> "However after a few days I started to get smacked on the back of the head or kicks on the backside when the Brothers were walking past me. These were for no reason whatsoever. The Brothers simply hit you and walked on without saying a word. This happened to me and to other boys frequently. I literally became afraid of them …".[332]

330 SPT 10553, 10555.
331 SPT 010.
332 SPT 041-042.

273 HIA 282's stay at St Patrick's was not long, and shortly before he left he:

> "must have received ten or fifteen thumps with the strap on my head and back"

for dropping crumbs from a sausage roll he was eating. There were marks all over his back and "a couple of lumps" on his head. When he got home his father happened to see the marks on his back, and went with a friend to confront the brothers, who threatened to call the police.[333]

274 HIA 100 named three brothers, BR 83, BR 94 and BR 47, as being violent or frightening. He wrote:

> "You would get the odd punch in the ribs, you were forever getting slapped and hit across the back of the head and stuff like that. They would hit you if you were cheeky or did not do what you were told but to be honest they did not need an excuse to hit you. I was just riddled with fear of them all the time."[334]

275 HIA 58 said that he was thrown into the swimming pool when he was unable to swim for attempting to abscond. He wrote that BR 26, a "tall skinny brother" and two others threw him into the "six foot end", and that it was "torture" to him; he never learned to swim but is still very scared of water as a result:

> "The punishment was so bad that I only tried to escape twice".[335]

276 HIA 272 described the way that BR 5 strapped him in the gym on a Sunday morning in front of the rest of the boys and other staff. He was bent over a chair in his boxer shorts and was given "six whips of the strap", which was made of leather, about eighteen inches long, with a split in it. These punishments were for theft and breaking a window.[336]

277 HIA 344 was admitted to St Patrick's in 1973; his main complaint concerned two lay housemasters, SPT 1 and SPT 2, alleging that they frequently slapped him on the back of the head, hit him with boots and flicked wet towels at him like a whip, causing big welts on his back and the backs of his legs. When he broke a saw blade, he was also punched in the eye by a woodwork teacher, SPT 89, resulting in a black eye. He puts his absconding mainly down to a wish to escape the physical abuse, and

333 SPT 044.
334 SPT 050.
335 SPT 057, 058.
336 SPT 080-081.

his description of life at St Patrick's otherwise indicates satisfaction with conditions. However, his absconding ended with his removal to Crumlin Road Prison and then Armagh Borstal.[337]

278 HIA 94 was also admitted in 1973, and like HIA 344, he alleges that the same two housemasters, SPT 1 and SPT 2, beat him when he was placed in a cell as punishment. He also states that on a few occasions the brothers made the boys get in a shower naked and then beat them with a strap with lead in it.[338] HIA 94 had been moved from Rubane when he was beyond control there, and after seven months at St Patrick's he was moved on to Lisnevin for the same reason.[339]

279 HIA 320 was in St Patrick's in the mid to late 1970s and he described a violent atmosphere, with "a few members of staff who were a bit vicious", including both housemasters, SPT 2 and SPT 78, and brothers, naming BR 4. Boys were punched or beaten with straps. SPT 2 said that he had had to man-handle HIA 320 into a time-out room, but never assaulted him. He also cast doubt on HIA 320's evidence.

280 HIA 227 was at St Patrick's in the same period as HIA 320 and he also noted the use of the leather strap by housemasters and the extensive bullying by older boys. As he was one of the youngest boys in the school he found it "hell at times".[340] HIA 54 was also there in the same period, and he recalled the brothers beating boys with leather straps and being hit over the head with a bunch of keys by BR 50.[341]

281 HIA 50 was only in St Patrick's briefly at the end of 1986. He says he was beaten daily by two boys, but it was the caretaker whom he feared, who caned him across his "back, head, neck and across the back of the legs" when the police returned him from absconding.[342] HIA 275, who was admitted in 1987, made a similar statement about a watchman SPT 64, who:

> "physically assaulted me almost every time I returned to St Patrick's after absconding. He threw me into a cold shower and beat me with a big blackthorn stick he used to have. He hit me up to fifteen times with the stick and I was often bruised."

337 SPT 091-092.
338 SPT 099.
339 SPT 100.
340 SPT 129.
341 SPT 152.
342 SPT 187.

Another lay member of staff was cruel and hit him with wet towels or a bunch of keys. He had no complaints about the brothers.[343]

282 BR 94 candidly stated that he strapped boys and gave some a clip round the ear.[344] Otherwise, the brothers and lay staff who gave evidence all denied physical abuse. Formal recorded punishments were acknowledged, but the excessive and informal punishments described above were denied. We did not find the denials persuasive.

283 The accounts of the former residents and former staff of physical abuse are clearly at odds, but the volume and detail of the allegations are more persuasive than the denials. The emotional weight attached to the physical attacks will probably have rendered their memory more significant to the victims than to the abusers. It should be noted that most of the allegations of physical abuse relate to the 1960s and early 1970s. The abuse alleged in the 1980s appears to have related largely to one member of night staff. This would suggest that the practice of casual physical abuse as a means of control generally died out in the last two decades of St Patrick's existence. The prevalence of unauthorised physical punishment in the 1960s and early 1970s was, however, contrary to the Training School Rules, and constituted systemic abuse.

Peer Physical Abuse

284 There appears to have been an undercurrent of violence and bullying which came and went from time to time, depending in part on the discharge of older boys who, sometimes in groups, intimidated younger ones. It is a common feature in residential child care that the atmosphere established by the staff is replicated among the children, whether for good or ill, and where the atmosphere is abusive it can have a corrupting effect. The harsh regime imposed by the staff in the 1960s and early 1970s, with the use of physical force to maintain control, may therefore have provided a model for relationships among the boys. Many of the boys will, however, also have experienced violence at home or been belted at school or, during the Troubles, even experienced punishment beatings, or the threat of them, at the hands of paramilitaries. Physical punishments by staff will only have confirmed such boys' experience that 'might is right' in obtaining what they wanted.

343 SPT 193.
344 Day 147, pp.31 and 32.

285 HIA 162 described an occasion when two older boys who used to beat him took him to Black Mountain and "tortured" him, saying that they were from the IRA (a claim he did not believe) and that he was an informer. He was bleeding and bruised when he got back to St Patrick's but he received no treatment. This appears to have been a one-off event.[345]

286 HIA 162 said that birthdays were celebrated by boys gathering round, singing "Happy Birthday" and then giving the birthday boy a kicking.[346]

287 HIA 320 commendably admitted to having become a bully in order to survive, a fact of which he is now ashamed:

> "There was frequent bullying going on and I ended up being a bully myself. There was a tier system between the boys and I was able to handle myself but I hate myself for that today".[347]

288 In view of the limited range of examples provided by witnesses, peer physical abuse does not seem to have been a persistent problem.

Emotional Abuse

289 HIA 96 was the only witness to allege that he had been emotionally abused. He felt that he had been "kidnapped" by the state and should not have been at St Patrick's at all.[348] He therefore saw any denial of contact with his family as emotionally abusive, and alleged that staff manipulated the points system so that he could not go home.[349] He also alleged that he was placed in Slemish House for punishment without justification, after an incident had escalated when he fought back after an unjust accusation.[350] While we have no reason to doubt the allegation, no other witnesses alleged emotional abuse.

290 As it was a large institution, much of the care offered by St Patrick's must have been fairly basic and impersonal; it would only have been in its last two decades that staffing was sufficient to pay adequate personal attention to individual boys. However, unlike some of the other large homes we have considered, a substantial number of the boys came to St Patrick's from their family homes and they had experienced parental care in their early years. Indeed, continued contact with families was encouraged at

345 SPT 108.
346 Day 140, p.64.
347 SPT 115.
348 SPT 217.
349 SPT 221-222.
350 SPT 221.

St Patrick's, and many boys were visited regularly and/or went home at weekends. They would not, therefore, generally have experienced the emotional deprivation that children brought up throughout their lives in residential care from nursery onwards would have suffered.

291 It is our conclusion that emotional abuse was not a systemic problem in St Patrick's.

Neglect

292 Some witnesses said that they were always hungry, or that their clothes were second-hand, but such references were few. Others said that they did not receive medical treatment for injuries, such as HIA 26. He slashed his wrists and BR 26 cleaned and bandaged the wounds.[351] In view of the large numbers of boys who were admitted to St Patrick's over its lengthy history, these allegations do not present a picture of neglect sufficient to term it systemic. This conclusion does not invalidate the witnesses' experiences, but reflects the need for more substantial evidence to determine that problems were systemic.

Allegations of Unacceptable Practices

Silence at Meals

293 HIA 100 mentioned that when he was at St Patrick's, from 1964 to 1966, boys were not allowed to speak at meal times.[352] He recalled an incident in which eight boys had been lined up for talking in dinner.[353] Requiring silence in mealtimes was a carry-over from earlier institutional practice when it was a common means of maintaining order if a large number of children were gathered in one place, since the maintenance of control was a sine qua non of such establishments.

294 However, by the mid-1960s child care practice was changing and, since meals were now thought of as social occasions, maintaining silence was considered poor child care, though it could not be termed systemic abuse. The practice generally changed when smaller units were introduced and meals could be taken in family-sized groups. When the chalets were opened at St Patrick's, for example, the boys ate in their units in groups of about ten.[354]

351 SPT 074.
352 Day 138, p.128.
353 Day 138, p.128.
354 Day 140, p, 85.

Excessive Chores

295 Unlike some other homes, there were few allegations about boys having to do excessive chores. HIA 58 said that he had to polish three dormitories on his own, "when the Belfast boys were out" with cloths under his feet, and that he had to wash pots and pans in the kitchen for six months, suffering dermatitis as a result.[355] Again, while such demands would have been excessive, the small number of complaints does not amount to systemic abuse.

Interception of Post

296 HIA 58 said that in the late 1960s his mother enclosed money in her letters which did not reach him,[356] and in the early 1970s HIA 162 alleged that letters were put on his file and were not given to him.[357] HIA 384 also complained that his mail was intercepted in the 1990s when he was in Slemish House, which was at that time a secure intensive care unit.[358] As a member of staff, SPT 2 said that the post in Slemish House was not intercepted, but that boys opened their letters in the presence of staff.[359]

297 It would have been reasonable practice for money to be removed from letters and banked for the boys, in order to avoid the temptation of theft by other boys or the use of the money for inappropriate purposes. It would have been unacceptable for children and young people to be prevented from reading their letters unless there were exceptional reasons, but during much of the Inquiry's remit post would still have been intercepted and possibly read before it was passed to children in some homes and schools. The practices described by HIA 158 and HIA 62 would therefore probably have been unacceptable. However, there is insufficient evidence that the practice was widespread and we are not persuaded that it amounted to systemic abuse.

Failure to Take Action

298 A number of witnesses said that they informed other people who they thought would be sympathetic that they were being abused, but that they were not believed. In some cases the people approached simply felt it was beyond belief that brothers would abuse children sexually. It was also

355 SPT 058, 059.
356 Day 139, p.16.
357 Day 140, p.29.
358 SPT 50165.
359 Day 143, pp. 83 and 84.

because of this perception that boys did not report abuse, for example to their parents.

299 HIA 314 wrote:

> "I couldn't tell my parents about the abuse as they were very religious and would not accept that a member of the Catholic Church would do such a thing. There were two nuns there and they must have known about the abuse. We tried to mention it to the nuns because we thought we might get a bit of support or help from a woman but they just called us liars and hit us."[360]

300 HIA 229 told the bandmaster, who was strict and demanding but "a good man", about the abuse boys were suffering. The bandmaster told HIA 229 to leave it with him, but HIA 229 heard no more and does not know whether he took action.

301 HIA 272 told his housemaster SPT 2 whom he considered "a genuine and good person" about the abuse he was suffering. SPT 2 wrote out a statement and said he was going to act on it; HIA 272 heard no more, but surmises that SPT 2 was in a difficult predicament as he would have lost his job if he had complained. HIA 272 also mentioned a news story about abuse to his mother, but she did not want to believe that brothers would abuse people.[361] SPT 2 denied that he recorded HIA 272's statement and that he failed to take action in consequence. He pointed out that there was no corroboration of HIA 272's account, and that his job would not have been at risk if he was simply acting as a messenger on HIA 272's behalf. He said he would have acted on a report of sexual abuse.

302 HIA 162 made a complaint to one of the welfare staff, SPT 48, and he alleged that within an hour he was beaten and placed in a punishment cell where he was kept for three or four days. The cell had no windows but light was admitted through glass bricks. There was a hard bed with half a mattress, no food and no call system.[362] The brothers denied that any boy was held in a cell for this length of time.

303 HIA 314 reported that he had told the Bon Secours nuns who worked at St Patrick's about the abuse he had suffered. They called him a liar and hit him. The nuns may have been SR 74 and SR 75.[363]

360 SPT 006.
361 SPT 083-4.
362 SPT 110.
363 SPT 006.

304 In all of these cases, the proper practice was of course that those in receipt of complaints should have taken matters up with appropriate senior managers, or other responsible persons. However, for much of the period covered by the Inquiry's remit, the common way of thinking was that children who made allegations lacked credibility and it was unthinkable that religious and professionals would abuse children. People taking up the complaints also could possibly have jeopardised their jobs or their working relationships with their colleagues, and would have had to face the authority of the Roman Catholic Church or the state. It is understandable therefore at a human level if they failed to put themselves at risk in this way and challenge the system.

305 The Brothers, however, as a matter of good practice, should have created an atmosphere in which both staff and boys felt able to make complaints and report abuse. We consider it a systemic failure that a culture existed that meant that potential whistle-blowers felt unable to speak up.

306 Following the introduction of new complaints procedures with the Children Order 1995, there should now be no excuse for individuals who fail to report allegations of abuse.

307 As noted above, the police followed up the allegations made by SPT 96 against BR 26 and others very thoroughly.

Conclusion

308 St Patrick's played a key role in the training school system in Northern Ireland, providing education, trade training and care for boys from the Roman Catholic community. For the most part it appears to have fulfilled this role effectively, admitting 4,537 boys in the course of its 126 years history. The physical standards of care provided were adequate; the regime could be described as harsh, but for much of the time it was no more punitive than the day school system in the wider community, and HIA 96's description of the school as a "war zone", a continuous battle between staff and boys in which the state and Church combined to hold boys against their will, is not supported by the evidence of other witnesses.[364]

309 The main defect in residential care practice at St Patrick's was the persistent high level of absconding. The proximity of the school to the city of Belfast certainly exacerbated this problem but, although some measures were taken such as the opening of the secure unit in Slemish House, this issue was never adequately addressed or solved.

364 Day 142, p.123.

310 The Troubles presented acute problems for the school. Managing a large school for young offenders and disturbed adolescents is an exceptionally difficult task at the best of times, and it is to the credit of the staff and managers that St Patrick's kept going throughout this difficult period. It was, however, during the Troubles that one of St Patrick's two tragedies occurred with the death of Bernard Teggart, abducted and murdered by the IRA. The conduct of some of the staff during this episode was also questionable.

311 The second tragedy was the death of SPT 81, accidentally run over by other boys from St Patrick's, 'joy-riding' while absconding. The event highlighted the need for improvements in staffing and staff deployment, as well as the serious dangers associated with absconding.

312 There was both physical and sexual abuse at St Patrick's. There were three members of staff - two brothers and a chef - who between them were the source of about a third of the allegations of sexual abuse. All three were investigated by the police, who for different reasons took no action in relation to the two brothers, but the chef served a prison sentence for his offences. The remaining allegations were made against 24 brothers, 1 priest and 10 lay staff, or 38 adults in total, mostly in ones and twos in different years, suggesting no particular pattern of systemic abuse, though in the early 1960s there were allegations that there was a culture of low level sexual abuse in public among the brothers.

313 The allegations of physical abuse for the most part seem to have reflected the harsh regime, but there were a few occasions when formal punishment was excessive and there were periods such as the early 1970s when staff appear to have indulged in casual unjustified attacks on boys, perhaps as a way of asserting their control but creating an atmosphere of violence in the process.

314 Unsurprisingly in a large establishment for boys there was bullying, fighting, peer physical abuse and peer sexual abuse, perhaps partly influenced by the model offered by some of the staff and partly arising from the earlier experiences of boys who had suffered abuse at home.

315 At the start of the period covered by the witnesses' evidence the school moved from Milltown to a new large building in Glen Road, and was over time remodelled by providing smaller units and a more homely model of care. Staffing and staff training were also considerably improved. In consequence over its last four decades the school developed from a highly institutional regime to a residential social work model, which by the time of the school's closure was well up to date.

316 Without in any way diminishing the significance of the two tragic deaths or the suffering of the 24 applicants who shared their experiences of abuse at the hearings of the Inquiry, these failings have to be seen in the context of the 4537 boys who went through the doors of St Patrick's, some of whom clearly enjoyed and benefited from their stay.

317 On behalf of the Diocese of Down and Connor the Very Reverend Timothy Bartlett expressed their sincere and profound apologies to any person who had been abused while at St Patrick's, especially in view of the high ideals espoused by the members of the Order when acting in loco parentis.[365]

Summary of Findings

318 The following are the issues which we consider constituted systemic abuse at St Patrick's:

(a) We consider that the failure of St Patrick's to conform to the Training School Rules in respect of secure accommodation and of the Inspectorate to note the breaches and take action, constituted systemic abuse. (Para. 75)

(b) We consider the use of informal corporal punishment was systemic abuse. (Para. 84)

(c) We consider that permitting older boys to punish others when supervising them in the dormitory was a breach of the Training School Rules and was systemic abuse. (Para. 88)

(d) The humiliation of stripping a boy naked to stand in full view on a number of occasions constituted systemic abuse. (Para. 91)

(e) The failure to report the abductions of Bernard and Gerard Teggart to the Police was clearly a systemic shortcoming on the part of the Brother Director. The failure of the Board of Management to meet immediately after the boy's death, to investigate and to provide support to the staff and boys was negligent and constituted systemic abuse. (Para. 119)

(f) There is nothing to suggest that the NIO took any steps following the death of Bernard Teggart to investigate whether any policies or procedures needed to be changed to protect boys from suffering a similar fate, and their failure to do so represents a systemic failing on their part. (Para. 120)

365 SPT 855.

(g) Statistical returns concerning absconding were provided by St Patrick's to the NIO and these records would have been open to Inspectors when they visited. Prior to the concern raised by the death of SPT 81 neither the NIO nor the SSI had raised absconding as a major issue with St Patrick's and we consider this a systemic failure on their part. (Para. 136)

(h) The failure to circulate the findings of the report on absconding from Rathgael more widely and assist St Patrick's in finding ways of dealing with persistent absconding was a systemic failure on the part of the NIO. (Para. 137)

(i) Furthermore, the APRU, which had been set up as a combined unit to support all the training schools and which had undertaken the research on absconding, also failed to share their findings with St Patrick's, when they must have known that it had a similar problem. (Para. 138)

(j) The failure of St Patrick's to take adequate measures to counter absconding constituted systemic abuse, in that it left boys vulnerable in terms of the risks they faced when absconding, in the patterns of criminality which were fostered while absconding, and in the effect of their absconding pattern on their later lives. (Para. 141)

(k) We consider that the frequency with which the secure rooms were used and their use for young children, contrary to the Training School Rules, amounted to systemic abuse on the part of St Patrick's and by the SSI in failing to address this breach of the Rules. (Para. 168)

(m) The failure to appoint sufficient staff amounts to negligent management, and we consider it to be a systemic failure. (Para. 178)

(n) St Patrick's was not inspected between 1971 and 1988, and we consider the lack of formal inspections a systemic failing. (Para. 186)

(o) We therefore consider the sexual abuse perpetrated by the Brothers, particularly as reported in the television room, to have been systemic. (Para. 223)

(p) The Order has stated that they do not see the allegations as well founded, but it is our view that BR 1 sexually abused boys while he was at St Patrick's and that this constituted systemic abuse; if he had been apprehended and had not been promoted to be Brother Director of Rubane House, the boys there would not have been abused by him. (Para. 229)

(q) It is our view that, taking account of current practice in the mid-1990s, Bishop Farquhar was at fault in failing to suspend BR 26 during the police enquiries and in undertaking their own limited investigation, and that these failures were systemic, potentially putting the boys then and subsequently at St Patrick's at risk. (Para. 242)

(r) We consider the failure of the Brother Director:

- (i) to inform both the police and his Committee of the allegations of abuse by DL 137 in 1978 and again in 1980,
- (ii) to dismiss DL 137, permitting him to resign,
- (iii) to protect potential victims of sexual abuse in providing DL 137 with a positive job reference which omitted the reason for his departure from St Patrick's to be systemic failures. (Para. 259)

(s) The prevalence of unauthorised physical punishment in the 1960s and early 1970s was contrary to the Training School Rules, and constituted systemic abuse. (Para. 283)

(t) We consider it a systemic failure that potential whistle-blowers felt unable to speak up. (Para. 305)

Chapter 13:

Module 7 – Youth Justice Institutions: Introduction

Introduction

1 This Introduction deals with a number of different types of institution which admitted young offenders. Over the period covered by our Terms of Reference the legislation governing these institutions, the names by which different types of institution were known and the institutions themselves all changed as the systems evolved.

2 In Module 4 we considered Nazareth Lodge, which was an industrial school until 1950. In Module 7 we heard witnesses from St Patrick's, which was an industrial school and reformatory until 1950, when it became a training school. In the same Module we also considered Rathgael, a training school which admitted both boys and girls, a few of the witnesses having also been in Malone or Whiteabbey, Rathgael's predecessors. We also heard from applicants who had been in Lisnevin, a secure training school, and Hydebank, a young offenders' centre. In Module 10, witnesses who had been in Millisle, a borstal, gave evidence. In Module 11 we heard from applicants who had been in St Joseph's, which was the only training school specifically for girls which we considered. The purpose of this Introduction is to explain the differences between the types of institution and the way in which the system evolved.

History

3 In the first half of the nineteenth century there were no specialist institutions for children and young people. Young offenders were sent to prisons which were for adults, and children in need were placed in workhouses. Two Acts in the second half of the nineteenth century provided the basis for institutional care in Ireland for children and young people for nearly a hundred years, establishing the reformatories and industrial schools which were later transformed into training schools.

4 It was common practice to base legislation for Ireland on laws which had been passed for England and Wales. Following the Reformatory Schools (Youthful Offenders) Act passed in 1854 "for the training and reformation of older boys who had committed offences against the law" in relation to England and Wales, the Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Act was passed in 1858, with a view to keeping young offenders out of adult prisons in Ireland, though it was 1893 before it ceased to be mandatory for children to spend an initial period in prison before being moved to a reformatory.

5 Malone Reformatory, which was Rathgael's predecessor, was opened in 1860, and in 1872 a training ship, HMS Gibraltar, was moored in Belfast harbour.

6 A decade after the Reformatory Schools Act, following the Industrial Schools Act 1857 in England and Wales, the Industrial Schools (Ireland) Act 1868 provided for setting up Industrial Schools for:

> "neglected, orphaned or abandoned children", "for the rescue and care of younger boys…who were in danger of becoming delinquent".

In part, this Act was designed to help children avoid placement in a workhouse. To be registered, each school was required to draw up rules, to be approved by the Secretary of State, concerning the governance and conduct of the school.

7 St Patrick's was opened as an industrial school for Roman Catholic boys in 1869, and after periods at two other sites in Belfast, it settled in Milltown in 1873, where it remained until 1957. St Joseph's was established for girls in 1881 by the Sisters of St Louis under this Act. On the same site the Sisters also ran an orphanage and a boarding school, which closed in 1942.

8 The Sisters of Nazareth opened Nazareth Lodge in 1900 as a children's home, but in 1902, despite misgivings, it was registered as an industrial school. The number of boys sent to them under court orders appears to have been low, and there were tensions at times because of their need to care for a wide spectrum of presenting problems. Nonetheless Nazareth Lodge retained the role of industrial school until 1951.

9 In 1902 a new type of institution was trialled in England at the village of Borstal, intended as "a half way house between prison and the reformatory" for young offenders. A pilot borstal was opened at Clonmel, Co Tipperary in 1906, but none was opened in what is now Northern Ireland.

10 The Children Act 1908 applied to the whole of Great Britain and Ireland and, known as the Children's Charter, it provided the basis for children's services in Ireland for several decades, establishing juvenile courts, for example. Under this Act reformatories and industrial schools were funded by a combination of central government, local government and parental contributions.

11 With the partition of Ireland in 1921, separate systems of industrial schools, reformatories and borstals had to be established in both Northern Ireland and what is now the Republic of Ireland. At the time of partition a third of the trainees in Clonmel borstal were from Belfast. Boys requiring borstal training in Northern Ireland were sent at first to Feltham in Middlesex, and later to Greenock in Scotland. A Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Northern Ireland was set up, which became known as the Moles Committee, and it concluded that a borstal was required in Northern Ireland for males, but that the demand for places for females was too low to warrant setting up a borstal for them. Following the Malone Training School Act (Northern Ireland) in 1926 a semi-secure borstal was sited at Malone, with a single governor responsible for both the training school and the borstal.

12 The Departmental Committee also considered reformatories and industrial schools. A system was established in Northern Ireland which consisted of five industrial schools, four institutions which were both industrial schools and reformatories, and one reformatory. Young people were also admitted to HMP Armagh and HMP Belfast. Some of these institutions were already in existence, and some were newly established. The Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools appears to have rationalised the system, as six of the institutions were either closed soon afterwards or had their roles modified.[1] (see Appendix 2)

13 It was found, for example, that there was no reformatory in Northern Ireland for Catholic boys, and so from 1922 St Patrick's, which had been set up as an industrial school in 1869, was given an additional role as a reformatory, and it was thereafter registered and inspected as both an industrial school and a reformatory, serving both young offenders and boys requiring care and education away from their families. It will be seen that from 1922 onwards the dual requirement to meet the needs of these two groups caused difficulties which were resolved in different ways, but continued to re-emerge, not only in St Patrick's up to the closure of the school in 1996, but also in other institutions serving both groups. St Patrick's was based at Milltown but in 1957 it moved to new premises about a mile away on the edge of Belfast.

14 Malone Reformatory was managed by a voluntary board, but in 1926 it was brought under the Ministry of Home Affairs by the Malone Training

1 SPT 1601-1602.

School Act (Northern Ireland), and in 1927 a borstal wing was added. Prior to this Act, the training school system had been essentially provided by voluntary bodies and the state had no direct control.

15 In England and Wales there were Acts in 1932 and 1933 which served to develop and regulate children's services. Reformatories and industrial schools were renamed approved schools, and the Approved School Rules were introduced. These were standard rules, applied to all the schools for young offenders. The two Acts were not replicated in Northern Ireland for economic reasons, and so the reformatories and industrial schools continued to make use of their own rules under the Acts of 1858 and 1868 respectively.

16 It was recognised that the system needed to be improved and so a working party known as the Lynn Committee was set up. It drew up recommendations for the modernisation of the system in 1938, but the Second World War intervened, and no action was taken.

17 During the Second World War the demand for places in training schools was such that St Patrick's acquired additional premises at Forkhill, Co Armagh which catered for junior boys, with the overall established number increasing to 225.

18 In 1945 Whiteabbey Reformatory School was certified for girls and a year later it was also certified as an industrial school. It was intended to meet the needs of Protestant girls, as St Joseph's served the Roman Catholic community.

19 Major change was required by the time the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 was passed, and it incorporated further developments taken from England and Wales's Children Act 1948. It was in 1952, following the implementation of this Act, that the Training School Rules were introduced, based largely on the English and Welsh Approved School Rules.

20 Rather than use the term 'approved schools', reformatories and industrial schools were all renamed training schools in Northern Ireland, blurring the distinction between the care and justice elements. This term applied until 1996 when the training school system was disbanded following the implementation of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. The Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) was made responsible for the schools, including their finance and inspection.

21 Under the 1950 Act the Sisters of St Louis were invited to register St Joseph's, Middletown, as a training school; in accepting this role they closed the orphanage, though the remaining children stayed on. Malone, Balmoral and Whiteabbey were also registered as training schools. The Sisters of Nazareth, on the other hand, decided that Nazareth Lodge should be registered as a children's home, rather than as an industrial school, as so few of the children in the home were committed by the courts.

22 Woburn House was usually known as Millisle Borstal; it was opened in 1956 and admitted male offenders aged 16 to 21. This was an open borstal, situated in a mansion, but in 1977 a purpose-built closed borstal was opened, sited within the same grounds. Both the open and closed borstals were closed in 1980.

23 In 1956 the Malone and Whiteabbey Training School Act merged Malone and Balmoral training schools and a single Management Board was set up for Whiteabbey and Malone. The borstal wing of Malone was transferred to Millisle; during the previous three decades Malone had been largely staffed by Prison Service staff.

24 Plans were in hand at this point for a purpose-built establishment at Rathgael to take over from Malone training school, but temporary accommodation had to be used as the new premises were not ready. The new buildings at Rathgael were opened in 1968 and Malone was closed. This move was intended to introduce a new approach to the care and treatment of young offenders. In 1985 Whiteabbey School was closed and the remaining girls were transferred to Rathgael, making it the first mixed training school in Northern Ireland, and the only training school for Protestant boys and girls in the province.

25 It will be seen in the histories of the individual homes that the Troubles, which commenced in 1969 and continued for many years, caused considerable difficulties for training schools, because of the number of young people who were involved in civil disorder and required containment in a residential setting. The Troubles led not only to an increase in the number of remands and Training School Orders, but the children and young people in residential care were also at greater risk, for example when visiting their families in areas affected by rioting and housing problems, and it will be seen that the schools themselves were directly affected by the unrest. It was during the Troubles that direct rule was imposed, and in 1973 the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) took over responsibility for the funding and inspection of the schools, though the MoHA Inspectorate continued to undertake inspections on behalf of the NIO.

26 It was in 1973 that Lisnevin was opened as a training school, consisting of an assessment unit to assist the courts in determining the suitability of boys for residential training and a secure unit for boys who absconded from the open training schools. It admitted both Protestant and Catholic boys. The opening of Lisnevin came at a time of considerable pressure because of the number of adolescents who got caught up in social disorder in the Troubles. Because of pressure from the local community, Lisnevin was resited at Millisle, which had previously been used as a secure borstal.

27 The Treatment of Offenders Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 was designed to introduce a new approach to the management of young offenders, and in June 1979 Hydebank Wood Young Offenders Centre was opened. As a consequence, the open and closed borstals at Millisle were closed the following year.

28 In 1985 a remand unit was opened at Lisnevin. Previously there had been no specialist unit for young people on remand, and the training schools had been expected to provide the service in addition to their usual remit of caring for the boys committed to them.

29 During the period 1979 to 1985 three influential reports were published which all had an impact on the quality of care offered by the training schools.

(a) In 1979 the Black Report was published, which recommended the splitting of the care and justice aspects of training schools and the development of a range of smaller specialist homes. For a variety of reasons, these recommendations were not implemented for some years; it was not until November 1986 that the Prior Compromise led to the adoption of the main principles of the Report, and we have been told that action on some aspects is still outstanding.

(b) The Sheridan Report followed in 1982, recommending improvements in staff selection, supervision and other aspects of the management of residential childcare services.

(c) In 1985 the Hughes Report was published, recommending the professionalisation of residential childcare through improvements in pay and training. Around this time large numbers of training school staff were seconded for qualifying training and the proportion of trained care staff was greatly improved. The contents and impact of these three reports are addressed more fully in other chapters of our report.

30 The period from the publication of these reports to the end of the Inquiry's remit is marked by a range of improvements, such that by 1995 the quality of residential care in Northern Ireland, including the training schools, was possibly better than in the other countries of the United Kingdom.

31 Among the early developments, in 1981 the Adolescent Psychological and Research Unit was set up, amalgamating the posts of the four psychologists who had previously been attached to individual training schools, so that they were able to provide a service to all the training schools.[2]

32 From the 1980s onwards, the demand for places in training schools began to fall away, and the occupancy was much reduced by the time that the system was disbanded and was replaced by Juvenile Justice Centres under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. Some of the training school sites continued to be used, however, with St Patrick's renamed Glenmona from 1996 and Rathgael known as Lakeside from 1998. These changes took place shortly after the end of the Inquiry's Terms of Reference.

33 Since little of the evidence we have received predates the 1950 Act, the witnesses' experience related primarily to the schools during the phase when they were known as training schools. The schools were, however, affected by their histories as reformatories and industrial schools, and they were in need of considerable modernisation when the 1950 Act was passed. It will be seen that the institutions in some respects continued to reflect traditional ways of working for some time, but that standards improved throughout the history of the training school system.

Types of Training School

34 Throughout much of the history of the training schools the provision was organised primarily to provide separately for boys and girls, and separately for Roman Catholics and Protestants. There were therefore four main types of school. St Patrick's served the Roman Catholic boys throughout this period, and Malone or Rathgael provided for the Protestant boys; Whiteabbey served the Protestant girls, and St Joseph's the Catholic girls.

2 LSN 1241.

35 Within Rathgael and St Patrick's there was also a division for a time between senior boys and junior boys. There were also often divisions between units designated for young offenders, known sometimes as the 'justice' units and those known as the 'care' units, for children and young people with other types of problem, whose behaviour at times was a greater cause for concern than that of the offenders.

36 Absconding proved a major problem in St Patrick's and Rathgael. One response was the creation of special units within the schools, offering security and intensive care. Another was the creation in 1973 of a secure training school, Lisnevin, which served both Roman Catholics and Protestants.

37 There were therefore five ways in which children and young people resident in training schools might be categorised – by gender, religious denomination, age, history of offending and the need for secure care. The divisions between the residential units which served all these categories of resident within the schools were at times quite marked and the different groups of children and young people were often not allowed to mix, even though they were living on the same site.

38 The Black Report recommended the development of specialist units, but one of the difficulties facing those responsible for planning the system was that the numbers of children and young people falling into some of these categories often fluctuated and could be small. As time went on, attempts were made to blur some of the distinctions described above. In 1973, for example, Lisnevin was set up as an interdenominational secure home for boys, and in 1986 Rathgael took in the girls from Whiteabbey, creating a mixed training school for the first time. Community-based services were also developed, curtailing the demand for residential care, while going some way towards meeting the need for specialist services. These developments appear to have continued after the end of the Inquiry's remit.

Mental Health Services

39 Lissue Hospital provided both paediatric and psychiatric services for children. For most of the time, the upper age limit for admission was thirteen, and very few older children were admitted. There was no other unit offering adolescent psychiatric help in Northern Ireland, and in consequence young people over the age of thirteen had to be placed in adult psychiatric wards or, if their behaviour suggested that they required some form of containment or control, they were placed on occasions in training schools, even though the placement may not have met their needs. This placed extra demands on training schools staff. If they too could not cope, the young person might have moved on to Millisle, Hydebank or even an adult prison.

The Prison Service

40 A number of witnesses spent periods of time in prisons before they had attained adulthood. However, they did not make allegations of systemic abuse which suggested that the prisons required investigation.

Conclusion

41 The training school system dealt with several thousand children and young people during the 45 years from its establishment to its closure in 1996. During that time the system was adequately funded. Physical standards of care were improved. Schools were built or modernised. Education, trade training and a variety of activities were provided. The schools oversaw home contact and provided social work support to families. Various aftercare programmes were devised and young people were supervised during their periods of licence. Taking account of the standards of the times, the system was professionally well run, and by the end of the period, the quality of service offered appears to have been excellent.

42 The borstal system in Northern Ireland also played a useful role in diverting young men from the prison system, and there were those who regretted its demise.

43 It will be seen that there were recurrent themes running through the development of services for young offenders. There were constant attempts to develop more humane approaches, to offer young offenders ways of breaking their patterns of offending and develop the skills they required for a constructive way of life. There was the need to adapt the systems to match changing needs, for example following the impact of the Troubles. There was the continual problem that institutions often had to meet the needs of different groups of residents or different functions, which were sometimes in conflict, and which the institutions were not equipped to address. Finally, there was the consequent need made explicit in the Black Report to develop specialist services for relatively small numbers of people, and in a province with a population of under two million this problem is likely to be ongoing.

Appendix 1: Chronology

1858	The Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Act was passed.
1860	Malone Reformatory opened.
1868	The Industrial Schools (Ireland) Act was passed.
1869	St Patrick's Industrial School was registered in Donegall Street, Belfast, and in 1873 it moved to Milltown.
1872	HMS Gibraltar was opened as a training ship, moored in Belfast Harbour.
1881	The Sisters of St Louis opened St Joseph's reformatory for Roman Catholic girls.
1893	It was no longer mandatory for children sentenced to a reformatory to spend an initial period in prison.
1902	After opening as a children's home in 1900, Nazareth Lodge was certified as an industrial school.
1906	A pilot borstal was opened in Clonmel, Co Tipperary.
1908	The Children Act known as the Children's Charter was passed, relating to the whole of Great Britain and Ireland. Under this Act reformatories and industrial schools were funded by a combination of central government, local government and parental contributions.
1921	The partition of Northern Ireland and the Republic.
1922	The establishment of a Government in Northern Ireland and the start of the Inquiry's remit.
1923	A Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Northern Ireland, known as the Moles Committee, was set up.
	St Patrick's Industrial School was also registered as a reformatory as there was no provision for Catholic boys in Northern Ireland.
1924	St Michael's Industrial School, Lurgan, was closed to boys.
1926	Malone Training School Act (Northern Ireland) was passed.
1927	Part of the reformatory at Malone was converted into a semi-secure borstal for boys.
	Hampton House Industrial School was closed.

1929	St Michael's Industrial School, Lurgan, was closed.
1933	The Sacred Heart Industrial and Reformatory School at Whiteabbey was closed.
1938	The Lynn Committee on the Protection and Welfare of the Young and the Treatment of Young Offenders reported.
1943	Shamrock Lodge ceased to be a reformatory, but presumably continued as an industrial school.
1945	Whiteabbey Reformatory School was certified.
1946	Whiteabbey was also certified as an industrial school.
1949	St Catherine's Industrial School in Strabane was closed.
1950	The Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) was passed, amalgamating the industrial schools and reformatories as training schools. The Ministry of Home Affairs was given responsibility for training schools and for providing the necessary finance.
1952	The Training School Rules were authorised under the 1950 Act.
1953	The Prison Act (Northern Ireland) was passed.
1954	A borstal was set up for girls at HMP Armagh.
1956	The borstal moved from Malone Training School to Woburn House, Millisle.
1957	St Patrick's had moved from Milltown to purpose-built accommodation in Glen Road and their buildings were officially opened..
1961	The girls' borstal at HMP Armagh was closed.
1968	The Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) and the Treatment of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Act were passed. The Malone and Whiteabbey Training Schools (Northern Ireland) Act 1968 was also passed, renaming the Board managing the schools the Rathgael and Whiteabbey Schools Management Board.
	Malone School was closed and Rathgael was opened.
	The Troubles started.
1972	The Northern Ireland Office was established and took over the control of the training school system from the Ministry of Home Affairs.

	The Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order was passed.
1973	The Ministry of Home Affairs became the Department of Health and Social Services, and the Inspectorate was renamed the Social Work Advisory Group.
	Lisnevin Training School opened with a secure assessment unit and a long-term special unit for committed boys.
	At Crumlin Road Prison a Junior Remand Wing was opened, and so "young terrorists" were not sited at Lisnevin.[3]
Nov 1973	Bernard Teggart was abducted from St Patrick's and murdered by the IRA.
1976	HMP Magilligan received some young offenders.
1977	Young male offenders at Magilligan were transferred to the borstal.
	The assessment unit at Lisnevin was moved to Blacks Road as a day assessment unit.
	A purpose-built closed borstal was opened on the Millisle site.
1978	The Treatment of Young Offenders Act (Northern Ireland) 1978 was passed, to introduce a new approach to the management of young offenders.
1979	The Black Report was published.
	Following the 1978 Act, Hydebank Young Offenders Centre opened.
1980	As a result of the opening of Hydebank, both the open and closed borstals at Millisle were shut.
Sept 1980	The special unit at Lisnevin moved to the Millisle site.
1981	The Adolescent Psychological and Research Unit was set up, amalgamating the four psychologists who had previously been attached to individual training schools.[4]
1982	The Sheridan Report was published.

3 LSN 1234.
4 LSN 1241.

1985	Whiteabbey closed and the girls were transferred to Rathgael, which became mixed. This move had been planned, but was accelerated by a fire which severely damaged Whiteabbey.
	The juvenile remand unit at Hydebank Young Offenders Centre was closed, and a secure remand unit was opened at Lisnevin.
	The Hughes Report was published.
	The Social Work Advisory Group was renamed the Social Services Inspectorate and given a brief to inspect, rather than advise.
1986	Females were transferred from HMP Armagh to Mourne House, Maghaberry.
1987	All four training schools were inspected formally.
1988	HMP Armagh was closed.
1989	The reports of the formal inspections of the training schools undertaken in 1987 were published.
Aug 1994	SPT 81 was killed, run over by a car while absconding from St Patrick's.
1995	The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 was passed, enacting some of the Black Report's recommendations, and replacing training schools with juvenile justice centres.
1995	The end of the Inquiry's remit.
1996	St Patrick's closed and became Glenmona Resource Centre.
1998	Rathgael was closed and became Lakeside.

Appendix 2

Industrial schools, reformatories and penal institutions, either in existence or brought into existence in 1922, which admitted children and young people:

Balmoral Industrial School	Belfast Corporation
*Shamrock Lodge Industrial and Reformatory School	Voluntary/charitable
St Patrick's Industrial and Reformatory School, Milltown	Religious
*Nazareth Lodge Industrial School	Voluntary/charitable
*Sacred Heart Industrial and reformatory School, Whiteabbey	Religious
Malone Reformatory School	Belfast Corporation
St Joseph's Industrial and Reformatory School, Middletown	Religious
*St Catherine's Industrial School, Strabane	Religious
*St Michael's Industrial School, Lurgan	Religious
*Hampton House Industrial School, Belfast	Voluntary/charitable HMP Armagh
HMP Belfast

Starred institutions were closed between 1922 and 1950 when industrial schools and reformatories were redesignated as training schools under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, most of the closures occurring during the 1920s, presumably as a result of rationalisation. Shamrock Lodge continued as an industrial school only.[5]

5 SPT 1602-1603.

Chapter 14:

Module 7 – Rathgael Training School

The History and Role of Rathgael

1 Rathgael was registered as a training school for boys in 1968, but its role was rooted in the earlier history of the reformatory and industrial school system in Northern Ireland, and in particular Balmoral Industrial School, Malone Reformatory and Whiteabbey, a school for girls.[1] It will be noted that account has been taken of changes in social policy and childcare methods in considering the development of Rathgael and in making any criticisms of practice.

2 A former warship, the 'Gibraltar', was used as a training ship from 1872, and it was registered as an industrial school on 15 June 1877 to provide nautical training for over 300 boys so that they had the skills to obtain work at sea. It was moored in Belfast Lough, and when life on board proved unsuited to the care of the younger boys, an additional school was sited at Fox Lodge from 10 January 1884 on Ravenhill Road, Belfast. This school expanded to meet demand, and by 1897 it held 133 boys. To meet the increased requirement for places a site was acquired at Balmoral in September 1897, which opened in November 1897 to replace Fox Lodge. On 13 March 1899 the ship, by now renamed the 'Grampian', was closed and the remaining boys were brought ashore and placed at Balmoral, where a large new wing was added and junior and senior sections were established. The nautical traditions were maintained and it was not until 1934 that naval uniform was abandoned. The school at Balmoral was registered for 350 boys, but actually held as many as 442 boys.[2]

3 Following the implementation of the Children Act 1908, industrial schools were used less and the occupancy of Balmoral dropped. It was taken over by Belfast City Corporation on 30 June 1920, shortly before the partition of Ireland. When Northern Ireland was established in 1922, industrial schools such as Balmoral were re-registered. In 1939, with the outbreak of the Second World War, the school's premises were required as a military hospital, and so Balmoral moved to Shamrock Lodge on the Ballysillan Road, Belfast.[3]

4 Malone was originally established as a reformatory for boys in 1860 managed by a voluntary board. It was modelled on Redhill School, which

1 For a fuller history of Rathgael and its predecessor institutions, see RGL 22202-22246. We are indebted to Campbell Whyte and Lindsay Conway for much of the information describing the running of Rathgael.
2 RGL 22208, 22212, 22195-22196.
3 RGL 22196.

was opened in the eighteenth century, a predecessor of reformatory schools, run by the Royal Philanthropic Society in Surrey.[4] In its earlier years Malone was busy, but occupancy was variable at times. For example, around 1885 magistrates became more reluctant to commit boys for reformatory training, as it still entailed an initial period in prison, and around 1920 there was increased use of probation. After much negotiation, Malone was brought under the control of the Ministry of Home Affairs in 1926 under the Malone Training School Act (Northern Ireland) and in 1927 a borstal wing was opened. This meant that in the period from 1927 to 1968 a large proportion of the staff was drawn from the Prison Service.[5]

5 In 1945 Whiteabbey Reformatory School was certified for girls and a year later it was also certified as an industrial school.

6 In 1950 the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) was passed, amalgamating the industrial schools and reformatories as training schools. Therefore Malone, Balmoral and Whiteabbey were registered as training schools. Under section 72 of that Act, a court or the Ministry was obliged, in determining the training school to which a young person should be sent, to select, where practicable, a school for the religious persuasion to which the girl or boy belonged. As Roman Catholic boys attended St Patrick's and girls were placed in St Joseph's, the other three training schools in effect served Protestant children. The Malone and Whiteabbey Training School Act (Northern Ireland) merged Malone and Balmoral training schools in 1956, and the Malone and Whiteabbey Training School Management Board was set up. Temporary accommodation arrangements had to be made pending the opening of the new Rathgael buildings, and there followed an unsettled period when the Malone and Balmoral schools were combined.

7 In July 1956 the borstal wing at Malone was moved to Millisle, and in 1968 the training school was closed.[6] The boys and staff were moved from the combined Malone and Balmoral schools to purpose-built premises at Rathgael. This move marked the beginning of a new era. It was intended to take a more up-to-date progressive approach in the provision of care and education for the boys. There was a programme of staff secondment on qualifying courses in residential childcare in England, which introduced the students to different ideas. Housemasters and housemothers were appointed, a wider range of activities was offered, comprehensive assessments were undertaken on admission, and psychiatric support was made available.[7]

4 RGL 22220.
5 RGL 22196, 22221-22223.
6 RGL 22197.

8 Lindsay Conway, who was first employed at Rathgael as an assistant housemaster in 1972 said that he and a teacher, Campbell Whyte, considered themselves:

> "to be very much part of a new generation of staff being recruited into Rathgael aimed at developing new approaches and creating a different culture within the Training School sector."[8]

9 Despite the range of new ideas which were introduced, some of the traditional working methods and staff attitudes from the Malone and Balmoral era inevitably lingered for some time. Lindsay Conway wrote:

> "A small percentage of staff felt that their only approach, especially with the senior boys, was to be 'macho'; this resulted in a more regimented approach, with an emphasis on physical activity and a highly competitive regime. Over time this was replaced by a more relational approach to working with young people, and the introduction of marks and the setting of short-term goals."[9]

The change described by Lindsay Conway can be seen in the nature of the evidence provided by the witnesses.

10 Prior to the opening of Lisnevin in 1973, Rathgael was the only training school in Northern Ireland for Protestant boys, although a small number of young people were moved to community homes with education in England when secure accommodation or specialist forms of therapeutic care were required.[10] It was therefore expected to provide for boys with a wide variety of problems and cope with difficult behaviour. Campbell Whyte stated that Rathgael, despite being an open institution:

> "accommodated the most difficult, damaged, disturbed and, in some cases, delinquent children" from the Protestant communities of Northern Ireland.[11]

7 RGL 22231-22232.
8 RGL 5091.
9 RGL 5094.
10 RGL 5093.
11 RGL 1715.

11 From 1958 to 1985 Rathgael was an all-boys school, but in 1985 Whiteabbey was closed and the girls were transferred to Rathgael, which became mixed. The amalgamation also offered the opportunity for a change to be made from the division between a senior and a junior school to the provision of a justice side for offenders and a care side for non-offenders. This development was therefore the final stage in a process of amalgamation, which saw the functions of Malone, Balmoral and Whiteabbey combined on the one site at Rathgael. The numbers of children and young people requiring this type of residential care had clearly diminished considerably over the previous fifty years.[12]

12 The closure of Whiteabbey and the move to Rathgael had been planned to take effect by 3 June 1985, and measures were taken to reduce the number of girls for transfer. Indeed there were those who argued that all the girls who had been at Whiteabbey should have been discharged from there, so that Rathgael would admit only girls who had had no experience of Whiteabbey. However, the process of transfer was accelerated by a fire in March 1985 which severely damaged Whiteabbey.[13] Consequently, the amalgamation of the two schools was not trouble-free.

13 The ten girls who moved over did not want to be in Rathgael and when they were placed together in one unit there were disruptive and challenging behavioural problems. The girls were then split up between the other units, and they settled down.[14] The Whiteabbey staff also had some difficulty in coming to terms with a different way of doing things, but the two teams were integrated over time.[15] Rathgael continued as a mixed training school for thirteen years from 1985 to 1998, after the end of the Inquiry's remit.

14 In 1995 the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 was passed, enacting some of the Black Report's recommendations, and replacing training schools with juvenile justice centres. In 1998, Rathgael was closed but it continued to serve children and young people as a juvenile justice centre under the name of 'Lakeside', managed by the North Down and Ards Trust[16] It is estimated that between eight and nine thousand children and young people passed through Rathgael between 1968 and 1998.[17]

12 RGL 21685.
13 RGL 5099.
14 RGL 1722.
15 RGL 5099.
16 RGL 22197.
17 RGL 1714.

15 For the purposes of this chapter, the two main periods of concern are the 27 years from 1958 to 1985 when Rathgael was for boys only, and the ten years from 1985 to the end of the Inquiry's remit in 1995 when it was mixed. During this time Rathgael developed from its traditional reformatory and industrial school roots to become, in Campbell Whyte's words, "a more caring and educating establishment."[18]

The Premises

16 Rathgael was sited on the outskirts of Bangor, not far from the A2 to Belfast and thirteen miles from the city. The site, which covered 86 acres, was selected because of its easy access to Belfast, where a large proportion of the boys in the school came from,[19] though public transport access was poor in the immediate vicinity.[20] In planning the buildings, consideration was given to recent developments in the approved school system in England, adapted to meet the differing circumstances in Northern Ireland.[21]

17 There was a senior school and a junior school, with a cut-off point at the age of fifteen. The senior school had 70 places in three house units with a pre-release flat with twenty places, and the junior school had 94 places in four house units providing 80 places and a pre-release unit with fourteen places.[22]

18 The need for specialist units in Northern Ireland had been recognised, but the numbers of children and young people requiring some forms of care were very small. Lindsay Conway was critical of the way that training schools were expected to meet a very wide range of needs on the same premises.[23] To meet Northern Ireland's needs the solution devised in planning Rathgael was to follow the English model of house units, but to create a framework within which house units were divided by age and function, whereby different house units could adopt different approaches.

19 There was also a reception unit, which was able to undertake a five-week assessment of newly admitted boys, covering "educational, social, vocational, medical and, if necessary, psychological and psychiatric"

18 RGL 1717.
19 RGL 22233.
20 RGL 5092.
21 RGL 22233
22 RGL 1716.
23 RGL 5093.

aspects. It also provided for boys who were remanded for only a month, thereby leaving the longer-stay units less disturbed by frequent changes among the resident group.[24] The reception unit consisted of two wings for the seniors and juniors respectively, with shared facilities such as a dining room and a classroom in the centre of the building. There were dormitories of different sizes: for eight boys, six boys, four boys and two for two boys each, making 22 bed spaces in each unit. Staff accommodation was also attached.[25] Two of the other house units were single units, but the remainder were on a similar architectural model to the reception unit, in pairs with some shared facilities and staff housing attached. The units, incidentally, were given names that reflected stages in Rathgael's history, such as 'Gibraltar', 'Grampian', 'Fox Lodge' and 'Shamrock House'.

20 There was a semi-secure intensive care unit with seven places. This provided short-term care for children who were not coping in the open school, with a view to returning children to their house units in the open school. The reasons for placement in this unit included drug or glue addiction and absconding.[26] There were time-out rooms, equipped with secured bed frames, heavy duty mattresses, blankets and restrictions on permitted equipment, so that there were no materials which could be used as weapons or for self-harming.[27]

21 In addition to the intensive care unit there were eight units in all, with the potential therefore to house over 160 boys.[28] Campbell Whyte stated that Rathgael was registered to provide 203 places[29] but the actual number of children and young people resident appears to have fluctuated and the registered number appears to have been treated as a guideline, rather than a fixed ceiling which it was forbidden to breach. Campbell Whyte stated that when he joined Rathgael in 1973 there were about 210 boys on the roll and bunk beds had to be set up in recreation rooms.[30]

22 At the centre of the site was the administration block, which contained a number of general services, such as offices, the laundry, the medical centre, the central kitchen and some staff accommodation.[31] There was also an assembly hall, known as the chapel.[32]

24 RGL 22234.
25 RGL 1715.
26 RGL 1716.
27 RGL 5102-5103.
28 RGL 22235.
29 RGL 1714.
30 RGL 1715.
31 RGL 22235.
32 RGL 1715.

23 There were two other large blocks. The first consisted of the workshops, stores and some classrooms for the senior school. The second held the classrooms for the junior school, which included woodwork and metalwork classrooms; a gymnasium was attached, with a swimming pool nearby. There were also separate playing fields for the juniors and seniors, and additional sports grounds for matches.[33]

24 It has been noted above that staff accommodation was attached to each of the house units. The wives of the housemasters usually acted as housemothers, a development introduced on the new site. In all, there were eighteen staff houses, such that Rathgael formed a community of staff, as well as the boys and girls.[34] This had a number of potential advantages. At a practical level it meant that there were probably colleagues readily available to replace a sick member of staff, to assist in a crisis or to provide transport. On a more general level, the presence of a large number of staff gave scope to create supportive teamwork whereby staff knew that they had the backing of others to whom they could turn if necessary. Resident staff also often identified more closely with the school or home where they worked, and the availability of accommodation may have reduced staff turnover.

25 This brief description omits many of the additional facilities provided, such as equipment for the screening of films in the gymnasium, a pottery, greenhouses, a band room and so on. In short, Rathgael was provided with an excellent range of premises and equipment, equal to the best in the United Kingdom at the time of its construction.

26 There were also two other services for children that came under the control of Rathgael. The first was Runkerry, an outdoor pursuits centre near the Giant's Causeway, which was used not only by Rathgael but by other training schools and services for children and young people.

27 The second was the East Side Project, which offered 24-hour support for young people who had settled in east Belfast following discharge from Rathgael. The scheme offered help in finding work, in developing self-sufficiency and in participating in the community. It went on to take referrals from all over Belfast and had three houses for those who had nowhere else to live. Lindsay Conway said that the concept arose from the Black Report and the proposal was based on research he had undertaken concerning young people with no home base.[35] Campbell Whyte reported that this scheme won a national award in 1984.[36]

33 RGL 22235.
34 RGL 22235.

The Aims

28 The official aim of the school was:

> "to restore the child or young person to society better equipped mentally and emotionally to cope with the environment from which he came and to accustom him to the habit of work. It is a process of readjustment and social re-education, based on an understanding of the personality, history, abilities and aptitudes of each boy or girl and a knowledge of the family situation, and is promoted by
>
> (a) a stable environment which enables remedial influences to be brought to bear and progressive training to be given;
>
> (b) contact with the home; and
>
> (c) help and supervision after the boy or girl leaves the school."[37] [38]

Daily Life

Care and Justice Sides

29 The two parts of Rathgael were known as the care side and the justice side, and the split reflected the conclusion of the Black Report that young offenders should be dealt with separately from children with acute needs and behaviour problems who were non-offenders. The second group were known colloquially within Rathgael as the 'care bears'.[39] The division was not rigidly observed and some children were moved from one side to the other when it was felt that their needs would be met more appropriately on the other side. HIA 434, for example, was placed on the care side until he was involved in joyriding, when he was moved over to the justice side, which he found "very different", being "treated as if I were a criminal."[40]

35 RGL 5112.
36 RGL 1720.
37 RGL 1715.
38 This quotation is taken from A Social Psychological Evaluation of a Community Service Programme for Young Offenders in a Northern Ireland Training School, a thesis by Campbell Whyte, August 1981, pp.30-31.
39 RGL 083.
40 RGL 113.

House Units

30 Each house unit had its own team of staff led by a house warden, comprising housemasters and housemothers, together with teachers and instructors undertaking extraneous duties additional to their teaching role. Houses were encouraged to develop their own character and children were allocated to house units which were thought to match their particular needs.[41] In the reception house on the care side, residents were locked in their dormitories at night and had to call the care staff if they needed to go to the toilet. The other houses were open.[42]

Daily Routine and Education

31 The residents were awoken at 7.30am, and after breakfast at 8.00am there were morning jobs and some free time before school.[43] The school day started with assembly at 9.00am, held in a building called the chapel. The content of assemblies was non-religious and was designed to give the children positive messages, though at least two of the witnesses recalled assemblies as being Catholic services.

32 There was then classwork or work in workshops until lunch, which was served in the house units, followed by more classwork and workshops until about 4.00pm.[44] In the junior school, subjects taught included literacy, mathematics, geography, history and physical education, where possible matching the junior intermediate school curriculum in mainstream schools.

33 Several witnesses spoke about the quality of education provided at Rathgael, and most, but not all, were critical. Among the critics, HIA 200 said that the education was "very basic", such that he had difficulty adjusting when he returned to Bangor High School.[45] HIA 429 said:

> "...school in Rathgael...was like going back to primary school. I have dyslexia and no additional help or assistance was provided. The education was very poor and my level of education fell. For that reason I had more interest in practical subjects like woodwork, gardening and metal work than the academic subjects."[46]

41 RGL 1716.
42 RGL 111.
43 RGL 5103.
44 RGL 1718.
45 RGL 041.
46 RGL 108.

HIA 172 said:

> "If Rathgael was supposed to fulfil a child's educational needs I could never understand why I left Rathgael unable to read and write. I have taught myself everything that I know."[47]

34 HIA 231 said that school work was not compulsory and there were weeks at a time when she did not attend. The classes were of mixed ability, with twelve to fifteen children in a class. She said that her education essentially stopped when she went to Rathgael and she left without any qualifications.[48] Her education report from Rathgael described her as 'very difficult to teach'.[49]

35 HIA 503 said that her:

> "education consisted of colouring in pictures. I was not taught anything of value and I left there without any qualifications."[50]

36 By contrast with the critics, HIA 267 thought the education system was "fairly good" and he learnt to read, though he obtained no qualifications.[51] HIA 434 said that although some of them had short tempers the teaching staff were good to him. He explained that the whole school was put into five streamed classes, with the least able in Form 1 and the "very clever" in Form 5. This meant that the classes had mixed age groups and there was no set curriculum.[52]

37 The PE teacher, RG 17, was described as being good at sport but very strict. He had a real talent for gymnastics and he trained a team of boys from Rathgael to give displays.[53] HIA 267 found him "a positive influence";[54] others were afraid of him. HIA 429 alleged that RG 17 threw him into the swimming pool, which scared the life out of him, but he became a strong swimmer.[55] RG 17 denied having done so, and said it was his target to teach all boys at Rathgael to swim.[56]

38 HIA 172 said that RG 17 walloped him a few times, and that he was quite a violent man who:

---

47 RGL 021.
48 RGL 049.
49 RGL 46566.
50 RGL 132.
51 RGL 067.
52 RGL 112.
53 Day 152, p.181.
54 RGL 068.
55 RGL 108.
56 RGL 31323.

> "would slam children into the ground, twist their arms up their backs, use swimming flippers to whack them across the legs and throw things at them."[57]

HIA 429 said that RG 17 hit many boys with the largest plimsoll available at Rathgael.[58] RG 17 denied having done so[59] but several witnesses made mention of the plimsoll, which even had a name, being known as "Rufus".[60] [61]

39 Despite RG 17's denial, he stands out as the member of staff whom the witnesses accuse most frequently of physical abuse, and we accept the allegations that he applied informal corporal punishment which was unrecorded and contrary to the Training School Rules. RG 17 achieved success in Rathgael's sporting activities, nonetheless some of the children were afraid of him. We consider RG 17's practice of using frequent unrecorded informal corporal punishment unacceptable, amounting to systemic abuse.

40 In the senior school the main focus was on trade training, with departments to teach building, metalwork, motor engineering, painting, decorating, joinery, catering and horticulture, leading on to City and Guilds awards from the 1980s onwards. HIA 400, for example, completed a City and Guilds in motor engineering.[62] Classwork was optional for seniors.[63] Young people with a high level of academic ability attended local schools in the Bangor area to continue mainstream education and obtain qualifications.[64]

41 HIA 503 said that she had work experience in the kitchens, but that she spent the entire fifteen weeks making sandwiches. When the kitchen staff took their breaks she was locked in the kitchen on her own.[65]

42 At 4.00pm the children and young people returned to their house units for dinner and evening activities. These included classes in photography, art and typing as well as playing pool, table tennis, board games, watching television and doing hairdressing. There were also sporting competitions, mostly for football, pool and gymnastics and Rathgael Gymnastics Club

57 RGL 020-021.
58 Day 152, p.161.
59 RGL 31323.
60 RGL 040.
61 Day 152, p.26.
62 RGL 095.
63 RGL 1717.
64 RGL 5095.
65 RGL 132.

put on displays[66] HIA 200 also mentioned "patter tennis" played on miniature courts.[67] HIA 400 said that each house had to build a raft and they were raced across the lake.[68] These competitive activities appear to have taken place for the most part while Rathgael was for boys only.

43 HIA 503 complained that the residents were not allowed to select which television programme was watched, and that the pool table could only be used on the infrequent occasions that staff could accompany them.[69] Bedtime was at 9.00pm.[70] The nightwatchman had two large Alsatians which he took with him when he patrolled the dormitories.[71]

Activities

44 At weekends there was house cleaning on Saturday mornings, church parades in Bangor Protestant churches on Sunday mornings, and Sunday services conducted by chaplains on Sunday afternoons. HIA 429 said that there was always something planned for them to do at weekends, such as walks, swimming or videos. He joined the cycling club and was allowed to cycle home to stay with his father in Belfast.[72] In general, though, there was more free time.

45 Campbell Whyte also described a Community Service Programme, which he initiated in 1974. Young people were placed in a variety of community-based programmes (Rudolf Steiner, PHAB, and the Avoca Play Group, for example) where they took on the role of 'treaters' rather than being treated themselves. Over 150 boys participated in the first five-and-a-half-years, with minimal trouble.[73]

Health Care

46 There was a matron and two qualified nurses to provide 24-hour first aid cover, there were daily 'sick bay parades', a doctor visited weekly, and dental care was available on site.[74] When the girls from Whiteabbey joined Rathgael, a female doctor was also appointed.[75] The sick bay facilities were replaced in the 1980s by care provided by nurses visiting the house units.

66 RGL 1720, 1721.
67 RGL 041.
68 RGL 096.
69 RGL 130.
70 RGL 5103.
71 RGL 066.
72 RGL 108.
73 RGL 1719.
74 RGL 1721.
75 RGL 5096.

47 A number of witnesses were critical of the health care which they received. HIA 200 wrote:

> "There was no medical or dental care. There was a Matron ... but she just seemed to dispense Strepsils for every ailment."

Although medical investigations had identified a minor degree of cerebral palsy among other things when she was little, HIA 198 said that she was not given any medication or medical help at Rathgael.[76]

48 HIA 438 suffered appendicitis at a weekend, and at first was only given paracetamol by a locum doctor. When examined by Rathgael's own doctor on Monday after a weekend of agony, she was admitted to hospital for emergency surgery.[77]

49 HIA 182 said that ambulances were never called when children self-harmed as the staff did not want to draw attention to Rathgael. Instead, RG 11, who was a senior member of staff resident on site, was to be called.[78] RG 11 agreed that he might be called at night, depending upon the severity of the self-harming but denied that he would fail to call an ambulance or take a child to hospital if that was required.[79]

50 When HIA 438 had her first period she absconded to talk to her mother, and when she was returned to Rathgael she was put in isolation, and no one talked to her about the changes that were happening to her body.[80]

51 Staff found out that HIA 434 was having a consensual relationship with a girl at Rathgael, and he was required to attend the VD clinic every three weeks for about three months before he was informed that he was disease-free. He was then given sex education and some condoms.[81] He said he felt humiliated by this treatment, but we consider that the staff were taking sensible precautions.[82]

Clothing

52 In the earlier years, residents were required to wear a uniform but from the early 1980s they wore their own clothes.[83] HIA 172 said that his own

76 RGL 034.
77 RGL 120.
78 RGL 025.
79 RGL 4824-4825.
80 RGL 120.
81 RGL 114.
82 Day 153, p.135.
83 RGL 1721.

clothes were removed on admission in 1986, and they were all made to wear outdated humiliating clothes which marked them out as being from Rathgael when they were in Bangor.[84]

Food

53 Food was cooked in a central kitchen, but children ate in their own house units. HIA 267 thought the food was good[85] but HIA 386 and HIA 389 were both critical of the food, alleging that they were forced to eat undercooked meat, and as a consequence they both became vegetarians despite being provided with the same vegetarian dish every day.[86] HIA 503 also complained of the lack of choice for vegetarians.[87] HIA 198 described the food as disgusting and unfit for human consumption; the meals reaching Shamrock House were cold and rubbery.[88] HIA 83 said that the food was "horrible and watery", and that they had to drink from "a plastic cup and eat off plastic plates".[89]

54 From a staff perspective Campbell Whyte noted that there were complaints about the food in the 1970s and early 1980s, but measures were taken to improve the food and the chef was replaced.[90]

55 Most of the complaints quoted above concerning education, health care, food and other aspects of daily living relate to the period from 1985 to 1995 when Rathgael served both boys and girls. While some of the complaints may well have been justified and represented instances of poor childcare, we do not consider any of them to have amounted to systemic abuse, with the exception of RG 17's informal use of corporal punishment.

Family Contact

56 Visits by the residents' families were permitted, but the siting of Rathgael made visiting difficult for those who lived in parts of the province away from Belfast.[91] HIA 200's father visited him every week, but his mother had moved to Portrush and she visited less frequently as the journey was difficult.[92] HIA 400 was visited regularly by his mother, but his father was

84 RGL 015.
85 RGL 066.
86 RGL 082-083, 091.
87 RGL 129.
88 RGL 034.
89 RGL 003.
90 RGL 1721.
91 RGL 5092.
92 RGL 041.

an alcoholic and HIA 400 was "not sure he was even aware I was in any institution".[93] HIA 386 said she never had visitors, but she put that down to lack of interest on the part of her parents.[94] HIA 231 was visited weekly by her grandmother, whom she saw as the only positive influence in her life at that time, but she did not feel able to disclose the sexual abuse she was suffering to her grandmother, who was in her mid-seventies.[95]

57 Some of the witnesses had siblings and cousins who were also in Rathgael at the same time, but sometimes living in other units. HIA 503 said that when her brother was gravely ill she only learnt of it from her sister, who was in the care side. She was not allowed to visit him in hospital. When another brother visited and brought her a television, he was not allowed to see her, as he had not made an appointment, and she was not permitted to have the TV set.[96] When she spoke to a brother on the phone, HIA 503 was told that their conversations were not appropriate, and this resulted in her "pushing him away and rejecting contact with him", which she believed was a deliberate tactic to alienate her from her family.[97]

58 Residents had home leave, depending upon their progress in the school,[98] but children and young people had long journeys on their own if they lived some distance away.[99] Residents assessed as being eligible for leave were granted two-week blocks of time at home, and during this time staff from the house unit visited to monitor progress.[100] We consider the arrangements for family contact to have been broadly satisfactory.

Absconding

59 Absconding was a serious problem at Rathgael. The school was not a closed institution; it was not far from Belfast and the main road went near the school, so that absconding was fairly easy for any boy or girl wishing to run away. Absconding put children at risk as they could become involved in offending while on the run, and they were vulnerable to exploitation and danger, particularly during the Troubles.[101]

93 RGL 096.
94 RGL 085.
95 RGL 048.
96 RGL 131.
97 RGL 132.
98 RGL 1722.
99 RGL 5092.
100 RGL 5104.
101 A fuller description of problems associated with absconding and details of research findings are to be found in chapter 12 on St Patrick's Training School.

60 Lindsay Conway stated that:

> "no child would have willingly chosen to come to Rathgael, although many knew that there was no other option."[102]

He felt that absconding was triggered at times by external factors such as a wish to see a relative in hospital, but in other cases it was to avoid bullying by other residents or perceived mistreatment.[103] It is not surprising, therefore, that a substantial number chose to run away.

61 Campbell Whyte wrote:

> "Every time a young person absconded, this was reported to the local police. Rathgael received a lot of criticism because of the high level of absconding. In response to criticism by the North Down MP Jim Kilfedder, the Spectator newspaper ran an article on the school on 22 September 1991. Statistics at the time of the article in relation to absconding showed that in the previous six months, 54% had not absconded; 34% had absconded but many were just late back from home leave, a training programme or work, whilst some were absent for a day or two; only 12% were persistent and serious absconders - these were the cause of most concern."[104]

62 Caning was administered by the head or his deputy,[105] and this would appear to have been the way in which absconding was dealt with in earlier decades. In 1977 boys were put into corduroy shorts and baseball boots with no laces to prevent absconding.[106] [107] HIA 200 said that the police usually caught absconders quite quickly.

> "The staff would isolate you for a time after you were returned and you were made to wear shorts instead of jeans. The boys who ran away were closely supervised by a housemaster after they were caught."[108]

HIA 434 said that when he had absconded he was left for ten to fourteen days in an isolation room in his underwear, with a plastic mattress and a sheet. He was brought food on a tray three times a day, but was otherwise left isolated.[109] His records show that HIA 434 absconded on seventeen

102 RGL 5094.
103 RGL 5099.
104 RGL 1724.
105 Day 152, p.81.
106 RGL 003.
107 Day 152, p.75.
108 RGL 041.
109 RGL 112.

occasions, but there is no reference to the lengthy spell in isolation which he alleged.[110]

63 Because of the scale of the problem, the Adolescent Psychology Research Unit (APRU) was commissioned to carry out a review in 1991, which criticised the failure to monitor absconding. A Monitoring Group was set up therefore "to monitor, understand and reduce absconding." There were follow-up reports in 1992 and 1993. In 1992 it was noted that:

> "The number of absconders and number of abscondings in the Rathgael Centre has declined significantly in both absolute and proportionate terms. The number of absconders is reduced by 37%; the number of abscondings is reduced by 60%. This is attributable to the strategic management approach implemented by Senior Management. Given the inherent unpredictability and fluctuating nature of absconding the difficulty in sustaining this reduction should not be underestimated."

64 Action was taken to address this problem:

> "The young people were counselled on the likely consequences of absconding, and sanctions, such as depriving them of taking part in activities or freedom of movement were applied. In addition a number of measures were in place to reduce absconding in relation to:
>
> - carrying out detailed research to ensure improvements, if any, could be measured;
> - provision of a residential programme for homeless children outside North Down; and
> - and continuation of work on providing a semi-secure building to enable the more serious absconders to be locked in their rooms at night."[111]

65 The number of abscondings increased again in 1993, probably in part because of a 25% increase in admissions. The significant point as far as this Inquiry is concerned, however, is that Rathgael management recognised the seriousness of the problem and took sensible measures to address it.

110 RGL 994-99.
111 RGL 1724.

The Management of Difficult Behaviour

Corporal Punishment

66 In the early years, caning was still permitted, subject to the Training School Rules, but Campbell Whyte, who joined the staff in 1974, said that he never witnessed or administered corporal punishment. When corporal punishment was abolished in state schools under the Education (Corporal Punishment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 a Directive was issued concerning training schools and the practice stopped.

Points Systems

67 Campbell Whyte reported that "There was very little violence in Rathgael and none against staff until the last few years".[112] RG 24, however, said that "both verbal and physical assaults on staff [were] not uncommon"[113] and cited extracts from board minutes.[114] When a pupil was disruptive in the classroom, 'contracting' was introduced, whereby an agreement was made with the pupil to earn points for improved behaviour.[115]

68 There was also a points system to reinforce good behaviour. Marks were allocated by staff for good behaviour in class and in the house unit and for performance at school or in the workshops, for house-cleaning and for tidiness of rooms, as well as sporting activities. There were weekly 'Mentions Meetings' to discuss children's conduct and small monetary rewards were given.[116] High scores were rewarded with:

> "…full pocket money, full home leave and full participation in sporting and weekend activities."[117]

Negative scores could result in sanctions such as:

> "…reduction of pocket money, withdrawal of home leave, withdrawal of sporting activity and early beds."[118]

The Mentions Meetings were attended by all the residents and the house staff, and were held on Friday afternoons; they were also used to discuss activities for the weekend and routine matters concerning the house unit.

112 RGL 1717.
113 RGL 5098.
114 RGL 22790-22797.
115 RGL 1718.
116 RGL 1723.
117 RGL 5104.
118 RGL 5104.

Sanctions

69 Sanctions were based on the withdrawal of privileges such as pocket money, television, swimming trips, home leave and outings.[119] Campbell Whyte nonetheless acknowledged that:

> "There is no doubt that there was a difficulty in getting the balance right between care and control."[120]

70 Rather than deprive the residents of cigarettes completely, RG 5 chose to cut their cigarettes shorter, "At times…shortened to an inch long". HIA 503 said that this led to tensions among the residents, as any confiscated cigarettes were usually returned later on, while the parts of the cigarettes which were cut off were destroyed, which was resented.[121] [122]

71 HIA 267 said that, as a punishment, boys were given small hammers to chip tiles away from a swimming pool. Their hands were blistered and they had no protection against the dust. He considered this a degrading form of child labour.[123]

Close Supervision

72 Campbell Whyte reported that he was aware of three suicide attempts, though none were successful due to the vigilance of the night supervisors. There were other instances of self-harm through children cutting themselves or swallowing glass. To address this problem, Campbell Whyte set up a Self-Injury Monitoring Group which met monthly, monitored patterns of behaviour and considered any practical measures required, such as closer supervision.[124] Children and young people who self-harmed were often transferred to Shamrock House or Fox Lodge where such behaviour was more easily monitored and managed, with the close support of the APRU.[125]

Restraint and Isolation

73 In the event of difficult behaviour, young people were frequently restrained and placed in secure rooms, such as the Shamrock Room. HIA 503 wrote:

> "In my room at Rathgael there was no handle on the inside of my

119 RGL 1723-1724.
120 RGL 1717.
121 RGL 130.
122 Day 155, p.108.
123 RGL 066.
124 RGL 1726.
125 RGL 5110.

door, which was locked at night. There was a glass window in the door and staff would peer through this at night when I was in bed. We had buzzers in our room that we had to ring for staff to accompany us to the bathroom. I have always suffered from a weak bladder and would have to urinate frequently. When I would press the buzzer, staff would ignore it and I would have had to urinate in a container and dispose of the contents out the window. In place of a mattress I had a blue gymnastic mat. I had no bed sheet to cover the mat. I had one thin blanket and a pillow. During the winter months I was very cold."[126]

74 HIA 503 was critical of the use of isolation, seeing it as pointless and inhuman; she argued that it did not solve children's problems and that staff needed to talk to the residents, rather than shut them away.[127] HIA 198 endorsed HIA 503's description. Young people in Shamrock House had to ask to go to the toilet and they were accompanied by a member of staff. During the daytime they had to remain in one room, watching television together, and they were never allowed to be on their own. Bedroom doors were locked at night time.[128] They attended school, but were limited to colouring in pictures, completing crosswords and playing games on the computer.[129] In oral evidence she said that they were just sitting around doing nothing.[130]

Discharge

75 The ultimate sanction if Rathgael staff could not manage a young person's behaviour was removal to Millisle borstal or, later on, the Young Offenders Centre. This entailed endorsement by the NIO and an order signed by a lay magistrate. Campbell Whyte recalled two such instances.[131]

Case Management

76 Some children and young people were admitted to Rathgael in the first place as they required care because of a crisis in their personal or family life; this was often on a short-term or interim basis. Others were placed at Rathgael because of their offending. As noted above, these two groups were dealt with separately in the care and justice sides of Rathgael respectively.

126 RGL 129.
127 Day 155, p.91.
128 RGL 033.
129 RGL 034.
130 Day 155, p.72.
131 RGL 1727.

77 In each side, children were admitted to reception houses so that their needs could be assessed before being moved on to other units. In 1982 Campbell Whyte introduced Independent Assessment Treatment Profiles as a mechanism to develop an interdisciplinary approach to deal with the particular problems of individual residents, and he said it was deemed successful.[132]

78 Following assessment, residents' progress was observed and monitored. Staff were provided with sheets which gave them the information they required for the coming day or night, and they recorded any events that occurred on these sheets. If there were incidents, an additional form was completed, and if an incident was serious, it was drawn to the attention of senior staff.[133]

79 In Campbell Whyte's time, members of the Adolescent Psychological Research Unit visited Rathgael every day, and Dr Clenaghan, a psychiatrist, visited the school weekly.[134]

80 Lindsay Conway noted that when Training School Orders were made, the requirements were inflexible and some young people regressed after their first year at Rathgael because of uncertainty about their future placements.[135]

Discharge and Aftercare

81 Under the Training School Rules, it was a requirement that schools should provide aftercare. The discharge of residents related to the progress they had made and Rathgael Management Committee had a sub-committee which monitored the progress of boys and girls and decided when they should be released on licence. The licence was for a minimum of a year but, in accordance with a formula, it might have lasted up to nearly three years. The school was required to find appropriate accommodation (such as the child's family, boarding out, approved landladies or supported housing) and an occupation (return to mainstream education if young, higher education, supervised work placements or employment).[136]

132 RGL 1719.
133 RGL 5106.
134 RGL 1718.
135 RGL 5092.
136 RGL 1728.

82 An aftercare team was established, which evolved into a small community care department responsible for the oversight of aftercare of young people who had left Rathgael. Social workers were introduced to residents at an early stage and they then followed them through to discharge and during their aftercare on licence. The social workers provided support and supervision; liaison with schools; help with employment and work schemes; links with social services and probation; and the provision of reports to other agencies and courts.[137]

83 Witnesses provided very little information about the aftercare which they received. HIA 200 spoke appreciatively of the aftercare provided by RG 18 in his own time; he not only visited HIA 200 but also bought him hampers. Lindsay Conway, a senior member of staff, visited HIA 200 to check that all was going well, and he also attended court to support him.[138]

84 The East Side Project mentioned above, provided accommodation for young people who had no families to whom they could return, and this type of provision was expanded to include units in other parts of Belfast. In short, although the evidence is limited, it would seem that Rathgael fulfilled its aftercare obligations well.

85 HIA 268 said that one of her friends, RG 37, told staff that she did not want to return to her grandparents when discharged as she was being abused. She alleged that staff ignored this and on her first weekend home RG 37 took her own life.[139] A detailed report explains the work undertaken with RG 37 in the months prior to her death. She had earlier been subject to severe mood swings, but was apparently contented and positive about moving to live with her grandparents, and her suicide was a shock to all who knew her.[140] We accept the findings of the report and do not believe that there are grounds for criticising Rathgael.

Staffing

86 No information is available concerning staffing during Rathgael's earlier decades, but the information provided concerning the later years suggests that staffing numbers and training were satisfactory. Campbell Whyte stated that all the teachers were qualified, and that the care staff held either the Certificate of Qualification in Social Work or the Certificate

137 RGL 1720, RGL 5111, RGL 23888.
138 Day 152, p.44.
139 RGL 074.
140 RGL 28162-28164.

of Social Services. Such a level of professionally qualified staff would have been outstanding at that time. When unqualified staff with relevant experience were appointed they had to give a commitment to become qualified within five years.[141] Staff were also funded to attend local and national conferences.[142]

87 As noted above, many of the house staff were married couples, but in 1975 there were two male staff in every house unit.[143]

88 By contrast with the day care staff, night supervisors were unqualified. Campbell Whyte reported that the Inspectorate was keen to remove these staff and introduce qualified staff sleeping in on call.[144] This change was resisted, as waking supervision was necessary and the task of the night staff in relation to the children and young people was relatively straightforward and did not require the professional skills taught on CQSW or CSS courses. Furthermore, Campbell Whyte said that as Director he was contactable out of hours if there were problems.[145]

89 Lindsay Conway commented on the significant role played by chaplains, who provided pastoral care to young people and staff alike.[146]

Complaints

90 There was a complaints procedure in Campbell Whyte's time. Less serious issues were dealt with at house unit level by keyworkers and team leaders.[147] Staff were instructed to report more serious complaints by any of the residents to line management. If there were reasonable grounds for suspecting abuse, the issue was routinely reported to the local police, NIO and Rathgael Board of Management.[148] The member of staff was placed on precautionary suspension as "…the welfare…of the children was of primary importance."[149]

141 RGL 1721.
142 RGL 1725.
143 Day 152, p.61.
144 RGL 1726.
145 RGL 1722.
146 RGL 5095.
147 RGL 1727.
148 RGL 1718 and RGL 46333.
149 RGL 1727.

Governance

91 Reformatories and industrial schools came under the purview of the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA), though all of Rathgael's predecessor establishments were run by voluntary boards. From the implementation of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 they all became training schools, but responsibility for funding and inspection remained with the MoHA. With the implementation of the Malone and Whiteabbey Training School Act (Northern Ireland) in 1956 the MoHA took over direct control of the three training schools. From 1972 to the end of the Inquiry's remit in 1995 the Northern Ireland Office took over responsibility from the MoHA, which had by now become the Department of Health and Social Services following the implementation of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972. The Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG), which came under the DHSS, still provided professional support and advice to training schools by an informal arrangement with the NIO, which eventually became contractual. This role continued when SWAG was redesignated the Social Services Inspectorate, with a more rigorous inspectorial function.

92 Throughout its existence, Rathgael had a close working relationship with its host Government Departments and in particular the section responsible for support and inspection. Lindsay Conway wrote that the working relations between the Management Board, the NIO and the other training schools were good, with:

> "a familiarity and openness that enabled positive working, whilst allowing challenges to be made when appropriate."[150]

Contact with the Social Work Advisory Group, and later the Social Services Inspectorate, was frequent, offering ready access to advice.[151]

93 Rathgael was under the control of a Management Board which was answerable to the Ministry of Home Affairs, and later to the NIO. Members were appointed by the Secretary of State for three-year terms, with a maximum of two terms allowed. Board membership consisted of a cross-section of the community:

> "including clergymen, councillors, trade union representatives and independent individuals with an interest in youth care."[152]

150 RGL 5107.
151 RGL 5107.
152 RGL 5107.

94 The Board met monthly and had three main sub-committees, dealing with finance and property, the review of children's progress in accordance with the requirements of the Training School Rules, and staffing matters respectively.[153] Sub-committees were also set up to deal with specific issues, either concerning ongoing matters such as the management of the Runkerry site, or topical issues such as the high levels of stress and staff sickness experienced in 1984 following the integration of Whiteabbey and Rathgael.[154] Board members visited the school on a monthly basis, interacting with both staff and residents, and recording their visits in detail. The Board also had oversight of the implementation of innovative thinking.[155]

95 The Director reported monthly to the NIO, covering disciplinary matters and issues which might attract publicity, including any allegations of abuse. Campbell Whyte said that he and his management team devised a five-year business plan, which was presented to the Deputy Under-Secretary at the NIO, and thereafter he reported annually against the targets laid out.[156]

Finance

96 Finance for Rathgael was "adequate, perhaps generous" in the early days.[157] However, during the 1980s there were budget cuts. The senior management team, which was top-heavy, was reduced by 50% and twenty staff from the departments were made redundant, resulting in the closure of the painting and brick-laying workshops. With the exception of this cost-cutting exercise there is no indication in the records that shortage of finance affected the quality of services provided.

Inspections

97 As with other training schools, the Ministry of Home Affairs was for many years responsible for the inspection of Rathgael. There were inspectors on its staff, though it did not have an inspectorate as such. In 1973 the childcare responsibilities of MoHA were absorbed by the Department of Health and Social Services. Under the DHSS the Social Work Advisory Group was set up with its own management structure. From 1973 the

153 RGL 5108.
154 RGL 5098.
155 RGL 5108.
156 RGL 1723.
157 RGL 1725.

NIO was responsible for running and inspecting training schools but it made an arrangement with the SWAG to undertake the inspections; this arrangement was at first informal and later contractual. There was then a phase when the Social Work Advisory Group took on a less inspectorial role, offering advice and support instead of formal inspections. A more rigorous inspectorial regime was introduced in 1986 under the influence of the Hughes Inquiry, and SWAG was renamed the Social Services Inspectorate.

98 Only one inspection report concerning Rathgael is extant, dating to 1987. The inspection was undertaken as part of a programme of inspection involving all training schools in the wake of the Hughes Inquiry. The inspection covered two and half weeks and involved four inspectors, headed by Dr Kevin McCoy. The report indicates a thorough examination of the school and 74 recommendations were made for improvements.[158] Many of these were practical matters or recommended the review of various systems, but several related to locking up children and recommended a more liberal approach. The report recognised the massive changes which Rathgael had undergone in the previous four years, with the introduction of girls and the care/justice split. The lead criticism, however, related to the provision of information to residents and their families, and in particular to their opportunities to make complaints.

99 An inspection of Shamrock House Intensive Care Unit was undertaken in 1992 at the request of the Northern Ireland Office as part of a thematic review of secure accommodation and intensive care units, in the wake of the Pindown Report, to seek reassurances that children's rights were being observed and that the practices in Staffordshire were not replicated in Northern Ireland.[159] A team of three inspectors led by Victor McElfatrick visited the Unit from 22 to 23 January 1992. They made nine recommendations, the main concerns being the poor maintenance of the bedrooms and the need for a second senior residential social worker to provide consistent cover, particularly in view of the number of casual staff. Of the permanent staff, four had relevant qualifications and three were unqualified, but were required to train during their first five years in post. Overall, the description of the policies, systems and resources in the unit suggested a well-run professional operation.[160]

158 RGL 23626-23752.
159 The Pindown Experience and the Protection of Children, (1991) by Alan Levy and Barbara Kahan.
160 RGL 23798-23833.

100 Otherwise, we have no evidence that other inspections were not carried out as required, but if so the records are no longer extant, having probably been destroyed in accordance with departmental file disposal policy. There are no records of the annual training school inspections which might have been anticipated from the opening of Rathgael in 1958 to 1973. It seems highly likely that no inspections were undertaken from 1973 to 1987, as this was the pattern in other training schools during the period when SWAG offered advice and support but did not undertake inspections. It appears that inspectors visited informally and that their advice was appreciated, and the DoH have said that such visits involved the "scrutiny of practice", though we have received no evidence of the content of such meetings or their impact on practice. The evidence of inspections from 1987 onwards has been reported above. We consider NIO's failure to ensure that Rathgael was inspected from 1973 to 1987 to have been systemic.

The Evidence

101 The witnesses who gave evidence to the Inquiry concerning Rathgael gave evidence in Module 7. Following an introduction by Senior Counsel on 19 October 2015, eighteen applicants gave evidence, together with two senior members of staff and Dr Hilary Harrison who represented two core participants, the Department of Justice and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, which had prepared a joint statement.[161]

102 Eighteen applicants to the Inquiry had been resident in Rathgael and it was these people who gave both written and oral evidence. In addition, we received information concerning 40 former residents who made complaints to the police, making 58 who alleged abuse. With one important exception, the patterns of abuse alleged to the police were similar to those of the applicants to the Inquiry. None of the applicants had attended Balmoral School. One witness was resident in Whiteabbey School prior to moving to Rathgael. Two witnesses had attended Malone School, but their main concerns however, had related to other residential establishments and they did not give evidence in this module.

103 The 58 complainants fall into two fairly distinct groups: the 23 admitted during the first phase between 1968 and 1985 when there were only boys at Rathgael, and the 35 admitted during the second phase from 1985 to the end of our remit in 1995, who were a mixture of boys and girls.

161 RGL 1332-1334.

104 Not only did the nature of Rathgael change with the arrival of the girls and staff from Whiteabbey, but so did the nature of the allegations put forward both by applicants and by those who gave evidence to the police. These two phases will therefore be considered separately. Because those who spoke to the police did not give evidence to the Inquiry in person, we have considered the information drawn from their records primarily as confirmatory, and the accounts of alleged abuse in this chapter are based almost entirely on the oral and written evidence of witnesses. Two people who were in Rathgael from 1995 onwards made allegations but they were not considered, as this period was beyond the Inquiry's Terms of Reference.

105 Six applicants were resident during the seventeen years when the school was for boys only from 1968 to 1985, and twelve (eight of whom were girls) were there during the ten years from 1985 to 1995 when it was a mixed establishment. The number of witnesses making allegations was therefore substantially higher during the second phase. Considering the size of the school and the estimated total throughput of about seven to eight thousand children and young people, the number of applicants and other complainants alleging abuse is moderate, and in the early years, in a school accommodating 200 or more pupils, it amounts to little more than one a year. This is not to diminish the seriousness of the evidence of abuse provided by the witnesses, but it has a bearing on the question whether the alleged abuse was systemic.

106 During the 1968 to 1985 phase, in the evidence of the applicants there was a clear emphasis on physical abuse, perhaps in part reflecting the tough traditional regime inherited from Malone Training School. However, those who complained to the police made allegations as much about sexual abuse as physical abuse; this is the only instance in which the picture presented by the applicants' evidence differs from that of people who spoke to the police. There were also some complaints of emotional abuse made by applicants who were at Rathgael in the first phase.

107 During the 1985 to 1995 phase there were 26 female complainants and nine males. Of these, there were nineteen females who alleged sexual abuse, but only one male. This is clearly a radically different pattern from the earlier period. Whatever sexual abuse of boys there had been previously, it seems to have diminished considerably, while the sexual abuse of the girls became a major issue.

108 Four of the female complainants were admitted around the time when Whiteabbey joined Rathgael and they alleged sexual and physical abuse. The one male who alleged sexual abuse was also admitted about this time. There were also three males who alleged physical abuse and one who alleged emotional abuse.

109 Thereafter, only three males made allegations, which all concerned physical abuse. There were, however, 22 female complainants, who made allegations concerning a mixture of sexual, physical and other forms of abuse. In particular, from 1992 to 1995 there were fifteen complainants, ten of whom alleged sexual abuse. Since many of the residents stayed at Rathgael three or four years, this means that at this time there were always about half a dozen girls in the school who have subsequently alleged sexual abuse. Nor does this figure include any who were abused but who have chosen to speak to neither the police nor the Inquiry.

110 In view of the emphasis on sexual abuse allegations in 1985 to 1995 it is perhaps surprising that the number of complaints of physical abuse by former girl residents is approximately equal to the number of allegations about sexual abuse, because of complaints about excessive restraint. Physical abuse was also the main concern of the boys, though the complainants were far fewer in number. In all, allegations of physical abuse amounted to more than a third of the complaints.

111 Six boys and six girls alleged emotional abuse. It is not clear whether this reflected a higher level of emotional abuse than in other homes, or whether it indicates a greater awareness of emotional issues among former Rathgael residents, reflecting the type of therapeutic discussion they may have had with staff.

112 Nearly all the allegations classed as 'other' relate to the 1985 to 1995 phase. They include single allegations of disproportionate punishment, neglect, inappropriate behaviour and threatening with a gun, and two of false imprisonment. These allegations did not suggest any systemic patterns. The one significant feature is that eight people (six women and two men) alleged failure to report abuse.

113 The reasons for the increase in allegations in the second phase are not clear. Fewer witnesses will presumably have come forward from earlier years because of age and infirmity, but it may also be that younger adults are more prepared to complain, when in previous generations people were more accepting of harsher conditions or poor standards of care. Again, it could be that the style of residential childcare at Rathgael encouraged young people to speak up. It is equally possible that there were more instances of abuse in the later phase.

Allegations of Abuse

Phase 1 (1958 to 1985): Allegations of Physical Abuse by Staff

114 During the phase when Rathgael was for boys only, one applicant made no complaint about the school; the remaining five all complained primarily about physical abuse.

115 HIA 200 provided a good example of the range of physical abuse which he alleged. He named five staff as people who had physically assaulted him in the sixteen months he spent at Rathgael. RG 13 was "quite violent" and was always shouting at the boys. When HIA 200 was caught lying, RG 13 slapped him round the head and face, to the point that a young female member of staff tried to intervene.[162] RG 16 insisted that the boys all jumped into the sea, and when HIA 200's twin brother refused, RG 16 threw him in.[163] RG 16 also hit HIA 200 round the face and head when he refused to change into the school uniform on re-admission; HIA 200 absconded in consequence, and when he was picked up from his home, RG 16 apologised to him. RG 73 punched HIA 200 in the stomach when he caught him doing something wrong.[164] Finally, as mentioned earlier, HIA 200 saw RG 17, the PE teacher, as a bully who used his slipper for beating boys for minor misdemeanours.

116 In summary, HIA 200 saw this kind of punishment as "normalised to a degree" in Rathgael.[165] There were other staff to whom he could talk, and HIA 200 named three whom he rated highly, but even they did nothing if he complained of bullying.[166] He concluded:

> "I experienced a lot of physical, emotional and verbal abuse at Rathgael both from the other boys and from staff members."[167] and he remembered his time in Rathgael as:

> "an almost entirely negative experience."[168]

162 RGL 038.
163 RGL 038.
164 RGL 039.
165 RGL 040.
166 RGL 041.
167 RGL 037.
168 RGL 041.

117 Other witnesses gave similar accounts. HIA 248 said that there were no problems while he was in the Reception House, but on moving to House 5 he was physically abused by the housemaster, RG 30, who was known as 'the Beast'. HIA 248 said that RG 30 hit boys on the head with his keys, he kicked them and he punched them. He also punished boys in other ways, making them stand in corners for hours, sending them to bed early without supper or not allowing them to watch television.[169]

118 HIA 248 went to RG 112, the headmaster, and asked for a transfer to House 7, where he was treated well by the housemaster, RG 64, but he says he was later moved to House 8, where the regime was tougher, and the housemaster punched and slapped boys for misbehaviour or on their return from absconding; their privileges were also withdrawn and they were made to wear shorts.[170] The records indicate that HIA 248 frequently presented difficult behaviour, including several abscondings, for which he was at times punished.[171]

119 HIA 434 recalled witnessing RG 20 restraining RG 77 by twisting his hands behind his back and repeatedly punching him in the back.[172]

120 On his first evening at Rathgael HIA 267 was punched by another boy and when he punched him back (RG 50) pulled him out of the queue and beat him with his fists, leaving HIA 267 "very fearful". He found RG 64, who taught him English, very unpredictable and sadistic, delivering "some vicious beatings to the boys he was teaching", knocking one boy unconscious. HIA 267 was "terrified" of him, and on one occasion when RG 64 was beating him, he fell against a radiator and cut his head. He was so upset that he absconded and on his return RG 4, who was known as 'the Tank', gave him a beating.[173] He was beaten on another occasion by RG 4 with such force that the cane broke and he thumped HIA 267 with his fists.[174] RG 4 denied that he beat boys in this way, but said that if a boy had to be caned he followed the regulations.[175]

169 RGL 060.
170 RGL 060, 42953.
171 RGL 828, 42957.
172 RGL 111-112.
173 RGL 065.
174 RGL 066.
175 RGL 4777-4778.

121 HIA 267 said:

> "I came to lose respect for all authority figures because of the experiences I had in Rathgael. I believe that, because I saw these violent encounters as a young man, I turned into a very, very violent man myself. It ruined me in the end. Even now, as an adult, I don't back down from a fight, not even if paramilitaries are involved. Consequently, as an adult, I was stabbed twice and sustained other serious injuries, including injuries where someone tried to cut my head off. I feel I have lost almost everything positive in my life because of my exposure to violence."[176]

122 It is clear from the evidence that during the first phase there were some staff who used informal physical violence in order to maintain control and punish boys. It appears to have been used as a response to misbehaviour on the part of the boys, but it was unrecorded and was contrary to the types of corporal punishment authorised in the Training School Rules. There were also staff who did not assault boys physically, but their influence did not prevent their colleagues from breaching the regulations. The practices may well have been part of the historical legacy from the way in which Malone School was run, and it has to be acknowledged that many parents and schoolteachers in the wider community used corporal punishment at this time. Indeed, the Training School Rules permitted caning, but were drawn up in part to ensure that there was no unregulated or unrecorded punishment of this type. We accept that some of the witnesses lived a life of fear as a result of the practices described. We consider that the extent of the unregulated physical punishment applied by some staff amounted to systemic abuse.

Phase 1 (1958 to 1985): Allegation of Sexual Abuse by Staff

123 HIA 83 was the only applicant to allege sexual abuse during the 1958 to 1985 period when there were only boys at Rathgael. He said that he was told to have a shower and that a member of staff, RG 31, started to touch his private parts while he was in the shower. A few weeks later he was sent to bed early as a punishment for smoking, and RG 31 entered the bedroom and touched and rubbed HIA 83 while masturbating himself. He added that RG 31 was there every time he went for a shower. HIA 83 said he felt dirty.[177] HIA 83 was discharged and when he was readmitted six months later, RG 31 resumed the touching and masturbation "about two or three times a fortnight", until HIA 83 was moved to another unit.[178] HIA 83 never reported this abuse as he did not think people would listen to him.[179] We accept the witness's accounts of events, but do not think that his experiences suggest that there was systemic sexual abuse of boys during this phase.

176 RGL 068.
177 RGL 002.

Phase 1 (1958 to 1985): Allegations of Emotional Abuse by Staff

124 Three of the witnesses from this phase made allegations of emotional abuse. Clearly, other forms of abuse have a serious emotional impact, such as the persistent fear of physical punishments or bullying, or the humiliation and guilt often associated with sexual abuse.

125 HIA 200 said that he felt he had an inferiority complex because of the way he had been bullied. He remembered being punched by other boys at night and there was no one to complain to, as no one listened. RG 73 used to encourage other boys to tease him, and HIA 200 was humiliated in class when RG 73 taunted him and implied he was gay, which made all the other boys laugh.[180] His housemaster called him "names like 'sleekit', 'slimy' and 'underhand'" in house meetings; these names stuck and HIA 200 said he was still sensitive about people perceiving him that way.[181]

126 We accept that the use of name-calling by staff is hurtful, can undermine a child's self-confidence and may rankle for many years afterwards, as HIA 200's account demonstrates. It is poor childcare practice. However, in our opinion, HIA 200's experiences are insufficient for a general finding of systemic abuse.

Phase 1 (1958 to 1985): Allegations of Abuse by Peers

127 Witnesses provided examples of bullying, usually of younger, weaker boys by bigger, older boys. Such events were not uncommon in places such as training schools, where some of the children will have experienced violence at home and may have become disturbed and violent themselves. Vigilance on the part of staff and the creation of a positive atmosphere which encourages children to be supportive towards each other can counter bullying. The question, therefore, is whether the staff at Rathgael were alert to bullying and whether they took action to prevent or minimise it.

178 RGL 005.
179 RGL 003.
180 RGL 040.
181 RGL 040.

128 HIA 400 saw himself as:

> "a small, skinny child, who was vulnerable and weak, so I would have been a target for bullies. I experienced lots of unnecessary violence."[182]

He described seeing another boy bullied at night, made to strip naked and dance on a table, having shoes thrown at him, and being made to put his penis on a table, where the bullies hit it with shoes.

129 There was a gang of five or six boys who ruled the twenty-bedded house unit:

> "They did a thing called 'hooding'. ...when you were sitting on a chair one of them came up behind you and pulled their jumper over your head and held it tightly. The rest of the unit would fly over and punch you and kick you while the jumper was still being held over your head. There was not a day that passed when I didn't either receive or see someone else receive a 'hooding', a beating or be spat on. I constantly had split lips and black eyes."[183]

130 One bully, RG 71, treated HIA 400 as a slave, making him run errands, clean his shoes or dry his hair. He found this humiliating and after his Christmas leave he decided not to return. Although it was winter he was on the run for a month, committing crime to survive and living in a lock-up garage and a tree house. When he was apprehended and returned to Rathgael the peer abuse he had suffered eventually stopped, partly because the abusers had been moved to Millisle and partly because he had grown and was establishing himself as a stronger character.[184]

131 He said that staff must have known about the bullying, but they tended to stay in the staff room, and no one dared to 'tout' and tell the staff:

> "...you lived in fear if there was a member of staff on duty who spent a lot of time in the staff room, as you knew that you had no protection from the bullies that shift. There was not a lot of interaction between the staff and boys."[185]

He attributed 95% of the physical violence to bullying by peers and only 5% to abuse by staff.[186]

182 RGL 094.
183 RGL 094.
184 RGL 095.
185 Day 152, p.119.
186 Day 152, p.122.

132 HIA 400's conclusion was that:

> "I think Rathgael was badly managed and therefore there was no protection for the boys from other boys."[187]

HIA 172 says that he became like the thugs who had bullied him, and he gave one bully a black eye. He was not proud of what he had done.[188]

133 Our conclusion is that the evidence substantiates the assertion that there was - at least on occasion - bullying which the staff could have prevented. Where staff actively supervised and engaged with the boys, bullying was prevented, and it took place when staff who were known to do so absented themselves. We therefore concluded that the failure to prevent bullying by peers amounted to systemic abuse.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Physical Abuse by Staff (Boys)

134 As noted above, the pattern of allegations of abuse changed with the arrival of the girls from Whiteabbey. Only four male applicants alleged physical abuse during the second phase and, with one exception, the allegations concerned incidents which took place early in the phase, they largely related to measures taken by male staff to control boys, and at times they reflected the difficult behaviour which the staff were expected to manage.

135 There were two occasions on which HIA 429 was restrained, both of which escalated from minor problems into serious incidents. In one, involving RG 20, HIA 429 was pinned down and punched, and he attributed his current spinal problems to the way he was hit.[189] RG 20 denied this allegation.[190] In the second, an argument developed into a fight in which HIA 429 was thrown over a sofa by RG 49, the head of his unit, and to defend himself against punches, HIA 429 hit RG 49 with a poker, breaking his little finger.[191] HIA 429 was confined in the D Room, where he broke the window to escape, and he was moved to House 5 in the justice side of Rathgael with a view to his discharge. HIA 429 was convicted of assault for this incident, but the Director of Public Prosecutions directed that RG 49 should not be charged.[192]

187 RGL 094.
188 RGL 021.
189 RGL 109.
190 RGL 4793.
191 RGL 45532.
192 RGL 109-110, 4838.

136 In his first few days at Rathgael, HIA 172 was hit with a back-handed smack in the face by his houseparent, RG 50, when he complained that someone had spat in his cereal.[193] On being moved to the care side, HIA 172 was locked in a room (possibly by RG 4) and he said his arm was twisted so far up his back that his shoulder was almost broken. No one responded when he banged on the door to go to the toilet, and he had to defecate on the floor.

137 A walkman which his mother had given to HIA 172 was stolen - by staff, he believed.[194] When he complained about staff stealing his things, his housefather, RG 49, punched HIA 172 in the stomach. As he was also being bullied, he felt under attack by both peers and staff, and started self-harming. When he rang Childline he was placed in the secure unit, House 4. When he absconded, RG 48 punched him in the head on finding him.[195]

138 HIA 172 said that his behaviour became more bizarre as he wanted to be removed from Rathgael to hospital; he self-harmed and ate non-food items, such as the components of a smoke detector. He was taken to casualty and given laxatives before being returned to Rathgael. The next day he was moved to a psychiatric unit in Downshire Hospital, before being returned once more to Rathgael and placed in Shamrock House.[196]

139 HIA 172 considered all the teachers to be violent. RG 33 punched and kicked him in a broom cupboard and RG 62 punched him in the back of the head. His allegations about RG 17 have been quoted above.[197]

140 HIA 182 was the only male applicant to allege physical abuse in the last decade that Rathgael was open. He was there for only three months in 1989 and he remained in the reception house. He said that residents were punished for "not complying with instructions, self-harming or generally messing around". RG 11 was seen as "the Enforcer" and other staff looked up to him. HIA 182 alleged that RG 11 punched him and kicked him with his trainers while gripping him by the hair or the throat. He witnessed other young people being dragged away by RG 11 and hearing their screams getting louder. He said that other staff were aware of what RG 11 was doing but were scared of him. Another member of staff, whose

193 Day 158, p.12.
194 RGL 016.
195 RGL 017.
196 RGL 018.
197 RGL 020-021.

name HIA 182 could not recall, also beat him up for messing around in the television room. HIA 182 said that it was during this time that he started self-harming.[198]

141 RG 11 said that HIA 182's allegations were "false and entirely without foundation." He considered the allegations to be malicious, as HIA 182 had later worked at the Lakewood Centre and RG 11 had been his superior. He listed six disciplinary issues which had emerged concerning HIA 182's work, including sleeping on a night shift.[199] RG 11 also denied the allegations which HIA 182 had made to the police on 24 January 2013; these allegations were of assault, similar in nature to this in his statement to the Inquiry but including further detail. HIA 182 had also told the police that RG 11 had assaulted him "probably about a dozen times". RG 11 categorically refuted any suggestion that he was violent to HIA 182 or any other resident in his charge.[200]

142 The allegations indicate the disturbed behaviour with which the staff had to cope. In some of the instances it might have been possible to divert the boys rather than confront them and use force to ensure compliance, so that the problems did not become crises leading to even more disturbed behaviour such as self-harming. Unless there are implications concerning systemic failure, it is not generally our role to make findings on individual allegations, but overall it seems that at times excessive force was used to maintain control. However, the issues involved were complex, and we do not consider the scale of the allegations as amounting to systemic abuse, as the number of serious incidents was not large, taking account of the number of boys who were resident at the time.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Physical Abuse by Staff (Girls)

143 The allegations of physical abuse made by female witnesses to the Inquiry all related to restraint and action taken by staff to place them in secure accommodation. The evidence largely relates to the mid-1990s, though some of the people who spoke to the police about physical abuse were at Rathgael in the 1980s. It could be argued that initially the staff at Rathgael had had inadequate preparation to work with adolescent girls when they arrived from Whiteabbey, but this argument was no longer valid in relation to the allegations recounted below.

198 RGL 025.
199 RGL 4824-4825.
200 RGL 4826.

144 HIA 438 was most unsettled and in her two years in Rathgael from 1988 to 1990 she absconded thirty times, going straight home to her mother, typically being picked up by the police next day and returned to Rathgael. At first she was placed in a single bedroom on her return, but later she was admitted to Shamrock House, as it was more secure.[201]

145 HIA 438's complaint was that excessive force was used in restraining her and placing her in secure accommodation. On one occasion six members of staff were involved, one of whom she bit. She said that they were "very forceful" and she thought that one of them had broken her arm. HIA 438 said that she had a very slight build and the way in which staff handled her left bruises on her arms and body, as they pinned her arms behind her back.[202]

146 HIA 438 began to self-harm and cut her arms. She saved up to buy paracetamol and tried to take her life on several occasions, but she said she was never asked why she ran away or given counselling or pastoral care to counter her negative feelings.[203]

147 HIA 386 was placed at Rathgael on three occasions, amounting in all to nearly two years. It is clear from her statement that she was going through a very disturbed phase while at Rathgael. She was being cheeky and aggressive to staff, glue-sniffing, refusing to go to sleep at night, "slicing" her arms, cutting her face and body in circles and pulling the skin off her face, causing herself a lot of pain.[204] Rathgael records confirm her account, with incident reports detailing abusive language, damage to furniture and equipment, lashing out at staff and a barricading incident, among other things.[205]

148 The staff restrained HIA 386 and locked her in the "care unit", known as the 'D' room or Shamrock room. She described it as a cell where she felt "totally trapped". The room had only "a thin blue mattress on the floor" and she found the food so disgusting that she became a vegetarian. HIA 386 said that she was constantly monitored, even when she went to the toilet, and she had no time to herself. Nor was she permitted to mix with other children. She felt that the staff were uncaring, "very hard" and "only here for the money".[206]

201 RGL 120-121.
202 RGL 121-122.
203 RGL 123.
204 RGL 082-083.
205 RGL 44472, 44473, 44479.
206 RGL 083, 084.

149 She wrote that she was hit, kicked in the shins, spat on and trailed by her hair, but her main complaint was the mode of restraint used by staff:

> "[RG 11] used to trail me up to the Shamrock room with another member of staff, usually another man, and I would only have been wearing a night dress. One man had me by the feet and the other by the arms. My dignity wasn't protected at all and I used to squeal for them to let me down. All of my private parts were out and there were maybe two or three people on top of me, with my arms forced behind my back and my face squashed into the floor. If I was wearing jogging bottoms at any stage and they came down, then my underwear was on show. They didn't let me get covered up and I was often put in there wearing my nightdress for seventy-two hours."[207] [208]

150 HIA 389 also self-harmed and took overdoses of tablets on several occasions, as she was "constantly bullied by both staff and residents".[209] She made similar complaints about restraint:

> "This involved being thrown to the ground, usually having my arm twisted behind my back and sat on. I was not able to breathe and was left bruised from these ordeals. Often depending on what I was wearing when I was being restrained, staff did not care if my private parts were exposed. I would have been restrained at least once every fortnight."[210]

151 She described the D Room as:

> "empty with the exception of a gymnasium mat on the floor. It was like a prison cell. The room had no windows and the door had a spy-hole. ...When I had to use the bathroom I would have had to press the buzzer to gain a member of staff's attention, although staff often never responded. At meal times staff would throw in food to the room as if they were feeding animals."[211]

152 HIA 231 said that:

> "At times I found the way the male staff at Rathgael physically restrained me to be excessively forceful. The female staff would usually try to reason with me first if I refused to do something. They had a more gentle approach. However, the male staff [RG 48] and [RG 47] would just go straight in and physically restrain me. They were well-built men.

207 RGL 082-084.
208 Also described in detail on Day 155, p.9.
209 RGL 090.
210 RGL 088.
211 RGL 089.

> They would hold me with my head face down in the carpet and twist my hands behind my back in order to restrain me. I had a very slight build at that time. They could have held me down with one hand. I felt that the way they treated me amounted to physical abuse."[212]

153 HIA 503 spent two periods in Rathgael, first a fifteen-week assessment and secondly following her committal under a Training School Order. She complained about physical abuse, and in particular about undue restraint during both her times at Rathgael.[213] At a case conference it was recorded that HIA 503 was physically and verbally aggressive towards staff and was non-compliant to the simplest requests.[214] She hit out, kicked and spat at staff, but having ventilated she calmed down quickly.[215] A specialist therapeutic placement was recommended, but no places were available.[216]

154 During her first spell at Rathgael, she was restrained by RG 3, who was ex-military:

> "He put my arm right up my back and pressed on a pressure point on my thumb which paralysed me with pain."[217]

On another occasion, when she wanted to stay longer in the swimming pool, RG 4:

> "...took me out of the pool using a large hook and sat on me. I would estimate him to be 18 stone weight. My face was pushed against the tiles..."[218]

155 She wrote that during her second period at Rathgael:

> "I also had to be taken to hospital due to being restrained by staff. On one occasion my wrists were very painful. At hospital I had to have splints applied to my wrists. I was usually taken to Newtownards Hospital when I sustained injuries as a consequence of being physically restrained. Hospital staff asked how I sustained the injuries. I told them while being restrained, but they never asked who in particular caused the injuries."

212 RGL 047-048.
213 RGL 129-133.
214 RGL 884.
215 RGL 885.
216 RGL 886.
217 RGL 130.
218 RGL 130.

156 "On another occasion while being restrained I twisted the muscles in my back and found it difficult to walk for several weeks. The Matron rubbed my back with a cream to relieve the pain. If I had been restrained during the night I would be in my night clothes. Staff would drag me, each holding a leg and an arm, my underpants would be visible and my breasts would be on display."[219]

157 HIA 503 said that she still suffered:

"pain in my knees as a consequence of being continuously [sic] restrained and slammed against the ground whilst in care."[220]

158 HIA 389 alleged that RG 5 "constantly physically and mentally abused" her, and on one occasion, when she wanted to spend a longer time swimming, she:

"...dragged me out of the pool using a long-handled net before she grabbed me and twisted my arm up my back. I screamed in pain. Other residents tried to release her grip on me. I had to be taken to hospital following this incident as my arm was left badly bruised."[221]

159 HIA 268 alleged that she was injured by RG 33. Her version of events was that she had been glue-sniffing with two other girls, and when he took her to his office she attempted to climb out of the window. When part-way out of the window she was knocked against a wall by RG 33, pinned by her throat, knocked unconscious and injured. When she regained consciousness, blood was running from her head, and RG 33 knocked her against the wall again. She required six stitches at Newtownards Hospital.[222]

160 His version was that the incident took place in RG 34's office. Her behaviour was "erratic and unpredictable" and her language was "loud and obscene"; he thought she was under the influence of some intoxicant. She climbed onto RG 34's desk, which was positioned under a window, and tried to climb out. RG 33 estimated that there was a drop of eight to nine feet to the ground from the window. As he attempted to guide HIA 268 away from the window and off the desk she lost her footing and hit her head on a bookcase.[223]

219 RGL 133.
220 RGL 133.
221 RGL 090.
222 RGL 074.
223 RGL 4796-RGL4797.

161 RG 33 clearly had to take action to prevent HIA 268 from climbing out of the window, and if she were affected by sniffing glue, her fall was unsurprising and her recollection of the incident may have been affected. We believe that RG 33 acted appropriately.

162 These accounts highlight the dilemma which is posed by restraint. It is obviously preferable if behavioural problems can be avoided in the first place, and in the best childcare practice children can often be diverted or talked out of seriously damaging behaviour. However, when a disturbed child is acting hysterically or is at risk of harming self or others, or is causing damage, restraint may be unavoidable.[224] If so, the type of indignities which HIA 386 and HIA 389 described can be difficult to avoid.[225] Furthermore, it is often to the stronger staff that their colleagues turn when restraint is required, and, as the evidence shows, the problems are accentuated if male staff have to be involved in restraining adolescent girls. The distress experienced by the girls is understandable, but it is often hard to know what else the staff could have done in the circumstances. What is more, while the use of separation rooms provided staff with temporary control over the situation, it did not provide a long-term solution, and constraining young people in this way could also have been damaging if they resorted to more extreme behaviours such as self-harm and even attempted suicide in consequence.

163 Dealing with such situations is one of the most demanding and difficult tasks in residential childcare. It is our impression from the evidence that: restraint was probably used too readily, rather than as a last resort; that it was applied more often than was required; that excessive force was used, taking account of the disparity in size of the male staff and the girls; and that the regular reliance on male staff to control the girls presented risks to both the girls and the staff.

164 The lesson to be learnt is possibly that some residents were inappropriately placed in Rathgael, even if it was the best that was available in the province. In the case of HIA 503 it was noted that no therapeutic placement was available for her. Young children requiring therapeutic placements were on occasion placed in Lissue, and young people, such as HIA 172 who spent eighteen months at Peper Harow, were at times placed in units in England, but there was no such unit in Northern Ireland. The behaviour problems which some young people presented may have been beyond the skills of the staff at Rathgael. If so, rather than blame them for the systemic failure of restraining the girls in inappropriate ways, it is probably the planners who failed to make suitable provision available who should bear the responsibility. Whoever should be held accountable, we acknowledge that the witnesses found their experiences of restraint unpleasant, painful and at times degrading and humiliating.

224 RGL 44480.
225 RGL 084, 088.

165 RG 47 told the police that when Rathgael and Whiteabbey were merged in 1985, "...we were ill trained and totally ill prepared and grossly understaffed." They had to take on staff with no experience.[226] It is not until March 1990 that there are records of staff being trained in control and restraint,[227] and the training materials supplied were prepared for the Northern Ireland Prison Service and are dated 1 January 1991.[228]

166 It was noted in police enquiries in 1986 into improper conduct on the part of a residential social worker RG 91, shortly after the merger in 1985, that there had been no training for staff at that time. He had worked with boys in Rathgael for eight years, and had had to learn how to handle situations with girls from colleagues at staff meetings. The lack of training was seen by Detective Chief Inspector Thompson as:

> "a serious error of judgement on the part of the Rathgael and Whiteabbey Schools Management Board and a contributory factor in this incident occurring."[229]

This criticism would presumably have applied not only to training in control and restraint, but also to any problems for male and female staff from either school in relating to children of the opposite sex.

167 If, therefore, the staff of Rathgael were having to cope with behaviour for which they had not been trained, staff would presumably have had to develop their own methods of coping. We do not therefore, place responsibility for the excessive restraint described above on the individual staff members involved, but on the Department which placed them in this unhappy predicament. We consider the lack of training in control and restraint to have been a systemic failing.

226 RGL 34146.
227 RGL 100544.
228 RGL 100001.
229 RGL 38275.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Staff (Boys)

168 One person who spoke to the police made allegations that he had been sexually abused, but none of the witnesses to the Inquiry did so.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Staff (Girls)

169 All the allegations considered up to this point reflected problems arising from the normal running of a training school for children and young people presenting a variety of problem behaviours. Staff may at times have used inappropriate methods of control or been excessive in their application, but they were part of the ordinary way of managing daily life. By contrast, sexual abuse should never have occurred, and it would have been known to all concerned that it was unacceptable. The allegations made by girls that they were sexually abused at Rathgael are the most serious which we had to address during this module. In all, six applicants and thirteen others made allegations of sexual abuse during this phase.

170 HIA 268 was one of the ten girls who were transferred to Rathgael when Whiteabbey closed. Soon after her arrival a maths teacher, RG 27, started to take a personal interest in her. He organised fishing trips, so that while the other residents went fishing, RG 27 and HIA 268 could stay in the van together and kiss. There was "no sex, just kissing and friendship", and the one occasion when they attempted intercourse failed as he could not achieve an erection. RG 27 also bought her cigarettes and took her to bars where he bought her alcoholic drinks.[230]

171 The relationship continued for two years and HIA 268 said she believed that staff were aware, although she was never questioned. She thought that someone reported RG 27.[231] RG 27's personnel records have been destroyed, but two documents have survived. A hand-written note indicates that he was to face a number of questions about being in licensed premises, borrowing cars and taking HIA 268 off the premises without permission.[232] The second is a minute of a meeting of the Disciplinary Committee of the Management Board, at which it was decided that RG 27 should be given a final warning for taking HIA 268 to licensed premises.[233] HIA 268 thought that RG 27 was dismissed or made redundant.[234]

230 RGL 073.
231 RGL 073-074.
232 RGL 28515.
233 RGL 22971.
234 RGL 074.

172 In August 1985 (five months after the first girls had been transferred from Whiteabbey to Rathgael) a disciplinary inquiry was held into allegations of improper conduct against a residential social worker RG 91, who had kissed, and written "romantic" letters to, a girl RG 157 for whom he was keyworker. He had become emotionally over-involved, but there was no allegation of sexual abuse, and he was given a warning and moved to a boys' unit. The police later investigated, but no action was taken, partly because of the lack of training to prepare existing male Rathgael staff to work with girls.[235]

173 HIA 198 alleged that RG 20 grabbed her with both his hands around the chest area and pulled her into the house, after she had been mouthy and refused to enter the building.[236] RG 20 denied this allegation.[237] There are also allegations which are less serious. HIA 198, for example, used to dread times when RG 2 was on duty because he would flirt with all the teenage girls. [238]

174 HIA 389 alleged that RG 20 "would often pretend to tickle me. In reality he was fondling my breasts"; she added that he also did this often to RG 23.[239] This was "emphatically" denied by RG 20.[240] [241]

175 HIA 231 provided detailed allegations concerning sexual abuse by RG 48, who was then "a well-built man in his mid-forties". She said that he was:

> "well respected by other staff and they deferred to him a lot on day to day matters regarding our welfare. There was a perception that he was beyond reproach."[242]

176 As a typical example of her allegations, HIA 231 wrote that RG 48:

> "...began sexually and physically abusing me almost as soon as I moved to House 6. He did not hit me but he was always very forceful when he grabbed me and pinned me down or against a wall. One evening I was doing the dishes in the kitchen of House 6 and he came up behind me. He puts his hands down the front of my trousers and forced his fingers inside me. I could feel him rubbing himself against

235 RGL 38263-38293.
236 RGL 033.
237 RGL 4793.
238 Day 155, p.52.
239 RGL 091.
240 RGL 4793.
241 Day 155, p.37.
242 RGL 045.

me from behind and I could feel his erection through his clothing. I told him to pull his hand out and get him to stop but he wouldn't. This happened every time he and I were alone. He took his chance to touch me at any opportunity."[243]

177 She said that on other occasions she was assaulted in the TV room, when ill in bed in House 6, and when he was dressing her wounds after HIA 231 had cut herself, a practice which she started "as a way of coping with the sexual abuse I was experiencing at Rathgael".[244] RG 48 also gave her extra treats, such as cigarettes, and presents, including trainers and a Thornton's Easter egg with her name on it. Looking back she considered this behaviour as being manipulative, as a way of buying her silence.[245]

178 HIA 231 believed that HIA 236 was also abused by RG 48. In 1995 RG 88 complained about sexual abuse by RG 48, but when HIA 231 was questioned by police she:

"protected [RG 48] at that time because I genuinely liked him and he was good to me."

In her statement to the Inquiry, HIA 231 said that she now cringed at her failure to support RG 88.[246]

179 HIA 236 also alleged that RG 48 sexually abused her at every opportunity until she left Rathgael, kissing her, putting his hands under her clothing and digitally penetrating her.[247] There is no suggestion in her brief account of the abuse by RG 48 of any of the reciprocal feelings which she and RG 47 had for each other (described below). RG 48 denied the abuse, and said that he:

"never at any stage touched [HIA 236] in a manner which could be construed as sexual."[248]

180 A member of night staff, RG 82, let HIA 438 sit in the office with him and have a smoke. She alleged that twice he touched her breast through her night dress. She threatened to report it, but he pointed out that no one would believe her. She told a member of staff RG 52, who said she would talk to HIA 438 about it later, but then went home.[249] HIA 438 told her boyfriend, and assumed that he must have said something, as it stopped

243 RGL 045-046.
244 RGL 046.
245 RGL 047.
246 RGL 050.
247 RGL 057.
248 RGL 4817.
249 Day 153, p.54.

after that.[250] RG 82 provided a detailed rebuttal of this allegation, among other things pointing out that girls were checked at night by female night staff.[251]

181 The sexual abuse alleged by HIA 236 is unique in this Module in that it led to an ongoing relationship in adult life. It should be noted that, although RG 47 has acknowledged that he had a relationship with HIA 236 as an adult, he has consistently denied having sexual relations with her until she attained adulthood.[252]

182 HIA 236 said that when she went to Rathgael RG 47 was a senior member of staff, aged 46:

> "If there was any trouble he was the one who came and sorted it out. [RG 47] paid me more attention than the other girls. He came down to the kitchen in House 4 and cooked with me once. He was always playing pool with me and he knew I liked him. I was confused sometimes because of the way he behaved with me. Things started to get tense between us. I wished he would leave me alone at times and yet at other times I wanted him to talk to me. I talked to [RG 47] about the sexual abuse I suffered at the hands of family members. I felt I could talk to him as he seemed interested in what had happened to me and asked me questions. I think this is why I saw him as a father figure."[253]

183 "One day I was misbehaving... [RG 47] put me in the lock up room for an hour and a half. He then handed me some paperwork which said that I was going to be sent to Maghaberry for the rest of my training school order. I was extremely upset and started to cry. He held open his arms and I hugged him. He asked me if I hated him and I replied that I probably liked him too much. He told me he felt exactly the same and that I couldn't tell anyone. He kissed me on the cheek. When I asked about Maghaberry he ripped up the paperwork. ...He walked me back to the school block and told me he loved me. I said that I loved him too but I think I was shocked and confused. I loved him as a father figure. This happened on 31st May 1994. I know the date because [RG 47] would write it in cards and letters he sent to me and in later years in text messages."

250 RGL 122.
251 RGL 4789.
252 RGL 4866.
253 RGL 055.

184 In her statement HIA 236 went on to describe how the relationship developed from kissing and telephone calls to sexual touching over clothes and then intercourse on a regular basis. The relationship continued for fourteen and a half years, and HIA 236 was hoping to conceive RG 47's baby. The relationship broke down when HIA 236 found that RG 47 had been having a long-term relationship with another woman, and that he had had a vasectomy many years earlier. HIA 236's retrospective view was that RG 47 had groomed her from the age of fourteen.[254]

185 RG 47 said that on 31 May 1994 he spoke to HIA 236 at length and threatened her with a permanent transfer to Maghaberry, because he was happily married with two kids and he was becoming exasperated with her obsessional behaviour.[255] He also continued to pick her up, take her home and take her to hospital, despite the obsessional behaviour. He was questioned closely by the police about his reason for doing so, and staff shortage was the only reason he could give, as he was the senior member of staff on duty.

186 As noted above, in his written and oral evidence RG 47 firmly denied that any sexual relationship took place until January 1977, when HIA 236 was an adult and he was weak and vulnerable because his mother had died, his father was in hospital with Alzheimer's and his marriage was breaking up.[256] He said that HIA 236 contacted him, and they went to his cottage in Ballyeasborough and had sexual intercourse.[257] RG 47 had no explanation for commencing this intimate relationship when questioned by the police,[258] especially since he had described HIA 236 as "exceptionally volatile", displaying "outrageous behaviour", and reacting "violently and unpredictably" when at Rathgael.[259]

187 HIA 236's account is consistent with evidence from a number of sources. A note in HIA 236's occurrence sheet records that when she was non-compliant in the schoolroom she was returned to the house by RG 47. The writer of the occurrence sheet noted:

> "I am not happy with the management of [HIA 236]'s non-compliance. Already she is being perceived by her peers as special. I have spoken to [LN 7] and he is aware of my concerns."[260]

254 RGL 056-057.
255 RGL 34226.
256 RGL 4866, 34155.
257 RGL 34156.
258 RGL 34156.
259 RGL 4865-4866.
260 RGL 42050.

188 In a statement to the police LN 115 said she was HIA 236's key worker and she was aware of HIA 236's crush on RG 47, and the impact that his presence had on her. HIA 236 was happier when RG 47 visited her house unit, and was tearful when he left. LN 115 recalled one time when HIA 236 wanted to disclose something but appeared fearful of doing so, and said nothing. LN 115 was very concerned and spoke to RG 57 about it, who said that RG 139 had also approached him, but the matter appears to have gone no further.[261] RG 82 was a night supervisor and he was shocked on checking into the office one night to find RG 47 hiding under a table in the dark from a girl who was looking for him, and he was waiting for RG 250, another night supervisor, to take him to his car, which was parked some distance away, to avoid detection by the girl.[262] RG 82 met the girl later on his rounds and told her that RG 47 had gone off centre, so she returned to her unit. It was explained to him next day that RG 47 was being stalked by the girl, though he never learnt her name.[263]

189 HIA 231 told police in 2013 that while at Rathgael HIA 236 had told her that she was having a relationship with RG 47, and that she "couldn't get her head round it" as she was so shocked, because RG 47 was a senior member of staff:

> "I then started and noticed the way they were looking at each other, the eye contact, the staring and the flirting."[264]

She also quoted the name 'Boo', which HIA 236 said that she and RG 47 used for each other, and said that she had been with them on a trip to the seaside, during which she had been left to occupy herself for an hour and a half, and had witnessed them kissing.[265]

190 In 2013 RG 276 provided a police statement that she had been told by RG 45 that her cousin, HIA 236, was having a relationship with RG 47, who was Assistant Head of Youth Treatment of Rathgael at this time. She reported this to RG 73, the team leader of the neighbouring house unit, (as her own team leader was on leave) but he subsequently denied having the conversation, possibly covering for RG 47, in her opinion.[266]

261 RGL 34215-34216.
262 RGL 34218-34219.
263 RGL 4791.
264 RGL 34202.
265 RGL 34203 and RGL 34206.
266 RGL 34219.

191 HIA 236's description of events showed that their relationship was conducted secretively, but it is nonetheless surprising that it does not seem to have been properly questioned by colleagues or recorded in HIA 236's file. RG 47 was well respected and was promoted three times within Rathgael to the post of Assistant Director on the justice side because of his ability.[267] Lindsay Conway, the Director of Rathgael, described RG 47 as "a very capable and caring manager with a flair for organisational matters", who related very well to young people, parents and staff, was an able communicator, worked well in a crisis, and was open to change.[268]

192 We accept HIA 236's version of events, however, it is clear that, whichever account is correct, RG 47 and other staff mishandled events. There are times when the forming of a close relationship with a member of staff can be of real help to a child or young person, but to ensure that the child's needs are met, the matter needs to be discussed fully with colleagues and recorded, not only to monitor the way things develop and avoid the abuse of the child but also to protect the professional.

193 RG 47 described HIA 236 as having "an obsessive crush" on him.[269] It is hard to believe that such a close relationship was not observable, and the evidence is that some of RG 47's colleagues did have concerns, though they did not follow them through to ensure that the matter was properly investigated. Handling the crush was a matter he should have shared with colleagues in accordance with her care plan, and yet he persisted in placing himself in compromising situations where he was alone with HIA 236.

194 We accept HIA 236's account of her relationship with RG 47. His sexual exploitation of her, his failure to raise concerns about HIA 236's crush with colleagues and their failure to question the relationship properly all constituted systemic abuse.

195 As noted at the beginning of this section, a total of nineteen people have complained either to the police or this Inquiry about sexual abuse, and the instances recounted above are only examples. This would suggest that particularly in the later years - in the early 1990s - some staff had come to think that they could sexually abuse girls with impunity. Such thinking is not likely to have been in any way made explicit and most staff may have been quite unaware of their colleagues' conduct. If some staff were aware of inappropriate relationships, such as RG 47's with HIA 236, as some of the evidence suggests, action should have been taken to identify possible abuse and address it. If staff were unaware, it suggests that relationships between staff and residents were such that none of the nineteen girls felt able to disclose the abuse they have since alleged. It should be noted that two of the staff against whom serious allegations have been made were in senior positions, and they will have had an influence on the general atmosphere and attitudes in the school community as a whole.

267 RGL 34135.
268 RGL 34277.
269 RGL 4866.

196 We are satisfied that a small number of staff sexually abused girls during this phase and that this amounted to systemic abuse.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Emotional Abuse by Staff

197 There is only one instance where an allegation was primarily concerned with emotional abuse. HIA 172 said that he and another boy were humiliated unnecessarily in front of all the other children, being accused of masturbating over the toilet, when the substance was actually shampoo.[270]

198 However, the allegations of physical and sexual abuse described above all carried connotations of serious emotional abuse. The girls, for example, bitterly resented being restrained and felt humiliated.

Phase 2 (1985 to 1995): Allegations of Abuse by Peers

199 In relation to bullying, Lindsay Conway stated that staff started to question certain behaviours from the early 1980s and that there was:

> "growing recognition that bullying was not acceptable and could not be tolerated when detected."

Where necessary, action was taken to transfer children to other units, or to apply sanctions such as the loss of points or pocket money.[271]

200 There were references to bullying during the second phase, but they were few and general, rather than specific. HIA 172, for example, said he was "badly beaten" by other residents.[272] When HIA 503 approached other staff to report the bullying she was told to grow up and "sort herself out", or that the bullying was all in her head.[273] This may have occurred after the dates covered by the Inquiry's Terms of Reference.[274]

270 RGL 019.
271 RGL 5109.
272 RGL 016.
273 RGL 131-132.
274 RGL 46959.

201 About 1992 an Independent Representative Scheme was introduced in relation to Shamrock House under the auspices of the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NIACRO), providing a further assurance mechanism through external scrutiny. This was in accordance with good practice in the care of children in secure units at that time.[275]

Conclusion

202 In summary, Rathgael was expected to provide care and education for young people with a variety of problems, including offending, and for some of its history it was the only residential school of this type to serve the Protestant community. The school appears to have been well financed, with carefully designed purpose-built buildings, excellent resources to provide the education, care and leisure activities required by their residents, a busy programme for the children and young people, a sufficient staffing complement in both numbers and variety of staff, good access to professional support for the staff from the APRU, and senior staff and managers who encouraged continuous improvement in working methods.

203 We acknowledge that there were some complaints concerning daily living at Rathgael, for example about food, but overall the school's professional practice appears to have been fundamentally sound, as evidenced for example in its comprehensive system of assessment of the children, the provision of an intensive care unit for children at critical times, the considered response to the problem of absconding and the excellent aftercare service. The allegations of abuse described have to be seen against this background.

204 The abuse took two main forms. In the earlier phase, when there were only boys at Rathgael, the complaints were primarily about harsh treatment and physical abuse. These complaints continued into the early years of the second phase, when the girls from Whiteabbey had been admitted. The other main form of abuse occurred in the second phase, particularly in the later years, and concerned the sexual abuse of girls.

205 Understandably the people who have come forward as witnesses had unhappy experiences of Rathgael. HIA 231 said:

> "My behaviour was in Rathgael wayward and difficult for the staff to control at times. However, there was very little engagement by the staff with the underlying problems which triggered my bad behaviour."[276]

275 RGL 5101.

HIA 198 wrote:

"I did not receive any life skills during my time spent in Rathgael, for example, how to look after my appearance or respect myself. I was not prepared for life when I left care."[277]

HIA 172 said in conclusion:

"I have been permanently scarred by my experience at Rathgael. The children were brutal and violent and the staff turned a blind eye. I lived in fear of everyone around me and was beaten by both children and staff…There seemed to be a culture of assaulting children as a means of management and getting children hooked on cigarettes as a means of asserting control."[278]

HIA 200 said that looking back he could see that, although getting into trouble, he was quite innocent on arriving at Rathgael, but that he was exposed to a lot of negative influences and his own behaviour escalated until he was involved in serious drinking and crime. Yet he felt very insecure and was never taught to value himself and never had the confidence to develop his career. He missed so much education that he ended up as a labourer like his father.[279]

206 As with the other homes we have examined, there were residents who saw their experiences more positively. HIA 182 concluded:

"Despite the issues I have with Rathgael, I enjoyed my time there in comparison to the political situation I was living in in Belfast. Undoubtedly it was a place of safety and the majority of staff could not have done enough for you and were kind people. I believe that the problems with the care in Rathgael were the result of deficiencies in the recruitment, supervision and training of staff."[280]

207 In trying to understand how a well resourced training school with high standards could be viewed so critically by some of its former residents, we identify three main factors.

276 RGL 048.
277 RGL 034.
278 RGL 022.
279 RGL 041-042.
280 RGL 025.

208 Firstly, Rathgael had a long history as a reformatory and training school and there were some staff who maintained traditional ways of keeping order, and these entailed physical abuse.

209 Secondly, the boys and girls admitted to Rathgael had some of the most troubled histories of children in the province, and they brought with them considerable problem behaviour, including offending. Despite important attempts to update its approach to young people with serious needs, Rathgael was not equipped to provide therapeutic care. It is our view that what was required of Rathgael was in some cases beyond its resources.

210 When being interviewed by the police, RG 47 said:

> "...all of a sudden Northern Ireland Office dropped us all in it and dropped the girls in, and it was sheer...None of us were trained for it. We didn't know what the hell to expect and things just went belly up from then on; you were chasing your tail 24/7."[281]

RG 47's comments may have been unguarded, but they probably reflected the truth of the situation at times.

211 Thirdly, in the later years in particular, the experiences of some of the girls were made worse by sexual abuse. Although the evidence we heard was persuasive, it was not disclosed at the time and the abuse was therefore not addressed. The atmosphere cannot have been conducive to disclosure and the concerns which were identified were not properly investigated.

212 The number of witnesses was significant. However, they have to be set against a total of up to 7,000 children and young people who were admitted to Rathgael in the course of its history, and we believe that many children may have benefited from the services offered by Rathgael and we would want to recognise the contribution of the many staff who did a good job.

Summary of Findings

213 We consider RG 17's practice of using frequent unrecorded informal corporal punishment unacceptable, amounting to systemic abuse.

214 We consider NIO's failure to ensure that Rathgael was inspected from 1973 to 1987 to have been systemic.

281 RGL 34220-34222

215 We consider that the extent of the unregulated physical punishment applied by some staff amounted to systemic abuse.

216 We conclude that the failure to prevent bullying by peers amounted to systemic abuse.

217 We consider the lack of training in control and restraint to have been a systemic failing.

218 We accept HIA 236's account of her relationship with RG 47. His sexual exploitation of her, his failure to raise concerns about HIA 236's crush with colleagues and their failure to question the relationship properly all constituted systemic abuse.

219 We are satisfied that a small number of staff sexually abused girls during this phase and that this amounted to systemic abuse.

Chapter 15:

Module 7 – Lisnevin

Introduction

1 We considered evidence about Lisnevin Training School (Lisnevin) during Module 7, which dealt with juvenile justice institutions. Module 7 commenced on 01 Septermber 2015 and concluded on 24 November 2015.

2 Twelve applicants referred in their written statements to time they spent in Lisnevin. Two of these applicants, HIA 320 and HIA 50, referred to spending periods in Lisnevin but made no further comment about their time in the school.

3 The evidence of HIA 418 and the responses to it were summarised as HIA 418 could not attend in person for medical reasons. We set aside the evidence of HIA 275 and did not take it into account as he did not appear to give evidence in person and gave no reason for not doing so. We heard evidence in person from the remaining eight applicants.

4 Dr Bill Lockhart OBE, a chartered forensic psychologist provided psychological services in Lisnevin from 1973 until 1983 as part of the Adolescent Psychology Research Unit (APRU). Dr Lockhart provided a detailed statement with exhibits about Lisnevin[1] and gave evidence in person. We also received a statement [2]and evidence in person from LN 25 who worked as a care worker and then manager in Lisnevin. LN 8, a former teacher in Lisnevin, provided a written statement.[3] We are grateful for the evidence from these former members of staff, which assisted our understanding of the operation of the school.

5 We considered response statements to the evidence of applicants and contemporaneous documentation to support these statements provided by the Department of Justice (DoJ) and the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB). We were assisted by a joint statement submitted by the DoJ and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS), which provided background information about the establishment and operation of Lisnevin.[4] The DoJ also provided a helpful and detailed closing submission responding to the evidence given about Lisnevin during Module 7.[5] We were also assisted by a written statement and

1 LSN 1227-1250.
2 LSN 1224-1226.
3 LSN 872- 874.
4 LSN 925 -957.
5 RGL 90160–90187.

exhibits from Alan Shannon CB,[6] a retired civil servant who held senior policy and operation responsibility for training schools from 1990 to 1992 and a statement from his successor Mary Madden CBE, who held that responsibility from 1992 to 1995[7] and who gave evidence in person during our consideration of St Patrick's Training School.

6 Dennis O'Brien was appointed deputy headmaster at Lisnevin when it first opened. Later in his career he was appointed as an inspector with the Social Services Inspectorate (SSI) and in that role he was a member of the team who undertook the first SSI inspection of Lisnevin in 1988. Mr O'Brien provided a statement which we also took into account.[8]

Establishment of Lisnevin

7 At the time Lisnevin was established the Training School Division in the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) maintained a general oversight of training schools with a focus on budgetary control, the application of the Training School Rules (Northern Ireland) 1952 and related policy and guidance and the promotion of good governance. A related division within the NIO was responsible for criminal justice legislation, including the law concerning juveniles.

8 The DoJ, as the successor body for this aspect of the NIO's work, explained that the NIO established Lisnevin to provide two key services which it considered were necessary to enable the Northern Ireland juvenile justice services to fully function. These were a Special Unit to house boys who would not settle within existing open/non-secure training schools and an Assessment Unit to assist the courts to determine the suitability of boys for residential training.[9]

9 Lisnevin was opened in October 1973 at premises formerly called Kiltonga House, on the outskirts of Newtownards, County Down. It was designed as a non-denominational training school that would provide secure residential facilities for 40 boys aged between ten and seventeen years of age.

10 Before the school opened, it was the subject of a public inquiry because local residents had voiced strong objections to a training school being located in their neighbourhood. The inquiry decided that the school

6 LSN 254-675.
7 LSN 676-760.
8 LSN 875-877.
9 RGL 90160.

should open in Newtownards on a temporary basis, pending the building of a purpose built unit at Rathgael in Bangor, some five miles away.

11 When the school opened in Newtownards both the Special Unit and the Assessment Unit provided places for twenty boys. The main accommodation was in a refurbished nineteenth century mansion called Kiltonga House. Kiltonga House provided accommodation on three floors. The ground floor was used to provide a sitting room for the Special Unit and one for the Assessment Unit, showering and toilet facilities, a small domestic kitchen and an office. At the rear of the ground floor, small bedrooms with only a mattress for furniture were used as isolation/separation rooms. The dormitories for the Special Unit were on the first floor and the dormitories for the Assessment Unit were on the third floor.

12 In addition to the main house there were two wings consisting of temporary sectional buildings: one was used for classroom and office space and the other was used for kitchen and dining space. There were extensive grounds, which included a tennis court, football pitch, a small wooden gymnasium and a large heated greenhouse where the boys were taught horticulture.[10]

13 An eight-foot-high alarmed wire fence was erected around the property. A sectional building just inside the gates of the property was used to house the director's office and administrative and finance staff. A security guard controlled entrances and exits through a locked gate.

Special Unit

14 The Special Unit was designed to deal with boys who had been admitted through the courts to one of the open training schools for reasons such as non-attendance at school, being in need of care, protection and control, or juvenile offending, but whose behaviour in those schools was such that a secure environment was considered necessary. Dr Lockhart told us that many of these boys had extensive records of absconding from their existing open training schools and some had demonstrated violent or very disturbed behaviour in those schools.[11]

15 The decision to transfer boys from open training schools to Lisnevin was an administrative arrangement agreed by the respective managements of the schools and was not a court decision. Some of the boys had no record of criminal offending before being transferred to Lisnevin.[12] An Admissions Panel, which considered applications for boys to be placed in the Special Unit, included a member of the NIO's Training School Branch who was there to represent the Secretary of State.[13]

10 LSN 1229-30.
11 LSN 1228.

16 The Special Unit was a medium to long-term facility with boys living in the unit for between nine months and three years, with a median of around fifteen months.[14] The boys received education on site and Dr Lockhart explained that classes were rarely larger than three or four boys and a full range of subjects were available, including woodwork, metalwork, art, and PE. He recalled that a highly individualised curriculum based on the needs of each boy was provided.[15]

17 Dr Lockhart also described a weekly points system, and subsequently a token system, which were used in the Special Unit to encourage good behaviour. The achievement of points and tokens provided access to increasing levels of reward and privilege such as trips out and weekend leave. Poor behaviour resulted in demotion and loss of privilege. Dr Lockhart explained that the points and tokens systems were the main means of behaviour management, but when a boy engaged in more serious misbehaviour such as absconding, removal from the group to a separation room was used as a sanction.

18 Corporal punishment was permitted within the Training School Rules. Dr Lockhart explained that on occasion behaviour such as fighting and physical violence would be punished by caning. He explained that caning was normally administered by a bamboo cane to the hand by the head of the Unit or his deputy, that it would be recorded in the punishment book and that no other form of physical punishment was permitted.[16]

Assessment Unit

19 The Assessment Unit catered for boys who had been remanded by the juvenile courts for assessment after a finding of guilt or a case proven. While a significant number of the boys remanded for assessment were charged with scheduled or terrorist offences relating to the Troubles, such

12 LSN 1231.
13 LSN 13731.
14 LSN 1228.
15 LSN 1230.
16 LSN 1234.

as paramilitary activity and riotous behaviour, around 50% were charged with other juvenile crime, such as theft, burglary and criminal damage. A small number of boys were remanded because they were not attending school or were considered to be out of control in a children's home and therefore in need of care, protection and control.[17]

20 The assessment process involved the development of a social profile of the boy and his family, an educational assessment and a psychological assessment. These assessments were then collated and discussed at a multi-disciplinary case conference. In the case of boys remanded by a juvenile court a recommendation for disposal would be agreed and provided to the court.[18]

21 Dr Lockhart explained that the throughput of the Assessment Unit was quite steady and that it mainly ran at full capacity. He estimated that it had a throughput of more than 100 boys per year.[19] However, after only a few years of operation, it was identified that the Assessment Unit was recommending that around 80% of the boys assessed should receive a community disposal on return to court. Dr Lockhart told us this was in stark contrast to the reception units at both Rathgael and St Patrick's training schools which, after conducting their assessments, recommended that around 80% of boys should receive a Training School Order. He explained that this finding ultimately led the NIO to close the Assessment Unit at Lisnevin in 1977 and transfer its work to a day assessment unit at Whitefield House in Black's Road in Belfast. The Assessment Unit staff at Lisnevin moved to Whitefield, which meant that Lisnevin operated solely as a Special Unit for a period of approximately two years.[20]

22 The transfer of the Assessment Unit and the establishment of a junior remand wing in Crumlin Road Prison (mainly for those charged with scheduled offences) meant that young terrorist offenders would no longer be accommodated in Lisnevin. This change in function led to another attempt to have the school located permanently in Newtownards.

23 A second public inquiry about this matter was held in November 1978. Local residents maintained their objections and the inquiry recommended that as the role of the school had not changed substantially and it still had its share of "dangerous and thoroughly aggressive boys" it should be discontinued at its present site.[21]

17 LSN 1230-2301.
18 LSN 1232.
19 LSN 1228.
20 LSN 1232.
21 LSN 1235.

Move to Millisle

24 As a result of the outcome of the second public inquiry, the school moved in 1981 to Millisle, County Down, into premises which had been designed for and formerly used as a secure borstal.[22]

25 The accommodation at Millisle consisted of a main two-storey building enclosed by a perimeter fence. Access to the building was secured by an entrance hall, which was staffed between the hours of 7.00am and 10.00pm, and access from the entrance hall to other parts of the building was secured through the use of electronically controlled doors. Each storey of the building provided two wings of sleeping accommodation, living rooms, classrooms and office space. Workshops for training in crafts such as joinery, metal work and brickwork and a full-size football pitch were located in the extensive grounds.[23]

26 Dr Lockhart told us that the move to Millisle marked a major change in the culture and management of Lisnevin and that in his view the planning and implementation of the move from Newtownards to Millisle was "a disaster".[24] He explained that because the building had been designed as a category C prison it was totally unsuitable for housing children and the lack of planning for the move meant that necessary furniture was not available when the children arrived at the premises.[25]

27 He highlighted two particular aspects of the move which he considered adversely affected the experience of the boys. Firstly, the teachers decided to use the move as an opportunity to redesign the curriculum and this took from September 1981 to May 1982. He explained that while schooling was not available, a culture emerged of the boys sitting watching television during the day.[26] We consider the lack of schooling for almost a full school year to be a systemic failing by the Lisnevin Management Board and the NIO, as the Department with overall responsibility for the school to ensure that the institution provided proper care.

28 Secondly, although the site in Millisle was only ten miles approximately from the site in Newtownards it was much more isolated and difficult to reach by public transport. There were few direct buses from Belfast to

22 LSN 930.
23 SPT 16268.
24 LSN 1238.
25 LSN 1238.
26 LSN 1238.

Millisle and even fewer went down the coast past Lisnevin. This made it very difficult for parents and families to visit the boys. The journey took longer, was more expensive and often meant changes of bus and a walk of at least a mile. Dr Lockhart explained that the location also led to a reduction in the number of home visits made by staff.[27] LN 25 told us that when he commenced work in Lisnevin at the Millisle site in 1983 a minibus service was in place to transport family members visiting boys to and from the public bus stop in Millisle to the school.[28]

29 Major programmes of refurbishment were undertaken to make the site at Millisle more appropriate for a training school. However, when the SSI inspected Lisnevin in April 1988[29] inspectors found that because the premises had been built on penal lines it was in many ways unsuitable for use as a Special Unit for adolescent boys that had a philosophy based upon child care considerations.[30] Inspectors acknowledged that the décor had been modified to soften the institutional feel of the buildings, but concluded that despite these improvements there were still problems with the physical provision in Lisnevin.[31]

30 In its closing submission to this module, the DoJ accepted the criticisms about the premises at Millisle being unsuitable for housing a training school. However, it pointed out that the move was necessitated by the outcome of the second public inquiry about the Kiltonga site and that the choice of the Millisle site, which was vacant and contained many of the amenities necessary for a training school, was undoubtedly driven by public expenditure considerations.[32]

Remand Unit

31 Following the closure of the Juvenile Remand Unit, formerly located at the Young Offenders Centre in Hydebank, a ten-bed secure remand unit was opened in Lisnevin in 1985. This meant that boys between the ages of ten and seventeen could be remanded outside of the adult penal system.

32 Dr Lockhart helpfully provided us with a copy of a report the APRU produced of its analysis of admissions to the Remand Unit from 1985 to

27 LSN1238.
28 Day 162, p.87.
29 LSN 13714.
30 LSN 13726.
31 SPT 16268.
32 RGL 90162.

1992. This analysis identified that boys were admitted to the Remand Unit through three routes. Firstly, they were sent from one of the open training schools because it had been decided that their persistent absconding and/or disruptive behaviour was such that placement in a secure setting was required for a period of five weeks. These referrals were scrutinised and adjudicated by an Independent Admissions Panel, chaired by a member of the Lisnevin Management Board and attended by independent representatives from Social Services, APRU and the NIO.

33 It is recorded in the APRU report that out of a total of 1,057 admissions to the Remand Unit between 1985 and 1992, 165 boys were admitted for five weeks: 94 from Rathgael training school and 71 from St Patrick's training school. In 1988, 1989 and 1990 there were significantly lower numbers of admissions from training schools, with ten, fourteen and fifteen admissions respectively in those years.[33]

34 Secondly, and most commonly, boys were remanded to Lisnevin by the courts because of the seriousness of their alleged offence and/or because placement in a secure setting was considered necessary to ensure that a boy was available to attend his next court appearance.[34] Between 1985 and 1992 there were a total of 892 court remands, 361 (40.5%) of which were from Belfast Juvenile, Magistrates and High Courts.[35]

35 Thirdly, with the passing of the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order (1989) (PACE) boys could be admitted to the Remand Unit for an overnight remand at the request of the RUC to ensure their appearance at court the next morning. The first admission to Lisnevin under the PACE provisions was on 3 March 1990, and up until the end of 1992 there were 161 cases of boys admitted under PACE provisions.[36]

36 While the annual throughput of the Special Unit was quite low, with most boys remaining there for around fifteen months, there was a higher level of throughput in the Remand Unit, not surprisingly given its remit. The APRU report recorded that from an initial intake of 98 boys in 1985, the admissions increased to a peak of 153 in 1992. The annual admissions varied from 118 to 148, making an annual average of 132 admissions These figures included boys who were re-remanded for the same offence(s) or remanded for subsequent offences.[37]

33 LSN 1311.
34 LSN 1291.
35 LSN 1311
36 LSN 1310.
37 LSN 1289.

37 By 1994, in response to the demand for places, the capacity of the Remand Unit was increased to 25 places. There was a corresponding reduction in the capacity of the Special Unit from twenty beds to fifteen beds.[38] Even with this increase in capacity, the minutes of Management Board meetings record that there were periods that the Remand Unit was filled beyond capacity and that this over-occupancy put considerable strain on the operation and management of the Unit. The impact of over-occupancy was also raised with the NIO. For example, in November 1994, Mr Denley the then director of Lisnevin reported to the NIO that there were 41 boys in the Remand Unit and that this meant that the school was "severely overcrowded".[39] He pointed out that existing staffing levels were inadequate as they were calculated on the basis of 25 boys being accommodated in the Remand Unit and informed officials that boys were having to be locked up during the day as a means of dealing with the situation.[40] There is evidence that the NIO responded to these concerns. At a meeting in February 1995, senior managers reported to NIO officials that the situation had improved and acknowledged that this was due in part to the NIO having written to the courts about the overcrowding problems being experienced in Lisnevin.[41] It is clear from the report of the SSI inspection of Lisnevin in 1988 that it was not just the number of boys on remand in Lisnevin that was creating problems, but also the challenging nature of the behaviour of some of the boys. Inspectors commented:

> "Since the opening of the Remand Unit life has not been without its problems. Disturbances, barricades, damage, fire, assaults on staff and acute problems of control of very difficult behaviour."[42]

Governance

Management Board

38 Lisnevin was managed by a Board of Management which consisted of an independent chairman appointed by the Secretary of State and representatives from the management boards of St Patrick's, St Joseph's, Rathgael and Whiteabbey Training Schools. The DoJ and the DHSSPS explained in their joint statement that these governance arrangements

38 LSN 1287.
39 LSN 13236.
40 LSN 13235.
41 LSN 13241
42 LSN 13747.

were seen as a means of bringing together the expertise and learning of the different training schools.[43]

39 In an arrangement that was unique to Lisnevin within the training school system, the secretary to the board was a member of the senior management team. He had a second line management role equivalent in the hierarchy to the role of deputy director and had particular responsibility for financial management and for supervising the work of administrative, security, maintenance and domestic staff. SSI inspectors who inspected the school in 1988 were impressed with this arrangement and commended it to other training schools.[44] The Management Board established a committee to deal with staffing issues and a member of the board sat on the Admissions Panel that approved admissions to the Special Unit.

40 The minutes of the Management Board show that it exercised oversight of the management, funding and development of the school and also concerned itself with matters to do with the progress of individual boys, for example a boy being released on licence, and how incidents such as boys barricading themselves in rooms were handled.[45]

41 The Management Board was informed about allegations from boys that staff had assaulted them and about complaints by boys, for example that staff had used illegal holds during a restraint. We noted that the Management Board arranged for its staff committee to receive follow-up reports on these matters even when boys had refused to submit a formal complaint or had withdrawn their complaint.[46]

42 The Management Board also considered staffing matters such as the adequacy of staffing levels, staff turn-over, the type and mix of staff required and issues in relation to individual staff, including complaints made against them and grievances submitted by them.[47]

43 The report of the SSI inspection in 1988 reminded the Board of Management that Rule 10 (3) of the Training School Rules required that the school be visited at least once a month by at least one member of the Board of Management who "shall satisfy himself regarding the care of the boys and the state of the school".[48] The inspectors' scrutiny of

43 LSN 941.
44 LSN 13724.
45 LSN 13785.
46 LSN 12981-12982.
47 LSN 13784.
48 LSN 13755.

records showed that during the previous twelve months this duty had only been performed on six occasions. The report of the inspection included a recommendation that the frequency of visiting by board members be increased to comply with Rule 10 (3) of the Training School Rules. By the time of the next SSI inspection visit to Lisnevin in January 1992, inspectors found that monthly visits were being completed, findings were reported to meetings of the management committee and the director was responsible for taking any necessary action. They concluded that board members were carrying out their duties regularly and effectively.[49]

Northern Ireland Office

44 The NIO maintained regular oversight of Lisnevin. Officials met on a monthly basis with the senior staff team and on a quarterly basis with the Management Board. The minutes of these meetings, which were chaired by a NIO official, record detailed monitoring of financial and operational matters, discussion of legislative and policy developments and consideration of what were termed in the agendas and minutes as "sensitive items" which were issues to do with individual boys and staff members.

45 Major incidents such as violent incidents, damage to the school and multiple absconding were discussed, contributory factors identified and remedial action agreed. Although finances were limited and spend controlled, it was clear that where additional funding was required, for example, to repair damage to the building or improve security, it was forthcoming. However, the level and mix of staff, the lack of qualified staff and a dependence on the use of casual staff was a persistent concern, particularly at times when the Remand Unit was overcrowded. The delay in addressing this issue and the impact it had on the operation of the school is considered later in this chapter.

Inspection

46 The DoJ and the DHSSPS explained in their joint opening statement for this module that the training schools inspection functions were transferred from the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) to the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS) in the early 1970s. The Departments explained that they could not state at the time they submitted their statement

49 LSN 13819.

whether inspections of training schools were undertaken by the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) on behalf of the DHSS for the NIO between the early 1970s and early 1980s. They referred to their view that children's homes were not inspected at that time because of the influence of the Seebohm report, which recommended a shift from regulation to the provision of support and advice, and suggested this may have also affected the NIO's approach to inspection of training schools.[50]

47 The first report of an inspection of Lisnevin that was available to us was that undertaken by the SSI, the successor to SWAG, in April 1988.[51] We also considered SSI reports of announced inspections of the school in 1992,[52] 1993[53] and 1994[54] and two unannounced inspections in 1993[55] and 1994.[56] We were also assisted by an overview report "Residential Child Care in Northern Ireland: the Training Schools" which the SSI published in 1989. This report provided a helpful summary of the findings of inspections of the training schools including Lisnevin during the period 1987-1988.[57]

48 The report of the 1988 inspection was comprehensive and provided a detailed analysis of the operation of the school. Despite concerns about the physical provision in Lisnevin the inspectors described the regime in the school as having an emphasis on benign/humane containment, which enabled the young people to take part in educational, vocational and recreational programmes.[58] Inspectors made recommendations in this and subsequent inspections about ways in which the conditions for the boys should be improved, some of which we will consider in detail later in this chapter.

Independent Representation Scheme

49 Another form of monitoring was introduced in 1991 when the NIO funded the establishment of an Independent Representation Scheme for children detained in Lisnevin. The Independent Representation Scheme was operated by the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NIACRO) which recruited volunteers to act as independent representatives

50 LSN 949.
51 LSN 13709-13779.
52 LSN 13809-13849.
53 LSN 13850–13872.
54 LSN 13896-13904.
55 LSN 13873-13879.
56 LSN 13905–13911.
57 SPT 16222-19310.
58 SPT 16268.

(IR). These representatives were trained in a range of relevant areas, including child protection. Their role was to listen to the views of young people, to make these views known to management and senior staff within the school and, where possible, to facilitate resolution. We will consider matters boys raised with independent representatives later in this chapter.

Evidence from Applicants about Lisnevin

50 Eight applicants provided evidence in person about Lisnevin: HIA 200, HIA 267, HIA 253, HIA 138, HIA 94, HIA 400, HIA 434, and, HIA 374. Three of these witnesses (HIA 200, HIA 267 and HIA 253) were completely positive about their time in the school.

51 HIA 200 spent five weeks in Lisnevin in 1974 for assessment. He told us: "Lisnevin was fantastic and I have no complaints about my time there".[59] HIA 267 was in Lisnevin for assessment for approximately six weeks in 1975. He had no complaints about the school and told us he enjoyed the activities and the time he spent with the other boys.[60]

52 HIA 253 was in Lisnevin for approximately six months in 1984 and said in his written statement that he found the staff in the school friendly and not really strict.[61] He commented further when he gave evidence in person: "…they tried to make better of you."[62] HIA 253 particularly appreciated being able to earn weekend leave through good behaviour even though Lisnevin was a secure school.

53 We will now consider the evidence from the other five witnesses (HIA 94, HIA 400, HIA 434, HIA 138, HIA 374) and the written evidence of HIA 418 under the headings: physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse, neglect and unacceptable practices.

Physical Abuse, including Peer Abuse

54 HIA 400 was in Lisnevin for assessment for one month in 1974. He told us in his statement:

> "Apart from being hit around the head a few times, I have no complaints to make about Lisnevin. It was a reasonable place with good staff who, for the most part, were caring and compassionate".[63]

59 RGL 037.
60 RGL 064.
61 LSN 059.
62 Day 142, p.22.
63 Day 152, p.110.

When he gave evidence in person he explained that that there were certain codes of behaviour in Lisnevin and if inmates failed to adhere to them a minority of staff would:

> "shout at you, sometimes slap you on the ears, sometimes hit you over the head with their knuckles."[64]

55 He gave an example of an officer rapping him over the head with his knuckles as punishment for looking down a corridor. HIA 400 was in other institutions and commented that he did not consider that the physical chastisement in Lisnevin was exceptional.[65]

56 HIA 94 was transferred from St Patrick's training school to Lisnevin in November 1973. He remained there until August 1975 and then because of his disruptive behaviour he was transferred to Armagh Prison.[66] In his first written statement, HIA 94 alleged he was beaten in Lisnevin by staff called LN 1 and LN2. He submitted a suplementary statement (dated 12/3/14) in which he corrected this allegation and clarified that LN 1 and LN 2 were fellow inmates and not staff.[67] However, he went on say that three members of staff who he named as LN 10, LN 11 and LN 8 beat him at various times and that a female art teacher who he believed witnessed this abuse did nothing to stop it or help him.[68] He told us when he gave evidence in person that officers beat him in the showers, living room and the cells.[69]

57 It was not possible for the Inquiry to trace and make contact with LN 10 and LN 11 but LN 8 provided a statement. He told us that he was a teacher in Lisnevin and had acted as a joint key worker for HIA 94. He explained that the allocation of two key workers to one boy was unusual and that the arrangement was put in place in response to HIA 94's aggressive and physically violent behaviour.[70] LN 8 stated that he was able to talk to HIA 94 and accepted him into his class when other teachers were reluctant to allow HIA 94 back in to their classrooms after his violent outbursts.[71]

58 Dr Lockhart remembered HIA 94 as one of the most disturbed and violent young people he ever met and also recalled LN 8 telling him that

64 Day 152, p.110.
65 Day 152, p.111.
66 SPT 46116.
67 LSN 005.
68 LSN 009.
69 Day 139, p.152.
70 LSN 872.
71 LSN 873.

the director, LN 6 had given him permission to use "as much force as necessary" to control HIA 94's behaviour.[72]

59 LN 8 refuted without reservation the allegations that he beat HIA 94. He stated that he only remembered one occasion when he was involved in restraining HIA 94 and that was when HIA 94's behaviour had been so frightening to some boys and staff that they had barricaded themselves in a common room for fear of being attacked by him.[73] He referred us to extracts from contemporaneous records maintained in Lisnevin about HIA 94's aggressive and violent behaviour towards other boys and staff.

60 Junior Counsel to the Inquiry discussed these records with HIA 94 when he consulted with him prior to HIA 94 giving evidence in person. The records detailed the considerable difficulty staff in Lisnevin had managing HIA 94's behaviour. They also show that the Management Board had several discussions about how best to deal with HIA 94's behavior, including on one occasion how to respond to an incident where he broke a member of staff's nose.[74] HIA 94 told us that he could not remember the recorded incidents but he acknowledged, "They just couldn't control me".[75]

61 The records also showed that HIA 94 received corporal punishment in Lisnevin. For example, on one occasion he was caned for attacking a member of staff and on another occasion he was threatened with the cane if his public accusations to another inmate that the boy's father was murdered for being an informer were repeated. Both the caning and the threat of caning were recorded.[76]

62 In contrast to HIA 94's evidence, HIA 374, who was in Lisnevin for assessment in 1976 - the year following HIA 94's departure from the school, told us he didn't see anyone in Lisnevin "getting abused, hurt, harmed, shouted at or nothing."[77]

63 HIA 138 was in Lisnevin on remand from March to June 1990 and he told us that he was physically abused during his time there. He described getting into confrontations with staff, which would start with the exchange of verbal abuse and then lead to physical fights. He gave an example of a confrontation which he said occurred because a member of staff who was

72 LSN 1248.
73 LSN 874.
74 Day 139, p.144.
75 Day 139, p.152.
76 LSN 171.
77 Day 140, p.24.

handing out cigarettes (cigarettes were handed out at regular intervals during the day) refused to give him a cigarette and told him he would have to beg for one. HIA 138 said he got into a physical fight with the member of staff, managed to over-power him and made him promise to give him a cigarette and not punish him for fighting. He explained that when he got these assurances he let the member of staff go but that other staff who had come to see what the commotion was about assaulted him and he ended up on the ground being kicked and punched by them.[78]

64 HIA 138 also said that during restraints officers pressed pressure points on his body which had a paralysing effect and that it took time for feeling to return to his arms and legs. One of the methods that staff used to deal with disruptive behaviour was to remove a boy and put him in isolation. HIA 138 told us that staff regularly beat him as they were taking him to the isolation unit, and that on one occasion by the time he was left in the separation cell he was bleeding from his nose and had excrement all over his pyjamas because he had soiled himself.[79]

65 He also described an incident when he and another boy barricaded themselves in a room and were too scared to come out for fear of being beaten by officers. He recalled that a member of staff, LN 29 intervened and promised they would not be hurt if they came out and that he kept that promise.[80]

66 When HIA 138 gave evidence in person he was shown extracts from logs maintained in Lisnevin which recorded that he was placed in the separation unit for such behaviour as flooding his room, barricading himself in a room with another boy and wrecking that room, and hitting another boy.[81] The records also showed that there were times that HIA 138 was sent to bed early or made to stay in his bedroom during the day in response to his behaviour and that he was not always placed in the separation unit. Although HIA 138 could not remember the specific incidents that were recorded he did accept that the type of behaviour described did take place and that he and other boys would have been difficult for staff in Lisnevin to manage.[82]

78 LSN 031
79 LSN 031.
80 LSN 032.
81 Day 156, p.15 to16 and LSN 21451.
82 Day 156, p.10.

67 HIA 418 was remanded in Lisnevin on the first occasion from 18 September 1992 to 18 December 1992 and on the second occasion from 10 April 1993 to 21 April 1993. He commenced a third period in Lisnevin on 15 December 1995, but only sixteen days of that stay are within the years of the Inquiry's terms of reference. In his written statement, HIA 418 described being regularly intimidated and bullied by staff in Lisnevin and that when he tried to stand up for himself he was restrained by staff. He described staff putting his arms up his back and that the pain was so excruciating he screamed and pleaded for the restraint to stop.[83] He told us that he observed other boys being treated in the same way.[84]

68 HIA 418 also described a member of staff kicking him because he thought HIA 418 was laughing at him rather than at the joke he had told, and another member of staff, who played rugby, tackling him to the ground at an outdoor event and leaving him winded.[85]

69 HIA 418 stated that he did not remember the names of the staff that restrained him but that he remembered LN 25 being in charge of staff and believed he must have been aware of their behaviour.[86] LN 25 provided a written statement and gave evidence in person. He explained that he developed a rapport with boys that assisted him to diffuse situations but accepted that not all staff may have been able to do so. He confirmed that restraint techniques were used but he denied that were used to intimidate, bully or assault residents[87] and he stated more generally that he did not witness and was not party to any culture of intimidation or bullying by staff.[88]

Complaints Processes

70 LN 25 pointed out that complaints processes were available to boys if they felt they were being treated unfairly.[89] When he gave evidence in person he confirmed that a previous inmate who had been on remand in Lisnevin made a complaint about him. He explained that the complaint was referred to the police and the DPP but that he was not required to appear in any disciplinary or court proceedings in relation to it, and he was

83 LSN 026.
84 LSN 027.
85 LSN 026.
86 LSN 026.
87 LSN 1225.
88 LSN 1224.
89 LSN 1225.

just told by his manager that no further action was being taken in relation to it.[90]

71 It is clear from documentation we have seen that boys were given clear advice on admission about their right to complain if they felt they were being treated unjustly or that their rights were not being protected, and the procedure for doing so.[91] Minutes of the Management Board show that it was informed about formal complaints from boys and minutes of the meetings between senior managers and NIO officials show that complaints and how they were being handled were discussed with NIO officials. For example, at the meeting with the NIO officials in November 1993 Mr Gordon, who was the board secretary as well as a member of the senior management team, informed officials that two complaints from boys about assaults by staff had been referred to the RUC for investigation. He confirmed that the RUC had found no case in relation to one of the complaints but had referred the other complaint to the DPP for an independent assessment of the available evidence.[92]

72 However, a review by NIACRO's Youth Justice Unit of complaints received during the operation of the Independent Representation Scheme in Lisnevin provided more evidence of boys complaining about physical abuse by staff and also highlighted that there was not a consistent approach taken to referring complaints to appropriate bodies for investigation.

Review of the Independent Representation Scheme

73 The review covered the period 1994 to 2000, but in accordance with the Inquiry's terms of reference we only considered the period 1994-1995. During 1994 to 1995 Independent Representatives (IRs) received eleven complaints from individual boys and two general complaints from groups of boys, one about having to go to bed early and one about lack of privacy in the shower.[93] The complaints from individual boys were about alleged assaults by staff, verbal abuse by staff and bullying by other boys.

74 For example, one boy made two complaints to an IR in August 1994 about alleged physical abuse by staff. He made his first complaint on 8 August 1994. He told the IR that when he was being restrained by two members of staff, one of the staff punched the right side of his head and

90 Day 162, p.110.
91 LSN 12360.
92 LSN 13176.
93 LSN 14379.

his head was banged off the wall and floor. He said he was taken to the nurse but did not remember what treatment he received. Although the boy's account of how he was treated during the restraint was corroborated by another boy he was reluctant to make a formal complaint. He made his second complaint on 24 August 1994. He told an IR that a member of staff had put him on the ground and punched him leaving marks to his upper eye. However, he went on to explain that he had been "winding up" the member of staff and did not wish to make a formal complaint. Another boy complained to the IR on 24 August 1994 that when he did not respond quickly enough to an instruction to get undressed for bed a member of staff grabbed him around the throat causing him to choke and then kicked him on the ankles and punched him in the stomach.[94]

75 The IR coordinator wrote to the director of Lisnevin about these complaints. The director responded but said he was unable to investigate the two complaints of physical abuse from the first boy as he had left Lisnevin before they were brought to his attention. He explained that he had personally investigated the complaint from the other boy and had been unable to prove or refute the allegation but had advised the boy that he could meet with a member of the Management Board to discuss his complaint. He indicated that the boy was thinking about whether to do that.[95]

76 NIACRO's Youth Justice Unit noted in its review that despite the serious nature of these complaints they were all dealt with internally by Lisnevin and none were referred to social services or the police.[96] A further review of the Independent Representation Scheme was completed in 2000 and Ronnie Orr of the SSI, who was involved in it, concluded that a number of cases referred to the IRs "did not seem to have been properly concluded".[97]

77 This evidence suggests that although complaints procedures were available to the boys and there were related policies for how staff should handle complaints these were not always fully implemented. We consider that the two complaints the director told the IR coordinator he could not investigate because the boy in question had left Lisnevin were allegations of serious assault that should have been followed up in order to ensure that if they were true the staff member in question could be prevented from behaving

94 LSN 14394-14395.
95 LSN 14396.
96 LSN 14396.
97 LSN 14462.

in a similar manner towards other boys. We consider the failure of the director to refer these complaints to the RUC was indicative of a systemic failing to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

Physical Restraint and Staff Training

78 The contemporaneous records from Lisnevin detail staff having to deal with a range of disruptive, provocative, destructive and, at times, violent behaviour from boys, including riots involving a number of boys acting together.[98] The behaviour included boys barricading themselves in rooms, destroying furniture and fittings, flooding rooms, starting fires and fighting with each other and with staff. The DoJ pointed out in its closing submission that, given the range of behaviour boys were displaying, it is reasonable to infer that staff were bound to resort to physical intervention to defend themselves or to protect others from physical harm.[99]

79 There is an inherent risk in the process of restraining and moving a struggling and resisting teenage boy that the boy and/or the staff will be hurt. It would appear this happened on occasion in Lisnevin. For example, we considered documentation about an investigation into a restraint in Lisnevin that resulted in a boy's collar bone being broken and a staff member being admitted to hospital with chest pains.[100]

80 One of the most effective means of reducing the risk of a young person and/or staff member being hurt is ensuring that staff are properly trained in diffusing situations and in restraint and control methods. We noted that in the report of a working group set up to consider an incident at Lisnevin on 23 December 1986 where boys set fire to their mattresses and six boys absconded, it was recorded that no formal training had been given to staff in the matter of "physically controlling difficult boys".[101] The DoJ acknowledged in its closing submission that formal training for staff in the application of appropriate restraint measures was too long delayed and it accepted that some staff may have used inappropriate techniques to restrain boys.[102] However it also pointed out that even in the absence of such training, staff would have been aware that to beat a boy when taking

98 LSN 12984.
99 RGL 90174.
100 LSN 1538.
101 LSN 14499.
102 RGL 90176.

him to the punishment block (as HIA 138 said happened to him) was unacceptable and would have resulted in disciplinary action had any such abuse been detected.[103]

81 From the evidence we have considered, we are satisfied that some staff may have relied on restraint methods to maintain discipline in the face of disruptive behaviour and that during some restraints force was used that led to boys being hurt. We consider this was particularly the case when staff were faced with persistent poor behaviour from some boys, were frustrated about the damage caused by boys and were anxious to be seen to maintain control and authority. We also consider that the risk of harm was much greater when boys robustly resisted being restrained. However, taking account of all the evidence we have heard we do not consider that the use of excessive force by staff in Lisnevin was so widespread as to amount to systemic abuse.

82 We considered that inadequate training in control and restraint methods increased the risk of staff behaving inappropriately and boys being hurt. Therefore, we found the delay in providing this training amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board of Lisnevin and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

Peer Abuse

83 HIA 418 complained that he was intimidated and bullied by other boys, and staff did not intervene to protect him. Contemporaneous documentation records HIA 418 complaining to LN 25 on 21 October 1992 about being bullied and asking to be moved to a different class. LN 25 recorded the complaint and asked staff to "keep an eye on this situation". When LN 25 gave evidence in person he said he could not remember this complaint but indicated that in addition to alerting other staff to HIA 418's concerns about being bullied, he believed he would have discussed the possibility of moving HIA 418 to a different class with the deputy director of education, as it would have been for him to agree such a transfer.[104]

84 HIA 434 spent two and a half months on remand in Lisnevin from February to May 1989. He told us that the regime was very strict and regulated, and that autonomy in relation to basic decision making was taken from him but that generally the quality of care was good.[105] He told us that in

103 RGL 90176.
104 Day 162, p.101.
105 LSN 039.

his experience staff did intervene to stop fighting between boys and that he was not bullied in Lisnevin.[106]

85 Information about the work of the Independent Representation Scheme also provides an example of staff dealing with bullying. In October 1994 a boy told an IR that he was being threatened by other boys and when the IR reported this to managers in Lisnevin they agreed to take appropriate steps to ensure the boy's safety. Two days later, the same boy showed the IR self-inflicted injuries and when this was reported to senior managers they arranged a meeting with a psychologist for the boy and told staff to be vigilant in relation to him.[107]

86 The evidence we have heard suggests that bullying and fighting between boys, which might be expected in an institution like Lisnevin particularly during times of social unrest in the wider community, was taken seriously and staff intervened to address them.

Sexual Abuse

87 We received no complaints about sexual abuse in Lisnevin. HIA 374 who was in Lisnevin in 1976 told us in his written statement[108] that when he was showering, a male member of staff placed his hand on his private parts and told him "no masturbating". When HIA 374 gave evidence in person he explained that on reflection he considered this inappropriate rather than abusive behaviour and that he did not believe the member of staff got sexual gratification from what he did.[109]

Emotional Abuse

Sectarian Abuse

88 HIA 138 told us he was subject to sectarian abuse by staff and other residents. He said he was picked on by staff because he had the initials of a paramilitary organisation tattooed on his hand. He said this led to staff calling him insulting names and being verbally abusive to him and that it was a "culture of abuse" with over half of the staff on duty at any one time being verbally abusive to him.[110]

106 LSN 039.
107 LSN 14396-14397.
108 SPT 119.
109 Day 140, p.13.
110 LSN 030.

89 He particularly recalled a member of staff, LN 28, who was in charge of the woodwork shop. He said LN 28 would regularly verbally abuse him and say he would like to cut off HIA 138's fingers. HIA 138 took this to be a reference to getting rid of the tattoo on his hand. HIA 138 told us that he did not complain about the behaviour of staff because at first he did not know the procedure for complaining and when he did he decided that there was no point in complaining as it would make no difference.[111]

90 HIA 418 said that he was subject to sectarian abuse from other residents and staff and he referred to a particular member of staff, (LN 26) wearing Rangers football club t-shirts and jewellery to work. He also stated that LN 25 would tell him and other boys during snooker matches not to play shots called crosses and he thought "this was referring to our Catholic identity".[112] LN 25 expressed his surprise at this allegation. He explained that "crosses" was a common term used in the snooker fraternity to describe a particular shot and that was the only context in which he used it.[113]

91 The evidence of HIA 138 and HIA 418 about sectarian behaviour from staff in Lisnevin contrasted with the evidence we heard from HIA 434 and HIA 253. HIA 434 described "fights on an almost daily basis between Catholic and Protestant inmates in Lisnevin"[114] and recalled that staff intervened to stop the fighting. He confirmed when he gave evidence in person that he never observed staff being sectarian in their behaviour.[115] HIA 253 also confirmed when he gave evidence in person that he did not witness staff in Lisnevin being sectarian.[116]

92 When LN 25 gave evidence in person he said he was not aware of a culture of sectarianism in Lisnevin and confirmed that he would have made it clear to boys that he would not tolerate sectarian behaviour.[117]

93 Consideration of Lisnevin records provided examples of staff dealing with sectarian issues, for example staff isolating and then restraining a boy who refused to stop singing loyalist songs.[118] The director, Mr Denley informed the Management Board about a complaint from a boy

111 LSN 030.
112 LSN 027.
113 LSN 1226.
114 LSN 039.
115 Day 153, p.122.
116 Day 142, p.19.
117 Day 162, p.102.
118 LSN 1538.

that a member of staff had made a sectarian remark to him, even though the boy had withdrawn his complaint. The director shared his concern about the sudden retraction of the complaint and the Management Board agreed that the situation would have to be monitored closely.[119]

94 When Dr Lockhart gave evidence in person he referred to a research study he completed in Lisnevin which showed that the experience of mixing together during five-week assessment periods led Catholic and Protestant boys to realise they were more alike than different and that this perception persisted after they completed their assessment period.[120]

95 We consider it inevitable that the social unrest and sectarianism in the wider community at the time would have influenced the attitudes and behaviour of some boys and some staff in Lisnevin. However, the evidence we have received does not indicate that sectarian behaviour by staff was systemic or condoned by managers.

Abusive Comments

96 In addition to the evidence we heard about sectarian abuse, we noted that a boy complained to an IR in August 1994 that a member of staff had made abusive comments about his mother.[121] This complaint was referred to the governor, but he told the IR coordinator that he was unable to investigate it because the boy had left Lisnevin before the matter was brought to his attention.[122]

97 We also noted how HIA 13 compared the behaviour of a member of staff LN 29 with that of other staff: "where the other staff would have been kind of goading us and making fun of us and stuff like that, he wouldn't."[123]

Humiliation

98 HIA 138 told us that he was made to wear pyjamas when his father came to visit and when he queried this he was told by the member of staff that he had to earn the right to wear his ordinary clothes. HIA 138 said he found this treatment humiliating and that he felt singled out as none of the other inmates were treated in the same way.[124]

119 LSN 12987.
120 Day 161, p.57.
121 LSN 14395.
122 LSN 14396.
123 Day 156, p.25.
124 LSN 032.

Right to Privacy

99 We found evidence of action being taken to protect the rights of boys. In November 1990 a team leader reported that three members of staff had "acted unprofessionally in relation to a client's right to privacy". This matter was investigated, disciplinary action was instigated and formal warnings were issued to the staff.[125]

100 On the basis of the evidence we have received we have concluded that there was no systemic emotional abuse in Lisnevin.

Neglect

Physical Environment

101 The SSI commented in the report of its 1988 inspection of Lisnevin on the lack of furniture in the boys' bedrooms. As a result of bedroom furniture being deliberately damaged and destroyed only two pieces of furniture were provided, a cuboid which could be used as a chair or a table and a reinforced mattress which rested on the floor without a supporting frame. As there were no wardrobes in the bedrooms, the boys had to place their day clothing on the corridor floor, outside their bedrooms, during the night. The inspectors acknowledged the risk of furniture being vandalised but pointed out that boys held in a caring regime should only be deprived of normal home comforts in exceptional circumstances, and even then only for a short period of time. They recommended that appropriate furniture and clothing space was provided.[126] We noted that when Lisnevin was inspected in 1992 inspectors recorded that a major effort had been made to improve the quality of accommodation in the Special Unit but they found the bedrooms in the Remand Unit quite spartan and devoid of any sense of identity.[127] We agree with the inspectors' views about the accommodation provided for the boys. Although it is clear from Lisnevin records that some boys caused considerable damage to their bedrooms we consider the lack of furnishing, and in particular the lack of provision for storing clothes, was unacceptable. We consider that accommodating boys in this way was a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

125 LSN 12967.
126 LSN 1279.
127 LSN 13824.

Medical Attention

102 Dr Lockhart told us Lisnevin had a fully equipped medical room and employed three nurses, and that usually at least one of the nurses was on duty between the hours of 9am and 9pm each day. In addition, a local GP acted as medical officer and visited at least once per week or otherwise on demand.

103 He explained that each boy had a full medical on admission and that the nurses dealt with minor medical complaints and ailments. We noted references in the contemporaneous records to boys being taken to the nurse and to Ards Hospital for treatment of injuries[128] and of HIA 94 being sent to Muckamore Hospital for three short stays for assessment. Dr Lockhart also recalled a full dental room and that an outside dentist visited on a weekly basis. He recalled that it was noted that many boys' teeth were in a poor state when they arrived in Lisnevin and in a better state by the time they left.[129]

104 HIA 138 said in his written statement that he was quite bruised following what he described as a punishment beating and a nurse came to the cell where he was being held to check on him. He said that she looked at him, laughed and walked out commenting to other staff that were present that he would live, which made them laugh. HIA 138 commented "I could not believe someone who was supposed to help me could be so callous."[130]

105 When HIA 138 gave evidence in person he emphasised that he received no treatment for injuries caused to him by staff. He pointed out that there was detailed recording of treatment he received for minor ailments such as acne and an upset stomach:

> "but there is no record of the injuries to my face when I was taken to the separation unit, you know, because there always was, like. There was always blood, you know."[131]

106 HIA 434 said in his written statement that he was so cold in his room that he slept beside the radiator pipes and on one occasion burnt his arm on the pipes. He stated that staff laughed off his injury and failed to provide him with medical treatment.[132] When he gave evidence in person, HIA 434 clarified that he did receive treatment but not until a new shift

128 LSN 1538.
129 LSN 1232.
130 LSN 032.
131 Day 156, p.32.
132 LSN 039.

of staff came on duty and by that time his wound had started weeping and sticking to his clothes.[133] Lisnevin records detail HIA 434 receiving treatment for a small burn on his arm on 17 March 1989 and 29 March 1989.[134]

107 Apart from the inadequate furnishing in boys' rooms, and in particular the lack of storage facilities for clothes, we did not find evidence of systemic neglect in Lisnevin.

Unacceptable Practices

108 Putting boys in isolation was a regular response to disruptive and violent behaviour in Lisnevin. For minor offences boys might be confined to their bedrooms but for more serious misbehaviour they would be placed in a separation unit. Dr Lockhart recalled that on the Millisle site there were six isolation rooms located together with a small office beside them in an isolated part of the ground floor of the main building.[135]

HIA 138 described an isolation room:

> "The cell had high barred windows and there was no furniture in it. At night the staff would give me a blue mattress to sleep on but it was taken out every day."[136]

109 LN 25 told us in his statement that the separation unit was used to provide "time out" when a young person became so violently disruptive, disruptive and/or out of control as to represent a danger or disruption to staff members, fellow residents or himself. He explained that separation was used to give boys time and space to calm down.[137] However, we noted that some witnesses referred to the separation unit as the punishment block, and that term was also used in the Lisnevin policy documents.[138] We infer from this that both staff and boys in Lisnevin would have viewed confinement in the unit as a punitive measure not just as a means of enabling a boy to calm down. In this section we will use whichever term for the unit the witness used.

110 When LN 25 gave evidence in person, he told us that he could not recall senior staff approving the use of the separation unit for a boy in advance of his removal to it. The usual course of events was that a volatile incident would happen, staff on duty would decide separation was necessary,

133 Day 153, p.123.
134 LS 21290-21291.
135 LSN 1240.
136 LSN 031.
137 LSN 1224.
138 LSN 13738.

remove the boy and then report the matter to senior staff.[139] LN 25 estimated that 70% of removals would be for short periods and in the other 30% of cases boys would be separated for a morning or an afternoon, sometimes overnight and on rare occasions for up to two days.[140]

111 Dr Lockhart told us that his office on the Millisle site was near the separation unit and that he remembered boys ringing a buzzer for assistance and on some occasions having to wait considerable time before they received it. However, when LN 25 was asked about this he said that if senior staff approved the use of the separation unit they would allocate a member of staff to sit in the office in the unit to look after the young person's needs.[141] The DoJ acknowledged these different views from former staff about the operation of the separation unit, but pointed out that these staff members did not work for very long together at the Millisle site.[142]

112 Three witnesses complained about the use of the separation unit in Lisnevin. HIA 94 was resident in Lisnevin at Kiltonga and he told us that during a twenty-month stay in the school he was kept in a secure cell every night and sometimes during the day.[143] Dr Lockhart explained that because HIA 94 regularly got into fights with other boys it was decided that it was not safe for him to share a bedroom because of the danger of "significant violence", and as there were no single bedrooms for boys in Kiltonga one of the cells in the separation unit had to be used.[144] He accepted that this arrangement was not ideal but explained that to mitigate the situation somewhat HIA 94 was allowed to paint the room and personalise it and he was allowed a later bedtime.[145]

The DoJ confirmed that Lisnevin records show that HIA 94 was also put in isolation during the day in response to his behaviour, but that although there were times these confinements were for a day, they were usually for no more than a few hours at a time, with the shortest recorded confinement being for ten minutes.[146]

113 HIA 138 told us that he had frequent stays in the separation unit. When he gave evidence in person he first said he was detained for "short periods

139 Day 162, p.114.
140 Day 162, pp.115 to 116.
141 Day 162, p.113.
142 RGL 90184.
143 LSN 005.
144 Day 161, p.77.
145 Day 161, p.64.
146 RGL 90181.

of time"[147] but responding to questioning later in the hearing he said that he thought he was usually detained overnight as he could not remember being brought to the separation unit and returned to the group on the same day.[148] He confirmed that he had access to food and drink and to the toilet in the separation unit.[149]

114 The DoJ reviewed the records relating to HIA 138 and found he was removed to the separation unit on one occasion for assaulting another resident[150] and on another occasion because he had barricaded himself in his room and proceeded to destroy lighting and windows in the room.[151] A member of staff recorded on that occasion "staff reported that [HIA 138] is becoming unmanageable."[152] HIA 138 was later charged with causing criminal damage in relation to this incident.[153] The records also showed that other approaches were taken to managing HIA 138's behaviour such as confining him to his bedroom[154] and requiring him to go to bed early on three nights.[155]

115 HIA 418 said in his statement that he was placed in the punishment block ten to fifteen times in Lisnevin and that he felt "total despair and suicidal" when he was there.[156] The DoJ responded to HIA 418's evidence in its closing submission and explained that from a review of the comprehensive records available about HIA 418's time in Lisnevin it appears that although he was the subject of separation on quite a few occasions he was not placed in the punishment block. The DoJ listed five entries in the Lisnevin records of HIA 418 being separated from the group and placed in his bedroom, three entries about him being required to go to bed early, and one entry about him being removed from class. They noted one ambiguous entry which referred to HIA 418 being "removed from the group" but pointed out that did not record him being placed in the punishment block.[157]

116 HIA 418 also said that he was given very little to eat and drink when he was in a punishment cell.[158] LN 25 refuted this claim and was adamant

147 Day 156, p.23.
148 Day 156, p.34.
149 Day 156, p.35.
150 LSN 21451.
151 LSN 21460.
152 LSN 21459.
153 LSN 20782.
154 LSN 21437.
155 LSN 21446.
156 LSN 026.
157 RGL 90182.
158 LSN 026.

that the same meal routine applied to those held in separation as applied to the rest of the Lisnevin population and that occupants would be served the same quantity and quality of food as the rest of the boys. He explained that the only difference was that plastic trays and cutlery were used to prevent boys doing any harm to themselves.[159]

117 Dr Lockhart contrasted separation being used as a punishment on the Kiltonga site and as a control mechanism at Millisle. He explained that in Kiltonga separation was used as punishment, for example for absconding, and boys understood it to be a punishment and knew how long they would be separated from the group.[160] In his view, its use a control mechanism in Millisle meant that boys might be kept in isolation for longer periods and in some cases for "quite a while".[161]

118 He told us that he raised concerns with senior managers in Millisle about the over-use of separation and although they acknowledged it was an issue they did not appear to take action to address the matter.[162] It is clear from the reports of SSI inspections of Lisnevin at Millisle that inspectors shared Dr Lockhart's concerns about the use of separation.

119 In the report of the first SSI inspection of Lisnevin in 1988 inspectors raised concerns about the overuse of separation from the main group as a sanction. They pointed out that Rule 39 (d) of the Training Schools Rules provided that separation "shall only be used in exceptional circumstances" and where a separation was to be continued for more than 24 hours the written consent of a member of the Board of Management shall be obtained and the circumstances reported to the Ministry. Inspectors found that the guidelines about the application of sanctions drawn up by managers in Lisnevin to ensure that staff took a consistent approach to inappropriate behaviour had not taken account of Rule 39 (d).[163] When they examined the records held in the Special Unit they found that separation of boys for periods of more than 24 hours occurred frequently. They highlighted the example of a boy spending two periods in the punishment block, one of 82.5 hours and one of 72 hours, i.e. 154.5 hours in total, which were only separated by a 14-hour period, most of which he spent locked in his own bedroom.[164]

159 LSN 1225.
160 Day 161, p.73.
161 Day 161, p.75.
162 Day 161, p.74.
163 LSN 13738.
164 LSN 13739.

120 By the time of the next inspection in January 1992 inspectors recorded that all instances of separation had to be authorised by a senior residential social worker or the unit administrator and that the records of separation were clearly and regularly scrutinised by the deputy director. The inspectors were satisfied with the recording of the removals and satisfied that the reasons for removal were justified. They commented that they were pleased to note a reduction in the incidence of removal, particularly in the Remand Unit.

121 The monitoring of this aspect of practice continued, and inspectors made adverse comments in the report of an unannounced inspection in 1993 about the introduction of standard sanctions which allowed for automatic removal from the group for a set period of hours as a response to specific transgressions. The inspector commented that the application of such sanctions sat at the level of senior residential social worker rather than requiring consideration and signing-off by a member of the senior management team. He observed:

> "The notion that removal from the group should be the exception and even then for the shortest possible periods seems to have been replaced with removals which can in some instances be the longest allowed under the Training School Rules dating back to 1952."[165]

He acknowledged that the approach did not contravene the Training School Rules but suggested that it was a matter that should be discussed between management of Lisnevin, SSI and the NIO.[166]

122 The inspector recognised that standard sanctions as a means of control were introduced by a depleted senior management team as a means of assisting understaffed teams to manage the behaviour of a large group of delinquent youths. However, he observed:

> "…increased sanctions in the hands of unskilled staff does not seem to be the best recipe for ensuring the best possible care of young people who quite naturally do not want to be where they are and who will misbehave from time to time."[167]

123 At the time of the next regulatory inspection in January 1994 it was reported that sanctions such as removal from the group seem to be used as "the main means of controlling unacceptable behaviour".[168] The inspector expressed the view that although managers in the school had made efforts to bring about improvements in the application of sanctions, including removals, "unless the fundamental problem of staffing is tackled such efforts are likely to have limited success".[169] The inspector pointed out that the need to develop a core of permanent, experienced staff in Lisnevin had been highlighted in successive SSI reports but to date the situation remains unchanged:

165 LSN 13876.
166 LSN 13870.
167 LSN 13877.

> "Senior management and the Board are aware of the shortcomings of the present staffing situation but little action has been taken to change it."[170]

The inspector indicated that financial constraints had been advanced as the main problem which prevented the appointment of appropriate levels of trained and experienced staff.

124 We saw no response by the management of Lisnevin to these comments, but inspectors who made an unannounced inspection visit to the Special Unit in 1994 found no boys in separation and examination of the records showed that although separation had been used earlier in the day it had been for short periods. Inspectors recorded that the senior residential social worker on duty indicated that separation appeared to be less used as a sanction.[171]

125 In its closing submission to this module the DoJ accepted that what emerged from the SSI reports was that separation was not always used appropriately in Lisnevin and that inadequate staffing contributed significantly to the adoption of the tariff approach of applying standard sanctions as a means of maintaining control and order. The DoJ also accepted that the staffing issues should have been capable of resolution, but stated that at this remove it was not possible to fully explain why they were not more speedily resolved.[172]

126 We are satisfied from the evidence we have heard that in Lisnevin separation was regularly used as one of a range of responses to difficult and disruptive behaviour and that during periods of understaffing it became the main means of maintaining control, particularly in the Remand Unit.

168 LSN 13903.
169 LSN 13899.
170 LSN 13899.
171 LSN 13908.
172 RGL 90179.

The introduction of the tariff system and the associated reduction in managerial involvement and oversight of use of separation was particularly concerning. We consider it amounted to a systemic failing by the management of Lisnevin and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

127 The failure to address inadequate staffing levels, which were clearly having an impact on the daily experience and care of the boys, amounted to a systemic failing by the management of Lisnevin and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

128 SSI inspectors raised other issues about the treatment of the boys in their 1988 inspection of Lisnevin. They were concerned about the regular periods of lock-up used during the day in the Remand Unit. They recorded that the policy of lock-up developed when the Unit opened because some staff considered it necessary as a means of controlling the group of boys in the context of inadequate levels of staffing.[173] Inspectors recommended that senior managers should review the policy. They also recommended that the practice of keeping boys admitted to the Remand Unit locked up for the first 48 hours and requiring them to wear pyjamas in that period should be stopped.[174]

129 In December 1989, the then Director of the school, Mr McCloskey, wrote to the SSI to confirm what action had been taken to address the recommendations in the inspection report. He confirmed that the use of lock-up in the Remand Unit had been reduced by 50% and that the situation was being reviewed by management with a view to a further reduction.[175] He also confirmed that the boys were no longer locked up on admission to the Remand Unit except in exceptional circumstances.[176]

130 It is clear that inspection by the SSI had a significant impact on the regime in Lisnevin and led to an improved experience for the boys, particularly those in the Remand Unit. We consider that inspections of Lisnevin in the 1970s and 1980s could have enabled these and other improvements to be put in place earlier. Therefore, we consider the lack of inspection of Lisnevin from when it opened in October 1973 until the first inspection by SSI in April 1988 to be a systemic failing by the NIO to ensure that the school was providing proper care.

173 LSN 13743.
174 LSN 13767.
175 LSN 13791.
176 LSN 13792.

131 Dr Lockhart commented in his statement on the arrangements for staff leave over the summer period in Lisnevin. He told us that that each summer the teaching staff were on holiday in July and August and the bulk of care staff had some annual leave. He explained this meant that instead of a staff of eight care and teaching staff (plus a senior assistant in charge of the team) there were typically only two permanent staff on duty on each shift. The rest of the team was made up of temporary staff employed for the summer, most of whom were students on holiday from their courses and some of whom were local people. Dr Lockhart told us these staff received no induction training and he commented that this arrangement, which meant "temporary staff were expected to look after and amuse some of the most disturbed children in Northern Ireland", did not work.[177]

132 We accept that staff needed to be able to take annual leave and many will have wanted to take it during school holidays. However, we considered that approval of leave should have been managed in a manner that did not reduce the levels of permanent staff in the significant manner described by Dr Lockhart. We found it particularly concerning that this reliance on casual staff occurred during the summer months at a time when it could be anticipated that more boys might be admitted to the school and that tensions of a sectarian nature might be heightened amongst existing inmates. We consider these staffing arrangements in the summer months amounted to a systemic failing by the management in Lisnevin to ensure the school provided proper care.

Conclusions

133 We have heard evidence from nine applicants about the time they spent in Lisnevin, and while four (HIA 94, HIA 138, HIA 275 and HIA 418) were very critical about how they were treated, the other five were, in the main, positive about the time they spent in the school. We have considered contemporaneous documentation that shows the level of disturbed behaviour that some boys exhibited and it is clear that their behaviour attracted more staff attention and led to regular restraint, removal and separation.

134 After careful consideration of all the evidence we received about Lisnevin we have found systemic abuse with regard to the following aspects of the management, oversight and regulation of the school.

177 LSN 1240.

Findings

135 We found:

(1) The lack of schooling from September 1981 to May 1982 amounted to a systemic failing by the Lisnevin Management Board, the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

(2) We consider the failure of the director to refer allegations of the assault of a boy by staff to the RUC was indicative of a systemic failing to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

(3) The delay in providing adequate training for staff in control and restraint methods amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

(4) Accommodating boys in bedrooms with limited furnishing and making them store their clothes in the corridor outside their bedroom amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

(5) The use of a tariff system of standard sanctions, and the associated reduction in managerial involvement and oversight of use of separation, amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

(6) The failure to address inadequate staffing levels which were clearly having an impact on the daily experience and care of the boys amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

(7) The lack of inspection of Lisnevin from when it opened in October 1973 until the first inspection by the SSI in April 1988 to be a systemic failing by the NIO to ensure that the school was providing proper care.

(8) The leave arrangements during the summer months, which led to a dependence on casual staff, amounted to a systemic failing by senior managers to ensure the school provided proper care.

Chapter 16:

Module 7 – Hydebank Young Offenders Centre

Introduction

1 During Module 7 we heard evidence from four witnesses who were admitted to Hydebank Wood Young Offenders Centre (Hydebank) during the period 1983 to 1990. HIA 275 referred to his time in Hydebank in his statement but we left his evidence out of account as he failed to appear to give evidence in person or to provide a reason for not doing so.

2 We also heard from Maxwell Murray who commenced work as the deputy governor of Hydebank on October 1984 and remained there until April 1987. He acted as governor of the facility for most of the last two years he worked there. Mr Murray provided a very full and helpful statement to the Inquiry and appended exhibits of relevant documentation, for example guidance provided to officers about what type of clothing inmates should be allowed to wear,[1] and how they should report incidents and occurrences.[2] His statement and exhibits amounted to 1,202 pages. We are grateful for the detailed background information Mr Murray provided about how Hydebank operated in the period he worked there and for his responses to the evidence witnesses gave about their time in Hydebank. We also received a helpful statement and exhibits about the use of control and restraint techniques in Hydebank from Mr David Dowds of the Northern Ireland Prison Service.

3 We were assisted by a joint statement for this module provided by the Department of Justice (DoJ) and the Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and a closing submission provided by the DoJ. We considered response statements to the evidence of witnesses from the DoJ, the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and from a former prison officer HB 4 who responded to specific allegations made against him.

Establishment of Hydebank

4 Hydebank opened in June 1979 on the outskirts of Belfast, some four miles from the city centre.[3] Hydebank was established and operated under the provisions of the Treatment of Offenders Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 (the Act). The purpose of Young Offenders Centres was to enable the removal of young offenders, other than those sentenced for the most serious offences, from the adult prison environment. The Act provided for male offenders between the ages of sixteen and 21 years who had been sentenced to a custodial sentence of less than three years to be detained in a Youth Offenders Centre.

1 HYD 1469.
2 HYD 1311.
3 HYD 471.

5 The DoJ and the DHSSPS explained in their joint statement for this module that Hydebank was a Category C prison, which meant it was a low security closed prison for people who could not be trusted in an open prison but were considered unlikely to make a determined escape attempt.[4]

6 The Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 also applied to the operation of Hydebank. Section 72 (3) of that Act provided that a boy under seventeen years of age could not be sentenced to a Young Offenders Centre unless a court certified him to be so unruly or depraved that no other method of dealing with him was appropriate.[5] The DoJ and the DHSSPS confirmed that on occasion fifteen-year-old boys who had been convicted of certain offences, including terrorist-related offences, or whose behaviour could not be managed within the open training school system, were sent to Hydebank.[6]

7 At the start of the 1980s the Juvenile Remand Unit, which was previously located in D Wing Annex of Belfast Prison, was transferred to Hydebank. The Juvenile Remand Unit was for fourteen to seventeen-year-olds whose containment in a training school was deemed inappropriate because the court had certified them as unruly or depraved under Section 51 (1) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968.[7]

8 Hydebank operated in accordance with the Young Offender Centre Rules (Northern Ireland) 1979 which were superseded by the Young Offender Centre Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982.[8] These Rules set out in detail how Young Offenders Centres should operate, including the accommodation that should be provided, how the reception, transfer and discharge of inmates should be handled, and how discipline and control should be applied. Hydebank was managed by a governor, and staffed by prison officers.

4 RGL 1336.
5 HYD 520.
6 RGL 1337.
7 HYD 520.
8 HYD 521-548.

Accommodation

9 Hydebank could accommodate 297 inmates, both sentenced and remand. There were in the region of 14,000 receptions to Hydebank between 1979 and 1995; this figure includes multiple entries of boys who were committed to Hydebank on more than one occasion.[9]

10 The residential accommodation was split across five houses called Elm, Willow, Ash, Beech and Cedar, each of which contained approximately 60 inmates. The Juvenile Remand Unit was located on a third floor landing in Elm House and could accommodate up to twenty boys. It was completely self-contained with its own enclosed exercise yard, so that the boys held on remand did not come into contact with sentenced prisoners.

11 The report of the inspection of Hydebank in December 1983 by HM Chief Inspector of prisons stated that as a Youth Offender Centre, Hydebank was expected to provide, "a brisk regime" with particular emphasis on education and training, both physical and vocational.[10] Therefore, in addition to the residential units, there was a large workshop area for delivery of vocational training courses including joinery, bricklaying, motor mechanics and painting and decorating. A separate education centre provided courses from basic literacy and numeracy up to subjects at Ordinary Level standard. There were also two all-weather and two grass football pitches and a gymnasium with a weight-lifting area attached.[11]

Regime

12 Mr Murray explained that on initial admission to Hydebank, boys would complete a period of induction which was primarily aimed at acclimatising them to their new environment in custody. The procedures included familiarising boys with the daily routine and what was expected of them, and the need to obey rules and conform to routines and procedures was emphasised. After the period of induction, boys would be allocated to one of the other houses on the basis of their attitude, behaviour and length of sentence.[12]

9 HYD 471.
10 HYD 520.
11 HYD 471.
12 HYD 473.

13 During the induction period each boy would have interviews with the governor or his deputy, probation officers, chaplains, staff responsible for education, vocational training and physical education staff. Staff would then compile reports on each boy for consideration at a meeting of the Labour Allocation Board which allocated boys to activities on the basis of their assessed need and time to serve. The Labour Allocation Board was chaired by the deputy governor and attended by heads of departments, including education, vocational training, probation and security.[13]

14 Mr Murray described the daily regime in Hydebank, which commenced at 8.00am when inmates' rooms were unlocked. Inmates were then required to clean their rooms, make their beds and have breakfast. Mr Murray explained that inmates were required to keep their rooms and communal areas clean, make their beds to set standards and maintain their personal hygiene as a means of instilling discipline.[14]

15 Inmates had to be ready to attend work at 9.00am. Work included cleaning duties and participation in working parties as gardeners and labourers.[15] During the morning work period a 15 minute tea break would be provided, and all inmates returned to the residential units at 12.15pm for lunch and lock-up. The inmates were unlocked at 2.00pm and remained at educational and sporting activities until 4.00pm before they returned to the residential units for lock-up at 4.45pm. Evening association was provided with unlock at 5.30pm and inmates enjoyed free association and attended evening education or the gymnasium. Lock-up at night varied across the Centre depending on the agreed regime for the house, but the latest lock-up was around 8.30pm, other than for those with Special Privileges who were allowed a later lock-up.[16]

Discipline and Control

16 The major emphasis in Hydebank was on maintaining security and control and instilling discipline. A staged system of progress towards release was operated by means of movement through the houses to the final stage, which was a pre-release unit for those nearing the end of their sentence.[17] The progression was from the reception/committal unit to

13 HYD 473.
14 HYD 473.
15 HYD 474.
16 HYD 475.
17 HYD 520.

Elm, then onwards to Willow, Cedar, Beech and finally Ash. Each house had a progressively more relaxed regime and privileges such as longer association times. The high point in the progression was 'red band' (trusted orderly) status.[18]

17 Inmates could earn special privileges that allowed them to work out in the community and have free movement across the Hydebank site. They could also earn additional privileges such as reduced supervision, more freedom of association, increased access to the gymnasium and attendance at outside events, depending on security clearance and time remaining in custody.[19]

18 Hydebank was subject to the Young Offender Centre Rules (Northern Ireland) 1979 (YOC Rules). Rule 30 of these Rules (revised as Rule 32 of the YOC Rules (Northern Ireland) 1982) detailed 21 offences an inmate could be charged with if he, for example:

- disobeyed any lawful order or neglected to conform to the rules;
- treated with disrespect any officer or any person visiting the Centre;
- was idle, careless or negligent at work or refused to work;
- used any abusive, insolent, threatening, or other improper language;
- was indecent in language, act or gesture;
- committed any assault.

19 Charges against inmates were heard before the governor. When he decided an inmate was guilty of an offence he could award a range of penalties including:

- a caution;
- loss of remission for a period not exceeding fourteen days;
- loss or postponement of payment for work; and
- confinement to room for a period not exceeding three days.

20 In instances of more serious offences the governor could refer the case to the visiting committee or the Secretary of State on the grounds that the awards available to him were insufficient given the gravity of the offence.[20]

21 The visiting committee was an independent body of people appointed by the Secretary of State to ensure that inmates were being treated in accordance with the YOC Rules. It was given authority to enter a Young Offenders Centre with the object of ensuring it was properly run. Members of the Visiting Committee had free access to any part of Hydebank and could speak to any inmate or officer. Inmates had the right of access to members of the Visiting Committee about any matters. The committee met monthly and carried out visits to parts of the centre on the day of its meetings. Members of the committee also made visits between monthly meetings which meant that Hydebank was visited by a member of the Visiting Committee at least once every fortnight.[21]

18 HYD 513.
19 HYD 475.
20 HYD 476-477.

22 Mr Murray explained that referrals to the Secretary of State or the Visiting Committee were restricted to cases of violence or serious and repeated offences against discipline which the governor considered required a more severe punishment that he could award. In instances where a case was referred and accepted for hearing by the Secretary of State, or more usually the Visiting Committee, the awards were significantly greater and included:

- loss of remission for a period not exceeding four months;
- loss or postponement of payment in whole or in part for work for a period not exceeding 28 days; and,
- confinement to room for a period not exceeding fourteen days.

If an inmate was found guilty of mutiny or incitement to mutiny or of gross personal violence to an officer, confinement to room could be extended to a period not exceeding 28 days.[22]

23 As well as these formal hearing processes the governor could take more immediate action when he deemed it necessary, including temporarily confining an inmate to a protective room approved for the purpose by the Secretary of State. However, the YOC Rules specified that an inmate should not be confined to such a room as a punishment, and in instances when temporary confinement was used the medical officer had to be informed. The governor could also approve the use of restraints, but with the proviso that they should not be used for longer than necessary, and in no case for longer than twenty-four hours without the written permission of a member of the Visiting Committee.

24 The governor could also award immediate removal from association for 24 hours, after which time he had to seek authority of a member of the

21 HYD 487.
22 HYD 477/8.

Visiting Committee or Secretary of State. As part of this process the inmate would be interviewed, and the governor would have to provide evidence about why removal from association was necessary. If the removal was approved it would be for a period not exceeding fourteen days, and any extension would have to be renewed fortnightly thereafter by the Visiting Committee.[23]

25 Although there was a range of sanctions that could be applied to the inmates in Hydebank, we consider that the application of the YOC Rules for their use and the role and remit of the visiting committee provided important safeguards for the welfare of the young people in the Centre.

Governance

26 The Governor of Hydebank reported to the Director of Prison Operations in the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) and Mr Murray explained he had regular contact with the director during his time, who was Roger Kendrick. Mr Murray explained that Mr Kendrick made frequent visits to Hydebank, and carried out rounds of the establishment to satisfy himself that everything was in order.[24] He also explained that staff working in the NIO treatment of offenders branch were also frequent visitors to Hydebank and would have attended a number of routine meetings, such as the board which allocated work to inmates. We noted that an official from the NIO chaired the meetings that determined whether a boy should be trusted with orderly status.[25]

27 In addition, as part of the arrangement whereby HM Chief Inspector of Prisons for England and Wales (HMCIP) inspected one prison in Northern Ireland each year, Hydebank was inspected by HMCIP in June 1982 and October/November 1994. In the report of the 1982 inspection[26] inspectors made adverse comments about the management structure, the dissemination of instructions and information to staff, staff working excessive overtime and lack of staff training, and, in particular, lack of induction training. The inspectors also made recommendations about necessary improvements to health and safety matters such as the frequency of fire drills. However, their conclusions about the treatment and conditions of the boys were positive, and included:

23 HYD 478/9.
24 HYD 484.
25 HYD 513.
26 HYD 503-520.

> "The staff were concerned and caring, taking an interest in the well-being of the inmates from reception to discharge. Inmates' material needs were well provided for, and the arrangements for visits, the provision of food and medical care were of the highest order."[27]

28 In relation to the physical education provided, the inspectors commented:

> "We were most impressed by the quality of work, the enthusiasm of staff, the excellent provision of facilities and the attention given to the individual needs of inmates and their personal safety".[28]

29 We noted that the inspectors recommended that the NIO should define the term "special cell" and give guidance in its use in contrast to the use of punishment cells and introduce a system for documenting and monitoring the use of mechanical restraints.[29]

30 In the next inspection of Hydebank by HMCIP in 1994 the inspectors recorded that Control and Restraint techniques were used sparingly, staff had been trained to operate as part of a three-person team in order to restrain an inmate, and documentation was completed after every incident involving the use of Control and Restraint.[30]

31 The inspectors were impressed by the quality of care provided in Hydebank. They commented:

> "Although staffing levels were high the quality of supervision and standard of work achieved by most officers justified these levels. Landing officers (known as class officers) had excellent relationships with inmates whom they clearly knew well. The safety of inmates was protected by the alertness of staff."[31]

32 They reported that they found a general absence of bullying and recorded that inmates had told them they felt safe.[32] They were concerned to find that house staff were able to award their own unofficial sanctions for small infringements, and recommended that sanctions should only be awarded after an accusation had been properly investigated by a senior member of staff.[33]

---

27 HYD 509.
28 HYD 513.
29 HYD 511.
30 HYD 1619.
31 HYD 1610.
32 HYD 1612.
33 HYD 1617.

33 Inspectors found that there had been 256 adjudications carried out by the deputy governor in the first ten months of 1994. When guilt was proven, sanctions were severe, but in the cases they examined the sentences appeared appropriate to the offence.[34]

34 We particularly noted the concern recorded by the inspectors that seven juveniles (five fifteen-year-olds and two sixteen-year-olds) had been sent to Hydebank for five week assessment periods as a result of unruly behaviour.[35] The inspectors commented that they found no evidence that these boys were undergoing assessment. They were particularly concerned that the two sixteen-year-olds had neither been charged before a court, nor convicted of a criminal offence and were clear in their view that they should not have been held in a penal institution.[36] Consequently the Chief Inspector recommended to the Secretary of State that Schedule 5, 10(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968, should be reconsidered so as to avoid imprisoning juveniles who had not been charged with a criminal offence. [37]The DoJ confirmed that this recommendation was addressed through a programme focused upon reviewing and modernising children's services across various aspects of the juvenile justice system that the NIO was already engaged in at the time it received the Chief Inspector's recommendation.[38]

35 Mr Murray told us that members of the International Committee of the Red Cross also visited Hydebank and reported the conditions they found to HM Government.[39]

36 Any complaints or criticisms made by inmates to the members of the Visiting Committee were reported to the governor. More serious complaints could be reported to the NIO. The Visiting Committee submitted an annual report to the Secretary of State detailing their visits to the Centre and any matters arising. We found that the policy and framework for dealing with complaints in Millisle were undermined by the way they were implemented in practice. We did not hear evidence about similar problems in relation to the handling of complaints in Hydebank.

34 HYD 1617.
35 HYD 1650.
36 HYD 1651.
37 HYD 1653.
38 HYD 3123.
39 HYD 487.

37 Each year the governor had to provide an annual report to the Secretary of State which covered the inmate population, the behaviour of inmates, security and staffing issues. The annual report included a number of appendices including a report from the chairman of the visiting committee about the committee's work and its conclusions and recommendations for the year. In the annual report for 1984 the chairman of the visiting committee commented:

> "The past year has seen the YOC maintaining its image of a progressive and rehabilitative establishment."[40]

Evidence from Witnesses about Hydebank

38 We received evidence from four witnesses about their stays in Hydebank, which occurred between 1983 and 1990. Mr Murray told us he did not know any of these witnesses, and that given the dates they were in Hydebank he does not believe any of them were present when he worked in the centre. The information provided by the DoJ shows that HIA 253 was remanded to Hydebank on 16 May 1984 and received a 12 month sentence to Hydebank on 24 July 1984.[41] He was discharged from Hydebank in January 1985.[42] Mr Murray commenced work in Hydebank on 29 October 1984 so there was a brief period of approximately two to three months when Mr Murray was working in Hydebank and HIA 253 was an inmate there. We accept that Mr Murray does not remember HIA 253 given the briefness of the overlap and that it occurred when Mr Murray had just commenced his employment in Hydebank.

39 Mr Murray provided helpful general responses to the allegations of witnesses on the basis of his experience of working in Hydebank and his knowledge of some of the staff that are referred to in the statements of witnesses.

Physical Punishment

40 HIA 373 had four stays in Hydebank but only the first of these, which was for two weeks from 28 October 1983 to 11 November 1983, and the second, which was for six weeks between 11 January 1984 and 24 February 1984, are within our Terms of Reference, as HIA 373 was over 18 when he spent his final two periods in Hydebank.

40 HYD 11931.
41 HYD 048.
42 HYD 027.

41 HIA 373 told us that a member of staff HB 4 who worked in reception and another staff member slapped him for not addressing them as "Sir".[43] HB 4 proved a statement to the Inquiry in which he stated that he had no recollection of HIA 373 and denied slapping him or any boy. He stated:

> "I had an authoritative voice and I would have shouted if necessary to keep order, but I never needed to slap anyone."[44]

Mr Murray who worked with HB 4 commented that HIA 373's allegations about HB 4 were at odds with his knowledge of the officer whom he found to be "a professional, committed, dedicated officer".[45]

42 HIA 373 told us that when he refused to co-operate with the reception process at the start of his second stay in Hydebank he was stripped of his clothes, and when he tried to hold on to his underpants a female RUC officer who had escorted him to Hydebank insisted they were removed and kicked him in the stomach.[46] He also described being slapped around the face daily by HB 5, who was in charge of Willow House, for such things as not cleaning his room properly.[47] He told us that he observed other inmates being physically abused by officers and receiving no medical treatment for injuries they sustained. He described inmates barricading themselves in their cells and being beaten by officers for doing so. He said that following one such incident he saw a boy being dragged down three flights of stone steps, his head hit off each of the steps, and he heard later that the boy was so badly bruised that he was kept hidden in the punishment unit until his injuries healed.[48]

43 Mr Murray said he had no knowledge of officers routinely slapping inmates and that any officer found assaulting or misusing force against an inmate would be subject to disciplinary processes and could lose his job as a result.[49] He stated that he had no recollection of routine serious incidents or cell barricades, and pointed out that that it would have been impossible for an inmate to be kept hidden in the punishment unit, as it was clearly visible to managers in Hydebank and members of the Visiting Committee had regular access to it.[50] When Mr Murray gave evidence in person he

43 HYD 009.
44 HIA 2870.
45 HYD 490.
46 HYD 012.
47 HYD 009.
48 HYD 011.
49 HYD 491.
50 HYD 492.

emphasised that members of the Visiting Committee were not accompanied by staff during their visits and that they valued the independent nature of their role. He explained that as the deputy governor and then governor of Hydebank he had to attend meetings with the Visiting Committee to address any matters of concern or issues arising from their visits.[51]

44 When HIA 253 was admitted to Hydebank, he saw it as being given "short sharp shock treatment",[52] to ensure he followed the rules. He told us that officers knew what pressure points to use to control the behaviour of inmates, and said that when they touched pressure points on his shoulders he fell to his knees.[53] When he gave evidence in person he posed the question about whether there was Government approval for the use of such techniques.[54] Mr Murray said in response that he had no knowledge of staff bringing boys to their knees by pressing pressure points. He explained that up until the mid-1980s officers received use of force training based on judo techniques, which included using arm holds to take a prisoner who was being violent to the ground, but that from the mid-1980s onwards training on Control and Restraint techniques was introduced. He explained that these techniques placed an emphasis on de-escalation and the use of minimum force if other measures to get a situation under control had not proved successful.[55]

45 David Dowds submitted a statement on behalf of the Northern Ireland Prison Service about the use of Control and Restraint techniques in Hydebank. He provided contemporaneous documentation to show that the policy was that force should only be used when necessary and no more force than is necessary should be used. He referred to guidelines issued in August 1988 about the use of force in the prison service. This pointed out to officers that the use of force when it was not necessary, or the use of more force than was necessary to achieve the objective, was both a criminal offence and a civil wrong.[56] He also provided exhibits showing how the policy was disseminated to staff, how training was provided to staff and recorded, and how the use of restraint was monitored by the prison service.

51 Day 159, p.155.
52 HYD 027.
53 HYD 027.
54 Day 142, p.27.
55 HYD 480.
56 HYD 1676.

46 Mr Murray accepted that he did receive and deal with complaints about officers physically abusing inmates. He explained that such complaints were formally investigated with, where necessary, the involvement of the RUC. He provided an example where he continued an investigation into alleged mistreatment despite the fact that the inmate in question withdrew his complaint.[57] He also indicated when he gave evidence in person that the young people who were inmates in Hydebank would not have tolerated the type of systemic physical abuse described by some witnesses, and that it would have led to major riots.[58]

47 We accept that some officers in Hydebank may have taken an overly physical approach to establishing their authority and maintaining discipline, and would have dealt swiftly and robustly with any behaviour they viewed as insubordination. However, we consider that the approach of senior managers as described by Mr Murray and the active oversight of the Visiting Committee would have provided some protection from such behaviour. We have given careful consideration to the allegations we received about physical abuse in Hydebank but we do not find that they were sufficient to amount to evidence of systemic physical abuse of inmates.

Sexual Abuse

48 We received only one allegation of sexual abuse in Hydebank. HIA 373 told us that he was not sexually abused in Hydebank and did not observe such abuse.[59] However, he told us that he knew of boys who had been sexually abused in the centre including a friend of his HB 9, who had told him that he had been sexually abused by a senior prison officer, HB 10. HIA 373 indicated that HB 10 was connected to a paedophile network based in Coleraine and that HB 9 was abused by members of that ring following his release from Hydebank and that this combined abuse was the reason HB 9 took his own life four or five years ago.[60]

49 Mr Murray said he remembered an officer called HB 10 but did not recall any complaints against him. He told us that he received no allegations of sexual assaults while he was in Hydebank and confirmed that if he had he would have reported them to the police.[61]

57 HYD 496/7.
58 Day 159, p.136.
59 HYD 014.
60 HYD 013.
61 HYD 493.

50 Given this is the only allegation of sexual abuse we received and it is not an account from a witness that personally suffered abuse, we do not find evidence of systemic sexual abuse in Hydebank.

Emotional Abuse

51 When HIA 253 gave evidence in person he recounted an incident when prison officers suspected he had been masturbating in his cell during a lock-up period and gave him a "couple of slaps" for doing so. He described how when the doors were unlocked one of the officers grabbed him by the ear and marched him up and down the corridor in front of other inmates and made him tell them that he had been masturbating. He indicated that it was being paraded in front of other inmates that he found particularly humiliating.

52 While we recognise how distressing such treatment would have been to HIA 253 we do not consider that this single incident amounts to systemic abuse.

Unacceptable Practices

Excessive Chores

53 HIA 373 said that the regime in Hydebank was "designed to break your spirit". He described how if his room were not cleaned or his bed not made to the required standard they would be wrecked by officers and he would have to start again.[62] HIA 253 also described beds being wrecked by officers if they were not made properly[63] and recalled being made to clean the floor of his cell with a tooth brush.[64]

54 In contrast, although HIA 138, who was in Hydebank in 1990, described the regime as akin to a boot camp, he said staff treated everyone the same and that he did not receive any physical punishment.[65]

55 Mr Murray confirmed that cell inspections were routine but said he never witnessed cells being wrecked.[66] He also confirmed that inmates on committal were expected to carry out menial tasks, which included a lot of cleaning, but said this was to establish a routine and encourage a work ethic.[67] While he accepted that the committal regime required inmates

62 HYD 010.
63 Day 142, p.28.
64 HYD 027.
65 HYD 021.
66 HYD 491.
67 HYD 491.

to conform,[68] and that there was a strong emphasis on discipline and control,[69] he did not accept that the regime was designed to break the spirit of any inmate. [70]

56 It is clear that the committal regime was designed to ensure compliance and conformity. There can be a narrow dividing line between insistence on routines and the achievement of exacting standards and excessive chores and a requirement for perfection that amounts to abuse. We consider that officers may have crossed that line on occasion in Hydebank but the evidence we have heard about isolated incidents is not sufficient to amount to a finding of systemic abuse.

Sectarianism

57 HIA 373 said that prison officers singled out boys from a Catholic or nationalist background, gave them a particularly hard time, and were open about their admiration for, and loyalty to, loyalist paramilitaries.[71] He also recalled an officer with the nick name "Paddywhack" boasting that he was a former member of the Parachute Regiment and was on duty on Bloody Sunday. Mr Murray stated that he had no memory of an officer with the nick name "Paddywhack",[72] and confirmed that when he was in Hydebank he received no reports of sectarian behaviour between inmates or between inmates and staff.[73]

58 We have carefully considered the evidence we received about unacceptable practices, and while we accept that witnesses were unhappy about the practices they described we do not consider that their accounts amount to evidence of systemic abuse.

Neglect

Food

59 HIA 434 told us that the food was insufficient and of poor quality[74] and HIA 373 said that it was not particularly nutritious.[75] DoJ pointed to the

68 HYD 491.
69 HYD 474.
70 HYD 491.
71 HYD 013.
72 HYD 494.
73 HYD 493
74 HYD 034.
75 Day 156, p.56.

assessment of HM Inspectors of Prisons as recorded in the report of their 1982 inspection of Hydebank that the catering was good, with varied menus, and was consistently well-prepared and wholesome food.[76]

60 Mr Murray said in his statement that the Northern Ireland Prison Service was very aware of the need to ensure that inmates had sufficient to eat. He explained this further when he gave evidence in person by telling us:

> "There are two things prisoners value. One is his visits – the other is his food. Mess around with any of those and you're going to have problems."[77]

Medical Care

61 HIA 373 said he was not allowed privacy when seeing the doctor, that officers who attended with him made comments and humiliated him, and neither the doctor nor the nurse intervened to stop them.[78] Mr Murray stated that officers would not have been routinely present during medical examinations, and would only have been in attendance if there were concerns about a boy's behaviour.[79]

62 HIA 434 recalled being made to shave every day and his skin became very sore as he was not yet ready to shave. He explained that this practice only stopped when he saw the doctor in Hydebank, who gave him cream for his skin and said he should only be required to shave every second day. HIA 434 said that he continued to get cuts and sores from shaving even when it was limited to every second day.[80] Mr Murray stated that boys normally shaved prior to unlock, and that it would be unlikely that staff would have known whether an inmate had shaved or not if they had no need to shave.[81] The DoJ commented that this incident as described by HIA 434 shows that the regime in Hydebank was sufficiently flexible to take into account medical conditions.[82]

Clothing

63 HIA 373 described being embarrassed about being made to wear standard issue clothes when he was admitted to Hydebank[83] and HIA 253 also

76 HYD 510.
77 Day 159, p.129.
78 HYD 012.
79 HYD 492.
80 HYD 034.
81 HYD 495.
82 RGL 90194.
83 HYD 09.

described having to wear such clothes and said that they were used to make new inmates stand out and embarrass them.[84] The DoJ pointed out in its closing submission to this module that in 1982, prior to HIA 373's and HIA 253's committal to Hydebank, the agreed policy was:

> "all prisoners will be permitted to wear their own clothing at all times... Prisoners who are either unwilling or unable to provide clothing for their own use will be provided with official - issue clothing."[85]

The DoJ also pointed out that the report of the HMCIP inspection of Hydebank in June 1982 recorded that clothing issued to inmates was "sweaters and jeans, which were popular, serviceable and well cared for."[86]

Education

64 HIA 373 complained about the lack of educational support he received in Hydebank and that in particular there was no focus on rehabilitation or preparing young men for a life without re-offending. He was scathing about the quality of the social skills training he received, including the advice given about the transmission of AIDS. HIA 253 said that he attended a mechanics class in Hydebank, and although he learnt some aspects he did not receive a full training in the basics of mechanics. He indicated that the officer in charge of the class got him and other inmates to help make canoes, which he then sold, rather than teaching them about mechanics.

65 These accounts are at odds with HMCIP inspectors' assessment of the education facilities in Hydebank. They found teaching was geared to meet the individual needs of inmates and took account of the fact that some inmates were not ready for vocational training or their sentences were too short for them to complete assessed training. They were particularly impressed with the social skills course, and commented that the pre-release course and the alcohol awareness courses, which were voluntary, were oversubscribed. Inspectors went as far as to suggest that the approach to social skills training in Hydebank could be advantageous for young offender centres in England and Wales.[87] When he gave evidence in person, Mr Murray also referred to the effectiveness of the social skills training and the education provision in general provided in Hydebank.

84 Day 142, p.30.
85 HYD 1465.
86 HYD 11201.
87 HYD 13704.

66 While we recognise and accept that witnesses were unhappy about aspects of the care they received in these areas we do not consider that their complaints amount to evidence of systemic neglect.

Conclusions

67 We accept that on admission to Hydebank boys experienced a strict regime, and that the repetitive cleaning tasks and requirement to maintain their cells to a strict high standard were aimed at ensuring inmates conformed to the discipline of Hydebank and the authority of officers. We also think it is probable that some officers took the approach of intimidating boys at the committal stage in order to enforce obedience and discourage any resistance to the regime.

68 However, we recognise that Hydebank was a prison and was dealing with some boys who had been found unmanageable in open training schools, and a firm approach was necessary in order to maintain discipline. Despite that imperative, the evidence of Mr Murray and that provided through inspection reports and reports of the visiting committee indicate that a progressive regime was operated that allowed boys to gain privileges and to move purposefully towards release. That evidence also indicates that there was a range of educational, vocational and training activities available to the inmates.

69 We accept that the witnesses we heard from had negative experiences in Hydebank and do not consider their time there in a positive light. However, having carefully considered the evidence provided to us, we have decided that the complaints we received do not amount to evidence of systemic abuse in Hydebank.

Chapter 17:

Module 10 – Millisle Borstal

Introduction

1 Woburn House, as it was officially known, was a borstal for males aged sixteen to twenty-one from 1956 to 1980, but it was usually known as Millisle Borstal. It was designed to provide training for work, education and leisure activities for young offenders who were unsuited to training schools and who would otherwise have been sent to prison.

2 The Inquiry addressed the allegations of ten applicants in Module 10, which commenced with an introduction by Junior Counsel on 18 January 2016. Seven applicants were heard in person and two statements were read out on the grounds of the ill-health of the applicants, HIA 262 and HIA 320. The statement of one further witness, HIA 294, was based on the account he gave to the Acknowledgement Forum, as he had hoped to give evidence in person but was sadly deceased before he was able to prepare a witness statement. Evidence was heard from three former officers and one former governor (Duncan McLaughlan), as well as Stephen Davis on behalf of the Department of Justice. Evidence for the Module was completed on 26 January 2016.

3 We wish to express our appreciation for the help provided by the witnesses concerning their experiences as trainees at Millisle, nearly all of whom had already given evidence in relation to other residential institutions. We are aware that recalling such memories can be a painful process. We are grateful to all those in the Department of Justice who identified relevant records and contributed to the statements for the Inquiry presented by Stephen Davis, the Director of Operations for the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS). We are indebted to the officers who were employed at Millisle for providing first-hand recollections, and in particular to Duncan McLaughlan who was Governor during the period covered by most of the allegations.

4 Nearly all the evidence was provided by the Department of Justice, but some records, such as Prison Service personnel details, were not available, presumably as a result of destruction of files considered to be no longer required. In particular, there was a review of records at Millisle in May 1977 at which it was noted that there were 'dead' files for over a thousand trainees and these were presumably destroyed.[1] There are therefore some gaps in our knowledge. Unlike other institutions investigated by the Inquiry there were no social services files concerning the trainees during their time in Millisle as there were no social workers actively involved with them then. There was also very little police documentation, as (with one exception) the witnesses had not complained to the police and their allegations had not been investigated previously.[2]

1 MIL 141, 143.

The Premises

5 Woburn House was a stately home on the outskirts of the village of Millisle, three miles south of Donaghadee in the Ards peninsula in County Down, with views across the North Channel. The property was separated from the sea only by the main road, the A2. The house was rebuilt by George Dunbar MP as an Italianate mansion in the 1860s, and it was acquired by the state in lieu of death duties in 1952.[3] The Ministry of Home Affairs decided to use the premises as a borstal because the buildings were sufficient to house the trainees and there were 56 acres of grounds, largely woodland but with space for sports facilities and further developments.[4] Although not very far from Belfast if one had a vehicle, it was difficult to reach for those who were reliant on public transport, and this reduced visiting by trainees' families.[5]

6 The main house had a grand facade, painted white, facing the road and the sea. The ground floor was used for reception, administrative offices, a small rest room for staff to have snacks, two common rooms for the trainees, the dining room, the kitchen and the laundry. The first floor housed the dormitories, mostly for four or five boys in each room, and a medical room was sited between two of the dormitories.[6] The seamstress's room was in the attic, which was mainly disused.[7]

7 Behind the main building there was a variety of outbuildings which housed the workshops and cells used to isolate trainees at times of crisis, though their use was discontinued when Duncan McLaughlan took over as Governor in 1975. There was also a room which was available for 'special grade' trainees to use, where they had a greater degree of freedom.[8] Beyond these buildings there was a walled garden and greenhouses used for horticultural training.

2 MIL 106-107.
3 MIL 109.
4 For a plan of the site, see MIL 28129.
5 Day 180, p.32.
6 Day 182, p.23.
7 Day 182, p.26.
8 Day 182, pp.44.

8 To the right of the main building, when viewed from the main road, there was a substantial building housing the gymnasium, classrooms and more workshops. To the extreme right there was the Governor's house. The ground rose landwards throughout the site, which was encompassed by a wood that was termed 'the forest'. The main house and buildings described above were used for the open borstal. There was no fencing and the front door was managed by a 'special grade' trainee who held the key.[9] [10]

9 To the left of the main house, adjacent to the main road, there were 26 units of staff housing, mainly in the form of semi-detached houses. Behind them was the closed borstal, which was on the site of a farm acquired in 1970 and demolished to make way for the new development. The closed borstal was opened in 1977 and was a separate purpose-built unit, also within sight of the sea, although further inland. It was surrounded by a security fence and admission was regulated. It was self-contained and had all the facilities required for a closed section except that the laundry, the kitchen and some other services sited in the main building provided for both the open and the closed units.[11]

10 The closed borstal at Millisle was a two-storey building with a central section and two wings leading from it. In the centre there were administration offices, a visiting area, interview rooms, a recreational room, medical unit, reception unit, punishment cells, games hall, library, TV rooms, billiards room, quiet room and two workshops.[12] In the wings there was sleeping accommodation made up of 33 single rooms, twelve twin rooms and two dormitories, each with nine beds; in total this amounted to 75 places, but with the use of bunk beds this could be exceeded.[13] The ground floor was used for the allocation and assessment unit and for the segregation unit. Upstairs, one wing was used for trainees who had been assessed and were awaiting a move to the open section. The other wing was for trainees for whom an open unit placement was deemed unsuitable. The buildings were surrounded by a 17' high weldmesh fence.[14] There was also a small church for the use of all denominations within the fence so that there was no need for trainees from the closed unit to leave the site for religious observance.[15]

9 MIL 710.
10 Day 182, pp.34.
11 Day 182, p.19.
12 MIL 165-166, 173-174.
13 MIL 164, 172.
14 MIL 165.
15 MIL 171.

The Borstal System

11 The roots of this type of provision go back to 1895 when the Westminster Departmental Committee on Prisons, known as the Gladstone Committee after its chairman, Herbert Gladstone, recommended the creation of a type of special institution for young offenders which would be:

> "a half way house between the prison and the reformatory. It should be situated in the country with ample space for agricultural and land reclamation work. It would have penal and coercive sides which could be applied according to the merits of the particular cases. But it should be amply provided with a staff capable of giving sound education, training the inmates in various kinds of industrial work, and qualified generally to exercise the best and healthiest kind of moral influence."[16]

12 The original model for this type of institution was established in 1902 in the village of Borstal in Kent, England, and it was also piloted in Ireland in 1906. Authorisation for a system of borstals was provided by the Prevention of Crime Act 1908, which applied to the whole of Great Britain and Ireland.[17]

13 When partition took place in 1921 there was no borstal in Northern Ireland, and a third of the trainees in Clonmel Borstal were from Belfast. For the first few years boys requiring borstal training were first placed at Feltham Borstal near London and then, as the distance was found to render Feltham unsuitable, at Greenock in Scotland. A total of more than 60 boys were sent to England and Scotland in this way.[18]

14 However, the new Government of Northern Ireland addressed the problem speedily. A report was prepared in 1923 by the Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Northern Ireland, known as the Moles Committee, and it addressed the question of borstals.[19] The Committee concluded that a male borstal should be set up in Northern Ireland, but that the number of females requiring that type of provision was insufficient to warrant the establishment of a borstal for them.

16 Quoted in Niall Osborough Borstal in Ireland: Custodial provision for the young adult offender 1906-1974 (1975), p.3.
17 MIL 10013-10026.
18 MIL 108.
19 Report of the Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Northern Ireland (1923) HMSO pp. 22-27: (MIL 10159-10164).

15 The outcome was the passing of the Malone Training School Act (Northern Ireland) 1926. Malone School had been run as a reformatory by a voluntary board, and then by Belfast Corporation, but in 1926 it was taken over and fully funded by the Government. It housed both a reformatory and a semi-secure borstal, which functioned separately on the same site and under the same governor until 1956. Malone Borstal was then discontinued under the Malone and Whiteabbey Training Schools Act (Northern Ireland) 1956 and on 27 July 1956 the borstal was moved to Millisle, which was an open borstal, set up under Sections 1 and 2 of the Prison Act (Northern Ireland) 1953.[20] For some time there was a single governor for both Malone Training School and Millisle Borstal, and a housemaster (the equivalent of an assistant governor) was resident in charge of the borstal.[21]

16 The borstal system was expanded further by the introduction of a closed borstal at Armagh Prison in 1963, and from that point trainees spent the first months of their sentences in closed conditions at Armagh before moving to Millisle. Meanwhile Malone continued as a training school until a new purpose-built school was opened at Rathgael.[22]

17 The provision at Millisle was enhanced with the addition of new vocational training workshops and two new classrooms in 1966, residential staff accommodation in 1968, and a gymnasium in 1970.[23] These developments were funded by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

18 Throughout the 1970s considerable pressure was put on the borstal service by the Troubles and by the consequent need to accommodate boys and young men who had been involved in civil disturbance and offending. Millisle only suffered one serious disturbance during the Troubles. On 15 May 1972 a group of 35 trainees obtained access to the roof from the dormitory in Alexander House, and they caused considerable damage to the roof, the dormitory and the medical suite. Only one absconded and the others gave themselves up when the army and the police arrived in force. The rioters were all transferred to a secure unit in Magilligan Prison and work commenced to make the damage good the next day.[24]

20 MIL 110, 148.
21 MIL 111.
22 MIL 109, 10699-10713.
23 MIL 110.
24 MIL 24253.

19 Woburn House open borstal could accommodate 75 trainees, with some flexibility to increase. The average daily borstal population in Northern Ireland (which at first included the trainees in Armagh Prison) rose steadily from 84 in 1972 to 145 in 1979.[25]

20 In 1970 a farmhouse together with 33.5 acres of farm land adjacent to Woburn House was acquired with a view to creating a closed borstal. Demolition of the farm buildings began in 1974[26] but the first trainees were not admitted until November 1977[27], a year later than planned,[28] and by this time young offenders had had to be housed in closed borstal units at the Maze, Crumlin Road Jail and Magilligan Prison. With the opening of Millisle these borstals were now closed.[29] The closed section was designed to hold a further 75 trainees, but could take more with doubling up. Millisle was therefore capable of catering for a total of 150 trainees, or more if pressed.[30]

21 As the Governor of both the open and closed sections, Duncan McLaughlan issued a notice to staff:

> "First, it is important that all staff at all levels view the two institutions as one institution. There is one management, one staff and one task, which is to provide borstal training in the best and most humane manner possible".[31]

In the event, there was a unified management, but the two staff teams remained largely distinct unless there was a need for help because of staff shortage, and the modes of working of the two sections were quite different, despite having the same aims.[32]

22 Millisle itself only functioned with the two sections for three years and it was also closed in 1980 with the introduction of the Youth Offender Centre (YOC) system under the Treatment of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1980, as the borstal sentence had become redundant.[33] The indeterminate nature of the borstal sentence was unpopular with inmates, whereas the YOC sentence was determinate. The closed borstal was shut

25 MIL 117.
26 MIL 24298.
27 MIL 27750.
28 MIL 24765.
29 MIL 725.
30 MIL 710.
31 MIL 162.
32 Day 182, p.99.
33 MIL 115.

on 30 September 1980. On the last day, Duncan McLaughlan noted in the governor's journal:

> "We have shown that both trainees and staff can experience meaningful relationships. The heavy hand has not been needed."[34]

23 For a few months Millisle open section was technically a YOC, but it also closed on 31 December 1980 when the last trainees were transferred to Hydebank.[35] In his last entry in the governor's journal, Duncan McLaughlan wrote:

> "...whilst I welcome the closure of a penal establishment it is a matter of deep regret that Northern Ireland no longer has an open institution. There is no doubt in my mind that we at Millisle have shown what can be achieved when one attempts to establish a humane regime that treats both staff and inmates as human beings. We have not set out to rehabilitate inmates, as such an aim is based on myth and wishful thinking; we have tried to show that imprisonment need not be a totally negative experience."[36]

24 Thereafter the closed borstal premises were used for Lisnevin Training School, and the open section became a training centre for the Northern Ireland Prison Service.[37]

Open and Closed Borstals

25 There were two types of borstal: closed and open. Both were part of the Prison Service and most of the staff in both types of borstal were prison officers. The practice was for boys to be admitted to a closed borstal,and when they had demonstrated that they had settled down, typically after about two or three months, they were moved on to the open borstal. The closed borstals were more army-like and regimented, with uniforms, an emphasis on parades and chores, and a tough regime in which conformity was demanded. Officers had to be addressed as 'Sir'.[38] By contrast, in the open borstals boys wore a choice of clothing and were treated more liberally, with more freedom of movement, additional rewards and less regimentation.

34 MIL 185.
35 MIL 202.
36 MIL 157.
37 MIL 111-112.
38 MIL 055.

26 In 1965, for example, Governor Vogan issued instructions to trainees:

> "You must march to and from work in a quiet smart and orderly manner."[39]

By Duncan McLaughlan's time, twelve years later, trainees in the closed section "walked in a fairly orderly fashion", but this was not required of those in the open section.[40] MZ 1, who was used to working in prisons, was amazed to find that boys delivered newspapers to staff houses, and that one officer took 30 trainees for a walk in the surrounding countryside and was not clear about the numbers checking back in on their return.[41]

27 Because of the contrast in the regimes, trainees were usually keen to move on from the closed borstal to the open section as quickly as possible. In oral evidence Duncan McLaughlan said that canny trainees displayed difficult behaviour on arrival in the closed section and then became more conforming, to demonstrate that they had learnt their lesson and were ready for transfer, whereas less intelligent boys did not play the game and spent longer in the closed section.[42]

28 For most of its existence Millisle was an open borstal and (although some measures were taken to reduce absconding, such as bars on certain windows) reliance was placed upon trainees to complete their sentences without the use of security measures to prevent absconding. Trainees who had achieved a level of trust were given the freedom of the grounds. There was, however, always the possibility that problem behaviour in the open borstal, such as absconding, could lead to a return to the closed borstal.

The Applicants

29 Boys were admitted to borstal for a number of reasons: predominantly they had records of offending, they had absconded frequently from training schools, or they were proving difficult to control in other settings such as children's homes. Of the ten applicants to the Inquiry who were trainees at Millisle only two had not been in a training school prior to admission. One of these had been in three children's homes, and only one had no record of residential care prior to committal to Millisle.

39 Governor J. W.Vogan General Instructions to Borstal Trainees (1 December 1965) Instruction 7: his emphasis. (MIL 615-616).
40 Day 182, p. 35.
41 Day 181, p.32.
42 Day 182, p.51.

30 Because of their histories in other residential childcare institutions, the trainees therefore had the potential for presenting the staff of Millisle with severe handling problems, but the borstal model offered the boys more positive opportunities than prison life, and the hope was that they would seize the opportunities and avoid a life of offending and prison sentences. Nonetheless there was a clear expectation that the staff would be in control and prevent further offending by containing the boys, only offering them greater freedom as they responded to the training programme. A small percentage who did not respond were moved on to a prison.

31 Millisle opened in 1956 but there were no applicants applied to the Inquiry who were there in the 1950s, and only one in the 1960s. Three who were resident in the mid-1970s made allegations only against one particular officer, Officer Skillen. Although the closed borstal at Millisle was only open from 1977 to 1980, six of the ten applicants were admitted to Millisle closed unit before moving on to the open borstal, and while many of their complaints concerned Officer Skillen, the remainder related largely to their treatment in the closed section.

32 For the purposes of this chapter, therefore, the evidence has been drawn together to follow trainees through from their initial admission to the closed borstal to their transfer to the open borstal and then on to their discharge. The allegations of abuse which they made follow.

The Closed Borstal

33 The remit of the closed section was:

> "(i) to receive all young men sentenced to Borstal Training after their initial period of twenty-four hours in HMP Belfast [for registration].
>
> (ii) to assess trainees for their suitability for training in open or closed conditions.
>
> (iii) to provide a full programme of training for those trainees whom it is felt appropriate to place in open conditions.
>
> (iv) to provide a particular programme for those trainees who have rejected the training regime in the open or closed sections."

It was intended to keep the newly admitted trainees who were there for assessment away from those in the segregation unit.[43]

43 MIL 166.

34 The task of the unit was:

> "(i) to introduce trainees to Borstal Training and its implications for them.
>
> (ii) to assess the trainees' need for open or closed conditions.
>
> (iii) to prepare a training plan that the trainee will follow during his training period".

An Allocation Board made up of the senior officers of the borstal decided on the training plans and the units to which the trainees would go. It was intended that the regime in the assessment unit should be "vigorous".[44] Many of the allegations of physical abuse relate to time spent in the assessment unit.

35 Trainees in the segregation unit consisted of:

(a) a small number where movement to the open section was deemed inappropriate, possibly because of the nature of their offences;

(b) some who had failed in the open unit but who, it was hoped, would return there shortly through experiencing an "austere" regime;[45] and

(c) those who had failed in the open section but were to complete their sentence in the closed section.[46]

36 Several witnesses gave graphic accounts of gratuitous physical attacks which they sustained on the day of their admission, presumably intended to indicate to newcomers who was in charge. If trainees did not indicate that they submitted, for example if they complained about their ill-treatment, this was followed up by further punishment until they had been worn down. They described the atmosphere in the closed borstal as being regimented and intentionally punitive, presumably with a view to achieving the obedience of the trainees.

37 HIA 162 said that "Everyone is beaten on their first day there."[47] HIA 294 said that he was sent to Millisle for discipline, aged about seventeen:

> "So I went there for this discipline and as soon as I went through the door I got beat in there, kicked in the shins and there used to be the old brogues they all wore in them days."[48]

44 MIL 167.
45 MIL 169.
46 MIL 712.
47 MIL 044.
48 MIL 064, 30077.

38 HIA 416, who had no previous experience of institutional life, wrote:

> "I was brought into the canteen which was full at the time when I arrived. I was told that I had five minutes to eat. I had not eaten all day as I was in the Court house, and an Officer asked if anyone wanted more bread. I put my hand up and he told me to get the fuck out of there. He then took me into the corridor and battered me. I was then brought to a cell. That night was the worst night of my life as I did not know what was going to happen to me the next day."

39 "The next morning I was given black boots, a black jacket made of cloth and trousers. I had my hair shaved. An officer told me that I didn't have a mother or a father and that the officers in charge were my parents now. He then said that I was only a number. My number was 479 and he told me that they had me for three years. He then slapped me. I had just turned sixteen years of age."[49]

Three years was the maximum without remission. As it happened, HIA 416 remained in Millisle for almost exactly a year, but because of the isolation of the borstal he was visited by his family on only three or four occasions until his discharge, when his father collected him.[50]

40 HIA 320 said that he was assaulted by an officer, LN 18, in the assessment centre and he started screaming, which caused other staff, including Governor McCutcheon, to come in to see what was happening.[51] LN 18 strongly denied the allegation, as he could not place trainees in the punishment block without instructions from the governor.

41 HIA 320 added that in consequence of the incident concerning his admission, some officers, such as LN 20, made things difficult for him, slapped him and put him in the punishment block, but the governor was on his side and he was also supported by a kind officer (Mr McDowell).[52] LN 20 stated that he had no recollection of HIA 320, but that he never used force and did not have the authority to send a trainee to the punishment block.[53]

42 On arrival, trainees were subject to assessment during their first few weeks in the closed section. HIA 416 wrote:

49 MIL 070.
50 MIL 072, 075.
51 MIL 061.
52 MIL 061.
53 MIL 829-830.

> "I had to do six weeks in the first wing that I was placed in. It was called the assessment wing. I had to learn how to make my bed pack which consisted of a blanket then a sheet [and then another blanket]. It was the way that the Army had to make beds. The staff would come in and measure the beds to make sure they were made right. Your comb and toothbrush had to be a certain distance away from each other, the right side up and facing each other."[54]

43 > "The staff would come in and inspect our rooms. We had to shine our boots so that we could see our faces in them. If they checked your cell and found any dust on their finger tips they would wreck the whole bed and you would have to tidy it all. I cleaned my cell and the Officers would still find dust. ...I would then have to clean the whole cell again. ...In the room there was a chair and a Bible. We were not allowed to sit on the chair."[55]

Other witnesses confirm this picture. The cleaning of the cells clearly went well beyond what was required to run an institution hygienically, and it was part of the conditioning process to ensure that trainees conformed.

44 HIA 248 said of the closed unit:

> "The regime there was very tough and you needed permission from the staff to do everything."[56]

HIA 262 said:

> "It was run like an army recruitment camp. We wore uniforms, marched and stood to attention".[57]

This was required of trainees whenever an officer passed them according to HIA 416.[58] HIA 162 said:

> "It was extremely regimented in Borstal and there were rules for everything. If I did not follow the rules to the letter then I would be beaten by staff. The prison officers were tough and were always looking for faults in what I was doing or the state of my cell. If there was a problem then I either was beaten or locked up for the day."[59]

54 HIA 416 explained the process more fully in oral evidence as "the six pack". (Day180, p.5).
55 MIL 070.
56 MIL 055.
57 MIL 036.
58 Day 180, p.7.
59 MIL 044.

45 HIA 400 wrote:

> "Our cells were very basic with just a bed, a chair and a urine pot. We were woken up at six in the morning. We had to sit on the chair and we were not allowed to sit or lie on our beds during the day. If the prison officers caught you on your bed when they were doing their checks they would put you on report. We were only allowed out of our cells for meals. There was no one to talk to and nothing to do. I found somewhere in my room where I could hide things, so I made myself a chess board and made chess pieces out of papers for rolling tobacco. I would chew them and dry them on the radiator. I was able to play chess with myself to pass the time but I was always terrified of being caught."[60]

In oral evidence HIA 400 explained that in his experience any pastime which might be enjoyable was punished, as the period in closed borstal was intended to be harsh. He was worked so hard in PE that he vomited, but was made to clean it up and carry on; he also saw other boys vomiting.[61]

46 The above accounts of the closed section all occurred in the period 1977-1980, and (excluding the allegations against Officer Skillen) they constitute the majority of the allegations of physical abuse made concerning Millisle at this time. It is noticeable that the allegations are almost all non-specific: witnesses recalled being kicked or punched or beaten as regular occurrences. This suggests that there was a culture of low-level violence, coupled with an absence of serious violence, such that trainees did not suffer observable injuries. Governor McLaughlan said that if boys had been injured and required treatment the matron could not have kept it to herself and would have told him.[62]

47 Nonetheless, although the training provided in the closed section was meant to be "austere", even low-level violence was against Governor McLaughlan's stated policy of zero tolerance of physical abuse.[63] Furthermore, Rule 22 of the Prison Rules made it clear that only "necessary" force could be used to maintain order.[64] When asked why the majority of the allegations had related to the closed section, Duncan McLaughlan suggested that they occurred when the unit had not yet settled down.[65]

60 MIL 017-018.
61 MIL 018.
62 Day 182, p.69.
63 Day 182, p. 59.
64 MIL 10678.
65 Day 182, p.107.

48 Supporting this opinion, the Chairman of the Visiting Committee visited the closed section on 28 June 1978, seven months after it had been opened:

> "... A great change has taken place since my last visit. The staff have now settled in and any I spoke to showed an enthusiasm for the job which was lacking on my last visit when so many had recently arrived from the Maze and other prisons, and had not adjusted to the different atmosphere of Woburn. ...I have reflected recently on borstal training as I have known it at Woburn over the past fifteen years or so, and while the Institution has always been runn [sic] smoothly and efficiently from an administrative point of view, I think it could be said that there is evidence of a new dimension in training. This is hard to define, but mainly involves attitudes and rapport between Staff and Trainees. Also Trainees have been given more freedom to develop any potential they may have. The fact is that they are being 'stretched' rather than merely conforming."[66]

49 The Chairman put the change down to the enthusiasm of the Governor. It is possible that some of the abusive practices described by witnesses reflected approaches which staff had learnt in the other prisons from which they had transferred on the opening of the closed section at Millisle, and that they had not yet adopted the thinking of Governor McLaughlan on the treatment of trainees.

50 We accept that there was on occasion low-level violence in the closed unit between 1977 and 1980. This was contrary to Governor McLaughlan's instructions and may have reflected working practices introduced by prison officers from other prisons in the early months of the closed section, but it was unacceptable and constituted systemic abuse.

Transfer to the Open Borstal

51 At the end of the assessment period, trainees appeared before the Allocation and Training Board, which determined their training plans and made recommendations to the Review Body concerning their placement, which was preferably a move to the open section.[67] HIA 294 said that boys stayed in the closed borstal:

> "until you were good enough or they thought you were good enough".[68]

He spent six months in the closed unit.

66 MIL 28062.
67 MIL 20899.
68 MIL 065.

52 Despite his experience of the harsh conditions in the closed unit, HIA 400 tried to prolong his stay in the closed section, as some of the boys who had bullied him in Rathgael were in the open borstal and he was terrified of meeting them again. He therefore trod a fine line, misbehaving sufficiently to avoid promotion to the open unit while avoiding serious misconduct which might have resulted in a beating or being placed in solitary confinement (which he called being "put on the boards").[69] When a group of trainees were asked jokingly by an officer which of them did not want to be transferred to the open borstal, HIA 400 put his hand up, and was called to see the Governor the next day. He was given a job in the Governor's office, but it was a month later before he felt able to tell the Governor the real reason for wishing to stay in the closed section.

53 After some months' delay, HIA 400 was offered medication and was then transferred to the open unit by force, which he found highly distressing, though he admitted that in the end this made him stand up for himself and he outfaced the older trainees who had bullied him.[70] The process which HIA 400 experienced indicates not only considerable sensitivity and flexibility on the part of the Governor in meeting HIA 400's needs, but also the fundamental requirement for conformity, which was ultimately enforced. The transfer was badly handled and this constituted poor practice, but the example was isolated and it did not amount to systemic abuse.[71]

The Open Borstal

54 The model of care provided by Millisle open borstal was in many ways very similar to that of the training schools, but it also had characteristics associated with prison life. Features similar to those found in training schools were, for example, workshops for trade training, sports facilities, house units and a points system, but there was more regimentation, less family contact and less freedom of movement.

55 The trainees were divided into two house units, named Montgomery and Alexander, each under a housemaster, or assistant governor, who was expected to act in loco parentis for the trainees in his house.[72] According to HIA 416 there were two separate wings - "a green wing for country

69 Day 179, p. 6.
70 MIL 018-020.
71 Day 179, p.11.
72 MIL 141, 184, 611; Day 180, p.44.

people and a blue one for Belfast people". The distinction between the two groups was, he said, made by the officers and it reflected a social divide in the wider community, as the city boys considered themselves more streetwise than the country boys. HIA 416 said that there was, however, no distinction between the ways in which the two groups were treated.[73] Duncan McLaughlan denied that this distinction existed, and pointed out the management problems such an arrangement would create, as the number of trainees admitted from different areas was unpredictable.[74]

56 The main weekday occupation in the daytime was trade training in the workshops, with a view to providing skills for the trainees to enable them to obtain employment on discharge. Over time the subjects changed, reflecting developments in employment patterns. When the borstal was at Malone the options included:

> "tailoring, bootmaking, carpet-beating, carpentry, farm work and reconstruction/maintenance of buildings" with handicrafts classes in basket-making, leatherwork and painting.[75] By 1979 the options available at Millisle were:

> "Mechanical Engineering, Joinery, Painting and Decorating, Bricklaying and Horticulture".[76]

HIA 416 recalled workshops for joinery and metal work in 1979.[77] HIA 374 was an apprentice bricklayer before his committal to borstal, and he continued his training in the bricklaying workshop.[78] One trainee who was an apprentice electrician prior to admission was permitted to study at the local technical college.[79]

57 A Visiting Committee member noted that some of the work undertaken in the workshops was repetitive and unproductive, but there were examples where the projects were of real benefit, for example in building stores and a garage,[80] making items for other institutions,[81] such as internal gates for the Maze prison, preparing a new altar for the Roman Catholic chapel in

73 MIL 072.
74 Day 182, p.43.
75 MIL 119.
76 MIL 120, 713
77 MIL 072.
78 MIL 050.
79 MIL 713.
80 MIL 24299.
81 MIL 24168.

Donaghadee, which had been destroyed,[82] converting an ambulance into a mobile toy library[83] or making toys for sale.

58 Some trainees were allocated to tasks which were necessary to the running of the borstal.[84] HIA 212, for example, worked in the laundry and cleaned windows, including those of the prison officers' houses, which were "just across from the Woburn House complex".[85] HIA 248 said he worked in the officers' mess up the hill, starting with clearing up after their breakfast, but according to Duncan McLaughlin the 'mess' was no more than a small room in the main house with facilities for snacks.[86] HIA 248 also worked in the kitchen from 7am every day preparing meals for the trainees; he enjoyed this work while other opportunities to do woodwork, crafts or PE did not interest him. After a while he was given a red armband as an orderly, and this allowed him to move freely in the borstal grounds.[87]

59 The educational attainments of many trainees were poor. As early as 1960 a special teacher was brought in to help trainees struggling with education. In 1965 compulsory education was introduced, amounting to two evening classes a week of two hours each.[88] It was noted in 1966 that 69% of the trainees were educationally retarded, and by 1968 this had gone up to 74%.[89] In 1969 the attainments of 56% of the trainees equated with those of an eight-year-old.[90] Of the 149 committed to borstal in 1979, 100 were considered to have special educational needs.[91]

60 Duncan McLaughlan wrote that:

> "Formal education ranged from remedial education to what was then known as the General Certificate of Education."[92]

There was a team of three full-time teachers, led by a Head of Education, and a large number of part-time teachers. The library was reported to be well stocked.[93]

82 MIL 499.
83 MIL 27780.
84 MIL 713.
85 MIL 081.
86 Day 182, p. 45.
87 MIL 056.
88 MIL 180, 27780, 27903.
89 MIL 27925.
90 MIL 27937.
91 MIL 710-711.
92 MIL 713.
93 MIL 27914.

61 Sporting activities were also encouraged, and there are references in the records to football, cricket, basketball, athletics, swimming, darts and table tennis.[94] On Saturdays the afternoon was given over to football, cricket and swimming for trainees who did not have visitors.[95] In 1970 a new gymnasium was opened. There was also an annual Mourne Wall Walk, and it was reported to the Visiting Committee on 2 June 1980 that this had been completed in record time.[96]

62 HIA 416 said that during the day the trainees went to the gym to exercise, and complained that in the winter they went outside to exercise in the rain, though they were locked up all day in the summer. He said that they also did boxing, but this was denied by Governor McLaughlan, who said he was firmly opposed to boxing and would not have permitted it.[97] [98] The beach was used for a short season,[99] but in later years it was avoided because of the poor quality of the water.[100]

63 HIA 400 described 'murder ball', in which there were:

> " two teams of ten, a medicine ball in the middle and a big mat at each side of the room. The object of the game was for each team to try to get the ball on to the other mat by any means necessary. You were allowed to kick and punch. I liked that game and I thought it was a good way to allow all the boys to get rid of any tension."[101]

He added that as soon as the game started there was a free-for-all fight between the two teams, regardless of where the ball was.[102] As Governor, Duncan McLaughlan did not recognise this description of the game, saying that all the players had to sit on the ground and only move by shuffling.[103]

64 On Sundays trainees from the open section attended church services in the local community,[104] and HIA 416 recalled that Officer Skillen accompanied Roman Catholic boys to Mass.[105] There was religious instruction on Sunday

94 MIL 24255, 24298.
95 MIL 121.
96 MIL 748.
97 MIL 071.
98 Day 182, p.38.
99 MIL 24255.
100 Day 182, p.106.
101 MIL 020.
102 Day 179, p. 19.
103 Day 182, pp.41 and 42.
104 Day 182, p.105.
105 MIL 073.

afternoons, but it is unclear what proportion of the trainees participated in any of these activities.[106]

65 Although there was much less emphasis on chores than in the closed borstal, they were still a feature of life in the open unit. The governor inspected the cells for cleanliness on Saturday mornings and "your cell had to be twice as clean" according to HIA 416. They used a big wooden box with bricks in it and a blanket underneath as a buffer for the floors, and the trainees had to buffer the floors as a punishment. The buffer was very heavy and HIA 416 attributed his tennis elbows to this manual labour.[107] Duncan McLaughlan wrote that there was an electric floor polisher.

66 In general, life was more relaxed in the open section. Trainees were no longer required to make bed packs, but simply made their beds. Trainees were allowed to wear jeans in the open borstal, as against the black uniforms in the closed unit.[108] There were no complaints about food, and the Visiting Committee frequently commented on its excellence.[109] Leisure pursuits included first aid training, motor maintenance and adventure activities, as well as snooker and television. [110]

67 Duncan McLaughlan also wanted to get trainees out into the local community. In 1975, soon after he had taken up post, he reported that trainees on special privileges went for supervised walks in the neighbourhood, for example, and others played football matches against teams in the neighbourhood. Plans were in hand for camping trips and canoeing, and arrangements were being made to redecorate Corrymeela.[111]

68 There were parades, at which trainees could request to see the governor or the doctor or the chaplain. There were different chaplains for the different denominations. Medical services were provided by a local doctor, who "attended each day and on demand as required".[112] There was also a resident matron.[113]

69 When HIA 416 was suffering from sciatica (though he was unaware at the time that this was the problem), he was unable to stand straight to attention at parades, and was punched for failing to do so. He was

106 MIL 597.
107 MIL 071.
108 MIL 072.
109 MIL 423, 422, 386, 351, 24807.
110 MIL 713.
111 MIL 336.
112 MIL 714.
113 MIL 614.

suspected of malingering, but he was nonetheless taken to hospital for an x-ray, he was placed in a hospital room for three days, and he was put on light duties following the intervention of the governor.[114] [115]

The Progression System

70 The Prison (Northern Ireland) Act 1953 set a maximum of three years for borstal training, with the minimum being normally nine months unless a special case were made.[116] This was reduced under the Treatment of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Act 1968 so that the minimum period of borstal training was six months and the maximum two years.[117]

71 Under the Progression (Grade) System trainees could move up through four (or possibly five) grades, depending on their conduct. The further they progressed, the greater the freedom allowed to them and the greater the rewards in terms of parcels and visits permitted. Equally, if a trainee was involved in misconduct, such as fighting, absconding or cheek to staff, he could be downgraded. Originally, the grades appear to have been labelled Ungraded, A, B, Probationary and Special, plus a Penal Class which involved stone-breaking. Later, the grades were titled Entrant, General I, II and III, Special I and II and Group Leader or Prefect.[118] In the 1970s the grades were labelled 1, 2, 3, (and possibly 3B) and 4, the 'special' grade. Typically a trainee spent a few months in each grade, though accelerated promotion was possible.[119]

72 Records were kept on each trainee.[120] Every month officers and instructors provided progress reports which were collated by the house principal officers and discussed at house boards.[121] There was then an internal Review Board chaired by the governor where recommendations on promotions were discussed. Decisions on grading were taken by the Reviewing Board, which met monthly and included representatives from the Northern Ireland Office and the Prison Service headquarters.[122] [123] The Board essentially endorsed the recommendations made by the internal

114 MIL 073.
115 Day 180, p.39.
116 MIL 10658.
117 MIL 163, 10950.
118 MIL 603.
119 MIL 122, 162, 181, 712.
120 Day 182, pp. 36 and 37.
121 MIL 182-183.
122 MIL 168
123 Day 182, pp.49 and 50.

review system, but they also interviewed all newly admitted trainees and any who had been downgraded. It was the Visiting Committee, however, which made recommendations to the Northern Ireland Office for the release of trainees.[124]

73 An undated table described the privileges awarded to the differing grades in terms of letters, visits, pre-decimal pocket money and status.[125] 'Stripes' were awarded to match the grade and the loss of a stripe was one of the possible penalties.[126] A red armband was awarded to the 'special' grade, indicating that they had the freedom to move around the site.[127]

74 The longer trainees stayed at Millisle the later they were permitted to stay up and remain in association, playing badminton, billiards and table tennis. Those who had been there fifteen months or more were also allowed to smoke.[128]

75 When boys had worked their way up through the grades, the final stage was known as 'special privileges' and it applied to trainees in their final three months before discharge. It was still possible to lose such privileges, and witnesses described their apprehension when officers or other residents attempted to engage them in behaviour which would have delayed release.[129]

Punishments

76 Under Rule 84 of the 1954 Prison Rules the governor was authorised to deal with breaches of discipline such as:

> "idleness, carelessness, abuse of privilege, non-conformity to parole decisions, irreverent behaviour during prayers, disrespect towards officers/visitors, repeated/groundless complaints etc."[130]

77 The penalties he could apply were:

> "administration of a caution, removal from activities other than work, award of extra work, forfeiture of right to additional letters/visits, stoppage of gratuities or earnings, reduction in grade, delay in promotion to a higher grade, [and] confinement to room for 3 days."[131]

124 MIL 122-123, 162, 172, 712.
125 MIL 603.
126 MIL 122.
127 MIL 056.
128 MIL 122.
129 See also paragraphs 95-97 on Discharge and Aftercare.
130 MIL 125.
131 MIL 125.

78 Statistics indicate that the commonest penalties were loss of grade or privileges and stoppage of earnings, with confinement to room following on. These accounted for 96% of punishments in 1972-1976. By 1979 extra work was becoming a more frequent punishment.[132] With the exception of 1974, when fifteen trainees were caned, corporal punishment was scarcely ever used in the later years.[133]

79 HIA 272's recollection of solitary confinement was that he:

> "had to stand facing the wall for two or three hours at a time and answer questions on the Bible, which was the only reading material I had."[134]

In oral evidence he added that he did not read the Bible and had not been able to answer the questions.[135] Duncan McLaughlan said that as Governor he refused to use solitary confinement, and the cells were turned into a series of rooms to teach painting and decorating,[136] though there were still rooms for time out.[137]

80 If a trainee was punished with loss of association he was not permitted to join in leisure-time activities, which were seen as a privilege. Duncan McLaughlan said that trainees subject to loss of association had to go to their bedrooms or remain in the common room. HIA 272 wrote:

> "In the evening, I had to sit in a small metal box with a narrow seat from 6 until 10 p.m. for a month until my punishment was complete. It was called the doggie box as it was in the same shape as the starting boxes at a greyhound race-track. This was an isolating and depressing experience. I had no-one to chat to in the evening."[138]

Duncan McLaughlan said he had never heard of the "doggie box" and could not imagine what was being described.[139]

81 The rules for the application of corporal punishment were laid down in detail in the Prison Rules, and the requirements were demanding and precise.[140] The evidence of officers and former trainees alike suggests that

132 MIL 594.
133 MIL 205.
134 MIL 011.
135 Day 178, pp.42 and 43.
136 Day 182, p.17.
137 Day 182, pp.21 and 22.
138 MIL 011.
139 Day 182, pp.25 and 26.
140 MIL 10228-10229, 10680.

the Prison Rules were adhered to closely. It was for the Visiting Committee to decide if a trainee were to be caned and this is addressed more fully in the section below on the role of the Visiting Committee.[141]

82 HIA 262 said that he was caned for absconding by Officer Skillen and ML 6, but his statement did not indicate that he was alleging physical abuse.[142] Prison Service records were unable to identify anyone who might have been ML 6. According to Duncan McLaughlan, corporal punishment was awarded by the Visiting Committee on three occasions during his tenure from 1975 to 1980. He was opposed to corporal punishment,[143] but stated that:

> "the cane was applied by Mr Skillen and that he did so within the terms required under the Prison Rules".[144]

On one occasion the caning was stopped because the Medical Officer, who was required to be present, became unwell.[145]

Absconding

83 The establishment was intentionally open, and the trainees therefore had opportunities to abscond. Duncan McLaughlan described the usual process followed at Millisle:

> "When a young person absconded, staff searched the immediate area of the Borstal; if this was unsuccessful, the police were notified and they took over. A returned absconder would be interviewed by an assistant governor. An absconder would face formal disciplinary proceedings involving adjudication by the Visiting Committee. This Committee would decide whether or not a young person was guilty of an offence and if guilty, the sanction which should apply. Such sanctions could have included corporal punishment or loss of grade or privileges. Absconding episodes were recorded in the Governor's Journal."[146]

84 Stephen Davis said that absconding appeared to be a problem, citing figures for the period July 1975 to December 1980.[147] MZ 1 concurred; he was an officer in the open borstal for nine months, but requested

141 See paras. 119-121.
142 MIL 036.
143 Day 182, pp.53 and 54.
144 MIL 718.
145 MIL 718.
146 MIL 717.
147 MIL 160-161.

a transfer as he felt unsuited to the role. In oral evidence he said that abscondings were so frequent that "at night you could have set your watch by it", with boys smashing dormitory windows in order to escape, in one instance jumping onto the roof of the Chief Officer's car, which happened to be parked underneath.[148]

85 HIA 212 did not return when allowed out on parole, and so when he was apprehended he was sent to Crumlin Road Jail, where he completed his sentence.[149] HIA 272 who had absconded after only ten weeks at Millisle was at large for eight months before being apprehended, but this was at the height of the Troubles when the police would not have had safe access to his home area in west Belfast and the Army patrolled the area.[150]

86 The statistics published by the Ministry of Home Affairs, however, indicate that in the later years absconding was limited, and did not reach the levels experienced at Rathgael or St Patrick's, even though Millisle received some boys from these training schools specifically because of the frequency of their absconding. There were occasional peaks, such as May 1976 when six absconded and June 1980 when five ran away, but the general picture was one of stability. In the last four years prior to closure there were no abscondings in 34 of the 48 months, and in the eighteen months from March 1977 to September 1978 only three boys absconded. The figures for trainees failing to return from leave were similarly low.[151] Duncan McLaughlan was unable to offer an explanation for the decreasing level of absconding, and said he had no specific strategy to reduce running away other than treating people decently.[152] Trainees would, of course, have been aware that further absconding could result in their having to complete their full sentence in prison.

87 To those used to working in secure establishments any absconding may well have been seen as a serious problem but, by comparison with other open institutions for a similar clientele, Millisle's record was good. No one ever absconded from the closed section at Millisle.

148 Day 181, pp.51 and 52.
149 MIL 081.
150 Day 178, p.47.
151 MIL 90046.
152 Day 182, pp.97 and 98.

The Troubles

88 Millisle took both Protestant and Catholic offenders, and in view of the serious intercommunity discord from 1969 onwards, problems could have been anticipated, both within the trainee group and between officers and trainees. Duncan McLaughlan, who was at Millisle from 1975 onwards, said that there was no sectarianism among officers, and that while there were disagreements between trainees, this was never a serious issue.[153] MZ 1 went even further; he said there was no sectarian division between the boys and they just accepted the situation.[154]

89 There was, however, some scattered evidence of difficulties. HIA 162 said that there was a sectarian split in the dining hall and the common room, not organised by staff but with the denominational groupings of trainees gravitating towards their own.[155] The division between Roman Catholic and Protestant trainees may have underlain some of the bullying described by witnesses. HIA 262 wrote:

> "Because we were Catholic we were seriously under the heel."[156]

90 The sectarian division was said to involve the officers. HIA 400 described how an officer who was good to him told him:

> "to go into the Catholic boys' room while they were out and rip up their books. I didn't want to do it but I didn't dare say no to him."[157] [158]

The same officer put him up to fight another boy, "for his entertainment", he thought.[159]

91 The tension grew when, on 27 August 1979, eighteen soldiers were killed by IRA bombs at Warrenpoint near Newry, HIA 416's home town. When the news was announced, another trainee from Newry "let out a roar", such that an officer entered the room and called HIA 416 and the other trainee "Fenian bastards".[160] After that he felt under greater threat of physical abuse from other trainees.

153 Day 182, pp.40 and 41.
154 Day 181, p.43.
155 Day 178, pp.69 and 70.
156 MIL 036.
157 MIL 021.
158 Day 179, p.20.
159 MIL 021.
160 MIL 074.

92 Further to the problems within Millisle, the Probation Service had difficulty undertaking aftercare supervision in some communities.[161]

93 In his report for 1970 the Catholic Chaplain commended Millisle for the "immense amount of goodwill and co-operation among all members of staff" at a time of turmoil in the community, and he regretted that "such good relations never reach the headlines".[162] At the Visiting Committee on 7 July 1972 sectarian tension was discussed and a member suggested that any troublemakers should be moved.[163] In his report to the Visiting Committee, another member wrote concerning his visit on 24 April 1974 that the:

> "Governor and staff deserve credit for boys of both religions working, living and playing together over the last few years when this has been impossible in other penal establishments and indeed in the community at large."[164]

In 1980 the Visiting Committee questioned whether there was sectarian discrimination. The deputy governor denied discrimination but said that the question arose when there was a denominational imbalance, and that it was seasonal.[165]

94 On balance, in view of the problems occurring elsewhere in the province during the Troubles and taking account of Millisle's remit to admit both Catholics and Protestants, the staff at Millisle appear to have been as successful as could have been hoped in keeping the establishment on an even keel.

Discharge and Aftercare

95 As trainees approached the end of their training, they hoped to be put on 'special privileges' by the Licensing Board, which meant that three months later they were due for discharge. Witnesses reported that this left them vulnerable to bullying and other discriminatory behaviour, as they were unable to retaliate without risking the label of being a 'borstal failure', which would have led to a delayed discharge, or to a return to the closed borstal for the remainder of their full sentence if failed at three consecutive Boards. Furthermore, under the Treatment of Offenders Act

161 MIL 24225.
162 MIL 24173.
163 MIL 508.
164 MIL 406.
165 MIL 25006.

(Northern Ireland) 1968 it was not permitted to serve a second borstal sentence; any further offending could have led to prison.[166]

96 HIA 400 said that one officer used to whisper threats in his ear that he intended to make him a borstal failure, and he teased him publicly in the dining hall, such that HIA 400 reacted and was threatened with being put on report. However, the Governor, with whom HIA 400 got on well, overturned the officer's recommendation of failure and he was discharged ten weeks later.[167]

97 Similarly, HIA 416 said:

> "... when I received my special privileges, a screw was trying to break me so that I would lose them".[168]

He added further detail in oral evidence.[169] HIA 416 was discharged after a year, but he alleged that he knew not to report MZ 1, who punched and slapped him, as he "would end up having to serve the full three years of a sentence".[170] MZ 1 wrote that he worked in the control room and not in the dormitories where this is alleged to have taken place.[171] Records indicate that MZ 1 was considered to be unsuited to borstal work as he was an inflexible disciplinarian.[172]

98 On being released, trainees were subject to licence and were supervised by probation officers.[173] [174] Unlike the training schools, Millisle had no responsibility for aftercare and does not seem to have followed up any trainees to learn if they had been successful.

Staffing

99 As noted above, the staff were mostly prison officers in both the closed and open borstals. Once an officer had completed his probationary period he was confirmed in post as a prison officer. Officers working in borstals received no specific training in the custody of young offenders.[175] Class officers looked after specific house units or landings in the closed section. There was also a physical training officer.

166 MIL 114.
167 MIL 021-022.
168 MIL 075.
169 Day 180, p. 28.
170 MIL 074.
171 MIL 798.
172 MIL 789, 21994, 22327.
173 MIL 24300.
174 Day 182, pp.106 and 107.
175 MIL 719.

100 In addition to the prison officers there were a number of civilian staff at Millisle, such as the instructors in the workshops, teachers, nightwatchmen, matron and seamstress. Among them were a chief vocational training officer and an education officer.[176] There was also a visiting psychiatrist and a visiting dentist.[177]

101 There was a clear hierarchy of accountability within the Prison Service. Above the officers there were senior officers and principal officers, who accounted to the chief officer. Above him were the two assistant governors, referred to in borstals as housemasters, and overall there was the governor, who was responsible for almost all aspects of the running of Millisle.[178]

102 The housemasters played an important role in organising activities such as inter-house sports, in overseeing the education and vocational training of individual trainees, and in maintaining family links, including visiting their families and arranging employment for trainees on their release.[179] The welfare officer at Rathgael also assisted when support in the community was required.[180]

103 There appears to have been something of a division between the governor grades and the officers at times. While the governor's instructions were explicitly obeyed, the officer grades developed a culture of their own, which had its own way of dealing with matters. The evidence of the witnesses includes a number of instances in which governors protected trainees from officers, and witnesses appear to consider that governors were humane and fair, if strict at times, but they felt that things went on of which the governors were unaware. HIA 400, for example, said that officers behaved differently when the governor was present, and as a result the governor had no realistic understanding of what was going on.[181]

104 Duncan McLaughlan said that there were in all about sixty staff in the open borstal and a further sixty staff were added with the opening of the closed section. About thirty would have been resident on site, and could therefore have been available in the event of a crisis or if help were needed to cover sickness, other absences or additional duties. He thought he knew most, but not all, staff by name.[182]

176 MIL 714.
177 MIL 288, 24299.
178 MIL 714.
179 MIL 124.
180 MIL 714.
181 Day 179, pp.8 to 12.
182 Day 182, p.31.

105 In May 1974 the Visiting Committee raised concerns about the number of staff, stating in a letter to the NIO that Millisle had vacancies for ten officers.[183] The Prison Service faced serious recruitment difficulties and at that time they were 650 staff short in the province as a whole, such that volunteers were drafted from England and Scotland, but overall Millisle does not seem to have suffered unduly from shortages.[184]

106 Prison Officers were expected to abide by a Code of Discipline which spelt out what was expected of them in some detail.[185] Duncan McLaughlan said that if officers stayed within the boundary of acceptable conduct he supported them.[186]

Governance

107 Under the Prison (Northern Ireland) Act 1953, the Ministry of Home Affairs was made responsible for prisons. The Prison Service was within the purview of the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the governor of Millisle was responsible to the director of prisons. Under direct rule from 1972 to 1980 - the period relating to nine of the ten applicants - the Prison Service was the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Office.[187] The governor had considerable delegated powers, and was responsible for almost all aspects of the running of the borstal, including the finances, administration, human resources, public relations, security and all aspects of the care of the trainees, though there were some decisions taken by the Visiting Committee and others where the MoHA or NIO gave authorisation.

108 The governor was therefore in a position to influence the tone of the institution. It was customary in the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS) for governors to be promoted within the service, but in the 1970s there was a shortage of suitable candidates and so secondments were sought from England. Duncan McLaughlan, who was Assistant Governor of Millisle for three months in 1972-73 and Governor for the last six years prior to closure from 1975 to 1980, was initially seconded in this way. He provided helpful evidence, both in his statement and orally, as his tenure covered three years when Millisle was only an open borstal and three years when both the open and closed sections were in operation. It was also

183 MIL 24761.
184 MIL 394, 24764.
185 MIL 604-606.
186 Day 182, p.60.
187 MIL 117.

the period when seven of the ten applicants served their sentences at Millisle.[188]

109 Duncan McLaughlan was a keen exponent of "management by walking about" and, when on duty, he made a practice of visiting the whole borstal every morning, afternoon and evening, as he felt that this was a good way to "impose his will on the Establishment".[189] MZ 1, an officer who was accustomed to the traditional distance maintained between governor and prisoners in adult prisons, was alarmed to see him playing snooker with the trainees.[190]

110 The governor was required to investigate and report any serious misconduct to the Northern Ireland Office, such as "escape, smuggling, mutiny, assault on an officer, gross violence etc."[191] Duncan McLaughlan said that his contact with Prison Service Headquarters largely related to financial and personnel matters, although he participated in meetings on general prison service matters.[192] It was the practice for governors to prepare annual reports, but this ceased as it was not a legal requirement, though statistical returns were still submitted on:

> "admissions and releases, previous releases, accommodation, training, education and absconding episodes."[193]

Finance

111 As part of the Northern Ireland Prison Service Millisle was funded directly by the Government through the Ministry of Home Affairs or, from 1972, through the Northern Ireland Office. The Government incurred considerable expenditure not only in the building of the closed borstal but also in the addition of the classrooms, workshops, gymnasium and staff housing to augment the original Woburn House.

112 A request for a £100,000 indoor swimming pool was turned down by the Northern Ireland Office.[194] Otherwise there has been no evidence that shortage of staffing or other resources affected the quality of service provided by Millisle or impacted on the circumstances of any of the

188 MIL 706-724.
189 MIL 719.
190 Day 181, p.31.
191 MIL 125.
192 MIL 719-720.
193 MIL 720.
194 MIL 332, 340,356.

allegations made by the Inquiry's witnesses or recorded historically. We have therefore not inquired further into this subject.

Inspections and the Visiting Committee

113 There was no system of inspections for prisons and borstals in Northern Ireland until 1981, after the closure of Millisle.[195]

114 Some external influence was exercised by the Northern Ireland Office and Prison Service, as their representatives were members of the Review Board, which determined the progression of the trainees through the grades and their eventual dates of discharge, but according to Duncan McLaughlan this committee largely rubber-stamped recommendations made by an internal committee.

115 The main external check on the work of the borstal was the Visiting Committee, appointed by the Minister under Section 11 of the Prison (Northern Ireland) Act 1953.[196] It was a statutory requirement that there should be at least six members, but usually there were a dozen and in 1979 there were eighteen.[197] Members were expected, in the words of the May Committee, to be "well informed and acute but friendly watchdogs of the public interest".[198] Stephen Davis described the Visiting Committees as "both supportive and challenging".[199]

116 The Committee had two main roles. The first was for members to visit and apprise themselves of the quality of service being provided. The second was to adjudicate when a recommendation was presented to them under Rule 175 of the 1954 Prison Rules that a trainee had been involved in serious misconduct and merited corporal punishment.[200] The minutes of their monthly meetings have survived from 1972 to 1977 and 1980, and they throw light on a wide range of matters.[201]

117 The meetings typically heard a report from the governor on the occupancy, admissions and discharges in the previous month, staff changes and any major problems or developments. They received the reports of the two members delegated to visit during the previous month. They discussed

195 MIL 118.
196 MIL 10693.
197 MIL 582.
198 MIL 580.
199 Day 182, p.11.
200 MIL 125-127, 580.
201 MIL 24613-25039.

issues raised by members, and for a time in 1976 to 1977 they interviewed all trainees admitted during the previous month.[202]

118 The issues raised by members were very varied. In 1972, for example, they made visits to borstals in England, which reassured them about the service offered at Millisle, which "compared most favourably with the best they had been privileged to visit in England".[203] They decided, subject to Ministry approval, to invite members of the judiciary to visit the borstal.[204] To help trainees obtain employment in painting and decorating they met a delegation of trade unionists, to see if trainees could obtain union membership.[205] Following a visit by a member of the Committee, they advocated the fitting of half-doors on the lavatories.[206] The proposal for a heated indoor swimming pool was discussed on a number of occasions, and the Committee was not pleased when the idea was turned down on financial grounds in a brief communication from the Ministry.[207] It was the Visiting Committee which initiated discussion about single rooms.[208] Occasionally they discussed concerns raised about individuals, such as the exceptional violence of one trainee and the challenges this posed.[209] On one occasion they happened to meet the day after new Prison Rules came into force and so copies were promptly circulated to Visiting Committee members.[210]

119 The most contentious issue proved to be corporal punishment. When a trainee committed a serious misdemeanour, such as absconding, the case was presented to an emergency meeting of the Committee, often made up of only two or three members. They decided on the appropriate penalty, which was then reported to the Northern Ireland Office.

120 As the newly arrived Governor, Duncan McLaughlan was opposed to corporal punishment, and after the Visiting Committee had decided on 15 August 1975 that it should be applied, he chose not to implement their decision. Some months later he took advantage of a social occasion where he happened to meet Merlyn Rees, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and Lord Donaldson, the Minister for Prisons, to explain

202 MIL 24927, 24938, 24939.
203 MIL 549, 24635.
204 MIL 414.
205 MIL 469.
206 MIL 519.
207 MIL 355, 356, 340, 332.
208 MIL 24698.
209 MIL 300.
210 MIL 478.

his position on corporal punishment. By this time corporal punishment had been abandoned in English borstals, and Lord Donaldson met two members of the Committee and requested that they reconsider their decision. The two members acquiesced but pointed out that they could not speak for the full Committee, who were not happy about the pressure being exerted on them. Lord Donaldson then asked that they should have a twelve-month trial period without applying corporal punishment, and before the trial period had been completed and evaluated, the Treatment of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Act 1976 abolished it. The Visiting Committee found the way in which this process had been manipulated highly irritating, but they decided to "suffer with good grace".[211] No action appears to have been taken, or complaint made, concerning Governor McLaughlan's refusal to implement a Visiting Committee decision.

121 The Visiting Committee had alternative penalties to corporal punishment at their disposal, and there was an example on 13 February 1975 when they decided that four trainees who had absconded should be subject to forfeiture of privileges, stoppage of earnings, reduction in grade, confinement to their rooms and return to Armagh Prison.[212]

122 If the Visiting Committee considered a boy "incorrigible" or exercising a bad influence on other inmates, they could refer the matter to the Minister who had the authority under the Prison (Northern Ireland) Act 1953 to have the trainee imprisoned elsewhere.

123 Trainees had the right to speak to members of the Visiting Committee "out of sight, out of hearing of staff", but according to HIA 400 this was a farce as trainees were warned by officers not to speak to Committee members.[213] Reports of visits mostly describe practical matters such as the cleanliness of the buildings, and there are almost no indications of any conversations between trainees and Visiting Committee members, though there is an example on 4 January 1976 of a of boy wanting to speak to a Visiting Committee member.[214]

124 The Committee's contribution in advising the governor on the main issues facing staff was therefore severely limited. Duncan McLaughlan said in oral evidence that the Committee's visits were valuable, but within limits,

211 MIL 216, 298, 299, 309, 311, 312, 316-318, 719, 763.
212 MIL 345.
213 Day 179, pp.30 and 31.
214 MIL 556.

as staff would not have discussed deeper issues with them.[215] Members never brought forward any complaints from trainees of assaults by staff.[216]

125 At their final meeting on 1 September 1980 the Visiting Committee expressed considerable dissatisfaction with the closure of the borstal and the ending of the system as a whole, as under the YOC system trainees no longer had the incentive to work towards early release.[217] The Committee was reorganised to function for the following four months as the Visiting Committee to Millisle in its brief role as a Youth Offender Centre before its final closure.

126 In summary, both of the main roles of the Visiting Committee - visiting and authorising punishment - acted as checks on the powers of the staff. Without the visits of the Visiting Committee members there was little external scrutiny and complaints were dealt with internally. The trainees were therefore relatively powerless and vulnerable, with few forms of redress other than rebellion. Although the Committee had few powers, by providing a presence of which the staff were aware and which, in extremis, offered the trainees a listening ear, the Visiting Committee probably played a useful role as a safety valve.

Allegations of Abuse by Officers

Overview

127 The following categories of alleged abuse are addressed in this section:

(a) Allegations of physical, sexual and emotional abuse by Officer Skillen

(b) Allegations of physical abuse recorded in the documentation

(c) Allegations of physical abuse made by applicants in their statements or oral evidence

(d) Complaints

(e) Allegation of sexual abuse

(f) Allegations of emotional abuse

(g) Conclusions concerning allegations of abuse by staff

215 Day 182, p.73.
216 Day 182, p.75.
217 MIL 752.

(a) Allegations of Physical, Sexual and Emotional Abuse by Officer Skillen

128 Desmond James Skillen, known to colleagues and trainees alike as 'Punchy', was born on 2 January 1926 and he died on 5 December 1994. He joined the Prison Service on 30 June 1955, though it is not known when he commenced work at Millisle.[218] His personnel file was destroyed in 2000, and so very little else is recorded about him.[219]

129 He earned his nickname by acting as sparring partner for a well-known boxer. Officer Skillen was therefore a competent boxer himself, and was said to have shown "every sign of taking too much punishment". Two witnesses said he punched boys, though that was not alleged to be his main modus operandi in abusing boys.[220] Duncan McLaughlan, as Governor, saw Officer Skillen as sincere and honest, somewhat slow on the uptake and at times the subject of banter among the officers. He had warm memories of him and his "lovely family", and he had never heard reports of any abusive misconduct on the part of Officer Skillen.[221]

130 Although it is not clear when Officer Skillen commenced work at Millisle, he was already in post when Governor McLaughlan took over in 1975; Officer Skillen would have been 48 years old at that time. He was the officer nominated to apply corporal punishment when required, as HIA 362 found out.[222] According to Governor McLaughlan it is not known why Officer Skillen was selected for this role, but he said that he always carried out his duties in accordance with Prison Rules.

131 Officer Skillen was responsible for running the laundry, which was sited on the ground floor of the main house. Visitors' reports on the laundry were always satisfactory. When the Chairman of the Visiting Committee inspected the laundry on 12 February 1973 he noted "Mr Skillen getting the best from his boys as usual."[223] In the Governor's annual report of 1974 Officer Skillen was commended for the very efficient way he ran the laundry.[224] The next Governor, McLaughlan recalled that:

> "…when I visited there the atmosphere presented as good-humoured and relaxed."[225]

218 MIL 20305.
219 MIL 087.
220 Day 178, pp.33 and 34.
221 Day 182, p.62.
222 MIL 718.
223 MIL 488.
224 MIL 24300.
225 MIL 722.

132 From the evidence of witnesses it seems that he was the only officer who worked in the laundry, and at any one time he had one or more trainees who worked with him. Officer Skillen is said to have treated them well, and when he abused other trainees his assistants participated in the abuse, for example by holding boys down while he assaulted them.

133 HIA 272 wrote that a few hours after his arrival at Millisle he was told to report to the laundry to collect his new uniform from Officer Skillen who was:

> "looking me up and down. He was so close to me that I could smell his breath. He suddenly grabbed my testicles and head-butted me at the same time. I was so shocked that I just stood there and did not react. Another officer and prisoner were present and they laughed as well. There was a large clothes dryer in the laundry, and Mr Skillen and two other members of staff bundled me into the machine and shut the door. One of them turned the machine on for a second and scared me to death. It was a terrifying experience and one which I will never forget."[226]

In oral evidence HIA 272 said that he had been "stunned" by being head-butted, (which he understood was a "ritual" of Officer Skillen) and frightened when he was put in a dryer for ten seconds. He complained to the Governor, who said the matter would be investigated.[227] We also received a statement referring to an admission ritual from ML 56. His application to be treated as a late applicant to the Inquiry was refused by the Chairman, and this refusal was upheld by the High Court. Nevertheless we have taken into account the statement which ML 56 then submitted to the Inquiry, but his allegations have not been investigated by the Inquiry and so we express no opinion on them. ML 56 said that when he was admitted, the newcomers were all lined up:

> "in the corridor in single file, Skillen came along and some of us got punched, others got a head butt or a 'dead leg'."[228]

134 Officer Skillen was said by most witnesses to act in a joking fashion when assaulting boys. Bystanders - both trainees and officers - laughed, though his victims found his attentions humiliating and not at all amusing. Most of the allegations related to abuse in the laundry, (though one allegation related to a mock sexual attack in the more public space of the dining hall). All trainees had to visit the laundry at some point to collect clothes, but HIA 416 said he tried to go when he thought Officer Skillen would be absent, because of his reputation.

226 MIL 010.
227 Day 178, pp. 26, 28, 29.
228 MIL 835-836.

135 HIA 400 wrote that Officer Skillen:

> "played a 'game' where he would chase you and if he caught you he would pretend to touch you up. ...Periodically you would be sent to the laundry to get something, which was dangerous as he would throw a hammer or a spanner at you as soon as you appeared at the door. He hit a boy with a hammer and split his head open. It was part of his 'games' and everyone was afraid of being sent to the laundry... ."[229]

In oral evidence HIA 400 said that he saw Officer Skillen as being unlike other officers, simple, not very bright and "ogre-like".[230]

136 HIA 162 wrote of his personal experience with Officer Skillen:

> "He used to pretend to rub up against you in front of everyone and everyone thought it was funny. One day he hit me over the head with a hammer."[231]

HIA 162 saw Officer Skillen as "a bit of a character", and did not consider his simulation as sexual; he said it was funny to everyone except the trainee who was picked on.[232] ML 56 recalled that when this happened:

> "I can remember him getting that excited that he was foaming and dribbling at the mouth".[233]

137 Officer Skillen was quite open about some of his abusive behaviour. In the dining hall he approached boys from behind and simulated intercourse with them, causing laughter. HIA 374 wrote:

> "I only had a problem with one member of staff while I was there. I cannot remember his name but his nickname was 'Punchy'. He was a small man, stout with big lips. I will always remember his face. He worked in the laundry and once a week I had to bring my laundry down to be washed. He used to put his arms round me and try to kiss me. I could feel his erection against my body and he bent me over the washing machines and simulated sex with me. This was not a joke to him and he meant everything that he was doing."[234]

229 MIL 020.
230 Day 179, p.17.
231 MIL 044.
232 Day 178, pp.66 and 74.
233 MIL 836.
234 MIL 050.

In a statement to police he added that Officer Skillen had "fair hair, which was combed over" and that he:

> "would kiss at my face and slabber over me. This happened many times while I was at Millisle".[235]

In oral evidence HIA 374 said that he found the experience devastating, and it was repeated whenever he visited the laundry.[236]

138 HIA 416 went to the laundry one lunchtime to obtain a new jacket, as he thought Officer Skillen would be absent then:

> "There was a boy who worked in the laundry and I heard him shout 'Punchy, he is stealing jackets, get him, get him'. Punchy Skillen was the main guy in the laundry and he had a bad reputation. He made us call him boss. He would always punch you when you walked past him. Punchy then came in and closed the door and told me that I was going to get my star burst. Two boys held me over the press. Punchy then took my trousers down [leaving the underwear on] and shoved the shaft of a brush up my backside. After this I never went back near the laundry. I have never spoken to anyone about [this] incident."[237]

ML 56 reported that when he was trying on new jeans Officer Skillen head-butted him and stuck his finger up his back passage, causing him serious medical difficulties for some time afterwards entailing hospital care and a minor operation.[238]

139 Desmond Skillen was a practising Roman Catholic and HIA 416 said that, as a Catholic, he was particularly upset that Officer Skillen was prepared to assault a Catholic boy in this way. Officer Skillen escorted trainees to Mass. HIA 416 spoke of an occasion when he was present, recalling that Officer Skillen was enraged when two boys absconded at the end of Mass.[239] HIA 416 said that Officer Skillen "was even cursing. 'How dare they escape from the Lord's house?'"[240]

140 It is clear that Officer Skillen had a reputation among the trainees for physical abuse, sexual abuse (usually, but not always, in the form of a joke) and emotional abuse, in the humiliation of the boys he was attacking.

235 MIL 30187.
236 Day 179, p.45.
237 MIL 072.
238 MIL 836.
239 MIL 073.
240 Day 180, pp.17 and 18.

Although allegations were made against other officers, he stood out as the man whom the trainees feared. Officer LN 20 said he had heard of Officer Skillen's reputation, both from conversation with colleagues and from trainees who had been returned to the closed section where he worked, as they warned newcomers to avoid Officer Skillen.[241]

141 MZ 1, who was then a senior officer, said that Officer Skillen was known for being "a bit rough" with the trainees:

> "...on one occasion I heard from a member of staff that he had done something. He had I think hit or clashed somebody...and I said to him, 'You know, ...you would need to watch yourself, because this is not acceptable. You can't go around doing these things, because you are going to finish up in a lot of bother', and his idea was, 'Oh well', and I said, 'Well I am telling you, you just cannot do it.'"[242]

MZ 1 also told the chief officer, whose response was lackadaisical. He added that there would have been "Hell to play [sic] if the" number one" (that is, the governor) had known."[243]

142 Clearly Governor McLaughlan should have been informed. His predecessor had received a direct complaint about Officer Skillen from HIA 272 and his chief officer had received a complaint from another trainee, HIA 374, as well as from senior officer MZ 1. In a closed community such as a borstal Officer Skillen's behaviour would have been widely discussed, as LN 20 reported, and it would have been most unusual if more of Officer Skillen's exploits had not been passed on to senior staff. They clearly would not have known of some of the specific incidents described above, such as that recounted by HIA 416, but they should have been sufficiently aware of his unusual behaviour to know that his conduct was more than comical. He was clearly unsuited to the work.

143 Nonetheless, despite the physical, sexual and emotional abuse which Officer Skillen inflicted, Duncan McLaughlan said that he was quite unaware of it and he wrote that:

> "It would be unwise in the extreme for any prison governor to believe that he knew everything that went on in his establishment...or to maintain that every member of his staff was incapable of inflicting abuse on an inmate. ...I cannot therefore make any informed comment > on the veracity of the allegations that have been made. If any one of those allegations is found to have substance then that behaviour was in direct contravention of the policies in place at the time and of my belief of how those under my care should be treated."[244]

241 Day 181, p.75.
242 Day 181, pp.35 and 36.
243 Day 181, pp.38 and 40.

In discussion of the failure of his staff to report Officer's Skillen's abuse of trainees, he added:

> "The culture of the Prison Service would be that you don't inform on your mates."[245]

144 It may be understandable that for a variety of human reasons officers failed to report Officer Skillen's behaviour, that senior officers failed to inform the governor, and that he failed to take decisive action. Whether understandable or not, the outcome was unacceptable. A number of trainees were physically and/or sexually attacked by Officer Skillen or were publicly humiliated by him, such that trainees generally were frightened of him and warned others to avoid him. Most of the witnesses alleging abuse by Officer Skillen were at Millisle during Governor McLaughlan's time; if his predecessor had taken action, therefore, trainees at a later date might well have avoided Officer Skillen's attentions.

145 We consider Officer Skillen's behaviour to have been systemically abusive.

146 In relation to the staff failure to report Officer Skillen's behaviour to senior staff, the Department of Justice argued that it would be "to misdescribe the nature of their failure to label it as a systems failure. Instead this was a people failure - a failure on the part of the officers to carry out what they knew to be their duty."[246] Clearly, whilst the individuals involved carry personal responsibility for such failure, the systems for which the Department's predecessors were responsible were not simply the mechanisms of identifying the people to whom such misconduct should be reported, but also the instilling of the values and attitudes in the staff that turn such a framework into good practice. To blame the staff is to abdicate such a responsibility. We therefore consider it a systemic failure that at times information about Officer Skillen and his misconduct failed to reach senior officers who could have taken action, and that when it did reach them, as reported in the evidence, they failed to take action.

244 MIL 723.
245 Day 182, p.67.
246 MIL 90082.

(b) Allegations of physical abuse recorded in the documentation

147 There were six instances identified in the records where allegations of physical abuse were made against staff, none of which related to any of the matters raised by applicants to the Inquiry.

148 In February 1962 allegations were made by a trainee's sister that he had been badly beaten by his housemaster; they were investigated and despite the bruising described by the sister the allegations were found to be unsubstantiated.[247]

149 In January 1963 a number of allegations were made by several trainees against ML 32, who was suspended. The allegations were investigated thoroughly, but again they were felt to be largely unsubstantiated, though action was taken by the Governor concerning ML 32's "lack of tact which was provocative to these trainees".[248]

150 On 17 January 1966 a teacher (Mr Anderson) asked ML 38 to remove a trainee from his class. The trainee complained about the assault he suffered while being placed in a cell. The Governor's investigations of allegations of assault against ML 38 were inconclusive, and no action was taken. As usual, the matter was reported to the Ministry.[249]

151 On 28 October 1971 the trainees refused to go to their dormitories after a concert on the grounds of "the brutality of the staff". The protest continued until lunchtime the following day. The Governor promised to listen to any trainee who brought him evidence of ill treatment, but in further discussions the points raised by trainees were their wish to wear their hair longer and have shorter sentences, as in English borstals.[250]

152 In 1975 a mother complained that her son had been assaulted, but there are no records of the investigation.[251]

153 It should be noted that these earlier instances do not suggest a pattern of systemic abuse. With the possible exception of the 1975 complaint, the allegations seem to have been properly investigated. A total of six incidents in the course of nearly twenty years is not exceptional, and the incident in 1971 indicates both the potential volatility of the clientele and the successful handling of the incident by the senior staff, who resolved it without serious injury.

247 MIL 128, 620-624.
248 MIL 128, 625-684.
249 MIL 129, 685-700.
250 MIL 25768.
251 MIL 130, 704, 715.

154 Two common factors are, however, noteworthy. The first is that physical assault was the common factor in most of the complaints. This continued to be the case in the allegations made by witnesses who came forward to the Inquiry. The second is that, with the possible exception of the action taken concerning ML 32, none of the complaints about physical abuse resulted in external investigation or action, despite the reported injuries.

155 There was one further alleged assault, not long before the closure of Millisle. A trainee who was not an applicant to the Inquiry alleged that he had been assaulted by two officers. The Governor immediately reported the matter to the police and suspended one of the officers, the other having gone off duty. He also noted the incident in the governor's log for 14 May 1980.[252] There was a police investigation, and the two officers were prosecuted but were found not guilty. They were transferred to work at Belfast Prison.[253]

156 Although this must have been a serious and most unusual matter in the management of the borstal, we were surprised that Duncan McLaughlan, who was Governor at the time, stated in oral evidence that he had no recollection of the occasion.[254] The significance of this occasion is that it was the first time that an incident was reported to police and was fully investigated by an external agency.

(c) Allegations of physical abuse made by applicants in their statements or oral evidence

157 Six of the ten applicants were discharged from Millisle during its last fifteen months, that is from October 1978 onwards. There are two main deductions that we draw from this. The first is that there were only four people who applied to be applicants who had been at Millisle during the preceding twenty-two years between the opening of the borstal in 1956 and 1978. Three of those were former trainees who made allegations against Officer Skillen in the mid-1970s, and only one other officer was named as abusive in this period.

158 The second deduction is that abusive conduct on the part of the officers increased in the final period prior to closure. It is always difficult to manage the closure of a residential establishment, and there may have been concerns for the future placement of the trainees and the redeployment of the staff. Both of these factors could have contributed to tensions resulting in difficult behaviour on the part of the trainees and misconduct on the part of the staff. Three of these six witnesses named Officer Skillen as their abuser, but between them they identified seven other officers as people who had physically abused them. None of these officers was named by more than one witness, but the sudden increase in allegations suggests that there were problems in Millisle's final months.

252 MIL 130, 703, 748, 755-756.
253 MIL 25021, 25025.
254 Day 182, p. 81.

159 HIA 248 said:

> "There was a lot of physical abuse at Millisle. The staff were very aggressive and they physically punished us by slapping and kicking us if we did not do what we were told."[255]

Of two brothers on the staff he said:

> "They punched, kicked and slapped all the inmates if, for example, your cell wasn't clean or if it wasn't kept in the order they expected."[256]

160 An officer insisted that HIA 416 should shave; when the boy explained that he did not need to shave as he did not have any hair to shave, the officer smacked his face and said that he was to do as he was told.[257]

161 HIA 294 alleged that his Class Officer, ML 7, was "fond of lifting his hand" to him and punched him in the stomach and kidneys.[258] There was also an occasion when he was severely physically abused by the PE Instructor, ML 14 when he was:

> "kneeling down, like just putting my gutty on or something or taking it off, and I got this big mighty blow in the lung, which I don't know if it's cancerous or it's just a lesion, you know what I mean. ...But I reckon he done that with that blow cos I couldn't breathe nothing and me [sic] pride wouldn't make me cry or not in front of the other fellows, you know... ."[259]

He told the police that the officer (ML 14) found it funny.[260] ML 14 denied ever hitting any inmate at Millisle.[261] This is the only example of a specific allegation of excessive violence.

255 MIL 055.
256 MIL 055.
257 MIL 071, 799.
258 MIL 30078.
259 MIL 065.
260 MIL 30078.
261 MIL 30081.

162 The evidence in this section is supported by other passing references to physical discipline not quoted in this chapter, such as casual slapping reported in descriptions of other matters.[262]

163 While there may have been occasional instances of excessive force such as that described by HIA 294, it seems that the predominant problem was the prevalence of lower level violence in the assertion of authority through slapping, kicking and punching, as described already in the section on admission to the closed unit. We accepted that there was low-level violence in the closed unit between 1977 and 1980. This was contrary to Governor McLaughlan's instructions and may have reflected working practices introduced by prison officers from other prisons in the early months of the closed section, but it was unacceptable and we concluded that it constituted systemic abuse. (C.f. para. 50) The evidence in this section re-inforces that conclusion. It is our further conclusion that on occasion low-level physical abuse was also reported in the open borstal, and that this was also systemic abuse.

(d) Complaints

164 There was no formal complaints system, but a trainee could submit a petition to the Department on any matter although that petition was open to the scrutiny of the Governor.[263] We encountered no evidence of such petitions. Technically, "a trainee could make a complaint, request or allegation at any time".[264] Duncan McLaughlan recalled that:

> "Complaints and requests were generally about issues such as work allocation, not getting promotion to the next grade or requests for an extra visit. I do not now recall any allegations from trainees about abusive treatment from staff during my time as Governor in Millisle…".[265]

165 Any trainee could ask to see the governor (or the senior officer deputising for him) at the morning parade, when requests were also made to see the doctor or chaplain. The witnesses have indicated that they thought highly of the successive governors as being supportive and humane, and when they did complain, they were often, but not always, listened to. However, witnesses have also expressed scepticism about governors' knowledge of what was really going on within Millisle and about their ability to protect a trainee who made complaints about officers.

262 MIL 071-072.
263 MIL 716.
264 MIL 715.
265 MIL 715.

166 HIA 212 said:

> "I was in one time with the governor. I can't remember what I was charged with,...but the governor turned round and said to me 'Listen', he says, 'if officer whoever his name was says that you were riding up and down on a motorbike I'll believe him".[266]

167 HIA 374 complained about Officer Skillen to a senior member of staff who:

> "was sharp dressed, very presentable looking and had black hair and a black moustache. He simply dismissed what I told him and nothing was done."[267]

In a police interview, HIA 374 added that the senior officer had combed back hair and wore a number of gold rings on his fingers:

> "When I told him about what Punchy did to us in the laundry, he just laughed at me."[268]

168 HIA 272 complained about his treatment on admission by Officer Skillen, and was told that the matter would be investigated. He was then given the dining hall to scrub; having completed this task by lunchtime he was required to scrub it again after lunch. When he told LN 22, an officer, that it had been passed as clean by another officer:

> "He grabbed me by my ear and brought me back to the dining hall leaving black marks on the shiny floor as he went. He kicked the bucket of dirty water over the floor and told me to get it cleaned up by suppertime."[269]

169 He alleges that this continued for a month, and HIA 272 was then given another job, scrubbing the front of the building, with the warning not to look at any of the ladies who worked in the offices. He stated:

> "I was at breaking point at this stage. I complained to one of the staff members, [LN 24] as I felt I was being punished even though I had not done anything wrong. He shrugged his shoulders and said, 'We Officers stick together.' I understood this to mean that my treatment was because I had reported Mr Skillen for assault. After two months of scrubbing, I snapped and refused to do any more. I was reported to the Governor and punished by receiving five days in solitary confinement and 28 days of loss of night time association."[270]

266 Day 178, p.15.
267 MIL 050.
268 MIL 30187.
269 MIL 010.
270 MIL 010-011.

170 Complaints to senior officers were generally unsuccessful. In a closed community such as a prison or borstal there are often strong bonds of mutual reliance within the staff team, and it is unsurprising if complaints resulted in further repression as staff backed each other up. Even those officers who were considered the most supportive by the trainees will probably have been subject to pressure to turn a blind eye when they saw colleagues acting unprofessionally. Furthermore, officers who were less self-confident possibly looked to their more aggressive colleagues to give a lead in controlling the trainees and creating an atmosphere of conformity. HIA 400 said:

> "There were some prison officers who were very noticeably afraid of the job, and they were afraid of the boys, and they were afraid of the other staff. So they just put their heads down and got the day in".[271]

171 There was therefore a general reluctance to complain on the part of trainees, partly because it was seen as pointless, on the assumption that senior staff would support the officers, and partly because of fear of retaliation if action were taken. HIA 248 also pointed out that in his experience staff violence was not gratuitous, but was punishment for wrongdoing, so that both officers and trainees felt that it was justified.[272]

172 In taking account of the support offered by colleagues to each other, it has to be remembered that the solidarity of the Prison Service community was of great importance to officers throughout much of Millisle's existence, in particular as officers also faced severe external risks because of the Troubles. In 1979, for example, nine officers of varying ranks, a retired officer and his wife were killed by paramilitaries.[273] Some officers chose to live in staff accommodation at Millisle because it was more secure than living in the wider community, where they and their families were subject to the threat of a 'home visit'. Of the officers who gave evidence, MZ 1 had a bomb placed under his car when working in another prison and his family had to move house a dozen times,[274] while LN 20's car was hit by gunfire in an ambush as he left work.[275] Prison officers at Millisle were well aware that some of the trainees would have had close links to paramilitaries, and that there was personal danger in upsetting them.

271 Day 179, p.33.
272 Day 180, p.57.
273 MIL 567.
274 Day 181, p.6.
275 Day 181, p. 60.

173 It is against this background that the management of allegations against individual officers has to be considered. There were several mechanisms which could be used - a petition to the Northern Ireland Office, a request to speak confidentially to a Visiting Committee member, or an approach to the governor, doctor or chaplain. The evidence shows that the pressures placed on trainees rendered all these mechanisms ineffective in dealing with serious allegations of abuse by officers. Even when senior officers were approached, trainees' complaints were usually dismissed.

174 The collusion of officers in concealing abuse and poor practice was contrary to the standards which the governors promulgated and would in normal circumstances have been quite unacceptable. Taking into account the external pressures at that time it is unsurprising that officers behaved in this way, but that does not detract from the justification of the allegations made by former trainees. The Prison Service complaints system whereby trainees could address complaints to the governor, the Visiting Committee or the Department was undermined by the pressures exerted by prison officers and rendered largely ineffective, and we consider this to have been a systemic failure.

(e) Allegation of sexual abuse

175 HIA 248 said that ML 2, one of the nightwatchmen, befriended him, providing him with cough sweets. On a couple of occasions ML 2 put his hands under HIA 248's bedding and started to feel his private area, which left HIA 248 feeling "very uncomfortable and afraid". His bed was in the corner of the dormitory and could not be seen easily by other boys.[276]

176 This is the only instance of sexual abuse other than those concerning Officer Skillen. The nightwatchman was also the only member of staff against whom allegations have been made who was not an officer. He has not been identified.[277] His misconduct appears to have been an isolated event; it was not reported and would not have been known to other staff; it cannot therefore be considered systemic abuse.

177 William Edmonds was a Prison Officer who joined the service in November 1975. He undertook specialist training and was appointed Hospital Officer in May 1976. Dr Denis Elliott was Senior Prison Medical Officer at Magilligan Prison, where he came across William Edmonds and concluded that he had homosexual tendencies. When William Edmonds was placed on a provisional basis at Millisle in December 1976, Dr Elliott expressed alarm as he thought William Edmonds was unsuited to work at Millisle, and he contacted his Governor, Mr Cunningham, the Chief Medical Officer (Prisons) and the Prisons Department, to voice his concern.[278] William Edmonds was confirmed in post in March 1977, and in May 1977 Dr Elliott contacted them again to reiterate his concern.[279]

276 MIL 056.
277 MIL 096.

178 Although his assessment later proved to be accurate, Dr Elliott had no firm evidence that William Edmonds was homosexual, but was making a judgement based on the impression which William Edmonds made on him. Nor did he have any information to suggest that William Edmonds's work was unsatisfactory, nor that he posed a sexual threat to the inmates. Dr McKeown, Principal Medical Officer at the Department of Health and Social Services (which had administrative responsibility for prison health services), contacted Mr Gerard David Thompson, a Prison Staffing Officer, to raise the issue, but in the absence of any evidence that could be put in writing, Mr Thompson pointed out that no action could be taken.[280]

179 No allegations of improper conduct were made concerning William Edmonds's time at Millisle, and he left in August 1979. William Edmonds subsequently had homosexual relations with HIA 531, who explicitly stated that William Edmonds "didn't do anything" to him while he was in Millisle.[281] William Edmonds himself later volunteered that he had committed an act of gross indecency in the surgery with HIA 531 and had twice tried to masturbate him at Millisle.[282] This was not known to his colleagues in Millisle, and we do not consider these incidents to be symptomatic of systemic abuse.

180 The Department of Justice have argued that any allegation of sexual abuse would have led to disciplinary action, and that they acted properly in the way that William Edmonds's case was handled, as there was no evidence that William Edmonds posed any threat of sexual abuse to the inmates, and in any case there were no grounds for being suspicious about a member of staff on the grounds that he was a homosexual.[283] [284] We agree that the Department of Justice acted correctly.

278 KIN 108013.
279 Day 212, p.45.
280 Day 212, p.48.
281 Day 212, p.49.
282 KIN 4028.
283 Day 212, p.55.
284 KIN 4030.

(f) Allegations of emotional abuse

181 The evidence provided by the witnesses included few examples of emotional abuse unconnected to physical or sexual abuse, but much of the alleged abuse had strong emotional overtones, such as the atmosphere of fear created by perceptions that physical abuse could be perpetrated by bullies at any time, or the humiliation associated with Officer Skillen's mock-sexual activities. Several witnesses described attempts by officers to humiliate them, such as an incident in the dining room when HIA 400 was taunted, he felt, to make him react and lose special privileges.[285] Indeed, the emotional associations of such incidents frequently had more severe and much more long-lasting impact than the immediate physical pain experienced by the victims. HIA 400 said that it was a constant struggle to face the fear caused by not knowing what would happen next.[286]

182 Although the overall aims of the borstal system were commendable in their wish to offer positive opportunities for trainees to obtain skills which would help them obtain employment, for example the introductory training in the closed section was designed to control them, to depersonalise them and to break them if necessary, by insisting on the completion of pointless tasks, and inflicting humiliation and minor violence at times to ensure compliance. This amounted to emotional abuse.

183 The emotional impact of the training methods in the closed unit and the emotional damage associated with physical abuse constituted systemic abuse.

(g) Conclusions concerning allegations of abuse by staff

184 Among the trainees there were many with long histories of offending, and some were capable of violence. As noted above, only one applicant had been admitted directly to Millisle with no previous experience of life in a training school or children's home. Indeed, all the other nine applicants made allegations primarily about one or more of the other establishments where they had been resident and their complaints about Millisle were often brief. Borstal officers were expected to be firm, and to be in control, and it is understandable therefore that they took measures to assert their authority. Excepting the allegations concerning Officer Skillen, almost all of the allegations were against prison officers and concerned physical abuse resulting from measures to exercise control. There was only one allegation of sexual abuse.

285 Day 179, p.23.
286 Day 179, p.25.

185 Overall, the evidence presents a picture of an institution where some staff were highly thought of by the witnesses, most were seen as doing a reasonable job, and a small number were considered to have overstepped the mark in their methods of control, creating an unduly harsh and violent atmosphere, with random acts of unwarranted cruelty. Although a handful of staff were named by witnesses, Officer Skillen stood out, and was mentioned by six of the ten witnesses.

186 It was not necessary for staff to resort to abusive measures in order to remain in control, and there are instances in the evidence we have received in the course of the Inquiry where witnesses described conditions in borstals or prisons as firm or even harsh, but fair and not abusive.[287] LN 20 said that Governor McLaughlan was quite explicit to new staff that anyone assaulting trainees would be dismissed on the spot.[288] The slapping, punching, kicking and beating described by witnesses was unnecessary, contrary to Prison Rules and the Governor's policy, and unacceptable. In all, the evidence and the records indicate that over twenty trainees (or their families on their behalf) made allegations of physical abuse, either in the past or to this Inquiry, and they were justified in raising their complaints.

Peer Abuse

187 The records contain a reference to a trainee making an allegation of indecency against another trainee. This occurred in 1961 and was reported to the Visiting Committee as the reason for the victim's absconding. It appears that acts of a sexual nature had taken place in the dormitory which the two trainees shared and during a crowded film show. The Governor requested that the perpetrator should be removed to another establishment and expressed his regret, as he was "confident that little, or no, indecency existed at this Establishment".[289]

188 A Special Visiting Committee meeting took place on 9 September 1971 to address a further attempted indecent act against a trainee, which had taken place on 2 September. As a result, three trainees each suffered a number of penalties, including forfeiture of privileges, loss of pay and six strokes of the cane, as Committee members:

287 MIL 009.
288 Day 181, pp.77 and 78.
289 MIL 129.

> "expressed their opinion that it was the most unpleasant offence which they had been called upon to deal with...".[290]

The trainees were caned the same day, and the Governor informed the Ministry of Home Affairs.[291]

189 There were several references in the evidence of the witnesses to both physical and sexual abuse of boys by other trainees, usually by older boys. This is unsurprising in an establishment housing male adolescents and young adults, especially as they had experienced aggressive behaviour on the part of some staff and, in some cases, will have had histories of violence or sexual offending themselves.

190 HIA 416 said that intimidating behaviour was common, and that there was frequent violence between residents. He took various precautions to avoid beatings, but appears to have been in a state of constant fear. He was told that two boys wanted to kill him, but often the harassment was petty but intimidating, such as the constant messing of his bed, which got him into trouble with officers when they inspected the dormitories, resulting in him missing breakfast when he had to remake it. He felt that there was nothing he could do and no one in whom he could confide, though the man who ran his workshop offered him some protection.[292]

191 HIA 272 considered his time at Millisle as being "hell".[293] HIA 400 considered life in Millisle "a daily struggle" and wrote that he:

> "lived in fear not knowing what was going to happen to me from one day to the next".[294]

Other boys bullied HIA 248 but, though the staff turned a blind eye to it, this stopped after a while.[295]

192 HIA 272 recalled peers sexually abusing other trainees, and wrote that:

> "Millisle was rife with sexual predators at night time."[296]

He said he was "aware of people being raped when the lights were out", and heard "another inmate being forced to give oral sex to older

290 MIL 25761.
291 MIL 25763, 25764.
292 MIL 074.
293 MIL 011.
294 MIL 022.
295 MIL 56.
296 MIL 011.

inmates".[297] HIA 212 said that "other inmates would try to get into bed with you." He saw other boys being sexually abused, but he did not let anyone abuse him.[298]

193 In relation to the bullying and sexual abuse which took place at night, the nightwatchman did no more than a head count at regular intervals to ensure that no trainees were missing, checking in at a clock to demonstrate that he had done his rounds.[299] He was reported to have ignored seeing boys in bed with each other or hearing them moaning.[300]

194 The staff coverage at night was much lower than in the daytime, and the nightwatchmen were untrained civilians, rather than Prison Officers. This staffing was insufficient to prevent peer abuse, and the failure to protect trainees was systemic.

Conclusion and Summary of Findings

195 Millisle appears to have been efficiently run and it fulfilled its role in the penal system, both as an open borstal from 1956 to 1977, and from 1977 to 1980 when it had both open and closed units. It is not known how many trainees spent time at Millisle, but the existence of over a thousand 'dead' files in 1977 suggests that the total must have been around fifteen hundred. The total number of former trainees who have come forward to the Inquiry is therefore small in relation to the number who were accommodated at Millisle, and during its first twenty-two years only four applicants came forward with allegations. The primary complaints of nine of the ten applicants were about other residential establishments, and their main concern at Millisle was Officer Skillen's conduct. In short, if Officer Skillen's abuse is excluded, there were few complaints about Millisle, but that does not mean that the issues identified as systemic failures should be overlooked.

196 Millisle probably inherited a tradition of firm and tough treatment of the trainees from its predecessor at Malone and many of its staff were drafted from prisons, bringing the practices and approach to the work which they had learnt elsewhere. Trainees who avoided trouble appear to have been able to accept the spartan style of life and institutional demands for obedience and conformity. Those who did not conform, or who stood their ground, appear

297 MIL 011.
298 MIL 081.
299 Day 178, pp.17 and 55.
300 Day 180, p.41.

to have been met with rougher responses which were at times unacceptably violent, particularly in the last years before Millisle closed.

197 There were clearly witnesses who suffered from their experiences at Millisle. Looking back, HIA 416 concluded:

> "I feel like I have to reinvent myself. I did not get a good start in life and my experience as a young boy in Millisle was a brutal one. ...When I got out of borstal, I had so much anger inside me. I had become moulded into a hardened character."[301]

HIA 248 said:

> "I found this a difficult and isolating time. I never felt safe there because of the constant fear of violence. I lost all contact with my foster family. There was no-one I could talk to about my experiences. ...I was always very guarded with my emotions."[302]

HIA 272 said:

> "I just feel that if I had been treated like a human being I would have stayed and finished off my time. I was treated like an animal from day one from [when] I complained. I was not given a chance".[303]

198 In his responses concerning individual witnesses, Stephen Davis wrote on behalf of the Northern Ireland Prison Service:

> "The Department condemns without reservation any act of abuse which may have been perpetrated against any individual at Millisle Borstal. Those who were placed in that facility had every right to expect that they would be cared for with dignity and respect, treated compassionately and protected from abuse. Those who operated the Millisle Borstal facility on a day-to-day basis or who were responsible for its management, ought to have been fully aware of the high standards expected of them when caring for young people. They should have known that acts of physical, sexual or emotional abuse were unacceptable. They ought to have known that allegations of abuse, where they were raised, should have been reported to the appropriate authorities. If such abuse occurred, the Department would condemn the perpetrators of it as well as anyone who may have ignored the abuse or tolerated its occurrence." [304]

301 MIL 075.
302 MIL 056.
303 Day 178, p.51.
304 MIL 810.

199 The following are our conclusions concerning systemic abuse.

200 We accept that there was on occasion low-level violence in the closed unit between 1977 and 1980. This was contrary to Governor McLaughlan's instructions and may have reflected working practices introduced by prison officers from other prisons in the early months of the closed section, but it was unacceptable and constituted systemic abuse. (Para. 50) It is our further conclusion that on occasion low-level physical abuse was also reported in the open borstal, and that this was also systemic abuse.

201 We consider Officer Skillen's behaviour to have been systemically abusive.

202 We also consider it a systemic failure that at times information about Officer Skillen and his misconduct failed to reach senior officers who could have taken action, and that when it did reach them, as reported in the evidence, they failed to take action.

203 The Prison Service complaints system whereby trainees could address complaints to the Governor, the Visiting Committee or the Department was undermined by the pressures exerted by prison officers and rendered largely ineffective, and we consider this to have been a systemic failure.

204 The emotional impact of the training methods in the closed unit and the emotional damage associated with physical abuse constituted systemic abuse.

205 The night staffing was insufficient to prevent peer abuse, and the failure to protect trainees was systemic.

Chapter 18:

Module 11 – St Joseph's Training School, Middletown

Introduction

1 In Module 11 we considered evidence about St Joseph's Training School (St Joseph's) which was run by a Roman Catholic congregation, the Sisters of St Louis. Module 11 commenced on 8 February 2016 and concluded on 22 February 2016. We received evidence from sixteen former residents of the school, five of whom gave evidence in person during Module 11: HIA 203; HIA 178; HIA 161; HIA 198; and HIA 376.

2 The statements of two former residents, HIA 249 and HIA 176, were summarised and read out during Module 11 because they were unable for medical reasons to give evidence in person. We also took into account statements from three former residents of St Joseph's who wanted to tell us about their positive memories of the care they received in the school: SJM 73; SJM 74; and SJM 75.

3 Two former residents, HIA 49 (Day 9) and HIA 233 (Day 16) gave evidence in person about their time in St Joseph's during Module 1, which dealt with children's homes in Londonderry run by the Sisters of Nazareth. Four other former residents - HIA 124 (Day 96), HIA 195 (Day 101), HIA 175 (Day 100), and HIA 84 (Day 109) - gave evidence in person about their time in St Joseph's during Module 4, which dealt with children's homes in Belfast run by the Sisters of Nazareth.

4 During Module 11 we heard evidence in person from four nuns who worked in St Joseph's: SR 235, SR 234, SR 247 and Sister Canice Durkan. We considered helpful statements from SR 240 who was the Director of St Joseph's for almost thirty years from 1972 to 2000. Unfortunately SR 240 was unable for medical reasons to give evidence in person. We also considered a statement from SR 254. In addition to these statements the Sisters of St Louis provided written responses to the statements of former residents and related contemporaneous documentation.

5 A former member of lay staff of St Joseph's, SJM 4, provided a statement in response to allegations made against her and a written closing submission. SJM 56, who was HIA 176's social worker when she was in St Joseph's, provided a statement about his work with HIA 176.

6 We were assisted in developing our understanding of the establishment and operation of St Joseph's by the access we were given to extensive records relating to the school, which were maintained and retained by the Sisters of St Louis. These included daily logs, visitors' books, punishment books, the minutes of meetings of the Board of Management and quarterly returns about the use of corporal punishment, which were submitted to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA). We were also assisted by police material and civil claim papers in relation to St Joseph's.

7 The Department of Justice (DoJ) provided a general statement about St Joseph's and written responses to the statements provided by former residents. However, it was unable to provide detailed responses to the statements of applicant witnesses born before 1957 as its records for residents of St Joseph's only extend back to those born after that year. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) provided witness statements about the inspection and regulation of St Joseph's.

8 The Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) provided a general statement about St Joseph's and written responses and background documentation about the involvement that any of its predecessor bodies had in the care of applicant witnesses.

9 The Sisters of St Louis, the DoJ, HSCB and the DHSSPS also provided written closing submissions. We are grateful for the evidence all witnesses provided for this module and the assistance it gave us in considering whether there were systemic failings in the care provided in St. Joseph's.

The Sisters of St Louis

10 The origins of the Sisters of St Louis can be traced back to 1797 in Turkenstein, near Strasbourg, when Abbé Louis Joseph Colmar, Marie Madeline Louise Humann, and Thérèse Brek signed a spiritual act of union. In 1842, a priest named Louis Bautain, influenced by the trio's spiritual path, officially founded the Institute of St Louis, in Juilly outside Paris, to promote Christian education for young people. The Institute of men and women was approved by the Vatican in July 1844, but by 1850 the priests disbanded, leaving the sisters remaining in the order.

11 In 1859, Mother Genevieve led the first group of sisters to Ireland. The sisters came to Ireland at the request of the Bishop of Clogher to open a reformatory in Monaghan town to care for deprived children. Two years later, the Irish foundation separated from the French Institute on the Bishop's orders, as he did not wish it to continue to be governed from France.

12 For the next nine decades the Irish and French Institutes expanded separately across Ireland and France. In 1903, the first Belgian foundation was established by the French Institute, and in 1912, the first English foundation was established from Ireland. However, by the end of the Second World War numbers in the French Institute had declined significantly, and in 1952 it amalgamated with the St Louis Institute in Ireland.

Establishment of St Joseph's

13 The Sisters of St Louis came to Middletown, County Armagh, in 1875. The foundation of St Joseph's was laid in 1876 at a site approximately ten miles south-west of Armagh city on the fringe of the village of Middletown. A convent and an industrial school/orphanage were opened on 25 June 1881. St Joseph's was the second industrial school to be opened in Ireland and its operation and management was governed by the Industrial Schools (Ireland) Act 1868 and subsequently the Children and Young Persons Act 1908.

14 Eight girls were admitted to the school on the day it opened and came from as far apart as Dublin, Belfast and Donegal. The admission records for the first group of children described most of them as "destitute orphans found begging", and many were as young as four years of age.[1]

15 Over the next 50 years there was extensive development of the site with the establishment of a private boarding school and a primary school. With the partition of Ireland, admissions of children from the Republic of Ireland virtually ceased. In 1942 the Sisters of St Louis decided to close the boarding school and concentrate their efforts on the industrial school/orphanage.

16 In 1950 the MoHA invited St Joseph's to become a training school, within the terms of the Children and Young Person's Act (Northern Ireland) 1950. This invitation was accepted and the industrial school/orphanage was closed, although, the children who were resident in it at that time remained in St Joseph's until they reached adulthood or were discharged. Two of these former residents, HIA 249 and HIA 178, gave evidence to the Inquiry.

1 LSN 266.

Governance of St Joseph's

17 St Joseph's was established as a training school under the terms of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 and the associated Training School Rules (Northern Ireland) 1952 and subsequently the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968. In 1950, the trustees of St Joseph's who were members of the Congregation of St Louis and the Archbishop of Armagh entered into a Deed of Trust with the MoHA. This Deed of Trust formed the basis of the governance arrangements for the school.[2]

18 Registration as a training school was subject to a number of conditions including the establishment of a Board of Management.[3] The Board of Management established for St Joseph's included representatives of the Trustees of St Joseph's, members of the Congregation of St Louis and local clergy appointed by the Archbishop of Armagh in his capacity as trustee.[4] While the Board of Management had responsibility for maintaining, managing and controlling the school it was answerable to the trustees of St Joseph's.

19 The other conditions of registration were that no children would be admitted to the school on a voluntary basis and the school would not refuse to take a child placed there by a court order. Since St Joseph's was meeting a statutory need the MoHA agreed to meet 100% of the revenue expenditure for the school.[5]

20 It is clear from contemporaneous correspondence that by September 1964 officials in the MoHA were becoming concerned about the operation of the school and the lack of oversight by the Board of Management. Officials raised these concerns with Cardinal Conway, the then Archbishop of Armagh, at a meeting with him in September 1964 to discuss various matters relating to the care of deprived children. Mr Parkes, of the MoHA, reiterated these concerns in writing to Cardinal Conway in a letter dated 15 November 1965. He wrote, that despite the devoted efforts of it staff, St Joseph's was:

> "…tending rather to lag behind current developments in the Training School service"

2 SJM 22717.
3 SJM 26372.
4 SJM 22718.
5 SJM 26372.

and that officials were having:

> "...difficulty in persuading the Manager [who was then SR 237] to be a little more progressive and adventurous in outlook."[6]

21 Mr Parkes also pointed out that since the school was funded entirely from public funds it was required by law to be under the control of a Board of Management, which, in addition to controlling the general policy of the school, should take a personal interest in many aspects of the welfare of the girls. He stated that in practice officials found:

> "...that the Board has played virtually no part in any aspect in the life of the school."[7]

22 Mr Parkes explained that he was approaching the cardinal for his assistance because the Board of Management of St Joseph's was seeking funding for recreation and classroom accommodation, which the MoHA was reluctant to provide without a complete reappraisal of the operation of the school. He indicated that a further consideration for the MoHA was that it had recently received a tentative proposal from the Good Shepherd Order to establish a training school for girls in Belfast. In relation to this development, Mr Parkes explained that officials were keen to have the Church's view on this matter as the Ministry was not well placed to take a decision should the need arise:

> "...which may involve a choice between the possibly conflicting claims of the St. Louis and Good Shepherd Orders."[8]

23 Cardinal Conway responded by letter on 27 November 1965[9] and suggested a meeting with officials in December 1965. However, it is clear from a further letter from Mr Parkes to the cardinal in May 1966 that for some reason the proposed meeting in December 1965 did not go ahead.

24 In this subsequent letter of 4 May 1966, Mr Parkes reiterated officials' concerns about the operation of St Joseph's and explained that following a meeting the previous week with the Reverend Mother of Middletown convent, the secretary of the Board of Management and the director of the school SR 237, officials were minded to consider immediate funding of temporary additional accommodation on the clear understanding that a

6 SJM 28224.
7 SJM 28224.
8 SJM 28224.
9 SJM 28226.

complete re-assessment would be made of the method of caring for the girls in St Joseph's.[10]

25 Mr Parkes concluded his letter by raising again the suggestion from the Good Shepherd Order that it should provide training school facilities in Belfast. He reaffirmed that the views of the Catholic Church would be of paramount importance in determining the provision of training school accommodation for Catholic girls in Northern Ireland.[11]

26 Cardinal Conway responded in writing on 18 May 1966. He confirmed he had discussions with the Mother General of the Order of St Louis and had agreed to assist in providing "new blood" for the Board of Management of St Joseph's and that the refreshed Board would be tasked to undertake a reappraisal of the methods used in the school. He indicated that this reappraisal would be informed by consideration of the operation of similar establishments in other parts of the United Kingdom. Cardinal Conway also confirmed that the Mother General had agreed that two members of St Joseph's staff would be released for relevant professional training in 1968, two in 1969 and one or two in 1970.[12]

27 These undertakings were sufficient to reassure the MoHA and it agreed to invest capital funding in the renovation and extension of facilities in St Joseph's. It also agreed to fund the establishment and operation of a pre-release/after care unit in Belfast linked to St Joseph's and run by the Sisters of St Louis.

28 However, the MoHA decided that some safeguards were required in order to justify the 100% public funding of capital expenditure by a voluntary organisation. Consequently in May 1972 an indenture between the Board of Management and its successor or successors and the MoHA was drawn up.[13] This indenture included the safeguards that the property would be vested and that the trustees would undertake to manage the school and in the event of mismanagement or a withdrawal from the work the trustees would repay all monies granted.[14] The Government for its part undertook to maintain St Joseph's as a training school and not to change its use or role arbitrarily.[15]

10 SJM 28227.
11 SJM 28228.
12 SJM 28229.
13 SJM 22741
14 SJM 26373
15 SJM 26374

29 In relation to the MoHA's concerns about the Board of Management's lack of involvement in the school, Sister Canice Durkan confirmed on behalf of the Sisters of St Louis that from the mid-1960s, the Board played a more active role in the management of the school.[16] We noted from the minutes of meetings of the Board of Management that from that time it met at least quarterly and its sub-committees, which dealt with matters such as staffing, finance and licensing of girls, met more regularly. It was also clear from the minutes that the Board of Management contributed to the development of policy for the care of the girls and the handling of disciplinary matters.

Development of St Joseph's

30 One of the first members of St Joseph's staff sent on professional qualifying training as a result of the interventions by the MoHA and Cardinal Conway was SR 240 who had commenced working in St Joseph's in 1967. SR 240 completed a Diploma in Social Work in Leicester University in 1968 and returned to St Joseph's where she was appointed deputy director in 1969 and then promoted to the role of director in 1972. She remained as director for almost thirty years until the school closed in 2000 and it is clear from the evidence we have heard that she played a major role in modernising the school and developing a child-centred ethos that underpinned all areas of its operation.

31 An early example of the impact SR 240 had on the development of the school was the successful negotiations she initiated with the MoHA about how the school should be renovated and extended. Prior to the renovations the living, school and administrative accommodation for the training school were housed in one building. The sleeping facilities consisted of three dormitories, each accommodating eleven or twelve girls. Girls were allocated to the dormitories which were designated for senior, intermediate and junior girls according to their age. The Sisters of St Louis told us that the MoHA proposed that one block should be built to replace this accommodation and should include a large central kitchen and communal bathroom facilities but that SR 240 successfully insisted that four smaller house units should be built, to mirror, as far as possible, a family home.[17]

16 SJM 22718.
17 SJM 30107.

32 These units were built in two blocks. Each block contained two units which were linked together by a connecting corridor at ground and first floor levels. Each unit was self-contained and consisted of single bedrooms, bathrooms, a kitchen and a living room. The original training school building was adapted to become the main school building and administrative block.

33 The units were called La Sallette, Lourdes, Fatima and Banneux[18] but became known by staff and girls as Houses 1, 2, 3 and 4 and that is how we will refer to them in this report. House 1 was a reception, assessment and short-term unit. Houses 2, 3 and 4 were long-term units.[19] SR 235 told us that the houses had different cultures and regimes. Girls who were assessed as needing a more regimented approach were allocated to House 2, while a more relaxed approach was adopted in House 3 and House 4 and girls were given more freedom in those houses. Each house usually accommodated up to eight girls, but when emergency admissions were required they could accommodate ten girls.

34 In the early 1970s additional staff accommodation, a swimming pool, a games hall and a modern bungalow were added. The bungalow was used as an Independence Training Unit, to assist girls to prepare for life after care. It supplemented the existing after-care facilities run by the congregation in Belfast, which were housed on the Upper Falls Road and then moved to the Glen Road. The Sisters of St Louis told us that the after-care facilities in Belfast benefitted from a support network of befriending families, voluntary workers, as well as collaboration with voluntary agencies and women's groups. They also benefitted from the services of SJM 44 who from the early 1950s to 1985 acted in a semi-voluntary capacity to assist in arranging jobs and accommodation for girls leaving St Joseph's.

35 The facilities in the school were further extended in August 1988 when the Training Schools Branch of the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) approved a proposal submitted by SR 240 on behalf of the Board of Management of St Joseph's for an Intensive Care Unit (ICU) to be built on the site. SR 240 explained in the proposal that the Board of Management envisaged the ICU being used as:

> "…a temporary respite for a girl or girls who may be emotionally disturbed, suicidal or need space in a confidential setting to express grief, anger etc."[20]

18 SJM 1511.
19 LSN 300-301.
20 SJM 1586.

36 The ICU was built alongside the Independent Training Unit and was connected to it by a corridor. It was designed to accommodate two girls at any one time and staff supervising them. It was 100% funded by the NIO and built in accordance with its blueprint. We will consider evidence about the use of the ICU later in this chapter.

37 In addition to the extension of physical facilities in the school, there were also increases in staffing levels from 1972 onwards, with the appointment of more lay members of staff, and the qualification profile of staff also improved. These improvements were also achieved through SR 240's negotiations with the NIO. SR 234 told us that when she was reviewing St Joseph's records to assist the Inquiry she found letters that SR 240 had sent to successive government departments explaining that because of the increasingly complex emotional needs and behavioural problems of girls, for example self-harming, additional staff and/or staff training were required. She confirmed that the NIO provided necessary funding in response to these requests.[21]

38 With the introduction of the Children's Order in 1995 St Joseph's became known as the St Joseph's Adolescent Centre and it was reorganised to create separate units for girls subject to care and juvenile justice orders. This arrangement continued until St Joseph's closed in 2000. The Sisters of St Louis told us that the decision was taken to close the school because of the complexities of implementing the changes required by the Children's Order 1995 and also the age profile of the sisters managing St Joseph's was increasing and there were no appropriately qualified sisters available to replace them.[22]

Admission of girls to St Joseph's

39 Approximately 1,500 girls were admitted to St Joseph's between the years 1922 and 1995.[23] In the 1950s and 1960s the number of admissions varied between four and thirteen per annum. During the 1970s this number increased and by the 1980s the average number of admissions per year was twenty.[24] Even given this increase, the level of annual admissions to St Joseph's was significantly lower than that experienced in many of the children's homes we have considered.

21 Day 186, p.66.
22 SJM 28263.
23 SJM 22715.
24 SJM 2301.

40 SR 234 told us that it was only occasionally that a girl was admitted directly to the school through a training school order issued by the Juvenile Court as a result of her offending behaviour. She explained that most girls were referred to St Joseph's because their parents or the children's homes they were placed in could not deal with their behaviour.[25] This is borne out by the admission statistics recorded in inspection reports. For example, at the time of the 1987 inspection of the school there were 32 girls on the roll and only one of them was described as a juvenile offender. Sixteen of these girls had come from children's homes. At the time of the 1994 inspection there were 32 girls on the roll; 27 had been placed in the school for care, protection and control reasons and four because of non-school attendance. Eighteen of the girls had previously been resident in one of seven children's homes located across the province.[26]

41 The majority of girls were admitted on a Place of Safety Order for a five week assessment period. The five week assessment period could be extended twice before a girl was either discharged, or a formal training school order was obtained.

42 SR 234 explained that some girls with very complex behavioural problems were sent to St Joseph's as a last resort and, to assist staff with their care, psychologists from the Adolescent Psychology and Research Unit (APRU) maintained regular contact with the school and assessed and worked with these girls. Although SR 234 appreciated this assistance, she commented that if a small psychiatric unit had been available some girls might have been more appropriately assisted in it. Her memory was that there was a small adolescent psychiatric unit in Belfast but that it was always over-subscribed.[27]

Regulation and Inspection of St Joseph's

43 The Children Act 1908 imposed a duty on the MoHA to inspect certified reformatory and industrial schools at least once a year. Industrial schools were required to maintain a record of their use of corporal punishment and as part of the inspection process inspectors checked and signed and dated these records. The dated signatures of inspectors in the punishment records maintained by St Joseph's show that the school was inspected at least annually from 1922 to 1954.[28] The inspection reports for this period record a high level of satisfaction with the condition of the children in the school and the care they were receiving.

25 Day 185, p.6.
26 SJM 2299.
27 Day 186, pp.58 to 59.

44 An early example of such an inspection was that carried out by Mr J McCloy on 13 December 1926. He reported that on the date he visited there were:

> "…43 girls present namely, 40 under detention – of whom 5 were under six years of age – and three who had been admitted pending committal."

45 He recorded that the children appeared to be nourished, were comfortably and neatly clothed, and apparently contented and diligent. He noted that the conduct of the children had been good and that breaches of discipline had been few and the punishments mild.[29] Mr McCloy continued to be impressed with the school when he inspected it during the 1930s. In the report of his inspection in 1931 he recorded:

> "The school continues to be conducted with the usual excellence."[30] and in the report of his 1933 inspection he recorded:

> "The children continue to be very well cared for in all respects."[31]

46 Assistant Inspector Weir inspected the school in October 1944 and reported that the general atmosphere of the home was one which merited praise and that the staff were doing excellent work.[32] Miss Florence Harrison inspected the school in December 1947. She described the sister in charge and her staff as entirely devoted to the children in their care and noted the happy relations that existed between staff and pupils.[33] Mr Weir inspected the school again in January 1949 and commented favourably on the guidance and care the children were receiving.[34]

47 The Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, provided for a power rather than a duty upon the MoHA (and subsequently the NIO) to inspect training schools. The annual inspections continued following the passing of that legislation. For example, Dr Simpson and Miss Forrest

28 SJM 29276.
29 SJM 1488.
30 SJM 1444.
31 SJM 1434.
32 SJM 1379-1380.
33 SJM 1331.
34 SJM 1329.

inspected the school in November 1951 and concluded:

> "The usual happy atmosphere prevailed with everyone going about their tasks cheerfully and quietly. ...The attitude of the staff to the girls shows itself too in the way they speak to them, affectionate, concerned and understanding."[35]

48 There was evidence in contemporaneous documentation of the school responding to matters raised by inspectors, for example providing an update to the MoHA in April 1952 about the progress achieved in completion of repairs and improvements to the home identified as necessary in the report of the inspection carried out in March 1952.[36]

49 It was also apparent from contemporaneous documentation that the inspectors' contact with the school was not limited to annual visits. For example, in 1950, Miss Forrest visited the girls during their summer holiday in Glenariff[37] and in November 1951 Dr Simpson and Miss Forrest visited a girl boarded out from St Joseph's and found she was being well cared for.[38] In the report of the inspection completed in December 1952 there was a reference to Miss Forrest being impressed by the percussion band which she had heard on an earlier visit to the school.[39]

50 Records retained by St Joseph's, including a visitor's book, daily diary, minute book and punishment book, show that MoHA inspectors visited the school on an annual basis from 1955 to 1968, with the exception of 1961.[40] While not all of these contacts were described in the documentation as inspections, they do show that inspectors maintained regular contact with the school. We also noted that HIA 249 who was resident in the school from 1946 to 1958, HIA 178 who was resident in the school from 1949 to 1964, and HIA 203 who was resident in the school from 1964 to 1967[41] all referred in their evidence to inspectors visiting the school.

51 The DHSSPS also pointed us to references in the school's records to contact between the school and Miss Forrest and other MoHA officials from 1971 to 1973 about plans for proposed new buildings.

35 SJM 1300.
36 SJM 1288.
37 SJM 1302.
38 SJM 1299.
39 SJM 1281.
40 SJM 29277.
41 SJM 071, Day 184, p.83; SJM 056.

52 It is also clear, as we have considered above, that when the MoHA became concerned about the operation of the school and the need for an updated approach it took steps to ensure these concerns were addressed.

53 The frequency and format of inspections changed with the establishment of the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS) and the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) in 1972. Dr McCoy told us in Module 7, which dealt with juvenile justice institutions, that the approach taken to inspection of training schools at that time was probably similar to that which applied to voluntary children's homes and that visits would have been informal and infrequent and did not result in the production of detailed reports.[42]

54 A more consistent approach to the regulation and monitoring of training schools was re-established in 1975-76 when as a result of a major reorganisation in SWAG, an inspector, Wesley Donnell, was seconded to the NIO to provide professional social work advice about criminal justice matters including training schools.[43] Mr Donnell told us during Module 7, that as part of this role he visited training schools approximately once a month. He accepted that these visits could not be considered formal inspections but explained that they enabled him to provide professional assistance to the schools and to promote staff training.[44]

55 Sister Canice Durkan confirmed when she gave evidence in person that Mr Donnell visited St Joseph's regularly and that some of these visits were unannounced.[45] Contemporaneous documentation recorded that Mr Donnell's involvement extended to contributing to discussions about the care of individual girls. For example, the policy underpinning the operation of the ICU in St Joseph's included a requirement that where it was envisaged a girl would be kept in the unit for more than 24 hours Mr Donnell would be immediately informed and invited to attend a multi-disciplinary meeting in relation to the placement.[46]

56 We also heard evidence in Module 7 that senior personnel from the NIO's Training Schools Branch maintained regular contact with the training schools and met regularly with staff and representatives from the management boards to discuss policy and administrative matters. We

42 SPT 2000.
43 SPT 3004.
44 SPT 3005.
45 Day 187, p.149.
46 SJM 3530.

accept that officials maintained regular contact with St Joseph's and that the regular visits by Mr Donnell from 1976 onwards would have enabled significant problems in the operation of the school and the care provided to the girls to be identified and addressed. However, a more regular programme of formal inspections did not commence until 1987.

57 We considered the lack of formal inspections in the period from 1968 to 1987 was a systemic failing by the MoHA, and then the NIO, to ensure that St Joseph's was providing proper care and meeting statutory requirements about the operation of training schools.

Regulation of St Joseph's from 1987 onwards

58 The more regular programme of formal inspections of St Joseph's which commenced in 1987 was undertaken on behalf of the NIO by the DHSS's newly formed Social Services Inspectorate (SSI). The programme consisted of in-depth general inspections, which were undertaken in 1987 and 1993 and involved three inspectors spending a number of days in the school, and regulatory inspections, which were completed in 1992 and 1994 and involved one inspector reporting on how the school was meeting specific aspects of the Training School Rules. The SSI produced detailed reports of these inspections which provided us with helpful information about how the school operated from 1987 to 1995 and the inspectors' assessments of the quality of the care being provided to the girls during that period.

59 The first general inspection of the school was undertaken by the SSI in May 1987. Three inspectors spent a total of 101 hours inspecting the school.[47] The inspectors were positive about the standard of care the girls were receiving and recorded that it emerged through conversations with the girls that they had a high regard for staff, were generally content with the treatment they received in the school and had no complaints.[48]

60 The inspectors spent time in the school at all times of the day and at the weekends and the report of their inspection provided helpful detail about the daily living regime in the school. They described how the girls were woken around 8.15am on weekdays and were expected to wash, have breakfast and complete some chores before attending Assembly in the school at 9.30am. School continued until 4.00pm with a fifteen minute break in the morning and a lunch hour. After school, optional evening

47 SJM 1495.
48 SJM 22748.

activities were organised and an evening meal and supper were provided. The girls were free to associate with each other and bed-time was around 10.00pm. The inspectors observed that weekend days were more relaxed and unstructured with the girls being allowed to stay up late to watch television on Friday evenings and have a lie-in on Saturday mornings. They recorded that some girls were allowed home for the weekend and that those who remained undertook cleaning chores on Saturday morning and then had leisure activities including organised outings for the rest of the time.[49]

61 Staff were seen to be striving to maintain a facilitating ethos in House 1 by creating an environment of warmth, openness, trust and acceptance.[50] Nurturing of girls and the setting of limits was observed within the three long-stay houses.[51]

62 The inspectors noted that some girls because of their prior experiences could be volatile and that emotional outbursts could lead to physical confrontations, but that these were handled calmly by the staff. In general the inspectors found the environment and daily life in St Joseph's to be child-centred and commented that the staff were always available, supportive and involved in the lives of the girls.[52] They found that the concepts set out in the school's philosophy document about the provision of openness, warmth, acceptance, a non-judgemental attitude and movement at the girl's pace, were all evident in practice. The relationship between staff and girls was described as honest, trusting and supportive, and controlling as and when necessary.[53]

63 The inspectors detailed the staffing which comprised of a director, an assistant director, deputy assistant director, senior assistant, five senior residential social workers, nineteen residential social workers, one senior field social worker and one part time nurse/residential social worker. Care staff worked a 39-hour week under a split shift rota and a member of staff slept in each house unit at night. The inspectors recorded that in addition to care staff there were four teachers, administrative officers, a cook, a caretaker, a swimming pool attendant and a part-time domestic member of staff and that the services of a local medical officer and nurse were available to the school.

49 SJM 22760.
50 SJM 22764.
51 SJM 22765.
52 SJM 22761.
53 SJM 22773.

64 The inspectors noted the very low turnover of staff, the willingness of staff to be flexible about covering shifts and in particular the availability of the nuns who worked in the school. However, having regard to recommended staffing levels set out in Castle Priory guidelines, inspectors concluded that in order to maintain an acceptable level of staffing during the working day the appointment of two further residential social workers was required.[54]

65 By the time of the 1992 regulatory inspection there were 31 care staff,[55] an increase of one member of staff from 1987, and they were caring on the day of the inspection for 31 girls.[56] At the time of the general inspection in 1993 there were 33 care staff in total[57] and on the day of the census that took place that year there were 31 girls on the roll, two of whom by prior agreement were residing in their family homes. In the report of the 1994 regulatory inspection the inspector commented positively on the level of qualification of staff and the continuing staff development and training provided to them.[58]

66 This investment in staffing was accompanied by continued investment by the NIO in the maintenance and improvement of the fabric of the school. The inspectors who undertook the 1987 general inspection noted that there were excellent recreation facilities available for the girls including a swimming pool, a games hall equipped for gymnastics and a stage suitable for staging plays and concerts.[59] The inspectors who undertook the 1993 general inspection commented on the extension of the facilities available in the school including, for example, the provision of a fully equipped hairdressing salon for training purposes. The DoJ confirmed in its closing submission that:

> "St Joseph's was regarded as generously staffed, resourced and equipped."[60]

67 The inspectors identified in 1987 that while the Training School Rules specified that Boards of Management should meet as far as practical once a month that the St Joseph's Board of Management was usually meeting quarterly. By the time of the December 1994 inspection this continued to be the case and the inspector recommended that consent was sought

54 SJM 22755.
55 SJM 2300.
56 SJM 2269.
57 SJM 2267.
58 SJM 22751.
59 SJM 22758.
60 SJM 30063..

from the NIO for the Board of Management to meet quarterly rather than at monthly intervals as specified in the Training School Rules (1952).[61] This indicated that although inspectors were satisfied that quarterly meetings of the Board of Management were sufficient they were appropriately seeking to ensure that this departure from the Training School Rules was formally approved. We also saw follow-up correspondence between the NIO and the school in relation to this and other recommendations made by inspectors.

68 Also, although inspectors were satisfied in 1987 that the duty of monthly visiting by board members was being fulfilled they recommended that brief reports of visits commenting upon the general conditions, matters of interest and concern including any complaints should be tabled at each meeting of the Board of Management. During the 1994 inspection, inspectors noted that these reports were being provided and were able to identify from them that visits were not being undertaken monthly. They recommended that care should be taken to ensure that visits did take place monthly and that board members should spend sufficient time talking to the girls and making other enquiries to satisfy themselves regarding their care and the state of the school.[62]

69 Inspectors also sought the views of girls directly as part of inspections. Mr Donnell, who conducted the regulatory inspection in 1992, reported that the girls were aware of the purpose of his visit and their right to speak to him privately but none chose to and no matters or complaints were brought to his attention.[63] In advance of the 1993 general inspection each girl was sent a confidential questionnaire to complete and post back to the inspectors. The inspectors reported that although one girl commented on how far St Joseph's was from her family home and others said they would like more cigarettes, locks on bedroom doors and more freedom to go out at night in general the feedback was positive. They reported that the girls stated they felt fairly treated and knew they could talk to staff, and in particular, senior staff, if they had a worry or concern.[64]

70 Questionnaires were also sent to the parents or guardians of the girls and 50% of them were returned. All of those who responded said they were made to feel welcome when they visited the school and could speak to

61 SJM 22828.
62 SJM 22819.
63 SJM 2156-2157.
64 SJM 2270.

their child in private.[65] Also 85% of the returned questionnaires contained complimentary remarks about the staff, the friendly atmosphere that prevailed in the school and how their daughters were being well cared for and benefitting from being in the school.[66] One parent indicated that they had registered a complaint about the school with the RUC but when the inspectors wrote to the address given for this parent to seek more information the letter was returned marked "not at this address", although the inspectors recorded that it had been indicated to them that the parent still resided at the address the letter had been sent to.[67]

71 Inspectors identified a number of features that contributed to the effective provision of care in the school including that operational policies were straightforward, unambiguous and understood by all and that all staff had a sound knowledge of the girls and a consistent approach underlined the provision of care.[68] They found that discipline was maintained within a policy of balanced reward and sanction related to behaviour and concluded:

> "The main controls are the vigilance of staff and the consistency of staff team responses to each girl and her needs."[69]

72 In general, the recommendations that the inspectors made related to the development of the school, for example the possibility of employing male staff, and administrative matters such as improving the general order of the files. The inspectors' recommendations about matters relating to the direct care of the girls were few and covered such issues as increasing the amount of money available for birthday gifts for the girls, introducing incentives to encourage non-smoking[70] and maintaining a punishment book, even though corporal punishment was no longer applied, to record the sanctions imposed on girls.[71]

73 We will now consider the complaints we received about St Joseph's, under the headings: physical abuse; sexual abuse; emotional abuse; neglect, and unacceptable practices.

65 SJM 2278
66 SJM 2279
67 SJM 2279
68 SJM 2262
69 SJM 2262
70 SJM 22795.
71 SJM 2309.

Physical Abuse

74 HIA 249 was admitted to St Joseph's in 1947 aged almost five years with her two older sisters and one younger sister; she remained in the orphanage and then the training school until 1958.

75 SR 235 responded to HIA 249's evidence on behalf of the congregation. SR 235 spent three periods in St Joseph's, the first of which was from August 1958 to October 1959. HIA 249 was discharged from the school in April 1958 so SR 235 and HIA 249 were not in the school at the same time. However, SR 235 is the only living member of the congregation that worked in St Joseph's in the 1950s and for that reason she responded to HIA 249's evidence.

76 HIA 249 told us that SR 248 who was the Director when she was admitted was a good nun but that other nuns SR 237, SR 249, SR 250 and SR 252 hit her and her sisters with long thin bamboo canes called "sally rods". She described how this caning hurt her and left red marks on her skin. She also described SR 252 hitting her across her knuckles with a ruler. HIA 249 told us that she did not think SR 248 knew how the other nuns were treating her.[72]

77 She said that SR 237 was particularly harsh[73] and described how when she was around nine years of age she and other girls were frightened by the sound of an explosion at the nearby Middletown barracks and further alarmed when an older girl told them "there is somebody coming for us" and began to pray to the devil. She told us that SR 237 responded to their distress by beating them and making them kneel on the stairs all night as a punishment.[74] SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and said that although SR 237 was strict she did not think she would have made a child kneel all night but accepted that if it did happen then it was inappropriate and harsh.[75]

78 HIA 249 told us that girls were not allowed to talk at meal times and would be caned with a "sally rod" if they were caught talking.[76] SR 235 did not remember children being forbidden from speaking at meal times and being punished for doing so, but stated that if that was the case she

72 SJM 068
73 SJM 069.
74 SJM 070.
75 SJM 22923.
76 SJM 069.

apologised on behalf of the congregation for the implementation of such a harsh regime.

79 HIA 249 described an occasion where she and other girls were beaten for eating food intended for the nuns but in connection to that incident she also referred to a marks system that was in use at that time:

> "We didn't get stars/marks for good behaviour for a while after that."[77]

80 HIA 249 recalled that she started menstruating when she was around thirteen years and was frightened because she was unprepared and thought she was dying. She described SR 237's reaction when she caught her washing her stained sheets and mistakenly concluded that she had wet her bed:

> "She took me upstairs to my dormitory bent me over my wire bed and beat me on my bare back and bottom with a long narrow stick. She beat me until she was tired and it was the worst beating I ever had the whole time I was there."[78]

81 HIA 249 said that after this beating SR 237 gave her sanitary towels but did not explain puberty to her. She said she was so upset after the beating she ran away but as she did not know her way home she had to return to the school where she was beaten again.[79]

82 SR 235 responded to this allegation and explained that there was no entry in the punishment book of HIA 249 being punished in 1955, the year she was thirteen, and no record of her running away. SR 235 said she would totally condemn the physical punishment described by HIA 249 but pointed out that lack of discussion about puberty mirrored what would have happened in families at that time.[80]

83 HIA 249 also described SR 237 beating her with a stick for speaking back to the Reverend Mother and making her stand in school against a wall with her hands held up for the whole school day as a further punishment for the same infringement.[81] SR 235 told us there was no record of HIA 249 being punished in this way. She explained that there were eight entries in the punishment book about HIA 249 in the years between 1947 and 1954 but that only two of the punishments recorded took the form of a

77 SJM 071.
78 SJM 069.
79 SJM 070.
80 SJM 22007.
81 SJM 069.

slap and the others involved HIA 249 being deprived of treats such as sweets.[82]

84 When SR 235 worked in St Joseph's in 1958 to 1959 SR 237 was in charge. She explained that SR 237 had a reserved manner and was seen as strict:

> "She had a bunch of keys that hung on a short chain from her waistline and you'd hear the keys when she would be coming along. So people would straighten up and behave."[83]

85 SR 235 could not respond directly to HIA 249's allegations about SR 237's behaviour towards her except to say that if she behaved in the way described she would totally condemn her actions and apologise for them.[84] She explained that corporal punishment was permissible in the 1950s and she was aware it was administered in the school from overhearing girls discuss it but she never observed it being applied. She confirmed that SR 237 had a thin bamboo rod but she did not remember her carrying it around with her and thought she kept it in her office. However, she told us that she never saw SR 237 strike a girl.[85]

86 HIA 249 told us that her younger sister SJM 27 was regularly beaten because of her closeness to SR 248 by four nuns: SR 249, SR 250, SR 251 and SR 252. SR 235 explained that the congregation was not able to identify any sister called SR 251 and that the other three sisters were dead. She explained that beatings as described were not recorded in the punishment book but if they were administered and not recorded, that should not have happened and she apologised if it did.

87 SR 235 told us that there were entries in the punishment book that record SJM 27 being punished twelve times in the seven years from 1953 to 1960, but that the recorded punishments were at most two slaps and on five of the twelve occasions the punishment was deprivation of sweets or fruit.[86] SR 235 also pointed out that on occasion these punishments were applied by SR 245 with whom SJM 27 had a close relationship. HIA 249's sister SJM 27 is dead and we are not aware of any complaints she made about the treatment she received in St Joseph's.

82 SJM 22007
83 Day 186, p.17
84 SJM 22007
85 Day 186, p.16
86 SJM 22004.

88 HIA 178 was placed in St Joseph's on 23 March 1949, aged 1 year and 2 months when the home was operating as an orphanage. She remained in the school until spring 1964. Entries in the punishment book show that from the age of five years until the age of ten years HIA 178 received punishments on eleven occasions. On four of these occasions the recorded punishments are one or two slaps while on the other seven occasions the recorded punishments are deprivation of sweets or fruit. The reasons given for punishments included being "disobedient and bold" and "troublesome". Five of the punishments were administered by SR 248 and the remaining six were administered by SR 237 when she took over as director of the school.

89 HIA 178 did not recall being punished by SR 248 who she remembered as a gentle, kind person. However, she told us that she experienced "a lot of physical and emotional abuse" from SR 237. She stated:

> "She was such a wicked woman. She hated me for some reason and blamed me if anything happened or even just for simple things like laughing. She beat me with a long narrow bamboo stick or slapped me almost every day."[87]

90 HIA 178 told us that she lived in fear of SR 237 and felt that SR 237 picked on her because she had a physical disability which meant she could not use her right hand. She described an occasion when SR 237 wrongly accused her of smoking and took her upstairs, stripped her of her clothes, bent her over an iron bed and hit her with a bamboo cane while another nun, who she thought was SR 254, held her arms. HIA 178 told us that SR 237 caned her back and legs and when she finished said to her "Go and show those stripes to whoever you like."[88] HIA 178 recalled that SR 237 may have felt guilty afterwards because she offered her some sweets which HIA 178 refused to accept.

91 SR 237 is dead but SR 254 provided a statement in which she confirmed that she worked in St Joseph's for two years from 1960 to 1962 but explained that she was part of the housekeeping staff and was not involved in the care or disciplining of the girls. She told us that she had no recollection of HIA 178 and that she did not witness or assist others to beat any child with a stick.[89]

87 SJM 333.
88 SJM 334.
89 SJM 29257

92 As referred to above, HIA 249 told us that SR 237 made her and other girls kneel all night as a punishment and HIA 178 also told us that SR 237 punished her in this way. She said that she and another girl had been playing around at bedtime and as a punishment for making noise she was made to kneel in the middle of the bedroom floor all night. She commented "we weren't even allowed to be children."[90] When HIA 178 gave evidence in person she was told that the congregation found it hard to believe that SR 237 had behaved in that manner, but she insisted that she was punished in the way she described.[91]

93 HIA 178 could recall only one occasion when a nun intervened to protect her from SR 237. She said that SR 256 who taught in the school saw SR 237 pushing her to hurry her down stairs and that she intervened and told SR 237 she was going to complain to the Reverend Mother about her behaviour. HIA 178 said that SR 237 stopped pushing her on that occasion but continued to abuse her when no one was around.[92] HIA 178 told us that she talked to no one in the school about how SR 237 was treating her because she felt it must have been obvious to everyone.

94 To support this view, she told us that in 2006-7 she met a nun SR 242 who worked in St Joseph's when she was resident in the school. She said that she asked SR 242 where SR 237 was living as she wanted to confront her about how she had treated her. She said that SR 242 put her arms round her to comfort her and said "Didn't she give you terrible beatings? Sure I never done that."[93] The congregation responded to this account and said that the meeting HIA 178 described having with SR 242 could not have happened in 2006 as SR 242 was dead by then, but they did confirm that SR 242 worked in the infirmary in St Joseph's when HIA 178 was resident in the school.

95 HIA 178 explained that she had no one external to tell about the abuse and commented that even if she had, she did not think they would have believed her because people were inclined to trust the sisters.[94]

96 We are aware from material provided by the police that another girl who was resident in the school in the 1950s complained about the treatment she received from SR 237. SJM 59 was in St Joseph's from 1954 when

90 SJM 333
91 Day 184, p.75
92 SJM 334
93 SJM 335.
94 SJM 335.

she was aged nine years until 1961 when she was aged sixteen years. SJM 59 made a statement to the police in 2004 that she was force-fed by SR 237 and physically abused and denigrated by her, and by SR 239.[95] The police did not pursue the complaint since SR 237 was dead and SR 239 had left the congregation.

97 Dr Simpson and Miss Forrest of the MoHA checked the punishment book during their inspection of the school in December 1952 and recorded:

> "The punishment book shows a very occasional record of 2 slaps or 4 slaps, but mainly punishment is by deprivation of privileges. In general the impression is one of firmness and kindness in the right proportions."[96]

We understood that in this context the reference to "slap" meant being hit with a cane rather than being hit with an open hand.

98 We reviewed the punishment book for the 1950s and also found that recorded punishments were generally deprivation of sweets or fruit and where slaps were recorded it was usually two slaps. For example, it was recorded that in October 1955 a girl was deprived of sweets for being untidy and impertinent; in November 1955 a girl was deprived of fruit for being disobedient; in December 1955 a girl was deprived of pocket money for being quarrelsome;[97] and in March 1957 a girl received two slaps for sulkiness.[98] More unusual punishments were also recorded: in January 1957, a sixteen-year-old girl had her hair cut for absconding for a second time;[99] in March 1957, two girls of sixteen years were made to apologise publicly for impertinence; and, in January 1958 as a punishment for "destruction", a girl was given one slap on the hand and made to "pay a little of the cost of the article injured."[100]

99 These recorded punishments contrast significantly with the accounts we received of physical punishment and while we do not doubt the recorded punishments we recognise that it is possible that not all punishments or the extent of them were recorded. On the basis of the evidence we received from witnesses and our consideration of the punishment books we concluded that it is probable that spontaneous reactions to bad

95 SJM 4087-4093.
96 SJM 1284.
97 SJM 2049
98 SJM 2045
99 SJM 2046
100 SJM 2043

behaviour were less likely to be recorded than children being referred to the director for corporal punishment.

100 HIA 203 was committed to St Joseph's by Belfast juvenile court in November 1964 aged sixteen years and eight months and remained there until January 1967 when she was released on license at the age of eighteen years and eleven months. She was finally discharged in February 1967, the day before her nineteenth birthday. HIA 203 told us that ten days after she was admitted to the school she absconded with three other girls and was brought back some hours later by the police. She said that she and the other girls were taken to SR 237 for punishment and that while each girl was sent in separately to SR 237's room the others were supervised by SR 241. HIA 203 said that while she was waiting she was "ranting and raving" that she was not going to be hit by SR 237 and that SR 241 responded by punching her in the eye. She said she was left with a black eye, which none of the nuns commented on, and that she also got caned on the behind by SR 237.[101]

101 In a form detailing the administration of corporal punishment which the school submitted to the MoHA it is recorded that HIA 203 was given six slaps on the hand for absconding.[102] When HIA 203 was shown this return on the day she gave evidence in person she confirmed her memory that she received six slaps on her behind rather than on her hand. The Sisters of St Louis told us that this was the only complaint it has ever received about SR 241. HIA 203 confirmed that this was the only occasion that SR 241 hit her and that she saw it as a reaction to her saying that she would not allow SR 237 to hit her.

102 There was another entry in the punishment book about HIA 203 receiving six slaps for being disobedient and defiant. HIA 203 did not remember this punishment but thought it might relate to her fighting with another girl. She told us that although some nuns were physically abusive, abuse did not happen all the time and that SR 237 was not always harsh with her; "in most cases she was pretty fair."[103] She also told us that there were some "really great nuns" in St Joseph's,[104] and particularly remembered SR 269 who taught her music as a lovely nun.[105]

101 Day 184, p.23.
102 SJM 874.
103 Day 184, p.35
104 Day 184, p.29
105 Day 184, p.31

103 HIA 161 was admitted to St Joseph's in December 1968 when she was fourteen years and discharged in March 1971 when she was almost sixteen years. She described in her written statement that when she first arrived at the school she heard a girl screaming because she was being scrubbed in a bath with a deck scrubber. SR 240 provided a response in writing to this evidence and stated that she had no recollection of nuns having to bath girls as they were all teenagers and looked after their own hygiene.[106] When HIA 161 gave evidence in person she clarified that she did not actually observe the girl being scrubbed but told us that on more than one occasion she heard girls being distressed at being scrubbed and that the scrubbing was intended as a punishment rather than assistance with washing. She gave the example of girls being found in bed together being punished in this way.[107] HIA 161 described a nun SR 238 as a "nightmare":

> "I was in her dormitory and you got slapped, beaten and punched by her regularly. There was no-one I could think of in life that I could have gone to for help, no-one who would have believed me or done anything for me."[108]

104 SR 240 responded in writing to this evidence and said she was not aware of SR 238 behaving in this way and that if she had been aware of such behaviour she would have put a stop to it. She noted that HIA 161 said she felt unable to complain but pointed out that there would have been approximately eleven other girls sleeping in the dormitory and she would have expected some of them to have complained about a nun behaving in such a manner.[109] HIA 161 responded to this when she gave evidence in person and said that all the girls would have been scared to raise a complaint about a nun.[110]

105 HIA 161 remembered SR 237 and said that she "had it in" for her and her sister because they had been resident in Nazareth House before being sent to St Joseph's and the Sisters of Nazareth had given a bad account of them to the Sisters of St Louis. When asked what she remembered about SR 237 she said:

> "It was the cane, you know, and having to stand for hours and own up to something that you didn't do. You know, you would have been called

106 SJM 883
107 Day 184, p.144
108 SJM 010
109 SJM 884.
110 Day 184, p.148.

a liar and a liar until you actually said something and owned up to it just to get out of it, but then you would get punished anyway."[111]

106 HIA 161 told us she ran away with another girl and got as far as Derry where she was put in contact with an up and coming MP. She said she told the MP about the abuse she had suffered in St Joseph's and asked for her help, which she agreed to give provided HIA 161 returned to the school. HIA 161 said that when she returned to the school she was made to write out lines as a punishment for running away and speaking negatively about the nuns. Contemporaneous records maintained by the school record HIA 161 being given the task of writing out the menu because she had made "derogatory remarks about the school."[112]

107 HIA 161 told us that although she had to return to the school she believed that it was through the MP's intervention that she was eventually allowed to leave St Joseph's and stay with a family in Portadown. However the Sisters of St Louis told us that since HIA 161 was almost sixteen years old preparations had already commenced for her discharge from the school.[113]

108 SJM 73 was admitted to St Joseph's in 1970 and remained there until 1981 so she had a short period of overlap with HIA 161. She told us that she never witnessed girls being beaten or hit but that she remembered a few occasions when girls had to be restrained because they were fighting with each other.[114] She was clear that the nuns were authority figures but stated that they were not aggressive and would have talked through issues with girls.[115]

109 SJM 74 was in St Joseph's from the early 1980s to 1985. She told us that she was not hit by the nuns and did not observe other girls being hit. She explained that the punishments she received for misbehaving were being told off, sent to her room, having her pocket money reduced or losing out on a cigarette. HIA 161 also recalled cigarettes being withheld as punishment for poor behaviour.

110 HIA 176 had four placements in St Joseph's: January 1982 to January 1983; March 1983 to August 1983; February 1984 to May 1984; and, September to October 1984.

111 Day 184, p.175.
112 SJM 24704.
113 SJM 885.
114 SJM 29260.
115 SJM 29261.

111 HIA 176's sister HIA 376 had two placements in St Joseph's: the first was from June 1983 to July 1984; and the second was from August 1984 to April 1985. So for two periods the sisters were resident in the school together.

112 When HIA 376 arrived for her first placement in St Joseph's in June 1983 her sister HIA 176 was completing her second placement in the school. Both girls were in St Joseph's together for a period of two months and then HIA 176 was discharged and returned home at the end of August 1983. However, she returned in February 1984 for her third stay in the school, which lasted until May 1984. So, for approximately five months of HIA 376's first stay in St Joseph's her sister was also resident in the school.

113 HIA 376 started her second placement in the school in August 1984 and her sister (HIA 176) arrived for her fourth stay in the school in September 1984 and was discharged home in October 1984. Therefore, the sisters were only resident in the school together for three weeks during HIA 376's second stay in St Joseph's.

114 Given the overlaps in their stays in the school and common themes in what they told us we will consider their evidence together. HIA 176 made a statement to the Inquiry but was unable for medical reasons to give evidence in person, her sister HIA 376 provided a statement and gave evidence in person.

115 HIA 176 and HIA 376 both told us that they were physically abused by a lay member of staff, SJM 4. HIA 376 told us in her statement that when she first arrived at the school SJM 4 hit her on her ear and knocked her down the corridor when she asked to see her sister HIA 176 and told her she would have it hard in the school because she was bad.[116] When HIA 376 gave evidence in person she clarified that this incident commenced when she and another girl went into the staff bedroom and found a pair of SJM 4's trousers which were big enough for both girls to fit into one of the trouser legs, which they then proceeded to do. She recalled that SJM 4 came into the room while they were doing this and "backhanded her" i.e. hit her across the ear and face.[117]

116 HIA 376 told us that this was not the only occasion that SJM 4 hit her. She said she never knew when she passed SJM 4 whether she would get hit, "the backhand came so quick", and that SJM 4 pushed and poked

116 SJM 061.
117 Day 187, p.49.

her.[118] HIA 376 also said that SJM 4 hit other girls in a similar manner and that someone would get hit by SJM 4 once or twice a day.[119]

117 HIA 176 also described physical abuse by SJM 4:

> "She would be the one who would hit you, shove you about and punish you. She was a very big woman and she flung me about a few times."[120]

118 SJM 4 worked in the school from 1972 to 1988 and she provided a statement to the Inquiry in which she denied hitting HIA 376 or telling her she would have a hard time in the school because she was bad.[121] She also provided a statement denying that she treated HIA 176 in the way she alleged and stated that she never physically assaulted any child in her care.[122]

119 SR 235 responded to HIA 376's allegations about SJM 4 on behalf of the congregation and said a member of staff striking a child in the ways described would have been totally against the school's discipline and pastoral care policies and was totally inconsistent with how she observed SJM 4 treating girls in her care.[123] SR 235 also responded to HIA 176's allegations about SJM 4 and told us that SJM 4 was a much loved member of staff and that she was particularly skilled in settling new girls.[124]

120 When SR 247 gave evidence she explained that SJM 4 was a "larger than life" character and that children might react to that at first but that she found SJM 4 to be a warm nurturing person who was very motherly to the girls and was loved by them.[125] These are the only complaints we received about SJM 4 and it does not appear that the police or the congregation received any other complaints about her physical abuse of girls.[126]

121 Both HIA 376 and HIA 176 made allegations against SR 240 who was the director of the school while they were resident there. SR 240 responded in writing to the statement of HIA 376 but submitted a medical certificate to explain why she would not be able give evidence in person.

118 Day 187, p.49.
119 Day 189, p.50.
120 SJM 472.
121 SJM 15256.
122 SJM 15255.
123 SJM 927.
124 SJM 29006.
125 Day 187, p.8.
126 Day 187, p.53.

Subsequently when she was asked to respond to HIA 176's statement, her health had deteriorated to such an extent that she provided a second medical certificate to explain why she was not in a position to provide any further statements to the Inquiry.[127] Therefore, she was not able to respond personally to HIA 176's allegations but SR 235 did so on SR 240's behalf and on behalf of the congregation.

122 HIA 376 told us SR 240 gave her "terrible beatings" and that she saw her hitting other girls:

> "She carried a large bunch of keys that she used to hit us with. She would also kick me and punch me with her knuckles and fists."[128]

123 HIA 376 also described a beating she said she received from SR 240 as a result of her behaviour when she was out on a trip with SR 235. She told us that SR 235 was driving her and other girls, including her sister HIA 176, to Monaghan and that during the journey SR 235 made her travel in the boot of the car as a punishment for misbehaviour. She told us the car was stopped at an Army checkpoint and the soldier who searched it asked why HIA 376 was in the boot but accepted SR 235's explanation that HIA 376 had been speaking too much and not listening. HIA 376 said that when she returned to the school SR 240 punched and slapped her and pulled her hair as punishment for the trouble she had caused.[129]

124 SR 235 provided a statement to the Inquiry and gave evidence in person and categorically rejected the allegation that she "dragged" HIA 376 from a car and put her in the boot. She said in her statement:

> "I find such a suggestion offensive, hurtful and quite honestly beyond belief."[130]

SR 235 confirmed this response when she gave evidence in person.[131]

125 When HIA 376 gave evidence in person, SR 235's denial was put to her but she insisted that the incident happened:

> "It did happen. I still get flashbacks of it. It did happen."[132]

126 We received no other complaints of physical abuse by SR 235. The congregation pointed out that although HIA 376 said her sister HIA 176

127 Day 187, pp.118 to 119.
128 SJM 61–SJM 62.
129 SJM 63-64.
130 SJM 940.
131 Day 186, pp.27 to 28.
132 Day 187, p.86.

was in the car when this incident was said to have happened HIA 176 made no reference to it in the statement she provided to the Inquiry.[133]

127 HIA 376 also told us that SR 240 beat her when her sister HIA 176 became pregnant, because as the older sister she should have prevented her sister becoming pregnant.[134] The Congregation pointed out in response to this evidence that HIA 176 stayed in St Joseph's for a short time after she became pregnant because her parents had reacted very negatively to her pregnancy and that she subsequently paid an overnight visit to the school with her baby. The congregation also pointed out that HIA 376 accompanied her sister and niece on that visit and during it confided to staff that she was three-months pregnant.[135]

128 When Counsel to the Inquiry asked HIA 376 why she returned willingly to somewhere she says she was so badly treated she explained that she suffered abuse at home before and after her stays in St Joseph's and that at least in St Joseph's:

> "…we were getting fed. We had a roof over our head. We were warm, we had hot water you know."[136]

129 SR 240 provided a statement in response to HIA 376's allegations, in which she absolutely denied hitting HIA 376. She explained her philosophy of care while in charge of St Joseph's:

> "…because abuse is one of the main experiences these girls had in life before they came to us, any form of physical abuse was not only wrong, but it was totally contrary and counter-productive to what we were trying to achieve."

130 She explained that her main aim was to:

> "…try and help the girls to grow and to learn to take responsibility and discover what they were good at through positive education, positive role models and positive care from staff at St Joseph's in their daily lives."[137]

131 She pointed out that that there is no record of HIA 376 complaining about how she was treated when she was at the school and that a review of the diary entries made about HIA 376 are not consistent with her being unhappy in the school.[138]

133 Day 187, p.123.
134 Day 187, pp.97 to 98.
135 SJM 987.
136 Day 187, p.100.
137 SJM 921.
138 SJM 921 -922.

132 HIA 176 also told us that SR 240 carried a large bunch of keys and that she would come up behind her and dig her knuckle in her back and ask her if she was behaving herself.[139] She described an incident where girls stole altar wine while attending a retreat in Armagh and SR 240 lined up all the girls from St Joseph's who were attending the retreat and threatened to beat them all if the girls who stole the wine did not own up. She stated that when the girls who stole the wine owned up they got a "terrible beating".[140]

133 HIA 176 also described SR 240 taking a girl, SJM 54, from a classroom to her office because the girl had stolen glue to sniff. HIA 176 told us that SR 240's office was visible from the classroom and that she saw SR 240 slap SJM 54 with her hands and heard SJM 54 screaming.[141]

134 SR 235 responding on behalf of SR 240 emphasised that she was very caring in her approach to the girls in the school and that there were no records about the alleged incident of the altar wine being stolen or SJM 54 been punished for stealing glue.[142]

135 SR 235 pointed out that contemporaneous records indicate that HIA 176 was well cared for and supported in St Joseph's. SJM 56, who was HIA 176's social worker when she was at school, provided a statement to the Inquiry in which he supported this view. He told us that he maintained regular contact with HIA 176 and received letters from her in which she made no mention of feeling threatened or compromised in St Joseph's and that he reviewed relevant files and found no reference to her expressing any such feelings.[143]

136 He explained that he considered that the staff in St Joseph's were supportive of HIA 176 and created a degree of stability which enabled her to be more reflective and realistic about her family relations.[144]

137 SR 234 also gave evidence in support of SR 240 and told us that she was a very good leader and a remarkable person. She described the impression she gained after attending her first staff meeting in the school as "this place really is run for the children."[145] She told us that she occasionally heard SR 240 raise her voice and that there was no doubt she was the boss but that she loved the children and they loved her.[146]

139 SJM 474-475.
140 SJM 475.
141 SJM 475.
142 SJM 29010.
143 SJM 29312.
144 SJM 29312.
145 Day 186, p.43.
146 Day 186, p.56.

138 SR 247 told us SR 240 was highly respected by the girls and the staff[147] and described how she would work hard to give the girls a good Christmas so as to create good memories for them.[148] She also described SR 240 as:

> "…great one for children getting something to eat when they returned from absconding."[149]

139 In relation to administration of punishment by SR 240, we noted the evidence of SJM 75 who was in St Joseph's from 1994 to 1996 and who ran away on a number of occasions with other girls and was brought back by the police. She said that on her return SR 240 would give off to her and she would lose marks and be deprived of a cigarette but that would be the extent of her punishment.[150]

140 The Inquiry has received no other complaint about SR 240's behaviour in St Joseph's and is not aware of any other complaint being made about her to another relevant body, e.g. the police.[151]

141 HIA 376 complained about the behaviour of other nuns. She told us that SR 243 would wear white gloves to inspect the dormitory in House 2 after the girls had cleaned it and if she found dust she would "wreck it (the dormitory) beat us and make us do it again."[152] The congregation pointed out that SR 243 worked in House 1, not House 2, and Counsel to the Inquiry pointed out to HIA 376 that her sister had described another nun, SR 258, wearing a white glove to check for dust. However, HIA 376 was adamant that it was SR 243 that had behaved in the way she described.

142 HIA 376 also told us that on one occasion when SR 243 was driving girls to Dundalk she stopped the minibus because girls were misbehaving and "dragged" one girl SJM 19 out of the bus by her hair and beat her although she had not been involved in the misbehaviour.[153] SJM 19 did not apply to the Inquiry and as far as the Inquiry is aware has not made any complaint to any other body about how she was treated in St Joseph's.

143 The Inquiry received no other complaints about SR 243. SR 243 is dead and SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation to the evidence

147 Day 187, p.24.
148 Day 187, pp.9 to 11.
149 Day 187, p.5.
150 SJM 29271.
151 Day 187, p.69.
152 SJM 062.
153 SJM 065.

against her. SR 235 stated that SR 243 was the fairest and most just person she knew and she could not believe any allegation that she had beaten a girl.[154]

144 HIA 376 told us that SR 275 pulled her by the ear and slapped her if she did not clean the sink properly and this left her with a dislike of anyone touching her ears and an obsession about ensuring that her sinks are clean.[155] HIA 176 also made allegations against SR 275 who she said "dished out beatings in House 2." She said that she saw SR 275 beat a girl, SJM 50.

145 SR 275 is dead, so SR 235 responded to these allegations about her on behalf of the congregation. She explained that SJM 50 was only resident in House 1 for three weeks in 1982 and that SR 275 did not work in that house at that time. SR 235 also told us in response to the allegations from both sisters about SR 275 that from her personal experience of working alongside her she did not believe she would hit any child.[156]

146 HIA 176 alleged that another nun, SR 260, broke a brush over the back of a girl, SJM 52, because she had been told that SJM 52 and other girls had been misbehaving the night before. SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and told us that they have no record of any such incident and that from her personal knowledge of SR 260 she would find it hard to believe that such an incident took place.[157] As far as the Inquiry is aware, this is the only complaint made about SR 260 and we noted that SJM 52 did not apply to give evidence to the Inquiry about how she was treated in St Joseph's.

147 HIA 376 told us that SJM 1, a lay member of staff beat her and had favourites. She said SJM 1 would slap her and other girls but would also give them chores as a punishment or deprive them of tea or cigarettes.[158] We were not able to trace SJM 1 and this is the only complaint against her. We noted from contemporaneous records that HIA 376 complained to SJM 1 about two girls verbally abusing her and SJM 1 brought the three girls together and settled the matter to their mutual satisfaction.[159]

154 SJM 935.
155 SJM 062.
156 SJM 29011
157 SJM 29010
158 Day 187, p.88
159 SJM 25959

148 When HIA 376 gave evidence in person she said she realised that she was headstrong when she was in St Joseph's and that her behaviour would have been difficult to deal with but that she did not deserve all the beatings she received there.[160]

149 HIA 198 spent two periods in St Joseph's. She was almost twelve years of age when she was first admitted for assessment on 5 May 1992. This admission was considered necessary because HIA 198 was engaging in self-harm and taking overdoses and was therefore considered to be a risk to herself. HIA 198 was discharged home on 5 June 1992 but subsequently had two separate overnight stays in St Joseph's in response to her behaviour in the children's home in which she had been placed. She was then admitted to the school for a second time on 22 August 1994 and remained there until 3 November 1994.

150 When she gave evidence in person HIA 198 told us that she believed that the inadequate response by residential and field social workers to her disclosures about being sexually abused and the lack of specialist treatment to assist her to deal with that abuse led to the downward spiral in her behaviour that resulted in her being admitted to St Joseph's.[161] The HSCB pointed out in its closing submission that the contemporaneous documentation shows that significant efforts were made to keep HIA 198 within her family, to secure appropriate placements for her when that proved not to be possible and to provide ongoing support to her and her family. They also emphasised that the placement in St Joseph's was necessary because HIA 198 was putting her life at significant risk.[162]

151 HIA 198 remembered the marks system that was used in St Joseph's to encourage good behaviour and we saw a note she wrote on 4 June 1992, during her assessment period, in which she referred to losing points for the use of bad language.[163]

152 She also remembered cigarettes being withheld for poor behaviour[164] and being given to reward good behaviour, including helping nuns to find girls who had absconded.[165] SR 234 responded to this evidence on behalf of the congregation and told us that cigarettes were not used as a

160 Day 187, p.87.
161 Day 185, p.5.
162 SJM 30099.
163 SJM 195.
164 Day 185, p.10.
165 Day 185, p.16.

bargaining tool or as a reward or treat by staff if a girl who had run away was subsequently returned.[166]

153 SR 235 explained that the reward system was based on each girl receiving 100 marks on a Saturday evening. Then during the week if their behaviour was not appropriate they lost marks but they could also earn additional marks for good behaviour, which were known as "plusses". Each Saturday afternoon each girl was told how many marks she had achieved and marks were also generally allocated to each House. SR 235 explained that if a girl gained "plusses" she would be given extra pocket money but if she had lost marks she would have her pocket money reduced. She confirmed that girls purchased cigarettes with their pocket money.[167]

154 HIA 198 told us that on one occasion when she absconded she was in a nearby field and was caught by SR 247 who slapped her across her face.[168] SR 247 provided a statement and gave evidence in person. She denied that she slapped HIA 198 or hit any child at any stage in her life,[169] and said she never saw any other member of staff in St Joseph's strike or humiliate a girl.[170] She told us that her only memory of HIA 198 was that on one occasion she collected her from Craigavon hospital and HIA 198 asked her to keep money safe for her.[171] She explained that on occasion she did find girls who had absconded in the fields surrounding the school and that she would walk and talk with them and usually be able to persuade them to return to the school.[172]

155 When HIA 198 gave evidence in person she was told that SR 247 denied slapping her. HIA 198 insisted that SR 247 had slapped her across the face.[173] This is the only complaint we received about SR 247 and the Sisters of St Louis confirmed they have not received any other complaint about her.[174]

156 Given the civil unrest in the province at the time and St Joseph's' location close to the border with the Republic of Ireland it is not surprising that the nuns were concerned about the safety of girls who absconded. SR 234

166 SJM 163.
167 SJM 216.
168 SJM 034.
169 Day 187, p.16.
170 Day 187, p.11.
171 Day 187, p.15.
172 Day 187, p.14.
173 Day 185, p.14.
174 Day 185, p.16.

described how SR 240 had to liaise with the Army to ask them to stop carrying out patrols in the grounds of the school and how on one occasion the school was caught in the middle of a gun battle between the Army and the IRA.[175]

157 HIA 198 told us in her written statement that she was aware of rumours in St Joseph's that SR 240 slapped girls. However, she confirmed when she gave evidence in person that although she observed SR 240 "roaring and shouting" she was never hit by her and she never saw her physically abusing any girls.[176]

158 SJM 75 was in St Joseph's from 1994 to 1996. She told us that she did not get hit or beaten by staff in St Joseph's and did not witness other girls being treated in that way:

> "I never witnessed the Sisters slapping, beating or hitting any of the girls."[177]

159 We are satisfied from the evidence we have heard that SR 237 chastised girls at times in a manner that was not formal or controlled and which was not a reasonable response to the girls' behaviour. We consider SR 237's behaviour in this regard was a particularly significant failing because of her position as director of the school and the authority and influence that role gave her. We are also satisfied, that given the descriptions of SR 237's chastisements of girls, that not all the punishments she applied, or the extent of them, were fully and/or accurately recorded in the punishment book.

160 We recognised that during the time SR 237 was the director of St Joseph's the physical chastisement of children was more common and accepted by society in general. However, we consider it significant that SR 237's approach, which we consider extended to physical abuse of girls, contrasted sharply with that of her predecessor SR 248 and that of her successor SR 240. We received consistent accounts of SR 237 being regularly physically abusive to girls and making them kneel as a punishment. We considered this behaviour was particularly damaging because of the influence and authority she held in her position as director of the school. That position meant that girls could not appeal to a more senior member of staff about SR 237's behaviour; it also meant she provided a poor example to her

175 Day 186, p.60.
176 Day 185, p.21.
177 SJM 29271.

staff about how children should be treated. Therefore, we found SR 237's behaviour amounted to systemic physical abuse during her period of directorship between 1957 and 1971.

161 We also considered whether the fact that SR 237 could behave as she did suggested a lack of oversight by the Reverend Mother of the Middletown convent to whom she would have been accountable. However, we noted from HIA 178's account that SR 237 stopped pushing her when another nun threatened to report her to the Reverend Mother, which indicated to us that she was concerned to ensure that her behaviour did not come to the attention of her superior.

162 We also concluded from the evidence we have heard that there were a small number of times when some staff physically chastised girls on the spur of the moment in response to particularly disruptive or provocative behaviour. However, we consider this behaviour was one-off in nature as opposed to systemic and has to be considered within the context of the small number of allegations we received about physical abuse in the school and the evidence from witnesses who told us that while they were physically abused by staff in other institutions they were well treated in St Joseph's. We also noted that according to HIA 249's evidence, which we referred to above, as far back as the 1950s a stars/marks system was used as a means of promoting good behaviour and presumably to reduce the need to punish poor behaviour.[178]

163 We consider that the departure of SR 237, the appointment of SR 240 as the director and the increase in professionally qualified staff resulted in a more benign and child-centred regime that was focused on recognising the needs of the girls and understanding their behaviour in order to support them to manage themselves and their relationships better.

Visiting Priests

164 We received evidence from four witnesses, (HIA 249, HIA 176, HIA 178 and HIA 376) about priests slapping girls in St Joseph's. HIA 249 described a priest, SJM 28, slapping her across the face when she approached to take Communion. The Sisters of St Louis confirmed that SJM 28 said Mass at the school but pointed out that it was a public Mass and he would have been observed if he had hit HIA 249 in the way she described.[179] SJM 28

178 SJM 071.
179 SJM 22006.

is dead. We received no other complaints about him and are not aware of any complaints being made about him to any other body.

165 HIA 178 told us that a priest who visited the school occasionally, who she named as SJM 36, hit her on the head for no apparent reason. Counsel to the Inquiry asked HIA 178 if she might be mistaken about the name as there was no record of a priest of that name visiting St Joseph's but she confirmed that was the name she remembered.[180]

166 HIA 376 told us she was slapped by a visiting priest for dressing inappropriately. She said in her written statement that this occurred during Mass but accepted when giving evidence in person that it was probably during morning assembly. The Sisters of St. Louis pointed out that a priest hitting a girl in the way described would have been observed and when this was put to HIA 376 when she gave evidence in person she stated that nuns were present when it happened.[181] SR 235 told us on behalf of the congregation that it has no record of any such incident happening or of HIA 376 complaining about such an incident.[182]

167 HIA 376's sister, HIA 176, told us that a priest called SJM 49 struck a girl called SJM 50 across the face when she came to receive Communion wearing bright red lipstick.[183] The Sisters of St Louis pointed out that SJM 50 gave evidence to the Inquiry about a children's home that she was resident in but made no complaints about her time in St Joseph's.[184]

168 It is noteworthy that three witnesses each described being slapped by a different priest at public Masses or assemblies in St Joseph's and in addition one witness described another girl being slapped by a priest in a similar manner. The Sisters of St Louis told us that they have no memory of or records of such incidents or complaints being made about them. While such incidents could have occurred we do not consider the evidence sufficient to amount to a finding of systemic abuse.

Peer Abuse

169 HIA 249 described two older girls bullying her and making fun of her body but confirmed that she did not report this behaviour to the nuns for

180 Day 184, p.86.
181 Day 187, p.56.
182 SJM 930.
183 SJM 474.
184 SJM 30114.

fear that the nuns would respond by beating her.[185] HIA 161 said she experienced bullying in St Joseph's[186] and that a hospital admission she had for three days in April 1969, which was recorded in St Joseph's diary but with no reason given for the admission, was a result of being beaten up by another girl and having her nose broken.[187] When asked if nuns would intervene to stop fights, she explained that sometimes they would but sometimes they would turn a blind eye.[188]

170 HIA 376 said in her statement that when she moved from House 1 to House 2, two other girls hit her on several occasions because she did not receive full marks in the reward system and that meant the whole house did not receive a weekly treat.[189] The Congregation told us that the reward system did not work in that way and that the weekly treat which was given on Friday evenings, and consisted of crisps and lemonade and occasionally an extra cigarette, was given out regardless of the marks lost by individual girls. They also confirmed that they have checked their records and there is no note of HIA 376 complaining about being physically bullied in this way.[190] There was a record of HIA 376 complaining to staff about these girls' verbal abuse of her and that a member of staff, SJM 1, talked to the three girls together and sorted matters to HIA 376's satisfaction.[191] HIA 376 explained when she gave evidence in person that the physical abuse happened at night in the dormitory and that she did not complain to staff because she knew that would only make matters worse.[192]

171 The Inquiry was able to trace one of the girls HIA 376 referred to, SJM 8. She provided a statement in which she denied hitting HIA 376 and also stated that she was never hit by nuns or staff in St Joseph's and did not see them hit other girls.[193]

172 HIA 176 also told us that she was bullied by two other girls in St Joseph's and that although she felt able to talk to a member of staff, SJM 43, who made her feel safe she could not tell her or any staff member about the bullying because she was frightened that if the girls involved were punished they would make her life more miserable.[194]

185 SJM 070.
186 SJM 010.
187 Day 184, p.149.
188 Day 184, p.147.
189 SJM 061.
190 SJM 930.
191 SJM 25958-25959.
192 Day 187, p.64.
193 SJM 15252.
194 SJM 476.

173 HIA 233 told us about name-calling between her and other girls and SR 235 confirmed this and provided a copy of a contemporaneous explanation written by HIA 233 about a fight she was involved in that was triggered by name-calling.[195]

174 SR 235 told us that staff were vigilant about bullying, would deal with it immediately and never condoned it.[196] We noted that this was also the view of the SSI inspectors who inspected the school in 1987 and recorded observing staff intervening calmly to deal with physical confrontations between girls.[197] We also noted that when HIA 376 reported problems with other girls, staff convened the girls and addressed the behaviour with them.[198] Therefore, we reached the view that while a degree of bullying and physical confrontations might be expected in a training school for girls, staff were alert to this behaviour and intervened to stop it.

Use of the Intensive Care Unit (ICU)

175 The ICU was opened in October 1990 and when the school was inspected in 1993, inspectors found that since it opened it had been used on 31 occasions, fourteen of which were attributable to six girls. The inspectors recorded that on 26 of these occasions the ICU was used because it was decided to keep girls who had returned to the school late at night and were unsettled and/or under the influence of alcohol or drugs separate from their house group until the next morning. They identified only five occasions when a girl was removed from her house unit to the ICU because of her disruptive behaviour.[199] The report of the regulatory inspection carried out in December 1994 recorded that the use of the ICU had reduced further, as it had only been used eight times in 1994.[200]

176 In her written statement, HIA 198 told us that after she ran away a few times from St Joseph's she was placed in the ICU. She stated:

> "I only got to see one staff member for one hour a day. The remainder of the time I was locked in my bedroom."[201]

195 SJM 237.
196 SJM 290014.
197 SJM 22761.
198 SJM 25959.
199 SJM 2274.
200 SJM 2306.
201 SJM 034.

HIA 198 accepted, when she gave evidence in person and had the opportunity to consider contemporaneous records, that she was placed in the ICU to manage the risk her behaviour was presenting to herself, but she insisted that there should have been a better way to take care of her.[202] Contemporaneous records show that staff closely monitored HIA 198 when she was in ICU. She confirmed that while she was in the unit she received food, had access to the toilet and was allowed to listen to the radio and read magazines and at times watch television in the living room of the unit.[203] She remembered SR 234 being with her in the ICU and encouraging her to go to sleep.[204] However, she did not remember staff talking to her about her behaviour or why she was running away.[205]

177 We saw evidence in contemporaneous documentation of professionals communicating about how best to manage HIA 198's behaviour and expressing concern about her being contained in the ICU for an extended period. However their conclusion, which was recorded by a psychologist (Michael Barbour) from the APRU who was working with HIA 198, was that keeping her in the ICU was the only way to try and keep her safe given the "unacceptably high level of risk" she was posing to herself.[206]

178 HIA 233 was transferred to St Joseph's from Harberton House and was admitted on a Place of Safety Order. The intention was that the placement would be short term and that HIA 233 would return to Harberton House. However, during planned visits to Harberton House, including overnight stays, HIA 233's behaviour continued to be challenging and an application for her to be made subject to a Training School Order was granted on 26 January 1993. HIA 233 told us in her written statement that she was content to remain in St Joseph's because she felt safer there as there were no male members of staff or residents in the school.[207]

179 When HIA 233 gave evidence in person during Module 1 she was referred to what she said in her statement about St Joseph's and she confirmed that she had no complaints to make about her time in the school and that she had "loved it" there.[208] However, she did tell us about the time she spent in the ICU and how she was transferred to the unit.

202 Day 185, p.20.
203 Day 185, p.28.
204 Day 185, p.27.
205 Day 185, p 32 to 33.
206 SJM 199.
207 SJM 027.
208 Day 16, p.116.

180 She described the ICU, which she called the "lock up", as having four cells and that each cell had a metal bed and red doors and bars on the windows. She said she was put there many times, usually for two or three days at a time and that she would be given her usual allocation of cigarettes and water but no food. She said that time in the "lock up" was a punishment and that she would be "trailed there by her hair".[209]

181 SR 235 told us in response to this evidence that the ICU did not have cells but had three bedrooms, two for the use of girls sent there although normally only one girl would be in the unit at any one time, and one bedroom for the member of staff who was supervising the girl in the unit. She explained that the bed in each bedroom had a metal frame and was secured to the floor for the girls' safety. She confirmed that the door to the ICU was red but stated that there were no bars on the windows. She explained when she gave evidence in person that if a child wanted a particular member of staff to supervise them and be with them in the ICU that was facilitated where possible.[210]

182 SR 235 explained that she reviewed the records in relation to HIA 233 and found she had four admissions to the ICU. One of these admissions was for an overnight stay, which occurred after HIA 233 was discharged from St Joseph's and her behaviour was proving disruptive in Fort James children's home. On that occasion she was admitted at 11.03pm on 31 January 1995 and released and moved to a hostel the next day.[211]

183 SR 235 provided copies of contemporaneous records that detailed the reasons for HIA 233's other three admissions to the ICU which occurred when she was resident in St Joseph's and observation notes about her behaviour in the unit. These records showed that discussions were held with HIA 233 while she was in the ICU to help her to reflect on the disruptive behaviour that had caused her to be placed in the unit. Before she was released from her first stay in the unit in November 1993 she agreed a new contract about her behaviour[212] and during her stay in March 1994 she responded in writing to questions about what behaviour had led to her being placed in the unit and her feelings about being there.[213] The records also detail the food HIA 233 was given when she was in the ICU in March 1994 and what she chose to eat.[214]

209 SJM 026.
210 Day 186, p.54.
211 SJM 243.
212 SJM 242.
213 SJM 29179 to 29181.
214 SJM 29178.

184 We noted that although HIA 233 had only three admissions to the ICU while she was resident in St Joseph's, two of these stays were for around forty-eight hours which may explain why she remembered spending considerable amounts of time in the unit. SR 235 stated that no girl was "trailed" into the ICU by the hair and usually girls would accept that their behaviour was out of control and that they would have to go to the ICU.[215] There are contemporaneous records to indicate this was the case, for example it was recorded on 9 June 1994 that staff were concerned that HIA 233 had been sniffing substances as she was very "high" and that she agreed to spend the night in the ICU.[216] However, it was also recorded that in March 1994 physical force was required to get HIA 233 to the ICU. The circumstances were recorded by the member of staff as a "major incident" which indicates they were unusual and she described requiring assistance from a colleague:

> "…to remove her (HIA 233) physically – it was a case of dragging/pushing to the pool steps – she agreed to walk with [SJM 5] up the grass" and that once in the ICU "HIA 233 screamed, kicked etc for over an hour."[217]

185 Therefore, there is evidence of HIA 233 being physically removed to the ICU and spending extended periods in the unit. However, there is also evidence that she was properly monitored and cared for in the ICU, provided with food and assisted to consider her behaviour.

186 SJM 75 was in St Joseph's from 1994 to 1996. She told us she was placed in the ICU on one occasion for fighting. She described the ICU as "a good place to calm down" and that a member of staff stayed with her and she was allowed access to puzzles and magazines.[218]

187 From the evidence we have considered we are satisfied that the ICU was not overused and that when girls were placed in it they were appropriately cared for and monitored. When SR 240 wrote to the NIO to propose the unit she explained that the Board of Management envisaged it being used as:

> "…a temporary respite for a girl or girls who may be emotionally disturbed, suicidal or need space in a confidential setting to express grief, anger etc."[219]

215 SJM 29137.
216 SJM 29183.
217 SJM 29176.
218 SJM 29271.
219 SJM 1586

We consider that this intention was fulfilled and that there were no systemic failings in relation to the use of the ICU in St Joseph's.

Sexual Abuse

188 We received no allegations from applicants that they were sexually abused while in St Joseph's. However we are aware from material received from the police that three former residents complained to them that they suffered sexual abuse in the school.

189 In 1998 a former resident, SJM 58 complained to the police that in the mid-1970s, SJM 4 had sexually abused her. She told the police the sexual abuse started when she was fourteen and was resident in House 1, the house SJM 4 worked in, and continued after she was transferred to House 4 until she left the school two years later. SJM 58 told the police that she thought another resident SJM 109 might also have been abused by SJM 4.[220]

190 SJM 4 was interviewed by the police and denied the allegations. She admitted buying gifts for SJM 58, and that she was a favourite of hers and known as "SJM 4's child" but said that each house parent was known to have favourites.[221] Police also contacted SJM 109 who was shocked at the allegations, denied she was ever abused by SJM 4 and said she had the utmost respect for her.[222] The Director of Public Prosecutions directed no prosecution because the evidence was insufficient to afford a reasonable prospect of conviction.[223]

191 Another complaint was brought to the attention of the police by the congregation when a former resident, SJM 60, told a nun that a male member of staff who looked after the swimming pool in St Joseph's sexually abused her.[224] The matter was not investigated by the police because once SJM 60 learned that the man in question was dead, she did not proceed with her complaint.

192 SJM 59 spoke to police in 2004 about her time in St Joseph's from 1954 aged nine years until she left in 1961. She alleged that she was sexually abused on a regular basis by SR 238.[225] Police investigations found that SR

220 SJM 4034–4040
221 SJM 4026
222 SJM 4026-4027.
223 SJM 4020.
224 SJM 4079.
225 SJM 4087-4093.

238 was still alive but suffering from senile dementia and it was determined that she could not be interviewed because of her medical condition.[226]

193 These are the only allegations of sexual abuse in St Joseph's that we are aware of and we do not find that they amount to evidence of systemic sexual abuse. We also noted that HIA 195, who told us she was abused in Nazareth House by Father Brendan Smith, felt able when he visited her in St Joseph's to tell a member of staff that he scared her. She said the member of staff told SR 240 who went out to see Father Smyth as he was leaving in his car and told him that he wasn't welcome to visit HIA 195 again.[227]

Emotional Abuse

194 HIA 178 told us that SR 237 made demeaning remarks about her mother in front of other girls:

> "She told me that I would 'end up in jail like your mother' and also that 'she didn't want you and so we had to look after you'."[228]

HIA 178 explained that she had not known until that point that her mother had been in prison.

195 HIA 178 also recalled SR 237 pulling curlers out of her hair which she had received as a present from a former day pupil at her school and confiscating a scarf she received from a former resident and telling her on both occasions: "We have no pets here."[229] She also told us that when she told SR 237 that she had passed a music examination SR 237 slapped her across the face and she thought that was to ensure that she did not get above herself.

196 HIA 203 told us that when her older sister DL 219 came to visit her in St Joseph's she was kept at the door and not allowed in. She told us that SR 237 and SR 242 said DL 219 was unholy and a fallen woman and that HIA 203 should not be associating with her. When she gave evidence in person, HIA 203 commented that she thought the nuns responded in that way because they had a funny attitude to unmarried women having children or to women who married outside the Catholic faith.[230]

226 SJM 4113.
227 SNB 176.
228 SJM 334.
229 Day 184, pp.88 to 89.
230 Day 184, p.43.

197 HIA 249 described a lack of affection from the nuns:

> "We were never shown any affection by the nuns - no love at all. They were very cruel. I remember feeling frightened of them all the time."[231]

However, she acknowledged that her sister SJM 27 had a very close relationship with SR 248. The Sisters of St Louis confirmed this and explained that in 2010 they agreed to SJM 27's request to be buried with SR 248 whom she considered to be a mother figure and that SJM 27 was the only person other than a nun to be buried in the cemetery at Middletown convent.[232]

198 HIA 376 told us that when she took an overdose in July 1983, a few weeks after her first admission to the school, she had to stay in hospital for a few days and her sister HIA 176 was not allowed to leave the school to visit her and her parents were not informed for a week. She said when she returned to the school she was not given food for three days and she believed this was a punishment for taking an overdose.[233] SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and explained the assessment and treatment that a girl who took an overdose would receive and stated that in her experience:

> "There would never have been punishment meted out as HIA 376 describes."[234]

She also explained that there was no record of HIA 176 asking to visit her sister.

199 HIA 376 said in her statement that SR 240 told her that her parents didn't want her and that was why she was in the home and that she was dirty.[235]

200 HIA 176 told us that when she became pregnant at sixteen it was a result of being raped by a twenty-year-old man. She said that staff in St Joseph's and her social worker SJM 56 knew the pregnancy was the result of a rape but provided no help to her.[236] Both SJM 56 and SR 235 told us that there are no references in contemporaneous records to HIA 176 telling them that the pregnancy was the result of being raped.[237]

231 SJM 069.
232 SJM 22005.
233 SJM 064.
234 SJM 939
235 SJM 062.
236 SJM 477.
237 SJM 2931-29313 and SJM 29016.

201 HIA 176 also told us that when she was pregnant SR 240 called her a whore and said she was unfit to be a mother.[238] However, SR 235 pointed out that HIA 176 was allowed to stay in St Joseph's when her pregnancy caused trouble with her parents and that after she had her child she brought her to St Joseph's for an overnight stay. SR 235 also explained that staff assisted a number of girls who became pregnant during their time in St Joseph's and that the independent living bungalow was converted to enable two girls to remain in the school with their babies.[239]

202 HIA 176 told us that SJM 4 subjected her to verbal and emotional abuse. She said that she called her a "Derry Hog" and laughed at her when she asked for a bra, saying that she would need to get a chest to get a bra.[240] SJM 4 denied that she behaved in this way and said that although some of the girls used the term "Derry Hogs" she never did.

203 We were concerned to note that when she was interviewed by the police about alleged sexual abuse SJM 4 admitted that the woman who alleged the abuse was her favourite and was known to be and that all house parents had favourites.[241]

204 When SR 235 responded to evidence from HIA 376 that a nun SR 246 favoured her and another girl, she pointed out that behaviour which favoured one girl over another would quickly have led to an enquiry by other girls:

> "They were very conscious of anything that could be perceived as favouring one girl over another."[242]

We consider this an accurate assessment of how girls would be alert to favouritism by staff and therefore we consider that the overt favouritism admitted by SJM 4, which included the girl in question being called "SJM 4's child" was poor practice and should have been identified as such and addressed by senior staff.

205 HIA 176 told us that she found the public awarding of marks for behaviour humiliating.[243] However, we accept that the public allocation of marks was used to motivate girls towards good behaviour and reinforce the consequences of poor behaviour.

238 SJM 470.
239 SJM 29016.
240 SJM 472.
241 SJM 4026.
242 SJM 941
243 SJM 473

206 HIA 233 told us that staff in St Joseph's were kind to her and she particularly remembered SR 236 singing to her to try and calm her down.[244] She recognised that she was a "handful" and she recalled SR 235 calling her a "delinquent". SR 235 told us she had no memory of this and that it was not the type of language she would have used to any of the girls.[245]

207 HIA 233 indicated that at times she felt anger towards staff in St Joseph's because they did not believe her about the sexual abuse she suffered prior to her admission to the school. SR 235 told us that staff did believe that HIA 233 had been sexually abused and referred us to the minute of a review meeting held in January 1993,[246] where the implications of the abuse for HIA 233's return home were discussed, and to handwritten notes of a discussion a member of staff had with HIA 233 about it.[247] However, the fact remains that HIA 233 felt that she was not believed about the abuse.

208 HIA 49, who was in the school from 1971 to 1974, told us she loved it there and said in her statement:

> "I'd never had a hug in my life and I got a hug off [SR 240]...They treated us like human beings and trusted us. The nuns were kind and considerate."[248]

209 When she gave evidence in person, she confirmed this experience of the school and referred in particular to her mother being invited to stay at the school so that she and HIA 49 could spend some time reconnecting with each other.[249]

210 HIA 175, who was in the school from 1972 to 1974, told us that she was happy in St Joseph's and that in particular SR 240 made her feel that she mattered:

> "You were made feel like you were wanted and were treated with warmth and affection which I had never experienced before."[250]

211 HIA 195 who was in the school from 1977 to 1979 told us:

> "I loved it in Middletown. The nuns were brilliant. The staff members were so good to us."[251]

244 SJM 026
245 SJM 215
246 SJM 215
247 SJM 239
248 SJM 22253
249 Day 9, p.31.
250 SJM 22239.
251 SNB 176.

212 We carefully considered the allegations we have heard about emotional abuse in St Joseph's, such as the derogatory remarks made by SR 237, and we noted the overt favouritism by staff described by SJM 4. We also took into account the positive accounts we have received about the warm care and attention witnesses told us they received in St Joseph's and the clear focus from the 1970s onwards on promoting the emotional well-being of the girls. We concluded from all the evidence available to us that there was not systemic emotional abuse of girls in St Joseph's.

Neglect

Medical Treatment

213 HIA 178 suffered from a disability caused by an injury at birth. Contemporaneous records and correspondence show that the congregation sought medical assistance about the disability, which entailed HIA 178 having appointments with an orthopaedic consultant in May and August 1949 and October 1950. When Dr Simpson and Miss Forrest inspected the school in December 1950, they recommended that a written diagnosis and prognosis should be requested from the surgeon.[252] This was subsequently received and the surgeon confirmed that no effective treatment was available.[253] HIA 178 accepted that she attended medical appointments but told us she had no memory of being encouraged or helped to do the exercises that the consultant had recommended.[254]

214 There is also a record of HIA 178 having a hospital stay of just under a month in August/September 1949 but it is unclear why the hospitalisation was considered necessary and what it achieved, and HIA 178 who was under two years of age at that time has understandably no memory of the reason for it. HIA 178 did remember having her head shaved for a medical appointment and she thought that might have been in relation to the treatment of ringworm.[255]

215 The congregation told us that a local doctor would visit the school fortnightly.[256] HIA 178 did not remember seeing a doctor but she did remember a dentist coming to the school.

252 SJM 22963.
253 SJM 22937.
254 SJM 337.
255 Day 184, p.85.
256 SJM 22925.

216 HIA 249 remembered being sick in bed but did not remember seeing a doctor or a nurse. However, she remembered being taken to hospital when she fell off a chair and having her arm put in plaster.[257]

217 A doctor's opinion was sought about the appropriateness of HIA 249 being in an industrial school because of her age and her fragile health. We saw a doctor's written confirmation that HIA 249 suffered from congenital heart disease and his opinion that she was being cared for particularly well in St Joseph's.[258] SR 235 confirmed on behalf of the congregation that HIA 249 was admitted to the Royal Victoria Hospital on 11 December 1955 in relation to her heart condition and remained there for nine days and that there was follow-up correspondence between the hospital and the school about her care.[259]

218 HIA 203 told us in her written statement that SR 237 did not believe her when she said she was feeling ill and that it was only through the intervention of a caretaker who noticed how swollen her jaw was that she was diagnosed as suffering from mumps. She told us in her written statement that she was left alone in the school while she was sick in bed with mumps, but clarified when she gave evidence in person that a nun brought her food although she was left mainly on her own.[260] Even though the Sisters of St Louis pointed out that there is no record of HIA 203 being sick with mumps she was definite that was the case.

219 HIA 176 remembered consulting a nurse who worked in St Joseph's and also being seen by a local doctor. She told us she complained to the nurse about problems with her chest and was told it was phlegm. She linked this lack of treatment to asthma that she suffered from as an adult. She also told us that she did not attend a dentist while she was in St Joseph's.[261]

220 SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and provided copies of documentation which recorded the medical attention HIA 176 received, including a referral for a chest x-ray. She also confirmed that when HIA 176 was in St Joseph's, a nurse was employed in the school to tend to the girls and that a local doctor was available to advise on more serious

257 SJM 071.
258 SJM 1333.
259 SJM 22010.
260 Day 184, p.36.
261 SJM 475.

conditions.[262] She explained that HIA 176 developed an abscess on her tooth when she was on holiday in Runkerry and that the records of that trip indicate that she developed a fear of the dentist. SR 235 notes that this may explain why HIA 176 received treatment for this abscess from the local doctor who attended the girls in St Joseph's and why she did not have the regular dental check-ups which records show the other girls attended.[263]

221 HIA 176 also said that she was unprepared for puberty and that although SR 243 had been kind to her when she got her first period she did not provide any further guidance. SR 235 explained that the girls received sex education in class, and she assumed this would have covered menstruation, and that girls would have discussed such matters with house staff. We noted that the diaries which were maintained in the houses when HIA 176 was a resident in the school recorded when girls had their periods.[264]

222 We concluded from the evidence, particularly that provided in the contemporaneous records, that nursing care was provided on site and that the girls could avail of regular consultations with a local doctor and dentist. It is also clear that when specialised medical attention was required it was arranged. We also noted that SSI inspectors were satisfied with the health care that was available to the girls and the records that were maintained of illnesses and medical complaints and the treatment given for them. In the report of the inspection that took place in 1993 the inspectors noted that satisfactory arrangements were in place for medical, nursing and dental care and that, for example, the girls received dental check-ups every six months.[265]

Education

223 HIA 178 told us that her education in St Joseph's was inadequate and described being made to sit at the back of the class and having to teach herself to read.[266] Contemporaneous records show that HIA 178 did well in typing and elocution but she said she had no memory of these achievements.[267]

262 SJM 29013.
263 SJM 29013.
264 SJM 29013.
265 SJM 1778.
266 Day 184, p.90.
267 Day 184, p.91.

224 HIA 249 also told us that she was made to sit at the back of the class and got no support to learn. She said that nuns beat her for mistakes and that day pupils from the locality who also attended the school were not beaten in the same manner.[268]

225 HIA 178 told us she had positive memories of learning to play music and Irish dancing.[269] HIA 203 was also positive about the music classes she attended and the nun who taught her, SR 269. She remembered being hit on the hands for not playing the piano correctly but recalled that it was SR 237 who hit her, not SR 269.

226 HIA 176 complained that the education at St Joseph's was poor and that some teachers allowed the girls to engage in leisure activities such as playing bingo and watching films rather than learning activities.[270] SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and, while unable to comment on HIA 176's comments about the behaviour of individual teachers, she did provide a copy of the annual education report for 1984-85 which showed the positive educational results achieved by the girls in that year.[271]

227 In contrast to the criticisms we received about the standard of education provided in St Joseph's, we also received positive comments from witnesses about how they were enabled to learn in the school. HIA 84, who was in St Joseph's in 1976-77, said it was one of the happiest times in her life and she appreciated the different classes available to her, including being able to learn to do tapestry.[272] Also, SJM 75, who was in the school from 1994 to 1996, told us that she had been expelled from her secondary school and that she learnt to read and write in St Joseph's as the smaller class sizes made it easier for her to learn.[273]

228 We noted that in the 1993 inspection of the school the SSI inspectors recorded that Department of Education inspectors who had inspected the school in 1989-90 had commented on the good relationship that existed between staff and girls and how it would "undoubtedly lead to the promotion of higher levels of self-esteem and self-confidence."[274] The inspectors also commented on the investment in the fabric of the school

268 SJM 071.
269 Day 184, p.78.
270 SJM 474.
271 SJM 29009.
272 SNB 726.
273 SJM 29271.
274 SJM 1773.

and how it helped to create the necessary environment within which "the young people have the opportunity to learn and develop intellectually."[275]

229 The DoJ in its closing submission referred us to the written report by a member of the Management Board who had visited the school in August 1995. As part of that visit she met with one of the teachers who informed her that education inspectors had visited recently. They had stated they were very impressed by the exam results achieved and her teaching methods and commitment and had requested that her training packages be made available to other schools.[276]

230 From the evidence we considered we reached the view that education was seen as a central element of the care provided to girls in St Joseph's and that it was well resourced in relation to the number of teaching staff and the physical environment. There is evidence that girls undertook state examinations, which provided formal recognition of their academic attainment, and throughout the decades girls were taught to play musical instruments and benefited from elocution lessons.

Enuresis

231 Since St Joseph's mainly cared for older girls from 1952 onwards we heard very little evidence about the management of enuresis. However, we considered it worth noting that HIA 124, who was in the school from approximately 1974 to 1977, told us that after being punished for her enuresis in another children's home she was too scared to tell the staff in St Joseph's about her difficulties with it. She explained that a member of staff realised her difficulty and brought her new sheets and a rubber sheet and with her agreement arranged for a member of staff to wake her early so that she could change her bed and shower before the other girls were awake. HIA 124 told us that in time she stopped wetting her bed and that with the support of SR 240 in later years she shared her experience with other girls in St Joseph's who were suffering with enuresis.[277]

232 We carefully considered the written statements, oral testimony and contemporaneous records and correspondence in relation to the care provided in St Joseph's and we did not find evidence of systemic neglect.

275 SJM 1773.
276 SJM 30047.
277 SNB 842-843.

Unacceptable Practices

Excessive Chores

233 HIA 203 was resident in the school from 1964 to 1967. She complained of having to do excessive chores and said she was constantly scrubbing floors and having to work in the laundry. She told us that as an older girl she was expected to supervise younger residents to make sure they bathed and washed their hair and that if they misbehaved SR 237 would "have a go at them and then have a go at me."[278]

234 The Sisters of St Louis pointed out in its response that since all the girls were teenagers there would have been no need for HIA 203 to supervise them, but HIA 203 insisted when she gave evidence in person that because she was the oldest girl SR 237 would shout at her if younger girls did not behave properly.[279] She also clarified that she was not saying she had to scrub floors all day but that she had more chores to complete in the mornings than the girls who attended school and she then had to work all day in the laundry that served the school.[280]

235 HIA 178 also told us that she had to do excessive chores from an early age and did not agree with the response provided by the Sisters of St Louis that chores were age appropriate and were the sort of chores children would be expected to do in a family home.

236 HIA 249 described having to clean on a daily basis from a young age and told us that on one occasion a nun beat her because she put a cloth on her foot to help wax and polish the floor.[281] SR 234 responded on behalf of the congregation and explained in her statement that attaching cloths to feet was the method used for polishing the floor and that therefore she could not understand why HIA 249 would have been punished for doing that.[282]

237 HIA 376 complained about excessive chores and said that her hands were "red raw" from cleaning.[283] She described having to clean all day Saturday and moving all the chairs and furniture from rooms into the garden in order to clean the rooms.[284] SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and

278 Day 184, p.14.
279 Day 184, p.14.
280 Day 184, p.16.
281 SJM 068.
282 SJM 22005.
283 SJM 062.
284 Day 187, p.90.

explained that at the time HIA 376 was in the school, although chores had to be done each day, the girls would be allowed a lie-in on Saturday mornings and after completing some chores with the assistance of staff they would have had Saturday afternoons free.[285] She pointed out that the furniture in the houses was much too heavy for it to be removed to the garden as described by HIA 376.[286] SR 235 also referred us to a description in the report of the 1987 inspection of the school of the relaxed atmosphere that prevailed on Saturdays and the outings that were arranged, and she confirmed that was her memory of Saturdays in the school at that time. She also provided a copy of a diary entry for 24 November 1984 that recorded HIA 376 having a lie-in until 1p.m. on that Saturday and referred us to other diary entries which record HIA 376 enjoying her work in the kitchen and expressing positive views about it. When HIA 376 gave evidence in person she insisted that cleaning was undertaken all day until teatime on Saturdays and that furniture had to be moved as part of that cleaning. She confirmed that she regarded the amount of cleaning she was expected to do as excessive.[287]

238 SJM 73, SJM 74 and SJM 75 provided positive statements about the care they received in St Joseph's and told us that they had chores to do, which were allocated on a weekly basis, but that they were not onerous and were the type of chores they were expected to do in their family homes.

239 In response to the evidence of witnesses about excessive chores SJM 4 told us that it was important to have an organised regime that enabled the girls to contribute to keeping the "home" tidy and a reasonable place to live and she stressed that the daily chores were light duties and that external cleaners were used for more substantial cleaning.[288]

240 We accepted that until the start of the 1970s girls had to do daily chores which often involved a significant level of manual work. However, it appeared that once the new house units opened the chores were more akin to those that would be expected in a family home. We consider this change in expectation and approach reflected the wider societal norms about how much physical work children should undertake therefore we did not consider that the chores expected of the girls amounted to systemic abuse.

285 SJM 935.
286 SJM 936.
287 Day 187, pp. 90 to 91.
288 SJM 21001.

Force Feeding

241 HIA 203 recalled being force-fed beetroot by a nun she could not name. She said the nun forced the beetroot into her mouth and as a result she vomited. She confirmed that this had only happened on one occasion. When she was told by Counsel to the Inquiry that SR 240 told us that in her long time working in the school she had never heard of an allegation of force-feeding, HIA 203 was adamant that it had happened.

242 HIA 161 also told us when she gave evidence in person that she was force-fed in St Joseph's with nuns holding her down and forcing food into her mouth.[289] The Sisters of St Louis pointed out in their closing submission that although she wrote a book about her time in care this is the first time HIA 161 had made such an allegation.[290]

243 From the evidence we have heard we do not believe that force-feeding was a regular occurrence in St Joseph's and while these incidents may have happened we do not consider they amount to systemic abuse.

Separation of Siblings

244 HIA 203 was admitted to St Joseph's with her sister and they spent time together in the school. However, she told us that on one occasion she was prevented from spending time with her two brothers, who were resident in another children's home. She explained that she saw her brothers as they were leaving the holiday house used by the Catholic congregations in Glenariff as she was arriving. She described how she and her brothers ran to each other but were pulled apart by a nun and not allowed to spend time together. She could not recall the name of the nun who pulled them apart. She also told us that she wrote letters to her brothers but that they did not receive them. The Sisters of St Louis provided documentation that showed that HIA 203 and her sister DL 222 had written to their other sister who was living in England and that correspondence had been received, but HIA 203 had no memory of writing to her sister.

245 HIA 249, who was admitted to St Joseph's with her sisters in 1946, told us that she was separated from her sisters on arrival at the school. There is no living sister who worked in the school in the 1940s, but SR 235 who worked in it in the 1950s explained that at that time and in earlier years girls were allocated to dormitories according to their age and that could explain why HIA 249 was separated from her sisters. However, she pointed out that HIA 249 would have had contact with her sisters throughout the day in the classroom and at meal times.[291] We noted correspondence in 1947 between SR 248 and the MoHA about the appropriateness of HIA 249 and her baby sister residing in an industrial school. SR 248 pointed out in that correspondence that the continuance of the placement would have the advantage of enabling HIA 249 to have the companionship of her sisters.[292]

289 Day 184, p.177.
290 SJM 30112.

246 HIA 249 also told us that there was no privacy during family visits and that she and her sisters were taken in separately to meet their parents and that a nun was always in attendance. She suggested this may have been to prevent her older sisters from complaining about the treatment they were receiving.[293]

247 HIA 376 said that she and her sister who were in St Joseph's together for two periods amounting to five months in total from 1983 to 1985 were kept apart. SR 235 explained on behalf of the congregation that at that time its approach was to give sisters placed in the school at the same time the opportunity to develop their own identity in recognition that many of the girls had been neglected in their homes and that tensions may have existed between siblings. She explained that the decisions about whether the sisters should be accommodated in the same house would have been influenced by what was known about their relationship and she exhibited contemporaneous records which showed that tensions existed between HIA 376 and her sister HIA 176.[294] However, she pointed out that the sisters would have been in the same class in school and that there would have been no barrier to seeing each other in the evenings.[295] HIA 376 accepted when she gave evidence in person that there were opportunities during the day when she could see her sister but that when she asked to see her in the evening it would depend on the mood of the staff member on duty whether she would be allowed to do so.[296]

248 HIA 376 also recounted a time when her parents visited and she was not allowed to spend time with them and her sister but was made to serve them tea and then was taken to a small television room where

291 SJM 22003.
292 SJM 1341.
293 SJM 072.
294 SJM 928.
295 Day 187, p.95.
296 Day 187, p.96.

she observed them though a window.[297] SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and said that staff were not present during family visits unless there were restrictions regarding family access, so that the separation from her parents that HIA 376 described could not have been enforced and would have been "completely inconsistent with how we sought to maintain links between girls and their parents."[298] HIA 376 accepted when she gave evidence in person that most weekends she was given leave to return home and therefore had access to her parents and her sister then.[299]

249 HIA 176 told us that she only learnt from another girl that her sister HIA 376 was hospitalised as a result of taking an overdose. She said that when she asked SR 240 about it she was told to go about her own business and that her sister would be all night. She also told us that she was not allowed to visit HIA 376 in hospital. SR 235 responded on behalf of the congregation and told us that there was no record of HIA 176 asking to visit HIA 376 in hospital.[300]

250 We concluded that there was not a policy of separating siblings in St Joseph's and that even in earlier years when girls were allocated to dormitories according to their age there were still opportunities for them to socialise together during the day. We considered that although HIA 376 and HIA 176 were in different houses there were ample opportunities for them to spend time together during the day and when they were at home together at weekends. HIA 203 was obviously upset about not being allowed to spend time with her brothers when they met in Glenariff but we accepted that this approach may have been taken for the practical reason that the boys needed to leave the holiday home so that the girls could settle in. We do not consider that this one-off occurrence amounted to systemic abuse.

A False Impression Created for Inspectors

251 HIA 203 recalled new linen being put on beds when someone official was coming to visit and that when the visit was over it was removed. She also recalled being told to be careful about what she said to any such visitors.[301] HIA 203 clarified at the hearing that the usual linen was of a

297 Day 178, p.94.
298 SJM 939.
299 Day 187, p.94.
300 SJM 29007.
301 SJM 056.

good standard and regularly laundered but was adamant that new bedding was put on for official visits and then removed. When Counsel explained that SR 240 did not recall such practices in her time in St Joseph's, HIA 230 responded "well, it didn't happen maybe in her time, but it did happen in mine."[302]

252 HIA 178 remembered that although the clothes she was given to wear were second hand they were lovely. She also remembered being given better clothes when inspectors were coming, but that those clothes were taken off her when the inspectors left. When Counsel put to her the Sisters of St Louis's response that children received new clothes regularly she disagreed and was adamant that better clothes were given out for inspections and then taken back. She also commented that children were not allowed to speak privately to inspectors.[303] While we considered it possible that better linen and clothing may have been given out for use on days inspectors were expected, we do not consider that amounts to systemic abuse, particularly as the applicants told us that the standard of the regular linen and clothing was good.

Religious Observance

253 HIA 203 and HIA 376 told us that there was an excessive emphasis on religious practice and observance. HIA 203 recalled having to go to Mass every day and having to pray regularly throughout the day, but the Sisters of St Louis stated that girls were only required to go to Mass once a week and were expected to attend daily assembly. HIA 176 accepted when giving evidence in person that it would have been assembly not Mass that they were required to attend each day.[304]

254 The DoJ in its closing submission pointed out in response to this evidence that the Training School Rules provided that each day should begin and end with a prayer and that Holy Days should be observed in such a manner as the Board of Management deemed appropriate.[305]

255 Inspectors considered religious observance in their inspections in 1987, 1993 and 1994 and did not find the approach excessive. Inspectors commented in the 1993 report that while the school was strongly influenced by a religious order:

302 Day 184, p.49.
303 Day 184, p.87.
304 Day 187, p.54.
305 SJM 30044.

> "Religion does not seem to be over-emphasised in the daily life of the school."[306]

St Joseph's was run by a Roman Catholic order for girls of that faith and therefore we consider that religious observance was an understandable aspect of the life of the school and the evidence we received did not suggest that it was excessive.

Food

256 Miss Forrest inspected the school in November 1951 and observed:

> "We saw a satisfying meal being prepared in the kitchen. The appearance of the girls is the best recommendation for their diet!"[307]

This was echoed by the recorded observations of Mr Hughes, who was a monthly visitor to the home in 1956:

> "I have seen the children of this school monthly for the last 12 months and often during meal times. They are well looked after as regards food and clothing and always appeared to be very happy."[308]

257 HIA 178 told us that often she did not get enough to eat and went to bed hungry.[309] HIA 161 also said that she did not receive enough food. She told us that on one occasion she and other girls locked themselves in the refectory and handed over a list of demands to be met before they would come out, including a demand for more bread and butter.[310] She explained that the lock-in came to an end because some of the girls needed to go to the toilet and that their demands were not met.[311]

258 While we accept that access to food is an emotional issue and that there may have been occasions when growing girls felt hungry we found no evidence of systemic abuse in relation to the provision of food in St Joseph's.

Smoking

259 HIA 176 criticised the congregation for facilitating smoking amongst the girls[312] and indicated that she started smoking in St Joseph's. However

306 SJM 1769.
307 SJM 1300.
308 SJM 25261.
309 SJM 337.
310 Day 184, p.177.
311 Day 184, p.178.
312 SJM 475.

the HSCB provided a record which showed that HIA 176 was already smoking before she was admitted to the school.[313]

260 HIA 233 told us that she started smoking at the age of thirteen in St Joseph's because cigarettes were handed out at regular intervals during the day by the nuns and that she still smokes the same brand of cigarette today.

261 SR 235 explained that most of the girls who arrived in St Joseph's were already smoking and while that was not encouraged neither was preventing them from smoking a major priority. She explained that girls could buy cigarettes with their pocket money but they had to hand them in and staff gave them out at regular intervals during the day. She accepted:

> "With the benefit of hindsight and given the knowledge which is now available in relation to the dangers of smoking, I accept that permitting smoking was not in the best interests of the girls."[314]

We accepted SR 235's explanation and found it reasonable. Therefore, we found no systemic failing in relation to girls being allowed to smoke in St Joseph's.

Lack of Preparation for Leaving Care

262 The importance of preparing girls for life after care was recognised as early as 1952. Dr Simpson and Miss Forrest recorded in their report of the inspection they completed of the school in December 1952 that the new system of aftercare was working well and that SJM 44 visited the school regularly to get to know her future charges.[315]

263 SR 240 told us that in the 1970s a licensing committee operated that was a review committee made up of two members of the Board of Management and three or four external professionals, who were responsible for reviewing girls two to three months before they were due for release. She explained that the committee would interview each girl and relevant members of staff to ensure sufficient preparation had been made to enable her to transfer from care. In particular, the committee would focus on what job opportunities and accommodation were available to her and what further support could be given to her so that she could be released on licence.[316]

313 SJM 22259.
314 SJM 216.
315 SJM 1284.
316 SJM 885.

264 HIA 203 complained about a lack of preparation for leaving care and that she was removed by SJM 44 and taken to live with a relative with whom she was not familiar. When HIA 203 was shown contemporaneous correspondence and records she accepted that SR 237 contacted her relatives to try and make arrangements for her and that she was taken to Belfast for a job interview although she has no memory of that happening. However, she insisted that plans for her future were never discussed with her and that she felt unprepared for the move and was not given the opportunity to say goodbye to her sister.[317] When she gave evidence in person HIA 203 acknowledged that some time after she left St Joseph's she got into trouble and had to complete a prison sentence and that SR 237 arranged a hostel placement for her on her release from prison.[318]

265 HIA 161 also told us that she had very limited preparation for her departure from St Joseph's. When she gave evidence in person she was shown copies of contemporaneous documentation that showed the nuns were liaising with her relatives and potential employers about possible openings for her but HIA 161 said she knew nothing about this and that she remembered being given ten-minutes notice of her departure.[319]

266 HIA 175, who was in the school from 1972 to 1974, told us that the training she received in Middletown helped her to get a job at a home for older people which was arranged by staff in Middletown. She stayed at that job for a short period before moving to a better job.[320]

267 Sister Canice Durkan, who worked in St Joseph's from 1987 until it closed in 2000, had a particular responsibility for organising aftercare for girls and although she spent time in the school she was not attached to one of the houses.[321] She explained that former residents would keep in touch with staff and that outreach work continued with girls after they had settled in their own homes and in some cases had children.[322]

268 While it is clear that some of the applicants were not aware of the efforts being made on their behalf to organise appropriate aftercare arrangements for them, we were convinced that the school did its best to organise accommodation and employment for girls and maintained contact with

317 SJM 056.
318 Day 184, pp.34 to 35.
319 Day 184, p.167.
320 SJM 22240.
321 Day 187, p.169.
322 Day 187, p.170.

girls and welcomed them back to St Joseph's for visits after they were discharged from the school.

269 We have considered the statements we have received about unacceptable practices, the responses to them from the Sisters of St Louis, contemporaneous records and the findings of inspectors, and have concluded that there were no unacceptable systemic practices in St Joseph's.

Conclusion

270 Given the positive assessments by inspectors of the care provided in St Joseph's throughout the decades and the accounts from some witnesses about how well they were treated in the school it is perhaps not surprising that we only received a small number of complaints about the school.

271 We carefully considered the evidence in relation to SR 237 and concluded that she was physically abusive to girls to the extent that it amounted to systemic physical abuse.

272 We found that the ICU was used appropriately and not over-used and that girls were not merely contained there but were given time to calm down, reflect on their behaviour and to consider how better to manage it in future. We were convinced that when SR 240 was in charge the emphasis was in supporting and developing girls and helping them to understand and manage their behaviour and to develop their self-esteem and confidence. We found contemporaneous evidence that staff maintained good contact with girls' social workers and worked with them to develop and review care plans. Evidence from inspections indicated that girls were encouraged to maintain contact with their families, and family members were made to feel welcome when they visited St Joseph's.

273 We found some evidence of overt favouritism being shown by some staff to chosen girls and while we consider this poor practice that should have been identified and addressed we did not consider that it amounted to systemic abuse.

274 The work of St Joseph's was supported by a level of state funding that was generous in relation to voluntary children's homes and meant that a good staff-resident ratio could be maintained, which enabled the provision of individual attention to girls and the creation of a more home-like environment. The stability of the workforce was also a positive factor that assisted in the provision of consistent standards of care and a confident approach to working with girls, many of whom displayed very challenging behaviour including significant self-harm. The staffing ratio and consistency of the workforce was greatly assisted by the availability of the sisters who worked in the school and in particular those sisters who were senior managers. Inspectors found these senior managers were readily available to the girls despite their additional responsibilities for overseeing the operation of the school, liaising with government officials and being accountable to the Board of Management. It was clear that SR 240 in particular was successful in attracting funding for the school and persuading officials that specialist well-resourced care in appropriate surroundings with high quality facilities was needed to address the increasing complexity of the difficulties experienced by girls being placed in the school.

275 In addition to our finding in relation to SR 237 we found that the lack of formal inspections in the period from 1968 to 1987 was a systemic failing by the MoHA, and then the NIO, to ensure that St Joseph's was providing proper care and meeting statutory requirements about the operation of training schools. This meant girls in the school at that time did not have the benefit of external monitoring of the facilities and practices in the school. However, once Mr Donnell was seconded to provide professional advice to the NIO about the running of the school and a programme of inspections was established and implemented there was a high level of detailed scrutiny of and support to the school.

276 Our consideration of St Joseph's was assisted by the detailed records and diaries that were maintained in the school and retained by the congregation. They provided a clear picture of how the school was developed and operated over the decades and recorded levels of interest in, and concern for, the girls which demonstrated that the ethos, principles and policies that underpinned the school were genuinely applied in practice.

Summary of Findings

We found the following systemic failings in relation to St Joseph's.

The Ministry of Home Affairs and the Northern Ireland Office:

277 The lack of formal inspections in the period from 1968 to 1987 was a systemic failing by the MoHA, and then the NIO, to ensure that St Joseph's was providing proper care and meeting statutory requirements about the operation of training schools. This meant girls in the school at that time did not have the benefit of external monitoring of the facilities and practices in the school. (Para. 57)

Sisters of St Louis

278 During the period of SR 237's directorship, between 1957 and 1971, she was physically abusive to girls to the extent that it amounted to systemic physical abuse. (Para. 160)

Chapter 19:

Module 8 – Barnardo's

Introduction

1 The Inquiry devoted Module 8 to the examination of evidence relating to two homes run by the organisation now known as Barnardo's, but for most of that time as Dr Barnardo's, in Northern Ireland. These homes were known as Macedon and Sharonmore, and were dealt with in the same module because Sharonmore succeeded Macedon, and many of the applicants, and much of the evidence, related to a period when some of the applicants were in one or other of the two homes. As will be apparent from the evidence we consider, some at least of the issues and the evidence relating to these issues overlap both homes.

2 The Inquiry devoted two weeks covering eight sitting days between 7 December 2015 and 17 December 2015, during which we heard oral evidence from three applicants and received the written statement from a fourth. We also received oral and written evidence from Lynda Wilson, the Director of Barnardo's Northern Ireland, and from five former employees of Barnardo's. The Inquiry tried unsuccessfully to locate BAR 2, but on 17 December 2015 he made contact with the Inquiry. He was then provided with the relevant evidence, and ultimately provided the Inquiry with a statement dated 24 February 2016. He was offered the opportunity to give oral evidence but declined to do so.[1]

3 Our investigations have not been limited to the matters raised by the evidence of the four applicants, because we also considered material obtained by the Inquiry from Barnardo's and from other sources, particularly from the police, relating to the care provided by Barnardo's to the children in both Macedon and Sharonmore.

4 A substantial part of the material considered by the Inquiry during this module related to allegations that resulted in a major police investigation into the actions of two former staff members of Barnardo's who were employed at either Macedon or Sharonmore. These two individuals, to whom we shall refer as BAR 1 and BAR 2, were the subject of a Crown Court prosecution in 2004 based upon the evidence of ten individuals, nine of whom were former residents - the tenth being the child of a former staff member. Following the convictions of BAR 1 and BAR 2 on many, but not all, of the charges against them, both appealed to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal. In 2005, after considering new evidence, the Court of Appeal quashed their convictions and decided not to order a retrial on those charges in respect of which they had been convicted at the Crown

1 BAR 2546-2548.

Court. The effect of the acquittals at the Crown Court, and the quashing of the charges in relation to which they had been convicted, was that BAR 1 and BAR 2 were acquitted of all of the charges against them.

5 Because of the nature of the allegations it was necessary for us to consider afresh the evidence relating to the allegations which led to the police investigation and the subsequent prosecution. Although the allegations we considered mostly related to the period 1977 to 1981, we have also considered events that are alleged to have occurred outside that period, and for that reason we have followed a broadly chronological approach when considering these allegations.

6 We had written submissions from a number of those who were the subject of allegations, as well as submissions on behalf of Barnardo's, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MOHA) and the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS), which had statutory responsibility for these homes during the period with which we are concerned. We also received written submissions on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB), as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children they placed in Barnardo's. We have considered all of this evidence and paid careful attention to the various submissions made to us. However, in accordance with our general approach, we do not propose to refer to every allegation that was made, whether against an individual or against Barnardo's, although we have taken all of the evidence and the submissions into account.

Macedon

7 Macedon was a large Victorian house set in substantial grounds at Whitehouse on the north-side of the shores of Belfast Lough. It was bought by Barnardo's and registered by the Ministry of Home Affairs as a voluntary children's home on 29 June 1950. It accommodated children between the ages of 16 and 18 years, and in its early days had a feeder home called Manor House in Ballycastle, Co Antrim (not to be confused with Manor House, Lisburn, which we consider elsewhere in our Report). Manor House was approximately 55 miles from Macedon, and was a home for babies and toddlers. It accommodated approximately 50 children at any one time, who then progressed to Macedon.

8 Barnardo's built two purpose-designed cottages in the grounds of Macedon.

In later years there were generally 30 children resident in Macedon at any one time, with ten in the main building, and ten in each of the cottages. Initially Macedon was registered to accommodate 35 boys and girls, and although it was originally intended to be a single sex facility, in order to meet the needs of the time and to facilitate family groups, both boys and girls were accepted, with flexibility as to admitting children of different ages. Altogether 598 children passed through Macedon in the 31 years of its existence, and by June 1981 all the children in residence had moved from Macedon to Sharonmore.

9 During its existence Macedon offered long, medium and very short-stay placements, although in the years leading up to its closure in 1981 the placements were predominantly long-term in nature. Described by Barnardo's as a "traditional Children's Home", as the years went by Macedon increasingly catered for children who were from a very disturbed and difficult background, many of whom would otherwise have been placed in a training school if Barnardo's had not undertaken to care for them.

10 In January 1958 it was registered for 52,[2] but by 1979 the numbers had been reduced to 32.[3] It appears that in the early 1970s two factors coalesced that led to Macedon being closed and being replaced by what was known as the Sharonmore Project. One was that in 1971 Dr Bywaters, Barnardo's Medical Officer, visited Macedon and raised queries as to whether it was appropriate to have as many children on site as the 52 who were in Macedon at that time.[4] It is clear that the numbers had increased from the original permitted maximum of 35.

11 This questioning of the justification for such a large institution reflected a change in mainstream childcare thinking at that time. BAR 14, who became Barnardo's Divisional Director for Northern Ireland in 1974 shortly after he had joined Barnardo's, explained in his evidence that when he joined Barnardo's a replacement home for Macedon was being planned for a location at Ballyhanwood at Dundonald on the outskirts of East Belfast. The plans had reached the stage at which they were about to go out to tender, but he and the chief architect of Barnardo's agreed that the new facility would be what he called a "white elephant"[5] and the plan was scrapped. This facility may well be what Dr Bywaters meant in 1971

2 BAR 25007.
3 BAR 25188.
4 BAR 624.
5 Day 171, p.22.

by the "new home", when he asked "...are we right in replacing the same number in the new home as there are at Macedon?"[6]

12 The other factor was that the projected M5 motorway would result in the compulsory purchase of Macedon and its closure.

Sharonmore

13 BAR 14 explained how the scrapping of the proposed replacement home for Macedon at Ballyhanwood resulted in a process of Barnardo's thinking through what was required to replace Macedon. BAR 24 prepared a document called "The Sharonmore Project", based upon discussions he had with local staff. This eventually emerged as Macedon's replacement. The Sharonmore Project, as it was known, (although for simplicity we refer to it simply as 'Sharonmore'), was a response to the Black Report,[7] and by and large catered for more disturbed children than Macedon.[8]

14 Sharonmore had a number of components. Ballyduff House in Newtownabbey was purchased from Newtownabbey District Council. It was called the Parent Unit and contained the administrative functions of Sharonmore. In addition there were two separate, purpose-built, living units: Ballyduff and Ravelston. Ballyduff accommodated eight young people in four single and four double rooms. It closed in February 1985 and the children and staff in Ballyduff transferred to Ravelston. The Ravelston Unit accommodated eight young people in eight single rooms. Both Ballyduff and Ravelston had a "sleeping in" room for staff whose turn it was to be on call at night, and a spare room that could be used for parents and friends.[9]

15 In addition there were two satellite units at Ballysillan and Derrycoole. Each satellite unit was an ordinary dwelling house, both within five miles of Ballyduff, with four young people each in single bedrooms. Derrycoole was closed and deregistered as a children's home in January 1996.

16 Unlike Macedon, Sharonmore was community based. Each unit was physically much closer to ordinary neighbours than many traditional children's homes at that time, with children attending schools, churches and recreational facilities in the community, and medical facilities were

6 BAR 624.
7 Report of The Children and Young Persons Review Group (1979). Sir Robert Black was chairman of the Review Group.
8 BAR 22034.
9 BAR 690.

provided by a local GP at the local health centre.[10] Each child had a key worker, and the individual units were intended to provide a range of social work interventions for the children in their care, as may be seen from the following extract from a statement to the Inquiry by Lynda Wilson, Director of Barnardo's Northern Ireland:[11]

> "Initially, the Ballyduff Unit was intended to provide a residential social work service, which was task-centred, for children who presented with social, emotional and behavioural difficulties. The social work interventions were designed to help these children reflect on their difficulties and to understand better the reasons underlying them, in order to gain control over their actions and begin to take responsibility for them.
>
> "The Ravelston Unit was designed to help young people presenting with social, emotional and behavioural difficulties through the provision of a residential social work service, which provided individualised care with focus on specific tasks including preparation for independent living.
>
> "The Satellite Units aimed to provide residential social work interventions providing individualised care with their focus on specific tasks to children who would benefit from living in a small unit in the community. In the Satellite Unit, care was on a domestic scale to replicate some aspects of substitute family care, while maintaining a professional approach to problem-solving."

HIA 417

17 The first allegation we considered was that of HIA 417 who was in Macedon between 1967, when she was thirteen, to 1973, when she was nineteen. She was the only applicant from this period to make allegations of abuse. She was placed in Macedon by Tyrone County Welfare Committee and said that she did not remember visits by a social worker. Whilst Barnardo's records only refer to one such visit, there was substantial correspondence relating to her between Barnardo's and the Tyrone welfare authorities, and there were also efforts to maintain links with her family.

18 She described how she witnessed the then superintendent of Macedon BAR 5, dragging other girls by the hair, and Barnardo's concede that there were concerns in 1969 about his leadership and management skills; his skill in dealing with staff was regarded as problematical, as was notably, his limited capacity to handle girls. We accept that HIA 417 was pushed and shoved by BAR 5 as she alleges. However, as hers is the only allegation of such behaviour relating to this period we do not consider that sufficient to amount to a finding of systemic abuse.

10 BAR 690.
11 BAR 690-691.

19 She also complained of being bullied and sexually abused by older girls. We accept this occurred, but she did not tell staff what was happening to her, and as there is no other evidence of bullying and sexual abuse of other children at this time, we do not consider the abuse she suffered amounts to systemic abuse.

20 She alleged that she was not given sufficient encouragement or opportunity to achieve her full potential academically. We note that at the time she was felt to be very intelligent. Concerns were noted about the standard of her homework at the time, and it was to be more closely supervised in future.[12] Although we sympathise with HIA 417's frustration at her lack of academic achievement while she was in the care of Barnardo's, we consider that Barnardo's ensured that she had as good an education as many other children who were not in residential homes at that time. We are satisfied that Barnardo's did as much as they could to point children towards occupations that could be expected to provide a realistic opportunity for them to acquire the necessary skills to enable them to become financially independent once they left the home. We do not regard Barnardo's efforts in her case as indicative of any systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's.

Allegations relating to BAR 3

21 BAR 3 was employed at Macedon as an assistant house parent from 23 April 1979 until 9 January 1980.[13] His employment was terminated because it came to light that he had borrowed money from petty cash and from children's pocket money.[14] BAR 8 described to the Inquiry how he had borrowed money from her and from other staff. On one occasion she had to pay £40 to the child because he was unable to pay money back to allow a child to buy clothes, and it seems that it was her report about this that led to his employment being terminated after he repaid the money.

12 BAR 591.
13 BAR 5922.
14 BAR 5924.

22 It is clear that this was not the only aspect of his conduct that was suspect. In her evidence BAR 8 described to us how he wore a large cross around his neck as if he were a priest.[15] BAR 9 confirmed that BAR 3 represented himself as a member of a Roman Catholic religious order.[16] BAR 8 said how he called himself doctor and carried a doctor's bag and stethoscope.[17] She was told he was treating staff and children for headaches, and giving the staff powders. BAR 14 later described BAR 3 as having "an effeminate manner and one is inclined to the view that he is most certainly homosexual",[18] and BAR 9 referred to BAR 3 as wearing eye shadow.[19]

23 We consider that BAR 3's behaviour in describing himself as a priest and doctor (neither of which appears to be true judging by the absence of references to any such qualifications in his application form), and borrowing money, could have led to his services being dispensed with before the report from BAR 8 that he had taken money from a child's pocket money. His behaviour was bizarre, and in itself was sufficient to call into question his suitability to work with children because he was clearly not who he purported to be. The failures to detect these matters, and then take appropriate action, represented systemic failures because they demonstrated either a lack of knowledge or an unacceptable tolerance of what was happening among the staff on the part of management at Macedon.

24 In 1981 it came to light that allegations had been made by BAR 46 that BAR 3 (who left Barnardo's in January of that year)[20] had tried to kiss him on a number of occasions.[21] It appears from a memorandum made some months later that these allegations were originally made to BAR 2. He reported them to his supervisor BAR 8. She does not appear to have reported what BAR 2 said to her for some time, to judge by the note made by the Superintendent BAR 24.[22] In that memorandum BAR 24 recorded that BAR 8 told him that BAR 2 had told her about these matters "some months ago". The memorandum is dated 21 April 1980 and implies that he was told on 11 April 1980.

15 Day 169, p.124.
16 Day 172, pp. 110 and 115.
17 Day 169, p.124 and following
18 BAR 5944.
19 Day 172, p.115.
20 BAR 4237.
21 BAR 4242.
22 BAR 4242.

25 In a statement which she made to the police[23] BAR 8 claimed that when BAR 24 did not get back to her she took her complaints to BAR 14, who was then Barnardo's Divisional Children Officer/Director of Childcare in Northern Ireland. A memorandum written by BAR 14 on 17 April 1980 makes no reference to the allegations made by BAR 46, although (as stated above) he did record that BAR 3 "has an effeminate manner and one is inclined to the view that he is most certainly homosexual. However, this was never a problem, as far as his work was concerned, except that some children made reference [to it]".[24]

26 In his statement and oral evidence to the Inquiry BAR 14 said that he had no recollection of BAR 24 speaking to him about this. When BAR 8 gave evidence to the Inquiry she accepted that although she recalled mentioning a number of the things about BAR 3 to which BAR 14 referred in his note, she did not think that she had mentioned the kissing incident to him, because she thought that as she had spoken to BAR 24 about it and he had said that he would go to BAR 14 about the matter, that would be sufficient. We accept that BAR 14 was not told by BAR 8 that BAR 3 was alleged to have kissed BAR 46. BAR 14's memorandum is entirely consistent with his not being told. We are satisfied that if BAR 14 had been told of the kissing he would have recorded it.

27 The memorandum of 21 April 1980 contains the following passage:

> "As these reported incidents took place some months ago, the member of staff has now left our employment (9.1.80)…on considering the situation in my judgement any well intentioned cross-examination at this late stage might do damage to all concerned, especially in view of the climate in the province at present."[25]

28 The reference to the "climate in the province at present" appears to be a reference to the recent disclosure in the media that a number of members of staff at the Kincora Boys Home were alleged to have committed serious sexual offences against the children in their care, allegations which were subsequently found to be well-founded in view of the pleas of guilty of the three men concerned, although that did not take place for some considerable time after the writing of this memorandum.

23 BAR 8502.
24 BAR 5924.
25 BAR 4242.

29 We are satisfied that the allegation that BAR 46 had been kissed by BAR 3 was not passed on by BAR 24 to BAR 14 as it should have been. Had it been passed on, then it would have been essential for Barnardo's to report these allegations to the police and to the Eastern Health and Social Services Board (EHSSB) in whose care the child was and who had placed the child in Macedon. The failure to report the allegations meant that no steps were taken to investigate whether BAR 3 had made sexual approaches to any other child, and, if he had, to do whatever was necessary to assist the child. Had the matter been reported to the EHSSB that would have allowed the Board to consider whether it was satisfied that the children it had placed in Macedon were free from any risk of abuse. Had the matter been reported to the board and to the police it would have enabled both to try to investigate the actions of BAR 3 with a view to his being prosecuted and thereby prevented from abusing other children. BAR 3 died aged 47 on 13 September 1993 in the Republic of Ireland.

30 From the medical evidence presented to the Inquiry on his behalf, we were satisfied that BAR 24 was not capable of assisting the Inquiry in relation to his recollection of these events and why he acted as he appears to have done.

31 BAR 14 said in his witness statement to the Inquiry:

> "I do not know what BAR 24 had in mind in making this judgement, but I do not think that he was referring to the political climate or the troubles in Northern Ireland. It seems more likely that he had in mind the turmoil that existed amongst residential care staff as a result of the Kincora saga and the range of allegations and disclosures that were emerging at that time at a number of other homes. Residential staff felt under-valued and mistrusted and low morale was widespread."[26]

And at paragraph 28:

> "Having read his File Note[27] for the first time within the last few weeks, I cannot fully understand how he came to the conclusion that he did. Nor do I understand why he did not make me aware of what had been brought to his attention regarding BAR 3. I am content that he made his decision in good faith, motivated by his desire to do what he felt at that time was in the best interests of a young person."[28]

26 BAR 1143.
27 BAR 4242
28 BAR 1143.

32 The Inquiry put to BAR 14 the possibility that a factor was that,

> "To draw these matters to the attention of their proper authorities might result in unfavourable attention being directed towards Barnardo's?"

He accepted that was certainly a possible implication but he did not think that BAR 24 would have concealed the matter in that way. He accepted that he was influenced by the man whom he knew and whom he made it clear he held in very high regard as someone whom he respected and whose professional and moral integrity he valued.[29]

33 Another possible reason may have been a desire to protect the reputation of Macedon and its staff, and the reputation of Barnardo's, in the media, because we recognise that once allegations such as these are aired publicly, whether there is any substance to them or not, they can have a severe impact on staff morale and on staff retention and recruitment.

34 The view of Lynda Wilson about this was set out in her witness statement when she said that, "the first task of the Superintendent was to find out the facts. This did not happen and as a result, Barnardo's failed to address potential child abuse".[30]

35 Whatever the reason may have been, we are satisfied that BAR 24 took a deliberate decision not to report the full nature of the allegations to his superiors, not to report the allegations at all either to the police or the EHSSB, and not to investigate the allegations further. His failure to do any of these things was wholly unacceptable. His duty as Superintendant was to find out the facts so that Barnardo's could establish whether or not BAR 3 had made sexual advances to any other children in their care and he failed in that duty.

36 His failures had another extremely important consequence. The Hughes Inquiry appears to have only been made aware of one episode of sexual abuse of a child in the care of Barnardo's during its terms of reference, namely that involving BAR 44 which we consider later in this chapter. We are satisfied that had BAR 24 reported these matters to his superiors at the time Barnardo's would then have reported them to the EHSSB and to the police. Had a conviction followed that would have resulted in these matters being investigated by the Hughes Inquiry. Because these matters were not reported, the Hughes Inquiry could not be made aware of them, and Macedon was not investigated by the Hughes Inquiry in the way that Sharonmore was.

29 Day 172, p.33.
30 BAR 048.

37 More than 30 years later we cannot be sure what would have come to light had the EHSSB, the police and the Hughes Inquiry learnt of the allegations about BAR 3's conduct in Macedon. Nevertheless, we are satisfied that the opportunity to uncover and investigate the allegations about BAR 3, and quite possibly the allegations made many years later about BAR 1 and BAR 2 as well, was missed because of BAR 24's failure to report the allegations about BAR 3 to his superiors as he should have done.

38 It emerged during the Macedon Inquiry, which we consider later in this chapter, that after BAR 3 left Barnardo's employment BAR 46 said to BAR 75 that BAR 3 "was a real fruity boy" and "had tried to touch him up". By this time BAR 46 was in either Macedon or Sharonmore. Because BAR 3 had left Barnardo's employment at that stage, BAR 75 does not seem to have reported the remark to his superiors at Barnardo's.[31]

39 The way BAR 3's behaviour was dealt with by different individuals within Barnardo's was unsatisfactory in the ways that we have identified. Nevertheless, we should record that although BAR 14 was not told of matters about BAR 3 that he should have been, in his memorandum of 17 April 1980 to the personnel manager, to which we have already referred, BAR 14 said that:

> "he had grave doubts as to [BAR 3's] reliability, and certainly would not recommend him for a position of trust, or for any post in a social work setting."[32]

40 This was clearly designed to prevent BAR 3 being given a favourable reference from Barnardo's should he apply for a job with another employer in this field. That was an effort to protect any children with whom BAR 3 might otherwise have been able to work in future.

41 Barnardo's accept "the failure to take appropriate steps in response to the [BAR 46] allegation about [BAR 3] constitutes a systemic failing".[33]

42 We are satisfied that there were several systemic failings in the way in which this matter was handled by Barnardo's staff at the time:

- BAR 75 does not seem to have reported the remarks by BAR 46 to his superiors.

31 BAR 8619.
32 BAR 5924
33 BAR 21090

- They were not reported for some months by BAR 8 to BAR 24. BAR 24 made a deliberate decision not to report the full facts to his superiors or to anyone else.

Barnardo's handling of other sexual allegations by children in Macedon or Sharonmore

43 BAR 47 is a sister of HIA 516. She did not apply to the Inquiry, but the Inquiry considered events relating to her because of material it obtained in respect of a number of matters with which she was concerned. The first of these events occurred on 20 February 1981 when she told BAR 8 that whilst on a home visit to her father BAR 30 he attempted to pull down her underpants and touched her about her chest below her sweater. She was almost fifteen at the time. The matter was promptly reported to the police who investigated the matter, although it appears that no prosecution resulted.

44 Her complaint in 1981 is relevant because:

- BAR 47 felt able to disclose a sexual assault to Barnardo's staff.

We are satisfied that on this occasion Barnardo's dealt appropriately with this allegation.

45 The second event involving BAR 47 occurred on 17 May 1982, when she informed BAR 9 that she had had sexual intercourse with her then boyfriend a few days before during a period when she had absconded from Sharonmore. This was also promptly reported to the police by Barnardo's staff. During the investigation BAR 47 told the police that intercourse had been consensual. She also told the police that before intercourse had occurred she had been a virgin,[34] something that will be significant when we consider other allegations she made subsequently. This matter was also dealt with by Barnardo's in an appropriate fashion.

The attitude of Barnardo's and the EHSSB towards the relationship between BAR 12 and HIA 516

46 Barnardo's first became aware of BAR 12 when BAR 8 approached BAR 14 because of the interest expressed by police from Newtownabbey in setting up a trust fund for HIA 516. The interest shown by other officers appears to have waned after a time, but BAR 12 was encouraged by

34 BAR 8732.

Barnardo's staff to focus his attention on one child, rather than on all the children in the unit.[35] At this point BAR 12 should have been assessed as an individual volunteer or as a 'befriender', but this seems to have been overlooked. From January 1980 BAR 12 took a considerable interest in HIA 516,[36] but it was only in February 1981 that Barnardo's decided to place this interest on a more formal 'befriender' basis. Hilary Reid, (now Dr Hilary Harrison), who was at that time a project leader for Barnardo's at another home, was asked to perform an assessment of BAR 12 because "some concern was expressed about the relationship and the benefits or otherwise of this".[37]

47 She carried out two long interviews of BAR 12. She was uncomfortable about being asked to perform this task when a relationship had already been going on for some fifteen months, and as she did not know the child concerned. However, she sensed that information may have been deliberately withheld from her so that she would approach her task in a completely unbiased way. Whilst on one view it might have been better if she had been fully briefed about HIA 516, and about BAR 12's failure to follow all the guidance given to him about how to approach HIA 516 by the staff at Macedon, nevertheless it is important to bear in mind that BAR 12 held a responsible position, Barnardo's were unaware that there had been concern expressed by his senior officers about his attitude to children in the past, and HIA 516 did not make any allegations against BAR 12 until June 1982.

48 Dr Harrison told the Inquiry that she had nothing to suggest that BAR 12 would have had any interest in HIA 516 sexually when she carried out her interviews with him. She made no recommendations when she submitted her report in April 1981, pointing out that she was unaware of the whole picture.[38]

49 In the light of what was to happen subsequently she made a particularly prescient observation in her conclusion when she said:

> "…how much he is prepared or willing to accept the guidance of others, however, is difficult to say. I feel his own needs might tend to override his better judgement".

35 BAR 7108
36 BAR 7107.
37 BAR 11428.
38 BAR 11434.

50 BAR 14 told the Inquiry that while it was unusual to assess a potential befriender after the befriender was allowed to develop that relationship with the child, his opinion was that there seemed to have been thorough consideration of the relationship both by Barnardo's and by the EHSSB, (which had placed HIA 516 with Barnardo's), there had been consultation and the matter had been well handled.[39]

51 Lynda Wilson took a different view. While she pointed out that there was no suggestion of interference of HIA 516 by BAR 12 at that time, and BAR 12 was a trusted member of the community, it was at least poor practice to leave the befriending assessment to a point where the issues had become problematic. She accepted that whether or not abuse had occurred the befriending assessment should have started earlier.

52 Whilst we accept that it was entirely justifiable for Barnardo's to accept BAR 12's willingness to befriend HIA 516, who was a boy with a very disturbed and difficult history, nevertheless a formal befriending assessment should have been carried out at the start of the relationship, and not fifteen months later. In addition, the unwillingness of BAR 12 to follow the advice given to him on several occasions during 1980 by Macedon staff should have been dealt with more firmly at the time.

53 As can be seen from Dr Harrison's assessment report, and from the detailed report prepared by BAR 111 (then in charge of Barnardo's in Northern Ireland), in 1980 BAR 12 was putting substantial amounts of money into HIA 516's post office savings book virtually every month. He had also given him a stereo unit and records at Christmas 1980. By the time Dr Harrison carried out her meetings with BAR 12 in February 1981, he was paying for riding lessons for HIA 516 each week.

54 On 14 May 1981 BAR 111 Assistant Divisional Director (Child Care) Irish Division, wrote to BAR 12 to record the outcome of a meeting held with him on 6 May 1981 to discuss his relationship with HIA 516. BAR 111 confirmed that Barnardo's and the EHSSB were prepared to agree to the relationship continuing subject to conditions. These conditions were that BAR 12 accepted the guidance of Macedon staff about the nature and length of time he spent with HIA 516, including his plans for trips out with him, and the value of presents and amounts of money he intended giving him. This letter was copied to BAR 60, Assistant Principal Social Worker, EHSSB and senior members of Macedon staff.[40]

39 Day 171, pp.63 to 64.
40 BAR 16115.

55 In June or July 1981[41] (and not October 1981 as stated by BAR 111),[42] BAR 12 bought a pony for HIA 516 for £300, and paid for its board and feed until the end of May 1982.[43] The farmer who sold the horse told the police that on numerous occasions BAR 12 brought HIA 516 out to ride the pony, and "he was also brought out sometimes by the home".

56 It is unclear when Barnardo's staff knew that BAR 12 was going to buy the pony, but he had indicated to Dr Harrison in February 1981 that he would be willing, if HIA 516 proved interested enough, to buy him a horse.[44] Whether Barnardo's or the EHSSB knew that BAR 12 was going to buy the pony, it seems that Barnardo's staff allowed HIA 516 to continue to use the pony after it was bought.

57 That BAR 12 bought the pony so soon after BAR 111 wrote to him was a significant breach of the conditions. We consider that he should not have been permitted to continue the relationship with HIA 516 after the meeting of 6 May 1981. We are satisfied that BAR 12 had clearly shown himself to be unwilling to abide by conditions which Macedon staff sought to impose upon him before that meeting of May 1981. He should not have been permitted to continue his relationship with HIA 516 after that meeting because he had repeatedly shown an unwillingness to abide by the advice of Barnardo's staff and the willingness of Barnardo's to allow the relationship to develop. By November 1981 Barnardo's had come to the conclusion that the conditions that had been made clear to BAR 12 were not being complied with, and that he was to have no further contact with HIA 516.

58 The length of time that it was allowed to continue after BAR 12 had repeatedly shown an unwillingness to abide by the advice of Barnardo's staff represented poor practice. Lynda Wilson conceded that Macedon's systems were not sufficient in terms of how these matters were dealt with,[45] and we consider the manner in which this relationship was allowed to develop, and the length of time for which it was allowed to continue, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to ensure proper child care of HIA 516.

41 BAR 7136.
42 BAR 7113.
43 BAR 7136.
44 BAR 11432.
45 Day 172, p.2.

The allegations by HIA 516 against BAR 12

59 The next allegation in chronological sequence relates to an allegation relating to BAR 12 by HIA 516. In October 1980 an oral complaint was made to Newtownabbey Police Station (where BAR 12 was stationed at the time) that staff at Barnardo's were concerned about the relationship between him and HIA 516. The complaint was apparently reported by the detective constable who received the call to the Sub Divisional Commander at Newtownabbey RUC Station but it would seem that no further action was taken at that time.[46]

60 The next relevant development was that on 6 October 1981 BAR 30 phoned Newtownabbey police and complained that his son HIA 516 was 'overly friendly' with BAR 12 who had bought him a stereo and a pony. The reference to the stereo presumably related to the stereo unit and records BAR 12 bought for HIA 516 at Christmas 1980.[47] The reference to the pony clearly relates to the purchase of the pony referred to above.

61 Although BAR 30 subsequently withdrew his complaint, it was investigated by Newtownabbey police at that time, and an inspector spoke to Barnardo's staff and to BAR 30, but not, it seems, to HIA 516.

62 As it happens, as part of his investigation into allegations concerning Kincora, Detective Superintendent Caskey interviewed BAR 12 on 16 April 1982. In the course of that interview BAR 12 was asked about his relationship with HIA 516, and it is clear from the question that Superintendent Caskey was aware of at least some of the details of that relationship, notably that HIA 516 had a pony.

63 On 28 April 1982 Detective Chief Inspector Colgan was directed to carry out investigations into a number of associations giving rise to what he termed as "suspicions" that BAR 12 had displayed:

> "an inordinate and unhealthy interest in certain youths whom he had met in the course of his police duties and whom he had afterwards befriended and associated with".[48]

64 One of these associations was with HIA 516, who by that time had been transferred from Macedon to Rathgael Training School. DCI Colgan interviewed him on 25 June 1982 about his relationship with BAR 12.

46 BAR 7063.
47 BAR 7113.
48 BAR 7058

During the interview HIA 516 became distressed and ultimately made a written statement alleging that BAR 12 had:

- Given him gifts of the stereo and the pony and money – usually £2.50 a time.
- Bought pornographic books.
- Put his arm round him and tried to kiss him.
- Tried to get him to touch BAR 12's penis.
- Exposed his erect penis and tried to get HIA 516 to touch it.
- Asked HIA 516 to masturbate him.

HIA 516 said he resisted all of these approaches.

65 BAR 12 was subsequently interviewed on 6 August 1982 about these allegations. He responded by saying he "just simply had no comment or rather no answer". He denied being homosexual, or having homosexual tendencies.

Later that month, HIA 516 indicated he wished to see DCI Colgan again, and an interview was held on 19 August 1982. HIA 516 told him he had been thinking it over, had told his mother, and that things had gone further than he had said. HIA 516 said he was not prepared to go to court, but would give evidence against BAR 12 at any police disciplinary proceedings.

66 Two written statements were recorded. In the shorter statement[49] HIA 516 said what he had earlier alleged was correct, except that BAR 12 had stopped about four times at a quarry near the riding stables, and that he had visited BAR 12's home in Bangor about six times, and not twice as he had earlier alleged.

67 In the longer statement[50] he described in considerable detail his relationship with BAR 12. So far as sexual abuse is concerned, the salient allegations were:

- On the first day BAR 12 took him out he tried to open his trouser buttons.
- A week after the purchase of the pony BAR 12 had shown him a book with pictures of nude men and women, and offered him three more similar books to keep, but he refused.

49 BAR 7141.
50 BAR 7142.

- On another occasion BAR 12 felt HIA 516's penis through his trousers.
- On a further occasion BAR 12 tried to open his trouser buttons.
- On the first visit to BAR 12's home in Bangor, he tried to kiss him on the mouth.
- On subsequent visits BAR 12 had again tried to kiss HIA 516 and get his trousers down.
- On the last visit BAR 12 was able to get HIA 516's trousers and underpants down to his ankles, then sat on him and masturbated HIA 516's penis to an erection, before HIA 516 punched him on the back, whereupon BAR 12 stopped.

68 HIA 516's mother BAR 112 made a statement[51] to the effect that when her son told her that BAR 12 had been "messing" with him she assumed her son had been anally raped. She went to BAR 12's house and confronted him. He denied these allegations, and asked her whether she thought his father had put him up to it, to which she replied that he might have.[52] She signed a statement to that effect prepared for her by BAR 12 and his brother-in-law (also a police officer).[53] She said when she called to the house, "I had drink on me, but I was not drunk". She then went to Greencastle RUC station with BAR 12, his sister and his brother-in-law, but the station sergeant refused to accept the statement because the matter was already the subject of an internal police investigation. The sergeant also considered that she had consumed a considerable amount of drink before coming to the station.[54]

69 The DPP directed no prosecution. The directing officer, while acknowledging that the relationship of BAR 12 with HIA 516 was suspicious, stated that there was no corroboration, pointed out that there were significant discrepancies in the accounts given by HIA 516, and observed that HIA 516 was clearly disturbed, violently anti-police and anti-authority, and widely reported by responsible people as being, among other things, a liar.[55]

51 BAR 7145.
52 BAR 7146.
53 BAR 7070.
54 BAR 7070.
55 BAR 7056

70 These matters resurfaced in March 1997 when HIA 516 wrote to the Chief Constable of the RUC renewing his allegations against BAR 12, making further allegations about him, his father BAR 30, and BAR 1. In this letter[56] he gave a different version of being indecently assaulted by BAR 12 in his car, and added a new allegation of a violent anal rape during a car journey back from the riding stables to Macedon. He described this in his police statement[57] but did not refer to the incident in BAR 12's house in Bangor, Co Down.

71 It appears that he was asked by the investigating police inspector why he had not mentioned the alleged anal rape during the 1982 allegations, to which HIA 516 offered no explanation. The police pointed to the absence of corroboration, the passage of time since the alleged anal rape (fifteen years) before the complaint was made to the police, and the problems with the credibility of HIA 516 because he was serving a ten-month sentence in the Republic of Ireland for indecent assault on a fifteen-year-old female, and was awaiting trial on a charge of rape of his niece for which it seems he was subsequently convicted and sentenced to twelve years imprisonment. The DPP directed no prosecution.

72 HIA 516 was only fifteen and in Rathgael Training School when he made the original allegations against BAR 12. Although he did not advance any explanation fifteen years later as to why he did not mention the alleged violent anal rape in 1982, it is unclear how closely he was questioned in 1997 as to why this was the case. It is possible that in 1997 the police and the DPP may not have given any, or sufficient, weight to what is now a well recognised tendency for victims of sexual abuse to be reluctant to disclose all, or the most serious, abuse to which they were subjected when they first disclose some allegations.

73 Looking at the evidence as a whole relating to HIA 516's allegations of abuse against BAR 12, the relationship of BAR 12 with HIA 516 is strongly indicative of a pattern of grooming by BAR 12 of a young, vulnerable child by lavishing gifts and attention on the boy, and having the opportunity to sexually abuse the boy when HIA 516 was away from Macedon where he was living.

74 However, we have not had the benefit of oral evidence from HIA 516 or BAR 12, although both submitted written statements to the Inquiry. On the evidence presently available to us we do not feel able to reach a definite conclusion as to whether HIA 516 was subjected to sexual abuse by BAR 12 while HIA 516 was in the care of Barnardo's, although the relationship of BAR 12 with HIA 516 gives rise to considerable suspicion.

56 BAR 7198
57 BAR 7029.

75 These allegations were unknown to Barnardo's at the time because they were not made until after Barnardo's and the EHSSB believed that the relationship between BAR 12 and HIA 516 had been brought to an end in November 1981, although later there were grounds to believe that BAR 12 and HIA 516 continued to have contact with each other in March 1982. That was because HIA 516 arrived back in Sharonmore from school with cigarettes, sweets and money. On 17 March 1982, when he did not return, a staff member contacted BAR 12 who said he would look for him. BAR 12 brought HIA 516 back to Sharonmore at approximately 5.30 pm; it seems that HIA 516 had been at a roller disco.[58]

76 It is also important to bear in mind that at that time Barnardo's were not aware of the police suspicions about BAR 12. On the basis of what Barnardo's knew, or ought to have known, in 1981, we cannot be satisfied that if HIA 516 was subject to sexual abuse by BAR 12, Barnardo's was guilty of a systemic failure in not preventing any abuse that may have occurred.

The allegations relating to BAR 44

77 BAR 44 was a thirteen-year-old boy with a very disturbed history who was admitted to Sharonmore from Rathgael Training School in October 1981. He was truanting from school and was picked up in Belfast City Centre by a delivery man on his rounds. The man persuaded the boy to join him on his delivery rounds and sexually assaulted him. Some days later BAR 44 told his uncle what had happened, and his uncle informed Barnardo's. It promptly informed the Southern Health and Social Services Board (who had placed the boy in Sharonmore) and the police. The matter was investigated by the police, the perpetrator was traced and questioned, and admitted the offences. He was prosecuted, pleaded guilty and sentenced.

78 This episode came to the attention of the Hughes Inquiry, and as a result it investigated Sharonmore and the way it was run in considerable detail. The Hughes Inquiry was satisfied that Barnardo's took all necessary steps to assist the police fully in relation to this matter.[59] We agree. They promptly reported the allegations to the police, and a member of staff accompanied BAR 44 when he was interviewed by the police.

58 BAR 7113.
59 BAR 22008

79 The Hughes Inquiry also examined Barnardo's policy and practice in a number of areas, such as record keeping, recruitment and training of staff, strategic planning and compliance with the 1975 Voluntary Homes Regulations, and we will comment on these matters later in this Chapter.

The 1985 complaint by HIA 216 against BAR 4

80 HIA 216 was in Macedon from 1967 (when she was aged five) until she left in March 1981 aged eighteen and a half. She remained friendly with BAR 8 who visited her from time to time. On 24 April 1985 BAR 8 visited her at her home; by then HIA 216 was aged 22. A note made of that visit by BAR 8 records that the purpose was to discuss something that HIA 216 had told her in confidence, "some time ago".[60] When that was is unclear, the note saying that HIA 216 had given information to BAR 8, "at a much earlier date". In any event, the note makes it clear that although HIA 216 had not wished to pursue the matter, BAR 8 had discussed it with her project leader and a decision had been made to approach HIA 216 again. BAR 8 persuaded HIA 216 to discuss what happened to her in greater detail, and HIA 216 told BAR 8 she had been sexually assaulted by BAR 4. We will consider the details of the allegations later.

81 It is clear from a note made by BAR 8 of a further visit to HIA 216 on 10 July 1985 that in the interim Barnardo's had been gathering information. The matter was then reported to the police by BAR 79, Barnardo's Divisional Director, (Child Care).[61]

82 While this account might suggest that thus far Barnardo's dealt appropriately with this disclosure by HIA 216, there is evidence to suggest that that was not in fact the case. BAR 8 said that when she discussed the position with BAR 79, his reaction was to say that as HIA 216 had left Barnardo's a long time ago, there was nothing Barnardo's could do about it, and it was for HIA 216 to contact the police. BAR 8 responded:

> "Well I know that, but there is [sic] other children who were working/living down in Macedon and something could have happened then".

60 BAR 227.
61 BAR 17630.

To which she alleges he replied:

> "you are not to go to any child to ask them about anything. They must come to you first and make a statement".[62]

However BAR 8 disobeyed this direction and went back to HIA 216, as BAR 8 recounted to Lynda Wilson in 1999.[63]

83 We are satisfied that BAR 79's initial reaction was not to follow up the implications of these allegations, despite the risk to children elsewhere that might arise if the alleged abuser was not investigated, as well as the possibility that any investigation might reveal that other children in Macedon had been abused by the alleged abuser. As we have stated, the allegations were later reported to the police in August 1985. We consider the reluctance on the part of some Barnardo's staff in Northern Ireland at that time to report such matters to the proper authorities was a systemic failing.

84 We now turn to consider whether HIA 216 was the subject of sexual abuse by BAR 4. When she made her statement to the police in 1985 she alleged that when she was thirteen or fourteen two types of incident occurred. The first occurred in one of the cottages at Macedon when he put her hand down the front of his trousers. The second occurred some weeks later and involved him stopping the car on the way back to Macedon from his house in Lisburn. She alleges that he touched her on the breasts and below her waist, but stopped when she told him to stop.[64] The DPP directed no prosecution, it would seem because there was no corroboration and because of the delay in reporting the matter.[65]

85 In 1999, by now aged 37, HIA 216 made further allegations against BAR 4 in the course of a further statement she made to the police during an investigation that resulted in the prosecution of BAR 1 and BAR 2. On this occasion HIA 216 considerably expanded her allegations.

- She said she was abused by him in the cottage, "at least 10 times".
- In the cottage, in addition to putting her hand down the front of his trousers, he pulled up her nightie, felt around her breasts and vagina, inserted his finger in her vagina, and on a couple of occasions made her masturbate him.

62 Day 169, p.90.
63 BAR 17791.
64 BAR 7614.
65 BAR 8470.

- On the car journeys back from Lisburn he kissed her, made her masturbate him, inserted his finger into her vagina, and on maybe three or four occasions made her perform oral sex on him.
- On at least three occasions on such journeys he forced her into the back seat and held her by the throat while he vaginally raped her, as well as anally raping her on one or two occasions.
- On two or three occasions while in BAR 4's house in Lisburn, and while his wife was watching, he took his penis out of his trousers and made her touch it. He also put his hand inside her underwear and rubbed around her vagina, again while his wife was watching.[66]

86 At the beginning of the 1999 statement HIA 216 explained that when she made the 1985 statement she felt that the police woman who took the statement was just not interested. She felt that she had been thrown in at the deep end and was expected to tell the police woman everything the first time HIA 216 had met her. She also said that BAR 8 was not allowed to come into the room at the police station when the statement was being taken.

87 In her evidence to the Inquiry HIA 216 said that although she had told a friend at the time that BAR 4 had put his hand around her privates (and she also referred to telling her friend in the 1999 police statement), she had not told her or the police about the rapes "because I just felt ashamed", and that "...even getting out that first part about BAR 4 was hard enough without anything else".[67]

88 BAR 4 and his wife were interviewed by police in 2002 in Wales where they were living by that time. Both denied all the allegations. By this time BAR 4 had been convicted in September 1992 of five charges of indecent assault, three involving males and two involving females, one of whom was his daughter. In the course of that investigation he admitted touching his daughter and getting her to masturbate him,[68] but denied that sexual intercourse had occurred. He admitted in engaging in mutual masturbation with a teenage boy, and that he and his wife and this boy had engaged in sex together.[69] He also admitted that he was sexually interested in both male and female children.[70] His wife was convicted in 66 BAR 7615-BAR 7621.

67 Day 170, p.22.
68 BAR 7706.
69 BAR 7691.
70 BAR 7707.

1991 of the offences of having intercourse with two under-age teenage boys.

89 Whilst the DPP directed no prosecution in relation to HIA 216's allegations against BAR 4, there are two other matters that are of some significance in respect of these allegations. The first is that she told the police that BAR 4 had a mole or birthmark or something like that, a brown colour, definitely not a tattoo on the top half of his body, although she could not remember where, or if it was on the front or back of his body.[71] BAR 4 admitted that he had a small mole less than one quarter of an inch in size just above his belly button, although he claimed HIA 216 could have seen it when he washed or came downstairs while looking for a shirt or something.[72]

90 The second matter is that HIA 216 said that while she was still at Macedon she went into the office of BAR 23, who was the superintendent of Macedon at the time, intending to complain to him about BAR 4. Although we are satisfied that HIA 216 is mistaken when she says that BAR 8 was present, we accept that there was such an occasion. In May 1985 BAR 28 typed a note for the record, her memory having been jogged while typing BAR 8's note about her discussions with HIA 216.[73] In 2001 BAR 28 made a police statement in which she said she remembered very clearly HIA 216 coming into BAR 23's office and saying that she wished to speak to him, but then turning red and leaving the room when she realised that BAR 4 was also in the room. BAR 28 said that BAR 23 went after HIA 216 to speak to her, and when he came back asked BAR 4 how she had been during their meeting, why was she upset and did he know what HIA 216 wanted to speak about. BAR 4 said that he had no idea what was wrong with HIA 216. BAR 23 was described as being perplexed by this incident.[74]

91 Elsewhere we have considered other allegations made by HIA 216, and have taken all of the evidence relating to those other allegations into account when assessing her evidence about BAR 4. We are satisfied that HIA 216 was sexually abused by BAR 4 in the manner she described to the police in 1985, but we are not persuaded to the required standard that the abuse she described as suffering at the hands of BAR 4 in her later accounts to the police went beyond the matter she originally alleged.

71 BAR 7620.
72 BAR 7742.
73 BAR 8462.
74 BAR 7645/46.

92 Although we are satisfied that HIA 216 was sexually abused by BAR 4 to the extent we have just described, we are not satisfied that this was due to any systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's. At the time Barnardo's had no reason to believe that BAR 4 was behaving inappropriately towards HIA 216, or that he posed a danger to her or any other child at Macedon. He was with Barnardo's in the summer of 1977 as part of a scheme that enabled him to work there on placement for some months before he left the Army.

93 Although a more rigorous vetting procedure of the type that is standard practice today might have revealed what appears to have been a highly sexualised environment in BAR 4's home, such a rigorous vetting procedure would not have been good or standard practice at that time. Whilst we consider BAR 79's initial reluctance to report the matter when it first came to his attention in 1985 was poor practice, the situation was rectified without excessive delay, although in large measure this was due to the persistence of BAR 8 in pursuing the matter.

94 Nevertheless, the amount of unsupervised access BAR 4 was permitted to have to HIA 216, and the failure of Barnardo's to check the home environment, were unacceptable by the standards of the time. It is noteworthy that in 1972 Mr Bunting of the EHSSB told all voluntary homes that even if children were only going out for a day this had to be approved by the Board.[75] Barnardo's have told the Inquiry that they think the Board was not informed. We consider the amount of unsupervised access by BAR 4 to HIA 216, and the failure of Barnardo's to inform the EHSSB that this access was taking place, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to provide proper childcare.

The decision by Barnardo's to retain BAR 1 in their employment

95 BAR 1 was 41 when she joined Barnardo's staff on 1 April 1977 as a nursery officer at Barnardo's Day Care Centre at Windsor Avenue, Belfast. As was standard practice she was placed on a six month probationary period.

96 It is clear that she was not regarded as a satisfactory employee when dealing with small children, and on 9 November 1977 she was notified that a decision had been made not to confirm her appointment. However, she appears to have persuaded Barnardo's that, notwithstanding her poor record when dealing with children of nursery school age, she would nevertheless be suitable to work with older children. On 18 November 1977 Barnardo's decided to accept her application to transfer to work at Macedon because she had experience of working with older children, and because she held a recognised residential childcare qualification. She was appointed as a residential social worker at Macedon with effect from 1 December 1977, again subject to a six month probationary period.[76]

75 RUB 5569.

97 Seventeen months later she was promoted to the position of third senior, effectively the third in command in her unit, with effect from 1 April 1979, again subject to a six month probationary period. As we shall see, this promotion took effect a short time after what we later refer to as 'the wooden spoon incident' in February 1979.

98 On 29 June 1981, three and half years after she had been appointed to Macedon, and 26 months after she had been promoted to third senior, she transferred to Sharonmore. By that stage all the children at Macedon had moved to Sharonmore[77], but by 1 March 1982 her performance was considered unsatisfactory, and disciplinary action and demotion were suggested.[78]

99 It seems that there was no improvement in her work, and disciplinary proceedings in September of that year resulted in her being given a formal warning.[79] In March 1983 her work was still regarded as unsatisfactory, and the highly unusual sanction of the deferral of an annual increment to which she would normally have been entitled occurred for the second time.[80]

100 Although it appears that she then tendered her resignation on 26 April 1983,[81] for some reason which cannot now be established she was allowed to remain in post. Her work was regarded as unsatisfactory, and on 21 July 1983 the warning period was extended for a further year and she was warned about her lack of ability to work with and to control children.[82]

76 BAR 5880.
77 BAR 4329.
78 BAR 5884.
79 BAR 5893
80 BAR 5896.
81 BAR 5901.
82 BAR 064.

101 On 1 December 1983 she was transferred to another project run by Barnardo's at Tara Lodge House in Belfast as a disciplinary measure. On 1 January 1984 she struck a child with a Scholl-type wooden shoe or sandal,[83] disciplinary proceedings were instigated and she then resigned.[84]

102 Despite a highly unsatisfactory employment record over the previous two years, BAR 79, then the Divisional Director of Barnardo's in Northern Ireland, told her that if she ever needed a reference she should contact him.

103 Her employment record has to be viewed against a number of issues which were known about at the time.

The wooden spoon incident in 1979

104 BAR 1 left £100 in her handbag in the sleeping-in room at Macedon. Some two weeks or so later she discovered that £30 was missing from her handbag, and on 6 February 1979 she accused HIA 101 of stealing the money. The events that then occurred were subsequently recorded by BAR 14 in a lengthly file note.

105 The initial reaction of one of Barnardo's staff, BAR 35 was to smack HIA 101 on each hand with a wooden spoon, and then she went to report the matter to BAR 7 who was the Acting Superintendent of Macedon at that time. After BAR 35 left to make this report another staff member, BAR 76 and BAR 1 also struck HIA 101 with a wooden spoon. BAR 76 slapped him on the legs, and BAR 1 struck him on the bottom, both also using a wooden spoon.[85]

106 As BAR 14 observed in his note, the three members of staff each punished HIA 101 without consultation with each other, or without reference to the Superintendent, actions he described as "completely indefensible".[86] He also noted that HIA 101 was punished in a number of other ways. He was not allowed to go home to his grandmother, and he was told he was not allowed to use a bicycle he had been given by BAR 8. As BAR 14 commented to the Inquiry, HIA 101 was effectively being punished several times for the same offence, something that was "totally unacceptable".[87]

83 Day 172, p.70.
84 BAR 5905.
85 BAR 148.
86 BAR 134.
87 Day 171, p.46.

107 The theft was reported to the police and to her superiors by BAR 7. She required each of the three staff to enter what they had done in the punishment book. The matter was investigated by BAR 14. While all three staff members who struck HIA 101 were admonished, and a note placed on their personal file, no formal disciplinary action was taken against them.[88] BAR 14 was asked by the Inquiry whether he felt this was the appropriate way to deal with the matter and he stated that he felt that the line taken was probably proportionate. We accept that when this episode came to the knowledge of the Acting Superintendent at Macedon it was promptly and thoroughly investigated by her and management.

108 In July 1977 Barnardo's issued a circular to all its staff throughout the United Kingdom and Ireland relating to Care and Control.[89] This expressly stated that the only form of corporal punishment that was permitted was an occasional smack on the hand for children who were under the age of ten (and who were not handicapped).[90] Any other form of corporal punishment was forbidden, including the use of any implement.[91] No doubt to emphasise the importance of adherence to this policy, and the gravity with which a breach would be regarded, the document stated that "Any breach of these rules by a member of staff may lead to disciplinary action which could include dismissal" (emphasis added).[92]

109 We consider that the episode, and the way it was dealt with, reveal a number of systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's.

- There was no preliminary investigation of the theft by staff before the child was punished.
- The three staff who struck HIA 101 acted in breach of Barnardo's policy prohibiting the use of any implement by way of corporal punishment.
- That each resorted to the use of a spoon in such an impulsive fashion suggests to us that this was not the only occasion that staff resorted to a wooden spoon to administer minor corporal punishment.
- We consider that to admonish the three staff, and to place a note on each of their personal files, was an inadequate and inappropriate response. They had individually and collectively

88 Day 171, pp 45 and 47.
89 BAR 22272.
90 BAR 22273.
91 BAR 22274.
92 BAR 22274.

behaved in a very unprofessional manner, and we consider that the proper course to have taken at that time would have been for each to have received a formal written warning.

Ghost stories and the "evil eye"

110 There was considerable evidence before the Inquiry that BAR 1 was in the habit of telling children ghost stories in thoroughly inappropriate circumstances, and grimacing at them in a way which led them to think that she was giving them the "evil eye". BAR 1 told the police that the children called her "evil eye" and that she had told them ghost stories,[93] although she maintained that the lights were always on on such occasions.[94]

111 However, we are satisfied that BAR 1 was in the habit of telling children very frightening ghost stories, and on many occasions did so in the dark. For example, BAR 55 (who was in Macedon from the age of nine in 1973 until 1977 when she was thirteen) described BAR 1 as playing games in the dark, moaning like a demon and trying to catch the children.

112 These accounts were not limited to children, because several staff described what happened during a police investigation in 2001. BAR 35 described how BAR 1 would tell ghost stories with the lights out and "seemed to get the children excited which was the last thing needed around bedtime. It must have been done regularly because I can remember them", and "there was a mixture between kids being frightened and enjoying it".[95] Other staff such as BAR 76, BAR 91, BAR 113 and BAR 92 gave similar descriptions, BAR 92 describing the children being chased around at bedtime and saying that BAR 1 "was unsettling the kids around that time".[96] BAR 75 told the police that he had instructed her in 1981 not to tell ghost stories.[97]

113 No doubt, as a number of the staff maintained, some at least of the children in Macedon enjoyed having ghost stories told to them and on some occasions this may have been done in the dark. We are satisfied from the various accounts given by children and others to the police in 2001 that it was well known that BAR 1 regularly chased children in the grounds and told ghost stories involving her moaning and jumping

93 BAR 4910.
94 BAR 4914.
95 BAR 4540.
96 BAR 4606.
97 BAR 4630.

at children. A number of Barnardo's staff seem to have seen nothing untoward or wrong in this, but others clearly disapproved of her behaviour because this was resulting in a number of children being frightened whilst others became excited and difficult to settle down before bed.

114 We consider that this went much too far and was a practice rightly stopped by BAR 75 in 1981. It should not have been permitted to the extent that it was. Whilst we accept that a rare treat might have been to tell children ghost stories, to do this on a regular basis in the manner in which it was done was a highly undesirable practice. It frightened and upset many children when they should have been preparing to settle down for bed. We are satisfied that it was a completely unacceptable practice which was well known to Barnardo's staff who either condoned it or failed to intervene to stop it until BAR 75 stopped it in 1981.

115 We consider that the way in which this was allowed to happen amounted to a systemic failing, and that it went unreported and/or undiscovered for several years by senior managers responsible for the home represented a failure by Barnardo's to exercise proper supervision.

116 We consider this to be a further sign of BAR 1's unsuitability in any capacity to work at Macedon. Whilst BAR 1 held a childcare qualification, it is apparent to us that she was unsuitable to work in Macedon, and it is questionable whether she should have been permitted to transfer to Macedon from Windsor Avenue when her suitability there was found to be unsatisfactory. The fact that she was repeatedly permitted by senior management to continue in her employment having been found to be unsatisfactory is something we find inexplicable, particularly in the light of her known conduct in relation to ghost stories and grimacing in a way which led impressionable children to believe that she was in some way exercising power over them. It is particularly surprising that she was promoted so soon after the wooden spoons incident in 1979.

117 Irrespective of the nature of her conduct in other matters which we shall consider in due course, we are satisfied that Barnardo's was guilty of a series of systemic failings in relation to her employment.

- She should not have been retained as an employee for several years, let alone promoted, when it was clear that she was unsatisfactory in the manner that we have described.

The relationship between BAR 1 and Joseph Mains

118 As appears in that part of our report relating to Kincora, Joseph Mains was in charge of Kincora Children's Home from when it opened in 1958 until he was the subject of a police investigation in 1980. That resulted in his being charged with sexual offences against a number of children, charges which he ultimately admitted and for which he was subsequently sentenced to a period of imprisonment. The relevance of Mains to this chapter stems from his relationship with BAR 1.

119 BAR 1 said in her Inquiry Statement that they:

> "...went out together. After the Kincora scandal broke I broke our friendship off. He contacted me again when he was in prison and I felt sorry for him and visited him. I also visited him when he was dying in hospital in Coleraine".[98]

However, the evidence before us establishes that the relationship between BAR 1 and Mains when the Kincora investigation started was a long-standing one and more than one of friendship, and that BAR 1 was formally engaged to Mains. BAR 7 said that she believed that it was a formal engagement,[99] and Lynda Wilson recalled that BAR 1 had an engagement ring.[100] As part of the Terry Inquiry BAR 1 made a statement to Chief Inspector Flenley of the Sussex Police on 1 April 1982 in which she admitted that Mains had been her steady boyfriend for twenty years, that they had become officially engaged two or three years before (i.e. in 1979 or 1980), and that they went out socially together, including going to dances and dinner dances.[101]

120 We are satisfied that when it first became known that Mains was being investigated in relation to alleged sexual offences against children in his care it was well known to Barnardo's staff at Macedon that there was a close relationship between Mains and BAR 1.

121 We must emphasise that the Inquiry has found no evidence to suggest that Mains had any improper connection with Macedon, or with any child whilst that child was in the care of Barnardo's. Nevertheless, when it became known that Mains was alleged to have sexually abused children in his care, Barnardo's should have taken steps at that time to investigate

98 BAR 2533.
99 Day 170, p.107.
100 Day 172, pp.160 to 61,
101 KIN 40609.

the extent of the relationship between Mains and one of their staff to try to establish whether that relationship involved any risks to the children in Barnardo's care. No consideration appears to have been given by anyone at Barnardo's at the time to taking such steps.

122 In her evidence to the Inquiry, Lynda Wilson conceded this was a failing on the part of Barnardo's, because Barnardo's recognised that there should have been management consideration of the situation, and as a point of good management practice there should have been consideration and a proactive plan put in place at that stage.[102]

Barnardo's accept that "the failure to address, by way of risk assessment and management, the engagement of a member of staff to a person charged with sexual offences against children is...a failing".[103]

123 We agree that the failure of Barnardo's management to investigate the nature of Mains' connection with BAR 1 and Macedon represented a systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's.

124 Lynda Wilson felt that it was surprising that BAR 1 was kept on by Barnardo's as long as she was. She explained that at that time in particular a lot of effort would have been made to keep giving people a chance to do better. Nevertheless, she felt that in BAR 1's case that was a mistake.[104] While it is understandable that Barnardo's wished to support staff, we feel that indicated a willingness to put the interests of staff above the well-being and protection of children.

125 We consider that BAR 1 had shown herself to be a completely unsatisfactory employee to be placed in the care of children for a considerable period of time before she finally resigned. Barnardo's failure to terminate her employment at an earlier stage represented a systemic failing on its part to ensure that suitable staff were in place to look after the children in its care.

HIA 50

126 HIA 50 spent two periods in Sharonmore, the first for eight months in 1985 when he was fifteen, and the second for six months in 1986. HIA 50 alleged that during his time in Sharonmore he was anally raped by HIA 516 in a launderette in Ravelston. HIA 516 has denied this. He 102 Day 172, pp. 135 to 136 and 157 to 160.

103 BAR 21093.
104 Day 172, p.163.

was a former resident of Sharonmore, and Barnardo's accept that he probably did return from time to time after he left in 1982. It is noteworthy that in 1985 he was banned from entering Sharonmore because he had threatened a young boy there, and in December 1986 police had to be called to remove him from Ravelston. We also note that HIA 516 has a substantial criminal record including convictions for common assault, attempting to pervert the course of justice, two offences of unlawful carnal knowledge, as well as convictions for rape in the Republic of Ireland and England. Barnardo's paid £5000 compensation and his legal costs to HIA 50 in respect of this incident.

127 HIA 516 responded to the Inquiry Warning Letter and denied the allegations. However, we accept that HIA 50 was sexually abused, but we also accept that at the time Barnardo's had no reason to believe that he was at risk from HIA 516. Given that Barnardo's had no reason to believe that, and that they tried to keep HIA 516 away from Sharonmore when HIA 50 was there, we do not consider that the sexual abuse suffered by HIA 50 was due to any systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's.

128 HIA 50 has also complained that on one occasion he was taken in a Barnardo's staff car by BAR 8 when she went to pick up another child living in Sharonmore from her home on the Shankill Road in Belfast. This is a Protestant area but HIA 50 is a Roman Catholic, and he felt extremely frightened when two brothers of the girl tried to get into the car. He alleges that BAR 8 locked the car doors, and slapped him on the face. He believes that she deliberately set up this incident, and part of his complaint is that she did not report the incident afterwards.

129 BAR 8 gave evidence that no such episode occurred involving her and HIA 50. Barnardo's disclosed to the Inquiry a report of a different incident involving another staff member collecting the same girl from her home when the girl was late and had been drinking.[105]

130 Having considered all of the evidence relating to this matter, in the absence of conclusive evidence we are not persuaded that there were any systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's.

105 BAR 098

The Macedon Police Investigation

Background

131 In March 1997 HIA 516 wrote to the Chief Constable of the RUC. As a result he was interviewed by officers of the RUC in the Republic of Ireland where he was serving sentences imposed on charges of unlawful carnal knowledge, as well as awaiting trial on charges of rape and indecent assault.[106] In his police statement at 6 May 1987 HIA 516 made allegations that he had been subjected to abuse by three individuals. One was his father BAR 30. Another was BAR 12 and we have considered the allegations made against BAR 12 earlier in this chapter. The third person was BAR 1. These allegations were investigated, and in September 1997 the DPP directed no prosecution against each of these three individuals.

132 Whilst these matters were being investigated, the police learnt of further allegations by BAR 46 that he had been sexually abused by BAR 3 on an overnight trip to Dublin. It subsequently transpired that BAR 3 died in the Republic of Ireland in 1993,[107] although the police were unaware of that when they carried out this investigation.

133 In June 1998 allegations were made by BAR 47 a sister of HIA 516 and by HIA 101 his brother, that they too had been sexually abused during their time in Macedon.[108]

The Police Investigation

134 As a result of these additional allegations the police launched a wider investigation into Macedon covering the period from 1 December 1977, when BAR 1 started to work at Macedon, and 30 May 1984 when she stopped working for Barnardo's. This investigation also dealt with allegations against BAR 2 who worked at Macedon during part of that period.

135 With the assistance of Barnardo's, the police identified 51 people who had been in either Macedon or Sharonmore as children between these dates. Thirteen of the 51 could not be located, were confirmed to be deceased, or were unwilling to speak to the police. Twenty-seven said that they were not abused and were unaware of abuse. Thirteen of the 51

106 BAR 8102
107 BAR 8651.
108 BAR 4243.

ex-residents made allegations of abuse. One withdrew his allegation, one would not confirm his verbal allegation in writing, the third was murdered and there was no corroborative evidence of his allegations. As well as the ten remaining ex-residents, two children of a former staff member at Macedon also made allegations of abuse, making twelve people in all who alleged that they were abused during this period.

136 The allegations pursued by the police related to four individuals, namely BAR 1, BAR 2, BAR 3 and BAR 52. The DPP subsequently directed no prosecution of BAR 52. As we have already stated, at this time the police were unaware that BAR 3 had died, and because he had not yet been traced only BAR 1 and BAR 2 stood trial.

137 An unusual feature of the proceedings was that before the trial Barnardo's settled claims for compensation by nine of the ten individuals who alleged that they had been sexually and/or physically abused by BAR 1 or BAR 2 for amounts ranging from £15,000 to £25,000. Seven of the nine claims were settled within a few days of each other early in January 2003. The only one of the ten individuals who had not brought a civil claim against Barnardo's at that time was HIA 516.

The Trial

138 A lengthy trial of BAR 1 and BAR 2 took place in 2004. BAR 1 was charged with 105 offences against ten individuals, nine of whom were ex-residents of Barnardo's and one who had been a child of a former staff member who worked for Barnardo's. The trial judge directed that she be acquitted on thirteen charges, and that twelve charges be "stayed" (meaning that the prosecution was not allowed to proceed with the charges, but no verdict was taken). BAR 1 was convicted on 52 charges relating to eight of these individuals, and was sentenced to a total of eleven years imprisonment.

139 BAR 2 was charged with 60 offences against six ex-residents. He was convicted on seventeen charges relating to four of them. He was acquitted by direction of the trial judge on 33 charges, and found not guilty on the remainder. BAR 2 was sentenced to fourteen years in prison.

140 Two matters relating to the trial and its outcome are worthy of particular note:

- BAR 47 did not appear to give evidence in support of the allegations relating to her, and so her evidence on which these charges were based was not considered by the jury who were directed by the trial judge to acquit both BAR 1 and BAR 2 where those charges depended upon the evidence of BAR 47.

- Although HIA 516 gave evidence at the trial, at the end of the prosecution case the trial judge ordered that the twelve charges against BAR 1 that depended on his evidence should be "stayed" because the charges were an abuse of the process of the court as BAR 1 had been informed by the DPP that she was not to be prosecuted in respect of those charges. The effect of this ruling was that the jury did not have to reach a verdict on the allegations made by HIA 516.

Events before the hearing of the appeal

141 Both BAR 1 and BAR 2 appealed against their convictions. Prior to the appeals being heard by the Court of Appeal, BAR 37, who had given evidence for the prosecution at the trial, wrote a series of letters which were to prove highly significant. One of these was to BAR 2. In this letter,[109] which appears to have been written on 26 January 2005, BAR 37 made several important assertions.

- He had undergone a religious experience.
- BAR 1 was innocent and he would not be surprised if BAR 2 was innocent as well.
- A great injustice had taken place and he would come forward and tell the truth.
- HIA 216 and BAR 29 were lying about BAR 1, and so he believed they were lying about BAR 2 as well.

142 In March 2005 BAR 37 wrote another letter to BAR 89,[110] a social worker. He again said that he had undergone a religious conversion and that he wished to put right the injustice he had caused. In this lengthy letter he made the following assertions.

- BAR 1 was innocent of any of the sex charges against her.
- BAR 1 had frightened him and had given him the evil eye.
- That was why he gave evidence against her.
- BAR 1 had only nipped him while bathing him.
- He would now tell the truth although the others may stick to their lies.

109 BAR 4218.
110 BAR 9477.

- It would not surprise him if BAR 2 were innocent as well.
- That he had told his sister BAR 38 what to say about an incident that he had described involving BAR 1 and his sister and himself whilst both children were in the bath together.

143 As a result of these disclosures the police interviewed BAR 37 and he made a statement on 3 June 2005.[111] In this statement BAR 37 purported to recant what he had said in the various letters, and in particular that at BAR 9477. He asserted that he had said these things because he was angry at not being visited in prison by BAR 89, or by anybody else from Barnardo's, and because BAR 3 had been acquitted on a charge of buggery of him. He explained that his reason for saying that he had lied during the trial was the belief this would mean someone would come to visit him in prison, and that what he had said about others lying at the trial was untrue. He also said that he had not told his sister what to say about the bath incident.

The evidence given to the Court of Appeal

144 Before the Court of Appeal dealt with the appeals against the convictions by BAR 1 and BAR 2 it heard evidence from a number of those who had given evidence at the trial, namely BAR 37, BAR 39, BAR 38 (sister of BAR 37), and the investigating officer in the case, Detective Sgt Boyce. BAR 89, the social worker who had been closely connected with some of the witnesses, also gave evidence. Several, notably BAR 39 and BAR 89, were rigorously cross examined by defence counsel over an extended period of time. The Court of Appeal later expressed its opinion upon some of the witnesses who had given evidence before it, and on some of those who gave evidence during the trial.

The outcome of the appeal

145 After the appeal, the Court of Appeal delivered three judgements. The first was an ex tempore, oral, judgement quashing the convictions.[112] This was followed by a written judgment confirming and amplifying the reasons already given.[113] Finally, on 16 September 2005 the court delivered a second written judgment giving its reasons for not ordering a retrial of

111 BAR 9491
112 BAR 4120.
113 BAR 4112.

BAR 1 and BAR 2 on the various charges in respect of which they had been convicted.[114] As we have already indicated, the outcome of the trial and of the appeal was that BAR 1 and BAR 2 were acquitted of all of the charges against them.

146 It is essential to remember that the acquittal of any defendant on a criminal charge does not necessarily mean that some or all of the evidence upon which the criminal charges were based was untrue, only that the prosecution have failed to establish his or her guilt to the high criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt.

147 It is therefore perfectly possible that in such circumstances some or all of that evidence may nevertheless satisfy the lower standard of proof on the balance of probabilities applied by a civil court, or by an inquiry such as this Inquiry. Although Barnardo's payments of compensation made before the trial to a number of the witnesses at the trial shows that Barnardo's accepted that it was legally liable to those individuals, all of whom gave evidence at the trial, Lynda Wilson explained to the Inquiry that Barnardo's does not take issue with the decision of the Court of Appeal, and it recognises that it is not for Barnardo's but for the Court or this Inquiry to determine the allegations to whatever extent is necessary.[115]

148 Our Terms of Reference require us to determine whether there were systemic failings on the part of those responsible for residential homes for children, in this case by Barnardo's. We have to take account of all the evidence now available to this Inquiry to establish whether on the balance of probabilities abuse occurred which could give rise to findings that there were systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's towards the children in its care. This includes us giving proper weight to any material that affects the reliability of some, or all, of the evidence of witnesses during the trial of, and during the appeal by, BAR 1 and BAR 2.

149 In particular it requires us to take into account that the evidence of individual witnesses has been exhaustively probed in cross examination, either at the trial or before the Court of Appeal. Where the evidence of an individual witness has been shown to be either untrue or unreliable in important respects at the trial or before the Court of Appeal, then we have to take that into account when deciding to what extent, if any, we can regard the evidence of that witness as reliable.

114 BAR 4105.
115 Day 172, p.132.

150 We have concluded that the judicial criticisms of the evidence of several of the witnesses whose evidence was relied upon to support the criminal charges against BAR 1 and BAR 2, criticisms which led the Court of Appeal to quash their convictions on the charges upon which they were convicted, mean that we cannot rely on their evidence alone. We have also considered the evidence of other witnesses relied upon to support the convictions of BAR 1 and BAR 2. We have not had the benefit of hearing oral evidence from the other witnesses, or from BAR 1 or BAR 2, although both provided written statements to the Inquiry denying that they committed any offences.

151 Because this was a criminal investigation it was concerned with possible offences and was not concerned with probing issues of a childcare nature. As a result, inevitably issues of systemic failings relating to the care provided for children were only touched on incidentally.

152 Taking all of these factors into account, we consider there is insufficient reliable evidence to satisfy us that the more serious allegations of sexual and physical abuse made against BAR 1 and BAR 2 by witnesses other than BAR 46 and BAR 39 have been established to the civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities.

153 For these reasons we consider that we must leave out of account the allegations of abuse against BAR 2, and the greater part of the allegations of abuse against BAR 1, when deciding whether there were systemic failings in the care of children provided by Barnardo's at Macedon.

154 As a result, we are left with only the evidence of BAR 46 and BAR 39 relating to BAR 1. We have considered that evidence very carefully. Some of their evidence supports the conclusions we have already expressed about BAR 1 frightening children by telling them ghost stories, chasing them in the dark and pretending she had the evil eye. We are not persuaded by the remainder of their evidence, which was relied upon at the trial to establish the more serious allegations of sexual and physical abuse of children in either Macedon or Sharonmore made against BAR 1 and BAR 2.

155 Looking at the evidence as a whole we are persuaded that BAR 1 engaged not only in the ghost stories and other related matters to which we have already referred, but also engaged in inappropriate bathing of male children who were of an age when they should have been left completely to bath themselves, as other witnesses alleged in their statements to the police, and not assisted to do so by BAR 1. We regard this as an unacceptable practice which should not have been allowed to occur.

That it was allowed was due to inadequate supervision of BAR 1 by management at Macedon, and amounted to a systemic failing.

156 Nevertheless, it is also clear from statements made to the police during this investigation that there was corroboration of some parts of the account by BAR 47 of her relationship with BAR 2.

- Several staff members observed that BAR 47 appeared to be very fond of BAR 2. BAR 9 told the Inquiry he warned BAR 2 to be careful.[116]
- BAR 47 agreed that she borrowed BAR 2's ring on occasion. This also is confirmed by BAR 9.[117]
- The then Superintendent of Macedon, BAR 23 (since deceased) objected to BAR 2 taking BAR 47 to his flat.[118]

157 We are satisfied that these events occurred, and that they should not have. We consider that management at Macedon were at fault in not taking steps to investigate whether an inappropriately close relationship was developing between a staff member and a teenage girl resident in the home. Whether or not anything untoward in other respects occurred between BAR 2 and BAR 47 (as to which we express no conclusion), the failure to prevent this relationship developing, and then to put a stop to it, represented a systemic failing on the part of the management at Macedon to ensure proper standards of professional behaviour on the part of BAR 2.

The Ruddock Report

158 When the trial judge sentenced BAR 1 and BAR 2 he made a number of critical observations as to how Macedon was run based on the evidence given during the trial, which had been clearly accepted by the jury. After the trial, and before the developments leading up to and during the Court of Appeal hearing, Barnardo's arranged for a senior officer at its headquarters in Barkingside in Essex to carry out an investigation and report. Lynda Wilson explained that this was not intended to be an in-depth historical review of the allegations, but an examination of Barnardo's practices when viewed against the trial judge's remarks in order to see whether there were systems failures in Macedon during the time with which the trial was concerned, and to check Barnardo's current

116 Day 172, pp. 99 to 100.
117 See police report at BAR 4278 for other accounts to the same effect.
118 BAR 4282.

practices.[119] This report was prepared by Martin Ruddock. Whilst part of the process involved consideration of notes taken with the permission of the judge by Barnardo's staff during the trial, Ruddock also examined a number of the children's files.

159 The Ruddock Report was subject to trenchant criticism by BAR 14, who had not seen it before it was provided to him by the Inquiry. He described it as, "a rather shallow piece of work, somewhat partial in its scope, and certainly weak in the evidence".[120] "To me it was a crudely constructed set of conclusions without evidence".

160 Ruddock commented on a number of matters, in particular BAR 1's continued employment, and observed that in his view "... management failed to effectively review evidence from children's records and no doubt elsewhere to show something at Macedon was wrong". However, he immediately qualified that by continuing:

> "This comment is however made with hindsight and knowledge about abusive practice gained through numerous reviews over the last 20 years".[121]

161 A key conclusion, and one to which BAR 14 took particular exception, was contained in the following passage:

> "My hypothesis is that the level of incident, low staff moral [sic] political environment [letter by BAR 24][122] management failure and lack of strategic leadership left a staff group managing a level of chaos that inhibited reflective practice to identify and address what was going on".[123]

162 We do not consider it necessary to comment upon every detail of the Ruddock Report. We accept that to a significant degree it was influenced by hindsight. We also accept that between 1977 and 1981 Barnardo's senior staff in Northern Ireland engaged in detailed strategic planning that led to Macedon being replaced by the innovative and carefully planned Sharonmore Project. We do not consider that there was a lack of strategic leadership in Barnardo's at that time in that context.

119 Day 172, p.133.
120 Day 172, p.12.
121 BAR 056.
122 BAR 4242.
123 BAR 057.

163 However, we are satisfied that management practices at Macedon during the years 1977 to 1981 were deficient in a number of respects that give rise to systemic failings. As we have already indicated, we consider BAR 1 should not have been employed at Macedon. Her assaults, and the assaults of her two colleagues, on HIA 101 and her being allowed to frighten children by telling ghost stories and the related matters should have been dealt with sooner and more robustly. The failure of BAR 24 to report BAR 3's behaviour to his superiors was a further example of an unacceptable approach. All of these failings contributed towards creating, or perpetuating, risks of abuse to children, whether they were in care of Barnardo's in Macedon or elsewhere.

164 Barnardo's have stated that the Ruddock report meant "Barnardo's accepted that when the decision was made to close Macedon, management focus shifted to the development of the new Sharonmore service. This shift in service, it was further accepted, had detrimental implications for the robustness of the service to be closed".[124]

165 We are satisfied the failings we have identified occurred because of poor management at Macedon, something that reflects on the leadership exercised by Barnardo's staff both in Macedon and at a higher level in Northern Ireland, possibly because oversight of Macedon by more senior staff was reduced due to the attention devoted to bringing the Sharonmore Project into being and to completion, as well as achieving a smooth transition from Macedon to Sharonmore. We regard the poor management at Macedon and of Macedon during BAR 1's time there as a systemic failing by Barnardo's.

BAR 52

166 The fourth person to be investigated by the police during the Macedon Inquiry was BAR 52 who was employed as a gardener or handyman at Macedon for some nine months between November 1973 and August 1974. BAR 55 (who did not apply to the Inquiry) was at Macedon for most of the time between 1969, (when she was aged six or seven), and 1976, when she was sixteen. In 2000 she described to the police how she had been in the handyman's shed when she was twelve, and how he came up behind her while she was standing at the work bench, put his hands on the bench on either side of her, rubbed himself against the back of her legs, and rubbed his hand on her leg on top of her school uniform skirt. Someone called his name and he moved away. Although she thought she told another girl about this, it would seem that she did not report the incident to anyone in authority.

124 BAR 21087.

167 When questioned by the police in 2000, he was 80 and the alleged events had occurred more than 26 years before. He denied allowing children into his workshop.[125] As the investigating officer commented,[126] the allegations were uncorroborated. Taking into account BAR 52's age and the passage of time the DPP directed no prosecution.[127]

168 BAR 52 was the brother-in-law of the then superintendent BAR 24. This appears to have been a "one-off" episode. Although there was one other allegation, which may have related to BAR 52, this was not pursued by the complainant and there appears to be no other allegations relating to him, whether at Macedon or elsewhere. Given the nature of his job as a grounds-man/handyman, it is unlikely that at that time in 1973 and 1974 the type of vetting which is now regarded as appropriate would have been considered usual for such a post. In those circumstances we do not consider that there is any evidence of a systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's in relation to these events.

Staffing

169 Apart from the suitability of BAR 1 to work at Macedon and Sharonmore, which we have already considered, among the criticisms made of Barnardo's by the trial judge when sentencing BAR 1 and BAR 2 was that "Staff had no or very basic qualifications and seem to have been given far too much unsupervised responsibility". We have the advantage of having received a great deal of evidence from all quarters about the level of qualifications and quality of staff during the post Second World War period in many more homes in the statutory and voluntary sectors of residential childcare in Northern Ireland than just the limited period at the Barnardo's homes at Macedon and Sharonmore that were examined during the trial.

170 That evidence, and the experience of those members of the panel with many years experience of the position elsewhere in the United Kingdom, leaves us in no doubt that in the early 1970s all residential institutions

125 BAR 5109.
126 BAR 4354.
127 BAR 4020.

for children still had to rely to a very significant degree on staff who were either unqualified, or had only basic qualifications, in residential childcare. There was a limited number of professionally qualified staff in the childcare sector generally at that time, something that the Ministry of Home Affairs had recognised as early as the 1950s needed to be improved.

171 Over many years the Ministry encouraged both the voluntary and statutory sectors to send staff on training courses and supported this by providing the necessary finance to pay replacement staff while staff were absent on training courses in England. From the late 1960s various training courses were provided by the Rupert Stanley College in Belfast on both a full-time and day-release basis. However, as BAR 14 pointed out in his evidence,[128] the voluntary sector had difficulty in retaining residential staff in the 1970s as the statutory sector offered more attractive working conditions, such as shorter hours and better pay.

172 It was only after the Hughes Inquiry had drawn attention to these difficulties in its report that a real improvement in the position in the residential childcare sector was achieved, and to such an extent that by the end of our Terms of Reference in 1995 the position in Northern Ireland was considerably ahead of the rest of England and Wales in this respect.

173 Although we have found systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's in relation to their employment of BAR 1 and in their treatment of the allegations against BAR 3, we consider that if anything, Barnardo's were better than other institutions in the voluntary sector in Northern Ireland in the quality of staff they employed. In her evidence Dr Harrison said that when she joined Barnardo's in 1976 its policy was to recruit staff with at least the minimum qualification, and her impression at that time was that there was a much higher number of staff with the basic qualification than maybe existed in statutory homes at that stage.[129]

174 Her recollection is in accordance with the evidence given to the Hughes Inquiry by BAR 79 (then the Divisional Director of Barnardo's for Ireland), and Barnardo's written submission to the Hughes Inquiry. BAR 79 emphasised that traditionally, Barnardo's put a lot of emphasis on staff development and training, and had its own training courses before nationally available courses became available from 1948 onwards.[130]

128 Day 171, p.34.
129 Day 172, pp. 42 and 46 to 48.
130 BAR 22026.

It also paid qualified staff more than their equivalents in the statutory sector so that they could attract and retain qualified staff.[131] As part of this approach, in 1979 Barnardo's decided to pay residential social workers the same as field social workers.[132]

175 BAR 79 pointed out that in its report of its 1983 inspection of Sharonmore the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) expressed the view that Sharonmore had :

> "...probably the best qualified group in a home in the Province. [And] overall, out of 120 social work staff in the division [that is for the whole of the island of Ireland] we have got 64 with an approved qualification by the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work, and 34 staff with either the Certificate in Social Service, which is part-job related training, or another allied qualification in teaching or in youth work."[133]

176 We are satisfied that Barnardo's made every effort to recruit suitably qualified staff, and although we have found it to be guilty of a systemic failing in the specific case of BAR 1, we are satisfied there was not a general systemic failing in Barnardo's recruitment of staff. From the documents we have seen we are satisfied that Barnardo's had many excellent policies, systems, and procedures, and went to considerable lengths to disseminate these by regular visits by senior staff from Headquarters, individual supervision of staff and staff meetings. We recognise that in many respects Barnardo's were amongst the leading exponents in the United Kingdom in the demanding field of residential childcare for very difficult children.

Inspections

177 As in some other modules, the DHSSPS were unable to find reports of inspections of Macedon by inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs due to the normal process of review and destruction of old files. However, there is no reason to believe that such inspections were not carried out as we know they were in other institutions, and that is borne out by the evidence of BAR 14 who was aware of inspections by Miss Forrest and Miss Hill of Barnardo's in the 1970s.[134]

131 BAR 22026.
132 BAR 22054.
133 BAR 22026.
134 Day 171, 2015 at p.33.

178 BAR 14 told the Inquiry that in his eight years with Barnardo's he never met a SWAG inspector in his professional capacity, although he was aware of informal visits, it remains the position that SWAG did not carry out any formal inspections in the mid-1970s for reasons we address in Chapter 2, but the failure by SWAG to carry out formal inspections of Macedon in the 1970s was a systemic failing on its part.

Compliance with the Visiting Committee requirement of the Voluntary Homes Regulations

179 BAR 14 explained that although Barnardo's Council in Essex had ultimate responsibility, a considerable amount of authority was delegated to divisional heads. Because there was no visiting committee in the Barnardo's structure in Northern Ireland this meant that the Divisional Director in Northern Ireland in turn delegated the responsibility for regular visiting to the Assistant Divisional Director (the ADD) in the divisional headquarters. The ADD was answerable to the Divisional Director, and visited each residential home on a monthly basis and prepared a detailed report.[135] In addition, there were regular meetings of the superintendents and deputy heads of all the homes, which were properly minuted and matters of day-to-day administration and concern discussed, as can be seen from minutes produced to the Inquiry, such as those for the superintendents held on 8 September 1978.[136]

180 We consider that these arrangements meant that the Divisional Director for Ireland was the "administering authority" within the meaning of the 1975 Voluntary Homes Regulations, and that the visits by the ADD fulfilled the requirement under the Regulations for monthly visits.

181 The Hughes Inquiry received considerable detail from BAR 14 about the frequency of visits to Macedon and Sharonmore by the ADD during the period relating to the sexual assaults suffered by BAR 44, and Barnardo's requirements for regular written pro forma reports to be submitted to the ADD by the superintendent. It concluded at 11.20 of its report[137] that:

> "As we have said in earlier chapters, we consider the reporting activity to be of secondary importance to the actual visits, and we accept that BAR 111 [the ADD at the relevant time] did visit the Project [Sharonmore] on a regular basis and that monitoring was continuous

135 Day 171, 2015 pp. 16 to 19.
136 BAR 26075/6.
137 BAR 22012

and well-directed. Nevertheless, we consider Barnardo's record on reporting to have been less than entirely satisfactory in so far as it fell short of full compliance with the letter of the 1975 Regulations. Nevertheless, this had no relevance to the isolated offence against [BAR 4]".

182 We are satisfied that these arrangements provided a very high level of external oversight of the day-to-day working of Macedon and Sharonmore, oversight which amply complied with the spirit, if not perhaps the letter, of the Voluntary Homes Regulations.

Conclusions

183 We are satisfied that Barnardo's and the DHSS were responsible for the following systemic failings in relation to Macedon.

Barnardo's

184 The failure to detect the bizarre behaviour of BAR 3, and then to take appropriate action, were systemic failures because they demonstrated a lack of knowledge of what was happening among the staff on the part of management at Macedon.

185 We consider the amount of unsupervised access by BAR 4 to HIA 216, and the failure of Barnardo's to inform the EHSSB that this access was taking place, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to provide proper childcare.

186 There were several systemic failings in the way in which the allegations about BAR 3 were handled by Barnardo's staff at Macedon:

- They were not reported for some months by BAR 8 to BAR 24.
- A deliberate decision was made by BAR 24 not to report the full facts to his superiors or to anyone else.
- BAR 75 does not seem to have reported the remark made to him by BAR 47 that BAR 3 was a "real fruity boy" to his superiors at Barnardo's.[138]

138 BAR 8619

187 The reluctance on the part of some Barnardo's staff in Northern Ireland in the 1980s to report allegations about staff to the proper authorities was a systemic failing.

188 The manner in which the relationship between HIA 516 and BAR 12 was allowed to develop, and the length of time for which it was allowed to continue, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to ensure proper childcare of HIA 516.

189 The 'wooden spoon' episode, and the way it was ultimately dealt with, represented a number of systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's:

- The three staff who struck HIA 101 acted in breach of Barnardo's policy prohibiting the use of any implement by way of corporal punishment.
- That each resorted to the use of a spoon in such an impulsive fashion suggests this may well have not been the only occasion that staff resorted to a wooden spoon to administer minor corporal punishment.
- To admonish the three staff, and to place a note on each of their personal files, was an inadequate and inappropriate response. The proper course to have taken at that time would have been for each to have received a formal written warning.

190 The way in which BAR 1 was allowed to frighten children with ghost stories and the 'evil eye' practice, and that it went unreported and/or undiscovered for several years by senior managers responsible for the home represented a failure by Barnardo's to exercise proper supervision.

191 BAR 1's bathing of male children who were of an age when they should have been left completely to bath themselves was an unacceptable practice which should not have been allowed to occur. That it was allowed was due to inadequate supervision of BAR 1 by management at Macedon, and amounted to a systemic failing.

192 We agree that the failure of Barnardo's management to investigate the nature of Mains' connection with BAR 1 and Macedon represented a systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's.

193 The failure to prevent the relationship between BAR 2 and BAR 47 developing, and then to put a stop to it, represented a systemic failing on the part of the management at Macedon to ensure proper standards of professional behaviour on the part of BAR 2.

194 BAR 1 should not have been retained as an employee for several years, let alone promoted, when it was clear that she was unsatisfactory in the manner that we have described.

195 BAR 1 had shown herself to be a completely unsatisfactory employee to be placed in the care of children for a considerable period of time before she finally resigned and Barnardo's failure to terminate her employment at an earlier stage represented a systemic failing to ensure that suitable staff were in place to look after the children in Barnardo's care.

196 There was poor management at, and of, Macedon during BAR 1's employment.

197 There was a failure on the part of the management at Macedon to ensure proper standards of professional behaviour on the part of BAR 2.

The DHSS

198 The failure by SWAG to carry out formal inspections of Macedon in the 1970s.

Chapter 20:

Module 9 – Manor House Home, Lisburn

Introduction

1 The Inquiry devoted Module 9 to the examination of Manor House Home (Manor House), a children's home in Lisburn, County Antrim. Manor House was run by The Society for the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics, which was a mission agency associated with the Church of Ireland. It was founded in March 1849 with the aim of converting members of the Roman Catholic faith in Ireland to Protestantism. The headquarters of the organisation was in London and it was managed by a General Committee made up of clergy from the Church of Ireland and the Church of England, which at that time were one Church under the Act of Union of 1800. A Northern Committee composed of lay and clerical representatives of the Church of Ireland and the London Committee was based in Belfast. The organisation is now known as the Irish Church Missions (ICM) and the abbreviation of that title will be used in this chapter. The ICM is now a registered charity concerned with the encouragement of gospel growth in Ireland.

2 The Inquiry devoted four sitting days to this module commencing on 5 January 2016 and finishing on 8 January 2016. We received complaints about Manor House from six former residents. We heard evidence from two of these witnesses, HIA 346 and HIA 341 on 4 September 2014, as part of Module 2 of the Inquiry which dealt with child migrant schemes. During Module 9 we heard three witnesses, HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 366 and a summary of the statement of HIA 289 who was unable to attend in person for health reasons.

3 HIA 354, who gave evidence on 3 September 2014, during Module 2 of the Inquiry, referred to a brief stay he had in Manor House in November 1950 prior to being sent to Australia. HIA 354's only memories of Manor House were of being taught hymns and being given a bath and new clothes prior to his departure to Australia. He had no complaints about how he was treated in the home.[1]

4 In addition to the evidence from witnesses, we considered information provided by the ICM about the establishment and operation of Manor House and its written responses to the statements provided by witnesses about the home. Reverend Edmund Coulter, the current Superintendent of ICM and Reverend Courtney, a retired Church of Ireland clergyman gave evidence in person. Dr Hilary Harrison provided a written statement and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS). Fionnuala McAndrew, Director of Social Care and Children's Services, Health and Social Care Board provided a statement and exhibits on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and the HSCB also provided written responses to the statements from former resident witnesses. We also examined police material about investigations into allegations of peer sexual abuse in Manor House, sexual abuse of a resident by an adult visitor to the home and sexual abuse of another resident by a man unconnected to the home.

1 MNH 033/4.

5 We spent some time considering the initial funding and inspection of the home by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA). This was because the MoHA's engagement with Manor House provided the only example we are aware of where the MoHA contemplated removing registration granted to a voluntary children's home under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968.

6 We appreciated the contemporaneous records and documentation provided by ICM, DHSSPS, the HSCB and the police, which greatly assisted our understanding of Manor House.

The Establishment of Manor House

7 In 1925, Miss Louisa Stannus, who was running a home for orphaned and disadvantaged children in her Manor House estate in Lisburn, made a proposal to the ICM that she would donate her home to the organisation if it would undertake to continue to run it as a children's home.[2] Following negotiations between Miss Stannus and the ICM about the terms of the donation the ICM took over the property and formally opened it as a children's home in November 1927.[3]

8 From the beginning, the funding of the home proved to be difficult for the ICM, and only seven months after it opened the General Committee of the ICM was considering closing the home.[4] However, it decided to allow time for a special appeal for the home to be launched in Northern Ireland and to use a legacy of £500 it had received to support the home. Despite these measures, the financial difficulties continued to the extent that by

2 MNH 2323.
3 MNH 2324.
4 MNH 2324.

December 1929 the children in the home had been moved to Dublin and the home was temporarily closed.[5]

9 In January 1930, the General Committee received representations from a Dr Peate, deploring the closure of the home and indicating that he and others felt that sufficient funds could be raised locally to support the home and warrant it being re-opened. The Financial Secretary of the General Committee was instructed to respond to Dr Peate and explain that while his views were appreciated there were "many difficulties in the way of re-opening the home".[6]

10 An important consideration for the ICM at this time was its obligations under the terms of the Trust it had agreed with Miss Stannus for the transfer of the property. It was also dealing with threats from Miss Stannus that she would sue ICM for compensation for monies she spent on repairs to the home after its closure.[7] The ICM sought advice from the Attorney General of Northern Ireland about the terms of the Trust, and legal advice about its position in relation to Miss Stannus's claims. The minutes of the General Committee dated 27 November 1930 recorded that the Rev T.C. Hammond had been advised by Mr Hector Hughes KC that in the circumstances the best solution would be for the ICM's Northern Committee to take over and re-open the home, which would mean the Trust would be fulfilled and in turn this would deprive Miss Stannus of any claim.[8] This advice was accepted and the General Committee agreed to provide the £200 required for repairs to Manor House, but only on the "understanding that the Northern Committee took over the entire liability of running the Home".[9] Given the General Committee's understanding of the financial difficulties experienced in maintaining and running the home we consider it was irresponsible of it to decide to re-open the home in order to avoid further legal action by Miss Stannus and then to allocate very limited funding for essential repairs and pass full responsibility for the home to its Northern Committee. We consider this irresponsible approach amounted to a systemic failing by the General Committee of the ICM to ensure the home provided proper care.

5 MNH 2325.
6 MNH 2326.
7 MNH 2326/7.
8 MNH 2326.
9 MNH 2326.

11 The Northern Committee agreed to this arrangement and following a court case in Belfast about the terms of the Trust it was ruled that the ICM should establish a local Management Committee for Manor House. The Management Committee was duly established. It was elected by the Northern Committee and approved by the General Committee of the ICM which indicates that the General Committee continued to have a formal role in the governance of the home. The Management Committee was comprised of clergy and lay people from the Church of Ireland, some of whom were local to the Lisburn area.[10]

12 The home reopened in 1932, and it is clear from minutes of meetings at that time that the Management Committee was almost solely responsible for securing funding for the home. The General Committee of ICM limited its contribution to a sum of not more than £52 per annum to help with the costs of paying the salary of the matron of the home.[11] As the majority of children admitted to the home were private placements, generally on the application of a local clergyman,[12] their care was not funded by Welfare Authorities. Limited financial contributions were received from the families of some of the children resident in the home.[13]

13 In order to raise funds, the Management Committee organised a variety of appeals in local papers and flag days and rented out some of the land surrounding the home. It also employed two ladies to raise and collect funds for the home and this was an important source of income.[14]

14 These funding arrangements appear to have been adequate for a number of years. For example, the minutes of a Management Committee meeting held in February 1947 recorded that the finances of the home for the year ending 31 December 1946 were most satisfactory.[15] However, by October 1951 the financial situation had taken a significant downturn on account of the illness and consequent resignation of the principal collector due to ill health.

15 At its meeting on 13 November 1951 the Management Committee recorded that debts were outstanding and accounts had not been paid for two months, and agreed that a statement of its accounts should be sent to

10 MNH 2328.
11 MNH 2327.
12 for example, MNH 3194.
13 MNH 2031.
14 MNH 2031.
15 MNH 3218.

the General Committee of the ICM. This decision suggests that although the General Committee was responsible for approving the appointment of the Management Committee it did not extend its governance to regular monitoring of the financial state of the homes. This was despite the financial difficulties it had experienced in funding the home. The Management Committee estimated that £2,000 was required annually to maintain the home, and recognised that in order to keep the finances of the home in a satisfactory state "a steady reliable and adequate income was necessary".[16]

16 There is evidence of contact between the home and government departments in 1945 in relation to a proposal to build a crèche facility for children. The minutes of the Management Committee meeting held on 23 February 1945 refer to a meeting being arranged with the Prime Minister with a view to obtaining the necessary materials for the new building.[17] There is no evidence that inspections and visits to voluntary children's homes which were provided for by Section 25 of the Children's Act 1908[18] were made to Manor House. The DHSSPS has indicated that it is likely such visits were made to the home during the period 1927 to 1950 since the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) employed children's inspectors from 1922,[19] but files that would have recorded such visits are no longer in existence.

17 However, whatever the position was prior to 1950, the passing of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, which required for the first time all voluntary children's homes to be registered by the MoHA, meant that Manor House came to the attention of officials from that Ministry.

Registration Process

18 The Management Committee first applied to have Manor House approved as an adoption agency and MoHA inspectors, Miss Forrest and Miss Harrison, visited the home in June 1950 in connection with that application. The inspectors met with Mrs Bannister of the Management Committee and the matron of the home, Miss Scott. Miss Forrest's report of the visit, dated

16 MNH 3309.
17 MNH 2481.
18 MNH 300.
19 MNH 15032.

8 June 1950,[20] record these ladies expressing some ambivalence about the application to become an adoption agency because the home did not have outreach workers and the matron already "had her hands full with her own work: 20 children (17 at school, 3 toddlers)". The staffing was detailed as matron, assistant matron, a nursery assistant aged sixteen years and a cook who all lived in the home and an unspecified number of domestic staff who were not resident in the home.[21]

19 Miss Forrest recorded her concern that the Management Committee was not aware the home had to be registered as a voluntary children's home, and appeared to think that such registration was linked to applications to the MoHA for funding. She described the home as very clean but shabby, noted decorating work was underway, and concluded that the home "seemed generally to be run on good lines, handicapped by lack of money".[22] At the end of her report she noted that her colleague, Mr Wilde, told her after her visit to the home that the DMO, whom we take to be the Divisional Medical Officer, thought the health of the children from the home who attended school was "not up to scratch".[23]

20 The MoHA received an application on 22 June 1950 for Manor House to be registered as a children's home,[24] with a covering letter asking for information about how the home might apply for a grant. The application form stated that the home could accommodate up to twenty-two children and that the nineteen children resident in the home at that time were being cared for by five female staff.

21 A letter dated 29 June 1950 was sent from the MoHA to the Management Committee to confirm Manor House had been granted registration and that the Ministry would consider applications for funding to assist the improvement of premises or equipment and the securing of qualified staff. The letter also explained that the MoHA intended to issue regulations for the conduct of children's homes, but that its powers to inspect children's homes would be put in force straight away and that Inspectors would carry out their first inspections within the next few weeks.[25]

20 MNH 2939-2941.
21 MNH 2939.
22 MNH 2940.
23 MNH 2941.
24 MNH 2933.
25 MNH 2927.

22 Despite this indication that an inspection was imminent no inspection took place and we found no record of any other visit by MoHA officials to the home until February 1953. The only indication of any contact between the home and MoHA from June 1950 to August 1952 is a reference in a letter dated 11 August 1952 from Mrs Bannister, who was by then the chairman of the Management Committee, to the then Minister of Home Affairs, Brian Maginess QC MP, which suggests the MoHA played a role in arranging for the Fire Authority to inspect Manor House.[26] However, it seems likely that this was a general arrangement put in place for all voluntary children's homes rather than a specific measure for Manor House.

23 Mrs Bannister wrote to Mr Maginess to ask for a grant to assist Manor House to implement the recommendations of the Fire Authority.[27] She explained that the home was in a financially embarrassed state because it had spent around £1,000 on repairs in the previous five years and its running costs had increased. A letter was sent by return under the name of the Minister indicating that it might not be possible to provide a grant as the Government was precluded from making contributions to any religious body.[28] However, this matter was quickly resolved, and the next day a further letter was sent stating that a grant might be possible and providing guidance about the conditions for grant aid.[29]

24 On 18 November 1952 the Management Committee submitted an application for funding for a grant of £1,000 towards the costs of meeting the Fire Authority's requirements and providing a new sewer and a playground.[30] In the supporting documentation sent with the letter, the chairman and the treasurer of the Management Committee confirmed that the home had a debt of over £600 due to the bank. Representatives from the Management Committee met with officials at Stormont on 7 January 1953 to discuss grant conditions. In a note of that meeting an unidentifiable official raised concern about whether the Management Committee would be able to fund the extensive repairs to the home that appeared necessary, and suggested that the opinion of an architect should be sought before a grant was made.[31]

26 MNH 2925.
27 MNH 2925.
28 MNH 2924.
29 MNH 2923.
30 MNH 2919.
31 MNH 2910.

25 Six days after that meeting the MoHA received notification from Antrim Welfare Authority that it had received an adverse report on Manor House, and officials decided to delay a planned inspection of the home until the matter could be investigated.[32] Miss Forrest spoke to the relevant Welfare Officer, and recorded on 4 February 1953[33] that the adverse report was about a rumour that children were being beaten in the home, but the mother of the children concerned had clarified that her children's complaint had been that the food in the home was dull and insufficient and that she understood it had improved. Miss Forrest also recorded the Welfare Officer's concern about inadequate staffing in the home, and how on one visit he had found a senior girl in charge.

26 On 6 February 1953, Mr Jackson a MoHA official, Miss Forrest and Mr Gibbs, an architect from the Ministry of Health and Local Government, visited the home to assess its condition and consider whether the Ministry would be justified in making a grant.

27 Miss Forrest and Mr Jackson both produced reports of the visit[34] and recorded significant concerns about the conditions they found in the home. These included dirty, untidy and cold rooms in need of renovation, and inadequate and unsuitable toilet and bathing facilities for the children. On a positive note, Miss Forrest recorded that children who wet the bed, who had previously been sleeping "in an awful little room in the basement quite away from everyone", had been brought back to sleep with the other children following MoHA officials protesting to Mrs Bannister about the previous sleeping arrangements when she met with officials in Stormont.[35]

28 Mr Jackson noted, "The building and equipment conveyed a most depressing impression of dilapidation and dirt", and commented that given the state of the home "the staff is insufficient, incompetent or lazy".[36] Miss Forrest also commented on the insufficient, untrained and inexperienced staff and the poor relations between the matron and her assistant.[37]

29 The inspectors found the children supervised by a senior girl in a room heated by one stove which the children were seated some distance from. They found all the staff in the kitchen, which they commented was the one

32 MNH 2908.
33 MNH 2908.
34 MNH 2904 and MNH 2894.
35 MNH 2905.
36 MNH 2894.
37 MNH 2904.

warm room in the house. Although Mr Jackson found the children to have pleasant manners and to be reasonably well nourished and clad, Miss Forrest recorded:

> "...the Children, although not unhappy looking, seemed dull and I thought them unresponsive and not so much ill-mannered as unmannered. They are just untrained".[38]

30 Mr Jackson recorded concerns about the ability and experience of Mrs Bannister and her Management Committee colleague, Mr McAdoo, and questioned whether they would be able to raise the funds that the home clearly needed. Miss Forrest commented that Mrs Bannister was unaware of the Regulations the MoHA had issued about the conduct of children's homes and asked for a copy to be sent to her.

31 Mr Jackson concluded:

> "So, far from recommending a Government grant in this case, I would suggest that we should seriously consider the transfer of the children to the care of the Welfare Authority if the Irish Church Missions cannot rise to the occasion within a reasonable time".[39]

We noted that there is no record of the MoHA advising the Management Committee to ask the Welfare Authorities to fund the care of the children from their areas who had been placed in the home through private arrangements.

32 Mr Gibb, the architect, also reported on the visit[40] and echoed his colleagues' concerns about the dilapidated state of the home. In particular, he pointed out that the wooden fire escape appeared very insecure and highly dangerous.

33 Although the letter confirming the registration of the home indicated that the Ministry's power to inspect voluntary homes would be put in force straight away, and that Inspectors would carry out their first inspection visit within the next few weeks, there was a delay of two years and seven months before MoHA officials visited the home. We recognise that MoHA officials would have been busy at that time implementing a new registration process and developing statutory regulations for the conduct of children's homes. However, this delay has to be considered within the context of Miss Forrest's initial observations in June 1950 about the state of the home and her reference to the Divisional Medical Officer's view about the health of the children. Also, it is clear from internal MoHA documentation that officials had reservations about the content and tone of the information provided in the application for the homes to be registered, which a senior civil servant recorded "scarcely suggested a hard headed and businesslike committee running a well organised home".[41]

38 MNH 2904.
39 MNH 2907.
40 MNH 2897.

34 We consider that these concerns should have warranted an earlier inspection. By the time Miss Forrest returned to the home on 6 February 1953 the conditions for the children had deteriorated significantly. Earlier inspection visits could have enabled the poor conditions for the children in the home to be identified and addressed sooner. Therefore, we find the lack of inspection of the home for a period of over two and a half years following initial registration to be a systemic failing by the MoHA to ensure the home provided proper care.

35 Although the reports of the MoHA inspectors described children who appear content and well nourished we consider the general state of dilapidation in the home, the inadequate sleeping, toilet and washing facilities for the children, the poor heating and the low staffing levels amount to a systemic failing by the Management Committee at that time to ensure the home provided proper care.

36 Following a report in the Northern Whig newspaper on 10 February 1953 regarding the seeking of additional funds by the ICM that made reference to a visit by the ICM Superintendent, Reverend T H Horan, Miss Forrest contacted Mrs. Bannister to ask if she had alerted Reverend Horan to the situation in the home. Miss Forrest recorded that Mrs. Bannister told her she had some general conversation with the Superintendent, but did not tell him about the MoHA visit or the inspectors' criticisms. Mrs. Bannister informed Miss Forrest that the Management Committee had met, and that all the members were confident that they "can or should carry on the home and that they can bring it up to scratch". She also informed Miss Forrest that the matron was leaving the employment of the home the following day.[42]

37 Miss Forrest visited the home again on 12 February 1953, this time with Dr Simpson.[43] Dr Simpson recorded in his note of the visit that Miss

41 MNH 2733.
42 MNH 2898.
43 MNH 2877.

Forrest found that the home had been cleaned since her last visit and new bed clothes had been purchased. Dr Simpson noted that the staffing had reduced to one assistant matron and a live-in domestic, and pointed out that this level of staffing was inadequate to care for fourteen children, some of whom were under five years. However, he was less pessimistic than his colleagues about the home, and suggested that given money and additional staff it would be possible to convert the premises into a satisfactory children's home.[44]

38 In a letter dated 10 February 1953, in support of the Management Committee's funding application, the Financial Secretary of the ICM, submitted the organisation's income and expenditure accounts for 1950/51 and 1951/52 to Mr Dunlop of the MoHA.[45] An unidentified MoHA official concluded the accounts showed that there was little prospect of financial assistance being made available to the home from ICM's headquarters.[46] He advised that the MoHA should:

> "have a heart to heart talk with the Committee at an early date and endeavour to make the members realise that it's not a Government grant they need so much as a series of schemes which would secure the home a much larger income".

We noted again that officials do not appear to have considered the possibility of advising the Management Committee to ask the welfare authorities to provide funding for the children from their areas that were resident in the home.

39 In March 1953 the Management Committee sent a report to the ICM Headquarters outlining the home's financial needs in respect of the premises, equipment, laundry, food, clothing and staff.[47] It concluded that it:

> "...was absolutely impossible for the Committee to obtain from voluntary subscriptions or by its own efforts the money required to continue the work of the Manor House Home".

40 In April 1953, the Management Committee wrote to MoHA enquiring about its grant application.[48] This resulted in a further meeting between

44 MNH 2877.
45 MNH 2878.
46 MNH 2875.
47 MNH 2856-2859.
48 MNH 2871.

the Management Committee and officials on 17 April 1953.[49] The MoHA's note of the meeting recorded that the Management Committee was considering appointing an architect to prepare estimates with a view to making a renewed grant application, and that officials had emphasised that before making any grant, the Ministry would:

> "...have to be satisfied that the finances of the organisation were such as would enable it to carry on its functions as regards general maintenance and management".[50]

41 Following this meeting three members of the Management Committee asked for a private meeting with officials which took place on 22 May 1953.[51] It was clear to officials from that meeting that there was a split in the Management Committee about the future of the home. Each of the three members who met the officials indicated that they favoured a transfer of the home to Antrim Welfare Authority.

42 Further to this meeting, officials met on 22 May 1953. They decided to send extracts from the inspectors' reports on Manor House to the Management Committee with a letter warning that the registration of the home would have to be withdrawn if the conditions were not made right within a reasonable period.[52] They also decided to send a copy of the correspondence to the ICM headquarters and agreed that Miss Forrest should pay a further visit to the home to monitor the situation.

43 In her overview report on the state of voluntary children's homes in Northern Ireland dated 28 April 1953,[53] Miss Forrest provided the following critique of Manor House:

> "Has been both poverty stricken in money and ideas for some time past. Insufficient staff of poor quality in recent times. Equipment and maintenance very poor. Some improvement in recent weeks but needs a large amount of money spent on eg floor-coverings, heating, beds, tables, chairs and play equipment. Attend outside schools".

44 Miss Forrest visited the home again on 22 May 1953 with a colleague, Mr Dunlop.[54] Although she found the house cleaner, and noted that some decorating had been done, her overall assessment was that "the state

49 MNH 2865-2869.
50 MNH 2866.
51 MNH 2855.
52 MNH 2855.
53 HIA 1462.
54 MNH 2852-2854.

of disorder and untidiness was appalling".[55] She noted that the children looked well and happy but that the sleeping, toilet and washing facilities for them remained unsatisfactory and their clothes were frayed and worn.

45 Mr. Dunlop also made a report of the visit and recorded his amazement at the conditions in the home. He concluded:

> "…in my opinion the home should be closed until it is put in order by the present organisation or taken over by some responsible body".[56]

46 A letter dated 8 June 1953 was sent from Mr O'Neill, Assistant Secretary, MoHA, to the Honorary Treasurer of the Manor House Committee,[57] and a copy was sent to the ICM headquarters.[58] Mr O'Neill recognised the efforts of the Management Committee, but pointed out that the Ministry could not maintain the registration of any home where the conditions were so unsatisfactory. He pointed out that as the registering authority the MoHA had the power to remove a voluntary home from the register where it appeared that the conduct of the home "was not in accordance with the regulations made or directions given…or is otherwise unsatisfactory."[59] Mr O'Neill concluded by stating:

> "Unless the Committee can assure the Ministry that immediate steps will be taken to bring the home up to the necessary standard, I am afraid the Ministry will have no alternative but to withdraw the home from the register".[60]

47 It is clear from internal MoHA documentation that the first draft of this letter was amended to make it "a more lengthy and sympathetic letter".[61] The initials on the note explaining the amendments are not clear but they appear to be WBM, which would suggest it was the then Minister of Home Affairs, William Brian Maginness QC MP, who wanted a more sympathetic approach to the Management Committee.

48 Mr Gurd, the Honorary Treasurer of the Management Committee sent a letter dated 10 June 1953, in response to Mr O'Neill's letter, in which he stated the Management Committee was going to meet on 19 June

55 MNH 2852.
56 MNH 2848.
57 MNH 2837/8.
58 MNH 2833.
59 Section 99(4) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 (HIA 233).
60 MNH 2838.
61 MNH 2843.

1953 to consider the MoHA's concerns about the home.[62] The Financial Secretary of the ICM also responded on 10 June 1953 to inform the MoHA that the ICM could not offer any financial help to the local committee.[63] However, she followed this letter with a further letter to the MoHA dated 18 June 1953, in which she indicated that the ICM was "considering the possibility of reconstituting the Trust".[64]

49 It is clear from hand written comments on the copy of this second letter that MoHA officials had different views about what response should be made to the ICM. Mr O'Neill responded to the Financial Secretary's letter on 22 June 1953.[65] He pointed out that the meeting of the Management Committee which was due to take place on 19 June 1953 had been cancelled, and that in the circumstances the Ministry's intention was to give notice to the Management Committee that the Certificate of Registration would be withdrawn from 1 August 1953. He stated however:

> "If of course, subsequently the Committee is in a position to convince the Ministry that it is able to run the home satisfactorily and in accordance with the regulations, the Ministry will be only too pleased to renew the Certificate of Registration".

50 Mr O'Neill also wrote to the Management Committee on 22 June 1953.[66] He referred to the Committee's cancellation of its planned meeting on 19 June 1953 and pointed out that the Ministry could not continue to permit children to be accommodated in a home under such unsatisfactory conditions. A copy of the letter sent to the ICM headquarters about the planned removal of registration from the home from 1 August 1953 was attached for information.

51 Subsequently, Mr Gurd confirmed in a telephone call to a MoHA official, which appears from the handwritten note of the conversation to be a Mr Dunlop,[67] that the Dublin branch had "agreed that the only thing to do was to close the home immediately but that the certificate should be retained". Mr Dunlop recorded that he pointed out that it would be more satisfactory if the certificate was returned as this would avoid any chance of the home being reopened before they were in a position financially to

62 MNH 2831.
63 MNH 2830.
64 MNH 2828.
65 MNH 2824/5.
66 MNH 2826/7.
67 MNH 2820.

do so. However, on a further file note dated 24 June 1953[68] Mr Dunlop recorded that he advised Mr Gurd:

> "...that the Management Committee might like to consider asking the Ministry not to take any action in relation to its letter and that the committee would arrange to disperse the children, promise not to admit any more and to hold the Certificate until the Chairman returns when they could then consider what action they should take".[69]

52 Subsequently Mr Gurd wrote to the MoHA on 29 June 1953[70] to confirm that the Management Committee had resolved to close the home as soon as satisfactory arrangements could be made to receive the children elsewhere, and that no further children would be admitted. He also requested that the MoHA:

> "...take no further steps regarding withdrawal of registration as after these arrangements have been made, we will ask you to accept a voluntary surrender of our registration until such time as we are in a position to carry on again."[71]

53 The Financial Secretary of the ICM wrote to the MoHA on 2 July 1953[72] to confirm the intention to have the children in Manor House transferred to Mrs Smyly's Homes in Dublin. The ICM had a close association with these homes. She also stated:

> "...my Committee hopes within the next few months that it may be found possible to reconstitute the Manor House Home on a basis satisfactory to your Ministry."

54 In a handwritten annotation to this letter, a MoHA official commented, "... If our Children Act has done nothing else it has at least cleared out this dump!"[73]

55 By 9 July 1953, the ICM had appointed a new Management Committee for Manor House Home[74] and when Miss Forrest visited the home on 10 July 1953,[75] she found that all the children had been sent to homes in Dublin except one child who had been found an alternative placement by Fermanagh Welfare Authority.[76]

---

68 MNH 2819.
69 MNH 2819.
70 MNH 2817.
71 MNH 2817.
72 MNH 2811.
73 MNH 2811.
74 MNH 2810.
75 MNH 2808.
76 MNH 2792.

56 Despite Mr Gurd's undertaking to surrender the Certificate of Registration the Management Committee did not do so and the MoHA took no action to require it to do so. Internal MoHA communications suggest that officials took this approach on the direction of the then Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Maginess. In a submission dated 1 September 1954[77] a MoHA official referred to the Minister's feeling at the time of the closure:

> "Our then Minister felt, however, that the local committee was a well-meaning and kindly body of persons (as, indeed, they certainly were) and that their failings were due to utter ineptitude rather than lack of good intentions; and he instructed the Division not to withdraw the Certificate in any way that would bring scandal upon them".[78]

57 A further reference on a file dated 23 November 1956[79] referred to Mr Maginess feeling that:

> "…the Institution was much too close to his own doorstep to be denied an opportunity of putting its affairs in order and perhaps starting a lease of renewed and more perfect life".

58 We noted a reference in a letter about Manor House sent from the MoHA to Welfare Committees in December 1957 that the MoHA had previously written to the Welfare Committees on 23 July 1953 to inform them that the use of Manor House had been discontinued temporarily as a voluntary home for children until further notice.[80]

59 In November 1953, MoHA received a letter from an architect acting on behalf of the Manor House Committee that enclosed plans and proposals for alterations and renovations to Manor House.[81] A MoHA architect, Mr Wright, inspected the home with Miss Forrest and Dr Simpson on 17 December 1953.[82]

60 This renewed engagement with the home prompted a series of discussions and correspondence within the MoHA about the approach that should be taken to the home and whether funding should be provided towards the costs of necessary renovations. It is clear that officials held different views. While some tended towards a sympathetic approach, others were of the view that as Manor House was no longer operating as a children's

77 MNH 2730.
78 MNH 2730.
79 MNH 2661.
80 MNH 2576.
81 MNH 2800.
82 MNH 2798/9.

home it was not eligible for a grant, and that in any case no grant should be considered until the new Management Committee showed it was able to meet the normal running costs of a children's home.

61 It is clear from the minutes of the Management Committee held on 21 September 1954[83] that the committee members were aware of the divergent views held by officials and sought a meeting with the then Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Hanna QC MP, to get definitive advice about whether the MoHA would be willing to grant funding for improvements to Manor House. The minutes recorded that the Secretary of the Management Committee had a frank discussion with Mr Hanna who indicated that if the Management Committee could raise £7,000 of the £12,000 it estimated was required for renovations and could show evidence of augmenting the regular income for the home considerably, the MoHA would be likely to give a grant in the region of £5,000.

62 A memo from Mr Hanna to officials, dated 7 September 1954,[84] indicates that he settled on the position he communicated to the Secretary of the Management Committee despite his reservations about the MoHA's handling of Manor House. In the memo he was critical that the Ministry had taken no action to withdraw the Certificate of Registration when the Management Committee failed to voluntarily surrender it as it had undertaken to do. He also pointed out that the Government architect's involvement in considering the plans for renovation of the home suggested that the MoHA "condoned the whole business". He expressed regret that he could not recall the registration, but accepted, as he had communicated to the Secretary of the Committee, that the Management Committee should be given the opportunity to secure necessary financing for the home.

63 A series of negotiations and meetings between representatives of the Management Committee and MoHA officials followed and culminated in the funding application for Manor House being referred in June 1956 to the Maconachie Committee.[85]

64 By letter dated 30 October 1956, Miss Maconachie informed the then Minister of Home Affairs, Mr W W B Topping QC MP, that her Committee had visited the home and scrutinised its accounts for the three years

83 MNH 3353.
84 MNH 2728.
85 The Maconachie Committee was established under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 to review grant applications from voluntary children's homes and training schools.

ending 31 December 1955 accounts and considered:

> "...the premises are now quite suitable for the reception and accommodation of 19 or 20 children, plus staff, and that the Management Committee is a responsible and conscientious body of persons".[86]

65 The Committee recommended that grant aid amounting to 70% of the approved expenditure over £10,000 incurred in the modernisation of the home should be awarded. Following further internal discussion in the MoHA about the terms of any grant and how and when it should be paid, given that Manor House was not currently operating as a children's home, the Minister approved the grant application. On 15 January 1957 the MoHA was notified of the Ministry of Finance's approval for a grant not to exceed £7,000 without the specific approval of the Ministry.[87]

66 On 15 October 1957 a letter from MoHA was sent to the Manor House Committee confirming this grant. We noted the reference in this letter to an advance grant of £2000 which had been paid to the home on 6 February 1957. The MoHA also sought information about the present position of the home in order that its inspectors could have an opportunity to inspect and report on the general suitability of the premises before the home was reopened. Inspectors visited the home in January 1957,[88] November 1957[89] and December 1957[90] to monitor progress. By 24 December 1957 the MoHA was in the position to write to the Secretary of the Management Committee to confirm that subject to adequate staffing arrangements being made the home was authorised to reopen for the reception of not more than twenty children.[91] The MoHA wrote to the Welfare Authorities on the same day to inform them that the home had been completely renovated and provided with appropriate staff and it was now reported by the Ministry's inspectors to be suitable for the accommodation of children.[92] We noted that this letter indicated that satisfactory staffing was in place in the home, while the letter sent on the same day to the Management Committee indicated that the reopening of the home was subject to adequate staffing arrangements being put in place.

86 MNH 2671.
87 MNH 2653.
88 MNH 2635.
89 MNH 2602.
90 MNH 2585.
91 MNH 2584.
92 MNH 2582/3.

Operation and Governance of Manor House from 1958 to 1984

67 When the home reopened under the management of the new committee it appears to have progressed well. The only extant records about admissions to Manor House cover the period November 1957 to December 1978. These show that, in contrast to the earlier years, generally over half of admissions were through the welfare authorities and then social services.[93] The fees received for these placements and funding raised through donations and special appeals and flag days[94] meant that the financial challenges the home had faced in the 1950s had lessened to the extent that by November 1962, the Management Committee was in a position to make loans of over £4,000 to the ICM headquarters.[95]

68 The minutes of the Management Committee show that it met regularly. Although it dealt with practical matters to do with the funding and maintenance of the home, it always received and discussed a general report about the health and progress of the children in the home, and concerned itself with the detail of arrangements for holidays and outings for the children. Committee members approved admissions to the home, and developed and agreed policies for the care and welfare of the children. For example, at its meeting on 18 January 1965 it agreed amendments to its rules about children receiving hospitality outside the home including approval for overnight stays away from the home.[96]

69 A staff sub-committee interviewed applicants for jobs and the Management Committee approved the appointment of staff and received progress reports about new appointments. The minutes show that there was a high turn-over of staff, particularly in 1962 and 1963, which was in part due to girls as young as fifteen and sixteen years being appointed as live-in care staff and leaving after short periods in the home,[97] but also due to poor relations between the matron, Miss Watson and some of her staff. The Management Committee recorded at its meeting on 15 October 1962 that it had to get to the root of the cause of the "major crisis" in staffing.[98] They subsequently interviewed staff who had resigned to find out their

93 MNH 159.
94 MNH 3521/2.
95 MNH 3514.
96 MNH 3630.
97 MNH 3535 and MNH 3538.
98 MNH 3511.

reasons for doing so and questioned Miss Watson about staff relations. The minutes of the meeting do not record any discussion of the effect the high turn-over of staff might be having on the children, but did record concern that supporters of the home and the general public would be wondering about the "almost continuous advertising for staff".[99] The tone of the minutes of subsequent meetings suggest that tensions developed between committee members and Miss Watson about staffing matters, and these culminated in Miss Watson's resignation in May 1963.

Administering Authority

70 The Management Committee was the Administering Authority of the home as defined in the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952 (the Regulations). We will now consider the Management Committee's performance in this regard in relation to two key responsibilities it held as the Administering Authority: the appointment of an officer in charge and the appointment of a monthly visitor to the home.

71 Section 101 (1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1950 dealt with regulations as to the conduct of voluntary homes and included provisions for the MoHA to be consulted about applicants for appointment to the post of person in charge of a home; prohibit the appointment of a particular person to such a post; and, receive required notice about any change of the person in charge of a home.[100] The Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952 (the Regulations) placed responsibility on the Administering Authority to appoint "a person to be in charge of the home" (Regulation 5(1)), and placed specific responsibilities on that post holder in relation to the maintenance of records such as the medical records of each child and records about the application of corporal punishment.[101] The Regulations specified that the person in charge of the home should ensure generally that order is maintained by his personal influence and understanding and that of his staff and that resort to corporal punishment should be avoided as far as possible. The detailed conditions for the application of corporal punishment included that it should only be administered by the person in charge of the home or in his absence his duly authorised deputy.[102] In Manor House the title 'matron' was used for the person in charge of the home.

99 MNH 3512.
100 HIA 236.
101 HIA 288.

72 It was recorded in the minutes of the meeting of the Management Committee of 16 September 1963 that a letter dated 5 September 1963 had been received from the MoHA stating that inspectors were not content with the staffing position as neither matron nor her deputy were on duty when they visited.[103] The Management Committee decided that one of its members, Mrs Burns, would contact the MoHA and explain the situation had come about due to staff sickness and that a Miss Spencer had been in charge. There is no record of the outcome of Mrs Burns' discussions with the MoHA about the staffing situation.

73 The Management Committee also decided to contact MH 71 who was due to take up the post of Assistant Matron in October 1963, to let her know that she would be "in full charge for the time being".[104] The minutes of the next Management Committee meeting, which was held on 21 October 1963, recorded that MH 71 was in post and that since no suitable applicants had been found for the post of matron she had agreed to carry on in full charge for a longer period.[105]

74 At its next meeting on 18 November 1963 the Management Committee decided not to advertise for a matron at that time because of the cost of the unsuccessful advertising of the vacancy over the previous months and concern that frequent advertising of the vacancy would have "adverse effects".[106] At its meeting in February 1964 the Management Committee agreed that MH 71 should be given the title Acting Matron, "when referred to in the press or in public".[107] The minutes of the March 1964 meeting record that Miss Hill of the MoHA had telephoned about the vacant matron post, and that the Chairman had informed her of the difficulties experienced in filling the post and that the Committee had confidence in MH 71. There is no record of Miss Hill's response to this information or any further contact with her about this matter.

75 MH 71 continued in the post of Acting Matron, but in June 1964 informed the Management Committee that she would be resigning and leaving in 102 HIA 290.

103 MNH 3549.
104 MNH 3548.
105 MNH 3554.
106 MNH 3557.
107 MNH 3591.

December 1964 to commence child care training.[108] The Management Committee appointed MH 3 to the post of Assistant Matron in October 1964 and decided in June 1965 to appoint her as Matron of the home.[109]

76 We consider the delay of almost two years in appointing a matron was unacceptable, given that post holder's general responsibility for the day to day management of the home and specific responsibilities to ensure order was maintained in the home, that resort to corporal punishment was avoided as far as possible and where corporal punishment was deemed necessary to ensure it was administered in accordance the conditions set down in the Regulations.

77 It is also clear that the Management Committee did not ensure that the statutory regulation about monthly visiting was fully met. Regulation 4 (2) required:

> "The administering authority shall make arrangements for the home to be visited at least once in every month by a person who shall satisfy himself whether the home is conducted in the interests of the well-being of the children, and shall report to the administering authority upon his visit and shall enter in the record book referred to in the Schedule hereto his name and the date of his visit."[110]

78 The ICM told us that Rev Thompson, who was the Honorary Secretary of the Management Committee in the 1960s, visited the home regularly and met with the children and encouraged them to discuss any problems with him. However, there is no signed record of the dates of his visits and no record of Rev Thompson making a formal report on them to the Management Committee.

79 Mr Johnston, who was the Honorary Secretary to the Management Committee prior to the home's closure, gave evidence to The Committee of Inquiry into Children's Homes and Hostels (the Hughes Inquiry), and said he visited the home regularly, including for an hour and a half before each Committee meeting. He described spending time with the children, how he would investigate any complaints made by them and report substantiated complaints to the Management Committee[111] Mr Johnston stated to the Hughes Inquiry that he understood that through his visits to

108 MNH 3626.
109 MNH 3645.
110 HIA 288.
111 MNH 10148.

the home he was undertaking a statutory duty on behalf of the Committee but he accepted that his reporting of his visits was more informal than it should have been and that with hindsight it might have been better to provide a written report to the Committee.

80 We accept that arrangements were in place for the Honorary Secretary of the Management Committee to visit the home regularly, and meet with the children, but consider that these arrangements were not sufficiently formal to meet the statutory requirement for monthly visiting as set down in the Regulations. The DHSSPS accepted that MoHA should have checked that the monthly visiting requirement was being discharged.

81 We consider that the Management Committee's delay in appointing an officer in charge during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and its failure to appoint a monthly visitor amounted to a systemic failing to meet statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

82 We consider the MoHA's failure to ensure that the Administering Authority met its statutory responsibilities to appoint a person in charge of the home during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and to make arrangements for monthly visiting amounted to a systemic failing to implement statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

Inspections by the MoHA and the DHSS

83 There are references in the Manor House diary and Management Committee minutes to Miss Hill of the MoHA inspecting the home in September 1966 and September 1970. No further detail is available as the DHSSPS was unable to locate copies of Miss Hill's reports of these inspections. There also is evidence that Miss Forrest of the MoHA visited the home after 1969. Mr Johnston, the former Honorary Secretary of the Management Committee, told the Hughes Inquiry that Miss Forrest of the MoHA would have been a regular visitor to the home but that she would have met with the matron, MH 9, not with Committee members. MH 9 succeeded MH 3 as matron in October 1969.

84 Mr Johnston said he received feedback from MH 9 about these visits and MH 9 indicated that Miss Forrest "criticised quite a lot of the time".[112]

112 MNH 10162.

This lack of direct contact with the Management Committee meant that the MoHA was not in the position to check whether it was meeting its responsibilities as the Administering Authority for the home. Given the history of Manor House, and the indication that Miss Forrest continued to be critical of the home, we consider the lack of more formal inspections at this time, and the MoHA's failure to raise Miss Forrest's criticisms with the Management Committee amounted to a systemic failing by the MoHA to ensure the home was providing proper care.

85 Equally we consider the Management Committee's failure to engage directly with Miss Forrest to find out more about her criticisms of the home amounted to a systemic failing on its part to ensure the home provided proper care.

86 The lack of formal independent scrutiny of the home continued when the DHSS took over responsibility for the regulation of voluntary children's homes. The only indication we had of the DHSS's attitude to the home in the 1970s was that it was prepared to provide funding towards the costs of building new staff accommodation which would increase the accommodation available for children in the home. Minutes of a Management Committee meeting held at the start of 1978 (date not included)[113] record that the cost of the building work was £36,327, and £17,286 had been paid as a grant by the DHSS.

87 The use of the home by the Welfare Authorities in the 1960s and 1970s provides some indication that it was considered to be providing a satisfactory level of care. There was evidence of social workers regularly visiting children in the home, and, as we will consider later in this chapter, evidence of a senior social worker investigating complaints from a mother about the care her children were receiving in the home. However, as the HSCB pointed out in the statement it submitted for this Module, the primary purpose of social workers' visits was to monitor the individual needs of the children in the home that they were responsible for, and they would not, as a matter of course, have formed part of any overall quality assurance of the home.[114]

88 The DHSSPS was able to confirm from information provided to the Hughes Inquiry and other documentation available to it that the Social Work Advisory

113 MNH 10088.
114 MNH 333.

Group (SWAG) inspected the home in July 1978 and September 1981, that a follow-up visit to the 1981 inspection was made in December 1982, and that a social work adviser visited the home in January and August 1978, July 1979, probably July 1982 and definitely in September 1982.[115] Only the report of the 1981 inspection was available to the Inquiry. An internal memo from an inspector (Mr Walker) to Dr McCoy indicates that in addition to the formal inspection in 1981 he also "inspected" the home using a format for earlier inspections as a guide: four times in 1982; three times in 1983; and, four times in 1984.[116] There are no reports available of these visits or any action recommended by Mr Walker or taken by the home in the light of them. We consider the continuing lack of formal inspections up until 1978 was unacceptable, particularly given the history of the home, and amounted to a systemic failing by the DHSS to ensure the home was providing proper care.

89 The report of the inspection of the home carried out by SWAG on 28, 29 and 30 September 1981 provided us with a helpful analysis of the care regime in the home at that time.[117] The inspectors found seventeen children in residence whose ages ranged from three to sixteen years. Three of the children were in the care of the Health and Social Services Boards on a voluntary basis, and thirteen children were the subjects of Fit Persons Orders. There were five siblings groups, which accounted for fourteen of the children. The EHSSB was responsible for twelve of the children and the SHSSB for four of the children. There was only one resident who had been placed privately, and his admission had been arranged thirteen years before in 1968. Inspectors found that ten of the children had been resident in the home for from six to ten years, and expressed concern that greater efforts were not being made to return children to their families or their local communities.[118]

90 Inspectors commented on the absence of male care staff, the youthfulness of some care staff and that contact with outside agencies, including field social workers, was made only through the matron, MH 9. They expressed concern that individual files were not kept for each child, that junior staff did not have access to the files that were maintained and that the home did not receive up to date information about the regular reviews carried out on the children and their families by the Boards.

115 MNH 300.
116 MNH 2250-2251.
117 MNH 10194-10232.
118 MNH 10015.

91 Inspectors were critical of the use of a whistle to summon children to assemble outside the dining room before meals and, to assist the serving of meals, children being seated according to the portion size they ate. They also commented on meetings between children and their parents being confined to the hallway of the home, and children being woken to go to the toilet to prevent bed-wetting.

92 The inspectors found that staff were sensitive to the children's needs and sought to maintain a warm comfortable living environment and noted a mutual trust between the children and the staff. However, they observed staff spending time on domestic chores rather than interacting with the children and recommended that care staff should be given a clearly defined role which would enable them to work to address children's developmental needs.[119]

93 Mr Johnston told the Hughes Inquiry that as a result of this recommendation a maximum amount of time for care staff to spend on domestic chores was introduced, and that staff were pleased with the new arrangements as it meant they could spend more time with the children. He explained that some members of the Management Committee were surprised at this matter being raised by Inspectors, and queried what else staff would be doing if they were not engaged in domestic tasks. Mr Johnston accepted this indicated that some members of the Management Committee were not sufficiently modern in their approach to child care.[120]

94 The inspectors recorded their surprise at finding that the matron had not been consulted about, or given sight of, policy documents provided to SWAG by the Management Committee prior to the inspection, including the statement of the aims and objectives of the home. They pointed out that there was a need for a clearer distinction between the roles of the matron and the Management Committee, and more recognition of the matron's responsibility for professional work of the home.[121]

95 Inspectors commented on the drop in admissions to the home and suggested that, given the trend towards older children with more difficult behaviour being admitted to care, the home would have to be re-organised and the attitudes and assumptions of staff adjusted so that their capacity to cope with more disturbed children could be improved.

119 MNH 10036.
120 MNH 10155.
121 MNH 10224.

They also suggested that there needed to be more emphasis on working effectively in the short term on behalf of children with a view towards their rehabilitation into the community.[122] Inspectors expressed the hope that early changes along these lines would encourage Boards to make greater use of the home.

96 The description of the home in the SWAG inspection report suggests that it provided a caring and ordered regime focused on meeting the practical needs of children who were in need of long-term care. The emphasis from the mid-1970s on enabling children as far as possible to remain within their families and using residential care as a short-term measure meant that the type of long-term care provided by Manor House was increasingly seen as less appropriate and therefore less necessary. The Management Committee and the staff got little opportunity to find out if they had the will and ability to adapt to these changing circumstances as the impact of the falling numbers on the home's finances became increasingly pressing.

97 By 1982, the number of children in the home had reduced to thirteen and the treasurer reported to the Management Committee on 20 September 1982 that the Bank had been in touch because the home's current account was overdrawn. The Management Committee agreed to accept the Bank's offer of overdraft facilities and to withdraw savings in order to pay accounts.[123] Mr Johnston told the Hughes Inquiry that in the years before the home was closed the low number of children in the home and the related loss of per capita fees meant that the home was running at an annual loss of £30,000.[124] This situation led the Management Committee to conclude that, in view of the reduction in the number of children requiring long-term residential care, the home was no longer financially viable and it arranged for the home to close in November 1984.[125]

98 We will now consider the evidence we received about physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse, neglect and unacceptable practices in Manor House.

Physical Abuse

99 Three of the witnesses we heard from said they were physically abused in the home. HIA 341 was placed in the home as a baby in 1941 and

122 MNH 10222.
123 MNH 10004.
124 MNH 10144.
125 MNH 10068.

remained there until he was ten years old. He told us he was frequently assaulted by staff and he attributed the hearing loss he suffers from to the smacks he received from staff.[126] He said he was caned by staff and hit with a whip with long strings attached and was told by staff, "Don't cry and don't tell, you cry, you get more."[127]

100 The ICM said in its response to HIA 341's evidence that they found it impossible to reconcile his account to the Inquiry of his time in Manor House with earlier accounts he has given to newspapers in Australia in which he stated that he had no memory of his life prior to being migrated to Australia. HIA 341 explained when he gave evidence in person to the Inquiry that he had not talked about his experiences in Manor House before because he did not want to jeopardise a possible reunion with his mother.[128]

101 HIA 346 was also a resident in the home in the 1940s. He was admitted to the home in 1946 when he was four years old and remained there until he was eight years old. HIA 346 told us he was beaten by staff, and he said in his written statement that he was put in a cold bath after being beaten which he thought was an attempt to stop bruising.[129] When he gave evidence in person he said that he was only guessing that the use of the cold bath was to reduce bruising and that it may have been part of the punishment.[130]

102 The ICM accepted in its statement to the Inquiry that corporal punishment was used in the home in the 1940s, but pointed out that corporal punishment was permitted in children's homes at that time. It stated that the Management Committee took seriously any complaints or allegations about abuse received from the children in the home and gave examples of such responses by the Committee in 1946 and 1947, two of the years in which HIA 341 and HIA 346 were in the home.

103 The first example, from 1946, was of the Management Committee investigating a complaint that two boys had been excessively punished by an assistant matron. As well as interviewing the assistant matron the Management Committee arranged for the boys to be examined by a doctor.

126 MNH 022.
127 MNH 023.
128 Day 45, p.29.
129 MNH 014.
130 Day 45, p.43.

104 The second example from 1947 was of the matron MH 1 reporting to the Management Committee that she had to administer corporal punishment to one boy and some other boys questioned her about it. The Management Committee met with the boys to discuss the matter.[131]

105 The ICM also provided the example of the Management Committee being informed in September 1962 that the behaviour of a member of staff who had been a former resident in the home had been found to be unsatisfactory because it had come to light that when she was a resident she had hit two children in the home. The member of staff in question resigned on the day of the Committee meeting.[132]

106 HIA 365 and his twin brother HIA 290 were admitted to Manor House in February 1964 when they were aged 9 years and remained there until January 1968. They then spent a year living with their father before returning to Manor House for a brief stay from January 1969 to June 1969. HIA 365 said he saw the strap being used on other children, but he was never strapped because he had chronic asthma as a child and was often unwell. HIA 290 told us he did not complain about sexual abuse by a visitor to the home because he was scared he would get strapped or slapped.

107 In contrast HIA 289 was in the home between June 1965 and March 1968, the same time as HIA 365 and HIA 290. He told us that the home was regimented but not harsh. He remembered the matron, MH 3, as firm but fair.[133] He recalled children who misbehaved having privileges taken away or being sent to bed early.[134] He said that if the misbehaviour was particularly serious the child would be taken to MH 3, and she would decide whether the behaviour merited the child being hit on the hand with a ruler. He commented, "I don't remember any of the children being terrified of her".[135]

108 HIA 366 was admitted to the home on 8 December 1972 aged nine years and was discharged just over a year later on 12 December 1973 aged ten years. She told us she was frequently physically abused by the matron, MH 9,[136] and she recounted a particular incident when MH 9 treated her

131 MNH 12001.
132 MNH 161.
133 MNH 085.
134 MNH 088.
135 MNH 088.
136 MNH 078.

roughly because a celebrity who was visiting the home was paying her attention. HIA 366 also said that she was bullied by older children in the home and that she felt they behaved in that way because they were bullied by MH 9.

109 The ICM pointed out that HIA 366 has given a range of dates and lengths of time for her stay in the home in the accounts she had given to the media. HIA 366 accepted when giving evidence in person that she had been confused about the dates of her stay in the home. However, it is the case that MH 9 was the matron when HIA 366 was resident in the home.[137]

110 The ICM told us that there are no records of complaint from children or others about MH 9, nor any record of her being subject to disciplinary proceedings. They gave examples of positive references about MH 9's relationships with children in reports from social workers, and referred to the observation of SWAG inspectors that she was quite protective of the children.[138]

111 HIA 366 also told us that MH 19, who was the Rector of the nearby Christ Church, inspected the appearance of the children before they went across to the Sunday service, and that on one occasion he "clipped" her around the ear because she was wearing the wrong colour of socks for attending church. She said she saw MH 19 hit a male resident (MH 12) in a similar manner because he was wearing the wrong trousers.[139] Rev Coulter, who attended Christ Church as a child and was in his teens when MH 19 came as Rector to the church, spoke on behalf of MH 19, who is now deceased. He said MH 19 was a serious man and he could understand how he could have appeared austere to a child but that he could not imagine him "clipping" a child on the ear.[140]

112 MH 26, the mother of four children in the home, MH 23, MH 24, MH 25 and MH 27, complained to the SHSSB in December 1978 that her children were being "victimised" in Manor House, and that a child had tried to drown MH 25 in the bath.[141] Her complaint was referred to MH 9 who investigated it and reported back to the SHSSB that when she talked in an informal manner to the children involved in the incident MH

137 MNH 078.
138 MNH 134.
139 Day 175, p.18.
140 Day 175, p.64.
141 MNH 343.

25 talked about the fun they had "ducking" each other during bath time. MH 26 was satisfied with this explanation.

113 In August 1980, MH 26 complained that her son MH 23 had been hit with a stick by a member of staff, MH 28, which had left marks on his legs. She also complained that MH 23 had told her that staff pulled his hair and that both her sons MH 23 and MH 24 told her they were beaten if they refused to eat food they did not like. MH 26 stated that the boys had pleaded with her not to report these matters as they were scared that "staff would retaliate on them when MH 9 would be away from the home."[142]

114 MH 73, Assistant Principal Social Worker, investigated this complaint and found that MH 28 had hit MH 23 with one of the sticks he and other boys had brought in from outside and were "skinning" i.e. peeling off the bark, in the kitchen of the home. MH 73 spoke to MH 9, MH 28 and MH 23's brother MH 24, who observed the incident. MH 24 told MH 73 that MH 23 and he had been "cheeky" to MH 28 and unwilling to tidy up the mess they had created in the kitchen, and when MH 23 then rang the fire bell MH 28 had hit him twice with one of the sticks the boys had brought into the kitchen. MH 73 arranged to have MH 23 medically examined and the doctor found a faint bruise on his thigh.[143]

115 MH 73 recorded in the note of his investigation:

> "After some further discussion regarding disciplinary procedures within the Home, I satisfied myself that a stick is not the usual form of disciplining and that any severe disciplining which has to be undertaken has to be done by [MH 9] with a member of staff present".[144]

He also recorded that MH 9 and he had agreed this was an isolated incident that did not merit dismissal, but that MH 9 "would certainly be informing her management committee".[145] We have no evidence of whether this referral was made but when giving evidence to the Hughes Inquiry MH 73 said there were occasions that MH 9 would mention staff performance to the Management Committee.[146] MH 73 met MH 26 and reassured her that it had been emphasised to staff in Manor House that MH 9 was responsible for disciplining children. There is no record of a

142 MNH 350.
143 MNH 346.
144 MNH 346.
145 MNH 347.
146 MNH 10145.

response to the complaints that MH 23's hair was pulled by staff, or that the brothers were being forced to eat food. However, MH 73 concluded in his report of his investigation that he was quite satisfied that "the children are in the best possible place for care at this moment in time".[147]

116 This informal approach to a member of staff striking a child with a stick suggests a lack of formal disciplinary processes. We are of the view that by 1980 such processes should have been in place in the home and should have been used to deal with this incident. We are also of the view that as an Assistant Principal Social Worker, MH 73 should have expected the use of formal disciplinary processes in a home in which the SHSSB was placing children. We consider that this informal means of dealing with a member of staff who hit a child with a stick amounts to systemic failing by Manor House to ensure the home provided proper care.

117 During the SWAG inspection of the home in 1981, MH 9 told inspectors that a reprimand or withdrawal of privileges was the usual means of punishment and that children had to contribute to the cost of putting right any damage to property.[148] From their observations of the interactions between staff and children the inspectors concluded that:

> "The staff influence is such in the best sense that organisational controls are seldom required."[149]

However, they noted that a recorded corporal punishment was the application of "three smacks with an open hand on [the] 'tail end'" and reminded the home of the requirement to strictly observe the stipulations about the administration of corporal punishment laid down in the Voluntary Home Regulations.

118 We consider that a warm, firm, but not harsh regime operated in the home and that it was underpinned by an established culture in which the children were clear about how they were expected to behave and about the authority of staff. It is evident that, particularly in the early days, misbehaviour would not have been tolerated. Corporal punishment was permissible, and it was used but it is clear that complaints about excessive punishment were taken seriously and investigated by the Management Committee. We heard evidence about physical punishment which was excessive and not administered in accordance with the statutory regulations governing the use of corporal punishment in children's homes. However, given the level of evidence and the particular, rather than general, nature of the allegations we do not consider that there was systemic physical abuse of children in Manor House.

147 MNH 348.
148 MNH 10027.
149 MNH 10210.

Sexual Abuse

119 HIA 366 told us that MH 9 took her to her bedroom and sexually abused her and made her masturbate her. This is the only allegation we have received about sexual abuse by MH 9 or any other member of Manor House staff. We do not consider that there is evidence of systemic sexual abuse of children by staff in Manor House.

120 Four of the six witnesses we heard from told us they were sexually abused in Manor House by adult visitors to the home. We also learnt through police material of another resident being sexually abused by a visitor to the home and of a resident being abused outside the home by a man who then came to the home to see him.

121 HIA 341 who was in the home in the 1940s told us that a minister, whose name he could not remember, dressed him in girl's clothing and sat him on his knee. He said that although there was no skin to skin contact he could feel the minister's erection through the silk fabric of the clothing.[150] HIA 341 said he was brought to see the minister by an older boy, MH 2 and that the abuse would happen quite often. When HIA 341 gave evidence in person he said that he also felt through the clothing what he thought was the Minister's finger in his anus.[151]

122 The ICM pointed out that this was the first time that HIA 341 had made claims of this sort about his time in Manor House and that he did not name the minister he said had assaulted him. HIA 341 explained that it was only as an adult that he recalled these events. There is no record of HIA 341 complaining to staff at the time, and we would accept that staff would have regarded a minister as a trustworthy and safe person to have access to children. Therefore, we do not find any systemic failing by the staff of Manor House in relation to this allegation.

150 MNH 023.
151 Day 45, p.10.

123 HIA 365 and HIA 290 are twin brothers, who were in the home in the 1960s. They told us that they were sexually abused in the home by a male visitor who came from the local Army barracks. They gave similar descriptions of the man and described him grooming and sexually abusing them. HIA 365 described how the visitor would sit him on his knee in a darkened television room, put his coat around him and then take his hand and make him masturbate him. He said the man would also abuse him in an upstairs bedroom and would use sweets and gifts such as a mouth organ as bribes. He said that he saw his brother HIA 290 sitting on the man's knee and that he believed other children in the home may have been abused in the same way.[152]

124 HIA 290 described a man sexually abusing him in a similar manner and he remembered the man wearing a trench coat in the television room to hide what he was doing.[153] He recalled the man bribing him with sweets and the promise of a pen knife and telling him not to tell anyone about what he was doing or he would not visit again. He also said that he was aware of other children in the home being abused in a similar manner by the man.

125 It is clear from the accounts given by HIA 365 and HIA 290 that this man effectively manipulated them to ensure their silence and compliance. HIA 290 explained that, although he felt he could talk to the staff at the home about problems, he had been brought up by his father, whose attitude was that children should be seen and not heard, so he did not feel able to report the man's behaviour to staff.[154]

126 HIA 289 was in the home at the same time as HIA 365 and HIA 290 and also described a man abusing him in a similar manner. He said he thought the children called the man "Uncle Bob".[155] He also referred in his statement to an "Uncle Tom" visiting but said that he did not abuse him and he was not aware of rumours amongst the children about him.[156] As HIA 289 was unable to give evidence in person the identity of the man that abused him could not be pursued further with him.

127 HIA 289 described the man fondling him and making him masturbate him in a darkened television room. He described trying to pull his hand away but the man being insistent and using his hand to keep HIA 289's hand

152 MNH 008.
153 Day 174, p.27.
154 Day 174, p.30.
155 MNH 086.
156 MNH 087.

on his penis. HIA 289 said he saw other boys being abused in the same way and described the children's awareness of the abuse:

> "The other children knew what was happening. They would just stare ahead at the television. All the children would dread this man calling their name and asking them to come out and sit on his knee. They would even push and shove each other on the bench so that they would be towards the end of it and he might not pick them. Sometimes, if you had been on his knee, the other children would ask if he had touched you. You might have answered 'yes' or 'no' but no-one would say much more than that. It was never talked about generally. He never bothered with the girls."[157]

128 HIA 289 described the same man playing football and chases with boys from the home in the field at the back of the house, and using the physical contact in such games to fondle their genitals and rub his unshaven face across their cheeks.

129 HIA 365 said in his statement that he believed staff knew about the abuse and indicated they were friendly with the man. At the hearing he described staff sitting in the television room while the man abused children. HIA 290 said that although staff may have been in the television room they would not have necessarily known what was happening as the man always put the light off in the room. HIA 289 said he remembered one child informing the staff of this man's behaviour but he thought the child was just told they were wicked for "making up such stories".[158]

130 In its written statement the ICM explained that no "Uncle" system operated in the home, and that the only record it could find of a soldier visiting the home was a reference in the minutes of the Management Committee meeting held on 20 March 1967 to visits from MH 49, who had been a resident in the home in 1953. The minute recorded that MH 49 was based in Singapore, had been in correspondence with the home since 1962, and that "[MH 49] had visited the Manor House when in Ireland on leave".[159] This reference to MH 49's communications with, and visits to, the home was recorded in 1967 at which time HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 289 were resident in the home.

157 MNH 087.
158 MNH 087.
159 MNH 087.

131 The ICM found no other references to MH 49 in minutes or other documentation. Reverend Coulter confirmed when he gave evidence in person that the ICM did not have documentation in relation to MH 49's time as a resident in the home.

132 Coincidently MH 49 contacted the headquarters of the ICM after the public hearings in relation to Manor House had finished. The ICM directed MH 49 to the Inquiry and he co-operated with our investigations and provided a statement about his very limited contact as an adult with Manor House. We were satisfied on the basis of the detailed statement provided by MH 49 that he was not the person who abused children in Manor House.

133 The ICM explained in its written statement that there was controlled access to the home, children were not allowed to answer the door and any visitors had to be approved by the matron or a member of the Management Committee. It also explained that the policy of supervision within the home was that staff should be seen around and be with the children as duties permitted and that whilst these arrangements were enough to regularly safeguard children most of the time, they were:

> "...unfortunately not enough to prevent an opportunistic, determined and devious abuser in this case."[160]

134 ICM also stated that if a member of staff had responded to a report from a child about this man's behaviour in the way recalled by HIA 289, that would have been totally contrary to the expectations and actions of the Management Committee in relation to the management of sexual abuse at that time.[161]

135 We accept ICM's account of the efforts the Management Committee and staff made to keep children safe. We noted a number of references in the minutes of Management Committee meetings to requests for visits to the home and proposed outings being refused because the members did not think they would be appropriate for the children. Also, as commented on in the SWAG inspection report as late as 1981, parents visiting their children were confined to meeting them in the front hall of the home.

136 We recognise that watching television in a darkened room would have been common practice in the late 1960s and we would not expect staff to have seen such behaviour as suspicious. However, we consider that the behaviour of the man in question in the television room as described by the witnesses should have raised questions about why he had nine-year-old boys on his lap, and the discomfort amongst the children described by HIA 289 should have been noticed. Also the special interest he took in some boys, such as buying HIA 365 a mouth organ and being upstairs with him, should have raised some suspicions. We noted that in 1966 the Management Committee dealt with a case of peer sexual abuse and instructed MH 3 "to keep a strict watch" on the boy, to which MH 3 responded that it was already being done.[162] So the matron and some of the staff were aware of the potential of sexual abuse of children at the time HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 289 were being abused in the home. Given that context we consider the behaviour of the man and the children's reactions to him should have been noticed. Therefore, in relation to these cases of sexual abuse we consider that there was a systemic failing on the part of the staff of the home to take proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

160 MNH 053.
161 MNH 095.

137 We received files from the police about the investigation of another case of alleged sexual abuse of a child resident in Manor House in the 1970s. In 2000 police investigated allegations of abuse at Macedon children's home and identified MH 20 as an alleged abuser. Police found that MH 20[163] had been a serving soldier and had become a voluntary helper at Manor House prior to his discharge from the regular Army. He subsequently volunteered with Barnardo's.

138 The police carried out further inquiries to try to identify other children who might have been abused by this man and interviewed MH 41, whose sister had been fostered by MH 20 and his wife. MH 41 told police that he had been sexually abused by MH 20 at Manor House over a period of five or six years. He told police that the abuse, which included masturbation and oral sex, took place in a bedroom, greenhouse and football pitch in the home and also happened when he spent weekends at MH 20's home. He said the abuse started when he was 10 years of age, and when he was approximately 14 years of age MH 20 involved his wife MH 21 in the abuse and that all three of them engaged in sexual intercourse together. MH 41 explained that the frequency of the abuse reduced when he reached his mid-teens and began to see less of MH 20 and MH 21. He said he never felt able to tell anyone about the abuse.[164]

162 MNH 104.
163 MH 20 is referred to as BAR 4 in the chapter dealing with Barnardo's homes.
164 MNH 6379–6381.

139 MH 20 was interviewed by police on 12 December 2002.[165] He told them that he came to Northern Ireland in 1969 as a soldier and in 1977 he joined the UDR. He explained that his first contact with Manor House was when his Army regiment organised trips for the children and gave them gifts.[166] When he was living in Northern Ireland after being medically discharged from the Army he went back to visit Manor House, spent time with the children in the home, and took them on day trips and to his home.[167] MH 20 admitted he had feelings for MH 41 and that they had sexual relations in Manor House and at his home. He said that he had not forced MH 41 to do anything against his will, and indicated that he did not accept all that MH 41 alleged happened.[168]

140 MH 21 was interviewed and said she remembered MH 41 being in her home and, although she was not certain, there was a possibility she had sex with him since she did have sex with adolescents because her husband wanted her to do so.[169]

141 On 22 December 2004 the DPP directed no prosecution of MH 20 and MH 21 because there was no reasonable prospect of a conviction based on the available evidence.[170]

142 It is clear that MH 20 was viewed by staff at Manor House as a person who could be trusted, and that he was therefore allowed considerable access to the children, including taking them out on trips and taking children to his home. The HSCB provided extracts from social work records which show that during a visit to Manor House, MH 41's social worker, who was employed by the EHSSB, learnt about plans for him to stay with MH 20 and MH 21 from 27-30 December 1975 with another boy from the home.[171] The social worker recorded:

> "MH 9 confirmed this and was reassuring about the couple's interest in the children as they have been regular visitors over a number of years."

143 The HSCB commented that this extract shows that MH 9 made arrangements for a child to spend a weekend out with a family without securing prior consent from the child's social worker. However, it also

165 MNH 6401.
166 MNH 6408.
167 MNH 6408.
168 MNH 6419–MNH 6420.
169 MNH 6502.
170 MNH 6334.
171 MNH 15016.

accepted that it shows that the social worker took MH 9's personal view of the couple to be sufficient information as to their suitability.[172] The HSCB pointed out that the social worker's response was not in keeping with the approach Mr Bunting told the Inquiry he took in July 1972 when he informed voluntary children's homes and EHSSB staff that couples who wished to befriend children resident in voluntary homes had to be approved by the Welfare Department prior to the children going out with them, even for a day.[173]

144 The HSCB also pointed out that subsequent to MH 41 being allowed to stay with MH 20 and MH 21 the couple successfully completed a rigorous assessment process to become foster parents, and that there was clearly no identification of any "mal intent" towards children on their part at that time. They submitted that it was likely, therefore, that any assessment of the couple's suitability to befriend MH 41 would, in all likelihood, have resulted in approval of the arrangements.[174]

145 From MH 41's account, MH 20 clearly groomed him and secured his compliance in sexual activity. It may have been that more questioning of MH 41 about the time he spent with MH 20, particularly at the start of the sexual abuse, might have identified what was happening. However, it is clear that MH 20 acted in a covert and manipulative manner, and, as the HSCB pointed out, suspicions were not raised about him during an extensive assessment process to be approved as a foster parent. Therefore, we do not consider that staff in Manor House should be criticised for not identifying the risk that a plausible man, who was introduced to them through the Army and was a member of the UDR, could present to children.

146 Another known incident of sexual abuse related to the indecent assault of a child MH 23 who was resident in Manor House. This assault was committed in May 1982 by David Jarvis. At that time Mr Jarvis was on bail in relation to a similar assault against a male child who was resident in Barnardo's, which he was subsequently convicted of in December 1982.

147 MH 23 was at a camp with the Boys Christian Missionary Society in Portrush in the summer of 1981. During that holiday he attended a stock car race and met Mr Jarvis who allowed him to use his camera. About a year later MH 23 was leaving a youth club in Lisburn and met Mr Jarvis

172 MNH 15017.
173 RUB 5569.
174 MNH 15020.

again. He agreed to go to Mr Jarvis's house, where Mr Jarvis sexually abused him. Around a month after this, on 18 June 1982, Mr Jarvis came to the outside of Manor House and tried to persuade MH 23 to go to his home, and he said he would pay him for sexual favours. MH 23 refused to go with him and went back into the home.

148 Mr Jarvis left but returned a short time later and MH 23 became upset and told members of staff that he did not want to see Mr Jarvis. A member of staff MH 34 told a colleague to take down a description of Mr Jarvis's car and its registration number and then went out and told him to leave, which he did. MH 23 then told staff about his previous encounters with Mr Jarvis.[175] The police were subsequently contacted and MH 23 and the relevant members of staff were interviewed. Mr Jarvis was identified by the police and convicted on 18 March 1983 of indecent assault of MH 23. We consider that the staff in Manor House acted promptly to protect MH 23, and that MH 34's quick thinking was commendable and assisted the police in apprehending Mr Jarvis.

149 On 4 February 1985 Mrs Brown of the Child Care Branch of the DHSS wrote to Chief Superintendent Pollock of the RUC to express concern that although staff in Manor House and Barnardo's had each co-operated with relevant police investigations they had not been informed about the outcomes of the investigations and the subsequent convictions. Mrs Brown explained that the Department was anxious to ensure that in future any home involved in this way would be informed about the outcome of police investigations.[176] On 5 April 1985 the RUC confirmed that arrangements had been put in place to ensure that would happen.[177] We consider it appropriate and helpful that the DHSS followed up this matter in this way.

Peer Sexual Abuse

150 Although only one witness told us about being abused by a peer in Manor House we learnt from police material that peer sexual abuse was a significant problem in the home in the 1970 and 1980s. The witness who told us about peer sexual abuse was HIA 289 who was in the home from 1965 to 1968. He told us that he was sexually abused by an older resident called MH 18, who would go into a rage if HIA 289 resisted him administering oral sex.[178]

175 MNH 6277/8.
176 MNH 6239-6240.
177 MNH 6230.
178 MNH 087.

151 HIA 289 said this sexual abuse happened in the fields behind the home and that although he remembered staff supervising the playground they did not supervise all periods of play time.[179] The ICM told us that they had no record of complaints about MH 18's behaviour, and that if HIA 289 had reported the abuse it would have been dealt with promptly. They provided documentation to support this view, which detailed how the Management Committee dealt with a case of peer sexual abuse that was referred to them in 1966, which was during the time that HIA 289 was resident in the home.[180]

152 Peer sexual abuse in the home between 1975 and 1980 came to the attention of the police in June 1985, the year after the home closed.[181] On Thursday 20 June 1985, a former resident of Manor House, MH 31, then aged 17, broke into the home of another former resident MH 12 and assaulted him with a poker. MH 12 overpowered MH 31, who then went on to spend the night in MH 12's home. MH 12 was concerned about MH 31 and the next morning, Friday 21 June 1985, he asked his own social worker Helen Taylor to visit to speak to MH 31. Helen Taylor visited and after speaking to MH 31 about what was concerning him brought him to see his own social worker Alan Morrison. [182]

153 MH 31 told Mr Morrison that MH 12 had sexually abused him in Manor House and that he had broken into MH 12's home on two occasions and attacked him on the second of these occasions because he was so distressed about the abuse. He further said that on the previous night when he had stayed in MH 12's home they had shared a single bed and MH 12 had sexually molested him twice during the night.[183] Alan Morrison agreed with MH 31 that they would go to the police on the following Monday, 24 June 1985, so that MH 31 could admit to the burglaries and assault and explain why he had committed the offences.

154 On Saturday 22 June 1985, MH12 visited his grandmother and told her and his brother who was also visiting about MH 31 breaking into his house and attacking him. He told them that he did not want to involve the police. As MH 12 was leaving his grandmother's house he collapsed and was admitted to hospital where he remained in a critical condition for a

179 MNH 087.
180 MNH 095.
181 MNH 6001-6182.
182 MNH 6027-6028.
183 MNH 6028.

number of days. His father was told about the burglary and the attack and he reported them to the police.

155 MH 31 was interviewed by the police on Sunday 23 June 1985; he admitted the crimes but explained that they were acts of revenge because MH 12 had repeatedly sexually assaulted him when they were both residents in Manor House between 1975 and 1980. The police subsequently interviewed MH 12 who admitted to sexual activity with MH 31 when they were in Manor House and on two occasions in his flat. He also explained that when he was a child in Manor House, just before he started primary school, older boys initiated sexual activity with him and although he did not want to take part they persisted and he did what they wanted.[184] He named other male residents of Manor House that he had sexual relations with during the eleven years he spent in the home.[185] He explained that he moved from Manor House to Kincora, and it was when he was abused in that hostel by a member of staff, William McGrath, that he began to realise his behaviour in Manor House was wrong. As a result of the statements of both men, and the possibility that the allegations might impinge on the Kincora Inquiry, the police decided to undertake a full investigation.[186]

156 The police traced and interviewed five other males who were former residents of Manor House during the period 1975 to 1980, MH 33, MH 24, MH 23, MH 39 and MH 32. Allegations were made about another former resident MH 30 but the police were not able to trace him.

157 From these interviews the police determined that the claims of sexual misbehaviour at the home between residents were substantiated, that the sexual activity had initially taken the form of experimentation but on some occasions progressed as far as buggery. During the interviews the former residents described consensual behaviour but also in some instances coercive behaviour. They all confirmed that they had not told staff in the home about the sexual activity. The police concluded from their interviews:

> "There is evidence to suggest that it began at a very early age, perhaps as young as 5 years and new boys would be introduced to sexual acts almost upon their arrival at the Home."[187]

184 MHN 6081.
185 MHN 6081.
186 MNH 6031-6043.
187 MNH 6010.

158 This conclusion is supported by disclosures MH 23 made to social workers on 31 July 1985 about his time in Manor House. MH 23 described older male residents in Manor House threatening him to make him engage in sexual activity and explained that he had not told anyone about it because he was afraid of being beaten up.[188] MH 23 was admitted to Manor House when he was approximately four years old and he disclosed that the peer abuse commenced when he was five to six years old.[189]

159 The police decided that four of the five former residents they interviewed would be weak and/or uncooperative witnesses. However, given the admissions by MH 12 and MH 33 and the evidence given against them, particularly that of MH 31, the police decided to arrest them on suspicion of committing an indecent assault on MH 31 by virtue of Section 2 of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967.[190]

160 The matter was referred to the DPP who directed that no-one should be prosecuted in respect of what had happened in Manor House or in respect of the aggravated burglary, due to the lapse of time, the interconnection between the aggravated burglary and the allegations of abuse and the reluctance of anyone involved to pursue the allegations.[191]

161 In February 2013, MH 31 contacted police to report the abuse he suffered in Manor House from 1975 to 1980. Police tried unsuccessfully to speak to him and then discovered in June 2013 that he, sadly, had taken his own life in March of that year.[192]

162 It is clear from the police investigations that during the period 1975 to 1980 there was sustained peer abuse in Manor House and from 1975 to 1977 there were at least eight boys involved in this abuse. While the three main instigators were in their teens, one of the boys they abused was six years old and another was seven years old. The activity is described as regular and the evidence suggests that on at least one occasion four boys engaged in oral sex together. This indicated to us that the level of supervision of the children particularly at night time was inadequate. Given this level of activity and the fact that at that time it involved at least over a third of the children resident in the home we consider that there was a systemic failure by the staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose peer sexual abuse in the home.

188 MHN 375.
189 MNH 375.
190 MNH 6022.
191 MNH 6020.
192 MNH 6183.

163 Another case of peer sexual abuse came to the attention of staff in Manor House on 14 September 1982[193] when a child in the home MH 38 told a member of staff MH 28 about behaviour between her brother MH 39 and another resident MH 25 which was sexual in nature. She said she saw the children in a room with their underwear down and heard MH 25 say "stop it [MH 39] its sore".[194] This conversation happened on a Saturday morning. In the absence of the matron MH 9 who was on holiday, MH 28 and her colleagues decided to do nothing further until they could contact MH 39's social worker on the following Monday.

164 MH 39's social worker, MH 57, was informed on Monday morning and came to see MH 39 in the home that morning, but he refused to stay in the meeting with her even before she could raise the matter with him. MH 28 interviewed MH 25 on Monday afternoon, who told her that the incident as described by MH 38 had happened, and that MH 39 had forced her to be involved, she had told him to stop, and had tried to push him off. She said that MH 39 had made a previous attempt to have intercourse with her about a year before, and had behaved in a similar way with another female resident. We have seen no evidence that the allegation that MH 39 behaved in a similar manner with another girl in the home was investigated further by Manor House or that her social worker and/or the police were informed about it. We consider that this allegation should have been investigated further and that the failure to do so was a systemic failing by Manor House staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

165 MH 28 left a telephone message for MH 25's social worker asking her to contact her and when she had not heard back from her by 9.45pm that evening she contacted the social worker's senior, Mr Forbes. Dr McCann, the Chairman of the Management Committee, and Mr Johnston, the Honorary Secretary were also told on the Monday evening about the incident. Dr McCann expressed his concern to staff that MH 25 had not been medically examined. MH 39 was interviewed by his social worker the next day and admitted to the behaviour and was subsequently interviewed by police. MH 25 was also interviewed by police and medically examined by a police doctor who found that her hymen was stretched but still intact. Mr Forbes pressed for MH 39 to be removed from the home and said that if that did not happen he would remove MH 25 and her sister MH 27 from the home. It was agreed that MH 39 would be removed but only after he had completed a planned interview and tests for admission to the Army that were taking place on the Thursday of that week. MH 28 recorded that MH 57, MH 39's social worker, felt that the Army should not be told about the incident until such times when it would be necessary, and that "We assured MH 39 about this and he seemed happier."[195]

193 MNH 390–394.
194 MNH 390.

166 We have received no information about the nature of the police investigations or its conclusions, but when MH 39 was interviewed by police in 1985 about allegations of peer sexual abuse in Manor House[196] there was no reference in the record of that interview to any previous police action in relation to his time in the home. We therefore conclude that no formal action was taken beyond the police interviewing MH 39 and his removal from the home.

167 Mr Forbes' manager, MH 73, Assistant Principal Social Worker, SHSSB, recorded his concerns about how Manor House staff had handled the matter and put on record that on MH 9's return from holiday he intended to raise with her why there was a delay in informing his department about the matter, why MH 39's social worker was informed before MH 25's and "the attitude that the boy would appear to have been the injured party and that we might be spoiling his chance to gain admission to the Army."[197] We have seen no documentation about whether these matters were raised with MH 9 and if so what her response was.

168 The SHSSB informed the DHSS about matters relating to MH 26's family because of the potential of MH 26 going public with her complaints about the care her children were receiving. Chris Walker of the DHSS visited the home on 22 September 1982 and met with MH 9 who gave him a summary of the events in relation to MH 39 and MH 25 and how they were managed. Mr Walker produced a note of this meeting[198] but there is no record of any further involvement by the DHSS.

169 When MH 28 spoke to MH 25 about the incident with MH 39 she asked if he had behaved in a similar way with MH 25's sister, MH 27. MH 25 said he had not but that his brother MH 72 had behaved in a similar manner with MH 27 two years previously. We have received no evidence to suggest that this allegation was investigated further by Manor House staff at that time.

195 MNH 10122.
196 MNH 6043.
197 MNH 396.
198 MNH 2551-2552.

170 However, three years later, when MH 27 was in another children's home she told staff she had been raped in Manor House. At that time she was referred to a child psychiatrist who concluded from the detail MH 27 provided that a sexual incident with MH 72 had occurred[199] and "action was taken at the time".[200] If the psychiatrist was correct that action was taken at the time the incident occurred, this may explain why Manor House staff did not record any reaction to MH 25's disclosure about MH 27 and MH 72 as the information was not new to them.

171 The SHSSB referred another alleged incident of peer sexual activity in Manor House to the police in August 1985 following MH 23's disclosure to social workers that while he was resident in Manor House he had sexual intercourse with his sister MH 25 who was also a resident in the home.[201] MH 23 told the social workers that he had sex with MH 25 "lots of times" in different places in Manor House including his bedroom, behind the house and in the yard. He said that a member of staff MH 34 had caught them acting in this way. He also said that he had sexual intercourse once with a female resident in Manor House MH 36 and more than once with another female resident, MH 38. The social workers also interviewed MH 25 and she confirmed that she had engaged in sexual activity with MH 23 in Manor House but stated that it only happened twice and that staff had only caught them on the first occasion.

172 In her record of the interview with MH 25, the social worker Miss Logan recorded reminding MH 25 of an incident in 1982 when staff at Manor House found MH 23 and her together in his room and their admission to "tickling each other". MH 25 agreed that had happened but stated that they had not had sex on that occasion.[202] The awareness of Manor House staff about the sexual contact between MH 25 and her brother MH 23 was also confirmed when Mr Walker met with MH 9 to discuss the incident between MH 39 and MH 25. At that meeting MH 9 told Mr Walker that MH 25 had been involved in incidents of sexual exploration with her older brother MH 23 and had been warned of the dangers involved, and told how to avoid such incidents in the future. There is no evidence to indicate if extra monitoring and supervision of the siblings were put in place to try to prevent a repeat of this behaviour.

199 MNH 360.
200 MNH 363.
201 MNH 6567.
202 MNH 379.

173 Police interviewed MH 25 in October 1985. She confirmed that her brother MH 23 had sex with her when they were both resident in Manor House. However, police reached the view through questioning her that she was describing sexual touching rather than intercourse. MH 23 was also interviewed by the police and although he said he had sex once with MH 25 in Manor House, the police reached the view from his description of what had occurred that the activity amounted to touching of genitalia rather than full sexual intercourse.

174 The accounts the young people gave to police were inconsistent with the ones they gave to social workers in which they each said more than just touching took place in a bedroom of Manor House. However, on the basis of what the children told them, the police concluded that what occurred amounted to sexual exploration and the DPP directed no prosecution on 9 January 1986.[203] However, the Detective Inspector who submitted the recommendation of no prosecution expressed the view that there was a case for "somewhat more supervision" of MH 23 and MH 25 to try and prevent a reoccurrence of similar type behaviour. He suggested that this view could be relayed to the Department in a letter when the result of the investigation was being forwarded to them for their information.[204] We have no evidence about whether this happened but we noted the inference that as a matter of routine the Department was informed of the outcome of police investigations of this sort. We consider that the EHSSB responded appropriately to these allegations and promptly referred them to the police for investigation.

175 MH 23 was admitted to Manor House in December 1973 when he was three and a half years old and he stayed there for almost ten years. He told social workers and the police that from an early age in Manor House he was initiated into sexual activity and then went on to initiate such activity with other children. His behaviour as described by him and his sister MH 25 went beyond sexual exploration to attempted sexual intercourse. We consider the extent to which MH 23 was sexually active from an early age with girls and boys in Manor House indicates a lack of supervision that amounted to a systemic failing by staff to prevent, detect and disclose abuse in the home.

203 MNH 6553.
204 MNH 6559.

Unacceptable Practices

Treatment of Enuresis

176 As previously referred to, we know from MoHA documentation that in 1953 officials protested to the Chairman of the Management Committee about the home's practice of making children who wet the bed sleep in "an awful little room in the basement".[205] We heard evidence from only one witness about being punished for wetting the bed. HIA 341 described being put in a room where coal was kept which was called the dungeon as a punishment for wetting the bed.[206] HIA 366 also told us that she and her brother were put in a cold, dark, wet cellar in the home as a punishment.[207]

177 HIA 341 said he wet the bed daily and that staff strapped him to his bed and left him lying on wet sheets sometimes for as long as 24 hours and that he was put head first into a cold bath and held down while he was being washed as a punishment for wetting the bed.[208] He said he remembered another boy in the home being treated in a similar manner.[209]

178 HIA 341 also described staff using enemas and a buzzer system to prevent him wetting the bed. We know from the report of the 1981 SWAG inspection of the home that at that time staff woke children at night to go to the toilet to prevent them wetting their beds. Although the SWAG inspectors recommended this practice should cease the Management Committee, guided by the two medical doctors in its membership, justifiably decided that it should continue as the children were generally unaware that they had been taken to the toilet.[210]

179 It would appear that in the 1940s and 1950s there was a harsh response by staff to children who suffered from enuresis, including the segregation of children who wet their beds and making them sleep in unacceptable conditions. We consider that this unacceptable practice amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care. However, we also recognise that even at that time attempts were made by staff to prevent bed-wetting occurring rather than just using punishment of it as a deterrent.

205 MNH 2905.
206 MNH 022.
207 Day 175, p.14.
208 Day 45, p.7.
209 MNH 022.
210 MNH 10079.

180 HIA 341 said that an older boy called MH 2 was involved in helping staff to put him in the "dungeon". This is a reference to the same boy that HIA 341 said brought him to a minister who sexually abused him. HIA 341 indicated that the boy might have been an altar boy. ICM pointed out in its response to HIA 341's statement that the Church of Ireland did not have altar boys. When HIA 341 gave evidence in person he clarified that he thought the boy had some kind of clerical connection.[211]

181 HIA 346 who was in the home in the 1940s described being attached by a rope to a brick to stop him running away and being hit by staff for dropping the brick on his toes. He also said he was tied to his bed at night.[212] We consider such practices to be unacceptable.

182 HIA 366 complained about the children from the home being marched to Christ Church each Sunday morning and "being sneaked round the side of the Church" and made to enter the church through a side door rather than the main entrance.[213] She said she tried to complain to MH 19 who was the Rector of Christ Church about being marched to church but that he ignored her.[214]

183 Rev Courtney explained that seating was reserved for the children from the home and that the door they entered through was the one nearest to the reserved seating. He explained that this arrangement was similar to one used in a church in which he was the rector, where seating was reserved for children from a local residential grammar school. We accepted Rev Coulter's explanation and found it satisfactory. He also indicated that he thought that if MH 19 had heard a complaint of a serious nature from a child he would have responded to it.[215]

184 HIA 289 described being made to go to church and Sunday school and how on one occasion, when he tried to resist attending by holding on to railings, his fingers were prised off the railings and he was dragged into church.[216]

185 The ICM explained in its written responses to HIA 366 and HIA 289's statements that the home was set up with the purpose of providing a stable home in a Christian atmosphere for orphans or children from broken homes to help them to develop spiritually, physically and intellectually to

211 Day 45, p.9.
212 MNH 014.
213 MNH 079.
214 Day 175, p.31.
215 Day 175, p.65.
216 MNH 085.

their full potential.[217] Therefore, the children attending the local church and availing of church activities and organisations for children was a normal and regular part of the way the home met its goals[218] and a key component of its care.[219]

186 HIA 366 told us she was put into a bath with a nineteen-year-old boy; she did not indicate that there was a sexual element to this incident.[220] This is the only allegation of this sort that we heard.

187 We carefully considered the accounts of unacceptable practices within the home. With the exception of the treatment of enuresis we did not discern patterns of behaviour by staff that would indicate systemic abuse.

Emotional Abuse

188 HIA 346 told us that staff threatened him that his mother would not visit if he misbehaved,[221] and HIA 341 told us that staff threatened to send him home to his mother if he did not behave, which he said he found confusing and distressing.[222] HIA 366 said that on occasion when her mother visited the home she was not allowed to see her.[223]

189 HIA 366 also said that she and her brother who was admitted to the home at the same time as her were kept separate.[224] When she gave evidence in person she clarified that she saw her brother at meal times but not at play time. ICM explained in its response to HIA 366's evidence that Manor House did not have a policy of separating siblings and that at times they made up the majority proportion of the residents. It also pointed out that in any case the home was small and it would not have been possible to keep siblings separate.[225]

190 We consider that making threats to children about removing access to their parents was very poor practice. However, we did not consider that the evidence we heard about isolated incidents of this nature amounted to systemic abuse.

217 MNH 10023.
218 MNH 093.
219 MNH 136.
220 MNH 078.
221 MNH 014.
222 MNH 021.
223 MNH 078.
224 MNH 078.
225 MNH 135.

Neglect

191 As we have previously indicated we consider the physical conditions in the home in the 1950s amounted to a systemic failing by the ICM General Committee and the Management Committee to ensure the home provided proper care.

192 HIA 366 remembered the canteen of the home being full of cockroaches[226] and the ICM accepted that there was an infestation of cockroaches in September 1970 but that it was in the basement not the canteen and that the Public Health Services were informed and immediate action was taken to eradicate them.[227]

193 HIA 366 explained that she had been diagnosed with Coeliac disease when she was resident in Lissue and that she was given the wrong type of food in Manor House, which made her unwell.[228] The ICM in its response explained that at the time of HIA 366's admission to the home a letter from Antrim Welfare Authority made clear that they had not yet obtained her medical cards and there are no records to show the home subsequently receiving them. The HSCB accepted in its response to HIA 366's statement that there was some involvement of Country Antrim Welfare Committee at the time of her admission to Manor House, but explained that the level of that involvement could not be assessed as a relevant social work file had not been located. However, it pointed out that as HIA 366 was placed in Manor House on a voluntary basis Antrim Welfare Authority would have relied on information about her health being provided by her parents.

194 We asked HIA 366 if she remembered having a medical examination when she entered the home and she said she did not.[229] We consider it poor practice that relevant information about HIA 366's general health was not pursued by the home and that Antrim Welfare Committee did not persist in getting medical cards and birth certificates for HIA 366 and her brother as they indicated to the home they would.[230]

195 HIA 366's complaint about being given inappropriate food was the only complaint that we received about the food provided in Manor House. We

226 MNH 077.
227 MNH 133.
228 MNH 077.
229 Day 175, p.33.
230 MNH 139.

noted the references to a mother saying in 1953 that her children were complaining that the food in the home was dull and inadequate, and a mother complaining in 1980 that her sons were forced to eat food they did not like. However, we also noted the comment from HIA 289 that the food in the home was probably better than he and his brother had eaten before and that if they wanted more food they could have it.[231]

196 Apart from our finding in relation to the conditions for children in the home in the 1950s we do not consider that the evidence we received indicates that there was neglect in the home that amounted to systemic abuse.

197 The early years of the ICM's funding, management and running of Manor House as a children's home were severely hampered by lack of funds and resulted in unacceptable conditions for children resident in the home. This situation was allowed to continue for many years and it indicates that the Management Committee at the time were incapable of ensuring that proper facilities were provided for the children. It is also the case that the Management Committee received only very limited assistance and support from the General Committee of the ICM although that organisation was ultimately responsible for meeting the conditions of the Trust it entered into with Miss Stannus. However, the new Management Committee, which was appointed in June 1953, succeeded in creating and maintaining better conditions greatly assisted by the funding it received from welfare authorities.

198 It is clear from the documentary evidence we have considered that the Management Committee and the staff showed a keen interest in the care and wellbeing of the children and endeavoured to provide a safe and secure home for them. We noted that even in the periods when the physical aspects of care were unsatisfactory the MoHA recorded that the children appeared happy. Also, although inspectors in 1981 found Manor House to be a somewhat out-dated children's home they were positive about the care the children were receiving and the trusting relationships that were apparent between children and staff.

199 In this chapter we have identified areas of poor practice in Manor House and we have also made the following findings in relation to systemic abuse.

231 MNH 085.

Conclusions and Findings

The ICM

200 We consider the irresponsible approach by the General Committee of the ICM to re-open Manor House as a children's home amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

201 The general state of dilapidation of Manor House in 1953, the inadequate sleeping, toilet and washing facilities for the children, the poor heating and the low staffing levels amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Committee to ensure the home provided proper care.

202 The Management Committee's delay in appointing an officer in charge during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and its failure to appoint a monthly visitor amounted to a systemic failing to meet statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

203 The Management Committee's failure in the early 1970s to engage directly with the MoHA to find out more about and address Miss Forrest's criticisms of the home amounted to a systemic failing on its part to ensure the home provided proper care.

204 MH 9's decision with Assistant Principal Social Worker MH 73 in 1980 that an informal approach should be used to deal with a member of staff hitting a child with a stick amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

205 In relation to the sexual abuse of HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 289 by a male visitor to the home there was a systemic failing on the part of the staff to take proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

206 The extent of sexual activity between boys in the home in the period 1975 to 1977 indicates a lack of supervision of children particularly at night time which amounted to a systemic failure by staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose peer sexual abuse in the home.

207 The lack of investigation of the claim by MH 25 that MH 39 had sexually interfered with another girl in the home as well as her amounted to a systemic failing by staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

208 The lack of supervision that allowed MH 23 to be sexually active from an early age with girls and boys in Manor House amounted to a systemic failing by staff to prevent, detect and disclose abuse in the home.

209 The harsh response by staff in the 1940s and 1950s to children who suffered from enuresis, including segregating these children and making them sleep in unacceptable conditions amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

The MoHA and the DHSS

210 The lack of inspection of Manor House for a period of over two and a half years following the initial registration of it as a children's home amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

211 We consider the MoHA's failure to ensure that the Administering Authority met its statutory responsibilities to appoint a person in charge of the home during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and to make arrangements for monthly visiting amounted to a systemic failing to implement statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

212 The low level of formal inspections of the home in the 1960s, and the MoHA's failure to raise Miss Forrest's criticisms of the home in the early 1970s with the Management Committee amounted to a systemic failing by the MoHA to ensure the home was providing proper care.

213 We consider the continuing lack of formal inspections up until 1978 was unacceptable, particularly given the history of the home, and amounted to a systemic failing by the DHSS to ensure the home was providing proper care.

SHSSB

214 Assistant Principal Social Worker MH 73's agreement with MH 9 in 1980 that an informal approach should be used to deal with a member of staff who hit a child in the care of the SHSSB with a stick amounted to a systemic failing by the SHSSB to ensure the home provided proper care.

Chapter 21:

Module 12 – Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd

Introduction

1 As the Chairman explained on 4 November 2015, and again in his opening remarks at the start of this module on 7 March 2016, in this module the Inquiry investigated only those allegations made to it in relation to institutions in Northern Ireland run by the Roman Catholic female religious order The Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd (also known as the Good Shepherd Sisters) by those witnesses who were under the age of eighteen when they were placed in one of these institutions. This was because only children in residential care who were under the age of eighteen are within our Terms of Reference. For convenience in this chapter we refer to the Congregation as the Good Shepherd or the Good Shepherd Sisters.

2 The Inquiry investigated allegations relating to Good Shepherd institutions at three locations in Belfast, Derry and Newry. Because of the small number of applicants to the Inquiry who were in each institution, and because some of them were in more than one of the institutions, we decided to investigate all three in the same module. Module 12 started on Monday 7 March, 2016 and the public hearings extended over seven working days, finishing on Tuesday 15 March, 2016.

3 Although there were a number of references by witnesses to their experiences, or the experiences of others, when working in laundries in the three institutions we have investigated, the Inquiry has not engaged in a wider investigation into what are commonly called Magdalene homes or laundries, or mother and baby homes. Because such institutions contained adults over the age of eighteen, and as our Terms of Reference confine us to examining residential homes or institutions for children under eighteen, the experiences of people in such institutions who were over eighteen are outside our Terms of Reference. Whether their experiences should be investigated is a matter for the Northern Ireland Executive and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

4 During Module 12 we heard from nine applicants, seven in person and two whose written statements were read out because they were unable to attend due to poor health. We also received two statements from individuals who came forward to offer favourable accounts of their time as children when they were looked after by the Good Shepherd Sisters in these three institutions.

5 We heard evidence from five Good Shepherd sisters who served in one or more of the three homes at various times, and from Sr Ethna McDermott on behalf of the Congregation. We received witness statements and substantial quantities of material from the Good Shepherd Sisters, from the HSCB, and a small amount of material from the PSNI. We also received a witness statement from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of the Department of Heath Social Services & Public Safety.

The Good Shepherd Sisters

6 The Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd was formed in June 2014 by the amalgamation of the Order of Our Lady of Charity and the Order of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd founded by Sr Mary Euphrasia Pelletier in 1835 in Angers, France. On 27 June 2014, the Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd canonically reunified with the Congregation of Our Lady of Charity. The two Congregations shared a common origin namely as the Order of Our Lady of Charity, which was founded in Normandy in France in 1641 by the then Father John Eudes, later St John Eudes. The Order had the stated goal of caring for girls and women. The re-unified Congregation has in excess of 4,000 members working in approximately 75 countries.

7 For the sake of completeness we should explain that within the Good Shepherd Sisters there was (and still is) a separate group of sisters who devote themselves solely to prayer and to the contemplative life (Contemplative Sisters). Although in some instances they resided in separate accommodation neighbouring the Apostolic Sisters' site, as in Belfast, to all intents and purposes the Contemplative Sisters were and are entirely separate from their fellow sisters who were and are engaged in apostolic work with the community (Apostolic Sisters).[1] The Inquiry is solely concerned with the work of the Apostolic Sisters.

8 In 1825, Sr Mary Euphrasia Pelletier was appointed superior of the community of the Order in Tours in France. In 1829 she was asked by the Bishop of Angers to set up a home for girls and women in that town. Sr Mary did that in 1829 and the home was called 'Good Shepherd'.[2]

9 Because each Convent within the Order of Our Lady of Charity was autonomous, the structure of the Order did not lend itself to the expansion of Convents/communities of Sisters that followed Sr Mary Euphrasia

1 GSC 1210.
2 GSC 580.

Pelletier's foundation of the first Good Shepherd community in Angers. She therefore sought and was given permission by the Vatican in 1835 to form a new congregation known as the Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd. Convents/communities of Sisters were established to respond to needs and to provide services to women and girls.

10 By the time of Sr Mary Euphrasia Pelletier's death in 1868 she had founded 110 communities across the globe. She was canonised in 1940 as Saint Euphrasia Pelletier. This module was solely concerned with those institutions run by the Order of Charity of the Good Shepherd before the amalgamation. That Order was commonly referred to as the Good Shepherd Sisters.

The Structure of the Congregation

11 The Good Shepherd Sisters are an institute of Pontifical Right directly accountable to the Vatican, with its own Superior General, and a General Chapter that meet every six years. Its Congregation was divided into a series of provinces, each with a Provincial Superior assisted by a Provincial Council.

12 The Superior General and provincial superiors would make regular visits to the various communities. The Superior General would visit each province every six years, and a Provincial Superior would make regular visits to the various communities within her province.

13 A separate Irish Province covered the whole island of Ireland. It contained a number of communities and services operating in Limerick, Dublin, Cork, Waterford and the three communities in Northern Ireland which we consider in this chapter. Each local community had a local leader known as the Mother Superior who was assisted by Council of Sisters from her community.

14 As in the case of other Roman Catholic religious orders investigated by this Inquiry, namely the Sisters of Nazareth, the Sisters of St Louis, the De La Salle Order and the Norbertines, the Good Shepherd Sisters were entirely separate in their management and financial structure from any diocese in which their communities were physically located, although they required the permission of a diocesan bishop to open a house in his diocese.

15 The Good Shepherd Sisters first came to Ireland around 1848. They came to Belfast in May 1867 at the invitation of the then Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor who wrote to the Provincial in Limerick asking the Congregation to send sisters to Belfast to operate a home for women and girls at Bankmore House adjacent to the River Lagan. This had been set up in 1860 by the Sisters of Mercy. They were primarily a teaching order and found they were unable to devote sufficient time to the Bankmore operation.

16 In October 1869 the Good Shepherd Sisters acquired new premises at Ballynafeigh at the top of the Ormeau Road in Belfast. The new premises, which we describe in greater detail later in this chapter, included laundry facilities.[3] The purpose of the laundry was said to provide income for the running of the facilities, and a way of offering work training to those in the care of the Congregation, as even after the introduction of the Welfare State they received little financial assistance, so the majority of admissions were private.[4]

17 In 1919 some sisters from Belfast moved to Londonderry to form a community in the city. A large mansion known as Bellevue House on the Dungiven Road in the Waterside area of the city, together with nineteen acres of land, was acquired following discussions with the then Bishop of Derry.[5] At the time of this purchase, plans were already underway to build a hostel and a laundry on the Dungiven Road site.[6] The Convent and home was opened in early 1921.

18 The Good Shepherd Sisters came to Newry, Co Down in 1944 following the purchase of Moorevale House on the Armagh Road. The building became habitable from 1945 and a new laundry was constructed and opened on the site in 1947.[7]

19 It will become apparent later in this chapter that the Good Shepherd communities in Northern Ireland operated a number of different services and facilities on each of their three sites at different periods, and we will describe these as necessary under the heading of each house in due course. We will describe the allegations made in relation to each of these three locations when we deal with each location. However, there are several themes which are common to each of the three houses, and we will deal with these first.

3 GSC 5013.
4 GSC 5026.
5 GSC 5029.
6 GSC 5030.
7 GSC 453.

The Objectives of the Good Shepherd Sisters

20 Because the Order was semi-enclosed before the changes brought about by the Second Vatican Council, and as such only permitted to undertake work outside the convent if the consent of the local bishop had been obtained, until the time of the Council those sisters who engaged in social work did so within a residential setting.[8]

21 From the arrival of the Good Shepherd Sisters in Ireland in 1848 the primary objective of their institutions was caring for women and children who had fallen into social or financial difficulty.[9] This was achieved in various ways, not all of which involved the provision of residential accommodation. As we shall see when we consider each of the three homes investigated in this module, in Northern Ireland this took a number of forms, not all of which were provided by each community in each location. Some of these are listed below.

- Residential centres for women and girls.
- Mother and baby homes for unmarried mothers.
- Laundries.
- An emergency night shelter for women and girls.
- Residential homes for teenage girls.
- Hostels for teenage girls moving from Good Shepherd care services.
- Youth clubs.

Ages of Girls in Good Shepherd Institutions

22 The references to "women and girls" require some clarification. While the Good Shepherd Sisters have informed the Inquiry that approximately 4,287 women and girls (excluding members of the Order) were cared for in their communities in Northern Ireland between 1922 and 1995,[10] it is clear that the majority were women over eighteen, and as such outside the Inquiry's Terms of Reference. Many of the Order's records and documents simply refer to women of all ages as "girls", and this has to be borne in mind when considering how many females under the age of eighteen (and so within our Terms of Reference) were resident within a particular institution at any given time.

8 GSC 582.
9 GSC 583.
10 GSC 529.

23 Because the surviving records do not always distinguish between females who were over or under eighteen at a given time, it has not always proved possible to establish the exact number of girls who were under eighteen residing in each institution at any one time, or how many of those under eighteen were under school leaving age. However, it does appear that the number of girls under eighteen were a small proportion of the total number of females resident in each institution, although the numbers varied from time to time. The number of girls below school-leaving age (which was fifteen for most of the period with which the Inquiry is primarily concerned) was smaller still, often only four or five in a house at any one time, although again the numbers fluctuated.

24 In this context it is important to bear in mind that the girls in these institutions fell into two groups. During the period when the applicants who engaged with the Inquiry were in these institutions the school-leaving age was fifteen. Girls in these institutions who contacted the Inquiry and were over that age sometimes, though not always, worked in the laundries or in other positions within the Good Shepherd community. Had they not worked in the laundries or other posts they would in the normal way have had to seek employment elsewhere or, in some cases, continue in education.

25 Girls who were under fifteen and had not reached school-leaving age were in a completely different position. Had they not been in a Good Shepherd institution then they would normally have been in a children's home of the type provided by the Sisters of Nazareth or, in some instances, in a children's home in the statutory sector. If placed in a children's home they would have lived in a completely different environment, which should have been completely child-centred. There were Good Shepherd Institutions which were completely child-centred such as the Sacred Heart Home in Belfast, and later the Adolescent Centre in Belfast. One of the issues for the Inquiry in this module is why children under school-leaving age (fifteen years old) were in Good Shepherd institutions which were not completely child-centred.

Siblings

26 The Good Shepherd Sisters emphasised in their written and oral evidence to the Inquiry that they were very aware of the desirability to avoid sisters being separated from each other, and so there were occasions when they accepted a significantly younger child in order that sisters would not be separated.

Changing Names

27 The Good Shepherd Sisters accept that at one stage it was their policy to change the names of women and girls upon their admission to one of their homes. The Sisters advised that the practice fell into abeyance in the early 1960s. They explained that they did not pry into the past of anyone, and no judgement was made as to what they had done before, or why they had ended up with the Order. The reason for changing the person's name was to protect their privacy and provide them with some degree of protection and confidentiality.[11] This practice appears to have applied equally to women over eighteen and to girls under eighteen and we understand may have been a widespread practice in mother and baby homes, although these are outside our terms of Reference. Although well-intended, this practice caused considerable distress and confusion to those affected. We considered that the practice continued longer than it should have done, and represented poor practice on the part of the Sisters.

Laundries

28 For many years, laundries were a very significant aspect of the work of the Good Shepherd Sisters in each of the three locations considered in this chapter. Those laundries generated a reliable source of income to pay the costs of care in the absence of state maintenance payments prior to the development of the Welfare State, or inadequate maintenance payments following the development of the Welfare State.[12] In their heyday these were substantial enterprises, taking in laundry from commercial and domestic customers, as well as dealing with the laundry needs of each community within the Order. For example, during the Second World War the Good Shepherd laundry in Londonderry secured the contract for all the military laundry in Northern Ireland, including that of the Americans at the local naval base.[13] A very large proportion of the females who lived in each community consisted of women over the age of eighteen, some of whom worked in the laundries for many years.

29 As will appear when we consider each location in turn, the Inquiry has sought to establish how many girls under eighteen worked in these laundries, and why.

11 GSC 341.
12 GSC 5809 and 5841.
13 GSC 5032 and 5492.

Corporal Punishment

30 It was a fundamental tenet of the Good Shepherd Sisters that they were never to strike children. While the Congregation accepted in their closing submissions that people do not always adhere to the high standards expected of them, from as early as 1897 it was the written policy of the Congregation that no corporal punishment should be administered by a Good Shepherd Sister against any person in their care, regardless of whether or not that was permitted by the law or statutory regulations in any jurisdiction within which the Congregation was operating.

31 In 1943 the Congregation's instruction manual entitled Practical Rules for the use of the Religious of the Good Shepherd for the Direction of the Classes, (the Practical Rules) emphasised that:

- It was forbidden to strike children.
- Children should never be deprived of food.
- If it was necessary to separate a child from her companions the child should never be shut up alone.[14]

32 The 1943 Practical Rules also emphasised that:

- Children should rarely be fatigued by any form of penance that they were required to undergo.
- Long penances were unprofitable.
- Penances should not be prolonged excessively.
- Penances should not be given too frequently.

33 The Congregation has said with some justification that the Practical Rules of that time could be legitimately described as enlightened and child focused at a time when corporal punishment was lawful, authorised in Northern Ireland by statutory regulations, and very frequently used in schools and families.

Not Turning Anyone Away

34 Sr Ethna McDermott emphasised that it was a fundamental tenet of the Good Shepherd Sisters that they would never turn anyone away who came, or was brought, to them in need of their help. On occasions this meant that they accepted children who were brought to them by social services or the police, even though the Sisters may not have been able to make satisfactory provision for the individual in question, at least in the short term.[15] The Inquiry has been provided with a handwritten note from a departmental file with a list of those in the Good Shepherd Home in Londonderry between 1960 and 1973, which appears to have been prepared by an official in the Ministry of Home Affairs and bears out what Sr Ethna said. The author noted that "Stranded young girls who come to their door, or who are brought by police are accommodated."[16] In 1973 Mr Kirkpatrick of the DHSS noted that:

14 GSC 555.

> "Good Shepherd (as has happened in the past) have a policy whereby they will not refuse people in need no matter what their religion is".[17]

The Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast

35 The Inquiry heard evidence from three applicants in person, and received a statement from a fourth who was ill and unable to attend in person, relating to their time in Belfast. We also received statements from two women who came forward to the Good Shepherd Sisters to describe their happy memories of their time in the care of the sisters in Belfast. As well as the evidence of Sr Ethna McDermott on behalf of the Congregation, we heard from a number of sisters who lived and worked in the Belfast community at various times.

36 Before considering the evidence of all of these witnesses, it is convenient to describe the various facilities on the Belfast site and their history, as some buildings were put to different uses during the period with which the Inquiry was concerned.

37 At various times from 1922 onwards the Good Shepherd Sisters had several different facilities located on a large eight-acre site at the top of the Ormeau Road in South Belfast. This was opposite the large Nazareth House complex of the Sisters of Nazareth located at the junction of the Ormeau and Ravenhill Roads which we have considered in Chapters 8 and 9.

38 At various times within the Good Shepherd complex there were eight different facilities. Some of these changed over the years or were in different buildings. Three of these are not directly relevant to this chapter.

15 Day 194, pp.45, 55 and 56.
16 GSC 5327.
17 GSC 5326.

These are the convent occupied by the Contemplative Sisters, the chapel and the Marianville Mother and Baby Home. Marianville operated between 1950 and 1990.

39 A facility that is relevant, although it was not a residential facility, is the St Mary Euphrasia Youth Club. This was set up by the Good Shepherd Sisters in 1951 and was located beside the Adolescent Centre, and is relevant because it is one of the practical ways the sisters sought to provide for the young people in their care. It is clear from what we have heard that the youth club was a very popular facility where girls from the Good Shepherd and young people from the neighbourhood could meet and socialise on a number of nights each week. The youth club was fondly remembered by many, and such was its popularity that not being allowed to attend it was regarded as a severe punishment.

40 Tragically, like so many organisations and facilities in Northern Ireland it was severely affected by the violence in the 1970s. A seventeen year-old Protestant boy who was a member of the youth club was murdered, presumably because of his association with a Catholic organisation. A history of the Belfast community described the Mass offered for the repose of his soul as "one of the most moving celebrations ever to take place in our chapel".[18]

41 On another occasion a car bomb was left outside the club one night, but fortunately caused little damage, and the club was able to open the following night.

42 In 1974 Michael Brennan, a youth leader in the club, was shot in the club while he was coaching table tennis by a terrorist group calling itself the Protestant Action Force. He died in hospital from his wounds. As a result, the youth club closed for almost a year, but it later reopened. However, by 1980 it had been transferred to a new building nearby and was managed by a committee of the Holy Rosary Parish.[19]

43 The terrible events described above that affected the youth club illustrate the violence from which the Good Shepherd Sisters sought to protect the children and young people in their care in each of their locations, and not just in Belfast, a concern which may have been wrongly interpreted by some of the children and young people as an example of a repressive and confining attitude on the part of the sisters.

18 GSC 5020.
19 GSC 1081 and 1082.

St Mary's

44 St Mary's was located in a large block situated beside the church and the convent. From the opening of the Convent in 1867 the Sisters provided residential accommodation for women and girls. A laundry was opened on the St Mary's site and operated until 1977 providing work for women. Although the great majority of those who lived and worked in St Mary's were over eighteen, it is clear that some teenage children also lived and worked there. The Inquiry heard from three applicants who did so between 1962 and 1966 (HIA 387, HIA 175 and HIA 124). We also received a statement from HIA 377 who was too ill to attend in person.

The Sacred Heart Children's Home

45 The Sacred Heart Children's Home operated between 1922 and 1962 and was located in a large building immediately beside St Mary's. The Sacred Heart provided residential care for children between the ages of two and sixteen, and was registered as a voluntary children's home by the Ministry of Home Affairs under the Children and Young Person's Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 on 29 June 1950.[20]

46 During the 1950s the Sacred Heart Home was registered for 33 girls of all ages.[21] In 1956 the Ministry of Home Affairs divided the certificate for the voluntary children's home into three parts.[22] This recognised that the Sacred Heart was different to St Mary's and to the Marianville Mother and Baby Home, both of which had also been included in the original registration certificate.[23]

47 The Sacred Heart Home was inspected by Miss Kathleen Forrest of the Ministry of Home affairs in 1953, and she described it in favourable terms:

> "Good material conditions. Could perhaps do with more play equipment, but would, I think, buy anything suggested to them. Have singing, elocution, dancing classes and girls go out to ordinary schools and to do shopping for Home. Not short of money I think."[24]

20 GSC 5009.
21 GSC 5005.
22 GSC 5009.
23 GSC 6876-78.
24 HIA 1463.

48 While it was registered to accommodate 33 girls of all ages,[25] in the mid-1950s the annual returns to the Ministry of Home Affairs recorded fewer girls in the Sacred Heart than that,[26] and the numbers gradually declined from 30 girls in 1953 to 23 in 1956, and 24 in 1957.[27] Unfortunately the limited statistics available for this period do not reveal what were the numbers of children under the school-leaving age (which was increased from fourteen to fifteen in 1957), and those who were over the school leaving age but under eighteen.

49 SR 283, who worked in the Sacred Heart Home from 1960 until it closed in 1962, remembered that the home took children between the ages of two and sixteen. She told the Inquiry that the sisters knew the importance of keeping sisters together, and recalled two incidences where this occurred during her time in the home. One girl was about seven or eight and her sister ten. In the other instance the younger sister was maybe thirteen and went to St Monica's Secondary School nearby. She thought her elder sister was perhaps thirteen to fifteen and went to St Dominic's Grammar School, which was in a different part of the city.[28]

The position between 1962 and 1970

50 The Sacred Heart Home closed in 1962, and in due course was replaced by the Adolescent Centre which opened in the same premises in 1970. Between the closure of the Sacred Heart Home and the opening of the Adolescent Centre the sisters told the Inquiry that they believe the older children who were ready to move into independent living arrangements moved out of care. They believe that those who were not ready for such a move, and this would inevitably have included those children who were still under the school-leaving age of fifteen, became the responsibility of the sister in charge of St Mary's. Whilst it is unclear where the younger children slept after the Sacred Heart Home closed, it seems likely that for part of the time at least they were accommodated in the St Mary's building. It had been extensively refurbished over a six-year period between 1957 and 1963, and the dormitories there had been sub-divided into cubicles.[29]

25 GSC 5005.
26 GSC 7052.
27 GSC 7049.
28 Day 193, p.58.
29 GSC 1177.

51 The sisters have described how from 1968 onwards those teenagers who were regarded as being part of the "St Mary's class" lived in the building that had previously been the Sacred Heart Home. That confirms the inference that between 1962 and 1968 those children lived in St Mary's with the older women who lived there. The St Mary's class was regarded as a separate and distinctive group. As there was not a separate kitchen in the Sacred Heart building, those girls were served their food in the St Mary's canteen kitchen and then carried their food along an internal corridor to the dining room or refectory in the Sacred Heart building where they ate their meals together.[30]

Conditions in the early 1960s

52 Two applicants to the Inquiry were in the care of the sisters in Belfast during the period between the closure of the Sacred Heart Home in 1962 and the return of children to that building in 1968 or 1969. They were therefore within the group described by the sisters as being part of the St Mary's class. HIA 387 was thirteen when she arrived in June 1962 and left fifteen months later in September 1963 aged fourteen and a half. She was unique among the applicants in this module in having been in all three of the homes considered by the Inquiry in this chapter, and we will consider her experiences in the homes in Londonderry and Newry later when we consider the evidence relating to those homes.

53 Before she came to the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast, HIA 387 had been in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth in Belfast, and she gave evidence about her time with the Sisters of Nazareth on Day 92 of the Inquiry. Her recollection is that she came straight to the Good Shepherd Sisters from the Sisters of Nazareth across the road in 1962. Whilst the Sisters of Nazareth records show her as leaving their care in July 1961 to return to her family, HIA 387 has no recollection of being at home, or elsewhere, between her time with the Sister's of Nazareth and when she arrived with the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast in June 1962. Be that as it may, she says that when she was with the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast she did not continue to attend St Monica's Secondary School as she had before, and she says she was placed in the laundry to work.

54 As she was under the school-leaving age of fifteen throughout her time in the Good Shepherd Sisters at Belfast she should have been attending school. Returns by the Good Shepherd Sisters to the Ministry of Home Affairs showing the number of children in their care on 31 March 1963 record that there were four girls in the home who were between the ages of five and fourteen,[31] all of whom were of compulsory school age (that is five to fifteen) and were attending school. These figures suggest that as HIA 387 was in the care of the sisters in Belfast at that time it is highly likely that she was attending school. We believe that she is mistaken in her recollection that she did not attend school whilst in the care of the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast.

30 GSC 1178.

55 She described to the Inquiry how she was made to work unpaid in the laundry, although the Good Shepherd Sisters say that no one as young as thirteen would have been allowed to do so. No one else who was in the Good Shepherd Sister's complex in Belfast and who was as young as HIA 387 has come forward to the Inquiry to say that they worked in the laundry there when they were under school-leaving age. HIA 377 came to Good Shepherd School in April 1963, a month after her fifteenth birthday. Because of illness she was unable to give evidence in person, but in her witness statement she described being told to help another girl fold laundry.[32]

56 SR 283, who worked in the Sacred Heart Home from 1960 until it closed in 1962, told the Inquiry that she had no recollection of children who were about twelve to fourteen working in the laundry.

57 Because we are satisfied that HIA 387 attended school during her time in the Good Shepherd in Belfast, as a school girl she could only have worked in the laundry after school hours during term time and before the work in the laundry stopped for the day, also at weekends or in the holidays. There is a possibility that she has conflated her experiences in Belfast with her experiences in the laundry in Londonderry and in Newry, where she also spent some time.

58 She has described an incident she says occurred when she was aged fourteen and in the Good Shepherd in Belfast. She says she climbed over a wall into an orchard in the nun's garden. She was caught there by a priest who took her to the sacristy, told her she was wicked and then raped her. This happened on a Saturday, and the next day being Sunday she refused to go forward to take Holy Communion. When asked by a nun why she would not go forward she explained that she would not eat "anybody's body from soiled hands". When the nun asked her what she meant she told the nun what the priest had done to her, whereupon the nun slapped her and told her she was a little liar. She was then put to work in the worst part of the laundry where all the soiled clothes were. Within a week of telling the nun what had happened she said she was moved to another Good Shepherd Home in the country, where there was a railway track at the back, which she now believes to have been the Good Shepherd in Newry. The Good Shepherd Sisters pointed out that in fact she went from Belfast to their home in Londonderry for eight months between 30 September 1963 and 1 June 1964, and from Londonderry she went to their home in Newry.

31 GSC 5844.
32 GSC 081

59 Although the Good Shepherd Sisters initially told the Inquiry there was no orchard in Belfast, on further investigation it was recalled that the Contemplative Sisters had a small orchard and vegetable garden bounded by a high wall on one side and by high hedges on another. According to a former caretaker, this was accessed through an arched opening in the hedge.[33] A map prepared by the Good Shepherd Sisters for the Inquiry shows this area as being some distance from the chapel where the sacristy was. A possible inference from this layout is that the description of the place where HIA 387 says she climbed over a wall is not easy to reconcile with the layout of the Good Shepherd Sisters' orchard. In addition, as the sacristy was some distance away it is somewhat unlikely that a priest would have been in the Contemplative Sisters' orchard or would have been able to take her to the sacristy unobserved.

60 We have also taken into account that the layout described by HIA 387 much more closely resembles the orchard attached to the presbytery of the former Holy Rosary Church, which adjoined the Sister of Nazareth premises on the opposite side of the Ormeau Road where she had been before.

61 We carefully considered all these matters, and whilst we accept that such an incident may have occurred, we have been unable to determine whether it occurred whilst HIA 387 was in the care of the Good Shepherd Sisters or in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth.

62 There are very few figures available which show the actual number of teenagers who were in the Good Shepherd in Belfast at the same time as HIA 377. In January 1964 out of 123 females, only ten were "welfare cases", ie children placed by local authority welfare departments and who were therefore under the age of eighteen. Of the ten, only four were under fourteen and all were said to be attending school. In March 1965, of 26 girls recorded as living in St Mary's, 23 were between fifteen and eighteen and three were fourteen and under. Whilst we know that in March 1966 there were sixteen welfare authority children in St Mary's and in March 1967 there were thirteen, it is not possible to establish in each year how many were under fifteen, or between fifteen and eighteen. Nor is it possible to establish whether these figures represent the total number of girls in St Mary's who came into either age group in those years, because there may well have been other girls in both age groups who had been placed privately. All that can be said with confidence is that for most of the time when HIA 377 was in the St Mary's class there were several other girls of a broadly similar age there at the same time. This is because we know there were twenty girls in 1965 in the fifteen to eighteen age group, and it is probable that there were girls at the same age in both 1966 and 1967.

33 GSC 1211.

63 HIA 377 was the only other person who was in the Good Shepherd in Belfast during the 1960s who has contacted the Inquiry. She arrived in April 1963 shortly after she passed her fifteenth birthday, and remained there until she left in April 1968 aged eighteen. As such she overlapped with HIA 387 and so would have been one of the teenagers who formed the St Mary's class.

64 HIA 377 was moved to the Good Shepherd in Belfast by Tyrone County Welfare Committee after she ran away from Coneywarren Children's Home outside Omagh, Co Tyrone. She described asking SR 285 and Mrs McFadden (the social worker who brought her to Belfast) how long she would be staying, and was told by them until she was eighteen. SR 285 told her she would not be allowed out, but her brothers could visit her. Her brothers took it in turn to visit her every week and brought her toiletries. They also brought her grandmother to see her. After about eighteen months, her brothers were allowed to take her out for a few hours on Saturdays.

65 While we accept that family visits were facilitated, we are satisfied that at this time the Good Shepherd Sisters discouraged the girls in their care from leaving their premises, and that in the earlier years there was a practice of containment of girls, although as HIA 377's experiences demonstrated, older girls were not prevented from going out if they were accompanied. As we shall see when we consider the Adolescent Centre, the practice appears to have become more relaxed by the early 1970s. However, in 1963 when HIA 377 arrived we accept that a more restrictive attitude prevailed, no doubt because at that time the order was still semi-enclosed, and changes in attitude that flowed from the Second Vatican Council were still to come.

66 HIA 377 complains that the nuns did not care for, or show any interest in, her education, but it has to be remembered that she was past school-leaving age when she arrived in Belfast. As we have already described, there is evidence that shows that at this time the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast ensured that children below school-leaving age attended schools.

67 Although HIA 377 says she suffered from poor health during her time with the Good Shepherd Sisters in Belfast, it would seem from her account that she received medical treatment at Belfast's Mater Hospital.

68 She describes the food as very poor, but hers is the only complaint about the food.

69 The descriptions of the laundry given by both HIA 387 and HIA 377 portray the work as hot, physically demanding and tiring. Both say they were not paid. We accept that was the case at that time. Irrespective of whether they were above or below fifteen, we considered it was unacceptable for such young girls to be expected to do industrial work of this type. We considered this amounted to systemic abuse.

70 HIA 377 describes how she was slapped by the nuns on two or three occasions, and was once slapped hard on the hands with a ruler. However, she describes hitting back on each of these occasions. We accept that such occasions were not widespread, systemic or condoned, and we do not regard them as sufficient to constitute systemic abuse.

71 HIA 377 also describes how on two occasions older women who she thinks lived in the convent made sexual advances to her in the boiler house. Whilst these amounted to sexual abuse by the individuals concerned, they were not reported by HIA 377 to anyone in authority, and as they appear to have been opportunistic and only occurred twice, we do not consider that they can be regarded as amounting to systemic abuse.

Roseville Hostel

72 In 1967 the Good Shepherd Sisters opened Roseville as a hostel to provide transitional living arrangements for those girls starting their first jobs, or who were leaving full-time care and starting to move into independent living. Roseville was located in a separate building on the Carolan Road side of the complex between the Sacred Heart Home on one side and the Marianville building on the other.[34] As the title "hostel" implies, Roseville was designed to cater for those who did not require strict supervision, which would in any event not be practical as many of those were starting their first jobs and went to employment outside the hostel.[35] Residents paid for their bed and board. The hostel had two bedrooms with a sister living in each, and two bedrooms of a larger dormitory type, each with separate individual cubicles for four girls.[36] Roseville closed in 1975.

73 HIA 175 was the only applicant to the Inquiry who had been in the hostel. When she had the opportunity to go through some social services and other records obtained by the Inquiry with Mr Aiken, Junior Counsel to the Inquiry, she accepted that her memory of dates and events was not accurate. She came to live in the hostel in November 1971 aged fifteen and a half, although she continued to work as a residential nursery assistant in St Josephs Baby's Home run by the Sister's of Nazareth across the road. During the succeeding months she did not return to the hostel on a number of occasions. By the end of February 1972 she was working in the laundry and by now was aged fifteen and nine months.

74 She did not like the laundry work, and her social worker, who saw her frequently, tried to arrange alternative accommodation for her in lodgings. HIA 175 did not like the suggested accommodation, so she was allowed to stay on in the hostel. However, a week later she refused to return to the hostel and was removed under a Place of Safety Order to St Joseph's Training School at Middletown, Co. Armagh. The application for a Place of Safety Order was refused and after a month at St Joseph's she was returned to Roseville. It seems that throughout this unsettled period she was very anxious to live at home with her mother, although home conditions were not satisfactory.[37] She did not settle in the hostel and was returned to Middletown under another Place of Safety Order in August 1972, and

34 GSC 379
35 GSC 389.
36 GSC 399.
37 GSC 224.

a Training School Order was made three weeks later committing her to St Josephs' where she was very happy.

75 Having seen the records, she only had two recollections about her time in the Good Shepherd in Belfast which were of concern to the Inquiry. The first was that she recalled being painted all over with a stinging substance by SR 196. When the records were explained to her she accepted that this may have been done because of a medical condition for which she received treatment at the time. The documentation from the records of the Health and Social Care Board[38] refer to her having had a medical condition "for which she attended the doctor". The Sisters did not accept that SR 196 would have engaged in administering or applying any medical treatment to any resident in Roseville. However, HIA 175 believed it was applied by SR 196, but she was anxious to emphasise that, whatever the substance was, it had not been applied for a sexual reason or as a punishment.[39] We are satisfied that there was nothing improper or abusive in this episode.

76 The other matter related to an occasion when she recalled all of the girls of her age being taken one at a time into a room by SR 196 where a priest then asked each of them whether they were a virgin. Such an exploration of the sexual history of HIA 175, or any other girl, by a priest in such circumstances was entirely inappropriate, and we regard such a question in those circumstances as unacceptable and abusive. However, whilst it is clear from her evidence that HIA 175 does not regard the Good Shepherd Sisters as being responsible for the question, or for the way it was asked, HIA 175 stated that SR 196 was present during the questioning. In their response to the Inquiry Warning Letter the Sisters did not accept that such an incident could have happened, or if it did, that they were responsible for it. However we are satisfied there was such an episode and the failure of SR 196 to intervene and stop the questioning was a systemic failing.

The Adolescent Centre

77 In 1969 the building previously containing the Sacred Heart Home was renovated and opened in 1970 as the Adolescent Centre. It operated until June 1982, when it closed because of a fall in the number of admissions.[40]

38 GSC 223.
39 Day 190, pp.34 to 36.
40 GSC 6342.

It was a residential centre with accommodation for up to 21 teenagers in twelve individual rooms, and there were also three small dormitories, each with up to three beds. It was intended to accept children who were twelve to seventeen, although one resident said that the congregation made an exception and kept her nine-year-old sister so they could remain together. GSC 21 was the sister in charge throughout its existence. It was sometimes known as "The Teenage Unit".

78 All the girls in the Adolescent Centre were placed there by social services. Those who were of compulsory school age went out to school, either to St Monica's Secondary School, which was a ten minute walk away, or by bus to St Dominic's Grammar School on the Falls Road. Although no records have survived, one of the sisters who worked there recalls files being kept on the progress of each child, and that regular reviews of each child were held with social services. Regular contact took place with members of their families, contacts which were encouraged and facilitated on a supervisory basis if necessary, where this was recommended and supported by the teenager's social worker.[41]

79 From the mid-1970s a sister was appointed to the Centre to prepare all the meals for the teenagers, although the girls were encouraged to help her with shopping and with the preparation of evening meals, they were also shown how to cook some dishes. All of this was to show them how to budget, select fresh vegetables and cook for themselves when they left care.

80 Those who had homework were sent to do it after school. If they had no homework they could play outside or relax in the sitting room where there was a TV and a record player. Reading of novels was encouraged.[42]

81 HIA 124 was in the Adolescent Centre from 1971 when she was thirteen and nine months until 1974 when she was sixteen and a half. She was placed there by social services. As in the case of HIA 175, Mr Aiken took her through the various records relating to her which had been obtained by the Inquiry. This process helped her to be aware of, and to understand, various matters relating to her time in the Adolescent Centre. She told the Inquiry that she did not have any bad memories of her treatment at the hands of the Good Shepherd Sisters,[43] something that was in marked

41 GSC 404.
42 GSC 397.
43 Day 190, pp.10-11.

contrast to her recollection of her time with the Sisters of Nazareth, which she described when she gave evidence on Day 96.

82 She quickly became very attached to GSC 21. When she made her witness statement she had been critical of the way her enuresis had been dealt with, but she now understood that the sisters saw to it that she received medical help from the specialist and that the sisters dealt with the problem in a more sympathetic way than she had appreciated. She also now understood why the Good Shepherd Sisters did not take her back after she had been admitted to a psychiatric hospital after taking a second overdose. She explained that seeing her records had cleared up a lot for her, and she saw the Good Shepherd Sisters had done a lot for her.[44]

83 The favourable views of their times in the Adolescent Centre to which HIA 175 and HIA 124 came after seeing their records was in keeping with the views expressed in witness statements by GSC 42, who was in the Centre from 1976 to 1980 and GSC 41, who was there for five years from the end of 1973 or the beginning of 1974. Two points stand out from their statements. The first was that GSC 21 insisted that girls from the Adolescent Centre were given money to buy lunch tickets at St Monica's so that they would not stand out from other girls by having free school meals or packed lunches. The other was that the youth club to which we have already referred was the focus of their lives, and if they misbehaved and were not allowed to go to the youth club "it was like the end of the world!"[45]

84 Looking at the Sacred Heart Home, the St Mary's class, the Roseville Hostel and the Adolescent Centre as a whole, it is clear that there was a very considerable change in the way the Good Shepherd Sisters approached residential care for the children in their care by the late 1960s. Not only were there greatly improved material facilities, but the Roseville Hostel and the Adolescent Centre were well run and provided a good standard of child care. These were examples of the Sisters' willingness to be flexible and innovative to respond to changing needs, and we commend them for doing so.

The Good Shepherd in Newry

85 The Inquiry heard evidence in person from two applicants. HIA 387 had previously been in the Good Shepherd in Belfast and we have already

44 Day 190, p.22.
45 GSC 294- 295.

referred to her evidence about her time there. She also spent some time in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry and we shall consider her evidence about that time later. HIA 202 also spent time in Londonderry after she had been in the Good Shepherd in Newry and we shall consider her time in Derry later. The third applicant was HIA 359 who was unable to give evidence in person due to ill health and we received her written statement.

86 Before considering their evidence, we describe the site and the facilities upon it at the Good Shepherd in Newry. The Newry site was the smallest of the three facilities run by the Good Shepherd in Northern Ireland with which we are concerned, and like them contained a number of separate facilities on the same site. There was a small farm of a few acres, a church and a convent for the sisters. A new laundry was built and opened in 1947. There were residential dormitories for women, that is ladies over eighteen, and teenage girls known as St Mary's Newry. Marianvale Mother and Baby Home opened in the 1950s and was co-located on the same site. Marianvale Mother and Baby Home provided accommodation for pregnant women, mothers and their babies.[46]

87 When considering the ages of the children under eighteen, as we have already explained it is necessary to distinguish between those under school-leaving age, and those above school-leaving age but below eighteen, for the reasons we have set out earlier. Originally there were four pre-fabricated buildings, two of which were dormitories, one was a kitchen and the fourth a dining room/refectory.

88 Distinct from St Mary's there was an entirely separate Marianvale Mother and Baby Home which closed in 1984. From 1973 a short-term Emergency Hostel was opened close to Marianvale. The hostel consisted of two bedrooms and shared kitchen, living, bathroom and toilet facilities. The hostel was for mothers and children in domestic violence situations, and the Sisters recall that it was run in conjunction with the local social services.

89 In later years the residential accommodation for the women and teenagers consisted of a dining hall, a recreation room, a room described as a community room, a common room, a kitchen, a TV lounge, bedrooms and dormitories. The convent as a whole was registered as a voluntary children's home on 16 February 1951, but was re-registered on 25 April 1956 to include the Marianvale Mother and Baby Home.

46 GSC 6892 and 6893.

90 Due to the very limited records that have been found it is difficult to establish how many girls under eighteen who are within our Terms of Reference were in St Mary's at any time, and how many of those were under school-leaving age. Prior to completion of the registration process, a letter of 7 September 1950 from the Northern Ireland Council for Social Services said only five or six girls in the fifteen to eighteen group resided in the home, and they were working in the laundry. The recollection of the sisters is that there were usually between three and six teenagers at any time, although the numbers fluctuated. In addition there were older women over eighteen. Whilst the home had accommodation for up to 36 girls of all ages (which included women over eighteen) in the 1950s the total was usually between 20 and 30 (including the teenagers) but the overall numbers declined significantly in later years.[47]

91 Statistical returns to the Ministry of Home Affairs for the four years 1953 to 1956 show one child in 1953, none in 1954, and two in 1956. An inspection by the Ministry of Home Affairs in June 1958 said there were two girls under eighteen, and a letter from the Ministry of 16 December 1959 said that there had been two girls under eighteen the week before.

92 Annual returns for a number of years in the 1960s show a slightly higher number of girls under eighteen in some years.

- 1963 – four (all over fifteen)
- 1964 – four
- 1965 – four
- 1966 – two
- 1967 – three
- 1968 – two

However, apart from 1963, it is not possible to establish if any of the girls were under school-leaving age.

93 The figures for the 1970s are limited to two occasions. An inspection on 22 June 1973 by Miss Hill recorded five girls, all between fifteen and eighteen. On 12 February 1976 Miss Forrest recorded that of 30 females "only five were in the younger age group". Whilst this does not expressly distinguish between those under and those over school-leaving age, it is probable that all five were between the ages of fifteen and eighteen, because Miss Forrest stated that the sisters:

47 GSC 460.

> "...would not normally take in school age girls because of travel difficulties, but have one fifteen year old girl in special circumstances."

The 'special circumstances' were not explained.

94 From the available, albeit limited, information it would therefore seem that in the 1950s there were often only two girls, and in the 1960s there were usually between two and four girls, and in the 1970s there were usually five girls. Although it may well be the case that during these decades all of the girls were above school-leaving age and under the age of eighteen, the absence of detailed information makes it impossible for us to be satisfied that in every instance there were no children under school-leaving age in the Good Shepherd in Newry.

95 In her "Brief Impressions" of the different Voluntary Children's Homes in Northern Ireland, which she prepared on 28 April 1953 and to which reference has already been made in this chapter, Miss Forrest described the Good Shepherd Convent Newry in the following terms:

> "Material conditions and equipment very good. Girls and women work in laundry, have all amusements laid on inside Home. Quite happy atmosphere in both places."

96 In her report on her visit to both the convent (that is the residential home) and the Marianvale Home on 22 June 1973, Miss Hill of the Ministry of Home Affairs described the arrangements for the girls in the residential home in terms which make it clear that some of those in the fifteen to eighteen year range were attending school.

> "Five girls were in the fifteen – eighteen years range, one of whom was in Special Care, while four were the responsibility of Welfare Authorities. One girl attends the Grammar School and another the Technical School in Newry. They are full-time students, but some other girls attend various classes in the Technical School."[48]

97 The three applicants who described their experiences in the Good Shepherd in Newry were there in different decades, HIA 359 being the earliest. She is now 79, and did not give evidence in person due to ill health. In her statement to the Inquiry she described how she came to the Good Shepherd in Newry from their convent in Limerick when she was about fourteen as she had suffered poor health, and she said she was told she was being sent to Newry because the air was fresher and healthier. She recalled being sent to work in a hospital in Clonmel, Co Tipperary when she was seventeen or eighteen.

48 GSC 6893.

98 However the Good Shepherd Sisters records state that she arrived in Newry in January 1955, when she was seventeen and a half, and went to Clonmel in April 1961 when she was 23. The Good Shepherd Sisters point to three other matters which it was suggested indicated that HIA 359 may have confused her recollections of life in Newry with those in Limerick. The first is that although she referred to working in a bakery in Newry, there was no bakery there but there was in the Good Shepherd in Limerick.[49] The second is a recollection that there were "about 80 girls in the Good Shepherd in Newry". The Good Shepherd Sisters say that there were never as many females as that in Newry, but the laundry in Limerick was larger. It is correct that the Ministry of Home Affairs records referred to earlier show much smaller numbers in Newry in the 1950s, such as "36 girls of all ages" in 1953,[50] and "girls of all ages" would include women over eighteen. The third is a reference to Mother Good Shepherd teaching in the classroom, and SR 281 said that Mother Good Shepherd taught in Limerick, never in Newry.[51]

99 HIA 359 described being in a classroom for a while, but as she was over school-leaving age when she arrived in Newry this may be somewhat unlikely. She said the food was poor and she was always hungry. She described working in the laundry from the age of sixteen, being punished for mixing up orders in the packing room, being given a bad beating on the back of her legs by a nun and being slapped on the hands many times.

100 She described working on the small holding attached to the convent and picking potatoes, but that would have been a common practice at the time of the potato harvest in rural families.

101 She said she was paid £2.50 when she left Newry, although it is not clear whether this was money due to her for her work, or perhaps was to cover her journey until she arrived at St Joseph's Hospital in Clonmel.

102 Whilst not all of HIA 359's recollections of the way she was treated during her time in Newry were negative, for example there was an annual trip to the seaside. She also described going to hospital to have her appendix out. There were some complaints that were corroborated to some degree

49 GSC 336.
50 GSC 5006.
51 GSC 336.

by the evidence of SR 281 who was in Newry between 1957 and 1969, and again in 1970 to 1971.

103 The first of these was the practice of silence at meal times, relieved only by a nun reading from a book or newspaper. SR 281 accepted that silence during meals was something that was carried over from the sisters' own practice at meal times, although she said she tried to lighten the atmosphere by reading from a humorous book or from a newspaper. She said that whilst the sister in charge would sometimes say that the women could talk, this was her decision. She recalled the practice of silence at meal times stopping late in her time, which would suggest that the practice continued at least until the late 1960s.

104 The second related to the practice of changing names, something we have already seen was a practice in Belfast. SR 281 reiterated that this was to protect the privacy of the girls so that no one could pry into their backgrounds.

105 HIA 387 came to Newry in March 1964 aged fourteen and eleven months, and left six months later at the end of September 1964. She is the only applicant who describes her experiences there in the 1960s. She came to Newry from the Good Shepherd in Londonderry. She says that she was made to work in the laundry in Newry. She said she was not hit by the nuns when she was in Newry, but did not remember receiving any pay or pocket money while working in the laundry. Her principal concern was that when she left she was put on a train to Belfast without any preparation for life after living in care.

106 However, the Good Shepherd Sisters suggested that her reason for leaving was because she had a row with another woman, and that although her recollection was that she was put on a train to Belfast and ended up in East Belfast living on the streets, the Sisters say that she left at her own request and went to a job in the Mater Hospital in Belfast. HIA 387 said that she vaguely remembered staying in a hostel and working in the Mater Hospital.

107 The third applicant who described her experiences in Newry was HIA 202, who arrived in August 1973 a week before her sixteenth birthday and left five months later in January 1974 when she went to the Good Shepherd Sisters in Londonderry. She also recalled working in the laundry with older women, and did not recall being paid. She described the atmosphere in Newry as being more relaxed than that in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry, although she did not recall being allowed out. She said that the food was all right, she was never physically abused, and while there she learnt the guitar.

108 She described how she became friendly with a nineteen-year-old boy who was the delivery boy for the laundry. Later he told her that the nuns would not let him see her, and in January she was told by the Mother Superior that he had died. She was so upset by this news that she ran away to England with two other girls. They were traced by the police and were brought back to the Good Shepherd in Newry. She described how she was given the option of returning to her home in Newry, but she felt that by placing her in the Good Shepherd her mother had deserted her so she went to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry and we will consider her experience there later. It is clear that this experience made a profound impact upon her and she describes how it has affected her throughout her life.

109 In the Good Shepherd in Newry amenities were provided for the teenage girls in the home, particularly in later years. There was a television, music lessons in their free time and at weekends, and they were encouraged to learn what were seen as useful skills such as embroidery and dress making. A house in Cranfield, Co Down was rented for holidays. SR 281 said that it was smaller than Belfast and she saw it as a family home where nuns interacted very simply and caringly with the girls.

110 Although we were satisfied that the practice of silence at meals, relieved only by a nun reading to them, and occasions when they were able to speak on days when that was permitted by the sister in charge, was a poor and outdated practice, we did not feel that the adverse effect was sufficient to amount to systemic abuse.

The Good Shepherd in Londonderry

111 Five applicants described their experiences whilst in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry. HIA 107 and HIA 211 were both there in the first half of the 1960s, although HIA 211 continued to live there until 1975. However, her experiences after she reached the age of eighteen in September 1963 are outside our Terms of Reference. HIA 387 was there in the same period. She came from the Good Shepherd in Belfast and spent five months in Londonderry before she went to the Good Shepherd in Newry. HIA 202 and HIA 7 were there in the 1970s. HIA 202 came from the Good Shepherd in Newry, and we have already referred to her experiences there, and to the experiences of HIA 387 in Belfast and Newry.

Buildings

112 The laundry to which we referred in paragraph 28 was mechanised in the early 1960s.[52] A new chapel was opened in 1958. A new wing was built in the 1930s and was used as the Sacred Heart home for young teenagers until it was closed in 1952.

113 In the early 1970s part of this wing was adapted to provide modern hostel facilities for sixteen teenage girls aged fifteen to eighteen. This contained sixteen single rooms, four sitting rooms, a dining room, an office, bathrooms and a kitchenette for the preparation of snacks.[53] The work was completed in 1975 and the hostel became known as the "Bellevue Hostel". A report by Miss Hill of the Ministry of Home Affairs of her visit to the hostel in July 1975 described the unit as "functional, attractive and well-equipped".[54] The hostel appears to have been an initiative similar to the Roseville Hostel, which operated in the Good Shepherd in Belfast from 1967 to 1975.

Numbers

114 Although there was accommodation for up to 100 girls aged between fourteen and seventeen, in her, "Brief Impressions" report of 28 April 1953 Miss Forrest commented that the convent contained, "only a few teen-aged girls, the rest are older women".[55] Throughout the 1950s the number of girls under the age of eighteen fluctuated, as can be seen from the statistical returns for 1953 to 1957.

- 1953 – Thirteen over sixteen.
- 1954 – Ten over sixteen.
- 1955 – Two over sixteen.
- 1956 – Five over sixteen.
- 1957 – Four girls are recorded.

115 The number of girls below eighteen in the 1960s appears to have been broadly similar.

52 GSC 312.
53 GSC 5330.
54 GSC 5304.
55 HIA 1463.

- May 1962 – Twelve between fifteen and eighteen.
- March 1963 – Eight between fifteen and eighteen and two aged fourteen or under.
- March 1964 – Ten under eighteen.
- March 1965 – Five between three and eighteen, and three aged fourteen or under.
- March 1966 – Three under eighteen.

116 Of those listed in the returns of the 1960s some are described as "welfare cases" and were therefore placed by local authorities, so must have been under eighteen. In the late 1960s such figures as are available refer to "welfare" cases.

- March 1967 – Seven under eighteen.
- March 1969 – Eight welfare children.

117 The few figures available for the 1970s suggests that the number of girls under eighteen was falling, despite the opening of the Bellevue Hostel by 1975. In September 1973, Miss Hill of the Ministry of Home Affairs found only two girls under eighteen, and in July 1975 she only found three girls. The small number of girls in the hostel may explain the willingness of the sisters to consider (and the DHSS to sanction) letting four of the rooms in the hostel to the nearby Altnagelvin Hospital to accommodate nurses.[56] By December 1982 there were only two girls resident in the hostel.[57] The small number of girls in Bellevue Hostel throughout its existence may explain why, like the Roseville Hostel in Belfast, it had a relatively brief existence. It was deregistered as a children's home on 27 February 1984.[58]

118 Over the three decades covered by the evidence of the applicants to the Inquiry it would seem that those under eighteen made up less than ten percent of the females resident in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry, (excluding of course the Good Shepherd Sisters themselves). Before the opening of the Bellevue Hostel it appears to have been the practice, as in other Good Shepherd institutions, to describe the accommodation for the teenage girls and adult women who lived in the convent as St Mary's.

56 GSC 5304.
57 GSC 6700.
58 GSC 5009.

The Decision to send HIA 107 to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry

119 HIA 107 was just three days short of her twelfth birthday when she was admitted to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry by a Fit Person Order made by Strabane Juvenile Court under Section 13 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950. She and two other children of similar ages were sent by the Juvenile Court to the Good Shepherd in Derry at the end of 1960. GSC 17 was already there when HIA 107 and GSC 16 were sent there. In HIA 107's case the court order states that she was committed to the care of the Good Shepherd Convent in Londonderry until she was eighteen on the basis that she was in need of care and protection because she was a child "who having a parent not exercising proper care and guardianship is exposed to moral danger".[59]

120 It would seem from her account, and from the few court documents now available, that HIA 107 and her two companions came to the notice of the RUC in Strabane, Co Tyrone, because a number of men had taken advantage of their youth to give them money in return for various sexual acts. Although HIA 107 says social services were involved, there are no contemporary records to confirm that Tyrone County Welfare Committee, which was the local welfare authority for Strabane at that time, was involved when HIA 107 and her companions were sent to the Good Shepherd (although there are records that show they were involved some years later). We can only infer that the RUC brought the applications because their investigations led them to believe that the home circumstances of all three children were such that they would not be properly looked after, and prevented from being involved in such matters again, if they were to remain in the care of their parents.

121 The Juvenile Court must have been satisfied that was the case when it sent HIA 107 (and presumably the two other girls also) to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry. We appreciate that to place three young girls who, through no fault of their own, had been involved in sexual behaviour in the same children's home might have created difficulty for the home. There is no evidence to explain why the Juvenile Court did not take what we believe to have been the only sensible course in those circumstances and split up the children by sending them to different children's homes. Coneywarren Children's Home in Omagh, Co Tyrone, and the Sisters of Nazareth Home in Bishop Street, Londonderry, would have been obvious choices for at least two of the children.

59 GSC 3015.

122 As the Good Shepherd Convent was named in the court order in the case of HIA 107, and because the other two children appear to have been sent there as well at approximately the same time, we can only infer that either the police or the court approached the Good Shepherd Sisters in Londonderry to take the children because they knew that the Good Shepherd Sisters looked after teenagers and unmarried mothers, and therefore that was the appropriate place to send children who had been exposed to some form of sexual behaviour. We also infer that because the practice of the Good Shepherd Sisters was not to refuse anyone they agreed to take HIA 107, GSC 16 and GSC 17. We consider this later.

123 In our opinion the only proper places for HIA 107 and the other two children to have been sent would have been childcare centred children's homes such as Coneywarren or Bishop Street. They should not have been sent to a place which was an adjunct of an adult establishment. The decision of the Juvenile Court is not within our Terms of Reference, and so we cannot characterise its order as amounting to systemic abuse within our Terms of Reference. Nevertheless, we must record our regret that the Juvenile Court thought it was appropriate to send at least one child who was a few days short of her twelfth birthday, and apparently two other children of approximately the same age, to a place where they would spend much of their upbringing in an environment dominated by large numbers of adult women working in an industrial laundry.

Education in the 1960s

124 HIA 107 says that she was put to work straight away in the sewing room and SR 49 remembers her working there. HIA 107 recalled that GSC 16 stayed in the sewing room, but she thought GSC 17's mother came for her at some stage and they then went to England.

125 HIA 107 said she was not sent to school, as she should have been as she was several years under the school-leaving age, which at that time was fifteen, and when she gave her evidence on Day 189, p.58 she was emphatic that she did not go to school after she arrived in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry. The March 1963 returns to which we earlier referred show that of ten girls under eighteen, two were fourteen or under[60] and this would be consistent with HIA 107 and GSC 16 still being in the Good Shepherd at that time, when HIA 107 would have been fourteen.

60 GSC 5844.

126 The same returns list two girls in the column for girls aged five to fifteen as being at school full-time.[61] The returns also state that the complement of seventeen childcare staff in post "includes 3 teachers".[62] The equivalent entry for 31 March 1965 records three girls aged five to fifteen attending school "full-time", and notes that they "are educated within the precincts of the Home".[63] Although by March 1965 HIA 107 was no longer of compulsory school age, she was in March 1964, and it seems likely that she was one of the girls recorded as attending school in 1963 in the Good Shepherd. It therefore appears to be the case that HIA 107 did not leave the premises to go to a nearby school, but was taught in the Good Shepherd by extern teachers and by the Sisters themselves. That may be why she was mistaken in her recollection that she did not receive formal schooling while she was in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry.

127 HIA 387 spent five months in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry, arriving on 30 September 1963. She ran away from Londonderry to the Sisters in Belfast on 1 March, and moved to Newry on 2 March 1964. During the five months she spent in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry she was fourteen, and should have attended school because she was still of compulsory school age. The records for the period she was in Londonderry do not throw any light on whether she attended school during her five months there. The 1964 returns do not appear to have survived, but a handwritten Ministry of Home Affairs note covering the ten years from 1963 to 1973 simply records that in 1964 there were six girls under eighteen, none of whom were of school age.[64] As HIA 387 was under school age throughout her time in Londonderry that would suggest that if the 1964 figures are accurate, they were compiled after HIA 387 left Londonderry on 1 March 1964. That is quite possible, because both the 1963 and 1965 returns gave the figures at 31 March in each year.

128 HIA 211 was seventeen when she came to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in June 1963, and as such was well over compulsory school age.

61 GSC 5847.
62 GSC 5840.
63 GSC 5828.
64 GSC 5327.

129 Such evidence as has survived, albeit limited, is consistent with girls under school-leaving age who were in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in the early 1960s being taught on the premises, rather than going out to attend local schools. In the written submissions made on behalf of the Congregation following this module the Congregation said that it "regrets this failure to ensure that these three girls were not sent out to external schools".[65]

130 In our opinion it would have been much preferable for the children to have been sent to an external school because they would thereby have had the opportunity to interact with other children of their age, something that is an extremely important part of the process of adolescence. Nevertheless, we are satisfied that they were properly educated, and in those circumstances we do not consider that the failure of the children to attend external schools amounts to a systemic failing to provide proper childcare.

The Laundry in the 1960s

131 All three applicants who were in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in the 1960s describe working in the laundry in some capacity. HIA 387's only memory of her time there is of working in the laundry. As she was of compulsory school age throughout her five months in Londonderry, and if she did attend school, she could only have worked in the laundry when she was not at school, such as during school holidays. The same would have applied to HIA 107 until she left school after ceasing to be of compulsory school age in November 1963. As she was sixteen when the Juvenile Court approved an application for her to be released into her brother's care in Germany, where he was serving with the British Army,[66] she would have worked full-time for about eighteen months before she left in February 1965. HIA 211 was seventeen when she arrived in June 1963 and she recalled working in the laundry during her time in Londonderry. As indicated earlier, she reached the age of eighteen three months after her arrival and so her experiences thereafter fall outside our Terms of Reference.

132 We accept that all three applicants worked in the laundry on occasions when they were under the age of eighteen. While HIA 211 was of an age when it would be appropriate for her to work in some capacity, such as working in a laundry, we consider that it was wholly inappropriate for HIA 107 or HIA 387 to do so while they were still of school age, even at weekends or on school holidays. We considered it was unacceptable for such young girls to be expected to do industrial work of this type even if the machinery had been recently modernised. This should not have been permitted by the Good Shepherd Sisters, and we considered this amounted to systemic abuse.

65 GSC 24017.
66 GSC 3018.

Food in the 1960s

133 Of the three applicants who were in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in the 1960s, only HIA 107 and HIA 211 referred to the food. HIA 107 referred to the food in her written statement as "slops", but when she gave evidence on Day 189, p.82, she said that was a bit of an exaggeration, but the food wasn't nice. She accepted that they never went hungry, whereas HIA 211 said in her statement that there was never enough food, and she was always hungry at breakfast. The Good Shepherd Sisters said that there was ample food which was simple and nutritious, and we are satisfied that there was no neglect in this respect.

Penances and the Black Book

134 HIA 107 and HIA 211 both recalled how any infringement of rules, or misdemeanours, were noted in a "Black Book", and at the weekend when the entire community was assembled together the entries in the Black Book were read out, and the offender had to kneel and apologise. The Good Shepherd Sisters accept that this was the practice from the 1950s until the mid-1970s when it was discontinued.[67] It is noteworthy that SR 49, who was in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry during these years, felt that the book "may wound a child's feelings",[68] and HIA 107 told the Inquiry that this was "a horrible thing to go through".[69]

135 Another form of punishment described by HIA 107 and HIA 211 was being made to eat a meal standing up; HIA 211 said that this could last for up to a week. SR 49 accepted that this may have happened, but said that it was generally only for one meal, and she felt that it was unlikely that it went on for a full week.

67 GSC 316-317.
68 GSC 317-318.
69 Day 189, p.80.

136 We considered the practices of reading out misdemeanours in front of others and making the offender kneel, or making an offender stand to eat her meal, were a form of deliberate humiliation and amounted to emotional abuse.

Silence at Meal Times

137 HIA 107 and HIA 211 recalled that there was silence at meal times, broken only by a nun reading. We have already described a similar practice in the Good Shepherd in Newry, and the Good Shepherd Sisters accept that it was the practice in Londonderry in the 1950s. We are satisfied that the same practice continued during the 1960s in Londonderry. Although we considered it was a poor and outdated practice, we did not feel that the adverse effect was sufficient to amount to systemic abuse.

Changing Names

138 As in the other Good Shepherd homes we have considered the Good Shepherd Sisters accept that names were changed on admission to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in order to protect the privacy of the girls, so that others could not become aware of, or pry into, their background before they came to the Good Shepherd Sisters. As we have already explained this practice appears to have applied equally to women over eighteen and to girls under eighteen, and we understand may have been a widespread practice in mother and baby homes, although these are outside our terms of Reference. Although well-intended, this practice caused considerable distress and confusion to those affected. We considered that the practice continued longer in Londonderry than it should have done, and represented poor practice on the part of the Sisters.

Other Punishments

139 HIA 211 said that she was slapped on the face by nuns if she did not eat her meals, and that SR 47 who was the sister in charge of the girls, slapped her on the face for not being able to correctly identify the new decimal coins, and on another occasion because she did not know the words of a song. HIA 107 said that she was never physically abused by SR 47 and did not recall seeing a girl or lady being hit by any nun.[70] SR 49 accepted that SR 47 was "...quite strict. She was firm", but said that in her time in St Mary's she did not see corporal punishment being inflicted on anyone.[71] Whilst we accept this may have happened, because only six months of HIA 211's time with the Good Shepherd Sisters in Londonderry comes within our Terms of Reference we cannot be satisfied that any such behaviour occurred during that six month period.

70 Day 189, p.72.

The 1970s

140 Two applicants describe their time in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry in the 1970s. HIA 202 came to Londonderry in January 1974 after her time in the Good Shepherd in Newry, which we have already described. She remained in Londonderry for fifteen months until she left in August 1975 when she reached the age of eighteen. As she was over sixteen when she arrived, she was over compulsory school age. She worked in the laundry for which she received pocket money.

141 It does not seem that she lived in Bellevue Hostel which opened in 1975, but whether she lived there or in the St Mary's accommodation, she described a much more relaxed atmosphere than that which appears to have existed in the early 1960s. She was allowed home on a number of occasions and she and other girls were allowed to go into town, although she was unsure whether they were actually encouraged to do so. She recalled one night when she and another girl went across the city into the Creggan Estate, and when she returned and was in bed SR 49 came in and struck her on the face.

142 She accepted that this was out of character for SR 49 and was a "one-off" incident, and she never saw anyone else slapped. At that time the Creggan Estate was one of the most dangerous places in Londonderry. It was the scene of rioting, explosions and numerous incidents where there were shootings at soldiers by terrorists and soldiers shooting at terrorists. There was therefore a grave risk of anyone in that area being caught up in a violent and potentially fatal incident. To get to the Creggan Estate from the Good Shepherd convent she had to cross from the Waterside area to the opposite bank of the river, and then make her way to the Creggan, a return journey of some miles.

143 It is not surprising that SR 49 was extremely upset and frightened by the danger to which HIA 211 had exposed herself by making this journey, and so over-reacted in a way which HIA 211 accepts was out of character. We accept this happened but do not consider that in these circumstances SR 49's behaviour amounted to systemic abuse.

71 GSC 315.

144 HIA 7 was the only other applicant who was in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry. Her circumstances were somewhat unusual. Her mother arranged for her to be placed in the Good Shepherd for two short periods. The first was for five weeks from December 1976 until late January 1977, and the second was for three weeks in November 1978, by which time HIA 7 was sixteen.

145 HIA 7 says that before she was admitted to the Good Shepherd her mother took her to see the family GP and asked him to check HIA 7's virginity. The doctor was not appointed by, or acting at the request of, the Good Shepherd Sisters and we need not refer to this any further. As HIA 7 was only just fourteen when she was admitted on the first occasion she was still of compulsory school age, although two of the five weeks she spent at that time would have been the Christmas holidays. In her statement she said that she went to school while she was in the Good Shepherd.

146 In HIA 7's second period in the Good Shepherd in Londonderry she was only there for three weeks. She described how she worked in the laundry, and that some of the older women were bullies. She was allocated to work with SR 49 in the kitchen because she was being bullied, and says that it was SR 49 who arranged for her to be admitted to Coneywarren Children's Home in Omagh where she went at the end of her short stay in the Good Shepherd and where she was very happy.

Positive Accounts

147 HIA 7 recalled how a number of girls in the Good Shepherd told her that SR 49 had made positive changes to the place, and we have already referred to the improvements made to the living accommodation in the 1970s with the creation of the Bellevue Hostel. We should also record that we accept the evidence that from the mid to late 1960s onwards there were classes provided for all the women, including the children under eighteen who are within our Terms of Reference, in various skills such as typing and embroidery. SR 49 described music as a core part of life in St Mary's and girls were encouraged to take part in choirs and musicals. There was a recreation room with a TV, and in the summer there were holidays in Rathmullan, and later in Rossnowlagh, both in Co Donegal.

Admission of Young Children

148 The matter which troubled us most in relation to the Good Shepherd in Londonderry was the admission of very young children. While accepting that HIA 7 may have been a special case because she was only there for five weeks between December 1976 and January 1977, and that was perhaps understandable in view of the policy of the Good Shepherd Sisters of never turning anyone away, the same cannot be said for children such as HIA 107. HIA 107, GSC 16 and GSC 17 were very young when they were admitted in 1960, and the figures available would suggest that subsequently other children around fourteen years of age were admitted.

149 In its general submissions relating to all its homes the Congregation "accepts that having teenagers with adult women was not ideal", but they point out that efforts "were made within the existing facilities to make suitable safeguarding arrangements for those teenagers".[72]

150 We consider that an institution consisting predominantly of adult women working in a laundry was an entirely inappropriate place to bring up children as young as twelve. We recognise that in Londonderry HIA 107 (and it seems GSC 16 and GSC 17) were placed there under a court order, but we are in no doubt that the Good Shepherd Sisters should have refused to take the children on a permanent basis. By accepting them on a long-term basis, which turned out to be over four years in the case of HIA 107, the Good Shepherd Sisters failed to ensure that proper care was provided for these children and that was a systemic failing on their part.

Inspections

151 Although very few inspection reports of the Good Shepherd in Londonderry have survived, it is clear from occasional references in other documents that it was regularly inspected by inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs in the 1950s, 1960s and early 1970s. That was also the position for the Good Shepherd in Belfast and in Newry. Thereafter the responsibility for such inspections transferred to the SWAG (Social Work Advisory Group) of the DHSS. As we consider in greater detail in Chapter 2 (Finance and Governance) the SWAG did not carry out regular inspections of children's homes until at least the late 1970s, and its failure to do so in relation to each of the three Good Shepherd Sisters Homes was a systemic failing.

72 GSC 24013.

152 Whilst no inspection reports of the Good Shepherd in Londonderry now exist for the early 1960s, we are satisfied that it was regularly inspected during that time. If there were inspections when HIA 107 and her companions, and other children under school leaving age, were living there, there is nothing to suggest that the inspectors expressed concern that such young children were living in an entirely unsuitable environment, or recommended that they be moved to a more suitable environment such as the Sisters of Nazareth in Bishop Street or a statutory home. In its response to the Inquiry Warning Letter the Department of Health argues that HIA 107 and her companions were deemed by a court not to be suitable for placement in a traditional children's home, and because the placement was in accordance with the contemporaneous advice of the Children's Welfare Council, there should not be a finding of systemic failing on the part of the Ministry of Home Affairs. We do not agree. Notwithstanding that a court order had been made, by the 1960s it should have been appreciated by all concerned, especially the inspectors, that it was completely unacceptable to place children under school leaving age in an institution of this type. These children should not have been there. If the inspectors did not detect this they failed in their duty to properly inspect. If they were aware and did not take any steps to try to get the order changed, they were equally at fault.

Administering Authority

153 There was also a failure for many years to appreciate that the Good Shepherd Sisters was the administering authority for each of the three homes, and as such obliged to put in place a system of monthly visitors as required by the Voluntary Home's Regulations. It appears that it was a SWAG inspection of Marianville in Belfast in 1984 that first brought the absence of such a system to light,[73] after which the position was rectified and a system of monthly visitors put in place.[74] The absence of such a system is a systemic failing by the Good Shepherd Sisters. The failure to detect that absence was a systemic failing on the part of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Social Work Advisory Group.

73 GSC 6408.
74 GSC 6434.

Apology by the Good Shepherd Sisters

154 In her evidence on behalf of the Congregation on Day 194, Sr Ethna said:

> "...we all would like to communicate to the Panel and the Inquiry that we welcome this Inquiry. We appreciate -- we appreciate it is important for all voices to be heard and we regret that some of our former residents have painful memories of the time spent in our care. Our Sisters have maintained contact with some of the applicants and many other former residents over the years, and we remain open to engaging with former residents in a pastoral context, and we hope that through our cooperation with the Inquiry and through any future pastoral outreach to former residents, who have painful memories of time spent in the care of Good Shepherd, that they may find healing."

Conclusion

155 We have concluded that there were the following systemic failings on the part of The Congregation of the Good Shepherd Sisters.

- It was unacceptable for young girls under the age of eighteen to be expected to do industrial work in the Good Shepherd laundries.
- Permitting girls to be asked by a priest whether each was a virgin.
- The practices of reading out misdemeanours in front of others and making the offender kneel, or making an offender stand to eat her meal.
- By accepting children under school-leaving age, such as HIA 107 and her companions, into one Good Shepherd institution that was not completely child-centred in the way that other Good Shepherd institutions were designed to be on a long-term basis the Good Shepherd Sisters failed to ensure that proper care was provided for these children.
- The failure of SWAG to carry out inspections of each of the three Good Shepherd Sisters Homes was a systemic failing.
- The failure of each of the three Good Shepherd Sisters Homes to put in place a system of monthly visitors was a systemic failing.

156 Systemic failings by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

- Failing to take steps to prevent children under school-leaving age, such as HIA 107 and her companions, being in the Good Shepherd on a long-term basis.

157 Systemic failings on the part of the Ministry of Home Affairs and/or the DHSS.

- Failing to detect the absence of a system of monthly visitors was a systemic failing on the part of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Social Work Advisory Group.

Chapter 22: Contents

Module 15 – Bawnmore Boys' Home

Introduction

1 Although Bawnmore Boys' Home was examined as part of Module 15 of the Inquiry because a number of those who were resident there were later moved to Kincora Boys' Hostel, we consider that Bawnmore should be dealt with in a separate chapter of our Report. Bawnmore is not to be confused with another children's home of the same name in South Belfast. The Bawnmore in this chapter was the home at Mill Road, Newtownabbey, Co Antrim, which existed between 1952 and 1977.

2 The evidence relating to Bawnmore was considered on days 208, 209 and 210, during which we heard evidence in person from four applicants: HIA 112, HIA 532, HIA 199 and HIA 409. We considered the evidence of HIA 83 who gave evidence at an earlier stage of the Inquiry, and we considered it unnecessary to ask him to give evidence again. We also received evidence from two former members of staff: BM 4 gave evidence in person, whilst BM 13 provided the Inquiry with a written statement.

3 We received a witness statement from Fionnuala McAndrew on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board, as the successor to the Belfast Welfare Authority and the Northern Health and Social Services Board (NHSSB), which took over Bawnmore with the reorganisation of local government in 1973 and ran it until it closed in 1977. We also received a witness statement from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of what was at that time the Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and is now the Department of Health, and from Richard Pengelly, who is Permanent Secretary of the same department.

4 Bawnmore was one of the homes investigated by the Hughes Inquiry because of offences involving the abuse of children at the home. They came to light during the wider Caskey Phase One investigation by the RUC, which had been set up following the publication of the article in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980 to which we refer in greater detail in the chapters relating to Kincora. The Caskey Phase One investigation was not simply confined to Kincora; it covered a number of children's homes or hostels, including Bawnmore. As a result of that investigation the police uncovered allegations against five men, two of whom (Peter Bone and Robert Elder) were prosecuted, pleaded guilty and were sentenced by Lord Lowry, Lord Chief Justice, on 16 December 1981 for offences relating to Bawnmore, at the same time that Mains, Semple and McGrath were sentenced for offences related to Kincora, and Eric Witchell was sentenced for offences relating to Williamson House.

Bawnmore and its origins

5 Bawnmore House was situated on the Mill Road on the outskirts of North Belfast. As was the case for a number of the institutions we examined during this Inquiry, it had been a large private family residence. It became a children's home as the result of an initiative by the then Board of Guardians of the Belfast Union to provide accommodation for children who had been living in the workhouse. The property was purchased in 1948 and transferred to Belfast Corporation. After the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 became law the Belfast Welfare Authority opened it as a children's home in May 1952.

6 For some years the home accommodated both boys and girls, and as late as August 1959 five girls were still resident. In due course it became solely a boys' home, although there was a plan which was never implemented to re-admit girls in the 1970s. No girls came forward to our Inquiry to complain about their time in Bawnmore. This chapter therefore deals only with allegations made by boys, and so we refer to it by the name it bore for much of its existence, Bawnmore Boys' Home.

The buildings

7 Bawnmore was a large building. Plans from the time it was purchased show a drawing room, dining room, billiard room, morning room and cloakroom on the ground floor. On the second floor there was a ballroom and bedrooms. In the attic there were rooms used as apartments by the maids. As well as an internal courtyard, there were garages, an open yard and stables. It was set in extensive grounds, and in later years a football pitch was laid out.

Numbers

8 Although the home had accommodation for 28 to 30 children, in the late 1960s and during the 1970s overcrowding was a recurring problem. In June 1969 there were 31 boys in residence.[1] By September of that year the number had increased to 33,[2] although by the end of October 1969 the number had been reduced to 29.[3] By April 1971 the number of boys had risen to 32.[4]

1 BWN 7676.
2 BWN 7682.
3 BWN 7683.
4 BWN 7707.

9 During this period the Belfast Welfare Authority recognised that conditions in the home were unsatisfactory. In August 1969 it was noted that:

> "It is becoming increasingly apparent that the facilities at Bawnmore are not adequate for the number of boys cared for there and it would seem that consideration must also be given to increasing the staff in order to allow for more individual attention to be given."[5]

10 In September 1969, when there were 33 boys, it was accepted that despite the home being fully staffed, "it is probable that the staff/children ratio is too low".[6] In October, the number of boys had reduced to 29, and efforts were being made to retain this level of occupancy, even though it meant refusing to admit children to care. In his report on the home to the Welfare Committee the Children's Officer pointed out that there was a vacant post of housemother's assistant, and the remaining staff were finding it extremely difficult to afford each boy the individual attention which he required.[7] The difficulty experienced in filling the vacant post was similar to that experienced when filling vacancies at Kincora which we examine elsewhere in this Report. At this time local authorities throughout the United Kingdom found it hard to recruit suitable staff for such posts because the posts were residential, demanding, poorly paid and involved long hours.

11 In November 1969 the Welfare Committee decided a new home to accommodate 36 boys should be built on the Bawnmore site.[8] However, by 1971 the necessary plans had not been prepared because of the pressure of other work in the City Architect's Office.[9] The plan to build a new building does not appear to have proceeded any further.

12 By this time such large institutions were completely out of date, and we find it surprising that it was thought appropriate to consider building a new institution of this size. This is particularly the case because in 1955 the Belfast Welfare Authority put forward a plan to build cottages on the site to provide family group homes. This was not favoured by the Ministry of Home Affairs, which preferred the establishment of family group homes, or Family Unit Homes as they were called, in ordinary dwelling houses scattered throughout the residential areas of the city. The Minister

5 BWN 7678.
6 BWN 7682.
7 BWN 7683.
8 BWN 7688.
9 BWN 7709.

reluctantly agreed to withdraw the Ministry's objection to the scheme if the cost could be significantly reduced because it had gone so far.[10] However, it proved impossible to reduce the cost to acceptable levels, and in 1957 the Minister refused to approve the plan because it was too expensive, and expressed the hope that "family-group homes, if needed, will in due course emerge in the various City residential areas."[11]

13 By the time the 1969 proposal was put forward, Belfast Welfare Authority had seven group homes in various areas, which makes it even more surprising that such a proposal was put forward at all. In any event, the proposal never came to fruition, whether it was recognised to be undesirable in principle, or because of the imminent reorganisation of local government.

14 A Review of Bawnmore Boys Home was prepared by the NHSSB in April 1984, evidently for the Hughes Inquiry. This described how Bawnmore left a great deal to be desired as a children's home when it was taken over by the NHSSB on 1 October 1973 as a consequence of the reorganisation of local government and the health and social services which resulted in the creation of four regional health and social services boards. It identified three major deficiencies: the records were incomplete; some 75% of the staff, including the superintendent and deputy, had chosen to transfer to the Eastern Board; and, finally, the building was in a poor physical condition, and a high level of vandalism "and an almost self destructive behaviour" existed among the boys, resulting in widespread damage to the furniture, decor and fabric of the building.[12]

15 Almost immediately, planning began for a replacement of Bawnmore. In the interim, steps were taken to introduce a group living system, and by February 1976 the necessary structural alterations had been carried out, and the group system was said to "have settled down and was beginning to produce benefits in standards of child care."[13]

16 Unfortunately, the location of the home and its extensive grounds brought additional problems. The grounds were used as a public park, and there were clashes, mainly of a sectarian nature, between locals and children and staff from the home. By 1976 the situation had deteriorated to such an extent that staff were frightened and childcare practice affected, and

10 BWN 5583.
11 BWN 5559.
12 BWN 5705.
13 BWN 5708.

the author of the Report re Situation at Bawnmore Children's Home recommended that the Board find alternative accommodation for the home.[14] In October 1976 a decision was made to close the home, and new premises were purchased at Coulter's Hill, Ballyclare. The children and staff were transferred to Coulter's Hill, and Bawnmore officially closed on 30 March 1977.[15]

Staffing

17 The problem with staffing in 1969 that has already been referred to was not new. A note made by the MoHA in December 1965 following an inspection referred to;

> "Shortage of staff, high numbers [of residents], delays in providing adequate heating/decoration suggests that this home is not getting enough priority in Belfast...Staff shortage in particular seems to need positive action."[16]

18 Staff shortages seem to have been a recurring problem from time to time during Bawnmore's existence. In 1955 there was a reference to the strain placed on the matron who had almost no time off because her assistant had left and not been replaced.[17] In 1967[18] and 1968[19] there are references in MoHA inspection reports to vacant posts. This meant that some staff were required to work for long periods of time without any time off.

19 BM 4 worked at Bawnmore for almost two and a half years between 1963 and 1965, and again for almost a year from February 1968.[20] He told the Inquiry that he once had to work constantly for three months without a break because of the lack of staff,[21] although he did not say in which of his two periods of employment that occurred. This experience echoed that of Joseph Mains at Kincora, who worked for very long periods of time without any staff to help him as we point out in that part of our Report relating to Kincora.

14 BWN 5700.
15 BWN 5710.
16 BWN 5724.
17 BWN 5754.
18 BWN 5752.
19 BWN 5751.
20 BWN 26574.
21 Day 209, p.8.

20 The Belfast Welfare Authority faced recurrent staffing problems, which indicates that insufficient resources were being provided to improve staffing in Bawnmore. Although the MoHA were told in December 1965 that it was hoped "to authorise more attractive salary scales",[22] staffing problems continued to be noted in 1969, which suggests that more needed to be done to try and resolve this problem.

Absconding

21 Absconding appears to have become a major problem in October 1974, with almost 50% of the boys absconding at that time. It would appear from the Review of Bawnmore Boys Home to which we have already referred, that at least four members of staff, and the new superintendent, were felt to have, "very rigid and inflexible approaches to care".[23] The implication was that these members of staff were not satisfactory, and this may have contributed to the high level of absconding. It is noteworthy that later in the Review the author refers to a number of those named as having departed during 1975, saying this meant there was a considerable period of major staff instability.[24]

22 The absence of reports from the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) of the DHSS for the period from 1973 until Bawnmore closed in March 1977 means that there is no further information about the rate of absconding, although it is perhaps fair to surmise from the absence of further references to it in the reports to which we have referred that the problem diminished. However, that it reached almost 50% at one point indicates that at that time insufficient, or inadequate, efforts had been made to address the causes of absconding. Absconding at this level suggests that, in part at least, it was due to failings on the part of a number of members of the staff at that time, because earlier reports from the MoHA do not contain references to significant levels of absconding from Bawnmore, and so there is no evidence that absconding was a problem in earlier years.

Conditions in Bawnmore

23 Of the four applicants who had been in Bawnmore and who spoke to the Inquiry, HIA 199 and HIA 409 had no complaints about their time there. HIA 199 was at Bawnmore when there were still girls in the home, and

22 BWN 5728.
23 BWN 5708.
24 BWN 5709

remembered trips to the seaside. Although there are references to poor heating in the home, and to the need for redecoration in the mid and late 1960s, none of the applicants complained of being affected by such problems to a degree that would amount to neglect. Facilities for recreation included the construction of a football pitch in 1965.[25] Recreational activities in the 1960s were provided with the help of volunteers who helped with Scouts, cookery, woodwork and drama.[26] At one stage a magazine was produced, although this lapsed, at least for a while, due to staffing problems.[27] Other activities, such as trips to a nearby swimming pool, were recorded by inspectors.

24 Considerable efforts appear to have been made by BM 3, who was the Superintendent at the time, to ensure that a wide range of activities were available to the children in the 1960s and early 1970s. Whilst the staffing difficulties to which we have referred raised concerns from time to time about the ability of staff to devote enough time to the children, overall the amount of attention given to the children appears to have been satisfactory.

Bullying

25 HIA 112 was in Bawnmore from May 1966, although it is not possible to establish how long he was there as no records had been found relating to him. He told the Inquiry that although he was bullied by older boys, who took a pair of jeans from him that had been given to him by his mother, and some older boys beat up younger boys, he did not regard it as really serious, seeing it as just the kind of boisterous behaviour engaged in by older boys.[28] He said that the staff turned a blind eye unless there was a particularly serious fight when they would intervene.

26 HIA 83 was in Bawnmore from mid-December 1976, and then moved to Coulter's Hill for a short time after Bawnmore closed at the end of March 1977. In his statement, HIA 83 described being bullied by three brothers in both Bawnmore and Coulter's Hill, and as a result said he started to run away and truant from school. He claimed that he told BM 13 a member of staff, who did nothing about it. BM 13 made a statement to the Inquiry in which he said that he had no recall of being told this, although he

25 BWN 5719.
26 BWN 5721.
27 BWN 5718.
28 Day 208, pp. 81 and 82.

accepted that HIA 83 was one of the children staff identified as vulnerable and prone to being bullied. He said he had no difficulty in accepting that HIA 83 had been bullied, adding;

> "...it is also the case that this was an endemic problem within that environment affecting many children and is something that as a staff group we were fully aware of and did our best to manage."[29]

27 Bullying can be a risk in any children's home. Staff have to be alert to that risk, and take suitable steps to prevent it wherever possible. As only two individuals have alleged that they were bullied, we consider that this is insufficient to the level of widespread bullying that would amount to systemic abuse.

Physical and Emotional Abuse

28 HIA 112 alleged that he was called a "dirty wee taig" by BM 3 – the Superintendent – and by BM 4 – the Assistant Superintendent. BM 3 is dead and BM 4 denied doing so. HIA 112 was a Roman Catholic in a home that was predominantly composed of Protestant boys during his time. Using such terms, particularly by staff, would be wholly unacceptable. HIA 112 also alleged that when he wet his bed BM 4 rubbed his face in the wet sheet, spat on his face, stripped him naked and put him in a cold bath. BM 4 denied each of these allegations, and pointed to his efforts to reduce the prevalence of bed wetting during his time at Bawnmore. He explained that children with enuresis were referred to hospital, and a programme was then put in place in the home to help the children concerned. As a result, at one stage where there had been 24 children bed wetting the number was reduced to 4. While we accepted HIA 112's account of his experiences, we are satisfied they were an isolated series of events, and do not amount to a systemic failing. We accept that the methods described for dealing with bed wetting were appropriate.

Sexual abuse

29 As we have explained, Bawnmore was one of the homes investigated by the RUC during the Caskey Phase One investigation. The police were provided with files relating to 135 boys dating back to 1963, although this was only a small proportion of the total number of residents who had passed through the home.[30] Although not all the boys on the list could be traced, the police investigation identified eleven former residents who between them made allegations of sexual abuse by five men. Two of these, Peter Bone and Robert Elder, were subsequently convicted.

29 BWN 35035.

30 A third person, S 2, was traced by the RUC to Canada and was interviewed by them in 1982. At that time he denied any offences. In 1985 S 2 visited Northern Ireland on holiday, and was again questioned by the RUC. On that occasion he admitted masturbating HIA 532. He also admitted similar activity in Firmount Children's Home in Antrim. The DPP directed no prosecution, pointing out that the only criminal offence that could be established in relation to HIA 532 was one of indecent assault. As the offences occurred seventeen years before, it was considered that the passage of time rendered proceedings stale and inappropriate.[31] Shortly after S 2 returned to Canada in 1985 he wrote to the RUC admitting masturbating another juvenile at Conway House Children's Home. The RUC decided not to refer the letter to the DPP, no doubt mindful of the DPP's earlier decision. Allegations of abuse were also made against two other former staff members, S 1 and BM 1.

31 Peter Bone was a married man with grown-up children and worked as an architect employed by the North Eastern Education and Library Board. He was prominent in the Scout movement, and another interest was photography. His initial involvement with Bawnmore came about when he went there to study arrangements for social service. He later returned to Bawnmore as a volunteer to help staff with activities. Over a period of several years he took HIA 532 on numerous trips in his car, including some visits to Bone's home. Bone admitted sexually abusing HIA 532, and to taking nude photographs of him and other boys. A search of his home discovered photographs of other naked boys who had not been resident at Bawnmore. Three of those boys who were traced by the police alleged that Bone had sexually assaulted them. On 16 December 1981 at Belfast Crown Court he was sentenced to a total of two years imprisonment on eight charges of gross indecency and eight charges of indecent assault.[32]

32 Although the offences against HIA 532 were committed outside Bawnmore, they are relevant to our Inquiry because the opportunity for Bone to commit

30 BWN 20014.
31 BWN 20199.
32 BWN 20665.

these offences came about when he was permitted to take HIA 532 out of the home. At that time there were no formal instructions in place for members of the public to be vetted who wished to take children out from time to time, although there was a formal vetting procedure for individuals who wished to befriend a child in care on a more continuous basis. The level of contact between Bone and HIA 532 was very substantial and lasted for a considerable period of time. We consider that formal vetting of Bone should have taken place, and the failure to vet him amounted to a systemic failing by the Belfast Welfare Authority.

33 However, we recognise that such vetting would not have revealed his predilections for sexual abuse of children. To all outward appearances at the time he was a respectable person. He had no previous convictions, was married with children, and employed in a responsible position by a public authority. He was also prominent in the Scout movement, something that suggested he had a genuine interest in youth work. HIA 532 said he did not reveal Bone's behaviour to the Superintendent BM 3, to his social workers or to his parents as "I was embarrassed to even think of it and just could not face actually telling anyone."[33] In the absence of a complaint it is difficult to see how Bone's behaviour could have been discovered or prevented by any form of vetting procedure at that time.

34 However, although HIA 532 did not tell anyone about the abuse at the time, he told us that after he left Bawnmore he told BM 1 about it. BM 1 had been employed as a house-master in Bawnmore from December 1965 until 1975 when he moved to work in the Palmerston Assessment Centre. HIA 532 told us that he visited BM 1 at Palmerston and told him about the abuse. He recalled that BM 1 told him he had a vague recollection that he suspected something was going on because Bone was persistently buying HIA 532 things.[34] In his response to the Inquiry Warning Letter BM 1 denied that he was told of allegations of abuse at Bawnmore while working at Palmerston, or that he was aware of concerns about Bone from HIA 532 or anyone else.

35 This suggested that if staff in Bawnmore had been more questioning about the extent and nature of Bone's relationship with HIA 532 that could have served, at least, to put Bone on notice that his contact with the boy was being monitored which might have prevented some of the abuse. Although

33 KIN 021.
34 KIN 021.

HIA 532 was no longer in care when he told BM 1 about the abuse, BM 1 was employed by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board and it would still have been appropriate for BM 1 to report the abuse to his seniors and for them to have reported Bone to the police. As we consider later, BM 1 was himself subsequently convicted of indecent assault of boys in Palmerston and it may be that his decision not to report Bone's abuse of HIA 532 was in order to avoid a more widespread investigation. Whatever the reason, we consider his failure to report the abuse amounted to a systemic failing.

36 HIA 532 was also abused by S 2, the Assistant Superintendent. Although S 2 initially denied the allegations, he later admitted masturbating HIA 532 on one occasion when HIA 532 stayed overnight at S 2's parents' home in 1968 as HIA 532 alleged.[35] However, S 2 denied that he rubbed HIA 532's penis through his trousers whilst the boy was lying on his bed after he had been to hospital to have stitches removed from a cut to his hand.[36] Again HIA 532 explained why he did not report what had been done to him by S 2 when he said:

> "I did not tell [BM 3] about [S 2] abusing me in my room, nor about Peter Bone. I think this was because I was young and I did not really know that what they were doing was abuse and was wrong. I just thought it was part of growing up."[37]

37 HIA 532's explanation was perfectly understandable. However, he was also sexually abused by Robert Elder whilst Elder was on a short term student placement at Bawnmore. HIA 532 made two distinct allegations against Elder. The first was that when HIA 532 was about ten, Elder took him from his room at night to the room where Elder slept when he was on night duty, masturbated him and performed oral sex on him. HIA 532 also alleged that Elder tried to make him perform oral sex.

38 The second allegation related to the day when S 2 touched him sexually while HIA 532 was lying on his bed. He said that Elder came to his room and showed him pornographic photographs of young boys and girls, and told him to keep them. However, a few minutes later Elder returned and retrieved the pictures, telling HIA 532 not to tell anyone what happened, and threatening to involve him in the activities depicted in the photos.

35 KIN 023.
36 KIN 021.
37 KIN 022.

HIA 532 said he was terrified by this because the photographs showed bottles being inserted into the children.

39 He told an older boy about this later the same day, and that night the boy brought HIA 532 to see the Superintendent in his bungalow, which was on the site. HIA 532 said to the police that he told BM 3:

> "...what this man was doing to me. He asked me to try and get one of the photographs as proof as there was little he could do without something to go on."[38]

BM 3 told the police that HIA 532 only complained to him about Elder showing him "dirty photographs". BM 3 said:

> "I spoke to Elder and he admitted having these photographs and I told him not to have them in the house as they were not proper things for young boys to see."[39]

40 BM 3 told the Hughes Inquiry that HIA 532 did not speak to him about anything other than the photographs. At first sight that may seem plausible, because HIA 532 had said he did not mention the abuse to anyone. When he described these events in his evidence to the Inquiry on Day 208 at p.121 he was unsure whether he told BM 3 about the abuse as well as about the photographs. However, Elder admitted to the police that BM 3 spoke to him about what HIA 532 had said.

> "I remember [HIA 532] told [BM 3] the Head of the Home about what had happened. [BM 3] approached me about this and I denied it. [BM 3] obviously believed me and all he told me was not to become too friendly with any of the kids."[40]

41 The Hughes Inquiry considered the apparent conflict between these accounts and concluded at 6.38 of its Report:

> "On balance, however, we believe the evidence is that a complaint about Mr Elder's homosexual activities was made and that [BM 3] was deceived by a denial and a story about the photographs which he should at least have sought to check by insisting on their production."[41]

The reference to a "story about the photographs" refers to BM 3's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry that he was told the photographs were of "famine stricken countries showing native people partially dressed."[42]

38 KIN 20041.
39 BWN 20070.
40 BWN 20091 and 20092.
41 BWN 25168.
42 BWN 25167.

42 In view of Elder's admission to the police that BM 3 spoke to him about the sexual abuse, we are satisfied that BM 3 was told about that, and not just told about the photographs.

43 We consider there were a number of systemic failings in the way this matter was dealt with:

- No written record was made of the allegations, or of Elder's response, by BM 3.
- BM 3 did not investigate the allegation about the photographs by asking to see them as he should have done.
- BM 3 did not report the matter to his superiors as he ought to have done.

44 HIA 532 connected these events to having stitches removed from his hands in February 1968.[43] If he were correct that these events happened in February 1968 that is significant, because that would place it after the investigation by Mr Mason into the 1967 allegations at Kincora. In the chapter dealing with Kincora we say that Mr Mason should have issued instructions to all the homes run by the Belfast Welfare Authority that any such allegations should be reported to him. Had such procedures been in place at that time then that should have resulted in the matter being investigated, and possibly that would have led to it being referred to the police. These events involving Elder at Bawnmore are a further illustration of the consequences of there not being such a procedure, and as a result senior staff were being kept in ignorance of serious allegations by the failure of staff at a lower level to report such matters.

45 Elder was also prosecuted and pleaded guilty at Belfast Crown Court to two counts relating to HIA 532, one of indecent assault and one of gross indecency. On 16 December 1981 he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment suspended for two years on both counts.

46 S 1 spent two periods working in Bawnmore as an assistant house-father. The first was from mid-January 1963 until the end of May 1965. The second was from February 1968 until February 1969. During the Caskey Phase One investigation four former Bawnmore residents made allegations against him, ranging from attempts to kiss them, to several allegations of alleged anal penetration. He resigned in 1969. By 1982 he had emigrated to Canada, where he was questioned by Detective Superintendent Caskey and Detective Sergeant Elliott. He denied all of the allegations. In 2012 another former resident of Bawnmore came forward to Manchester police and alleged that S 1 liked to rub himself against the boys, and always had an erection.

43 KIN 021.

47 In 1980 BM 20 complained that when he was smacked by BM 1 with his hand, the hand would remain on his bottom between smacks. BM 1 denied these allegations and the DPP directed no prosecution.

48 In January 1982 BM 1 was suspended following complaints to the police during the Caskey Phase Two investigation. He admitted that he had left his hand on children's bottoms for longer than was necessary after smacking them. Some of the boys had been clothed, others were unclothed. He denied allegations that he touched some of these boys on the penis.

49 BM 1 was prosecuted in the Magistrates Court on nine charges of indecent assault in respect of the offences at Palmerston. He pleaded guilty, and was given an absolute discharge. In 1992 he was acquitted of charges of indecent assault on a boy Scout.

50 We are satisfied that several boys were sexually abused by staff members while living in Bawnmore, and those abused included HIA 532 who was abused by Bone, a regular visitor to Bawnmore. The number of offences amounted to systemic abuse.

51 We have given considerable thought as to how it was that there were a number of sexual abusers of children connected with Bawnmore. We have found nothing to suggest a pattern that would suggest that such abusers were knowingly recruited to Bawnmore. We consider that the sexual abuse to which we have referred was able to take place because the abusers were able to exploit a culture of lax supervision of staff by the superintendent.

Records, monitoring and inspection

52 The Hughes Inquiry examined the relevant records from 1963 to 1973 and concluded that there was almost complete compliance with the statutory obligation on the Children's Officer to visit the home every month. Although the reports were described as tending to be short and stereotyped, from time to time they contained references to the condition of the home, truanting and absconding. However, the absence of records relating to Bawnmore prevented us, as it did the Hughes Inquiry, from establishing what action, if any, was taken to deal with such problems.

53 Although the absence of some records may be attributed to the inevitable disruption caused by the transfer of the home from the Belfast Welfare Authority to the new Northern Board in 1973, and to the rapid closure of the home in March 1977 when residents and staff moved to Coulter's Hill, that may not be the whole story. The Review of Bawnmore referred to records being incomplete when the NHSSB took over responsibility for Bawnmore on 1 October 1973. When the police carried out their investigations in 1980 they found that the admission's register had gone astray. These deficiencies suggest that record keeping at Bawnmore may have left something to be desired, but the absence of records makes it difficult for us to establish to what extent that may have been the case.

54 The Hughes Inquiry noted that whilst members of the Welfare Committee visited regularly between 1960 and 1965, there were frequent gaps in such visits in 1967 and 1968, followed by a significant further decline from 1971 onwards.[44] We agree with the Hughes Inquiry that it was unsatisfactory that the Welfare Committee neglected its statutory duty to visit, and we regard its failure to fulfil that duty as a systemic failing.

Departmental inspections

55 Until the childcare function of the Ministry of Home Affairs was taken over by DHSS in 1973 such records as had survived satisfy us that there were regular visits by MoHA inspectors. Some reports by Miss Hill and Miss Forrest have survived. Records from other homes show that the Ministry inspectors were regular and conscientious in their inspections, and we see no reason to conclude that regular inspections at Bawnmore did not take place when that was the responsibility of the MoHA.

56 There are no records of any formal SWAG inspections of Bawnmore being carried out between 1973 and 1977. Although the Department's response to the Warning Letter sent to it by the Inquiry points to evidence that there were some inspections of other statutory homes during this period, the routine destruction of inspection records makes it difficult to establish which homes were inspected and which were not. However, Mr Armstrong confirmed to the Hughes Inquiry that at that time the emphasis of SWAG was on inspecting voluntary homes. We are satisfied that because some homes were inspected it cannot be assumed that Bawnmore was also inspected. Elsewhere in our report we explain why we consider the absence of such inspections by SWAG was unjustified, and we consider that the failure to ensure that inspections of Bawnmore were carried out by SWAG between 1973 and 1977 was a systemic failing by the DHSS.

44 BWN 25165.

Findings of systemic failings

57 The failure to vet Peter Bone amounted to a systemic failing by the Belfast Welfare Authority.

58 The failure of BM 1 to report the abuse of HIA 532 by Bone to his seniors.

59 In relation to the allegations made against Elder by HIA 532 to BM 3.

- BM 3 did not make a written record of the allegations, or of Elder's response.
- BM 3 did not investigate the allegation about the photographs made by HIA 532 against Elder by asking to see them as he should have done.
- BM 3 did not report the matter to his superiors as he ought to have done.

60 A number of boys were subjected to sexual abuse by staff members.

61 The Welfare Committee neglected its statutory duty to visit the home.

62 The failure by SWAG to carry out inspections.

Chapter 23:

Module 5 – Fort James Children's Home and Harberton House Assessment Centre

Introduction

1 The Inquiry devoted Module 5 to the examination of particular aspects of the operation of two children's homes in Londonderry: Fort James and Harberton House. Both these homes were managed by the Western Health and Social Services Board (WHSSB), now succeeded by the Western Health and Social Care Trust (WHSCT). Our focused consideration of these homes was prompted by evidence we received from former residents and by police material about investigations they carried out in relation to the homes.

2 Two former residents of Fort James, HIA 108 and HIA 60, and one former resident of Harberton House, HIA 233, raised issues about the care they received in these homes as part of the evidence they gave during Module 1 of the Inquiry, which considered children's homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry.

3 The material we received from the police concerned their investigations into an allegation that FJ 5, the officer in charge of Fort James from September 1980 to August 1983, sexually abused a male resident in the home and into incidents of peer sexual abuse in Harberton House in 1989-1990, 1992 and 1994.

4 The Inquiry devoted eight sitting days spread over two weeks to this module, commencing on 8 June 2015 and finishing on 18 June 2015. HIA 108's evidence about her time in Fort James in 1980 and HIA 233's evidence about her time in Harberton House in 1991-1992, and responses to their evidence, were heard in Module 1. Therefore, HIA 108 and HIA 233 were not required to go through the pressure of giving evidence in person again in Module 5. Transcripts of relevant parts of the evidence they gave in person in Module 1, and responses to it, were considered during Module 5. HIA 60's evidence about his time in Fort James in 1980-1981 was not heard when he gave evidence in person in Module 1 and therefore he did attend and gave evidence during Module 5.

5 In addition to the evidence from these former residents, we heard evidence from staff who worked in the homes, HH 5, FJ 33, HH 22 and FJ 7, and from senior managers responsible for the operation of the homes, Dominic Burke and Gabriel Carey. Dr Kevin McCoy, Denis O'Brien and Marion Reynolds gave evidence about the inspection and regulation of the homes and Dr Hilary Harrison gave evidence on behalf of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS).[1]

1 FJH 60077-60081.

6 We also considered written statements from previous senior WHSSB managers such as Thomas Frawley, who was the Area General Manager of the WHSSB from 1984 to 1995[2], and from the current Director of Women and Children's Services and Executive Director of Social Work of the WHSCT, Kieran Downey.[3]

7 We are grateful for all the evidence we received, which assisted our understanding of the development and operation of these homes within the wider childcare services provided by the WHSSB.

2 FJH 599-770.
3 FJH 771-791 and 838 -859.

Part One:

Fort James Children's Home

8 Fort James children's home opened in 1973 and accommodated children from the Londonderry, Limavady and Strabane district (later Unit), until it closed on 31 March 1995. The home was originally built as a private residence in 1862, and was set in wooded grounds in Ardmore Road around three miles from the centre of Londonderry. It was a three-storey property with additional outbuildings at the rear. When it opened in 1973 it was located between two Housing Executive estates, Tullyally and Currynierin.

9 The Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) explained in its submission to the Inquiry that only limited records are available in relation to the early years of operation of Fort James. The available records show that the majority of children accommodated in the home between 1973 and 1978 were babies and young children up to the age of five, although one or two older teenagers were also accommodated in the home during this period. Initially the senior staff member of the home was called matron and the other staff were called nursery nurses.

10 HH 22 commenced work in Fort James in 1975 and by that time the title houseparent was being used for staff. HH 22 was appointed to the post of senior house parent. She told us that when she commenced work in the home there was a nursery on the ground floor with cots for three babies and that the oldest resident was seventeen-years-old. She explained that the staff received little information about the circumstances that led to children being admitted to the home and that although the practical needs of the children were met there was little therapy or care planning provided. She commented, "it was all about group living, with little opportunity for individual time, because of the small staff team and wide age range", and that it was "very difficult to observe or monitor the children's whereabouts both in the badly laid out house and the large grounds".[4]

11 The HSCB informed us that in and around 1978 the nursery in the home was closed and the intention was to develop a home for older children. When Harberton House opened in 1980, Fort James' remit was confirmed as being specifically to provide medium or long-term care for sixteen children, aged between five and seventeen years. The stated aim of the home was to assist children to return to their parents, prepare for a foster placement, or prepare for independent living in the community.

4 FJH 40182.

12 Given the focused nature of our consideration of Fort James it would not be appropriate to consider the governance, funding and operational arrangements in detail. However, it was clear from the evidence of previous staff and managers of Fort James and contemporaneous documentation that the home faced significant challenges in meeting its stated remit. This was, due in the main, to the number of emergency placements it had to accommodate, which included the placement of younger children with a range of needs. Emergency placements also led at times to a high throughput of children in the home, which hampered the provision of the consistency and stability required for medium to long-term care of older children. The home also had to deal with periods of over-occupancy and staff shortages.

13 The impact these circumstances had on the care that could be provided in the home and the pressures on staff were clearly and consistently identified through internal monitoring and external inspection of Fort James. To set the context for our consideration of the home we will briefly note these circumstances as they were identified through contemporaneous monitoring processes.

Arrangements for Internal Monitoring and External Inspection of Fort James 14 In accordance with the Conduct of Children's Homes Direction (Northern Ireland) 1975 the WHSSB had a duty to ensure that each of its children's homes was conducted in such a manner and on such principles as would further the wellbeing of children in the home. The WHSSB put arrangements in place for the regular monitoring of Fort James and invested significant resources in this monitoring throughout the 1980s and up until the home closed in 1995.

15 Part of the monitoring arrangements was the provision of a monthly report on the home by a visiting social worker. This duty was allocated to a senior member of social work staff, TL 4, first in his role as Senior Social Worker (Residential and Day Care) and then in his subsequent role as Assistant Principal Social Worker (Child Care). TL 4 visited Fort James regularly and submitted a monthly written report on the home to his managers using a standard format to record his observations and conclusions.[5]

5 FJH 6812.

16 In addition, from 1988 onwards, managers senior to TL 4, Gabriel Carey and then Robert Dunseath, undertook management audit visits to the home approximately every six months. Both these senior managers produced detailed reports of their audit visits to Fort James[6] which they provided to their management colleagues.

17 Directors of Social Services also occasionally visited the home and contemporaneous documentation shows that they tended to follow up these visits with memos to senior colleagues about any matters of concern.

18 In addition to monitoring by managers, a member of the WHSSB's Personal Social Services Committee visited the home on a regular basis and completed a brief proforma recording his/her findings, which were then reported to the Committee.

19 The Department of Health and Social Services (the Department) was responsible for the external scrutiny of the home. Records of this external scrutiny are not available for the period 1973 to 1982, but inspections of the home were undertaken by the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) in 1982 and 1986, and by the Social Services Inspectorate (SSI) in 1987, 1991 and 1994.

Challenges Fort James Faced in Meeting its Remit

20 In spring 1981 the then Director of Social Services, Ronnie Carroll, inspected Fort James to examine the professional functioning within the home. In a memo he sent to Tom Haverty, the then District Social Services Officer, about his visit he acknowledged the aspiration of the staff that the home should concentrate on offering care for periods ranging from six months to three years for older children. However, he pointed out that the wide variation in the ages of children admitted to the home and in the lengths of their stays affected the programmes of care that could be planned and put into operation. He recognised that the shift to caring for older children for longer periods would require an increase in emergency fostering and the number of long-term foster placements. Mr Carroll asked Mr Haverty to undertake a review of fostering resources to ascertain how many foster parents would be willing to accept shorter placements and emergency placements, particularly for pre-school children.[7]

6 FJH 6751.
7 FJH 6555.

21 Despite this intervention, the SWAG team that inspected Fort James in 1982 concluded that the home's aims and objectives to provide medium to long-term care for older children were being undermined by the need to accept emergency admissions. Inspectors found that between January 1981 and September 1982 a total of 34 children were admitted to Fort James. Twenty of these admissions were unplanned and arranged at short notice and ten of the eighteen admissions received between January and September 1982 were emergencies. The inspectors recorded the view of the officer-in-charge, which echoed that of Mr Carroll, that unplanned admissions and uncertainty about the duration of placements in the home was making it difficult to implement planned programmes of care for individual children. The inspectors recommended that the frequent use of the home for emergency admissions was reviewed urgently.[8]

22 Staff shortages were also a problem at times in Fort James. The monitoring of the home by members of the WHSSB's Personal Social Services Committee and the reporting on this monitoring to the Committee meant that this difficulty was known at the highest level of internal governance. For example, Mr P D McAleer recorded in the report of his visit to Fort James on 4 December 1982 that "there continues to be a severe shortage of staff".[9]

23 To further the remit of caring for older children, the accommodation in Fort James was renovated in late 1984 to provide self-contained flats on the site which were used to assist young people to prepare for leaving care. The addition of these flats increased the total capacity of the home to twenty-one.[10] When the home was inspected in 1982 inspectors recorded that the major problem was shortage of staff rather than the use of the home for emergency placements. By the time of the follow-up visit to the inspection which took place in October 1984 the inspector recorded that the staffing establishment had been increased by two senior house parents and two house parents and the number of emergency placements had reduced.[11] However, FJ 33 who was appointed as officer in charge of Fort James in May 1984 told us that during his period as officer in charge the home continued to have to accept a range of emergency and short-term assessment placements. He recalled that staff had to work with children who ranged in age from five to eighteen years, who had a variety

8 FJH 6619.
9 FJH 6561.
10 FJH 40908.
11 FJH 5263-5264.

of care needs, including some learning disabilities, and that the lengths of their stays varied from short to medium to long-term. He explained that this complex mix of children made it very difficult to meet their needs.[12]

24 Throughout the 1980s and into the 1990s these difficulties persisted and were recognised and recorded by senior managers who visited the home regularly. For example, Robert Dunseath, Principal Social Worker (Child Care) recorded in his monitoring report of the home for the period April 1989 to March 1990, that twelve of the total of fifteen admissions in that period had been directly from the community and were due to the lack of available alternative placements. He recorded that three children in the home were aged between five and nine years and four children were aged between ten and fourteen years. He observed that this position reflected the overall increase in the number of admissions of children to care in the area and concluded that if the level of demand for care was sustained there could be implications for the role and function of Fort James.[13]

25 A similar state of affairs was recorded in the 1991-1992 monitoring report, which identified that six of the eleven admissions in that period were emergency admissions direct from the community and that this reflected:

> "a trend identified in the last few monitoring reports of Fort James not meeting its core role as a long-stay unit being used for children moving from Harberton House".[14]

The report concluded that while the formal aims and objectives of Fort James remained unchanged, in practice it was being used predominately as an emergency reception centre rather than as a long-stay unit for adolescents preparing to leave care.[15] The impact on Harberton House of not being able to transfer children to Fort James will be considered later in this chapter.

26 Despite its continued inability to meet its stated remit, the home was further developed and restructured on the basis of that remit. By the time of the SSI inspection in 1994 the home had been divided into two units: an Adolescent Resource Team which was expected to provide a service from reception to long-stay care to address the assessed needs of twelve young people

12 Day 124, p.15.
13 FJH 6758-6794.
14 FJH 6966.
15 FJH 6966.

aged thirteen years and over; and, a Leaving and After Care Team which was expected to prepare four young people to leave care and to provide a supportive/crisis intervention service for those who had left care.[16]

27 However, the inspectors found that despite the redesign of the services being offered in Fort James the home was still not meeting its aim of caring only for children aged over thirteen years. Inspectors noted that eight of the 31 admissions made in the year prior to the inspection were of children aged less than eleven years. Inspectors also noted that in the previous year the home had to cope with a group of young people with very different needs, and that the throughput of children with 31 admissions and 37 discharges had created considerable disruption for the young people requiring long-term care.

28 The inspectors recorded that they had heard from staff and residents that there had been major control problems in the home during most of 1993. They suggested that one possible explanation for this unsettled and volatile situation could be the number of admissions and discharges and the resulting disruption this caused to the residential group.[17]

29 The inspectors also commented that the level of throughput and the practice of caring for adolescents on short-term and long-stay placements within one residential team, raised questions about how the "assessed needs of residents could realistically be addressed".[18] They noted that a proposal had been made by the team leader to use the bungalow in the site as a reception unit to separate the groups given their different needs, but that this plan had not been progressed because of cost implications.

30 The first recommendation in the report of the inspection was that the aims of Fort James should be reviewed and a statement of aims and objectives established that should inform decisions relating to admission and the admission process.[19] This recommendation was made in the knowledge that active consideration was being given to the closure of Fort James. Staff had informed the inspectors that the WHSSB, as part of its Purchasing Prospectus 1994/1995 – 1996/1997, intended to reduce its residential childcare places by fourteen beds over a three-year period and that the closure of Fort James, which would enable a reduction of sixteen beds, was being considered.

16 FJH 40261-2.
17 FJH 40283.
18 FJH 40262.
19 FJH 40299.

31 Given the obvious high level of demand for placements in Fort James, inspectors urged in the inspection report that any plan to close the home was based upon:

> "a comprehensive child care strategy;
>
> a detailed preventative strategy;
>
> a review of the number of beds required to support the Board's overall child care strategy;
>
> the development of a range of alternative placement options; and
>
> an assessment of the likely impact of closure on the remaining children's homes within the Board's area."[20]

32 The Department, appropriately in our view, followed up these concerns in writing to the WHSSB cautioning against closure of the home in the absence of any rapid development of fostering services, and pointing out the impact that closure could have on Harberton House.[21] Despite these concerns, the WHSSB continued with its plans and Fort James was closed on 31 March 1995.

33 We noted with concern that despite the high level of internal monitoring and external inspection of the home, recurring concerns about:

- the mix of children in Fort James in terms of age;
- needs and length of stay;
- over-occupancy;
- low staffing levels;
- the impact of emergency placements; and
- lack of fostering provision were never fully addressed or resolved. During our consideration of Fort James the question arose about whether this was in part due to a historical underfunding of the north west of the province, which meant the WHSSB could not provide the full range of foster and residential childcare increasingly required of it in the 1980s and early 1990s. We address that question more generally in the section about Finance in Volume 1.

34 We will now consider the evidence we received from applicant witnesses about Fort James and the police investigations into alleged sexual abuse by FJ 5, an officer in charge of the home.

20 FJH 40299.
21 FJH 40055.

Evidence of HIA 108 about her time in Fort James 35 HIA 108 was initially admitted to Harberton House on 11 October 1980 when she was eleven years old, as an emergency application under a place of safety order. A case conference was held on 24 October 1980 and it was agreed that Fort James would be a more suitable placement for her. She was admitted to Fort James from Harberton House on 3 November 1980 and discharged to her parents' care just under a month later on 1 December 1980.

36 In her written statement, HIA 108 described Fort James as badly run with an aggressive, noisy atmosphere.[22] When she gave evidence in person she described the home as chaotic and referred to the mixture of young and older children and the aggressive behaviour of the older boys.[23]

37 Her specific complaint about the home was that a priest, SND 67, who she alleged had previously sexually abused her in a parochial house in Strabane and in Termonbaca children's home in Londonderry, was allowed access to her in Fort James and continued to abuse her there. She told us that shortly after she arrived in Fort James SND 67 met her when she was out walking with a member of staff and other children from the home. She said the member of staff told her that SND 67 had been asking about her and commented that he was a lovely man. HIA 108 said that four or five days later SND 67 came to visit her in the home and she was taken to a small meeting room and left alone with him. She said that on that occasion he did not abuse her, but that on subsequent visits to the home he sexually abused her, including digitally penetrating her back passage and causing her to bleed.[24]

38 HIA 108 stated that when she tried to resist seeing SND 67 staff told her he was well-intentioned and that she was being disrespectful. She said that on one occasion when SND 67 visited she tried to physically resist being sent to meet with him and a member of staff, FJ 1, twisted her arm in order to make her do so. HIA 108 told us that SND 67 talked in a friendly manner to staff in Fort James, was given tea when he visited and prayed with some of the staff. She stated that the attitude of the staff towards SND 67 meant that he was able to continue to sexually abuse her two to three times a week while she was resident in Fort James.

22 FJH 030.
23 Day 12, p.63.
24 FJH 031.

39 HIA 108 said she told her key worker, SND 501, who was based in Harberton House that SND 67 had come to see her and that SND 501 had replied it was nice of a priest to call and see if she was okay. HIA 108 said she nodded as if she agreed with this view because "she did not feel the Welfare understood or cared about what was going on with her."[25]

40 The HSCB responded to HIA 108's evidence and confirmed that there is no record of HIA 108 informing her key worker about the alleged abuse.[26]

41 SND 67 gave evidence in person during Module 1 to respond to the allegations made about him by HIA 108. He stated that he had no connection to the area where Fort James was situated and would have had no reason to be walking in that area. He said he had no recollection of visiting Fort James in any capacity, and certainly not as described by HIA 108. He specifically stated that he did not visit the home eight to twelve times in a one-month period.[27]

42 FJ 7 worked in Fort James from 1975 to 1990, but was absent from the home undertaking the Certificate in Social Services Certificate when HIA 108 was resident in the home. She explained that visits would have been recorded in the home's diary.[28] However, as the diaries and log books maintained in Fort James prior to 1980 were not retained it was not possible for us to confirm, or otherwise, whether SND 67 visited the home. FJ 7 told us that during the time she worked in Fort James she could only remember one priest paying a one-off visit to the home to meet with a girl preparing for her confirmation and she confirmed that it was a local priest not SND 67 and that the girl was not HIA 108.[29]

43 We carefully considered the evidence that HIA 108 provided about her time in Fort James and we found no evidence of systemic failings in the care she received in the home.

Evidence of HIA 60 about his time in Fort James

44 HIA 60 gave evidence in Module 5, as his evidence about his time at Fort James was not heard when he appeared in person in Module 1. He confirmed that he stayed at Fort James from September 1980 until July

25 FJH 031.
26 FJH 825.
27 SND 14215.
28 Day 128, p.4.
29 Day 128, p.5.

1981 and that he was over seventeen years of age when he was admitted. Initially he shared a bedroom but half way through his stay he was moved to an independent flat on the third floor of the building to help him prepare for leaving care. He confirmed he took care of himself in the flat and prepared his own meals.

45 HIA 60 told us that a member of staff, SND 541, came into his room on a Sunday morning and made reference to him being a Jew. He said he responded by referring to her being married to an "orange bastard RUC man". He explained when he gave evidence that he was particularly upset by SND 541's comment because he considered it a slur on his father who had recently died. HIA 60 stated that on the following Wednesday, SND 541's husband, SND 542, arrived at the home, told him to come outside to have a chat, and then proceeded to punch him on the back of the head and face. He stated that three other members of the RUC were in a parked car in the grounds of the home. He described two of these men getting out of the car and running towards him while the third drove the car into the back of his legs so that he was thrown over the bonnet of the car. He told us that SND 542 and the two officers outside the car then proceeded to kick and punch him and that the beating only stopped because the husband of a member of staff SND 450 arrived to collect her from work and intervened on his behalf. HIA 60 said he was left with minor injuries consisting of cuts and bruises, and that he did not report the matter as he felt there was little point in reporting RUC officers to the RUC.[30]

46 In response to this allegation the HSCB explained that it had no record of a SND 541 working in Fort James, but that some former employees of the home remembered SND 449 working in the home. When FJ 7 gave evidence she confirmed that SND 449 worked in Fort James at the relevant time and that SND 449's husband, SND 448, was a police officer. She also confirmed that she saw no record in the log books of the events described by HIA 60 and that she would have expected such events to have been recorded.[31]

47 The HSCB also stated that it was unable to confirm that a member of staff called SND 450 was employed at the home at the time of the alleged incident, but there was a reference in a document[32] that in 1983, subsequent to the time that HIA 60 was resident in Fort James, a lady called

30 Day 126, p.17.
31 Day 128, p.20.
32 FJH 5338.

SND 450 was working in the home as a temporary house parent. However, in documentation provided to the Inquiry about Fort James, unrelated to HIA 60, we found references to a lady called SND 450 working as a key worker in Fort James between early 1980 and 1982.[33]

48 The HSCB pointed out that there are no entries in HIA 60's social work case records about the incidents described by him or any reference to the injuries he said he suffered.[34] HIA 60 explained when giving evidence that he had not told his social worker, SND 466, about the incident because he did not have a good relationship with him.[35]

49 HIA 60 also described an incident when he accepted money from a younger boy who was a resident in Fort James in the mistaken belief that the boy had received the money from his father, whereas he had actually stolen it from a car. HIA 60 said he was questioned by the police as a result of this incident and told he would be sent to St Patrick's Training School. He said he found out later that his social worker, SND 466, had made an application to the court for an order to send him to a training school but the Judge had rejected it.[36]

50 The HSCB told the Inquiry that it has no record of HIA 60 being interviewed by the police about missing money. It confirmed that consideration had been given to applying for a training school order for HIA 60 because of his disruptive behaviour in Fort James but it was decided it would be inappropriate to do so because HIA 60 was over seventeen years of age.[37]

51 Twelve days after his eighteenth birthday, HIA 60 was housed in a bungalow that had been allocated to him by the Housing Executive in response to an application for emergency housing which had been made on his behalf. He told us that when he returned to Fort James to collect his belongings a member of staff, FJ 7 told him through a locked office window that he was discharged from Fort James with immediate effect. He said all his personal belongings were put in two bin liners outside the front door as if they were rubbish and that he was not afforded the dignity of packing his own belongings.[38] The HSCB told us that it has no record of events

33 FJH 30996.
34 FJH 375.
35 pp. 20-21, Day 126, 15 June 2015.
36 FJH 377.
37 FJH 377.
38 FJH 020.

surrounding HIA 60's discharge from Fort James, but accepted that at that time it was not unusual for young people's belongings to be put into large plastic bags when they were moving into their own accommodation. The HSCB explained that this practice ended once residential homes were allocated petty cash, which enabled them to purchase holdalls for young people to use to transfer their belongings.[39]

52 We have carefully considered the evidence that HIA 60 provided about his time in Fort James, and it is clear from what he told us and our consideration of records provided by HSCB that it was an unsettled time for him and that his relationships with staff deteriorated while he was in the home. We consider it poor practice that HIA 60's belongings were packed into two bin liners but accept the HSCB's explanation for why that was the practice at that time. We did not find evidence of systemic failings in the care that HIA 60 received in Fort James.

Alleged Sexual Abuse by FJ 5

53 FJ 5 commenced employment as the officer in charge of Fort James on 2 September 1980, and remained in that post until 1 August 1983. On 7 October 1983 a former resident of Fort James, FJ 30 told his social worker FJ 41 that he had been sexually abused by FJ 5 while he was a resident in Fort James.[40] FJ 30 told FJ 41 that the sexual abuse started when he was on holiday with FJ 5 in Wales, continued following their return to Fort James and had only ended approximately a year before his disclosure to her. He explained that he had not told anyone about the abuse while he was resident in the home for fear of the outcome. He said he still felt confused and angry about what had happened but decided to tell her about it because he had recently viewed a documentary about venereal disease and was frightened he had contracted the disease from the sexual contact he had with FJ 5. FJ 41 explained to FJ 30 that she would have to inform her senior managers about what he had told her and also involve the police. FJ 30 accepted this.

54 FJ 41 reported the allegations to her senior managers and Mr Dunseath and Mr Victor Hutchinson, Assistant Principal Social Worker (Fieldwork) accompanied her on a further visit to FJ 30 at his flat on 12 October 1983[41] to gain more details about the alleged abuse. Following that meeting a case discussion was held on 18 October 1983 where it was decided to refer the matter to the police.[42]

39 FJH 378
40 FJH 30377-8.
41 FJH 627.

55 FJ 5 was living in Wales at this time and on 2 November 1983 he provided a statement, under caution, to police in Wales about the allegations made by FJ 30.[43] He explained that when he commenced work in Fort James a very aggressive and threatening group of teenagers were in residence, and that most of them were older and bigger than FJ 30. He described FJ 30 as having a very troubled background and that his response to the behaviour of the other residents was to isolate himself for protection. He explained that FJ 30 achieved some of this isolation through creating a garden and tending chickens and when he became aware that FJ 5 had some knowledge and experience about both these activities he frequently and persistently sought his advice and help.

56 FJ 5 also told police that FJ 30 had difficulty sleeping at night because of experiences he had as a young child, and that a pattern had emerged where he stayed up talking to the night worker and went for walks in the garden during the early morning. FJ 5 explained that he considered this behaviour should not be encouraged or allowed and therefore established an alternative bedtime routine for FJ 30 which included staff reading to him.

57 FJ 5 told the police that FJ 30 developed a dependency on him, would constantly seek him out even when he was off duty, and would become extremely abusive and aggressive if he was denied access to him. He stated to the police:

> "Due to the fact that there was a heavy burden in terms of time and effort needed for FJ 30 and the fact that there was a severe shortage of senior staff available my contact with FJ 30 and the implementation of his programme increased to the extent that the vast majority of the work became mine. This resulted in me becoming exhausted and over-important in his life".[44]

58 FJ 5 admitted to the alleged offences and said they occurred during the peak of a period when he had been working an excessive amount of overtime, which he described as working 24 hours a day seven days a week. He said the offending behaviour occurred on three or four

42 FJH 631.
43 FJH 30381.
44 FJH 30385.

occasions, that it involved mutual masturbation on one occasion and on the other occasion he masturbated FJ 30. He said that FJ 30 anally penetrated him on two occasions but that he never anally penetrated FJ 30. FJ 5 indicated that these offences occurred in FJ 30's bedroom in Fort James.[45] FJ 5 told the police he regretted deeply what had occurred and had made every attempt to do what was in FJ 30's best interest before and since. FJ 5's account was different from the account FJ 30 gave to police in Londonderry, where he stated that FJ 5 had anally penetrated him and that some of the sexual abuse occurred when he was on holiday with FJ 5 in Wales.[46]

59 The WHSSB established a review group, chaired by Mr Haverty, District Social Services Officer, to consider the circumstances surrounding FJ 5's alleged abuse of FJ 30 and to look at the detail of FJ 30's period in care.[47] As part of this review, an interview was carried out with FJ 7 who had been appointed acting officer in charge of the home on 7 December 1983.[48] FJ 7 explained that she had been completing her studies to attain the Certificate in Social Services for some of the period in which FJ 5 had been the officer in charge but had helped out in the home during her studies. She said that the home was understaffed, staff were under a great deal of pressure and that FJ 5 in particular was very tired and had fainted on a couple of occasions in the home.[49] She was anxious to point out that during the period FJ 5 was officer in charge of the home he initiated positive developments, such as the introduction of the key worker system and greater contact between the home's staff and social workers and foster parents.

60 Another member of staff, Eileen Wiley, was interviewed and she described the staffing situation when she started working in Fort James in February 1982 as "chronic". She said that FJ 5 was exhausted and at times he was also sick.[50]

61 Anne McDermot, who had commenced work in Fort James in September 1982, was interviewed[51] and commented on the lack of staff in the home, the negative effect this had on staff and on the children who she felt did not get sufficient personal attention.

45 FJH 30385.
46 FJH 30360-30366.
47 FJH 30990.
48 FJH 30990-3.
49 FJH 30991.
50 FJH 30994.
51 FJH 30995-6.

62 FJ 40, who had been FJ 30's key worker from early 1980 to April 1982 was interviewed[52] and also commented on the low staffing levels in the home between 1979 and 1982 and how at times it had meant there was only one member of care staff and one member of management staff on duty. She confirmed that staff were under considerable pressure and that FJ 5 did a great deal of overtime. She said that FJ 5 was always caring toward the children and that she received good support and supervision from him, including assistance with any problems she experienced in working with FJ 30.

63 In relation to FJ 30's absences from the home she recalled that he went on holiday with FJ 5 in March 1981 to Wales and that she thought they stayed at the house of a friend of FJ 5. She explained that prior to this trip FJ 30 shared a room with another boy, but following the trip the other boy moved out of the room and FJ 30 was left alone in the room. She stated that she believed FJ 30 was allowed to have sole occupancy of the room for professional reasons as he continued to be very deprived, demanded a great deal of attention and staff were still reading to him in bed.

64 She explained that in July 1981 FJ 5 took a group of five children on holiday to Wales and that initially he was not going to allow FJ 30 to go on the trip because of his poor behaviour, but that his behaviour improved and he was eventually allowed to go. She recalled two further trips when FJ 5 took FJ 30 on trips outside of Northern Ireland, but indicated that both trips had been agreed in advance with FJ 30's social worker, FJ 41. The first trip was in May 1981 when FJ 5 took FJ 30 to London for an interview at the community service volunteers' office. FJ 40 said that FJ 41 was heavily involved in arranging this trip and had agreed that it was more appropriate for FJ 5 rather than her to accompany FJ 30 to the interview. FJ 40 explained that FJ 5 and FJ 30 were away for a few days and she understood that after the interview they went to Wales for a couple of days. The second trip was when FJ 30 visited FJ 5 in Wales in February 1982. FJ 40 explained that this trip was arranged because FJ 5 was going on an extended trip to Thailand and FJ 30 was very upset at the idea of FJ 5 being away from Fort James for so long. FJ 40 indicated that these trips would have been mentioned at reviews and recorded in the log book.

52 FJH 30996-8.

65 In a memo dated 27 April 1984 Mr Haverty recorded notes about the conclusions of his review[53] in which he acknowledged the adverse impact that understaffing in the home, and particularly lack of senior staff, had during the relevant period. He recommended the establishment of a system to enable the senior staff in the home to meet on a regular basis at least once a week to examine care practices in the home, and to identify and modify strategies for the care of children in the home. Mr Haverty also pointed out that it was evident that staff had not been receiving supervision regularly enough and, while he expected this to improve given increased staffing levels in the home, it would be necessary to monitor on a regular basis the level of, and effectiveness of supervision of, staff in the home.

66 He also concluded that there was a need for greater clarity about roles and responsibilities in the home, including the responsibility of district staff and those involved in quality assuring the home. In particular, he stated that district staff should be informed about changes in the systems for management of the home.

67 We noted with interest Mr Haverty's suggestion that consideration should be given to permission for children leaving the home to be further delegated to the officer in charge.[54] We considered this a surprising recommendation given that FJ 5 was the officer in charge when he was taking FJ 30 on holidays outside Northern Ireland.

68 In a memo dated 17 April 1984, Mr Carroll, the then Director of Social Services wrote to Mr Haverty to comment on the notes Mr Haverty made during the review that had been shared with Mr Carroll. In particular, he referred to the note of the interview with FJ 40 in which she was recorded as saying that she was concerned about FJ 30, and phoned him in Wales to see if he was all right because other children in the home were calling FJ 5 "a big queer". Mr Carroll queried why FJ 40 did not see fit to report her concerns to more senior management.[55]

69 FJ 5 was charged with buggery and aiding and abetting buggery contrary to Section 61 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, as amended by the Homosexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 1982. His case

53 FJH 30986-7.
54 FJH 30987.
55 FJH 30983.

was heard from 11 September to 20 September 1984 in Londonderry.[56] Following the presentation of the prosecution's case the trial judge gave a direction to the jury on 20 September 1984 that the verdict should be "not guilty" on every count. The Derry Journal reported that the complainant had asked the jury to disregard his evidence given under oath in the witness box and instead refer to his statements made to the police about nine months previously and that the trial judge had stated that under these circumstances he had no alternative but to ask the jury to record a verdict of "not guilty".[57]

70 FJ 33 was the officer in charge of Fort James at the time of the court case. He told us that staff were positive about FJ 5 and felt he had improved the practice in the home and promoted a more child-focused approach. He said they were shocked about the allegations made against FJ 5 and when the case collapsed they were left confused and wondering whether the alleged abuse had happened.[58]

Conclusions about Fort James

71 Throughout the majority of time that Fort James operated it could not meet its agreed remit because of the impact of emergency placements, over-occupancy and the mix of children in relation to age, need and capabilities. We recognise that some of these circumstances were created by unforeseen factors that could not have been anticipated in strategic planning such as the discovery of a network of sexual abusers in Derry which made a number of emergency placements necessary. We also accept the point made by the HSCB through the Warning Letter process that finding suitable foster parents particularly for older children and children with sexualised behaviour was a difficult task and that the Foster Care Unit made significant efforts, particularly post January 1990, to develop fostering resources. We also noted the efforts made, for example in 1983/84 to increase the staffing levels in the home and reduce the number of emergency placements. Nevertheless, staff, senior managers, members of the Board who visited the home and inspectors consistently raised concerns about the impact emergency placements, over-occupancy and the mix of children in relation to age, need and capabilities were having on the quality of care provided to the children in the home. We consider the WHSSB's failure to effectively

56 The Chairman of the Inquiry withdrew from discussion of this case as he appeared as counsel in the court case.
57 Derry Journal 21 September 1984.
58 Day 124, p.10, 10 June 2015.

address these issues, which were clearly having an adverse effect on the appropriateness and level of care that could be given to children in the home, amounted to a systemic failure to ensure that Fort James provided proper care.

72 Despite the high level of monitoring of the home, staff and in particular the officer in charge were allowed to work excessive overtime for extended periods. We consider that the implications of such work patterns for the quality of care that can be provided to children should have been understood and addressed by senior managers. FJ 7 and FJ 33 told us that FJ 5 recorded the levels of staff overtime and made the case for additional staff. We noted that in a memo dated 20 August 1981 from FJ 5 to Tom Haverty, he stated he was stressing a point he had made before:

> "…that Fort James is severely understaffed. The type of therapeutic approach we are attempting to take could be a futile exercise; lack of staff time may sabotage the very great effort made by the team".[59]

We consider the WHSSB's failure to address the excessive overtime worked by staff, in particular by the officer in charge, and the implications such work patterns had for the quality and safety of the care provided to children in the home, amounted to a systemic failing to ensure Fort James provided proper care.

73 We consider that the WHSSB acted appropriately in referring the allegations about FJ 5 to the police, reviewing the circumstances surrounding the period that FJ 5 was officer in charge of the home and identifying action to improve practices within the home and the management and monitoring of the home by district staff.

74 We noted that when FJ 30 was interviewed by senior managers following his disclosure to FJ 41 he told them that his close relationship with FJ 5 was noticed by staff and other children and led to him being ostracised.[60] He also said that the other children implied FJ 5 was "queer" or gay and called him "fanny" and that they also referred to FJ 30 as gay because of his openly close relationship with FJ 5.[61] When FJ 40 was interviewed by senior managers she told them she heard children talking in this way about FJ 5 and as referred to above she was sufficiently concerned about FJ 30's wellbeing to telephone him when he was in Wales with FJ 5 to check that he was all right.

59 FJH 6558.
60 FJH 627.
61 FJH 627.

The HSCB pointed out through the Warning Letter process that in the context of a residential home setting it was inevitable that children would on occasion refer to a staff member in derogatory terms which would be difficult to control in any setting involving a number of children. We accept that may be the case but consider that the children's references to FJ 5's close relationship with FJ 30 and their related inferences about FJ 30's sexual orientation should have caused concern and been addressed by staff.

75 We found no evidence that any staff member raised the appropriateness of FJ 5's relationship with FJ 30 and the other children's perception of it with FJ 5 or referred any concerns about these matters to senior managers. We consider this lack of action by staff to be a systemic failure to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

76 We also found no evidence of senior managers questioning why the officer in charge was playing such a central role in the care of one resident, including taking him on trips outside Northern Ireland on a number of occasions. Setting aside any suggestion of a sexual relationship, we consider that senior managers who were in regular contact with FJ 5 as the officer in charge should have questioned the implications of his very close relationship with one child, not only for that child but also for the management of the home and the other children and staff's perceptions of him as the officer in charge. We found no evidence that this happened and we consider the effectiveness of the considerable monitoring of the home by district staff has to be questioned if relevant matters about the practice of the officer in charge were not identified, or if identified, were not addressed.

Summary of Findings about Fort James

77 We found that the WHSSB's failure to:

(1) effectively address strategic issues in relation to the provision of residential childcare and lack of foster care, which were clearly having an adverse effect on the appropriateness and level of care that could be given to children in Fort James; (Para. 71)

(2) address the excessive overtime worked by staff, in particular FJ 5 the officer in charge, and the implications such work patterns would have for the quality and safety of the care provided to children in Fort James; (Para. 72) and

(3) question the appropriateness of FJ 5's close relationship with FJ 30 and respond seriously to comments from children in the home about that relationship and about FJ 5 and FJ 30's sexuality, (Para 75)

all amount to systemic failings by it to ensure Fort James provided proper care.

Part Two:

Harberton House

78 As we explained at the start of this chapter, we decided to have a focused consideration of Harberton House because of incidents of peer sexual abuse that took place there and the evidence provided by HIA 233 about her time in the home. Before turning to these matters it is relevant to consider first the establishment and remit of Harberton House and the context in which it was operating when the peer sexual abuse occurred.

79 Harberton House was a purpose-built residential unit with a capacity for 25 children. It was opened on 8 September 1980 and the first children were admitted on 19 September 1980. The home was designed to provide a short-stay period of planned assessment for children in order to identify their care needs and develop plans to meet them. The home was also expected to provide emergency placements for children. Although the home was based in, and managed by, the Londonderry, Limavady and Strabane district, its facilities were available for use by Omagh and Fermanagh districts.

80 HH 22, the first deputy officer in charge of Harberton House, referred in her written statement and oral evidence to the planning of Harberton House and preparations for its opening, and commented that it was seen as an exciting initiative and one she wanted to be part of from the start.[62]

81 As Harberton House was planned as a short-stay assessment unit the procedures developed for its operation focused on making sure a period of assessment was necessary and appropriate for a child and that the fullest use was made of the time-limited period children were expected to spend in the home.

82 A Core Evaluation Team was established to meet weekly to:

(1) consider applications for assessments of children;

(2) discuss any relevant matters pertaining to the children in the home; and,

(3) discuss the assessment of each child's needs and agree plans for their future care.

62 FJH 40182.

83 The Core Evaluation Team was chaired by HH 40, the Senior Social Worker, Residential Child Care. Initially, the other members were Dominic Burke, then Principal Social Worker (Fieldwork) or Mr Hutchinson, Assistant Principal Social Worker, (Fieldwork); HH 5, officer in charge of the home, and his deputy HH 22, Dr Munroe, Medical Officer and one of a team of educational psychologists. Mr Newman, Assistant Director of Social Services, was also recorded as attending meetings of the team.[63]

84 Social workers who wanted to refer children for assessment were expected to attend a meeting of the Core Evaluation Team to present and discuss their referral. Once a child was accepted for assessment a member of residential staff in Harberton House was appointed as key worker. The key worker liaised with the field worker and met with the child and his/her family to help them understand and prepare for the assessment process. The involvement of the child's family was seen as key to the assessment approach, and they were expected to attend weekly meetings at the home, which the child's field social worker was also expected to attend.

Review of the First Six Months of Operation of Harberton House

85 Although the plans and procedures for the home were designed on the basis that it would operate primarily as an assessment centre it became clear only six months after it opened that it was mainly being used for emergency placements. HH 40, the first chair of the Core Evaluation Team, undertook a review covering the first six months of the operation of the home, from 19 September 1980 to 28 February 1981. In the report of his review[64] he recorded that in the first six-month period 62 children were admitted to the home, but only ten of these children were admitted for assessment on a planned basis following approval of an application for assessment by the Core Evaluation Team. The other 52 children were admitted on an emergency basis, without referral to the Core Evaluation Team. HH 40 noted that although some of these admissions were a result of an unexpected crisis in a child's life that necessitated immediate action, others were required because appropriate alternative placements could not be secured for children whose circumstances and needs were known.

63 FJH 20928.
64 FJH 20925-33.

86 Ten of the 52 children admitted as emergency placements remained in the home to be assessed, while the remaining 42 children were held without being assessed until alternative placements were obtained for them. Although the procedures agreed for Harberton House were based on children admitted on an emergency basis staying no longer than one week, the average length of stay of these 42 children was three and a half weeks, and the length of stay ranged from one day to twelve and a half weeks. The 42 children ranged in age from young babies to adolescents, and HH 40 recorded that the three cots for young babies were mostly in use over the six month period.

87 On the basis of these figures, HH 40 concluded in his report:

> "Before concentrating on the functioning of Harberton House as an Assessment Centre, it is necessary to recognise that in practice it has a dual function. It is a reception unit as well as an assessment unit, and in fact it is clear from the figures that in practical terms its primary function of assessment has been dwarfed by its role as a reception unit over this six month period."[65]

88 HH 40 identified that the demand on Harberton House to accept emergency admissions had been increased by changes to other children's homes in the area: by St Joseph's Termonbacca closing its nursery; and by Fort James working to change from a children's home to a medium to long-stay treatment unit for adolescents. He also identified that the large number of children being received into care could not be accommodated by already limited foster care provision, and that there was a gap in the present provision for young babies, children and adolescents who because of their religious denomination could not be placed in voluntary homes run by Catholic orders.[66]

89 HH 40 recommended that fostering provision should be extended and that the staffing levels in Harberton House should be reviewed, given the increased workload on staff dealing with emergency admissions, many of which involved babies or pre-school children whose care was resource intensive. He also noted that the demands of providing care to children on emergency placements meant that staff time was directed toward the care of these children, rather than planned work with the children who had been referred specifically to Harberton House for assessment.[67]

65 FJH 20926.
66 FJH 20926.
67 FJH 20932.

90 HH 40 also acknowledged that, as well as practical difficulties in the first six months of the home's operation, questions of principle had been raised by fieldwork staff and members of the Core Evaluation Team about whether the planned focus on assessment was appropriate. He noted that it had been suggested that procedures should be revised to allow the home to act as a treatment resource as well as an assessment centre.[68]

Formal Review of Harberton House in 1984

91 Although the barriers to Harberton House fulfilling its planned remit as an assessment centre were identified and analysed as early as six months into its operation, it took until 1984 for a more formal review of its function and operation to be carried out. We noted the remit of the working party established to review the home at that time and its conclusion from the references to them in the report of the SWAG's inspection of the home in 1986.[69] We asked the HSCB for a copy of the working party's report but it informed us that it was unable to locate a copy.

92 The remit of the working party as detailed in the SWAG report was:

> "(i) to review the functioning of Harberton House;
>
> (ii) to examine the most appropriate structure to carry out this revised function according to changing need; and
>
> (iii) to devise an appropriate operational plan for this structure."[70]

93 The SWAG inspectors recorded that the working party published its report in December 1984, and proposed that:

> "formal recognition should be given to the evolutionary changes which have occurred in order to meet the needs of children being admitted to Harberton House ie that the unit should be formally divided into:-
>
> (a) a reception/assessment unit with 13 beds; and
>
> (b) a medium stay unit with 12 beds."[71]

94 Although these changes were agreed and implemented on 1 October 1986, following necessary renovations to the property to create two separate units, the throughput of children in the home continued to be a problem. The quality assurance arrangements for the home meant that it was a problem that was recognised at all levels within the WHSSB.

68 FJH 20931.
69 FJH 15429-15465.
70 FJH 15432.
71 FJH 15433.

Governance and Quality Assurance Arrangements

95 The governance and quality assurance arrangements for Harberton House were similar to those that operated in Fort James. TL 4 Senior Social Worker (Residential Child Care) undertook the responsibilities of the visiting social worker in accordance with the Conduct of Children's Homes Directive (Northern Ireland) 1975. TL 4 visited the home on a regular basis, usually seven or eight times in a month and completed a standard monitoring report, which covered occupancy levels, the gender and age range of residents, the quality of primary care and emotional care provided, the maintenance of records, untoward incidents, level of contact between residents and their field social workers and the physical condition of the building. Gabriel Carey undertook audit visits to the home approximately every six months and produced detailed reports of his visits which he sent to the Principal Social Worker (Residential and Day Care), the Director of Social Services and the Assistant Director of Social Services.[72]

96 The reporting of the audit visits was an important means of ensuring that the strategic direction of the home and the challenges it faced continued to be kept on the agenda of senior managers. Although the Core Evaluation Team continued to meet, its focus was on the immediate situations of the children in the home rather than any oversight of how well Harberton House was able to meet its agreed revised remit or related resource issues.[73]

97 In addition to monitoring by senior managers, a member of the WHSSB's Personal Social Services Committee visited the home on a regular basis and completed a proforma report which was shared with members of the committee and senior staff.

98 The continuing problems that Harberton House faced in moving children on to more appropriate and more permanent placements were highlighted through these quality assurance processes. For example, in the report of his visit to the home on 12 September 1989, Mr Carey commented in relation to admissions and discharges to the home:

> "HH 5 again emphasised the need to get some movement, not least to enable staff to concentrate on work they should be doing with children. Prolonged admissions quite often create difficulty when children become somewhat frustrated about the lack of placement opportunities for them and perhaps a sense of hopelessness about their situation sets in. This inevitably results in behavioural and disciplinary problems."[74]

72 FJH 782.
73 FJH 11863-12542.

99 He also recorded that HH 5 had pointed out that retaining children while more permanent placements were sought meant the ability to accept new admissions was severely reduced, and that in comparison to 1981, when 121 new admissions were accepted, only 49 admissions had been possible in 1989.[75]

100 The issue of lack of throughput of children was also raised with Ms Imelda McGowan, the member of the Personal Social Services Committee who visited the home on a regular basis, when she visited on 22 September 1989. She recorded in her report of that visit:

> "Staff were anxious to develop their family work and move towards use of the Unit for other than residential care. However, shortage of foster parents and places in longer stay Units mean that children who are ready to move on cannot do so. Therefore staff are tied up with the day to day caring role."[76]

As a result of Ms McGowan's comments Mr Haverty, whose title was then Assistant Director of Social Services, wrote to Mr Carey asking for an update in the provision of foster care.[77]

101 Mr Carey responded that he and his colleagues were alert to the difficulties created by the lack of foster care provision, and were aware that at any one time 30 children were waiting for suitable placements. He confirmed that he had a number of discussions with HH 5 about the impact this had on Harberton House. He referred to a sub-group which had been established to consider how £59,000 of funding available for specialist fostering should best be used and that he had made a bid for childcare development funds to appoint an additional home finding post in the fostering team.[78]

102 The demand for residential places continued to grow, and Mr Carey wrote to Mr Haverty on 15 February 1990 about the pressures on field and residential services because of the number of children requiring care. He informed him that from 19 January 1990 to 15 February 1990, 28

74 FJH 40020.
75 FJH 40020.
76 FJH 15344.
77 FJH 15346.
78 FJH 15345.

children had been received into care and ten further children were awaiting admission. He explained that the majority of children in care had been admitted due to neglect, physical abuse, or the inability of parents to provide proper care and not sexual abuse, but pointed out that this did not mean that in relation to these children "disclosure of sexual abuse will not become an issue at a later stage".[79] He reported that the officers in charge of the children's homes had pointed out that because the homes were having to accommodate increasing numbers of children over their approved occupancy rates, staff were not able to give children individual attention, and care had become a holding process. He also reported that the officers in charge had told him that the number of children being admitted to the homes, and the level of disturbance of some of the children, created increased risks to children and staff because it made supervision difficult.[80]

103 The lack of foster placements also continued to be a problem to the extent that HH 42, Senior Social Worker Foster Care, wrote to Mr Carey on 7 March 1990 about the 'Crisis Situation in Foster Care' pointing out that 59 children were waiting for long-term foster placements, eleven of whom were resident in Harberton, and asking for two additional social worker posts to help resolve the crisis.[81]

104 In order to manage the demand for residential care and the placement of children, Mr Carey convened and chaired regular meetings of TL 4, HH 40 and the managers of Harberton House, Fort James and the fostering team to discuss the overall demand for residential care (which often exceeded available places) and to agree what action was necessary. Such a meeting was held on 8 March 1990, the day after the memo referred to above about lack of fostering placements was sent to Mr Carey. Mr Carey chaired the meeting which had to consider how to accommodate four children, all of whom were under six years of age, who required urgent residential care. As no fostering resources were available in the immediate area, the possibility of using fostering resources in Fermanagh was being explored but the meeting concluded that if that proved unsuccessful, the only option was to open the staff bungalow in Harberton House and use it to accommodate the children.[82] This ultimately proved necessary and

79 FJH 15516.
80 FJH 15516.
81 FJH 15493.
82 FJH 15495.

the next day, 9 March 1990, the bungalow was opened to accommodate these children.

105 As well as the challenges created by the number of children requiring care and the barriers to moving children on from Harberton House to appropriate placements, senior managers were also aware of the increasingly complex nature of the difficulties some of the children had experienced and were responding to. For example, in the report of his audit visit to Harberton House in January 1989 Mr Carey observed:

> "the fact that there are increasing numbers of disturbed children being admitted to the unit some of whom have been sexually abused with all the risks that poses such as sexual precociousness does not appear to have adversely effected the determination of the staff to do a good job. .....However, overall whilst I am satisfied with the standard of care at the present time, I believe that the quality of care provided will be severely tested because of the increasing number of children with very complex personal and family problems that are being admitted to care."[83]

106 The reality of the risks created by the number and range of children placed in Harberton House, the complexity of their needs and the lack of more appropriate alternative placements for some of the children came sharply to the fore when it was identified that co-ordinated peer sexual abuse was taking place in the home.

Peer Sexual Abuse

107 We noted from contemporaneous records that staff in Harberton House were dealing with incidents of peer sexual abuse from as early as 1981. At that time a boy who had been admitted to the home from Termonbacca was being closely supervised because of his sexual interest in and behaviour towards younger boys. In June 1981, the boy, then aged fifteen, admitted to HH 5 who was discussing his general behaviour with him that he had engaged in mutual masturbation on a number of occasions with two younger boys aged nine and eleven years.[84] Staff dealt with this matter through what HH 5 described as "an intensive level of supervision".[85] The boy was also referred to a consultant psychiatrist

83 FJH 20106.
84 FJH 50724.
85 FJH 50725.

in Gransha psychiatric hospital and the psycho-sexual clinic in Belfast City hospital and a clinical psychologist worked with him a number of times in the home.

108 We are aware that further incidents of peer sexual abuse came to the attention of staff in July 1988, when one of the teenage children involved, a thirteen-year-old boy, HH 48, reported the activity to a member of staff. HH 48 explained that he was telling the staff member about the sexual activity because he wanted it to stop. HH 48 and the other boy and girl involved in the sexual activity, who were also aged thirteen years old, were spoken to by staff about their behaviour. The "Untoward Incident Report" completed in relation to the incident recorded that this was not the first incident of a sexual nature involving the three children in recent months.[86] TL 4, Assistant Principal Social Worker, informed Mr Haverty, Assistant Director of Social Services about the incident and recorded that the report "highlights a continuation of sexualised behaviour involving these children".[87]

109 At that time of this disclosure HH 48 had already come to the attention of the police and of the SSI. HH 48 had been admitted to Harberton House on 2 June 1988 on a Wardship Order as a result of non-school attendance. On 9 June 1988 he absconded and returned to his family home in Strabane. When he returned to Harberton House he told staff that while he was in Strabane he was sexually abused by a man who had previously sexually abused him when he lived at home. SND 502, Assistant Director of Social Services, informed Mr O' Brien of the SSI by letter on 27 June 1988 about these allegations and that the accused man had admitted the offences and been arrested.[88]

110 SND 502 wrote to Mr O' Brien again on 25 August 1988 to inform him about the peer abuse that HH 48 was involved in. Mr O'Brien acknowledged receipt of this letter on 28 September 1988 and noted that staff in Harberton House were intensifying their work with the children involved and that the situation was being carefully monitored by the Core Evaluation Team.[89]

111 In October 1988 the man who had been arrested and was subsequently charged with buggery and gross indecency was found hanged in a voluntary

86 FJH 50726.
87 FJH 50727.
88 FJH 50728.
89 FJH 50729.

home for ex-prisoners where he was living pending his court appearance. The WHSSB informed the SSI of this and that HH 48 had named two other men in Strabane who he said sexually abused him and that these allegations were being investigated urgently by the police. It was recorded in an internal SSI memorandum that WHSSB staff were concerned that a vice ring might be operating in Strabane. The internal memorandum considered what notification should be provided to the Minister given that the case might attract media attention. The author of the memorandum suggested that the Minister should be advised about the peer sexual abuse but commented:

> "Such incidents are hardly a rarity but given the boy's background this particular one might attract media attention."[90]

The Minister was informed about the case and told that the WHSSB was dealing with the incidents of peer sexual abuse.[91]

112 Therefore, staff and managers were alert to the risks of peer sexual abuse when other incidents of it came to their attention in March 1990. On the evening of 13 March 1990 a senior house parent, HH 31, pursued an aside made by a nine-year-old male resident over the dinner table about sexual activity between residents. The boy was subsequently talked to by staff. He gave them the names of other children he said were involved in the sexual activity. These children were also spoken to by staff that evening and the next day. Staff attempted to inform TL 4 about the disclosures, but he was unavailable so it was the morning of 15 March 1990 before senior managers were informed about them.

113 HH 32, senior house parent, provided an untoward incident report on 15 March 1990 about the disclosures.[92] In the report HH 32 named eight children, four boys and four girls, aged from seven to thirteen years who had been interviewed about their involvement in the sexual activity. A case conference was held the next day, 16 March 1990, and immediate action was agreed including the children's families being informed, the matter being reported to the RUC and the employment of a waking night member of staff in the home from that evening.

114 From the information provided by the children it became clear that the sexual activity they were involved in included fondling, oral sex, sexual intercourse and bondage. It had commenced in December 1989 and was co-ordinated by some of the children to take place very early in the morning, and in the period around the end of the school day when they knew staff would be occupied with transporting children from school and handover meetings and would therefore be less available to supervise them. The incidents were described as happening in the playroom, bedrooms, the visitor's room and the garden areas at the rear of the home. Children described acting as "lookouts" and behaving in a disruptive way to distract staff attention so that the activity could go unchecked. Although some children described consensual sexual exploration, others described being coerced and frightened into sexual activity.[93]

90 FJH 50732.
91 FJH 50731.
92 FJH 10063-70.

115 Two of the boys who played a major part in the abuse implicated nine adolescent children resident in the home in it. The police interviewed one adolescent girl who admitted that she organised disruptive situations to distract staff attention so that the sexual activity could take place, but denied engaging in it herself. The police decided not to interview the other adolescent children. Staff did interview them and recorded that they denied any involvement.[94]

116 Mr Carey wrote to Mr Haverty on 26 March 1990[95] to inform him about the disclosures to date and what immediate action had been taken. He reported that the most serious incidents had taken place in the early hours of the morning, and the decision to introduce a waking member of night staff had proved effective but that member of staff had left to take up another job. He explained that consequently an interim measure had to be introduced of one member of sleeping-in staff commencing work at 5am to supervise the children. He also explained that he was exploring the installation of electronic warning systems that would alert staff to children leaving their bedrooms at night.

117 Mrs McGowan, the member of the Community Care Committee who made regular visits to Harberton House visited the home in April 1990. She recorded her view that in light of the peer sexual abuse there was a need to review the adequacy of childcare resources generally within the WHSSB, and particularly within the Foyle Unit of Management because:

> "...we are failing in our duty to protect children – providing a bed, shelter and food is not enough."[96]

93 FJH 11025.
94 FJH 20308.
95 FJH 15575-7.
96 FJH 10011.

118 Since the next meeting of the Community Care Committee was not until June 1990 Mrs McGowan wrote directly to Tom Haverty enclosing a copy of her report.[97] Mr Haverty responded on 18 May 1990.[98] He explained the increased demand for residential care for children since January 1990, acknowledged the untoward incidents in Harberton House and confirmed that the occupancy rate in the home had been reduced to 25 children.

119 Mr Carey wrote to Mr Haverty on 25 June 1990 to update him about the police investigations into the peer sexual abuse.[99] In due course, on 30 October 1990, Inspector McCracken of the RUC wrote to Mr Carey to inform him that the Director of Public Prosecutions had directed no prosecution and that rehabilitation of the children was best left to the Social Services.[100] Mr Carey also took the opportunity to point out that Harberton House had seven children over its occupancy level during the time the peer sexual activity took place, which necessitated the employment of six untrained members of staff. He explained that the number of children that had to be cared for, and the support that experienced staff were required to give to inexperienced staff, meant that the focus was on meeting the primary needs of children rather than engaging in therapeutic work. He suggested that this combination of factors may have explained why the sexual activity was not picked up sooner. He also made the point that the complexity of the needs of the children being received into care increased the need for additional and appropriately trained foster parents.

Involvement of the Department

120 On 23 March 1990, Mr Carey contacted Mr Wesley Donnell of the Child Care Branch of the Department to inform him of the events in Harberton House[101] and SND 502, Acting Director of Social Services, wrote to Mr O' Brien, Social Service Inspector, on 8 May 1990 to formally advise him about them.[102] SND 502 set the incidents of peer abuse in Harberton House within the wider context of the pressures being experienced by the WHSSB because of the increased numbers of children being received into care and the complexity of their needs. She explained that the General Manager and the Area Executive team had agreed the establishment of

97 FJH 10047.
98 FJH 10095.
99 FJH 15568-155740.
100 FJH 11016.
101 FJH 15596.
102 FJH 10270.

two new social works posts in the fostering team and four new social worker posts in Foyle Community which she anticipated would do much to free up the situation in the children's homes. Mr O Brien responded to SND 502 on 18 June 1990. He acknowledged that the increase in admissions to Harberton House may have contributed indirectly to the incidents.[103]

121 Dr McCoy visited Harberton House and Fort James on 26 June 1990;[104] these visits had been arranged prior to the peer sexual abuse being detected in Harberton House. Following these visits there was considerable discussion between Dr McCoy and his senior colleagues about how to ensure a proper investigation of what had occurred between the children in Harberton House. It was clear from the internal SSI communications in October 1988 about the peer abuse involving HH 48 that officials understood the potential for peer sexual activity and abuse in children's homes. However, the number of younger children involved in this case concerned them as did the fact that the sexual activity had gone on for a sustained period without being detected. Consideration was given to whether a formal investigation should be carried out to consider generally the care of sexually abused children in children's homes and to focus specifically on the lessons to be learnt from Harberton House.[105]

122 Subsequently, Dr McCoy telephoned SND 502 and asked her to provide a report on the overall circumstances of the incidents in Harberton House that could be shared for information with the Directors of Social Services of the other Boards. SND 502 told colleagues that Dr McCoy had indicated that the requested report could be used to appraise the Department of the problems the WHSSB was facing in providing childcare with a view to making the Department more amenable to requests for resources to deal with the problems.[106]

123 On 23 July 1990, SND 502 wrote to Dr McCoy and outlined the overall situation the WHSSB faced in relation to childcare and the investigation and action taken in relation to Harberton House.[107] She explained that, given the resource difficulties and pressures the workers in Harberton House were facing at the time of the incidents and their perceptions

103 FJH 10026.
104 FJH 10286.
105 FJH 11016.
106 FJH 10037.
107 FJH 10113.

that senior managers, and she in particular, did not understand their "impossible situation", it would not have helped staff morale or enhanced the safety of children for her to have undertaken an investigation of the incidents.[108] She also asked that "the ever increasing childcare difficulties should be looked at immediately with a view to the DHSS offering additional revenue". She suggested that such additional revenue could be used to appoint additional social work practitioners and to create a childcare team, a child protection team and a team of social workers working with children in residential care.[109]

124 This letter and its appendices were discussed by officials at a meeting in the Department on 26 July 1990, where it was agreed that the WHSSB should be asked to carry out an independent investigation which would:

- "review the background to the incidents and, in particular, why the incidents were not detected earlier;
- explore the lessons to be learned for the Province as a whole;
- examine the roles of individual staff including key workers and supervisors;
- review the training implications;
- explore the multi-disciplinary nature of the care and treatment requirements of the children involved."[110]

125 Mr Hunter, Chief Executive of the Department's Management Executive, contacted Mr Frawley, General Manager of the WHSSB, to request this investigation. Mr Frawley agreed to the investigation so that lessons could be learned and related training needs of social care and other professional staff could be identified. Mr Frawley agreed to ask SND 502 to liaise with Dr McCoy over who might undertake the investigation and agreed it should be done "in such a way as to avoid the appearance of a witch hunt and recriminations".[111]

126 On 31 July 1990 Dr McCoy met with SND 502 at Dundonald House and followed up that meeting with a letter offering draft terms of reference for the investigation, which included a specific focus on why the sexual activity between the children in Harberton House was not detected earlier and an examination of the roles and responsibilities and professional activities of staff responsible for supervision of the children in the relevant period.[112]

108 FJH 10118.
109 FJH 10119.
110 FJH 10995.
111 FJH 10994.
112 FJH 10992.

127 When Dr McCoy received a copy of the brief that had been given to the Review Team[113] he wrote to Mr Hunter to express his concern that the terms of reference for the review failed to make specific reference to the events in Harberton House and why the sexual activities were not detected sooner. He suggested that "the Board will use the review to emphasise their inadequate revenue basis" and that "the issues of supervision and management in Harberton House will not get the scrutiny they deserve."[114]

128 In response to Dr McCoy's concerns, Mr Hunter wrote to Mr Frawley on 30 August 1990 and indicated that while it was reasonable for the review to consider resource implications he would be concerned, "if the Team concentrated on this issue to the detriment of other factors surrounding the care of severely abused children".[115]

129 In a written statement to the Inquiry, Dr McCoy confirmed that his view remained that the emphasis in the terms of reference on the resources available to the Board generally was an attempt to extract more resources from the Department, he commented: "…it was opportunistic".[116]

The Review Process

130 The Review was chaired by Bob Bunting, Assistant Director of Social Services (Family and Child Care) Eastern Health and Social Services Board and he was assisted by Mr T Armstrong, Senior Social Services Manager WHSSB and Miss J Ross, Principal Social Worker (Training and Staff Development) WHSSB. The review team took the view that residential services for children could not be seen in isolation but had to be considered within the context of the total WHSSB's family and childcare programme. We consider this an appropriate approach since, as set out above, the number of emergency placements Harberton House had to deal with and the lack of foster placements to send children on to hampered its ability to fulfil its remit.

131 In considering the wider context in which the home operated the review team compared the social work resources of the Foyle Community Unit, the unit of management within the WHSSB in which Harberton House was located, with those of North and West Belfast, the unit closest to it in population size. The comparison showed that the staffing establishment

113 FJH 10987.
114 FJH 10986.
115 FJH 10984.
116 FJH 40886.

of the North and West Belfast unit's Family and Child Care Programme, which consisted of fifteen senior social workers and 53 social workers, meant it had nine more senior social workers and twenty more social workers than the Foyle Unit.[117]

132 The review team identified that the increased demand for childcare and the lack of resources to address it during 1989 and 1990 indicated "a high level of risk for children and staff in the Unit".[118] It referred to field social workers having to keep children in risk situations when they would have preferred them to be in care, and to residential staff being unable to undertake therapeutic work because of the number of children for whom they had to provide basic care. The team concluded that the extension of the range of services available, for example the provision of fee-earning foster parents, would provide advantages both in terms of efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

133 After making these general observations about the context within which Harberton House operated the review team considered how the home was run, including its admission and discharge records in the relevant period. It concluded that although the home was over-occupied in the relevant period, and this necessitated the employment of inexperienced staff who required training and support, the "main problem was the constant pressure of dealing with a highly disruptive and sexualised group of children".[119]

134 The review team considered the profile and current position of each of the eight children who had been identified as being involved in the sexual activity. They also included within their considerations the adolescent girl referred to above who had been interviewed by the police and admitted distracting staff in order to let the sexual activity take place. The review team stated that they were of the opinion that the adolescent children "were involved in the sexual activities though to what extent remains unclear".[120] They considered reviewing the other eight young people and looking at their records but decided not to as the police had decided not to interview them. Given the review team's suspicions about the involvement of adolescent children in the sexual activity we consider that it was a lost opportunity that they did not widen their review to consider any other recorded incidents of peer sexual activity in the home. This could have

117 FJH 20301.
118 FJH 20302.
119 FJH 20307.
120 FJH 20308.

identified other occasions, such as that involving HH 48, where sexual activity between three children was recognised as a recurring problem and where (at least on one occasion) it only came to the attention of the staff through one of the children involved making a disclosure about it.

135 The review team identified that only one of the nine children was understood to have been sexually abused prior to admission to care and another, an adolescent girl, was known to have previously had sexual intercourse with adolescent boys. The other seven children had been admitted to care because of behavioural problems and/or relationship problems with their parents or foster carers. However, through disclosure work while they were in Harberton House, prior to the uncovering of the peer sexual activity, the staff reached the view that all but two of the children had been sexually abused, had witnessed sexual activity or had been involved in sexual activity with other children prior to their admission to care.[121] Staff told the review team that they had received some relevant in-service training about caring for sexually abused children but were unable at times to apply this training due to the pressures they faced on a day-to-day basis.

136 The review team concluded that supervision of the children had been inadequate because of the low staff to resident ratio caused by the increased number of residents and the policy of staff having two days a week during the school term for report writing, liaison with families etc, which reduced their direct contact time with the children.

137 During the review process, the chair of the review team was copied into a memo that HH 22, the acting officer in charge wrote on behalf of Harberton House staff to Gabriel Carey on 1 November 1990.[122] In this memo, HH 22 pointed out that staff were continuing to have to deal with over-occupancy of the home leading to a dependence on inexperienced and unqualified staff, which was creating a similar set of circumstances to that which pertained at the time the peer sexual abuse occurred earlier in the year.

She placed on record the feeling of the staff group that:

> "… this present situation mitigates [sic] against fulfilling the Board's statutory responsibility to provide care, protection and control for children who require it."[123]

121 FJH 20342.
122 FJH 10084.
123 FJH 10084.

138 Mr Carey responded to the memo on 16 November 1990[124] and detailed the action that had been taken to raise resource issues with the Department and establish new social worker posts. He acknowledged the frustration of staff and indicated it was shared by all childcare managers but pointed out that managers, including HH 22, must provide leadership to help staff work through difficulties and provide the best standard of service possible to the children in their care.

139 In her oral evidence to the Inquiry, HH 22 said that she could not emphasise enough the impact that overcrowding had in Harberton House. She explained that staff felt they had no real say on admissions, because if a child needed to be cared for and there was nowhere else they could go they had to be admitted.[125]

The Review Team's Conclusions and Recommendations

140 The review team concluded that there were a number of important aspects which in combination created exceptional conditions within Harberton House that made it possible for the sexual abuse to continue undetected. They identified these aspects as:

- the number of children with sexualised behaviour in the home at the same time;
- the power exercised by two boys in particular and their intimidation of other children; and,
- the level of planning of sexual activity, including the distraction of staff and acting when staff cover was at a minimum.

The inadequate staff to child ratio was seen as a contributory factor in the relevant period but the review team made a more general point that the size of the home with two groups of twelve and thirteen children made it difficult to provide a satisfactory standard of care for the type of children and young people requiring residential care.

141 The review team assessed the performance of all residential and fieldwork practitioners as adequate, given the pressures they were under, the limits of their knowledge and awareness, and the resources available. In the case of residential staff, this conclusion was qualified as being in the context of the number of staff on duty to care for the total group of children. The point was made that, given the substantial group of very disturbed children in the home, consideration should have been given to increasing the number of staff on duty. The performance of the management staff of the home and senior social workers was also deemed adequate; the review team found they were clear about the pressures staff were working under and informed middle and senior managers about them. The performance of middle and senior managers was also deemed adequate given the increasing demands and the resources available.[126]

124 FJH 10081.
125 Day 127, p.91.

142 The review team stated that the workloads of field social workers and the management span of control of senior social workers were not conducive to providing child protection of satisfactory quality and that it was unrealistic to expect the workload of the Assistant Principal Social Worker (Family and Child Care) to be carried by one person.

143 The concluding statement of the review report focused on the lack of resources:

> "The Unit of Management is under-resourced in relation to the amount, range, complexity and stressful nature of the Family and Child Care work which has to be undertaken. This remains the case, though the 6 additional Social Worker posts have reduced some of the pressures.
>
> There are clear indications that the present situation represents a high level of risk for both children and staff in the Unit of Management."[127]

144 Given this analysis, it is perhaps not surprising that the eighteen recommendations in the report of the review focused on the need for strategic development of childcare services and additional resources. The review team recommended an immediate review of the size and function of Harberton House with a view to reducing the residential care component and concentrating it into one unit. It also suggested that the physical space this would create could be used as an adolescent support centre and as a facility for a multi-disciplinary team to develop expertise in the assessment of sexually abused children. It recognised that the residential places that would be lost through such a development might still be required and recommended that if that was the case a further smaller residential facility should be developed.

145 In addition to recommendations about improving staff development and supervision, an immediate review of staffing levels and the duty rota in the two Board homes was recommended to ensure that there were sufficient staff on duty to provide satisfactory care for the total group of children and allow time for individual work. A practical recommendation was made that the mound in the grounds of Harberton House should be levelled to facilitate the supervision of children.

126 FJH 20337.
127 FJH 20354.

WHSSB's Response to the Review Report

146 The review report was presented to the WHSSB Area Executive Team on 22 November 1990 and presented to the Community Care Committee of the WHSSB on 7 December 1990. Mr Bunting, the Chair of the review team, discussed his findings with Committee members. Mr Frawley, General Manager, cautioned the Committee that the recommendations were wide-ranging and could have serious resource implications and asked for the management team of the Foyle Community Unit to be given time to consider them.[128]

147 Mrs McGowan, the Committee member who made regular monitoring visits to the home, referred to the statement in the review report that "children and staff were still at risk". She urged serious consideration to be given to minimising the level of risk as a matter of priority.[129] However, the Committee agreed that senior managers should be given the opportunity to consider the recommendations and to report back to its next meeting.

148 Mr Frawley and HH 34 (Unit General Manager) attended the next meeting of the Community Care Committee on 1 February 1991 and the minutes of that meeting recorded that they provided committee members with an update on the measures that management and staff were taking to address "difficult aspects of caring for children".[130] The committee agreed that the Board should convey its concern about the need for additional funding to the Department. Mr Frawley undertook to write to the Department and while pointing out that it might consider the pressure on childcare as a national rather than local problem he said he would:

> "...put forward the case again for the Board's uniquely underfunded situation and ask the Department to consider the matter in the knowledge of the analysis they have sight of and consider making some exceptional arrangement for the Board."[131]

128 FJH 10432.
129 FJH 10432.
130 FJH 10436.
131 FJH 10437.

The chairman of the Community Care Committee is recorded as concluding the discussion by pointing out that while the Board had the responsibility to deal with the issues identified in the review report the Department, being a party to that report, also had a responsibility towards solving the problems.[132]

149 Mr Frawley wrote to Mr Hunter of the Department on 13 February 1991.[133] He explained that in light of the sort of investment that would be required to address the recommendations in the review report and the level of funding available to the Board compared to other Boards, particularly the Eastern Board, the Community Care Committee had asked him to ask the Department to consider making a separate allocation "to address this very worrying problem". He explained that the committee appreciated the difficult financial climate, but felt that "an issue of this complexity and public concern does need urgent attention". Mr Frawley finished his letter requesting a meeting to discuss this and more general matters relating to finance.

150 An internal memorandum from a civil servant Mr Green entitled "Review Of Child Care Services"[134] recorded the outcome of a meeting Mr Green, Dr McCoy, Mr Kearney and Mr Hunter had with Mr Frawley and Mr Burke on 27 February 1991. Mr Frawley was recorded as telling the officials that the Chairman of the WHSSB remained extremely unhappy about the Board's funding deficit and considered that the DHSS had not done enough to address it in the allocations for the next financial year. Mr Frawley advised that the matter was likely to come to a head at the forthcoming Policy and Resources Committee meeting when:

> "…the need for additional resources for the development of Child Care Services will be on the agenda and the disparities in staffing levels and other resources between the Western and Eastern Boards will be highlighted".[135]

Mr Green recorded the explanations he provided about why the funding arrangements could not be improved immediately, including that the DHSS held no reserves, and pointed out that £300,000 had already been skewed to the WHSSB despite the DHSS's limited ability to allocate additional funding. He also provided assurances about the DHSS's commitment to introducing a full capitation based funding position. Despite these assurances Mr Frawley requested an urgent meeting with Mr Hunter.

132 FJH 10437.
133 FJH 10979.
134 FJH 50740-41.
135 FJH 50740.

151 This meeting took place on 6 March 1991 and Mr Hunter's memorandum to Mr Green about it confirmed that Mr Frawley had raised the WHSSB's need for additional resources for the development of childcare services as well as broader issues about the funding available to the Board. Mr Hunter recorded that he had provided the same explanations and assurances as Mr Green had previously offered to Mr Frawley and offered some hope that additional funds might be available in 1992/93 that the Board could use to develop its child care services. However he recorded that he made clear to Mr Frawley that in the meanwhile:

> "...it was the Board's responsibility to manage any problems which currently exist in respect of the delivery of these services."[136]

152 Mr Frawley subsequently wrote to Mr Hunter on 20 March 1991 to record the WHSSB's Resource Allocation Committee displeasure at what it perceived as "positive discrimination by the Department against this Board in properly addressing the issue of equity in resource allocation". He went on to state that "Board members felt that their position and that of the Board in relation to both staff and children was becoming untenable".[137] Mr Hunter provided a written statement to the Inquiry in which he said he did not recall meetings he may have had with Mr Frawley and that as far as he could remember the WHSSB never argued through its area and operational planning process that it was under-funded for a particular service.[138] As indicated previously we consider the WHSSB's funding situation more generally in the section dealing with Finance in Volume 1. However, in relation to responding to the particular funding issues raised by the Bunting Review we consider that the WHSSB, through its senior officials, persisted in trying to attract funding to improve its child care services and made clear that its position in relation to both staff and children was becoming untenable.

153 While these discussions were taking place Dominic Burke wrote to Dr McCoy on 27 February 1991 to inform him of the action the WHSSB had taken to meet the recommendations of the Bunting Review including allocating £35,000 to fund increased staffing in Harberton House and £39,000 to increase foster care. He indicated that he would provide Dr McCoy with the minutes of the Community Care Committee's discussion of the review and share with him the Foyle Unit of Management's response to the recommendations of the review and the resources it considered necessary to implement them. Mr Burke also referred to the discussion Mr Frawley and he had with Dr Mc Coy and his colleagues on 26 February 1991 about efforts being made to redress the resourcing issues in the Board's Operational Plans and stated he would share the outcome of current discussions on the Plans with Dr McCoy as soon as possible. He reminded Dr McCoy that it was recognised at the meeting that:

136 FJH 50742.
137 FJH 50742.
138 GOV 629.

> "…these efforts because of other competing demands fail to meet the requirements as we explained additional resources will be required to meet this shortfall".[139]

154 In that context, he asked for additional funding of £130,000 to develop an assessment and treatment unit at Harberton (the inference was that this would be for peer abusers) and suggested that the provision of this funding from the Department would be "a recognition of this Board's difficulties and our joint efforts in redressing the resource problems".[140] He finished his letter by informing Dr McCoy that the Board was still experiencing sustained pressure within its childcare services. He explained that despite the increase in fostering provision Harberton House continued to be full and the staff bungalow was having to be used to accommodate children.

155 On 12 March 1991 Dr McCoy wrote to two of his staff, Mr Mc Elfatrick and Mr O Brien, copied to Mr Greene and Mr Kearney of the Child Care and Social Policy Division and provided them with a copy of Mr Burke's letter. He asked for a general discussion about what further action the Management Executive/DHSS needed to take and a specific discussion about Mr Burke's proposal for an Assessment and Treatment Unit.[141] Mr Kearney responded to this minute and informed Dr McCoy that he had no money to offer towards the suggested Assessment and Treatment Unit. He explained that he had put forward a Public Expenditure Survey (PES) bid for funds to address child sexual abuse covering prevention, protection and treatment (for victim and abuser). However, he pointed out that even if the bid succeeded resources would not be available until 1992.[142]

156 On 28 March 1991 Dr McCoy met with his colleagues Mr Simpson, Mr Kearney, Mr McElfratrick and Mr O'Brien to discuss the WHSSB's ongoing work to meet the recommendations of the review. They noted that the

139 FJH 587.
140 FJH 588.
141 FJH 16347.
142 FJH 16346.

WHSSB was meeting on that day to discuss resource allocation proposals for 1991/2 which included:

- £35,000 to improve childcare services generally in Foyle Community Unit
- £30,000 to provide greater support to existing foster placements
- £45,600 to Nazareth House children's home
- Additional funds to employ two house parents in Coneywarren home to bring the staffing levels up to those set down in Castle Priory guidelines
- £90,000 to establish child and adolescent psychiatry services for the area.

There was no reference in the note of the meeting to Mr Frawley's letter to Mr Hunter, which had been copied to Dr McCoy and which had requested additional discrete funds to address the recommendations of the review, to the meeting Dr Mc Coy attended with Mr Frawley and Mr Burke or to Mr Burke's written request to Dr McCoy for additional funds to establish an assessment and treatment unit. The meeting concluded that no direct action was required by the Department at that time. It was noted that the WHSSB was continuing discussions with the Foyle Unit of Management about their responses to the conclusions and recommendations contained in the Bunting review and that a report of these discussions would be submitted in due course. It was agreed that the WHSSB's implementation of its operational plan would be monitored, staffing levels in children's homes in the four Boards would continue to be monitored and discussions would continue with Board staff about the extent of peer abuse among children.[143]

157 As part of the Warning Letter process the DoH pointed out that the information provided in Mr Burke's letter of 27 February 1991 that the WHSSB was allocating £35,000 to meet increased staffing needs in Harberton House and £39,000 for extra Boarded-out payments and appointing additional field social work posts made it appear to the DHSS that the immediate pressures on Harberton House had been responded to quickly and appropriately by the WHSSB. The DoH also commented on Mr Burke's reference to the discussion in the meeting Mr Frawley and he had with Dr McCoy and representatives from the DHSS Management

143 FJH 16344.

Executive in February 1991 about attempts to redress the under resourcing issues in the Board's Operational Plans. The DoH suggested that this reference indicated that the DHSS Management Executive had asked the WHSSB to address under-resourcing issues in its operational plan and was sympathetic to the WHSSB's request for additional finances to make up the shortfall in other services (ie "competing demands") which had been created by the alleviation of the Harberton House situation. We found no reference in the minute of that meeting[144] to the DHSS asking the WHSSB to address under-resourcing issues in its operational plan and we understood from Mr Burke's letter that he was saying the efforts taken to address the requirements of the Bunting review were insufficient because of other competing demands and that additional resources were required.

158 It was also agreed in the meeting of 28 March 1991 that Mr Kearney would ask Dr Kilgore to monitor the establishment of the Child and Adolescent Psychiatry Service which was contained in the WHSSB's Development proposals for 1991/1992. Mr Kearney subsequently wrote to Dr Kilgore on 8 April 1991 to point out that although it was not possible to provide funding for an assessment and treatment unit it should be possible for the WHSSB to start to develop therapeutic programmes with sexually abused children if this aspect was recognised as a priority by the new consultant child and adolescent psychiatrist which the WHSSB intended to recruit. He went on to ask Dr Kilgore to highlight the importance of this work in any contact with the consultant once he/she was appointed. Mr Kearney finished by asking that he and Dr Kilgore stay in touch with developments in establishing the service to ensure that maximum use is made of it for child protection purposes.[145] There is no indication that this helpful intervention was shared with Mr Burke.

159 We noted that Mr O'Brien who attended this meeting had recently completed an inspection of Harberton House on the week beginning 11 February 1991. He made a number of observations and recommendations in his report of that inspection in response to the circumstances he found in the home, which were strikingly similar to those that the review team had concluded had aligned to create an environment in which the peer sexual activity in Harberton House in late 1989 and early 1990 had gone on for so long without detection.[146] These included:

144 FJH 50740-50741.
145 FJH 16342.
146 FJH 16513–16564.

(1) The number of children living in Harberton House had exceeded the places provided in the home for some months and this situation was pertaining at the time of the inspection.[147]

(2) Although the staff bungalow was being used to accommodate children, the demand for residential care was such that children had to be diverted to other statutory and voluntary homes.[148]

(3) In the circumstances, Harberton was incapable of providing a reception/assessment service for all children coming into the Board's care. The home had been reasonably successful in discharging children within twelve months of placement, thereby retaining the short/medium term nature of the facility and its main aim could have been attained if there had not been such a surge of admissions to the facility in the months preceding the inspection.[149]

(4) Staff ratios should be revised to allow staff sufficient time for primary duties and group care of children.[150]

(5) Less than half of the staff had been to short training courses on appropriate topics and "this was disappointing though, in circumstances where the home was over full and going through a difficult period understandable."[151]

(6) At best, staff were receiving supervision every two months when the expectation was that they should receive it every two weeks and at least once a month.[152]

(7) Staff were striving to implement programmes of care for individual children but the time taken had become protracted in some cases because of the number of children.[153]

(8) The officer in charge had informed him that Harberton was still catering for a considerable number of children who had sexual experience inappropriate to their chronological ages.[154]

160 Mr O'Brien quoted Mrs McGowan's conclusion that the Board "was failing in its duty to protect children".[155] He also quoted the review team's

147 FJH 16522.
148 FJH 16522.
149 FJH 16522.
150 FJH 16532.
151 FJH 16530.
152 FJH 16534.
153 FJH 16546.
154 FJH 16538.
155 FJH 16550.

recommendation that there should be an immediate review of the size and future of the home and its suggestion of the establishment of a multi-disciplinary team to undertake assessments of sexually abused children. He concluded that it appeared an appropriate time to review the procedures for admitting children to the home, revise its overall capacity and to reconsider its management structure and staffing levels.[156]

161 There is no record that Mr O'Brien's conclusions from this inspection informed the discussions he had with Dr McCoy and other colleagues on 28 March 1991 about the provision of childcare services in Harberton House. On 24 January 1992, Dr McCoy sent a letter to Mr Frawley expressing concern that reports of SSI inspections of children's homes in the Western Board's area had been issued to the appropriate unit of management and to the Nazareth Order in relation to Nazareth House, but that formal responses to the reports and the recommendations contained within them, had not been received.[157] Dr McCoy enclosed an overview report on the SSI's findings from these inspections and in his letter highlighted issues from them which required attention. Therefore, it appears that almost a year after the inspection of Harberton House the SSI was awaiting responses to the significant recommendations contained in the report of that inspection.[158]

162 Mr Frawley responded to Dr McCoy's letter on 27 April 1992. He confirmed that responses to the inspection reports had now been sent. We noted that he also referred Dr McCoy to a detailed report that was recently sent to him about a review of the WHSSB's implementations of the recommendations arising from the Bunting Review. Mr Frawley also pointed out that Dr McCoy would be aware from the Board's Annual Monitoring Reports for 1990/91 that the significant demand for care places meant the Board had to take a managed approach between the need to provide care and protection for children who were at risk in the community and meeting the objectives of individual units. Therefore, although responses to inspection reports had not been received we accept that there were other ways in which the WHSSB was accounting for its performance to the SSI.

163 We noted that the WHSSB's Social Care Committee considered the recommendation of the report of the inspection of Harberton carried out in February 1991 when it met on 8 April 1992.[159] The minutes of that meeting recorded Mr Haverty informing the Committee about action taken to address certain recommendations including the need to ensure regular supervision of staff and review the staff rota to enable more staff contact with children. However, there was no record of any discussion about the points raised by the inspectors about Harberton continuing to have to accommodate more children than it had places for, the staff bungalow being used to accommodate children and the home consequently not being able to meet its remit as an assessment centre. While we recognise that these matters may have been discussed but not put on the public record of the meeting, on the basis of the evidence before us it appears that the Committee did not address these significant resource and strategic issues.

156 FJH 16562.
157 HIA 5822-3.
158 FJH 50734.

164 With regard to Mr Burke's letter of 27 February 1991 requesting additional funding, it appears from an annotation on the letter that it was received on 7 March 1991. Dr McCoy's written response was over ten months later on 20 January 1992.[160] Dr Mc Coy and Mr Burke told us when they gave oral evidence that a good relationship existed between the SSI officials and WHSSB managers and that informal advice was sought and offered, so it may be that there was informal contact between these officials during the period that elapsed between letters. However, we considered that a ten month delay in providing a formal response to a letter that was seeking assistance to address serious problems was not good practice.

165 In his response, Dr McCoy referred to Mr Burke's request for £130,000 to establish an assessment treatment centre at Harberton House and acknowledged that Mr Burke had sought his support for this funding application. He asked Mr Burke to let him know what stage the proposal was at and whether the Board had been able to allocate funding for it.

166 Mr Burke responded on 7 April 1992. He provided Dr McCoy with an update on the steps the Board had taken to implement the recommendations of the review team, including strengthening social worker and family aide resources and increasing fostering provision. In relation to Harberton House he informed Dr McCoy that a review of the structure of the three children's homes in the Area had been undertaken and that the intention in relation to Harberton House was to revise the staffing structure and reduce the occupancy level to twenty. He explained that on the basis of this proposal, consideration was being given to the establishment of a separate small unit to cater for four or five children displaying particularly disturbed behaviour, including those who had been sexually abused and/or had been sexually abusive. He indicated that Dr McCoy would be aware of the WHSSB's plans to reduce the number of residential places on a progressive basis. We took this to be a reference to Dr McCoy's awareness of WHSSB's Strategic Plan in which these intentions were set out.

159 FJH 50738.
160 FJH 590.

167 Mr Burke did not specifically respond to Dr McCoy's question about the funding for the assessment treatment centre. Although he indicated that there would be costs associated with reducing the number of residential places he did not give an indication of the level of costs or ask for any additional funding.[161] When he gave evidence in person during Module 5, Mr Burke confirmed that it took about another ten years for an eight-bed assessment unit and emergency admission centre to be opened and that it did not open until after the closure of Fort James, Termonbacca and the Nazareth House children's home in Bishop Street.[162]

168 Dr McCoy responded to Mr Burke on 15 May 1992. He noted that the WHSSB had not been able to implement all of the recommendations of the review report because of competing demands but commented:

> "The Board is to be commended for the comprehensive range of measures introduced following this most thorough scrutiny of its services."

He went on to identify three areas of continuing concern: unqualified staff continued to be recruited in Harberton House; only three out of the eight additional social worker posts recommended by the review had been established; and, the span of control of the Assistant Principal Social Worker had not been addressed. He made no further mention of whether funding was required for the proposed treatment and assessment centre.[163] Mr Burke acknowledged Dr McCoy's letter on 21 May 1992 but did not make any further requests for funding.[164]

169 We consider that the Department, and Dr McCoy in particular, demonstrated a proper concern that the circumstances of the co-ordinated peer sexual

161 FJH 592-598.
162 Page 51, Day 125.
163 FJH 10371-2.
164 FJH 10370.

abuse in Harberton House should be fully investigated and lessons learnt and shared with other Boards. However, we consider that the SSI should have engaged more fully and immediately with the WHSSB's request for additional funding to strengthen its childcare services, even if funding constraints meant that assistance had to be limited to helping it to consider how its existing resources could be put to most effective use. We accept as pointed out by the DoH that the DHSS was not in the position to respond to the request for £130,000 for the assessment and treatment unit in the absence of properly costed proposals and operational plans. However, we saw no evidence that the DHSS or SSI on its behalf asked for this information. We found it particularly concerning that the SSI's decision to maintain a watching brief on the WHSSB's implementation of the Bunting recommendations was taken shortly after an inspector identified circumstances in Harberton House very similar to those that pertained at the time the co-ordinated peer sexual abuse occurred. The DoH pointed out that the suggestion in the Bunting report that an adolescent support centre could be established was linked to a recommended review of the residential component in Harberton House and that clearly that review needed to take place in the first instance. While we accept this point we could find no evidence that it was made at the time to Mr Burke when he requested the funding for the unit.

170 We are clear that the WHSSB was responsible for ensuring that it allocated the funding available to it in a manner that ensured its services for children were sufficient to enable it to discharge its statutory obligations and that it was also responsible for the management and quality assurance of its child care services. We accept that the DHSS was not in the position to immediately provide additional funding and that in any case the establishment of an adolescent treatment centre had to be considered within a wider review of the residential capacity of Harberton House. However, we saw no evidence of SSI engaging with the WHSSB to support it to consider how best to implement the recommendations in the Bunting review including, but not solely, the financial implications of doing so. This was despite the fact that the SSI was aware that adverse conditions were continuing to affect the care that children were receiving in Harberton House. We consider this lack of engagement amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

171 The WHSSB and the Department worked together to organise a seminar for providers of residential care in Northern Ireland about the risks of peer abuse in residential care, which was held in February 1992. Mr Kearney of the Department made a presentation on the work he had undertaken to monitor the extent to which children in Northern Ireland were known to have been sexually abused prior to admission into care and the extent of known peer abuse within residential homes for children.

172 The Department included a requirement in the 1992-1997 Northern Ireland Regional Strategy for Health and Personal Social Services for Boards to start work to secure, in the longer term, access to evaluated treatment programmes for child and adolescent abusers aimed at containing and, if possible, reducing such behaviour. In addition, the Regional Strategy recognised the need for Boards to move away from multi-purpose children's homes to a range of small specialist units designed to meet clearly identified needs.

Further Incidents of Peer Abuse in Harberton House

173 The review team's identification of continued risk to children and staff in Harberton House was realised in May 1992 when further incidents of peer sexual abuse were identified in the home.[165] On this occasion an adolescent female resident told a member of staff that she had heard three younger male residents discussing sexual matters. When staff interviewed the boys it became clear that one of the boys aged eight years had threatened the other two boys aged seven years and intimidated them into simulating sexual intercourse, while fully clothed, while he observed them.

174 This activity had not gone undetected for a prolonged period of time; it was described as having happened "over the past few weeks".[166] However, we noted that it was only brought to the attention of staff by another resident, and the activity took place at the same time as in the previous incidents, i.e. early in the morning and after school when staff were involved in hand-over meetings. The use of waking night staff, which had been introduced as a result of the previous incidents of peer sexual abuse in the home, had been discontinued at the end of October 1991. In response to this new incident, sleeping-in staff were increased to two in the medium stay unit, one of whom commenced work at 6am to supervise the children. Mr Carey asked senior managers to support a longer term measure of employing staff at care assistant level to act as waking night staff.

165 FJH 15536.
166 FJH 15481.

175 In 1992 the capacity of the home was reduced to twenty places, ten in each unit. However, the staff and children continued to have to deal with the impact of over-occupancy at times when the number of children requiring care was in excess of available places. For example, when Ruth Lavery visited the home, on 14 July 1993, she completed the pro-forma used by the visiting committee and recorded the concerns of staff that:

> "Numbers of children were regularly over the upper limit [because of] crisis interventions and limited fostering resources. Inability to develop specialist work with abused (& abusing children) because of general demands."[167]

176 Further incidents of peer sexual abuse came to light in April 1994 when staff investigated an incident that occurred on 25 April 1994 when a boy then aged eleven years, SPT 81, and another male resident exposed themselves to each other. During this investigation information emerged that SPT 81 and two other male residents aged seven and thirteen years had been sexually assaulting a female resident in the home for prolonged periods over a number of months. While this matter was being dealt with, a further incident of SPT 81 being involved in sexual activity with another boy was detected by domestic staff on 20 June 1994. SPT 81 was subsequently transferred to St Patrick's training school on a Place of Safety Order on 22 July 1994 and sadly was killed in 1994.

177 In response to SPT 81's death, the WHSSB established a team to review the care he received. Bob Bunting who had chaired the earlier review into the peer sexual abuse in Harberton House also chaired this review. In relation to the care SPT 81 received in Harberton House the review team concluded that the fact that the abuse of the girl in Harberton House by SPT 81 and two other boys went undetected, and that SPT 81 was able to intimidate the girl once the abuse came to the attention of staff, raised questions about the adequacy of supervision in the home.[168] The review team also questioned whether there was sufficient contact time between staff and children to allow necessary therapeutic work,[169] and concluded that the habitual use of 'time out' with SPT 81, 46 occasions in a four-month-period, made it an ineffective means of dealing with his behaviour.

167 FJH 17159
168 SPT 19032.
169 SPT 19047.

178 The review team also concluded that the homosexual activity between SPT 81 and another boy in June 1994 was serious and suggested knowledge of homosexual intercourse which should have been reported to the police so that they could have investigated how the boys had gained such knowledge and whether either of them had been sexually abused.[170]

179 The review team recommended that the standards of supervision of the children should be improved in Harberton House and that staff rotas should be revised in order to increase contact time with children.[171] There was no reference in the report to the previous review of incidents of co-ordinated peer sexual abuse in Harberton House or that similar recommendations had been made as part of that review.

180 It was clear from the evidence we considered that although Harberton House was designed to provide focused short-term assessment of children's needs and some emergency beds, it was not able to meet its planned remit from soon after it opened. This was because the level of demand for residential care for children meant it had to accept a large number of emergency placements. Also, the lack of alternative residential care and fostering resources meant children could not be moved to appropriate services once their needs were assessed and care plans agreed. HH 5 reported to Mr Carey that this resulted in some children feeling frustrated and hopeless and led to behavioural and disciplinary problems.[172] We consider that it was also likely to have meant that children whose care needs required to be assessed could not benefit from the services in Harberton House because places were not available as they were filled by emergency placements and children waiting for alternative appropriate placements.

181 At around the same time as Harberton House opened, it was decided that Fort James should focus on the care of older children. This decision had significant implications for the provision of medium to long-term care for younger children. We understand the view expressed by Mr Carroll at that time that residential care was not an appropriate choice for children under school years but, as he recognised, such an approach could only be sustained if there were sufficient and appropriate foster placements to accommodate such children.[173] This was not the case, and was known

170 SPT 19052.
171 SPT 19055.
172 FJH 40020.
173 FJH 6555.

not to be the case, and it meant that achievement of the stated remits of Fort James and Harberton House was undermined by the need to accommodate younger children, often in emergency circumstances. A clear example of the impact of this lack of provision was the placement in 1990 of four children all aged less than six years of age in the staff bungalow in Harberton under the care of a new team of inexperienced staff.

182 From the evidence we have considered, we have concluded that the WHSSB's strategic planning of Harberton House did not take proper account of the need to ensure that complementary services were in place that would allow its remit as an assessment centre to be realised and protected. The HSCB accepted in its response to the Warning Letter process that that while there was a strong desire to use Harberton House as it was originally intended in reality the frustration of large numbers of admissions along with inadequate resources for alternatives made this very difficult. We consider that this failure in strategic planning contributed to inappropriate placements of children in the home and children remaining in the home after the assessment of their care needs had been completed. We also consider that the pressures this placed on staff contributed to the inadequate supervision of children and lack of therapeutic work with them that enabled the co-ordinated peer sexual activity in Harberton House in 1989-1990 to continue undetected for as long as it did. We consider this failing in strategic planning amounted to a systemic failing by the WHSSB to ensure that Harberton House could meet its intended remit and provide proper care.

183 When Dr Harrison gave evidence in person on behalf of the DHSSPS she told us that although the Department did not give capital funding to Boards, Boards were required to submit plans for children's homes through the Department so that it could scrutinise the proposed purpose, function, location, structure and size of the home and its feasibility. She recalled that questions would usually go back and forward between the Department and Board about proposed plans and that the plans would only be put forward as part of a public expenditure bid when the Department was satisfied with them.[174] Dr Harrison explained that since the final bid had to have the Department's approval it was expected that any elements the Department wished a Board to address in relation to a proposed home would be incorporated in the final bid.[175] Dr Harrison could only speak from personal experience about the Department's process for scrutinising plans in the 1990s. She confirmed that at that time the scrutiny would have included how a proposed home would fit within a Board's wider childcare services, for example fostering provision.

174 Day 129, p.22.

184 Further to this evidence, we put additional questions in writing to the DHSSPS about the involvement of the Department in the consideration of the plans for Harberton House. Dr Harrison responded in writing on behalf of the DHSSPS and informed us that it had not been possible to locate any records about the Department's consideration of the proposal to establish Harberton House. However, she outlined the standard procedures which the Department used at that time to consider such proposals and confirmed that the DHSSPS had no reason to believe that these procedures were not followed in relation to Harberton House.[176]

185 Dr Harrison explained that a Board's proposals for the development of a children's home had to include the level of existing provision, the extent of the need identified, the type of service to be provided in the facility, the physical provision required and the proposed staffing level and structure.

186 The case put forward by the Board would then be considered by the Department's officials and professional advisors. Dr Harrison confirmed that professional advisors would have commented on the specifics of submissions in terms of standards of accommodation, numbers of children and staffing arrangements etc and that since they had an overview of existing statutory and voluntary children's home provision within the region:

> "...their views on the need for new provision would, of necessity, have had to take account of existing and projected numeric provision, as well as qualitative inadequacies or gaps in services and how the proposed home might address these or complement other necessary developments in child care services."[177]

187 In relation to the establishment of Harberton House, Dr Harrison told us it was unlikely that due regard would not have been given by the Department to the robustness of the WHSSB's plans to avoid children remaining in the home longer than necessary.

> "Part of this consideration would had to have been the extent to which 175 Day 129, p.24.

176 FJH 80002.
177 FJH 80003.

other services were in place to enable children to be assessed and moved in a timely manner to appropriate longer term placements. Also whether these services and (in the case of children who were to return home) family support services, were sufficiently adequate to support the proper functioning of a residential assessment unit within the Board's continuum of services."[178]

188 We found it surprising that given this level of scrutiny the lack of fostering resources and the growth in the number of children requiring care (increasingly on an emergency basis) were not identified and addressed as part of the consideration of the proposals to establish Harberton House. The lack of records meant we did not have access to the detail of the Department's scrutiny of the plans for Harberton House, including what time lag there was between funding for the home being agreed and the home opening. Clearly, if the time lag was significant then the demand for residential childcare and foster places may have increased in the intervening period. The lack of records also meant that we did not know if the Department gave any advice or guidance to the WHSSB about the establishment and operation of the assessment centre. Therefore, we are not in the position to reach any conclusions about the Department's role in approving the plans for Harberton House. However, the fact that almost from the point of opening, Harberton House was unable to operate as an assessment centre made us question the rigour of the scrutiny process.

189 The level of internal monitoring and governance of Harberton House was high, and those involved in it accurately identified pressure points and how they were affecting the quality of the care provided to the children. However, this awareness did not translate into appropriate and effective remedial action. We concluded that the time and energy invested in monitoring Harberton House was only marginally effective in its ability to positively influence the nature and quality of the service being provided. The wider context of the increased need for children to be accommodated outside their families and the lack of specialist residential services and fostering resources meant that although problems in, for example, the throughput of children, could be clearly identified, solutions were less forthcoming. We did not consider this was because of lack of commitment or concern on the part of staff and their managers. It was clear from contemporaneous documentation and from the evidence we heard from former staff and managers that they were committed to providing high quality childcare and felt frustrated and hampered by the lack of appropriate resources and reported the impact of this to senior managers and visiting committee members.

178 FJH 80003.

190 However, we noted that at the same time as Harberton House and Fort James were under pressure to accept and work as best they could with more children than they were equipped to deal with, the WHSSB's Strategic Plan for childcare for 1992-97[179] set the objective to move to the position where no more that 15% of the children in its care should be in residential facilities by 1997.[180] This objective was in line with the 1992-1997 DHSS regional strategic plan, which required Boards to:

> "...seek to reduce the need for residential care and, with the development of preventive and foster care services as alternatives to residential care to reduce the stock of residential provision".[181]

In order to measure progress against this objective, Boards were asked to aim by 1997 to have at least 75% of the children in their care, excluding any children home on trial, in a family placement.[182]

191 The WHSSB set a more ambitious objective of moving to a position where no more than 15% of the children in its care were accommodated in residential care facilities by 1997. The Strategic Plan stated that as of September 1991, 91 children, approximately 18% of the 506 children in the care of the Board were accommodated in residential care. The target set was to reduce this number to a maximum of 58 places over the planning period, which meant that the WHSSB was going further than the Department's objectives.

192 The WHSSB recognised that it needed to improve its fostering provision significantly to achieve this change. It also considered at the time whether it should convert its children's homes to provide smaller units, each of which would enable specialised individual work with children in care that could not easily be undertaken in multi-purpose units.[183]

193 We recognised that the WHSSB was seeking to improve the appropriateness and effectiveness of its childcare services and to meet the Department's objectives in this regard, and that in the absence of additional funding new services could only be developed through releasing funding from existing services. However, we considered there was a striking mismatch at this

179 FJH 1005-1015.
180 FJH 1011.
181 FJH 80143.
182 FJH 80145.
183 FJH 1012.

time between the targets being set for reducing residential childcare places and the increasing demand for such places that field and residential managers and staff were struggling hard to meet. We will return to the general issue of the funding of the WHSSB in the section about Finance in Volume 1.

194 Also, while the Department's aspiration for Boards to develop preventative and foster services, and thereby reduce the need for residential care for children, was laudable, there seemed to be little recognition of the knowledge, gained through the SSI's inspections of the WHSSB's children's homes, of what a major task the WHSSB faced in achieving such a major shift of resources. When the WHSSB decided to reduce its residential childcare places through the closure of Fort James in 1995, the SSI, appropriately in our view, was concerned about the impact this would have on Harberton House and advised caution and reconsideration of the planned closure. The WHSSB continued with the closure but explained in response to the SSI's concerns that in the short-term eight additional residential places would be provided in Harberton House.[184] The SSI strongly, but unsuccessfully, advised against this interim compensatory measure because of the adverse effect it was likely to have on the management of Harberton House and the associated risks to children in the Board's care.[185]

195 We do not underestimate the challenges that the WHSSB faced in dealing with significant increases in the number and complexity of childcare cases while serving a community coping with high levels of deprivation, unemployment and social unrest. For example, contemporaneous documents record that the number of child protection cases in the Londonderry, Limavady and Strabane Unit of Management increased from 31 December 1982, where twelve children from six families were on the child protection register, to 31 December 1988, where 106 children from 44 families were on the register. It was also recorded that in the same Unit of Management there were 22 referrals about sexual abuse of children in the period 1 July 1985 to 1 July 1986, and this had increased to 100 such referrals by the period 1 July 1988 to May 1989.[186] Middle managers consistently reported on the pressures within residential childcare services and the associated impact on the quality and safety of the care that could be provided to children. Nonetheless, they recognised, as do we, that where children were in urgent need of care and protection some arrangement had to be made to accommodate them, however much that might compromise the limited resources available.

184 FJH 40056.
185 FJH 40054.
186 FJH 10655-10662.

196 Immediately after the events in Harberton came to light the WHSSB allocated additional resources to increase staffing in Harberton House and increase fostering provision. It also considered the training needs of staff including the introduction of individual training needs profiles[187] and the need for the full range of child care staff to receive training in the development of skills in therapeutic work with victims of abuse.[188] Dominic Burke, in his letter of 7 April 1992, assured Dr McCoy that the WHSSB was continuing to develop its assessment of need strategies in relation to family and child care, was making good progress in related strategic planning and was undertaking a review of its three residential childcare homes. He also detailed planned further resource allocations to family and childcare programmes.[189] However, he reiterated the point he made to Dr McCoy in the letter he sent him in February 1991 that the WHSSB was experiencing difficulty in addressing all the recommendations of the Bunting Review because of the competing demands on resources.[190]

197 It is clear that while the WHSSB was seeking to implement the recommendations of the Bunting Review and address the Department's strategic objectives for childcare, managers and staff continued to struggle to provide appropriate residential care for children and the decision to close Fort James created further pressure. We consider a fundamental review of childcare services and residential care as part of those services was necessary at this time to protect the wellbeing and safety of children and that aspirational planning against a background of struggling and inadequate services was not appropriate.

198 Committee member, Ms McGowan's recorded views were that the Board was failing in its duty to protect children[191] and that urgent consideration needed to be given to minimising the continuing risk to children and staff identified by the Bunting Review.[192] Although senior managers sought to reassure Ms Mc Gowan about what action was being taken to deal with the

187 FJH 10149.
188 FJH 10151.
189 FJH 592-598.
190 FJH 592.
191 FJH 10011.
192 FJH 10432.

circumstances she had highlighted we saw no evidence of the Board itself specifically responding to these concerns or increasing its scrutiny of the ongoing quality and safety of its children's homes. As part of the Warning Letter process the HSCB pointed out that the Bunting review addressed issues about related services which impacted on residential care services. We accept this was the case and have indicated earlier in this chapter that we considered that was the right approach. However, our view remains that while the WHSSB made considerable efforts to address the pressures and issues highlighted in the Bunting review and engaged with the DHSS about them it did not undertake the fundamental review of its total childcare services that would have been necessary to address the fundamental problems it was experiencing in the delivery of its child care services and in particular in the provision of residential child care as part of those services. We consider the WHSSB failed to instigate a fundamental review of its childcare services despite the findings of the Bunting Review and failed to increase its scrutiny of its children's homes in response to Ms McGowan's concerns and that these failings amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the homes provided proper care.

Evidence from HIA 233 about her time in Harberton House

199 HIA 233 was placed in Harberton House on 28 October 1982 following the breakdown of a foster placement. She told the Inquiry that whilst she was in Harberton House a member of staff called HH 15 would grab her by the neck and "batter" her and that he abused her younger sister and other residents in a similar manner.[193] She alleged that the officer in charge of the home HH 5 knew HH 15 treated her in this way and did nothing about it. HH 5 strongly refuted this allegation in his second witness statement submitted to the Inquiry in Module 1, dated 10 March 2014[194] and continued to do so in his oral evidence to the Inquiry in Module 5.

200 In Module 1, the HSCB confirmed to the Inquiry that HH 15's personnel file had been checked and there was nothing in his file concerning any complaints about his behaviour or disciplinary action. However, we noted that documentation provided by the HSCB in relation to Harberton House included references to a complaint by a resident in 1989 about physical abuse by HH 15 which was investigated by a principal social worker and

193 FJH 008.
194 FJH 056.

assistant principal social worker who determined the complaint was not founded. There was also a record of a complaint from SPT 81 in June 1993 that HH 15 lifted him by the collar and threw him into a room thereby hurting his neck. It was recorded that this complaint was investigated by TL 4, Assistant Principal Social Worker, who did not find it possible to find any supporting evidence to substantiate SPT 81's complaint.[195] A further complaint was made by a resident in December 1994 that HH 15 had been rude to her on two occasions. It was recorded that HH 5 investigated the complaint and found no breach of professional practice.[196]

201 When giving evidence in Module 5, HH 5 confirmed that he had no concerns about HH 15's professional practice but pointed out that there was a problem, in that men (and particularly HH 15 because he was a man of considerable stature) were often used to defuse situations with children who were acting out in a physical manner. HH 5 was of the view that this approach made these male members of staff vulnerable. He stated that it was not until the mid-1990s that staff received appropriate training about managing and dealing with very challenging behaviour.[197]

202 HIA 233 also told us she was raped by a boy in Harberton House when she was about thirteen, and that she told another resident about what happened and that girl reported it to a member of staff, HH 20. HIA 233 said that when HH 22, who was then head of the long-stay unit in Harberton was told about the matter, she said to her: "are we back with these lies again HIA 233", and told her she was going to end up in a training school. HIA 233 told us that "Harberton" wanted her to report the matter to the police and she wanted to, but that nothing happened and she was not interviewed by the police.[198]

203 HH 22 gave evidence in person during Module 5 and was questioned about how she responded to HIA 233's disclosure about sexual activity with HH 18. HH 22 denied that she responded in the manner described by HIA 233. She told us that as a manager in the home her role would have been to see that policy and procedures were being followed rather than interviewing the children involved. She added that if she had made any reference to HIA 233 going to a training school that would have been a statement of fact, as that was the plan for HIA 233, and not a threat.

195 FJH 15777-15782.
196 Day 124, p.61.
197 pp.100-101, Day 124, 10 June 2015.
198 FJH 008.

204 The HSCB provided a response to HIA 233's evidence in which it set out the following recorded events:

- An untoward incident report completed by Harberton staff on Saturday 24 October 1992 recorded that HIA 233 told another girl that she had sexual intercourse with another resident, HH 18 in her room on Friday 23 October 1992.
- HIA 233, HH 18 and two other residents were spoken to about this by residential social work staff; HH 5 was informed and he in turn informed HH 40, Programme Manager.
- The Care Unit of the RUC was contacted and HIA 233's mother was approached for written consent to a medical examination, which she gave at 10pm on 24 October 1992.
- HIA 233 was interviewed at Strand Road RUC station on Sunday 25 October 1992 in connection with the allegations about HH 18; another female resident of Harberton House and HH 18 were also interviewed by the police about the matter.
- HIA 233 refused to be medically examined at the police station on 25 October 1992, and in the police statement she was recorded as being uncooperative and abusive during the interview.
- The Care Unit of the RUC informed Harberton House by letter on 9 December 1992 that there would be no further police action taken regarding HIA 233's allegations of a sexual nature against HH 18.[199]

The HSCB also confirmed that prior to this incident HIA 233 was already on a waiting list for a place in a training school, and it was because a place became available that she was transferred to Middletown Training School on 28 October 1992.

205 We carefully considered the evidence of HIA 233 and the responses from the HSCB, HH 5 and HH 22. We consider that HIA 233's allegations of rape by another resident were taken seriously and dealt with appropriately.

206 We noted HIA 233's complaints about HH 15 and that two other residents complained about his overly physical behaviour towards them and one resident complained about him being rude to her on two occasions. These complaints were investigated by managers and it was recorded that they were not upheld. We note that Mr Carey regularly reviewed the complaints made about staff and the outcome of their investigation.

199 FJH 30615.

207 Although we did not find evidence of systemic failings in the care HIA 233 received in Harberton House we consider the complaints she and other children raised about HH 15 highlight the importance of senior staff monitoring the number and type of complaints being made against a member of staff since a pattern of low-level complaints may indicate unsuitability and merit more serious disciplinary action.

Summary of Findings about Harberton House

208 We found that the SSI on behalf of the Department failed to:

(1) engage with the WHSSB to support it to consider how best to implement the recommendations of the Bunting Review, although it was aware adverse conditions were continuing to affect the care that children were receiving in Harberton House; and that this failing amounted to a systemic failing to ensure Harberton House provided proper care.

209 We found that the WHSSB failed:

(1) in its strategic planning of Harberton House to ensure that complementary services were in place that would allow its remit as an assessment centre to be realised and protected so that it could assess the needs of children and make arrangements for them to receive planned care appropriate to their assessed needs;

(2) to instigate a fundamental review of its childcare services despite the findings of the Bunting Review and failed to increase its scrutiny of its children's homes in response to Ms McGowan's concerns; and that these failings amount to systemic failings by the WHSSB to ensure Harberton House provided proper care.

Chapter 24:

Module 13 – Lissue Hospital, Lisburn

Introduction

1 Lissue Hospital was unique among the institutions considered by the Inquiry in that it was the only hospital to be investigated, and its functions therefore included medical and nursing care. It is not the Inquiry's role to evaluate the medical care provided, and if there remain medical issues which require investigation the task will need to be allocated to another inquiry to be undertaken by professionals with the appropriate qualifications and experience.

2 However, much of the work of Lissue concerned the residential care of children who were displaying behaviour or conduct disorders, and who might well have been cared for in other types of children's home or residential school if they had been available. Furthermore, most of the allegations made by witnesses were concerned with aspects of childcare, which is within our remit.

3 Module 13 commenced on 4 April 2016 with an introduction by Senior Counsel and we heard the evidence of ten witnesses who had been patients at Lissue Hospital as children. Sadly, one had died, and his evidence was therefore read out. Three former staff gave evidence concerning their respective roles in the multidisciplinary team - three nurses, LS 81, LS 7 and LS 21, two consultant psychiatrists (Dr William Nelson and Dr Roger McAuley), and LS 80, a social worker. On behalf of the core participants Dr Hilary Harrison spoke for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, (since renamed the Department of Health) and a joint statement was presented by Dr Carolyn Harper and Mary Hinds for the Public Health Agency and Fionnuala McAndrew for the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB). Since the closure of Lissue there have been twelve inquiries and reports based on investigations of issues related to the Hospital's functioning. Although undertaken following the end of the Inquiry's remit, their contents have a bearing on our findings, and the chapter therefore concludes with a summary of their contents. After nine days of hearings, the Module closed on 27 April.

The History and Role of Lissue Hospital

4 Lissue House was originally a private home, and in planning for the evacuation of children in the Second World War, Colonel and Mrs Lindsay offered the house to the Royal Hospital for Sick Children as a hospital for the treatment and convalescence of child patients. Thirty children were admitted in July 1940, which was timely in view of the air raids which Belfast suffered in early 1941.[1]

5 In 1945, after the War, the hospital was closed, but the Lindsays then donated the house to the newly created Northern Ireland Hospitals Authority. After a period in which the buildings were modified it was reopened in 1949 as a paediatric hospital, addressing children's health problems current at that time, such as tuberculosis, lobar pneumonia, rheumatic fever and worm infestation.[2] By 1959 Lissue was a busy branch of the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, treating surgical and medical patients and able to house up to seventy patients.[3] It fulfilled this role for just over two decades, and two of the witnesses were patients during this time.

6 With improvements in health care, there was less demand for these types of paediatric services. A report written, in 1982, noted that the illnesses and disorders prevalent in 1948 had almost entirely disappeared.[4] There was, however, an increase in the number of children admitted with behavioural problems, and the mixture of presenting problems caused management difficulties, so that it was decided to separate the children requiring paediatric care from those with psychiatric needs.

7 By 1966 the need for a psychiatric unit was becoming urgent. A working party chaired by Professor Carré was set up in 1968 and it produced proposals for a child psychiatry unit at Lissue. It was noted that under current guidance, per million of population, 20/25 beds were recommended for the assessment and short-term treatment of children with mental health problems, 25 beds for long stay for children, and 20/25 beds for adolescents. Northern Ireland had none of these units at the time.[5] The plans were approved in 1969, largely along the lines proposed by the working party[6] and in 1970 the upper floor was closed so that the building could be adapted.[7]

8 The next stage in Lissue's history commenced in May 1971 with the opening of the child psychiatry unit. It was the first such unit in the whole of Ireland.[8]

1 LIS 079, 810.
2 LIS 792, 811, 815, 818, 824.
3 LIS 080, 126.
4 LIS 824.
5 LIS 136.
6 LIS 135-149,151.
7 LIS 080, 812.
8 LIS 715-716.

The Hospital was now split into two units of twenty beds each. There was also the capacity for five day patients in the psychiatric unit. The paediatric unit remained on the ground floor and it came to concentrate on providing care for children with physical and mental disabilities, fulfilling a useful role in supporting parents by providing respite care from 1977 onwards.[9]

9 None of the applicants to the Inquiry was a patient in the paediatric unit during the phase from 1971 to 1989. The two units were run quite separately from each other and they had very little contact, though exceptionally HIA 251 was in the downstairs unit for a while and could not understand why he was placed alongside children with multiple disabilities.[10]

10 The eight witnesses from the period of almost two decades from 1971 to 1989 were all residents in the child psychiatry unit. The descriptions below concerning this phase all relate therefore solely to the child psychiatry unit. It addressed a range of needs, including enuresis, encopresis, anorexia nervosa and sleep disorders. Out of the twenty patients resident at any one time there were usually two or three with conduct disorders or behaviour disorders, where, as LS 80 put it, the children needed to learn to manage themselves. Their ages ranged up to thirteen for most of the period, though some older adolescents were admitted.

11 Dr William Nelson, who was at that time the only consultant child psychiatrist in Northern Ireland, was the first Director of the child psychiatry unit. He was joined by Dr Barcroft, and in 1975 Dr Roger McAuley was appointed. They each brought different approaches and skills to Lissue, described more fully below. When Dr Barcroft left, he was not replaced.

12 In his statement LS 21 said that in 1975 or 1976 when he had been the ward manager for two or three years, the police questioned him about allegations of serious sexual abuse made by HIA 220. (These allegations are described more fully in the section below on allegations of sexual abuse). LS 21 denied each and every one of them.[11]

13 In 1979 the placement of nursing students from the Central School of Psychiatric and Special Care Nursing based at Purdysburn Hospital commenced, and the students spent periods of four or five weeks at Lissue.[12]

9 LIS 812, 814.
10 LIS 032.
11 LIS 60518.
12 LIS 131.

14 In October 1981 there was a 'Horizon' programme on BBC television entitled 'Breaking in Children', in which Dr Roger McAuley explained how behaviour modification worked. Two mothers and their children appeared on the programme, one of the children being a witness to the Inquiry. Dr McAuley said that behaviour therapy was successful in one case in three, which was better than other therapies, except for tranquillisers.[13]

15 In the last few years of Lissue's existence there were four complaints of abuse. First, in March 1983 LS 71 made an allegation of three instances of peer sexual abuse by an older boy in 1982 and the police were informed.[14] An inquiry was conducted by the District Administrative Nursing Officer, (Miss Acheson), as a result of which it was decided that in future no young people aged over thirteen should be admitted.[15]

16 The Department of Health and Social Services complained that it had not been informed in accordance with a Circular concerning the reporting of significant events, issued in 1973. The allegations of peer sexual abuse were clearly a matter of public concern, and the Department had learnt of them through the Irish News. This was the first example of peer abuse reported in Northern Ireland, according to Dr Hilary Harrison.[16] [17]

17 Secondly, in November 1986 LS 68 said she had been sexually abused by LS 144, a male member of staff, when she was at Lissue in 1978. The member of staff had retired and was ill. LS 68 refused to make a statement to the police, and so the Director of Public Prosecutions directed no prosecution.[18]

18 Thirdly, in November 1986 a girl reported to LS 21 her "distrust" of LS 79, who was subsequently interviewed by LS 8, the Assistant Director of Nursing. No disciplinary action was taken, but LS 79 eventually left the service.[19]

19 Fourthly, in October 1988 LS 145, an eight-year-old boy, complained that LS 146, a twelve-year-old, had indecently assaulted him at night in the bedroom they shared. After investigation by the police the Director of Public Prosecutions directed no prosecution, but LS 146, was given a warning by the police.[20]

13 LIS 116.
14 LIS 239, 241.
15 LIS 240, 31655-31690.
16 Day 200, p.3-6.
17 LIS 098-100, 1414.
18 LIS 798-799, 31612-31654.
19 LIS 102.
20 LIS 31704-31714.

20 Following an inspection by the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Northern Ireland in January 1987, approval was withdrawn from both the paediatric and the psychiatric units at Lissue Hospital as suitable places for nurse training, but the report in which this decision was provided appears to have been destroyed. (See below.)

21 Lissue Hospital was eventually closed in January 1989, when the staff and patients resident at that time were transferred to Forster Green Hospital in Belfast. After a period when the building was left empty and became run down, it was damaged by fire in 1996 but had been refurbished for use by the Livestock and Meat Commission and was destroyed by fire in June 2016.

22 In all, between May 1971 and February 1989, 1,124 children had been admitted to the psychiatric unit at Lissue as in-patients, with annual admissions figures to the whole hospital ranging from 201 to 501, and 250 children were treated as day-patients.[21] Dr Harrison suggested that a minimum of 4,500 children had been admitted to the paediatric unit between 1966 and 1989.[22] The total number of children who were treated at Lissue during the four decades it was open must therefore have been much greater, and could have been as many as 10,000.

23 For the purposes of this chapter, the history of Lissue Hospital can be considered in two periods of about two decades each:

(a) the first phase from its opening in 1948 to 1971 when the Hospital mainly provided paediatric convalescent care, and

(b) the second phase from 1971 to the Hospital's closure in 1989 when it was divided into two units, respectively providing paediatric and psychiatric care.

24 Following the closure of Lissue a number of complaints were made which led to inquiries by the police and the responsible authorities; these are considered in a separate section towards the end of this chapter.[23]

21 LIS 792, 793.
22 LIS 80023.
23 For a fuller history of Lissue Hospital, see LIS 809-826, which is an extract from Love, Dr. H. The Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children: A History 1948 to 1998 (1998) Blackstaff Press, Belfast. (LIS 809-826) and Lissue Hospital History 1981 (LIS 124-133). For a map of the site see LIS 12699

Legal Basis and Governance

25 After the Second World War Lissue Hospital was re-established under the Health Services Act (Northern Ireland) 1948, and was governed by the newly created Northern Ireland Hospital Authority. The Authority was accountable to the Ministry of Health and Local Government for all aspects of the hospital system. Under the Authority, there was the Belfast Hospital Management Committee, and within the Belfast area each hospital had its own Management Committee, to whom responsibility was delegated for the day-to-day running of the hospital within the policies, guidelines and systems established by the Authority. Lissue was treated as an adjunct to the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, and it was the Royal Hospital's Management Committee which was responsible for overseeing Lissue's work.[24]

26 The Health Services Act (Northern Ireland) 1971 applied to Lissue, but it was soon superseded by the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972. In 1973 the structure of the health and social services was changed fundamentally, and four Area Boards were created, respectively for the North, South, East and West of Northern Ireland under the Order. They were accountable to the Ministry of Health and Social Services, subsequently renamed the Department of Health and Social Services. Although Lissue provided services for the whole of the country, the Hospital was allocated to the Eastern Board (EHSSB), which took over responsibility in 1973.[25]

27 In 1973 the management of the Hospital was removed by the EHSSB from the North and West Belfast Health Trust and placed under Lisburn District.[26] [27] This followed the principle of localising management as Lissue was sited near to Lisburn. However, it was contrary to Ministry guidance. Since Lissue had a province-wide catchment, it was argued that local management was less important than the long-standing link with the Royal Hospital.[28] The Eastern Board chose to ignore the advice of the Chief Medical Officer.[29] The new arrangement caused dismay.

24 LIS 794, 796
25 LIS 793, 796.
26 LIS 815.
27 Day 200, pp.88-89.
28 LIS 815-816.
29 LIS 816.

28 The outcome was that the nursing staff became isolated from their parent hospital in Belfast, being accountable through a District Administrative Nursing Officer to a Chief Administrative Nursing Officer, both being based in Lisburn, instead of through senior hospital nursing staff to the Matron of the Royal Hospital.[30] The consultant psychiatrists were the responsibility of the Eastern Board, as was the maintenance of the building. The social workers were managed by North and West Belfast Trust and the psychologists by the Royal Group of Hospitals Trust.

29 Dr McAuley commented that:

> "The interests of different line managements resulted sometimes in a lack of empathy with the overall purposes of the Unit…there was little cohesive caring for our service, as might have occurred if we had operated under one trust".[31]

In oral evidence, Mary Hinds spoke of the multiplicity of accountability lines and communication lines, the absence of any single organisation "looking out for Lissue" and the lack of anyone in overall control.[32] The move was described as "a triumph of bureaucracy over common sense".[33]

30 Indeed, it would be difficult to design a more confusing structure of governance. It was only at the level of the Eastern Board itself that the accountability for all aspects of Lissue Hospital came together.[34] Yet the professionals involved in Lissue were expected to collaborate in this unhelpful context as a multi-professional team. It is to their credit that Lissue functioned as well as it did. It is our view that the governance structure from 1973 onwards was a systemic failure, and it is fortunate that it did not engender serious management problems.

Finance

31 The Hospital was funded by the Ministry of Health and Local Government (renamed the Ministry of Health and Social Services in 1965) through the Northern Ireland Hospital Authority until 1973, when responsibility moved to the EHSSB, which was resourced through the Department of Health and Social Services.

30 LIS 085, 817.
31 LIS 484.
32 Day 200, pp.91 to 92.
33 LIS 484, 817, 80018.
34 Day 203, p.28.

32 It appears that from 1973 the financial responsibility for different parts of the budget lay with different budget-holders, and no one had overall control of Lissue's finances beneath Board level. This meant that when the budget holder for Occupational Therapy Services, for example, decided to withdraw the occupational therapist from the psychiatric unit, other staff at Lissue Hospital were unable to influence the decision. Presumably there was no one at Lissue either who could reallocate monies within the budget if the professionals involved wished to change priorities.

33 Although there have been subsequent criticisms of the level of nurse staffing, shortage of resources do not, however, seem to have been a matter of general concern or complaint during the lifetime of Lissue.

Management

34 The psychiatric unit was described as "consultant-led", and Dr Nelson was named as Director of the unit. Certainly the consultant psychiatrists were the most influential professionals in the staff team and they had particular responsibilities for determining the treatment plans for their patients. However, they did not have overall control of Lissue, and the lines of accountability were much more complex.

35 Until 1973 the nurses were responsible to a senior nurse manager at the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, but after the reorganisation LS 8, the Assistant Director who managed the nursing teams in both the paediatric unit and the psychiatric unit, was answerable to senior nurses based in Lisburn. The Assistant Director appears to have had no other responsibilities, and so his narrow span of control meant that he was fully involved in the running of both units, although his office was in Lisburn. He called at Lissue every day and became involved whenever there was a major problem.[35]

36 LS 21, who was promoted in 1973 from staff nurse to ward manager responsible for the psychiatric unit, appears from witnesses' evidence to have been a much more significant figure in the life of the unit.[36] There was a considerable amount of administration to be done, such as the organisation of staff training and the oversight of sessions with families. LS 21 found this work demanding and stressful, and for a time he shared his

35 Day 198, p.75.
36 LIS 60516.

managerial role with another charge nurse.[37] LS 21 provided professional supervision for the nurses on the psychiatric ward, and they also had sessions with the consultant psychiatrists.[38]

37 Similarly the psychologists, the social workers and the occupational therapist were all accountable within their professional hierarchies to managers in other settings. The social workers were professionally supervised by an Assistant Principal Social Worker at the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, but LS 80 said this only amounted to an occasional discussion if an issue arose where advice was required.[39] LS 80, as Senior Social Worker, therefore had considerable independence, but he did not have the benefit of regular professional supervision.

38 The practice policies which have been provided were nearly all drafted shortly after Lissue Hospital was closed, but it has been suggested that they reflected standard practice at Lissue.[40]

39 In summary, while the multiprofessional staff team appears to have collaborated effectively, the structure within which they worked was most unsatisfactory. Not only was there no single senior manager outside the unit who had ownership of Lissue Hospital with the responsibility for making it function effectively, but there was no single person accountable for the running of the unit on site. The hospital was reliant on each of its constituent parts working together, both in the day-to-day running of the hospital and in devising long-term strategy, for example in developing new treatment methods or in improving staffing levels.

40 In meeting the complex needs of children with psychiatric and behavioural problems it is necessary not only to devise suitable individual treatment plans but also to create an appropriate milieu in which the treatment can be offered. The traditional respective responsibilities of nurses and doctors in hospitals do not help in this respect, as a unified approach is required. The psychiatrists were the lead professionals, but their only responsibility was for the treatment of their patients. Other staff were not accountable to them and they had no control over the hospital's budget. In short, the chaotic lines of external accountability were matched by a fragmented internal management structure. The successes of the psychiatric unit at Lissue were thanks to cooperation between the individual

37 LIS 60516.
38 Day 198, p.115.
39 Day 200, pp.66 to 65.
40 LIS 158-167.

professionals involved; the managerial structure within which they worked was faulty and systemically unsound.

Inspections

41 When Lissue was set up, inspection was the responsibility of the Ministry of Health and Local Government under Section 63 of the 1948 Act. Under Section 70 of the 1971 Act, and then under Article 50 of the 1972 Order the Department of Health and Social Services had the general power to inspect. However, we have received no evidence that this general power to inspect was ever used prior to 2005, when the report Care at its Best was produced.[41] [42] Dr Kevin McCoy, who was Chief Inspector of Social Services, has stated that at no stage during his employment with the Social Work Advisory Group and the Social Services Inspectorate was an inspection carried out at Lissue.[43]

42 Lissue Hospital received a number of visits, three of which could be considered inspections. One was by the District Administrative Nursing Officer to investigate a specific complaint, one by the Mental Health Act Commission to review mental health services, and one by the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Northern Ireland to assess the Hospital for training purposes. There are no records of regular formal visits of inspection by the Departments, boards and committees responsible for the Hospital's services.

43 In the Belfast Hospital Management Committee Annual Report for 1971 Dr McSorley was named as the visitor for Lissue, but because of civil unrest, visiting was abandoned. There are no reports of such visits, and former staff felt that their purpose was predominantly familiarisation.[44]

44 The Royal College of Psychiatrists would ordinarily have arranged visits of inspection to units such as Lissue Hospital "every three years to examine the educational content of training and professional development of doctors", with inspections taking around two days, but no evidence has been found.[45]

41 Day 200, p.23.
42 LIS 087, 795, 827-961.
43 LIS 1450.
44 LIS 090, 188.
45 LIS 091.

45 The education provided at Lissue was subject to inspection by the Northern Ireland Department for Education Inspectorate, but we have no reports of inspections.[46]

46 On the afternoon of 20 May 1976 five members of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board accompanied by four professionals visited two hospitals, one being Lissue. They commented on the gross underuse of the paediatric unit, the overcrowding in the psychiatric unit and some dry rot. Although the notes of the visit commented on the high quality of paediatric nursing and the variety of psychiatric techniques available, the visit appears to have been made primarily to acquaint the Board members with the nature of the hospital, rather than as an inspection to ascertain the quality of services provided.[47]

47 LS 71 complained in 1983 of buggery by a fellow patient two years earlier, once he had moved on to Marmion children's home. The police were called in to investigate. The alleged abuser, LS 72, admitted buggery, and the police wanted to prosecute him but the Director of Public Prosecutions felt it was inappropriate.[48] [49]

48 The complaint was taken seriously, and the District Administrative Nursing Officer from Lisburn (Miss Acheson) made a visit of inspection. LS 8 was called in from annual leave to assist with the investigation.[50] [51] Miss Acheson's report was thorough and considered all aspects of the nursing task, staffing numbers and management, and other matters. She acknowledged that, assuming the allegations were true, Lissue's policies and systems had not protected LS 71.

49 She concluded that the unit was being well run, with one reservation, that the large number of children aged fourteen and over provided an element of risk and caused stress.[52] Nursing staff raised concerns about the treatment of older teenagers as day patients at Lissue because of the "strains" which this imposed.[53] According to Dr Nelson the school teachers were also concerned when older, stronger children were admitted.[54] In

46 LIS 803.
47 LIS 13644.
48 LIS 239, 31655-31690.
49 Day 201, p.62.
50 LIS 1414-1422.
51 Day 200, p.92.
52 LIS 236-237, 1415-1422.
53 LIS 1415.
54 Day 201, p.139.

consequence he decided that in future no young people aged over thirteen should be admitted.[55]

50 Dr Nelson recalled that Martin Bradley, who was later appointed as Chief Nursing Officer, made an inspection of Lissue.[56] We do not have a date or a report for this visit, and Martin Bradley has since said he was not involved in inspecting, or even visiting, Lissue.[57]

51 The remaining visits and inspections all took place in the last two years of Lissue's existence. The Mental Health Commission was established under Article 85 of the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, and under Article 85 it had a limited role to "keep under review the care and treatment of patients" and draw deficiencies to the attention of the appropriate authorities.[58] There is a record of a visit by two members of the Mental Health Commission for Northern Ireland on 5 January 1987 which suggests that other annual visits were planned.[59] No further reports have been found, but Lissue was closed less than two years later.[60]

52 The visit record was on a standard form which contained a description of the psychiatric unit, and the Commission also called in on the paediatric ward, which at that time was largely used for children with learning disabilities. With regard to the psychiatric unit, it was reported that patients did not have written treatment plans but that the notes of the ward rounds were used as the basis for treatment by nurses. Patients were followed up for a month after discharge, and were sometimes referred to outpatients for child guidance. The Commission were told that seclusion of patients was never used. The Commission's conclusion was that there was good multidisciplinary teamwork, though there was some concern about the adequacy of the staffing and the nurses complained that apprehending absconders should have been the responsibility of the social workers.[61]

53 The most significant visit was made by the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Northern Ireland, which conducted an inspection in January/February 1987 to consider the suitability of Lissue Hospital for nurse training. It should therefore have been a qualitative

55 LIS 240.
56 Day 201, p.149.
57 LIS 80005.
58 LIS 088, 794, 795.
59 LIS 13522-13533.
60 LIS 088.
61 LIS 088, 173-175, 796, 13522-13533.

inspection. No copy of the report has been found, but as a result of the visit approval of Lissue to be used for nurse training was withdrawn. At any one time there had been two student nurses working in the psychiatric unit and this arrangement ceased.[62]

54 On 8 April 1987 the Education Committee of the National Board considered that their grave concerns should be drawn to the attention of the EHSSB and on 9 December 1987 their minutes record a response from the Chief Administrator of the EHSSB to note that many of the items had been dealt with promptly.[63]

55 According to a brief summary in a memorandum dated 10 June 1988, the layout of the unit was "not seen as well suited for its present use" and "the philosophy of care was seen as restrictive and 'custodial'", because of the locking of doors, though the Mental Health Commission, which visited in the same month, did not comment on this. Eight requirements were listed for re-appraisal, ranging from the need for a philosophy of nursing care to the storage of videotapes, but there is no evidence that any application for re-approval was ever made.[64] [65]

56 Neither Dr Nelson nor Dr McAuley were informed of the withdrawal of recognition[66] and Dr McAuley said that, as the Assistant Director of Nursing Services, LS 8 had been remiss in failing to share information. He felt that this matter should have been discussed with the consultant psychiatrists and suspected that the decision might not have related to the quality of nursing so much as to a rationalisation of the training provision.[67]

57 While formal inspections had their limitations, they could have provided an opportunity for experienced professionals to check the quality of provision, to determine whether prescribed standards were being met and to observe the quality of medical and nursing services. When a unit was geographically isolated, as Lissue was, with relatively few outsiders visiting, it was particularly important that such inspections should take place, both on a formal regular basis and informally unannounced.

58 Because of their age and the types of presenting problems from which they suffered, the children were clearly vulnerable and in no position to speak for

62 LIS 13813, 80053-80055.
63 LIS 1087-1088, 1103.
64 LIS 091, 226, 1090-1091.
65 Day 200, pp83 to 84; Day 201, p.141.
66 Day 201, p.83.
67 Day 201, p.80.

themselves. Similarly, their parents, who visited on occasion, were often badly placed to make complaints, in view of their dependence on Lissue to cope with their troubled children. Nor have we found any references to other visitors who might have acted as advocates to ensure that the children were being well treated, such as clergy, general practitioners or independent representatives. External inspections were therefore of considerable importance.

59 We infer from the absence of references to formal inspections that, if they took place at all, they must have been at best very infrequent, and since one of the two external inspections of which we are aware resulted in the withdrawal of recognition of Lissue as a nurse training hospital, the lack of external scrutiny is clearly a matter of concern. The absence of any further information means that any detailed conclusion has to be conjectural, but it is plainly possible that some of the practices which were later subject to criticism could have been identified and dealt with at an earlier stage if there had been a system of inspection.

60 The Department of Health submitted that "it was not a failing of the Department not to have inspected Lissue Hospital".[68] Within the legal framework at the time this was true, as there was no prescribed duty for the Department to inspect hospitals. However, while the legislature bore the responsibility for debating and approving the legal framework, the Department and its predecessors were also responsible for the drafting of legislation, not just its implementation in practice. Neither the legislation nor the Department's policies provided for any system of inspection for Lissue Hospital, and, with the exception of the nursing inspection following the complaint made by LS 71, the visits which were made by those responsible for the overall management of the service or by senior professionals were essentially for their own information or for specific professional purposes, rather than the inspection of the services.

61 The Department of Health defended their predecessors' failure to inspect by pointing out that there were "layers of oversight" by professionals who had their own codes of conduct, that there were multidisciplinary meetings and children's meetings, and that the children were in frequent contact with their parents.[69] These measures were all useful, but they were no substitute for the regular, external, independent, expert surveillance which an inspection system should have provided.

68 LIS 80012.
69 LIS 80006, 80012.

62 Dr Harrison said that inspection was "a blunt instrument" which was unlikely to have identified abusive practices.[70] [71] Certainly, formal announced inspections have their limitations as it is possible to put on a show for the inspectors, but they are invaluable in establishing the standards expected of a service, in checking records and physical conditions, and in prompting possible complainants. They can also be backed up by unannounced visits. The "bluntness" of formal inspection is not a sound argument for its abandonment.

63 In the circumstances we consider the absence of both formal inspections and informal monitoring of Lissue Hospital on a regular basis to have been a systemic failure on the part of the Ministry of Health and Local Government and the Northern Ireland Hospital Authority from 1948 to 1973, and on the part of the Ministry/ Department of Health and Social Services and the Eastern Health and Social Services Board from 1973 to 1989.

Staffing

Multidisciplinary Teamwork

64 The staffing of Lissue Hospital was multidisciplinary.[72] In the Stinson Report (discussed below) there was criticism of the multidisciplinary working within the psychiatric unit, but witnesses reacted strongly against this observation. LS 81, for example, said that communication between the disciplines was good, and she found the consultant psychiatrists "always receptive and helpful" in responding to queries and talking through matters raised.[73] Although there are some references in the documentation to tensions between professional groups, they are relatively minor, and the general impression which we have received is that working relationships in the hospital were sound.

65 In December 1993 it was reported that in addition to the medical staff, psychologists, social workers and teachers, there was a total complement of 73 staff at Lissue, including 39 nurses and 30 ancillary staff, who covered both the psychiatric and paediatric units.[74]

70 LIS 80007-80008.
71 Day 200, p.27.
72 LIS 1197.
73 LIS 1200.
74 LIS 093.

Nurses

66 The psychiatric unit was staffed by a team of nurses who, in later years, had to have achieved the status of Registered Mental Nurse. Dr McAuley said that staffing provision was roughly in line with the levels recommended by the Royal College of Psychiatrists in 1971.[75] LS 81 said that short staffing was not "a prevailing memory" during her time at Lissue between 1984 and 1986.[76] LS 21 reported occasional staffing shortages because of illness, holidays and so on, but did not think it was a general problem.[77]

67 The Stinson Report identified four children out of a sample of 34 who required intensive care at a level beyond the available staffing. Restraint placed particular demands on staff time.[78] Concern was expressed by Mary Hinds that the level of staffing at Lissue had been insufficient, in that it amounted to 1.3 nurses per bed, when the current recommended ratio is now 3.3 nurses per bed. She thought that when occupancy rose the staff might have experienced stress.[79]

68 LS 7 said that, contrary to some of the other evidence,[80] staff turnover was low and in oral evidence she named four or five nurses who remained in the psychiatric unit for long periods of time. Indeed, some of them moved on to Forster Green Hospital after Lissue's closure, and spent their whole nursing career in work with children. Miss Acheson also mentioned low staff turnover when she reported on Lissue in 1983.[81] A core of staff who provided long-term service would have been helpful in the establishment of consistent standards. While Lissue was involved in providing training placements there would, of course, have been a steady turnover of student nurses.

69 Information was provided by the HSCB drawn from personnel records concerning nine staff.[82] Many of them had long careers in child psychiatric nursing; LS 7, for example, worked in Lissue and Forster Green for nineteen years,[83] and LS 8 was promoted five times in the course of his nursing career of 35 years, having been charge nurse, nursing officer and Assistant Director of Nursing Services at Lissue.[84]

75 LIS 481.
76 LIS 1199.
77 Day 199, p.54-55.
78 LIS 12290.
79 Day 200, p.78.
80 LIS 13533.
81 LIS 1420.
82 LIS 60522-60525.
83 LIS 60522.
84 LIS 60523.

70 Only one of the staff was subject to disciplinary action. LS 21 commenced as a staff nurse at Lissue Hospital in 1971 and was promoted to charge nurse (or Ward Manager) in 1973, a position he held until 1989, when he transferred to a similar position at Forster Green as Lissue was closed. Although there were police investigations in 1975 or 1976, LS 21 was not suspended. He was placed on precautionary suspension, however during police investigations in May 1993 into allegations made by LS 66 the police were unable to obtain any evidence to support the allegations from other possible witnesses, and he was re-instated in October 1993 when the police decided to take no action.[85]

71 When police undertake inquiries of this kind they are seeking evidence which will be sufficient to prove the guilt of the alleged abuser beyond reasonable doubt. If an employer is considering the dismissal of a member of staff on the grounds of the abuse of a patient, they require the lesser burden of proof on balance of probabilities. However, the employer has a primary duty to protect the patient and should consider action if there are reasonable suspicions of improper practice.

72 In this instance the EHSSB relied on the decision taken by the police and appears to have undertaken no independent enquiries to satisfy itself whether a lower burden of proof was met. By re-instating LS 21 without undertaking such investigations the Board left patients vulnerable and it is possible that any who made allegations at a later date might not have been subjected to abuse if action had been taken. (Green Park Trust was a Unit of Management within the EHSSB and was designated by the EHSSB at the relevant time as the employer of LS 21).

73 While we cannot say what the outcome of a disciplinary inquiry might have been, we consider the failure of the Green Park Trust to conduct its own investigations into the allegations of sexual abuse against LS 21 in 1993 to have been a systemic failure which left children at risk of abuse.

74 LS 21 was again suspended in April 1996 for working for an agency while off work because of ill-health and for leaving a child who presented a risk of suicide unattended. He took early retirement in July 1996 on the grounds of ill-health; it was suggested that the police investigation in 1993 had affected his health.[86] In oral evidence, LS 21 said that work at Lissue was "challenging, stressful but joyous at times".[87] He had been proud of his achievements, but what was now alleged was not what he recalled, and he felt he had chosen the wrong profession.[88] During his time at Lissue things changed "in a more progressively improving way".[89]

85 LIS 60524.

75 LS 7 was trained as a nurse in the 1940s, and although she had no specific mental health training, she joined Lissue Hospital in June 1975. She worked there until Lissue was closed and she moved with the service to Forster Green Hospital, retiring in 1994. She worked throughout as a staff nurse, acting up occasionally in the absence of senior colleagues.[90] LS 7 spoke appreciatively of her work. LS 7 said that nothing changed during her fourteen years working in the unit.[91]

76 Although never subject to disciplinary action, LS 7 was the nurse who was subject to most allegations of physical abuse. HIA 38, HIA 119 and HIA 172 all made allegations against her on the grounds of rough treatment. She said she was subject to only one complaint during her career, and that she had been exonerated.[92]

Psychiatrists

77 While the nursing team was dedicated to Lissue Hospital, the consultant psychiatrists, the psychologists and the social workers were shared with the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children.[93] For much of the time from 1971 to 1989 there were two consultant psychiatrists,[94] and Dr Nelson and Dr McAuley both gave written and oral evidence to the Inquiry. Each of them was responsible for a number of the patients.

78 Dr Nelson's philosophy was eclectic.[95] He introduced family therapy, and with the increasing appreciation of importance of family dynamics, parent accommodation was added in 1977 so that family interactions could be observed and parents could be helped with parenting skills.[96] In

86 LIS 60525.
87 Day 199, p.74.
88 Day 199, p.80.
89 Day 199, p.53.
90 LIS 1390.
91 Day 201, p.64.
92 LIS 1389.
93 Day 198, pp.74 and 81.
94 LIS 715.
95 LIS 715.
96 LIS 082, 812.

1978 Dr Nelson introduced a family therapy model, based on Dr Salvador Minuchin's work in Philadelphia, which entailed involving as many family members as possible in sessions at Lissue.[97]

79 In 1975 Dr Roger McAuley joined Lissue Hospital and introduced a behaviour modification programme in 1976, which was then a new approach in working with children. This became:

> "…the principal direction of care, with staff from all the disciplines adopting a behavioural philosophy in their work".[98] In 1977 he wrote a text on the subject, Child Behaviour Problems: An Empirical Approach to Management.

80 Dr John Barcroft worked at Lissue between 1976 and 1978. His approach was psychotherapeutic. When he left he was not replaced, and his workload was absorbed by Dr Nelson and Dr McAuley.[99]

81 There was also a senior registrar present throughout the working week. Registrars were medically qualified and undertook six-month placements as part of their training as psychiatrists. They did not carry caseloads but were able to advise staff, prescribe drugs and treat children medically.[100]

82 A number of different theoretical models were therefore in use at Lissue Hospital at any one time. LS 81, who had worked as a nurse at Lissue, noted:

> "These [different theoretical models] required different approaches with different children, and they were both of their time. Many of the techniques were new and innovative at that time in relation to the video undertaking with the families".[101]

In oral evidence she added that in the running of the unit the behaviourist model was adopted by the nurses and tended to be dominant in the way children's behaviour was managed. LS 80 thought behaviour modification was particularly applicable, and when it became the dominant mode for the running of the unit, he found the ethos helped children with other types of problem.[102]

97 LIS 716-717.
98 LIS 812, 480, 716, 812.
99 Day 201, p.68.
100 LIS 481.
101 LIS 1197.
102 Day 200, p.49.

83 HIA 38 complained that he felt that he and other children were the subjects of experimentation.[103] As the lead professionals, the psychiatrists were no doubt seeking new ways of meeting children's needs and were themselves learning in the process. However, we came across no evidence that formal research experiments were being conducted, nor that children were being in any way exploited in the search for new approaches. With the exception of certain incidents considered in the section on the witnesses' allegations, the treatment offered appeared to have been primarily with the children's best interests in mind.

Dr Morris Fraser

84 It is probable that Dr Morris Fraser worked at Lissue Hospital as a Senior Psychiatric Registrar in the course of his training as a psychiatrist, as he was employed as a senior registrar at the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children in 1970. In August 1971 he took a thirteen-year-old boy to London, and the boy later complained that Dr Fraser had indecently assaulted him.[104] On 17 May 1972 Dr Fraser pleaded guilty to a charge of indecent assault at Bow Street Magistrates Court. It is reported that the Northern Ireland Hospitals Authority was unaware of these events at the time, and Dr Fraser continued to work in Belfast.[105]

85 As one of eight people involved in "the abuse of boys on an international scale" Dr Fraser was convicted again of sexual offences against a child in New York in May 1973. This was reported in the press, and when he applied for a post as consultant psychiatrist in Belfast in 1973 the authority learnt of the conviction on the day of the interview, his interview was cancelled, and he ceased to work with children in Northern Ireland.[106]

86 Dr Fraser was found guilty of serious misconduct by the General Medical Council, (GMC) which deliberated on four occasions between July 1973 and July 1975 about the most appropriate sanction to apply. Strangely, however, the GMC does not seem to have taken account of his offending in New York and having postponed making a decision for two years and sought reassurances from Dr Fraser's colleagues, the GMC did not strike Dr Fraser off but decided to discharge his case and let him continue to practise.[107]

103 LIS 053.
104 LIS 120.
105 LIS 121.
106 LIS 121.
107 LIS 474-479.

87 There is no evidence of Dr Fraser's work at Lissue, or that he abused any child at Lissue, and no one has made a complaint. Dr Fraser continued to work elsewhere as a psychiatrist, though not with children, and he then took early retirement.[108]

Other Staff

88 There was also a clinical psychologist, two social workers and an occupational therapist, though the latter post was removed in 1978 despite the objections of the consultant psychiatrists.[109]

89 LS 80, was a senior social worker who worked throughout Lissue's period as a psychiatric unit. There were usually two social workers, working from Monday to Friday, and their workload consisted of both resident and day patients. Their work focused on supporting the children's parents and understanding the overall functioning of their families. They liaised with the community-based social workers who worked with the children, and they provided advice and support to the staff of children's homes when patients were discharged into residential placements, informing them about what had been learnt at Lissue. The social workers also participated in the family therapy sessions, but not in the children's morning meetings.[110]

90 There were also ancillary staff, and the children were not required to undertake any domestic tasks, other than tidying their bedrooms.[111]

91 Staff in the psychiatric unit not only wore casual clothes to create a less formal atmosphere in the unit, but both the medical and nursing staff also called each other by first names, rather than rank and surname.[112] This meant that children often did not know the surnames of staff, which has made the identification of alleged abusers more difficult in some cases.[113] Nurses continued to wear uniforms in the paediatric unit.[114]

Staff Training

92 Although in the early years, nurses who had had general nurse training were acceptable, such as LS 7, it became a requirement for applicants

108 Day 201, pp.103 and 104.
109 LIS 481, 715.
110 Day 200, pp.42 to 43.
111 LIS 1206.
112 LIS 007, 60516.
113 Day 198, p.81.
114 LIS 1390.

to hold the RMN (Registered Mental Nurse) qualification and the syllabus included a unit on child and adolescent psychiatry. A specialist training course in child and adolescent mental health was developed at the Purdysburn School of Nursing in 1990. It later transferred to Queen's University and was registered by the Nursing and Midwifery Council as a recognised course.[115] This lasted for fourteen months on day release.[116]

93 There was a monthly "journal club" where doctors, nurses and social workers came together to consider training and practice issues through presentations on research, cases or other subjects.[117]

94 There were also occasional classes for the nurses on specific subjects, including behaviour therapy, family therapy, child sexual abuse and medical conditions such as enuresis.[118] Nurses gave evidence that they had been trained in restraint, but others said that they had learnt by observing colleagues.[119]

95 Student nurses spent four to six weeks at Lissue as part of their RMN training, until 1987 when the hospital was no longer recognised as fit for the purpose.[120]

The Premises

96 Lissue House was situated just off the Ballinderry Road in the countryside on the west side of Lisburn. The rural setting would have been seen as helpful for children convalescing, and the siting near Lisburn meant that contact could be readily maintained with the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, which was the source of most referrals.

97 Approached by a long drive, Lissue House was a large building, with a spacious entrance hall and a grand staircase, surrounded by extensive grounds providing space for play. On the ground floor there were offices and the paediatric unit. The site was sloping, which meant that while children in the paediatric unit had direct access to the grounds, so too did the residents in the psychiatric unit on the first floor. One witness described the paediatric unit as being at the front of the building, while the psychiatric unit was at the back.[121]

115 LIS 1197.
116 Day 198, pp.123 to 124.
117 LIS 1198.
118 Day 198, p.78.
119 LIS 80043; Day 198, p.84; Day 199, p.48; Day 200 pp.63 to 64; Day 201, p.97.
120 Day 199, p.40.
121 LIS 007, 12837-40.

98 Within the building there was a staircase leading up to the psychiatric unit on the first floor and according to HIA 220 the door at the top of the stairs which led into the unit was kept locked.[122] The building was not ideally suited to childcare, and there were complaints that it was difficult to supervise the children because of the length of the corridors.[123]

99 The psychiatric unit was on two floors. Along one corridor on the first floor there were the kitchen and TV room and in the opposite corridor there was the dining room.[124] There were three four-bedded dormitories and one with eight beds, totalling twenty bed spaces.[125] Other than for babies, the dormitories were single sex.[126] A hobbies room, which had originally been the occupational therapist's room, was set aside for a train set, complete with papier maché countryside. The children played with the train as a special treat and HIA 38 described it as the Holy Grail of Lissue.[127] There was also a billiards room and a playroom with a rural mural painted by LS 21.

100 Beyond the dining room there were stairs to the eight single bedrooms, which were usually allocated to older children.[128] One single bedroom was fitted with a window for observation; HIA 251 recalled being in this room.[129] HIA 172 and HIA 38 both said that they had their own bedrooms.[130] HIA 38 said that there were bars on his window which prevented it from opening more than a few inches. He also said that the bedroom doors were locked at night, though staff have denied this.[131] There was also a sitting room on the upper floor, and a small kitchenette for dispensing drugs.[132] [133]

101 The buildings had been adapted to provide for the needs of psychiatric care. The bothy from the original building was incorporated into the provision and was used to house children's families, so that work could be undertaken on parenting and family therapy. Two rooms were set aside for observation, so that professionals in one room could observe children

122 Day 197, p.7.
123 Day 201, p.67.
124 LIS 008, 022.
125 LIS60516.
126 Day 198, p.27.
127 Day 198, p.27.
128 LIS 1204.
129 Day 198, p.90.
130 LIS 008, 049.
131 LIS 050.
132 Day 198, p.114.
133 LIS 1416.

and their families in another room where video recordings could be made for later analysis. HIA 38 recounted that he ran into the observation room one day and saw the shelves full of video recordings and the cameras for the staff to observe.[134]

102 Some of the rooms were gathered round a courtyard where the adjoining buildings were only one storey high, fronted by a verandah supported by pillars, and incorporating a bungalow. During disturbances children could gain access to the roof at this point and several did so. When HIA 172 jumped off the roof he hurt his ankle, and the concern caused was such that LS 8, Assistant Director of Nursing, issued an instruction that HIA 172 should be under constant supervision, irrespective of the views of medical staff, as he constituted a suicide risk.[135] Dr McAuley also issued guidance about the way incidents should be managed when children were on the roof.[136]

103 Although recommended by Dr McAuley, no one seems to have taken any action to prevent children from being able to climb onto the roof. The Eastern Board were responsible for the premises, and the failure to take preventative action may have been a symptom of the confused management structure. The HSCB has pointed out that this problem dated back to the time before risk assessments were undertaken with the implementation of the Health and Safety at Work (Northern Ireland) Order 1978, but addressing dangers of this sort should have been a matter of common sense long before the Order placed statutory requirements on employers. In view of the risk to the children who climbed on the roof and the danger which they caused to other people, the lack of action to prevent access to the roof was a systemic failure.

104 Immediately outside the main buildings there was a play area and the three (or possibly five) classrooms were beyond that, sited in two portacabins. The estate was surrounded by fields, one being a paddock where there was a chestnut brown pony called 'Pepper', which HIA 220 recalled riding.[137] LS 21 said that the hospital did not have any pets, and the pony may have been in a neighbour's field.[138] At the rear of the estate there ran a railway line. In the grounds there was also a large sandpit where the children used to tunnel, as if trying to escape.[139]

134 LIS 050.
135 LIS 1214.
136 LIS 166.
137 LIS 023.
138 LIS 60518.
139 Day 198, p.28.

The Patients

105 Throughout its existence, most of the children admitted to Lissue Hospital were referred through the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, though general practitioners at times referred children directly to Lissue. In the earlier years, grounds for admission included convalescence after operations or the relief of other hospitals when the number of children with tuberculosis peaked.

106 Once the psychiatric unit was open, the referrals reflected a wide range of problems, including conduct and behaviour disorders, phobias, school refusal, anxiety, depression, self-harming, anorexia nervosa, psychoses, obsessional compulsive disorders, encopresis and enuresis.[140] Children still came via the Royal Hospital out-patients, but social workers also referred children presenting behaviour problems directly to Lissue.[141]

107 Dr McAuley noted that the closure of some children's homes resulted in a higher concentration of children with acute problems in the remaining homes, with consequential increases in difficult behaviour.[142] This resulted in pressure to admit children with behavioural, rather than psychiatric, problems in growing numbers, and for Lissue to take in older children, which was resisted.

108 Dr Jacobs, who was invited in 2010 to assess the quality of treatment provided by the Hospital, criticised Lissue for attempting to meet the needs of children who required a long-term secure and safe environment, (See paras. 275 to 276) for a précis of his report). Dr McAuley, though, responded by pointing out that such placements did not exist in Northern Ireland. He argued that:

> "… government policy makers, by omission, need to share some of the responsibility for institutional abuse!"[143]

Lissue was not a long-term unit, and if lengthier treatment was required a child might be recommended for a therapeutic unit in England, though this was infrequent because of the cost.[144]

140 LIS 482.
141 LIS 117.
142 LIS 486.
143 LIS 486.
144 Day 200, pp.57 to 58.

The Witnesses

109 Of the thousands of children who were admitted to Lissue between its opening in 1949 and its closure in 1989, only ten have come forward as witnesses to the Inquiry. Many more were recorded as having been abused, however, in the course of previous investigations. Moreover, the victims of abuse in the previous investigations were drawn from fairly small samples of patients, such that the total number of possible abused children could be higher.

110 In view of the small number of witnesses, it is difficult to draw general conclusions about them as a group, but a number of features emerge.

111 Only two of the ten were at Lissue in the first nineteen years of the hospital's existence, and the other eight all attended the hospital's psychiatric unit during its last eighteen years. The bulk of this chapter therefore relates to life in the psychiatric unit.

112 Eight of the witnesses were admitted to Lissue between the ages of seven and thirteen (ie broadly during the latency period), with two being much younger. Although some older adolescents were treated at Lissue, there were no older teenagers among the witnesses. This would have contrasted with children's homes and training schools in the 1970s and 1980s, where the population was increasingly made up of older adolescents.

113 Some of the witnesses said they had been transferred to Lissue very suddenly, without being told where they were going or why.[145] When giving evidence, some said they were still unaware of the reason for their admission, though health service records were able to indicate why they were admitted in some cases.

114 The witnesses' histories differed greatly from each other. Most stayed at Lissue for a few months while their problems were assessed and treatment plans were formulated. A small number had serious physical illnesses, and they required longer term treatment and convalescence, in one case over three years. Some had specific behavioural problems which required medical or psychiatric treatment, such as hyperactivity, encopresis and enuresis. In a few cases the children were displaying unusually disturbed behaviour immediately prior to admission, such as trashing a bedroom in a children's home, and in these cases they generally returned to the children's home or moved on to a training school after a period of assessment. As Dr

145 e.g. LIS 022, 030, 069, Day 196, pp.22 and 29, Day 197, p.5.

Nelson observed, such cases were not necessarily psychiatric in nature, but there was no other facility which could manage them. Lissue had to cope with them in the absence of the specialist residential facilities which would have been found in large cities in other parts of the UK.[146] The mixture of age groups and presenting problems would have added greatly to the complexity of the residential childcare task.

115 LS 81 wrote of:

> "…the combination of children demonstrating and presenting behaviours that were described as difficult, high risk and unacceptable. It was a challenging environment to work with, children who were clashing with one another from a cultural and behavioural perspective. The ward promoted a neutral cultural environment but on occasions the history of Northern Ireland, the children and their cultural, social and family backgrounds had to be given very careful consideration."[147]

116 As Lissue Hospital was the only unit of its kind, the children were drawn from all over Northern Ireland, and they came from all sections of the community, as the admissions register indicates, in particular with a mixture of children from the Roman Catholic and Protestant communities.[148] It has to be recalled that the psychiatric unit was opened at the height of the Troubles, and while Lissue Hospital does not appear to have been involved directly, many of the children would have experienced violence or fear of serious danger in their home communities. HIA 220, for example, attributed his Attention Hyperactivity Disorder to having witnessed a shooting near his grandmother's home in Belfast and then having seen a soldier being violent to a nun as she administered last rites to the injured man.[149]

Daily Life

117 Medication was issued before breakfast. HIA 220 recalls being prescribed Ritalin. After breakfast and before school there was a meeting for all the children in the unit (except the youngest), at which they all sat in a big circle with cushioned seats, and the children could raise unresolved conflicts and announcements could be made. LS 21 said that he had introduced

146 LIS 716.
147 LIS 1201.
148 Day 198, p.108.
149 LIS 021.

the meeting, which lasted from fifteen to twenty minutes, and that it proved most helpful in resolving difficulties between children, and helped to settle them down for the day ahead. This meeting appears to have been a measure to help the unit run smoothly, rather than have any therapeutic purpose, and it was not attended by the consultant psychiatrists. There was a black mirror along the back wall, and behind the mirror was the observation room with three video cameras pointing into the room.[150] [151]

118 HIA 421 said that as she did not find the staff approachable she never felt safe to raise issues.[152] HIA 220 said:

> "Yes, you could say things, but on the abuse side of it you couldn't because there was a fear factor there."[153]

119 There was a handover meeting at 9.30am at which any issues raised in the children's meeting were discussed by the staff; the consultant psychiatrists participated in the handovers.[154]

120 Schooling started at 9am and continued until lunchtime at 1pm, with a mid-morning break. Schooling continued from 2pm to 3pm and the evening meal was at 5pm. Education was provided to the bedside in Lissue's earlier years, but in 1956 prefabricated classrooms were provided by the South Eastern Education and Library Board. There were four teachers.[155] Where children presented serious behavioural problems in class they were removed by nurses and placed in their own rooms, where on occasion they were provided with work to do on their own.

121 HIA 38 commented that he did not:

> "get much of an education at Lissue. Basic numeracy and literacy were taught but I did not learn much."[156]

In view of the wide range of ages and abilities among the patients at Lissue and the fact that most only stayed for a few months, it will have been difficult for the teachers to develop an effective educational programme. The records show a varied curriculum and good daily recording of the children's activities and progress reports.[157]

150 LIS 050.
151 Day 198, p.12.
152 Day 196, p.34.
153 Day 197, p.10.
154 Day 201, p.71.
155 LIS 820, 13531.
156 LIS 053.
157 LIS 657 to 668, 760 to 767.

122 The children were divided into three groups, which related to their age. The blue group was for young children up to the age of five, the green group was for children aged six to eight, and the red group was for children aged nine and above.[158] HIA 119 said that there were only two groups, and this could perhaps have been at a time of low occupancy.[159] The children stayed in these groups for meal times and recreation, with each group having three staff attached.[160]

123 After tea, the children then played - often outside - until supper at 9pm, though bedtimes varied according to the age group.[161] HIA 38 said that 'association time' was from 6pm to 7.30pm and that during this time, the children could watch television, play games, play football or table tennis, take up arts and crafts activities, or use the tuckshop.[162]

124 A communal set of toys was kept in a cupboard and the children were allowed to play with them at 'group time'.[163] HIA 172 said that toys were rationed; children were not allowed to have their own toys as that would have been unfair on children who had none, and his mother had to take away some which she had brought for him.[164] Unlike other residential childcare provision we have investigated, at Lissue there was no expectation that children would undertake chores, though they were expected to keep their own areas in their bedrooms tidy.[165]

125 Most children went home at weekends, leaving only three or four in the unit, and the daily programme was modified. There were weekly swimming trips, outings to the North Antrim coast, church attendance on Sundays and days out to watch the Orange marches. LS 7 felt that the children were "all spoilt".[166]

126 Children whose parents gave permission were allowed to smoke. This was a practice of which LS 7 disapproved, and she refused to hand out cigarettes to the children. In oral evidence she described how she searched one boy thoroughly for cigarettes, which she eventually found hidden in his underpants and shoes; she considered him "a vicious deceitful bully".[167]

158 Day 198, p.50.
159 LIS 002.
160 LIS 002.
161 LIS 023.
162 LIS 050, 482.
163 LIS 008.
164 Day 197, p.131.
165 LIS 113.
166 Day 201, pp.7,10 and 11.
167 Day 201, pp.13 to 14.

127 Dr Nelson said that he called in at Lissue:

> "...every day at different times of the day and also during night hours, with unannounced visits, talking to staff/children and walking round the unit".[168]

In view of his frequent visits Dr Nelson wrote that he was "very saddened" that staff had not felt able to approach him about the issues highlighted in the later reports.[169]

128 However, the nurses were the most constant figures in the children's lives, as they looked after the children whenever they were not in school. In practice this meant up to 9am in the mornings, in break times, from 3pm in the afternoon on school days, and all day at the weekends and during school holidays. The nurses used the school time for record keeping and meetings to discuss the patients.[170]

Family Contact

129 Children treated at Lissue Hospital were usually in close contact with their families. Most went home every weekend, but parents also visited the children during the week. For those undergoing family therapy there were sessions which were observed from the next room and recorded on video for later analysis; these involved as many members of the close family as possible.

130 The frequent contact with parents was considered by the Department to safeguard the children against abuse, as they had regular opportunities to complain or to let slip indications that they were being abused. The children's families also had access to the Hospital's complaints procedure.[171]

131 LS 21 said that as ward manager he made home visits occasionally, but that family contact was usually left to the social worker.[172]

Case Management

132 Nursing staff worked in teams of three in relation to individual children, one acting as the key nurse, the second nurse being in support, with

168 LIS 716.
169 LIS 718.
170 LIS 60515, 60518.
171 Day 200, p.28.
172 Day 199, p.75.

a health care support person being the third. This system should have meant that, allowing for time off and other absences, there would have been a member of the threesome present every day.[173]

133 At the conclusion of every shift, nurses were expected to write a report on the progress of each patient in relation to the implementation of the child's treatment plan. For a child with encopresis, for example, this would have included the recording of information on nutrition, fluid intake, toileting and psychological factors. Sleep patterns were also monitored at regular intervals in the night. The records in the documentation were factual and descriptive, and appear to have made no attempt at identifying the causes of the children's behaviour patterns. At the end of both the day and the night shifts there was a handover briefing, with a senior nurse staying on duty to oversee the children while the other staff held detailed discussions.[174]

134 A variety of records were maintained - admissions books, case records, medical and nursing notes, for example. Other professionals, such as social workers and psychologists, maintained their own records.[175] When patients were discharged, their notes were combined in one main file and forwarded to the referring hospital.[176]

135 The core of the case planning was the weekly Multi Disciplinary Team (MDT) meetings, otherwise known as 'ward rounds'. Dr Nelson and Dr McAuley held ward rounds, one on a Monday and the other on a Friday, in each case taking a full morning to discuss their patients' progress in detail with the nurses and other professionals. The meetings were attended by consultant psychiatrists, doctors in training, nurses, social workers, psychologists and a secretary to keep the minutes. When day patients were under consideration, professionals from the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children were often in attendance. At times, teachers or members of the children's families also attended. Nurses, including juniors, were expected to participate in contributing their observations of the children during the previous week, but the responsibility for the children's treatment plans remained with the consultants.[177]

173 LIS 1199.
174 LIS 1198-1199.
175 LIS 094, 1199.
176 LIS 095, 484.
177 LIS 716, 1197-1198.

136 For the first three or four weeks children's presenting behaviours were assessed. The nurses who were the children's keyworkers sometimes made home visits, occasionally accompanied by a social worker or a psychiatrist.[178] Among the assessment methods used were interviews in which children were asked about the impact of their medication. About half a dozen professionals were present and children were questioned in groups of four or five.[179]

137 The MDT then formulated a care plan, and the length of a child's stay depended on the plan and its effectiveness. Among the witnesses who had been at Lissue, some stayed for about three months, and others about eight months; only two remained at Lissue for substantially longer periods.

138 There was a points system to encourage good behaviour which applied to most, but not all, children. HIA 38 wrote:

> "On our bedroom doors we each had a chart with stars or ticks for good behaviour. I think they were blue or red marks and points. At the end of the week they would give you a plastic toy if you were well-behaved. I did not get a toy very often."[180]

Children could earn a phone call for 750 points or trips to the swimming pool for 1050 points, but HIA 220 said that many children were too rebellious to earn such privileges.[181] Playing with the electric train set was a special reward and:

> "…you had to be extremely well behaved to get into that room. You were only allowed 10 to 15 minutes to watch the trains go round."[182]

The train set was laid out with scenery and the children's role was limited to using the controls to start and stop the engines.

139 As LS 81 noted, there were some medical problems which required treatment that might have been interpreted as abusive by another child who witnessed it but did not understand what was happening.[183] This chapter includes a number of examples. Children with oesophageal problems or anorexia, for example, had at times to be fed by nasogastric tube, and

178 Day 198, p.74.
179 LIS 050.
180 LIS 051.
181 LIS 026.
182 LIS 052-053.
183 Day 198, p.75.

if children being fed in this way tried to remove the tube they had to be restrained. Such action was, however, planned and intended as being in the children's best interests, as they were liable to die if they did not take in sufficient nutriment.[184] It is understandable that such treatment was misinterpreted when witnessed by other children.

140 There was a bell and buzzer system to treat children who were enuretics.[185]

The Management of Difficult Behaviour

Introduction

141 Lissue Hospital fulfilled an invaluable function, both in dealing with psychiatric problems, such as anorexia nervosa, and in coping with behaviour and conduct disorders which could not be managed elsewhere at that time in Northern Ireland, as there were no special social services units where younger children exhibiting severely disturbed behaviour could be contained.

142 There were three main types of misbehaviour which the staff had to address. Firstly, a number of children ran away. The staff searched the immediate locality, but if they could not find the children the police were contacted. It seems that most children who ran away were apprehended and returned fairly quickly. LS 69 told the police that when she was returned from running away she was stripped and sent to bed for two weeks, with no bedclothes, with the bedroom door locked and a member of staff sitting outside.[186]

143 Secondly, children climbed on the roof and threw roofing tiles at cars and passers-by frequently enough for there to be a protocol for managing such occasions – essentially a matter of talking the child down and discussing what had led to this behaviour.[187] Various people were to be informed. Dr McAuley also gave instructions that children who had been on the roof should be sedated and kept in their rooms incommunicado for 24 hours. If this process did not work, discharge was to be considered.[188] HIA 172 said that "plenty of kids" climbed on the roof and that he did so a number of times.[189]

184 Day 201, p.75.
185 Day 198, p.93.
186 LIS 30076.
187 LIS 1204.
188 LIS 166.
189 Day 197, p.112.

144 Thirdly, there was a variety of disturbed behaviour, involving fights with other children, for example, or damage to hospital property or disobedience. Some of the misbehaviour was petty, but some could have had serious consequences. HIA 251, for example, said in oral evidence that he had set fire to a barn at Lissue.[190]

145 Peer sexual activity or abuse does not appear to have figured as a major problem for the witnesses, except for LS 71 whose allegations in March 1983 have been described above. The Stinson Report, however, identified fourteen examples of children sexually abused by, or abusing, peers, and this was also the subject of some later complainants.[191]

146 In having to manage these types of disturbed behaviour Lissue Hospital was facing similar problems to those which staff in children's homes and training schools were having to address. Indeed some of the patients came from children's homes and returned to them after some months at Lissue, and some moved on to training schools. However, the methods for managing the behaviour of children at Lissue were quite distinct from those applied in other settings.

147 According to LS 79 there were no set rules for managing behaviour but LS 81 described the methods considered acceptable for dealing with difficult behaviour. She said that staff always intervened when there were altercations between the children, using a loud voice or eye contact, or inserting themselves physically between children to break up squabbles.[192] LS 7 said that staff always intervened in fights, first by talking to bring a resolution, but then by intervening physically if necessary.[193] HIA 3 also mentioned relaxation techniques he was taught to cope with panic attacks, which proved successful.[194] All of these practices were acceptable.

148 Corporal punishment was permitted in other settings in accordance with the Training School Rules and the Children's Homes Regulations, but it was not permitted at Lissue.[195] Although witnesses have complained of rough handling, there was no caning or slapping with belts. LS 81 said she never witnessed physical chastisement.[196]

190 Day 202, p.42.
191 LIS 12282-12283.
192 Day 198, p.94.
193 Day 201, pp.20 to 21.
194 Day 199, pp. 8 to 9.
195 LIS 095.
196 LIS 1205.

149 In some training schools there were secure rooms or locked intensive care units to isolate and contain children going through a disturbed phase. Lissue had no such facility, though staff did seclude children in their own bedrooms. Very rarely, if a child's behaviour was too disruptive to be managed at Lissue, s/he was discharged and "bumped back" to social services.[197]

150 Forms of discipline deemed acceptable in Lissue were time out, the use of medication, special observation, placing children in pyjamas, confining children to their rooms and losing privileges on the points system.[198] Witnesses made no complaint about the points system or special observation (except that there appears to have been minimal interaction between the patients and the nurses minding them). There were four main measures applied to deal with misbehaviour, however, about which concern was expressed by witnesses:

- holding and restraint;
- time out;
- wearing pyjamas in the daytime; and
- sedation.

These will now be addressed in turn.

Holding and Restraint

151 The guidance on restraint, dated January 1989, was issued immediately after the closure of Lissue, but assuming that it reflects earlier practice, it is noticeable that it applied essentially to the nursing of adults, and of the seven "commonly used methods" of restraint only sedatives and the "inappropriate use of night clothes during waking hours" were used at Lissue. The guidance noted that:

> "Restraint is only to be used where all other methods of management have failed".[199]

The guidance focused on general principles such as avoidance, clear communication, the use of minimum force and good recording; it did not give practical advice on ways of restraining children safely and with dignity.[200]

197 Day 201, p.74.
198 LIS 097-098.
199 LIS 160.
200 LIS 163.

152 Mary Hinds noted that it was the responsibility of the nurses to determine the approach to restraint, and a balance had to be maintained between care and control. It took a skilled nurse to restrain a child with compassion and kindness.[201] Staff were trained in ways of restraining children.[202] In order to de-escalate situations where a younger child was having a temper tantrum, nursing staff held children as "a firm but gentle response". The technique described was to approach a child from behind, holding their crossed forearms in an enfolding motion, while talking to them about what was distressing them.[203] This was intended to be calming and comforting, akin to cuddling, and it was contrasted with restraint. LS 81 said that she never saw anyone restrained. Indeed, she said that the best practice was to try diversion first, and she said she had at times been concerned that some colleagues placed children in time out as a first option.[204]

153 An older child requiring restraint would, LS 81 said, be placed in a part of the unit which offered them a safe space to regulate their own behaviour without placing themselves or others at risk.[205] Where an older child needed to be restrained, any younger children would be moved elsewhere to avoid causing alarm. If a child was unwilling to be moved, s/he would be held by the upper and lower arms with a staff member on either side and walked to the place of safety. LS 81 never witnessed pushing or grabbing.[206] According to LS 7, a younger child might be restrained on their bed, but older children were held down on the floor, with staff holding their arms and ankles until they calmed down.[207] Dr Nelson assisted in the restraint of one girl who went berserk and he injected her with paraldehyde, whereupon she settled down.[208] LS 7 denied that gloves had ever been used to restrain children.[209]

154 Staff witnesses denied the use of physical restraints,[210] but applicants gave accounts which seemed to reflect a genuine child's view of events.[211] HIA 421, for example, said that she shared a room with her brother. At first:

201 Day 200, pp.93 and 94.
202 Day 199, p.48.
203 Day 198, p.85.
204 Day 198, pp.86 to 87.
205 LIS 1203.
206 Day 198, p.89.
207 Day 201, p.18.
208 Day 201, p.19.
209 Day 201, p.30.
210 Day 201, p.61.
211 Day 196, p.24.

> "He was always trying to break and smash things, and trying to escape. I remember the staff tied [his] arms in a child's jacket to restrain him. He would kick out and scream hysterically."

HIA 421 likened the child's jacket to a mummy's bandages, wrapped round her brother so that he could not use his arms and could be picked up by staff. He took his anger out on her, but she was moved to a single room.[212]

155 HIA 251 wrote:

> "I don't remember much of my time in Lissue because I spent the majority of my time strapped to a bed. I remember the medical officers strapping me to a bed on several occasions and going out cold. They gave me injections."[213]

On one occasion he was upset when a member of staff kicked a Meccano motorbike which a boy and a girl had made to smithereens. This upset HIA 251 greatly and he was strapped in bed again, waking up the next morning.[214] In oral evidence HIA 251 repeated his allegation that he had been strapped down, and commented:

> "No one is going to turn round and say they hit kids down".[215]

He denied that gloves were used, but said his hands were strapped to the sides of the bed.[216]

156 Dr McAuley said that there was no training in restraint until the unit moved to Forster Green, but that the practice was to enfold smaller children in the arms and to hold older children on the floor.[217] Where possible, staff would "talk children down", but while some nurses were skilled in this, others were less capable of doing so.[218]

157 The Historic Case Review found two instances in their sample of children at Lissue being restrained. The records of the restraint emphasised the children's loss of self-control and the dangers that they posed to themselves and others, and the Board believed that restraint was necessary in such cases.[219] Restraint was recorded in the children's notes.[220]

212 LIS 070.
213 LIS 031.
214 LIS 032.
215 Day 202, p.13.
216 Day 202, pp.12-13.
217 Day 201, p.97.
218 Day 201, p.98.
219 LIS 096.
220 LIS 097.

158 The Board acknowledged that:

> "It is known, however, that restraints, including gloves which could be attached to beds and bedding, were used in very particular circumstances with very disturbed children. This would have been in cases where children may have tried to harm themselves, or remove clothing and this method was employed to try and prevent them doing further damage to themselves."[221]

159 We appreciate that the nurses had to deal with disturbed children who were at times at risk of harming themselves or others. The use of physical restraints such as straps or gloves attached to the children's beds is not mentioned in the guidance provided by the Eastern Board, and the denials by staff that such measures were used suggest that there was no authorisation for these means of controlling children. The descriptions are, however, compelling. The occasions on which physical restraints were used may have been few, but their use was unacceptable; they would not have been used in other types of residential childcare, and their use in a hospital cannot be justified.

Time Out

160 The main form of behaviour management was the use of time out. It was seen as a "break from the treatment programme", and in the nursing policy dated December 1986 it was specified that time out did not mean seclusion in a secure room, which was the subject of a separate policy document.[222] Undated guidance stated:

> "In most young children short durations [sic] of approximately five minutes are quite appropriate. However, in general the duration should not begin until the child is reasonably quiet…There is no excuse for extending the time or forgetting that the child is in time out."

If a child refused to go to time out, he was to be taken, and if he refused to remain in time out, he was to be restrained. Time out was not to start until the child was sitting or standing quietly, and if the quiet period was disrupted, the time out had to recommence.[223]

161 The basic procedure appears to have been that when a child was unruly he or she was escorted to a safe place such as their bedroom; if necessary a degree of force was used, for example holding the child by the upper arm to ensure compliance. Once in the place for time out, the child was asked to calm down, and when the child was "reasonably quiet", the "minute per year" rule was applied, such that a five-year-old had then to remain calm for five minutes before being reintegrated to normal activities. The purpose was not to punish a child, but was a means of de-escalating problematic behaviour, allowing the child an opportunity to reflect and self-regulate behaviour.[224] There was "no excuse for extending the time or forgetting the child [was] in time out".[225]

221 LIS 582.
222 LIS 158, 159.
223 LIS 115, 161.

162 While it is understandable that practice may have changed during the life of Lissue, it was noticeable that each professional gave slightly different versions of the way that time out should have been applied, and the staff versions differed from the evidence of the applicants.

- Dr McAuley said that time out started when children were quiet and it amounted to two or three minutes for young children and five or ten for older ones.[226]
- LS 81 said that time out was for a maximum of 15 minutes for a thirteen-year-old, though the time could be extended to offer a calm environment to talk.[227] She also appears to have thought that the "minute per year" rule should have been applied as soon as the child was in time out, without waiting for the child to calm down, as there was a risk that time out could be extended unduly, though she herself never saw time out extended abusively for significant periods.[228]
- LS 21 could not recall the calculation of one minute per year, but said that time out applied while children were screaming and shouting, with five or ten minutes as a maximum. Children were told, "When you settle, it's all over."[229]
- LS 7 wrote of children being calmed by being made to stand in a corner for three minutes or placed on their bed by staff if they did not comply.[230]

224 LIS 1200-1201.
225 LIS 1217.
226 Day 201, p.99.
227 Day 198, p.105.
228 LIS 1200.
229 Day 199, p.50.
230 LIS 1391-1392.

163 It is possible that practice changed over time or that witnesses' memories were faulty, but in dealing with disturbed children it is important that staff should be consistent, so that children who misbehaved knew exactly where they stood and knew that they could not manipulate staff. If practice were as variable as the evidence suggested, it could have appeared arbitrary and have left children feeling confused rather than secure.

164 HIA 172 provided an example of the proper use of time out. She said that LS 73:

> "...made the place much easier. Even when [LS 73] was being strict and punishing you by putting you in time out she was fair and did what she said. If she told me I was going to my room for five minutes, then I was put there for five minutes. I respected her and she was kind."[231]

165 By contrast, five witnesses complained that they were left in time out for prolonged periods. They also saw time out as punitive on occasion. HIA 220, for example, said:

> "One time I was thrown into the cupboard and locked in the dark. I do not know how long I was in there for. I hated the dark. Whenever I was at home my mum kept my bedroom door open and landing light on ..."[232]

HIA 421 said she was left in her room all day sometimes and she refused the food which was brought to her.[233]

166 HIA 172 wrote:

> "...you could be left for quite a long time. I think some of the staff over used time out so they did not have to deal with us. Sometimes they would strip you and put you into bed. You could be left for the rest of the day or until the next mealtime. If you resisted you were manhandled. If you fell asleep because you had been left for so long and then couldn't sleep that night you were punished again for not going to sleep."

167 HIA 172 went on to say that he started to hallucinate, but thought that this could have been the impact of the medication he was given.[234] In oral evidence he added that he was separated from the group and supervised

231 LIS 011-LIS012.
232 LIS 026.
233 Day 196, p.34; LIS 071.
234 LIS 009.

one to one in his room "on observation", but that this did not constitute individual attention, as the member of staff sat at his door to ensure he did not leave. At other times he was left sitting on the toilet for long periods as a way of dealing with his soiling, or in the bathroom.[235]

168 HIA 38 said that he was occasionally locked in his room and denied supper for misbehaviour such as walking too fast on the corridor or pushing the lift button. On one occasion he ran into the video-recording room, and as a punishment he was locked in his room for three days during association time when the children had the chance to play.[236]

169 HIA 251 was put in isolation when a story circulated that he had set fire to a hedge and had burnt hedgehogs. This later proved to be untrue and Lissue staff apologised for placing him in isolation.[237]

170 LS 81 was concerned that time out was implemented without the prior use of diversionary techniques which could have precluded the need for time out.[238]

171 Seclusion was defined in an EHSSB policy document dated December 1986 as:

> "…the social isolation of a patient in a locked room on his/her own which he/she is unable to leave of their own volition".[239]

Seclusion had to be authorised by a doctor, and neither Dr McAuley nor Dr Nelson recalled patients at Lissue ever being locked up.[240] Seclusion was to be used for 24 hours if a child climbed onto the roof, but a member of staff had to stay with the child in his/her room.[241]

172 LS 81 said that doors were only locked briefly when an absconder was returned by the police until the situation had de-escalated. Indeed, there was debate as to whether doors should be shut, and practice was changed such that doors were left open, so that children did not feel closed in.[242]

173 The practice of applying time out was - and still is - acceptable in childcare as a means of calming a disturbed child. If applied properly it can be

235 Day 197, pp.97 to 99.
236 LIS 050.
237 Day 202, p.15.
238 LIS 1200.
239 LIS 114.
240 LIS 114.
241 LIS 115.
242 LIS 1204.

very effective. The volume of detailed evidence offered by the witnesses suggests that the policy was applied in different ways by different nurses, and that at times children were left in their rooms for excessive periods of time, perhaps locked in, and sometimes missing not only schooling or association with other children but also meals. While the policy was not at fault, the implementation of time out was not always in accordance with the policy and constituted systemic abuse.

Pyjamas

174 HIA 172 wrote of a variation on time out:

> "Sometimes I was punished by being made to wear my pyjamas all day and not sent to school. I used to sit in a room on my own all day looking at the pages of Ceefax. I was left school work to do but was unsupervised."[243]

The fortnightly summary of HIA 172's progress dated 17 May 1985 commented:

> "Has spent much time on a one to one basis and has been kept in isolation most of the time. But when he was on group activity, [HIA 172] participates very well, for a short time only."

Most other observations recorded his difficulty relating to staff and peers.[244]

175 HIA 251 was also at Lissue in 1985. His main memories are of being medicated and confined to his room:

> "I was kept in a room by myself and was very rarely allowed out to mix with the other children. I can visualise the corridors but I cannot remember where the rooms were as I was kept in my room most of the time. I know the staff office was right beside me so they could observe me. The door was always kept open and I could see out."[245]

176 HIA 251 was also made to wear pyjamas as a daytime punishment; indeed, he even attended the school wearing them. He was told that he had to "earn back his clothes".[246] On another occasion he was put in pyjamas when he was sent to bed early.[247] Allowing for the passage of time leading to some possible exaggeration, the impression which HIA 251 conveyed of being confined to his room was persuasive.

243 LIS 008.
244 LIS 1304.
245 LIS 031.
246 LIS 618, 620-621, 628, 636.
247 Day 202, p.16.

177 HIA 251 ran away frequently and twice he climbed on the roof, doing considerable damage.[248] His behaviour would therefore have posed serious problems to the staff. Indeed Dr McAuley had to issue instructions on the way in which further incidents of this sort should be managed, including tranquillising the child as soon as he came down from the roof.[249]

178 LS 81 said that the use of pyjamas to prevent further absconding was rare.[250] The Health and Social Care Board stated that the wearing of pyjamas all day was "an accepted form of discipline within the context of behaviour modification".[251] The purpose of making a child wear pyjamas in the daytime was presumably two-fold: as a punishment for a transgression, such as running away, and as a deterrent from further absconding, since he would not want the humiliation of being seen in public in night clothes. There were risks that the prolonged threat of humiliation would lose its impact, and that the implied humiliation did not provide a good basis for staff to develop a closer working relationship with the child. Indeed, the guidance on restraint refers to the "inappropriate use of night clothes", suggesting that this measure did not have the Eastern Board's backing.[252] While the practice could not be termed abusive, in other forms of residential care at that time it would have been seen as poor childcare practice.

Sedation

179 The evidence we have received in the course of this Inquiry suggests that very few children in children's homes and training schools were prescribed sedatives as a planned way of calming their behaviour, whereas witnesses who were resident in Lissue spoke of its frequent use. Furthermore, we have found no evidence at all of children in children's homes or training schools being injected in a crisis to calm them down, whereas four former patients said that they had experienced this in Lissue.

180 LS 66 did not give evidence to the Inquiry, but when reporting allegations of abuse to the police in 1993 she referred to being injected in the hip by a nurse, LS 78, as a means of control.[253]

248 LIS 628-631, 641-647, 651-654.
249 LIS 633-634.
250 Day 198, p.119.
251 LIS 1213.
252 LIS 160.
253 LIS 279.

181 HIA 38 said he was given Largactil every night, plus two Ritalin tablets every day, plus fortnightly injections by a nurse, LS 7. He feels that as a nine-year-old he should not have been given such drugs.[254] He said that he was also introduced to smoking to calm him down.[255] He quoted his father as saying that he was:

> "always lethargic and tired like a zombie, and not the hyper [boy] that went away".[256]

HIA 38 said that he was given drugs "willy-nilly", as were other children.[257] In oral evidence he said:

> "...we were injected all the time....I was always apprehensive, so I was. There is nothing fun about being sat on and having your rear end injected, so there is not, and that was it. You didn't know anything else till next morning."[258]

182 He felt that he:

> "...should never have been given such medication as my medical records show that I had no signs of mental illness."[259]
>
> "If you were very badly behaved, the staff threatened you with an injection and if you were difficult to control they held you down, usually by sitting on you, and gave you an injection in your rear to sedate you. It was the scariest thing in the world to me."[260]

HIA 38 provided the Inquiry with leaflets concerning his campaign to take legal action against the responsible authorities who, he feels, destroyed his life by placing him in institutions.[261]

183 HIA 172 wrote:

> "On one occasion I locked myself in to the observation room. The staff eventually talked me round and I let them in. When I was opening the door they threw water over me, pinned me to the floor and knocked me out. They pulled my pants down and gave me an injection."[262]

254 Day 198, p.5.
255 LIS 049.
256 LIS 053.
257 Day 198, p.
258 Day 198, p.7.
259 LIS 049.
260 LIS 050.
261 LIS 058.
262 LIS 009.

When he woke up, having been sedated, he found Lego, biscuits and snacks by his bed, which he recalled as being most unusual.[263] HIA 172 gave a similar account of this incident to the police in 1993.[264] He did not see the abuse he alleged as being institutional, but as the behaviour of individual staff.[265]

184 HIA 172 was recorded as having been injected with 5 mg of Valium on only one occasion, on 6 May 1985, when it was administered by Dr McCune, who was assisted by a security man, and the reason given was that HIA 172 had wrecked his bedroom. The chart of his sleep pattern showed that HIA 172 was running wild round the grounds until about 1am.[266] Dr McCune also prescribed Melleril syrup orally four times a day and further Valium immediately "if necessary", though on the injection record form it was noted, "If need to repeat, phone first".[267] This presumably authorised nurses to undertake the injection in the absence of a doctor, but after consultation.

185 HIA 251 said he was strapped to his bed on several occasions, when he went "out cold". He wrote:

> "They gave me injections. I could have been under for days and in that time I don't know what they were doing to me. There was a large mirror in my room and I must have been observed by the medical officers. I was given injections regularly and I do not know how long I was sedated for…I feel the injections had a negative impact on my life."[268]

The records confirm his recollections.[269] HIA 251 attributed his later drug dependency in part to the injections he had at Lissue, as they messed his head up. While acknowledging that he had behaviour problems, he did not feel that strapping him down to his bed and sedating him was the correct treatment.[270]

186 After one of HIA 251's escapades, Dr McAuley telephoned the senior nurse who made notes of the call:

> "…after child was returned to unit that child was being given tranquilliser to relieve Nursing pressure not given as a punishment for being on the roof, he asked that Nursing Staff were not to be negative towards the

263 Day 197, pp.130 to 131.
264 LIS 31222.
265 Day 197, p.94.
266 LIS 1350.
267 LIS 1340, 1343.
268 LIS 031.
269 LIS 646, 649.
270 LIS 036.

> child, but having said that, said child was to earn all his priviledges [sic] back as he earned them (by positive behaviour) I informed Dr McAuley that Nursing Staff were not negative but other disciplines had done nothing re arranging visits from Mum and Dad as had been promised previously and child had little positive to look forward to also child was very immature socially".[271]

187 This phone message indicates not only that HIA 251 had been injected to relieve pressure on the nurses, rather than as a part of his medical treatment, but that there were tensions within the multi-disciplinary team, perhaps caused by the demands which HIA 251 had placed on them. The boy, meanwhile, was sleeping with his thumb in his mouth.[272]

188 The HSCB suggested that:

> "... this note should be read in the context of the evident risk posed by the behaviour of HIA 251 to himself, other patients and staff on the Ward. By administering a sedative, those risks would be reduced and the Ward would be brought back under control."[273]

There is no suggestion in the records that HIA 251 was stirring up other children to misbehave. His behaviour was certainly a severe nuisance and there was a risk of danger to people nearby when he threw tiles and other items from the roof, but there was no need to bring the ward under control. When HIA 251 came down from the roof the sedative controlled his misbehaviour at that time, but it would have done nothing to help him understand or control his own behaviour in the longer run.

189 We have already quoted Dr McAuley's instructions that children who went onto the roof were to be sedated when they came down. The fact that this was a general instruction suggests that it was a measure to control the children rather than a specific decision concerning the medical needs of an individual child. It can, of course, be argued that each individual child needs to be calmed and settled, but the dividing line between the two justifications needs to be scrutinised carefully if malpractice is to be avoided. (In the 1980s there were instances in England where the excessive use of sedation to control disturbed adolescents led to allegations of serious abuse.)

271 LIS 649.
272 LIS 649.
273 LIS 80047.

190 Dr Nelson said that children were usually given mild sedatives in tablet or liquid form; injections were rare.[274] Except at night there was always a doctor on the premises at Lissue, and staff who provided evidence were clear that sedation was only applied if prescribed by a doctor.[275] Certainly this was the proper procedure. During the working week there was a senior registrar on site who was in a position to authorise injections in the event of emergencies. Dr McAuley said that medication was written up on a Kardex, that the nurses did not give injections, but the registrar, who was there throughout the working week, could have done so.[276] Dr Nelson, however, accepted that on occasion nurses might give injections.[277]

191 LS 21 said that the safety of the staff and children was of paramount importance, and that, as long as sedation was part of the child's plan, he would not have needed approval from a doctor on the spot before injecting a child.[278] LS 7 said that in her seventeen years in the unit she only recalled one child having injections, which were administered by Dr Nelson.[279] From the evidence provided by the witnesses we consider LS 7's memory to be at fault.

192 These different perceptions suggest that, perhaps at different times, there was flexibility in practice. Such treatment should only have been administered in the individual child's best interests, but the evidence suggests that on occasion children were sedated to make the nursing task easier.[280] It is clearly a matter of medical judgement to determine whether a child requires sedation in his or her best interests, but the drugging of children to make the job easier for nurses or to retain control of the ward is clearly outwith normal medical decision-making.

193 It seems that the use of sedation in the form of syrups and tablets was probably fairly common, and that injections were unusual but not rare. It appears that injections were usually, but not always, administered by doctors, and that nurses were at times authorised to inject children as necessary. While acknowledging that the nursing staff faced a very demanding task in dealing with disturbed children presenting difficult behaviour, the use of drugs to control children remains an unacceptable practice. On the occasions when children were sedated to render

274 Day 201, p.146.
275 Day 198, pp.119 to 120.
276 Day 201, pp.100 to 101.
277 Day 201, p.146.
278 Day 199, pp.45 to 47, 89 to 93.
279 Day 201, pp.8, 19.
280 LIS 649.

the nursing task easier, the use of injections constituted systemic abuse.

Allegations of Abuse

Physical Abuse by Staff

194 The only witness to make allegations of abuse at Lissue during its early years was HIA 404. He was admitted when he was very young with a history of multiple illnesses and he came from a family where tuberculosis was rife; indeed, an aunt who cared for him died of it while he was in Lissue. HIA 404 himself was later found to have scarred lung tissue. His main complaint was that he was cold; the windows were open and it was "cold like a dungeon".[281] Since one of the treatments for tuberculosis at that time was placing patients in the fresh air, this could account for his treatment.

195 He recalled a nurse who shook him and beat him and threw him down on his cot mattress until another nurse remonstrated and comforted him. HIA 404 was also hit with a dessert spoon by nurses who were trying to feed him, as he had difficulty eating.[282] He also remembered a male nurse who exposed himself, but did not recall any sexual contact. There is no reason to doubt HIA 404's account of his experiences but as he was so young it is not altogether clear that the incidents occurred in Lissue. When he eventually told his mother of the abuse she was astonished, as she had seen Lissue as a sanatorium in the countryside, providing the best possible care.[283] As HIA 404 is the sole witness from that era we cannot conclude any finding of systemic abuse.

196 The section above on the management of difficult behaviour has included examples of rough handling of children. HIA 421 was at Lissue in the mid-1970s. She said:

> "The staff were very physical and rough. They pulled me by my arms and my hair and trailed me down the stairs. I was shoved, dragged and thrown into my room and locked in on several occasions. It was an awful place to be in."[284]

281 LIS 065.
282 Day 196, pp.18 to 19.
283 Day 196, p.13.
284 LIS 070.

197 HIA 241 said she was aware that her behaviour was challenging and for a five-year-old she was strong and aggressive; it took two or three staff to pin her to the ground and at times the weight of staff on her made her sick.[285] She said she also saw children dragged along the floor into their rooms by their arms and being restrained.[286]

198 HIA 38 said that LS 7:

> "…had a pick on me from day one. On occasions she grabbed me by the scruff of the neck and she was rough with me and other residents."[287]

Although LS 7 could be "quite nice" if he conformed and "acted like the robot she wanted you to be", HIA 38 saw her as "evil".[288]

199 That informal physical punishment was used, appears to have been confirmed by a staff observation of a play session:

> "[HIA 38] seems to watch staff through play as if he was afraid of doing something wrong or turn his back in case he would get a slap, very edgy."[289]

200 HIA 220 found all the nurses very strict, and provided examples of physical abuse. When he was feeling unwell and felt unable to eat his dinner LS 22 hit him on the side of the face and knocked him to the floor for wasting good food. On another occasion when he got excited and was rushing round the room LS 23 told him to stop and when he ignored her, she took him to a bathroom beside the TV room and rubbed soap on his tongue until he vomited.[290]

201 HIA 220 said that when he and another older boy absconded they were caught by LS 21 and LS 27; he alleged that he was put in a bath of ice cubes and thrown into bed while still soaking wet and freezing, such that his bed was wet the next morning.[291] LS 21 denied the allegation, saying that he was never successful in catching absconders, and that they were always returned by the police or the Army.[292] The records, however, indicate that LS 21 did return HIA 220 to Lissue after he had absconded.[293] [294]

285 Day 196, pp.27 to 28.
286 LIS 070.
287 LIS 050.
288 LIS 052.
289 LIS 051.
290 LIS 025.
291 LIS 026.
292 LIS 60519.
293 Day 199, pp.69 to 70.
294 LIS 1182.

202 HIA 220 said that he saw another child, LS 14 being abused by being force-fed through a funnel.[295] LS 21 suggested that the allegation was "complete fantasy"[296] but from other evidence it is our opinion that HIA 220 probably witnessed LS 14 being treated for anorexia, and that he was being fed by tube as it was vital that the child should gain weight. Such a process could have appeared to be abusive to a child who did not understand its purpose.

203 HIA 172 told police of an occasion when he was misbehaving and was dragged down a corridor and put to bed forcibly by three nurses, who covered him completely with a quilt until he quietened down.[297] This practice was also noted in the Stinson Report. In oral evidence HIA 172 said that for confinement purposes in the daytime a bed in the dormitory next to the dining room was used; children were stripped, put under a quilt and then thumped by staff.[298] Staff witnesses have denied that this happened.

204 HIA 172 said that one night he climbed out of a window, ran around the grounds in bare feet, climbed in through the kitchen window and took a tin of biscuits. He was about to go back to bed when LS 8 grabbed him by the hair, dragged him along the corridor and up the stairs and flung him into his bedroom, such that his head hit the low windowsill. HIA 172's mother visited the next day but did not remonstrate when LS 8 denied hurting him and said that the boy had caused the bump on his head himself.[299]

205 By contrast, it is clear from records that staff attempted to be accommodating to HIA 172's behaviour by approaching him positively and trying to avoid triggers to disturbed behaviour.[300]

206 HIA 119 was placed at Lissue in 1983, and said he was:

> "…subjected to physical and mental abuse on a daily basis by three members of staff: LS 34, LS 7 and a man called LS 35. The abuse started a couple of weeks after I arrived."

207 Staff whom he considered to be nice did not intervene, but comforted him and told him he would be all right. He alleged that he was slapped, kicked, nipped and verbally abused, identifying LS 7 as the worst abuser. He found

295 LIS 025.
296 LIS 60520.
297 LIS 31220.
298 Day 197, p.80.
299 LIS 011, LIS 31221.
300 LIS 1323.

slapping round the legs very painful; if caught talking at mealtimes he was pulled from his chair by the ear and sent to his room without anything to eat. Sometimes they were locked in their rooms.[301] He said that every day he was treading on egg shells in fear of being beaten.[302] He was kicked or slapped by staff when they passed in the corridor.[303] HIA 119 said that he also saw other children physically abused.[304]

208 HIA 119 recounted a specific incident in which LS 35, a nurse, had stamped on his hand several times while playing football. Being in pain, he complained and was taken to Lagan Valley Hospital where a hairline fracture to one of his fingers was identified. He was told to say it was an accident.[305] On another occasion LS 35 spun a roundabout so fast that HIA 119 fell off and broke his wrist. Again, he was told to tell the doctor it was an accident.[306] LS 35 has not been identified. There are confirmatory records that HIA 119 was taken to casualty on 11 July 1984 for an injured finger and on 22 July 1984 for an injured wrist.[307]

209 HIA 251 alleged that he was hit on several occasions by a member of staff who also taunted him when he wanted a cigarette. He felt that it was as if the member of staff was "playing mind games" with him, perhaps to make him react by running away.[308] [309] Another incident which had made a great impression on him was when he absconded and the "gateman" caught him and pushed his face in a puddle until two policemen and a member of staff pulled the gateman off.[310]

210 HIA 3 complained of physical abuse, as the staff grabbed him and pushed him to get him to do what they wanted. They were physically rough, grabbing his shoulders and the back of his neck. One "cocky" member of staff punched and shook HIA 3 any time that they met.[311] He felt that there was little care or understanding. One night when he was unsettled he got up and walked around; the staff shouted at him, grabbed him by the shoulders and put him back to bed.[312] This evidence is in contrast

301 LIS 002.
302 LIS 003.
303 LIS 004.
304 LIS 003.
305 LIS 002.
306 LIS 003.
307 LIS 970, 1024.
308 LIS 032.
309 Day 202, p.43.
310 LIS 033.
311 LIS 043.
312 LIS 045.

with some of the records, which describe the way that staff tried to help HIA 3 settle at night and taught him how to use relaxation and breathing techniques to counteract panic attacks.[313]

211 With one exception,[314] the physical abuse which was alleged was all in response to difficult behaviour which staff were attempting to control. There is no doubt that the work was difficult and the children's misbehaviour was challenging and at times exasperating, but the blank denials by all staff concerning any form of excessive reactions to the children are not convincing in the face of the detailed evidence of the former patients. It may well be that the incidents which rankled with the former patients have been forgotten by the staff. It is our opinion that at times some staff did overstep the mark and were unduly rough in their treatment of the children, and that this constituted systemic abuse.

Sexual Abuse by Staff

212 HIA 426 suffered from chronic bronchial asthma and he attended Lissue from 1968 to 1971, before the psychiatric unit was opened. His only allegation is that a male nurse, LS 9 regularly took him to a part of the hospital that was little used and masturbated him. He said that he was pinned against a wall in a corridor and abused, "not aggressively, but tenderly". HIA 426 was discharged but re-admitted the following year, and the abuse recommenced.[315]

213 HIA 294 was admitted to Lissue Hospital around 1969 for the treatment of an eating disorder and encopresis. He said that he was put on his stomach and could not see the faces of staff. "And there was someone down below and I don't know if I was or if I wasn't…But I can remember the same thing happening to some other wee boy, the same cries." This made him feel "very dirty".[316] It is our opinion that the incident was probably some form of treatment for HIA 294's encopresis, rather than sexual abuse, and it is understandable that, if HIA 294 did not understand what was happening, he found the incident sufficiently upsetting to be memorable.

214 HIA 220 alleged that he had been sexually assaulted by LS 21 on a number of occasions. He recalled that on the first occasion he was "attacked", LS

313 LIS 721, 730, 737-738.
314 LIS 004.
315 LIS 038.
316 LIS 060.

21 took him to his dormitory, locked the door, said that he was HIA 220's friend, and rubbed his hands up and down his legs, touching his genitals. On the second occasion LS 21 was more violent and he raped HIA 220, saying that this was their "little secret". HIA 220 said that this continued two or three times a month until he left Lissue.[317]

215 HIA 220 said that he knew that other children were being abused, but they did not speak of it and kept themselves to themselves, not being "outward".[318] He felt that other staff were aware of what was happening but turned a blind eye to it.[319] LS 21 denied these allegations, pointing out that the bedroom doors had glass panels and the bedroom was very close to a busy office, so that any abuse would have been readily visible.[320]

216 HIA 220 also recounted an incident in which he was lured to an arts and crafts room to play with a new train set. He alleged that the door was locked, and that he was raped on a bed not only by LS 21 but also by a second member of staff, LS 27, while he was made to perform oral sex on LS 21 and masturbate a third member of staff, LS 26. Neither of the additional abusers, about whom HIA 220 provided further identifying information, touched him again.[321]

217 LS 21 denied the allegations against him, stating that he had tried to live his life by Christian principles and found the allegations "distasteful and disgusting". He said that the only craft room was very small, had no bed and would have had painting materials in it.[322] HIA 38 said that the room with the train set was next door to the interview room. LS 21 also denied that there were workers at Lissue called LS 27 or[323] LS 26, suggesting that they were "a complete concoction".

218 HIA 220's account of this incident is unique among the allegations of sexual abuse at Lissue. It is the only one involving more than one abuser, and it would have entailed discussion between the three staff beforehand and forward planning in the siting of the bed in the hobbies room. Neither LS 26 nor LS 27 has been identified from any HSC records.[324]

317 LIS 31282-31283.
318 Day 197, p.13.
319 LIS 024.
320 LIS 60520.
321 LIS 024, 31001, 31283-31284.
322 LIS 60518-60519.
323 LIS 052.
324 LIS 1159.

219 The allegations described here were provided by three of the witnesses, but a number of other former patients came forward later, alleging sexual abuse. Some of their allegations are described in the section below on Allegations 1993-2008, suggesting that LS 79 abused patients.

220 Our conclusions are that HIA 426's account is persuasive, but appears to relate to a single member of staff, while HIA 294 may well have mistaken medical treatment for possible abuse. In neither case could their experiences be termed systemic abuse.

221 HIA 220's accounts refer primarily to LS 21, and it is perhaps significant that two female former patients, LS 66 and LS 69, also named LS 21. He strongly denied all abuse, and in oral evidence he said that he had been informed that he would not be prosecuted, having received a letter (in August or September 2015, he thought) to advise him that no further action was to be taken against him.[325] We did not find LS 21's evidence persuasive.

222 We accept that some patients were sexually abused and consider this to have been systemic abuse.

Emotional Abuse by Staff

223 HIA 421 was aged five when she was admitted to Lissue. She came from an abusive home where her mother was violent towards her and prior to admission she had suffered burns, beatings, broken limbs and dysentery, but she found no respite at Lissue. Looking back she said:

> "I cannot remember how long I stayed in Lissue but I do remember it was a horrible place. It was very strict and there was no care or affection from the staff. I remember lots of children crying and screaming all the time. It seemed like nobody cared that the children were unhappy. It was a cold and frightening place."[326]

224 HIA 172 wrote:

> "There were three types of people working in Lissue: the gentle and kind people, the neutral people and then the vicious people. The latter were bullies who seemed determined to humiliate and punish at every opportunity as they were disinterested [sic] in the children. ...There was no humanity in the care they provided and I was deprived of any motherly love."[327]

325 LIS 60515.
326 LIS 070.
327 LIS 009.

225 In a contemporaneous summary of his case, dated 23 July 1985, Dr McCune made the point that HIA 172:

> "...seemed to thrive in one to one situations with lots of affection, which he got from both teaching and nursing staff". [328]

He also "revelled in praise" and responded in his schoolwork by applying himself better, taking great pride in completing tasks.[329]

226 HIA 172 provided two examples of emotional abuse. When his mother left after a visit, he was upset and cried, watching her out of the window, and a nurse, LS 6 told him that his "mum didn't love [him] and to shut up and stop crying".[330]

227 He said that on the second occasion he had made a pair of trousers out of a white sheet and LS 7 embarrassed him by making him parade up and down the corridor in them, revealing his genitals.[331] It should be noted that her version of the incident is quite different. She said that, because the other boys were wearing shorts, HIA 172 had cut down a pair of trousers to the point where they were indecent, and she had a battle with him to insist that he wore a more presentable pair.[332] [333]

228 HIA 172 said:

> "[LS 7] made it her mission to punish me as frequently as she could. I could not step out of line or make any sort of mistake when she was around or I would be put in my room or standing with my nose in the corner...I wasn't the only one; there were lots of other kids you know, and most of them probably haven't come forward because most of them don't want to go through this, don't want to hear or read about how they are denying what they did to kids."[334]

229 Other than physically rough handling, the main concern of HIA 3 was that staff made fun of him and attempted to belittle him and his family. HIA 3 was concerned that he might have suffered a brain haemorrhage and was very anxious, and he said that one member of staff made fun of his problems, saying things such as, "Is your head still on your shoulders?" HIA

328 LIS 1318-1319.
329 LIS 1319.
330 LIS 010.
331 LIS 010.
332 LIS 1395-1396.
333 Day 201, pp.30 to 32.
334 Day 197, pp.103 to 104.

3 found the taunting distressing. He witnessed the same man mimicking a boy with Tourette's syndrome, which annoyed and depressed him.[335] [336]

230 The nurses' records noted:

> "[HIA 3] unable to share a joke with his peers and staff, he likes to sit and have a laugh at other peers but doesn't like the joke to be on him. Tonight staff teasing him and he was unable to take it, ran out of the room and began to cry, when spoken to firmly he settled quickly."[337]

Dr McAuley was clearly shocked when this entry was drawn to his attention and expressed his concern.[338] The HSCB have acknowledged that such teasing was inappropriate.[339] It is our view that if a child is as fragile as HIA 3 was at this time, it was unprofessional to tease him. We consider this to have been an instance of systemic abuse.

231 When family therapy sessions were held, the staff asked HIA 3 and his family questions which he found belittling, degrading and humiliating, for example about his sexuality. His brother walked out on one occasion, though his parents trusted the professionals and never queried the line of questioning.[340] [341] LS 21 said that he would never have asked a child about masturbation and doubted whether the psychiatrists would have done so either.[342] Clearly the professionals involved would have had reasons for asking questions, despite any discomfort they caused, and we are not in a position to form an opinion on what was part of HIA 3's treatment. Even though he was only there for three months, HIA 3's perception was that his life had been ruined by Lissue.[343]

232 There were witnesses who felt that their experiences in Lissue had been seriously damaging. HIA 220, for example, had wanted to be an airline pilot, and he said that while others might consider his aspirations laughable, his dream never came true because his whole life had been "totally destroyed" by Lissue. He pointed out that others who had been through Lissue Hospital had committed suicide or taken to drugs.[344] HIA

335 LIS 043.
336 Day 199, pp.6 to 7.
337 LIS 758.
338 Day 201, p.123.
339 LIS 80036.
340 LIS 044.
341 Day 199, p.15.
342 Day 199, p.55.
343 LIS 045.
344 Day 197, pp.39, 43.

3 felt that Lissue had failed him; while his brothers and sisters had all obtained degrees at universities, he had no qualifications, and in his twenties had turned to alcohol and was not confident socially.[345]

233 In the Stinson Report, out of a sample of 34 case files, eleven instances of humiliation were identified in which:

> "Children were reduced to their most vulnerable state, i.e. having their dignity taken from them,..."

for example in strip searches, at bath time or when on the toilet.[346]

234 The examples above include specific instances which children found hurtful as well as generalised judgements that some patients had found their time at Lissue damaging. The records also indicate times when staff were trying to be supportive and sensitive to the needs of children who had had difficult times prior to admission. It is our conclusion, however, that there were many instances when staff were unfeeling and failed the children who required their support, and that these shortcomings were sufficiently frequent to be deemed systemic emotional abuse.

Unacceptable Practices

235 HIA 421 was admitted to Lissue in 1976 and she described aspects of childcare practice which were poor, though some fell short of being abusive. She wet the bed and she said that the staff refused to change the sheets, but left her in wet underwear for days. She was very sore, and when she complained, she was dragged into the bathroom and thrown into a cold bath with disinfectant, such that her skin was "roaring red". She was left freezing with no towel. As she was a constant bed-wetter, and since the sheets were not changed and smelt appalling, she often had to sleep on the floor. She did not sleep properly and was tired during the day.[347]

236 In a case review report in 1986 it was noted that HIA 421 had "a total disregard for her personal hygiene".[348] HIA 421's treatment for enuresis as described was clearly unacceptable. The HSCB say that they do not accept HIA 421's account of her treatment.[349] While the frequency of such treatment may be open to doubt, we accepted her account of events.

345 Day 199, p.26.
346 LIS 12289.
347 LIS 070-071.
348 LIS 1148.
349 LIS 80026.

237 HIA 172, who was admitted to Lissue in 1980, was also regularly enuretic and put in a bath containing Dettol. He said:

> "The staff did not want to touch me and it made me feel like I had a disease. I felt I was being sterilised in the bath and I found it quite upsetting."[350]

238 HIA 421 also alleged that if she refused to eat food it was left till she ate it, and she added that morning times were mayhem, with children screaming and banging at the table.[351] This could have been before LS 21 introduced the morning meetings, which he said made daytimes much calmer.

239 HIA 172 also said he was punished for not eating his food:

> "I remember a member of staff putting me in a room with a bowl of cold peas and telling me I was not allowed to leave until they were finished. I put them in my mouth and then ran to the toilet to spit them out. I think this is an example of the pettiness and inhumane treatment by the staff."[352]

There is written evidence, however, that HIA 172 had eating problems and that his behaviour modification plan was designed to help him eat in an acceptable manner, as he had been using his fingers, cramming his mouth and spattering his food over everyone.[353]

240 LS 7 wrote that children were encouraged, but not forced, to eat:

> "A child could not be pandered to and there was a set diet. Certainly a child would be encouraged to eat, with the admonition if they did not eat then what was put in front of them, that there was no further food going to be available at that sitting."[354]

241 During police enquiries, HIA 172 accused LS 7 of squirting lemon juice into the mouth of a little girl.[355] She explained that this was part of a treatment plan authorised by Dr McAuley; the child had great difficulty masticating and swallowing and it was thought that the lemon juice might act as a stimulant to eat other food. The girl eventually required surgery to correct her swallowing reflex.[356]

350 LIS 008.
351 LIS 071.
352 LIS 008.
353 LIS 1280.
354 LIS 1394-1395.
355 LIS 31144.
356 LIS 1396.

242 HIA 421 said that children were not allowed to talk and communication was not encouraged, so that they never bonded.[357] She was described in her case review as "glum and unsmiling" and having "very low self-esteem".[358]

243 Some of the examples given above describe poor childcare practice, but they appear to be isolated examples rather than consistent systemic abuse.

Staff Responses to Allegations

244 All the members of the nursing staff against whom former patients made allegations have consistently denied all accusations. A number also stated that they had not seen any colleagues assaulting children either. LS 81, for example, acknowledged that some of the older staff were "firmer", including LS 7, but she also described her as being "compassionate".[359] She said that guidance, not force, was used when children were placed in time out, and that staff tried to be supportive rather than coercive.[360]

245 The allegations which LS 7 faced were both general and specific, but they all related to rough handling of children. LS 7 denied all the allegations unequivocally:

> "I refute all and every such allegation from the most minor, to the most serious."[361]

She said that she enjoyed her entire time at Lissue, and believed that her work had been valuable, with positive outcomes.[362] She said that the method of creating an orderly atmosphere was to make a child stand in a corner for three minutes, and if that were insufficient, to take the child to his/her room and place the child on the bed. She found all the children "engaging to varying extents" except for one, who was "a deceitful bully".[363] LS 21 said that LS 7 was "very competent" and he had recommended her upgrading.[364]

357 LIS 071.
358 LIS 1148.
359 Day 198, p.101.
360 Day 198, p.102.
361 LIS 1391.
362 LIS 1398.
363 LIS 1392.
364 Day 199, p.42.

246 As noted in para. 211, in view of the volume of detailed evidence provided by the complainants, we found the denials of the staff unpersuasive.

Abuse by Peers

247 HIA 38 said that he was "beaten by other children almost daily", and pointed out that the records indicated that staff were aware. He felt that the records suggested that staff did not intervene, and the tone of the records:

> "...would suggest that the staff thought I deserved the beatings."[365]

The Health and Social Care Board argued that staff were concerned that HIA 38 brought out the worst in his peers, niggling them to the point that he required protection.[366] The incidents to which HIA 38 referred were clearly not covert bullying, but part of the open misbehaviour of the children.

248 As described above, LS 71 alleged three instances of buggery by an older patient. Dr McAuley questioned whether it was possible that LS 71 had been abused at night, as there were two nurses on duty and they patrolled every fifteen minutes. He saw this incident as the most serious abuse which had occurred during the eighteen years that the unit was open at Lissue, but considered that it was bound to happen from time to time.[367]

249 Other instances of peer abuse were recorded in the Stinson Report. Nonetheless we would concur with Dr McAuley. In view of the disturbed behaviour of the children, some abuse is unsurprising. The reported episodes of peer abuse are not sufficient to conclude that the culture of the ward was sexualised. When abuse was reported, it was taken seriously and properly investigated, as LS 71's case indicated, and we do not consider, therefore, that peer abuse indicated any systemic failure.

Investigations since the Closure of Lissue Hospital

Introduction

250 As described below, further allegations of abuse were made in 1993, after the closure of Lissue but within the period covered by our Terms of Reference. Additional allegations were made in 2009, which led to a number of inquiries, reports, reviews and statements, covering different aspects of the services provided by Lissue Hospital and by its successor, Forster Green Hospital, which we did not investigate. Although these reports were prepared well after the end of our Terms of Reference, our conclusions will be judged in the light of their findings, and we have therefore taken their contents and conclusions into consideration.

365 LIS 051.
366 LIS 492, 552, 554.
367 Day 201, pp.92 to 93.

Allegations: 1993 to 2008

251 In 1990 a female complainant, LS 67, said she had been sexually abused by a male member of staff at Lissue by being touched in the vaginal area, but despite repeated prompting she was unwilling to speak to the police, her family did not accept that the incident had happened and the matter was dropped.[368]

252 In May 1993 LS 66 who was not an applicant to the Inquiry, made allegations to Dr Hilary Harrison (then Hilary Reid) saying that fourteen years earlier LS 21 on about three occasions had lain on top of her on the floor, kissed her and ejaculated. LS 66 also said that both LS 21 and LS 78 injected her in the hip to sedate her, and were unnecessarily violent to children, dragging them down the corridor by the hair. She thought that LS 21 sexually abused other girls, and provided police with circumstantial evidence.[369] [370] [371]

253 Dr Harrison informed the Chief Social Services Inspector, Dr Kevin McCoy, and the police were informed. LS 21 denied all these allegations,[372] but he was placed on precautionary suspension from May to August 1993 while police inquiries proceeded.[373] Green Park Healthcare Trust does not appear to have conducted its own disciplinary inquiry and when the police decided to take no action on the grounds of lack of corroborative evidence, LS 21 was re-instated.[374]

254 While there may have been no corroboration from witnesses or documentation, such that the police could not be sure that they would obtain a guilty verdict, LS 66's evidence was detailed and persuasive, and

368 LIS 103, 247, 252, 255, 257, 260, 261, 266, 267, 270-272, 311, 800.
369 LIS 103-104, 275-276, 278-281, 31575, 31588-89.
370 Day 199, pp.59 to 62.
371 Day 200, pp.9 to 10.
372 LIS 60526.
373 LIS 283-305.
374 LIS 799-800.

the prime responsibility of Green Park Healthcare Trust was to ensure the safety of its patients. It should therefore have taken disciplinary action, independently of any police enquiries, and if they felt that there was a suspicion that the allegations were true.

255 On 26 October 1993, HIA 172 made allegations against five members of staff[375] but no evidence was found to corroborate his statement and no further action was taken.[376] The Director of Public Prosecutions confirmed on 11 April 1994 that there would be no prosecutions.[377] Police said reasonable force had been used by LS 8.[378]

256 In 1994, LS 67 again told a member of staff at Sharonmore, a Barnardo's project, that she had been abused at Lissue, and the police and other relevant authorities were informed, but she did not want the matter pursued.[379] In January 1997 Dr Hilary Harrison was concerned that these three separate allegations were not being considered together as they might have formed a composite picture. It should be noted that although LS 66, LS 67 and LS 68 all complained at different times about being sexually abused, they all said that they had been abused at Lissue in 1986.[380]

257 In May 2008, LS 69, a 33-year-old woman who had been a patient at Lissue for two periods between 1987 and 1991, named two boys and six staff (including LS 7 and LS 21) who had abused her either at Lissue or Forster Green Hospital between 1987 and 1991. She said she had been physically, mentally and sexually abused, having been stripped naked, locked in her room for two weeks, called names and 'touched'. There was a strategy meeting on 3 April 2008 at which various lines of action were agreed, including personnel checks on two of the alleged abusers who were still in Belfast Trust's employment.[381]

258 An investigation was undertaken by Geraldine Sweeney, Child Protection Nurse Advisor, and Anne McLean, Assistant Principal Social Worker, concerning LS 69's allegations against LS 79, which may have related to Lissue or Forster Green as she attended both hospitals during the

375 LIS 31222-31226.
376 LIS 31213.
377 LIS 31205.
378 Day 199, p.64.
379 LIS 800.
380 LIS 798-800.
381 LIS 105-106, 108, 315-321, 329-332, 30048-30122.

period 1987 to 1991. They did not interview LS 69 and found no direct corroboration of her allegations, though they were concerned about the "number and pattern" of reports of similar problems. A number of recommendations were made concerning staff training.

259 There was concern about LS 79, as the allegations against him were considered credible.[382] Five other children made allegations against LS 79, who was offered alternative work, but he went on sick leave and then left the work. Since his registration as a nurse lapsed he could not be subject to disciplinary proceedings by his professional body.[383]

Civil Claims[384]

260 It was in 2011, while the inquiries were proceeding, that HIA 172 repeated his allegations, complaining that "abuse was a daily occurrence", having contacted the Minister, Edwin Poots MLA.[385] Four former patients commenced civil claims during the following two years:

(1) On 25 September 2011, LS 115 alleged physical and sexual abuse between 1984 and 1986.[386]

(2) On 24 November 2011, HIA 220 complained of "negligence, assault, battery and trespass to the person" between 1975 and 1976.[387]

(3) On 27 January 2012, LS 116 alleged abuse by staff at Lissue.[388]

(4) On 4 July 2013, LS 17 alleged that around 1975 he was restrained in a jacket and helmet, physically restrained in a chair for hours without food or a toilet break, and frequently slapped and thrown against walls.[389]

Muckamore Abbey Hospital Review

261 In 2005 a former patient at Muckamore Abbey Hospital alleged that he had been sexually abused some 30 years earlier. Despite the scrutiny of the files of 300 Muckamore patients, there were no prosecutions arising from the inquiry which followed. The Department of Health and Social Services

382 LIS 119.
383 LIS 119, 13694-13707.
384 LIS 45001-45049.
385 LIS 107.
386 LIS 45005-45017.
387 LIS 45018-45025.
388 LIS 45026.
389 LIS 45027-45049.

nonetheless decided to use the Muckamore Abbey Hospital Review as a model to undertake a sampling exercise concerning all mental health and learning disability hospitals in Northern Ireland (other than Muckamore) with a special emphasis on minors and children, to identify any evidence of historical abuse. This major inquiry, which included Lissue Hospital, was established in 2007 and was being conducted by all five Trusts in parallel with the inquiries concerning Lissue described below.[390]

262 It was agreed that 10% of all files of patients during 1985 to 2005 would be sampled. However, the five Trusts interpreted their remits in different ways, with different sampling methods, and the resulting inconsistencies made it difficult to obtain a reliable overview of the situation across the province.[391] The review resulted in eight separate reports.[392] Eight categories of sexualised behaviour, physical abuse and other issues were drawn up. In the outcome, a large proportion of the sexual abuse recorded was between patients, and appropriate action had been taken wherever staff had abused patients.[393]

The RQIA Overview Report[394]

263 Although this report did not investigate Lissue, it was interlinked with the other inquiries listed here. The Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority review commenced in September/October 2007 and the report was completed in June 2008. It examined Safeguards in Place for Children and Vulnerable Adults in Mental Health and Learning Disability Hospitals and noted the failure to implement child protection procedures and the variations in practice in the Trusts.[395] A number of recommendations were made with a view to establishing consistent good practice.[396]

The Stinson Report[397]

264 Following a strategy meeting on 8 July 2008, the Eastern Health and Social Services Board agreed a range of actions, including a review of Lissue files. A project group was set up, involving senior members of the

390 LIS 355.
391 LIS 451-452.
392 LIS 395.
393 LIS 355-367.
394 LIS 10576-10717.
395 LIS 379.
396 LIS 380.
397 LIS 10973-11027.

EHSSB, with a steering group which included staff from the Belfast Trust, the South Eastern Trust and the police. Bob Stinson, who was formerly a social worker and probation officer, was appointed as an independent consultant to undertake the review.[398] The purpose of the review was to identify any safeguarding issues in the records, such as references to sexual or physical abuse or grooming. The Stinson Report therefore commenced almost twenty years after the closure of Lissue Hospital.

265 A sample of 34 files was selected for the project, consisting of the records of all known complainants and other children mentioned in the complaints, together with twenty names selected at random by computer. Gaynor Creighton, a librarian, then produced summaries of these files and Bob Stinson reviewed the summaries.[399] The report consisted of a general discussion of key issues and recommendations, followed by summaries of the 34 cases.

266 None of the 34 people whose cases he considered have come forward to the Inquiry, but they included 23 who alleged or encountered abuse, including seven girls and one boy who alleged sexual abuse by peers and four boys and two girls who were the alleged abusers. There were three allegations that girls had been sexually abused by staff. There were also allegations of bullying and spontaneous adolescent brawls, grooming, restraint, sanctions, victimisation and humiliation.

267 Bob Stinson expressed concern at the frequency of the alleged abuse and the lack of follow-up action, suggesting failures of leadership, accountability and governance. He made a number of recommendations and presented his draft report on 5 March 2009, though the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety did not receive a copy until a year later.[400] It is not clear whether a final version was produced, as the versions which we have are all labelled as drafts, with differing titles, such as Lissue Historical Cases Review Phase 2[401] or Independent Report Lissue & Forster Green Hospitals Historic Case Review.[402]

268 As Lissue Hospital had been closed, the findings of the Stinson Report were not challenged by the authorities.[403] Since Bob Stinson was neither a nurse nor a doctor, it was argued that further investigations were required

398 LIS 109.
399 LIS 109.
400 LIS 109, 372, 378.
401 LIS 12327.
402 LIS 10973.
403 Day 200, p.21.

by professionals with the relevant training and experience to be able to make appropriate judgements. This led to the Devlin and Jacobs Reports.

269 Dr McAuley, who had not seen the Stinson Report prior to his preparation to give oral evidence to ourselves, took strong exception to two of the conclusions. He felt that the description of care at Lissue as "harsh and punitive" was "inappropriately strong" and he noted that the criticism of multidisciplinary co-operation was unfair as there were meetings of all the professionals every day of the week and most people got on well together.[404] He wrote that the frictions which existed were "largely caused by the different line management responsibilities of different disciplines", and felt the unit was "reasonably cohesive".[405]

The Burke and Sweeney Report[406]

270 In 2009, as part of Belfast Trust's post-Muckamore investigations, they appointed Margaret Burke, Principal Practitioner (Social Work) and Geraldine Sweeney, Child Protection Nurse Adviser, to undertake a Retrospective Child Protection and Safeguarding Audit which covered a ten-year period from January 1970 to December 1979, which was outwith the remit of the Stinson Report.[407]

271 Ten Lissue files from that period were reviewed and all types of record were considered. Seven of the cases reviewed indicated physical abuse by parents and there was some sexual activity on the part of two of the patients.[408] In most cases there was no record of any action having been taken, for example in relation to child protection, and the quality of record-keeping was considered "very poor throughout".[409]

The Devlin Report[410]

272 Maura Devlin, Director of Nursing and Midwifery Education, was then asked to consider the nursing at Lissue, and she produced a report entitled Review of the Standard of Nursing Care provided to Children and Adolescents as Part of the Lissue Hospital Historic Review Case. She reviewed a sample of only four files, and was critical of the standards

404 Day 201, p.148.
405 LIS 483.
406 LIS 10738-10762.
407 LIS 111, 367-370.
408 LIS 368.
409 LIS 369.
410 LIS 11082-11092.

of nursing reported in the records, seeing it as punitive in response to misbehaviour. She commented on the practice of LS 79, but said that her findings of poor professional practice were "suggestive rather than substantive".[411] She made a number of recommendations and presented her report in May 2009.[412] Although it was unclear whether action had been taken concerning all the allegations against nurses identified in the Stinson Report, Maura Devlin did not expand the scope of her study to obtain a broader picture of the prevalence of abuse.[413]

The Black Response[414]

273 D.I. Reuben Black wrote to Marion Reynolds on 9 May 2009, summarising the police view of the Stinson Report. There were two victims of abuse whom they had not traced, but all other reports of offences which were not statute barred had been investigated, and no action was planned.

The Reynolds Summary[415]

274 In July 2009 Marion Reynolds prepared a summary of the reports prepared to date, entitled Interim Report in respect of Historic Review of Children Admitted to Lissue and Forster Green Hospitals Associated with [Serious Adverse Incident Report] SAI 117-08, which was submitted to the Department of Health and Social Services with the Historic Case Review.[416] The report included a reference to the Devlin Report but was essentially a précis of the highlights of the Stinson Report.

The Jacobs Report[417]

275 Dr Brian Jacobs, Consultant Child and Adolescent Psychiatrist at the South London and Maudsley Foundation Trust, was then called in to consider the quality of medical and psychiatric treatment provided at Lissue. He wrote Commentary Report on: Independent Report Lissue and Forster Green Hospitals Historic Case Review [sic].

411 LIS 11091.
412 LIS 110, 371, 374-375.
413 LIS 373.
414 LIS 11967-11970.
415 LIS 343-351.
416 LIS 110, 375-376.
417 LIS 11110-11123.

276 The report was based solely on the Stinson Report and consisted largely of comments and questions arising from Dr Jacobs's reading of the notes. He was not in a position, therefore, to gather evidence to form an independent view of the quality of psychiatric treatment at Lissue and Forster Green. He concluded that some children should not have been admitted as their problems were not psychiatric but reflected the inability of social services to manage them. He thought that Lissue and Forster Green were working within "a failing system", but the service provided by the medical staff was "clinically good". The report was criticised for failing to provide substantiation for these conclusions. Dr Jacobs reported in February 2010.[418]

The McMaster / Bamford / Devine Report[419]

277 In May 2010 Ian McMaster, Charles Bamford and Maurice Devine put together a critical analysis and summary of all the reports which had been prepared up to that time. Despite the weaknesses of the random sampling used in some of the inquiries, they felt that further investigations were unlikely to lead to any legal action.[420] They argued that any future investigations should be treated as child protection (or vulnerable adult) issues.[421]

Operation Danzin

278 All the information concerning possible offences identified in the inquiries was passed to the police, who were conducting an investigation under the title 'Operation Danzin'.[422] Although information was still being sought on some issues, no further police action was taken.[423]

Subsequent Action

279 The Stinson report was leaked to the Irish News in October 2011, and the media carried stories from people who were former patients at Lissue Hospital and its successor, Forster Green Hospital.[424] There were accounts of an anorexic boy being confined to bed when he did not eat,

418 LIS 371, 377, 12211.
419 LIS 355-384.
420 LIS 382.
421 LIS 384.
422 LIS 395.
423 LIS 396.
424 LIS 11541-11557.

children being beaten stripped, dragged by their hair, lifted up and thrown against a wall and confined to their rooms. The police said they were investigating and the Minister, Edwin Poots MLA, made a statement to the Northern Ireland Assembly.[425] On 28 November 2011 the Health and Social Care Board said that the allegations would be fully investigated by an independent inquiry into historical abuse being established by the Northern Ireland Executive.[426]

280 A further complication at this time was that the four regional Health and Social Services Boards were being wound up, and replaced by the single Health and Social Care Board. Dealing with the outcome of the various inquiries was therefore seen as a 'legacy issue' for the new Board.

The Strategic Management Group Final Report[427]

281 After a series of discussions, a Strategic Management Group (SMG) was set up by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety because of concern about the inconsistencies in the previous inquiries, and it aimed to ensure that all necessary action had been taken in reporting matters to the police and referring disciplinary matters to regulatory bodies. It included representation of the DHSSPS, the Health and Social Care Board and the police, to determine how to proceed with the information produced by all of the inquiries.

282 Fourteen former patients of Lissue had contacted the police, and a further twelve cases had been reported. Several issues of concern were identified, but although 35 incidents were referred to the police, there were no prosecutions as a result of the retrospective sampling.[428] The ten cases concerning Lissue did not present any new concerns, though allegations already made by former patients were under investigation by the police.[429] Although some instances of abuse were identified which should have been reported to the police earlier, these were all referred to the police in the course of the inquiries.

283 The SMG concluded that, with one exception, appropriate action had been taken, that any criminal concerns had been reported to the police and that

425 LIS 11541-11548.
426 LIS 11549.
427 LIS 391-461.
428 LIS 803-806.
429 LIS 409.

any regulatory action required had been dealt with by employers.[430] This report was dated December 2013. By this time Forster Green Hospital was also closed[431] and the establishment of the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry had been announced.[432]

The McAndrew Overview[433]

284 Soon after she was appointed, Fionnuala McAndrew provided an overview of all the reports to the newly created Health and Social Care Board in 2014. This was seen as a "legacy" issue from the previous Board, and she said that in tying up the loose ends, she had four objectives:

> "(a) to deal with concerns of a child protection nature;
>
> (b) to make sure that anything which may be a criminal offence was appropriately dealt with;
>
> (c) if there are any professional issues about staff who were still employed in the system, then appropriate action was taken;
>
> (d) to satisfy themselves that the current care of children in a similar facility was appropriate."[434] [435]

285 Earlier, on 9 March 2011, Fionnuala McAndrew had written of both Lissue and Forster Green Hospitals that:

> "…it is also clear that children accommodated within these hospitals were subjected to a harsh and punitive regime, and that staff were challenged by the complex needs of the children, a poor physical layout and at times inadequate staffing levels."[436]

In oral evidence she said that it was not her personal opinion that care had been harsh or that there was poor multidisciplinary co-operation generally, but that these comments related only to the treatment of the children in the samples.[437] There were concerns about other issues such as the management of risky behaviour.[438] Her report was accepted by the Board.

430 LIS 111.
431 LIS 112.
432 LIS 398.
433 LIS 13714-13720.
434 Day 203, pp.6 and 7.
435 LIS 1444-1445.
436 LIS 11922.
437 Day 203, pp.8, 17.
438 Day 203, p.12.

286 Fionnuala McAndrew saw the reports as a jigsaw, each providing some of the scene, but she did not see the need for a fuller inquiry to complete the whole picture. As the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry was being established, she felt that it was not for her to determine whether a further inquiry into Lissue was required.[439]

Commentary

287 Four main issues arose from this series of investigations. The first is that a relatively small sample of files had thrown up quite a large number of cases where the records indicated that abuse either by peers or staff had been alleged. While only ten applicants have come forward to the Inquiry, the statements by some witnesses that other patients were also being abused clearly had some substantiation. Some of the allegations were known to the police, and none of the new information led to prosecutions. The absence of prosecutions should not be taken to imply that the allegations were without substance; among the reasons for deciding not to proceed was the fact that some of the alleged abusers had died.

288 The second issue is that the Stinson Report had concluded that the multidisciplinary co-operation at Lissue was poor. A number of people bridled at this conclusion. Dr Hilary Harrison, for example, provided oral evidence of good multidisciplinary cooperation at Lissue in relation to two children for whom she was responsible. There was good communication with consultant psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers both while the children were at Lissue and on discharge.[440]

289 As a social worker, LS 80 also gave evidence of interdisciplinary co-operation, such as the representation of all the professions (including the teachers) on the ward rounds, the siting of his office beside the ward, where he could observe behaviour and liaise readily with nurses, the participation of people from different professions in the video sessions (both as participants and observers) and the open access of records, so that the various professionals could read each others' observations.[441]

290 We agree that the evidence suggests that multidisciplinary working relations were good, particularly in the unhelpful context of the multiple accountabilities of the different professions to different employers and the absence of any person with overall control of the Hospital, either internally or externally.

439 Day 203, pp.22 to 23.
440 Day 200, pp.20 to 21 and 30 to 31.
441 Day 200, pp.52 to 55, 62, and 68 to 69.

291 The third issue was the allegation that there was a "harsh and punitive" regime at Lissue. Dr Nelson denied that the regime was harsh or punitive.[442] LS 21 said that he did not consider it harsh, but there were rules, boundaries and limits to children's behaviour, and that breaching them had to be addressed as they could not tolerate a threat to the milieu and the stability of the regime.[443] Clearly, individuals cannot be treated properly in a chaotic setting, but equally this statement suggests that maintaining control of the unit could take priority over individual treatment plans.

292 Mary Hinds commented that the regime at Lissue was harsh from the patients' viewpoint, but not from the staff's; people who did not understand the philosophy of behaviour modification might see it as harsh. She felt that the reports failed to put their findings in a wider context.[444] Fionnuala McAndrew resiled from supporting Bob Stinson's conclusion, having cited it at an earlier date, saying that it applied only to the children considered in the sample, though she accepted that a wider review might have achieved "further understanding" of some of the actions.[445] The HSCB concluded that:

> "the available evidence in Module 13 does not support a view that the practices in Lissue as a whole were harsh and punitive. The HSB [sic] believes that such a view would ignore vital contextual factors about medical treatment and care."[446]

293 Dr Hilary Harrison said that on the basis of the evidence the Department accepted that, taking account of the standards at the time, the practice at Lissue appeared to be "very harsh and punitive".[447] When being questioned following allegations of abuse, LS 79 said that the regime was "tough" and that "there were a number of powerful individuals who persisted with the established custom and practice".[448]

294 We conclude that the evidence indicates that some of the treatment was harsh and that on occasion some of the nurses were rough with the

442 Day 201, p.148.
443 Day 199, p.79.
444 Day 200, p.115.
445 Day 203, p.25.
446 LIS 80058.
447 Day 200, p.35.
448 LS 13702.

children. This observation does not apply to all the staff, but there was sufficient rough handling of children for it to have been a predominant memory for some of the witnesses.[449] One of the problems may have been that behaviour therapy entails being firm with poor behaviour, and if this approach is adopted as a general mode of childcare in a unit rather than as a form of treatment for individuals with specific problems, it may provide a rationale for those who wish to treat children firmly, and it may then be only a short step to acting harshly.

295 Fourthly, there is the question of whether the combined reports, together with this Inquiry, have provided a sufficiently full picture of the services offered by Lissue Hospital. Mary Hinds pointed out that the authors of the reports did what was asked of them, but they did not provide the complete picture.[450] Fionnuala McAndrew saw the picture as a jigsaw, with each report adding more information.

296 The reports all showed weaknesses: the size of the Stinson sample was small, and Bob Stinson used material which had been pre-digested by a librarian. The Devlin and Jacobs reports essentially relied on Stinson, rather than considering the original evidence independently. Instances of historical abuse and poor practice were identified, but as the period in question related to two decades earlier, the value in studying it was primarily to check whether appropriate action had been taken, rather than to inform current practice.

297 As the number of files sampled was small, no doubt a fuller inquiry could turn up additional examples of abuse. However, it is doubtful whether additional examples would change the overall picture significantly. Former patients have now had the opportunity to complain to the bodies responsible for the services, to make civil claims, to speak confidentially to the Acknowledgement Forum and to give evidence publicly to the Inquiry. The fact that only ten witnesses have come forward to the Inquiry suggests that there are unlikely to be many more people who still wish to make allegations. Any further inquiry into Lissue would be subject to diminishing returns; the additional information which might be gained could well be very limited and it would not justify the time and expense entailed.

449 LIS 13716.
450 Day 200, pp.114 to 115.

Conclusion

298 For about forty years, from 1948 to 1989, Lissue Hospital was virtually the placement of last resort in Northern Ireland for children up to the age of thirteen, having to deal with a very wide variety of physical, medical, psychological and psychiatric problems, all on one site. With improvements in medical care, the nature of the problems changed considerably during those four decades, with a greater emphasis on paediatric care in the earlier decades and the creation of the psychiatric unit in 1971 to cope with the growing demand for help with psychiatric and behavioural problems.

299 Out of possibly 10,000 children who passed through Lissue Hospital only ten have come forward to the Inquiry to make allegations, eight of whom were patients in the psychiatric unit. Although by far the majority of the patients were in paediatric care, only two witnesses came forward who had been in this group. We conclude that the paediatric care at Lissue was not subject to systemic abuse.

300 The psychiatric unit was expected to cope with children with a wide variety of problems, ranging from physiological disorders such as encopresis or anorexia to those with behaviour or conduct disorders. Some of the children in the latter group could have been managed within the social services if special units had been available. Dr Jacobs criticised Lissue for the breadth of its intake, saying that the unit was working within a "failing system that was not of their making".[451] Dr Hilary Harrison commented that there were no alternatives in Northern Ireland for children with these problems prior to the development of a strategy for residential childcare in the 1990s.[452] According to Dr Nelson the social services in Northern Ireland did not have the resources to cope with the children presenting the most serious problems, unlike the London area, where he had also worked.[453] He argued that those who planned the system bore some of the responsibility for Lissue's problems. We agree.

301 This problem stretched beyond Lissue Hospital and its remit. It should be noted that when Dr Nelson decided that no child over thirteen should be admitted to Lissue as a day or residential patient, there was no alternative residential psychiatric provision for adolescents aged over thirteen in

451 LIS 11121.
452 Day 200, pp.33 to 34.
453 Day 201, p.144.

Northern Ireland. They had to be placed in adult wards or admitted to residential childcare placements such as training schools. HIA 172, for example, having spent time at Lissue and Rathgael, had to be placed in an adult psychiatric ward at Downshire Hospital at the age of thirteen. It was realised that nowhere in Northern Ireland could provide the unconditional caring he required.[454]

302 The response to this broad psychiatric remit was the creation of a consultant-led multidisciplinary team which applied a variety of innovative treatment methods, including psychotherapy, family therapy, behaviour modification and the use of drugs.

303 The treatment plans for individual children were a medical matter, and we have made no comment on them other than to report some of the evidence provided by witnesses. A few of the allegations were clearly based on misunderstandings about legitimate treatment methods, and we have discounted them. By way of example, as Dr Nelson noted, staff dealing with violent children or insisting on feeding by tube might have looked rough or forceful, but it was a necessary part of some children's treatment plans.[455]

304 Of the various treatment systems, the behaviour modification advocated by Dr McAuley became the dominant mode adopted by the nursing staff and it was applied generally to all patients. When the psychiatric unit was set up, this model was innovative, but it has now been widely adopted. It is a good model, particularly for changing specific aspects of a child's behaviour by setting clear boundaries and insisting on them, to discourage unacceptable behaviours and to ensure that the parent or caring adult is in control, providing security for the child.

305 The HSCB considered that:

> "the nature of the behavioural treatment programmes and the exercise of professional judgment about when to begin and end techniques such as time out occasions may have led to inconsistency in practice and, on occasions, may have gone beyond what was appropriate."[456]

They did not, however, "accept that this extended to systematic abuse of children".[457]

454 LIS 1383-1384.
455 Day 201, p.135.
456 LIS 80041.
457 LIS 80038.

306 It is our opinion that the abuse of which the witnesses have complained may have arisen when the approach was misapplied, not as part of the planned treatment for individuals, but as a means of managing and controlling the children as a group. In this respect there were times when the punitive aspects of the model appear to have been applied by some staff too harshly, for example in prolonged periods of time out, in the rough physical handling of children when isolating them, in the use of strapping to confine children to their beds, in the use of pyjamas throughout the day, or in the use of medication for control purposes. Moreover, the evidence of witnesses suggests that children were not always given the affection they needed to experience, whether as a reward for good behaviour or as part of their normal upbringing. The witnesses have acknowledged that they presented severe handling problems, for example by climbing on the roof, but we consider their allegations as persuasive that some of the ways in which they were treated by some staff were systemically abusive.

307 HIA 426 provided an account of sexual abuse in the earlier years of Lissue. During the later years, evidence of sexual abuse related largely to two individuals, LS 21 and LS 79, and in both cases there were multiple witnesses, either to this Inquiry or in earlier investigations, who alleged abuse by these nurses. These allegations do not suggest that the sexual abuse of patients by staff was extensive, but it was a misuse of power and breached their duty of care to vulnerable children; the evidence indicates systemic abuse. There was evidence of peer sexual abuse, but it was insufficient to conclude that there was a sexualised culture and when it was reported to staff appropriate action was taken.

308 Lissue Hospital worked within the wider health service in Northern Ireland. While the level of resourcing appears to have been adequate, there were serious defects in the governance and management structures. From 1973 onwards there was no one person responsible for Lissue Hospital either in the internal structure or externally up to Board level. Yet the professionals were expected to work together as a multidisciplinary team; we have already noted that it is to their credit that they worked together as effectively as they did. Furthermore there was no system of inspection, and the visits made by external agencies and individuals amounted to no more than a patchwork of observations. If there had been a system of regular inspections, some of the problems reported by the witnesses might have been avoided.

309 In summary, while acknowledging the allegations of harsh and inappropriate treatment and sexual abuse, for four decades Lissue Hospital played an invaluable role providing a wide range of services to children with paediatric, psychiatric and behavioural problems.

Summary of Findings

310 It is our view that the governance structure from 1973 onwards was a systemic failure, and it is fortunate that it did not engender serious management problems.

311 The successes of the psychiatric unit at Lissue were thanks to cooperation between the individual professionals involved; the managerial structure within which they worked was faulty and systemically unsound.

312 In the circumstances we consider the absence of both formal and informal inspections of Lissue Hospital on a regular basis to have been a systemic failure on the part of the Ministry of Health and Local Government and the Northern Ireland Hospital Authority from 1948 to 1973, and on the part of the Ministry / Department of Health and Social Services and the Eastern Health and Social Services Board from 1973 to 1989.

313 While we cannot say what the outcome of a disciplinary inquiry might have been, we consider the failure of the Green Park Trust to conduct its own investigations into the allegations of sexual abuse against LS 21 in 1993 to have been a systemic failure which left children at risk of abuse.

314 In view of the risk to the children who climbed on the roof at Lissue and the danger which they caused to other people, the lack of action to prevent access to the roof was a systemic failure.

315 The occasions on which physical restraints were used may have been few, but their use was unacceptable; they would not have been used in other types of residential childcare, and their use in a hospital cannot be justified.

316 While the policy was not at fault, the implementation of time out at times was not always in accordance with the policy and constituted systemic abuse.

317 On the occasions when children were sedated to render the nursing task easier, the use of injections constituted systemic abuse.

318 It is our opinion that at times some staff did overstep the mark and were unduly rough in their treatment of the children, and that this constituted systemic abuse.

319 We accept that some patients were sexually abused and consider this to have been systemic abuse.

320 It is our conclusion, however, that there were many instances when staff were unfeeling and failed the children who required their support, and that these shortcomings were sufficiently frequent to be deemed systemic emotional abuse.

Chapter 25:

Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Home

Introduction

1 Module 15 of the Inquiry's public hearings was devoted to an examination of Bawnmore Boys' Home and Kincora Boys' Home. As nineteen of the twenty sitting days from Tuesday 31 May 2016[1] until Friday 8 July 2016[2] were devoted to our investigations into Kincora, we deal with Bawnmore in a separate chapter of our Report. Because of the complexity and gravity of the allegations relating to Kincora, we depart from our practice elsewhere in this Report of dealing with a particular institution in a single chapter, and we devote several chapters to examining the history of Kincora and the allegations relating to it.

2 In the second chapter we examine the experiences of the residents in the home throughout Kincora's existence. In the third chapter we examine the investigations by the Belfast Welfare Authority and by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board (EHSSB), which took over responsibility for Kincora in 1973, into allegations of sexual abuse of residents in Kincora which came to their attention. Because some of these allegations came to the attention of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) we also examine in that chapter the way in which the RUC dealt with the allegations that came to its attention. As the response of the Belfast Welfare Authority, and later the EHSSB and the RUC were inter-connected in various ways it is convenient to consider all of these matters in a single chapter. In this chapter we set out the background to the matters we consider in greater detail in chapters two and three.

3 In the fourth chapter we consider whether the security services in the form of the RUC Special Branch, the Secret Intelligence Service (sometimes referred to as MI6), the Security Service (also referred to as MI5), and British Army Intelligence knew of sexual abuse of residents in Kincora, and whether any of these agencies exploited, connived in, or ignored the sexual abuse of residents of Kincora. In that chapter we also consider the response of various Government departments over the years to the allegations relating to Kincora. This will involve an examination of not just the security services described above, but the Northern Ireland Office, the Ministry of Defence and the Cabinet Office as well. In the fifth chapter we draw together our conclusions regarding all aspects of the events relating to Kincora that we have examined.

1 Day 204.
2 Day 223.

Background

4 In May 1958 the Belfast Welfare Authority, or more precisely Belfast Corporation Welfare Committee, as the statutory authority for the provision of social services in general, and for the provision of childcare in particular in Belfast, opened a hostel for working boys who had left school on completion of their secondary education. At that time the school leaving age was fourteen. Although commonly referred to as Kincora Boys' Home in later years, this was a hostel for working boys and when we refer to Kincora throughout these chapters it must be understood that we are referring to a hostel for working boys.

5 The hostel occupied a substantial Victorian dwelling house located at 236 Upper Newtownards Road in east Belfast. Then, as now, the Upper Newtownards Road is one of the main thoroughfares in east Belfast and the building was located on the corner of the junction of the Upper Newtownards Road and North Road. The hostel, which was closed in October 1980, was intended to be for working boys between the ages of fifteen and eighteen who were in care. There were occasions when boys up to 21 might be accommodated,[3] and it is known that on occasions younger boys were admitted.[4] The building consisted of two floors and an attic when it opened, and it originally accommodated eleven residents, but this number was reduced to nine when the attic was no longer used. Between May 1958 when it opened and October 1980 when it closed, 370 boys resided in Kincora. Altogether there were 580 admissions to the hostel,[5] but as many were readmitted on a number of occasions the number of those who lived there was 309.[6] As we shall see, in later years a one-storey extension was added to the rear of the building which provided an office and a separate bedroom for the use of the warden of the hostel, Joseph Mains. We should point out that the building is no longer in public ownership, and has been privately owned for a considerable number of years.

6 Kincora continued to be run by the Belfast Welfare Authority until the welfare authority was absorbed into the newly created EHSSB in 1973 when local government in Northern Ireland was reorganised. From 1973 it was run by the EHSSB. Throughout its existence from 1958 until 1980

3 KIN 1085.
4 KIN 1086.
5 KIN 1086.
6 Day 204, p.39.

the warden and officer in charge was Joseph Mains. For a considerable period Mains was the only member of staff responsible for the care of the boys in the home, although he had the assistance of a cook and a cleaner to deal with domestic matters. From September 1964 until February 1966 Raymond Semple was employed as an assistant warden. Semple left in 1966, but returned in June 1969 and continued to work in Kincora as the assistant warden until he was suspended in March 1980. The number of staff was further increased to three with the appointment of William McGrath as house father in June 1971. McGrath worked in that capacity in Kincora until he was also suspended in March 1980. Mains and Semple were suspended at the same time.

Allegations in the Irish Independent

7 On 24 January 1980, the Irish Independent newspaper published an article[7] making a number of grave allegations of sexual abuse of boys in Kincora, and these matters where taken up by Gerry Fitt MP in the House of Commons. Mains, Semple and McGrath were all suspended by the EHSSB pending the outcome of a major investigation that was immediately started by the RUC.

8 There were several allegations in the Irish Independent.

(1) Boys at the home had been recruited for homosexual prostitution.

(2) A police report had been sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) but no action was taken.

(3) Reports on certain cases were destroyed under orders from a senior member of the "Social Services Department".

(4) A member of staff at the home who was alleged to be involved with a small loyalist para-military group was suspected of encouraging children to engage in homosexual acts for money, and still held a senior position at the home.

(5) The police report named a number of important Northern Ireland businessmen as being involved in the abuse of children in the home.

(6) One of the children involved was alleged to have committed suicide, and a second to have attempted suicide.

(7) The matter first came to light in 1977.

7 KIN 11529.

(8) One boy who knew of the child prostitution was not provided with support by social workers when he faced a criminal charge, because it was thought advisable to have him locked up where he could not talk.

(9) Police files on the allegations currently existed in RUC stations at Strandtown and Donegall Pass.

(10) Some offences were alleged to have involved boys as young as twelve.

The first police investigation

9 A major police investigation was immediately set in train led by Detective Chief Inspector Caskey. During its existence this investigation expanded to include other children's homes, including Bawnmore Boys' Home (which is dealt with in Chapter 22 of our Report), and Williamson House, both in north Belfast. We shall refer to this investigation as Caskey Phase One, which resulted in a 121-page report from DCI Caskey, together with over 200 witness statements deemed relevant to the criminal investigation, as well as over a further 100 witness statements not directly relevant to the criminal investigation. The entire file, including DCI Caskey's 121-page covering report, amounted to 1,709 pages.[8]

The prosecutions

10 During the police investigations Mains and Semple admitted various homosexual offences, some of which were committed with individuals who were no longer resident in Kincora when those offences occurred. McGrath denied all the allegations put to him. The DPP directed that a total of 33 charges be brought against them, and Mains, Semple and McGrath were sent for trial on 1 September 1981. Each of them pleaded not guilty to the individual charges against them on 27 November 1981, and their trial started on 10 December 1981 before Lord Lowry, Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland. Mains and Semple then changed their pleas to guilty on various charges. Semple admitted each of the four charges against him.[9] Mains admitted six of the eleven charges against him, and the prosecution accepted those pleas and entered a nolle prosequi on the five remaining charges, thereby effectively withdrawing them.[10] McGrath maintained his pleas of not guilty to all of the charges against him, and the first witnesses were called on the afternoon of 10 December.[11] On the next day McGrath changed his pleas to guilty on fifteen of the eighteen charges against him, and the prosecution entered a nolle prosequi against him on the three remaining charges.

8 KIN 10001-1170
9 KIN 101001

11 The decision of the prosecution not to proceed with a number of the charges against Mains and McGrath reflected their assessment of the difficulty of establishing those particular charges to the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, and the decision to effectively withdraw the charges by entering a nolle prosequi was a normal and perfectly proper course for them to adopt.

12 On 16 December 1981 Lord Lowry sentenced the accused as follows.

(1) Mains received six years imprisonment on two charges of buggery, two years imprisonment on one charge of indecent assault and three charges of gross indecency. All the sentences were concurrent, making a total of six years imprisonment in his case.[12]

(2) Semple received five years imprisonment on each of two charges of buggery, and two years imprisonment on each of two charges of gross indecency. All the sentences were concurrent, making a total of five years imprisonment in his case.[13]

(3) McGrath received four years imprisonment on each of two charges of buggery, and two years imprisonment on each effecting charges of either gross indecency or indecent assault. All the sentences were concurrent, making a total of four years imprisonment in his case.[14]

We refer to the sentencing of these accused in greater detail in the next chapter.

10 KIN 101002.
11 KIN 101016.
12 KIN 21258.
13 KIN 21259.
14 KIN 21260-KIN21261.

Bone, Elder and Witchell

13 Mains, Semple and McGrath were not the only men convicted of the homosexual abuse of children in their care as a result of the Caskey Phase One investigation. Peter Bone pleaded guilty to sixteen charges of the 22 charges against him, and was sentenced on 16 December 1981 to a total of two years imprisonment on eight charges of gross indecency and eight charges of indecent assault. All the sentences were concurrent.[15] Some of the offences were committed whilst he was assisting in a voluntary capacity at Bawnmore Boys' Home.[16]

14 Robert Dewar Elder also pleaded guilty on 16 December 1981 to one charge of indecent assault and one of gross indecency, and was sentenced to a total of one year's imprisonment, suspended for two years on each count. These offences also involved a boy at Bawnmore.[17]

15 On 16 December 1981 Eric Witchell pleaded guilty to six charges of indecent assault and gross indecency. The prosecution entered a nolle prosequi on a charge of buggery.[18] These charges related to offences committed by Witchell against three boys who were residents at Williamson House,[19] a children's home also run by the EHSSB. He was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run concurrently.[20] Bone, Elder and Witchell were sentenced by Lord Lowry on the same day as he sentenced Mains, Semple and McGrath. That six males were sentenced on the same day for sexual offences committed by them at three homes run by the Belfast Welfare Authority and its successor the EHSSB is a sign of the extent of the investigation carried out by DCI Caskey and his officers in the Caskey Phase One investigation. That investigation was not confined purely to Kincora, or indeed Bawnmore or Williamson House, because it expanded to include allegations relating to several other institutions, including the De La Salle School at Rubane. We consider the Rubane allegations elsewhere in this report.

15 BWN 20665.
16 BWN 20665.
17 BWN 20026.
18 KIN 40221.
19 KIN 40220.
20 KIN 40221.

Further investigations

16 When passing sentence on Mains, Semple and McGrath, Lord Lowry expressed his surprise that their crimes had gone undetected for so many years. On 17 December 1981 the EHSSB decided to set up a committee to enquire into the home.[21] In the following weeks there were further allegations about what had happened in Kincora, notably in three articles by the journalists Ed Moloney and Andrew Pollak published in the Irish Times on 12, 13 and 14 January 1982.

17 We will consider these allegations in the next chapter, but for present purposes it is sufficient to note that in the article of 12 January 1982 it was alleged that;

> "The northern authorities blocked an RUC investigation into an alleged homosexual prostitution ring in 1976 which involved British officials in the Northern Ireland Office, police men, legal figures and business men and boys in care at the Kincora Boys Home and other homes run by the Eastern Health Board…".

The article also alleged that the ring was believed to have been in existence for at least three years, and it was suspected that the ring involved at least seven men, two of whom were British civil servants on secondment to the Northern Ireland Office.[22]

18 On 13 January the article dealt in some detail with allegations that between 1975 and 1977 concerns about homosexual offences involving boys in care in Kincora were passed on to their superiors in the EHSSB by at least four social workers, but they were told not to pursue their enquiries in case they prejudiced an ongoing police investigation at the time. This article also referred at some length to the experiences of two former residents at Kincora, one of whom it was said jumped from the Liverpool boat into the Irish Sea whilst being sent back to Belfast from Liverpool and was drowned. Misgivings about the case of the other, who it is clear was Richard Kerr, combined with what was alleged to be "apparent inaction on the part of the authorities concerning other allegations finally persuaded a number of social workers to publicise the Kincora affair".[23]

21 KIN 21311.
22 KIN 21312.
23 KIN 21316.

19 In the third and final article on 14 January 1982 the allegation was made that the Belfast Welfare Authority was alerted about homosexual offences in the Kincora Boys Home in 1971 but failed to take any action. The article described the experiences of an ex-resident who wished to remain anonymous and who lived in Kincora between 1968 and 1971. The ex-resident, who gave evidence in due course to the Hughes Inquiry when he was known as R 8, sent two letters dealing with his experiences to the Belfast Social Services but never received a reply.[24]

20 These allegations, and other similar allegations that appeared in other newspapers, such as an article in the Irish Independent on 13 January 1982 by Peter McKenna, whose article of 24 January 1980 in the Irish Independent sparked the Caskey Phase One investigation, and calls by a number of Northern Ireland MPs for an investigation into these matters, no doubt contributed to the announcement on 15 January 1982 by the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the Rt Hon James Prior MP that he had set up a Committee of Inquiry into Children's Homes and Young Persons Hostels. The Chairman of the Committee was Stephen McGonagle, previously the Northern Ireland Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and Commissioner for Complaints, or the Ombudsman as the holder of the combined posts was more usually described.[25] There were four other members, two of whom were leading figures in the social work field from England, and the other two were individuals of some standing in Northern Ireland. One of these was Dr George Humphreys, the Chairman of the Northern Health and Social Services Board. He resigned shortly afterwards because he had a relative connected with the social services in the Eastern Board, which was to be the main focus of the Inquiry.[26] Dr Humphreys was replaced by a distinguished former headmaster, Dr Stanley Worrall.[27]

21 It is unnecessary to set out the Terms of Reference of the McGonagle Committee because it proved to be very short-lived. It came to an end on 12 February 1982 after only two witnesses had been called, Mr Fitt MP and Detective Superintendent Caskey, who by now had been promoted from Detective Chief Inspector.[28] Three members of the committee said that they felt unable to continue until all police enquiries had been completed.

24 KIN 40983.
25 KIN 21270.
26 KIN 21273.
27 KIN 21272.
28 KIN 20004.

22 The reference to police enquiries was to a decision by Sir John Hermon, the Chief Constable of the RUC, on 10 February 1982 to set up a further investigation. This was also led by Detective Superintendent Caskey under the direction of Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) John Whiteside.[29] On 18 February 1985 Sir John Hermon announced that in order to allay public concern into what he described as "much rumour and unsubstantiated information", he had appointed the same team of RUC detectives (i.e. Detective Superintendent Caskey and his officers) to establish if there was any substance to the rumours and unsubstantiated information.[30]

23 Other allegations had been made on the BBC television Scene Around Six programme by the journalist Christopher Moore on 11 February 1982,[31] based on an allegation by another ex-resident of Kincora, Hugh Quinn. On the next day, Friday 12 February, Hugh Quinn also appeared on a BBC Spotlight programme on Kincora. The programme referred to:

> "...Rumours about prostitution rackets, security forces interest in one of the accused and allegations and counter allegations about who knew what, and when and how."[32]

The programme also raised specific issues as to why complaints in 1967 and 1971 did not result in police prosecutions, and why later complaints were not followed through.[33]

Sir George Terry's investigation

24 Sir John Hermon also announced that because of inferences which had been made about the way in which the police had conducted their enquiries, "In order to put the matter beyond any doubt and to alleviate public concerns", he had requested the appointment of an outside chief constable to investigate these allegations. He stated that the outside chief constable:

> "Will have full access to all the papers past and present and in addition will have general oversight of the continuing investigations. In due course he will forward a report to me and his conclusions will be made public".[34]

29 KIN 20005.
30 KIN 21277.
31 KIN 20920.
32 KIN 20926.
33 KIN 20927.
34 KIN 21277.

Sir George Terry, the Chief Constable of Sussex Constabulary, agreed to take on this task. He was assisted by two officers from his force, Superintendent Harrison and Superintendent Flenley.[35]

25 The appointment of Sir George Terry and his officers from the Sussex Constabulary meant that two parallel investigations took place. As we shall see, the Sussex officers reviewed the entirety of the Caskey Phase One investigation, and re-interviewed many of those interviewed by the RUC in the Caskey Phase One investigation. They explicitly raised with the Kincora ex-residents whether they had been aware of homosexual activity involving people from outside the home. Superintendents Harrison and Flenley produced extremely detailed and comprehensive reports, and although their reports were part of, and relied upon by Sir George Terry in his report, they have not hitherto been published. Sir George Terry described his published report as "a summary together with relevant background, of the enquiries", carried out by himself. As he emphasised, his report should be read in conjunction with the separate report prepared by Superintendents Harrison and Flenley.[36]

26 Sir George Terry's report was delivered on 27 May 1983 and later published. To distinguish it from the longer report by Superintendents Harrison and Flenley, we shall refer to their investigations and reports as being the Sussex Police Report to distinguish them from the distinct report by their Chief Constable, which we refer to as the Terry Report.

Caskey Phase Two investigation

27 On 26 August 1982 Detective Superintendent Caskey submitted his 211-page report on his Phase Two investigation which was part of a file which, including witness statements and other documents, amounted to 1,702 pages. During that investigation his enquiries extended to British Military Intelligence, and included allegations in respect of John Colin Wallace, a former member of the Army Information Service stationed at British Army Headquarters Northern Ireland (HQNI) at Thiepval Barracks in Lisburn, Co Antrim. In view of the sensitive nature of those enquiries, and the attachment to the report of documents which were classified, 'secret' or 'confidential', it was agreed between the Director of Public Prosecutions in Northern Ireland (the DPP) and the ACC Crime of the

35 KIN 40001.
36 KIN 40001.

RUC that this file would be submitted to the DPP under "Secret Cover". We refer to this separate and secret file as Caskey Phase Three. That file was submitted by Detective Superintendent Caskey on 16 March 1983 and consisted of a 58-page covering report, 106 pages of witness statements as well as exhibits and other documents amounting to 407 pages in all.[37] The DPP later issued a direction that there be no prosecutions on the Caskey Phase Two file. On 16 May 1983 the DPP issued a further direction that the initiation of criminal proceedings against any persons was not warranted on the information and evidence contained in the Caskey Phase Three file, and the file was therefore marked "No prosecution".[38]

The Hughes Inquiry

28 Following the termination of the work of the McGonagle Committee of Inquiry, on 18 February 1982, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced in the House of Commons that he did not propose to reconstitute that Inquiry. He recognised the need:

> "To investigate the failure to identify earlier malpractices in some [homes and hostels for children and young persons] and to examine and assess present policies, procedures and practices for their administration".

He continued:

> "In these circumstances, after the current police investigations and any consequent criminal proceedings are complete, I intend to appoint a committee, with a High Court Judge as Chairman, sitting in public. The Terms of Reference of such an Inquiry and the powers it might need cannot be determined until the results of the present investigations are known. But I am anxious that there should be no lasting cause for public disquiet that the truth has not been wholly discovered."[39]

29 In exchanges which followed his statement, the Secretary of State responded to questions by Mr Gerry Fitt MP as to whether the proposed inquiry would have power to take out of prison those who had been convicted because of allegations at Kincora. This was presumably a reference to Mains, Semple and McGrath. Mr Fitt also asked whether the Inquiry:

37 KIN 30001–30407.
38 KIN 100020.
39 KIN 21274.

> "Would enable Mr Colin Wallace, a former British Army security spokesman, who gave an interview to journalists in 1975 and made them aware of all the aspects of Kincora, to be brought before the Inquiry or the courts?"

30 The Secretary of State replied to these points by saying:

> "The hon gentlemen asked about the powers of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act [1921]. He asked whether, if we decided on that type of Inquiry, the Inquiry would have power to call for people who had been imprisoned for one offence or another. Such an Inquiry has complete powers to call for evidence from whomsoever it desires. Therefore, the answer to his question is 'Yes'."[40]

31 In the event, the Secretary of State did not appoint a Committee of Inquiry under a High Court judge, nor was the Inquiry set up under the 1921 Act. With the publication of the Terry Report and the earlier decisions of the DPP to direct no prosecution in relation to the matters considered in the Caskey Phase Two and Phase Three reports, on 18 January 1984 a Committee of Inquiry was set up with his Honour William Hughes, a recently retired circuit judge in England, as Chairman. As well as Judge Hughes (to use the title by which he was commonly referred to thereafter), the other members were Mr W J Patterson and Mr H Whalley. The Committee (which we shall refer to as the Hughes Inquiry) was appointed on 21 March 1984 by the Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland (the DHSS) by virtue of the powers conferred on it by Article 54 and Schedule 8 of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972.[41] In a later chapter we shall examine the reasons why this course was adopted instead of the original promise that a tribunal of Inquiry under the 1921 Act chaired by a High Court judge would be appointed once the police enquiries and any subsequent prosecutions had been concluded.

32 The Hughes Inquiry conducted 60 days of public hearings, during which a number of ex-residents of Kincora, and a substantial number of other witnesses from Belfast Welfare Authority, the EHSSB, the DHSS and the RUC gave evidence. We shall consider parts of the evidence given during the oral hearings, and of the 340-page report that relate to Kincora in greater detail in later chapters. It is sufficient to note at this stage that the findings and recommendations of the Hughes Inquiry helped to contribute to major changes in childcare practice in Northern Ireland, particularly in the fields of recruitment, training and the terms and conditions of staff.

40 KIN 21275.
41 KIN 75380.

33 The investigations carried out by the Hughes Inquiry were not confined simply to the Kincora Boys' Home, because they investigated eight other children's homes or hostels.

- Valetta Park Hostel, Newtownards, Co. Down.
- Bawnmore Hostel, (which we examine elsewhere in this report).
- Williamson House Children's Home.
- The Palmerston Reception Assessment Centre.
- The Nazareth Lodge Children's Home in Belfast.
- The De La Salle Boys Home at Rubane House, Kircubbin, Co Down.
- Barnardo's Sharonmore Project.
- Manor House outside Lisburn, Co Antrim.

In our Inquiry we have examined all of these homes, and refer to them elsewhere in our Report, with the exception of Valetta Park Hostel, Palmerston Reception and Assessment Centre and Williamson House.

34 In relation to Kincora, the Hughes Inquiry expressly considered whether there had been a "cover-up" in respect of two periods. It defined a "cover up" at 3.174 as:

> "The failure of persons in positions of responsibility to take action appropriate to their office and/or the destruction or suppression of information or records, in pursuance of an improper motive."[42]

35 The first period concerned complaints by residents and ex-residents up to 1971. The Hughes Inquiry pointed out that:

> "No person ever came forward with evidence of a deliberate or concerted 'cover-up' of the Kincora scandal by the Belfast Welfare Authority, but publicity frequently suggested that one may have been organised."[43]

42 KIN 75251.
43 KIN 75251.

At 3.175 the Inquiry expressly rejected the suggestion that either Mr Mason, the senior official in the Belfast Welfare Authority at the time, or Mr Moore, his deputy, had been engaged in a cover-up of allegations against Mains, which were investigated in 1967. At 3.176 the Inquiry took the view that Mr Mason's recommendation to the Town Clerk that the 1971 complaints against Mains should be referred to the police clearly absolved him from any "cover-up" allegation, and concluded that they could not find that there was a "cover-up".[44]

36 At 3.177 they said:

> "We received no complaints that the Belfast Welfare Committee became aware of complaints or suspicions concerning the Kincora staff, except through Mr Moore's comment to the late Councillor [Joss] Cardwell. There is no evidence that Councillor Cardwell took steps to prevent or suppress the matter. Nor is there any evidence that the Ministry of Home Affairs became aware of allegations or rumours relating to homosexual misconduct at Kincora".[45]

The reference to the Ministry of Home Affairs was because that ministry was the department responsible for the regulation and inspection of children's homes in Northern Ireland during the first period.

37 In their conclusions regarding Kincora, the Hughes Inquiry dealt with allegations that there had been a 'cover-up' in years subsequent to 1971 at paragraphs 4.226 to 4.230. They concluded that there were only two aspects of the way various officers of the EHSSB dealt with allegations, or suspicions, about Kincora that, "required serious consideration in the context of a possible "cover-up"". They rejected that either of those aspects could be so considered and stated at 4.228, "...the evidence against a concerted "cover-up" is overwhelming".[46]

38 In the published Summary of his Report Sir George Terry expressed a number of conclusions that are relevant to Kincora.

- There was absolutely no evidence that residents of any children's home were involved in anything resembling homosexual rings of the type alleged.[47]

44 KIN 75251.
45 KIN 75251.
46 KIN 75300.
47 KIN 40019.

- While there was a lack of awareness over intelligence, and some information which was not as thoroughly recognised, there was no "cover-up" or concealment of evidence, or disciplinary breaches by the RUC personnel.[48]
- No complaint was received by the RUC from any victim at Kincora, or other boys' homes, until the Caskey Phase One investigation was launched in 1980.
- In the absence of such complaints there were limits to the action which could be taken by the police on the basis of unsubstantiated rumours or allegations.
- That said, there were several occasions which should have attracted greater interest and a more positive approach.
- These occasions were due to inadequacy or inefficiency, and were lapses in professionalism.
- Despite these lapses, he did not consider that an earlier investigation would reasonably have been prompted on the basis of information available to those officers.[49]
- Despite his attempts to persuade reporters to provide him with evidence or the identity of witnesses who could substantiate their allegations of a "homosexual ring", no reporter provided any fresh or real evidence, and he considered that, despite the evidence the reporters claimed was available, they had no such evidence.[50] He concluded that there was no justification in the allegations that there was an involvement in any homosexual practices [in or relating to Kincora] by British officials in the Northern Ireland Office, or any action by them to suppress police enquiries in that connection.

39 He made the following observation about the allegation that some in military circles were aware of homosexual activity in Kincora.

> "The media have also given a degree of prominence to the fact that some Military circles were aware of homosexual mis-practice in the Kincora Boy's hostel. The military sources had been very frank with me and perfectly open during the ongoing enquiry by our own team under Detective Superintendent Caskey. Let me say quite clearly > that once more I sought evidence from all sources including the military with negative result".[51]

48 KIN 40020.
49 KIN 40020.
50 KIN 40021.

We shall consider these particular comments further in the chapter dealing with the security services.

40 We have already mentioned the remarks of Mr Fitt MP in the House of Commons on 18 February 1982, when he referred to Mr Colin Wallace having allegedly given an interview to journalists in 1975 during which, in Mr Fitt's words [Mr Wallace] "made them aware of all the aspects of Kincora". In a later part of this Report, we shall examine the allegations made by Mr Wallace over the years. At this stage it is sufficient to say that it was not until 1984 that a document emanated from him which he claims was drawn up by him in November 1974. This document is of great significance in the sequence of events relating to Kincora, as was recognised by the RUC at the time. They passed the document to the Hughes Inquiry. As we shall see in due course, the Hughes Inquiry was unable to persuade Mr Wallace to answer a number of pertinent questions relating to this document, nor were the police, despite considerable efforts by both to persuade Mr Wallace to cooperate with them. Because of doubts about the authenticity of the November 1974 document, Detective Superintendent Caskey carried out a further investigation relating to that document. His file containing his report, and the associated statements and exhibits, was submitted to the ACC Crime on 28 August 1985. We shall call that Caskey Phase Four.

41 In the succeeding chapters of this Report, when we consider the relevant material relating to the role of social services and other departments and agencies in the events concerning Kincora, we shall examine in greater detail material from: the four Caskey files; the Sussex Police investigations; the transcripts of evidence given to the Hughes Inquiry; those parts of the Hughes Inquiry Report which directly concern Kincora; as well as material from other sources.

42 For the purposes of this introductory chapter it is enough to say that despite the emphatic conclusions expressed by Sir George Terry and by the Hughes Inquiry - that each of them had found no evidence to support the allegations of a cover-up of the abuse of residents at Kincora, or of a homosexual vice ring involving residents at Kincora and prominent public figures, civil servants at the Northern Ireland Office and others - allegations to that effect persisted. Allegations have also persisted that the RUC and the security services were aware of the abuse of boys in Kincora, and either failed to prevent that abuse or exploited it in various ways.

51 KIN 40023–40024.

43 These allegations have been made by many individuals over many years in various ways in newspaper articles and in television programmes. They have also been made, examined or referred to in a number of books, notably in Who Framed Colin Wallace by Paul Foot, first published in 1989; in The Dirty War by Martin Dillon published in 1990; and in The Kincora Scandal political cover up and intrigue in Northern Ireland by Chris Moore, first published in 1996.

44 Colin Wallace was dismissed from his position as a civilian employee of the Army Information Services of the Ministry of Defence in 1975 in circumstances which we shall examine in due course. In 1980 he was prosecuted for the murder of Jonathan Lewis, with whose wife he had been having what was described by the Court of Appeal in 1996 as an "amorous but not adulterous affair". On 20 March 1981 he was acquitted of the murder of Jonathan Lewis, but convicted of his manslaughter and sentenced to ten years in prison. Colin Wallace's first appeal against his conviction was dismissed in February 1982; he served his sentence and was released in 1986. His conviction was later referred to the Court of Appeal by the Home Secretary, and on 9 October 1996 the Court of Appeal Criminal Division allowed the appeal and quashed his conviction for manslaughter.

45 In 1989 certain materials discovered by the Ministry of Defence (MOD) led it to look again at the circumstances of Colin Wallace's dismissal in 1975. David Calcutt QC was appointed to review the material relating to the dismissal. He concluded that Colin Wallace's dismissal had not been justified and recommended that he be paid £30,000 compensation. The MoD accepted the recommendation. As will be apparent in a later chapter, the circumstances surrounding Colin Wallace's dismissal from his post in 1975, and what he alleged then and subsequently, are inextricably bound up with any examination of what he says did or did not happen in Kincora, and what the security services, including Army Intelligence, did or did not know about the sexual abuse of boys in Kincora. The relevance of Colin Wallace's conviction, and ultimate acquittal, on the charge of manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis to this Inquiry, is that when he was in prison between 1980 and 1986 he engaged in a voluminous correspondence with a great many public figures, including the Prime Minister, in an attempt to establish his innocence on the charge that resulted in his conviction. During that time, in his correspondence, Colin Wallace made numerous allegations about Kincora as part of his argument that he was dismissed from his civilian employment in 1975 because of what he said he knew about Kincora, and his belief that his knowledge was instrumental in his being wrongly prosecuted and convicted of the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis. He also made a number of allegations about what he maintained was malpractice on the part of the security services in relation to various activities in Northern Ireland.

46 For many years the British Government rejected all allegations of any involvement of the security services in the abuse of boys at Kincora, relying upon the findings of the Hughes Inquiry and of Sir George Terry, as well as the absence of any charges being brought as the result of the extremely detailed investigations carried out by the police in the form of the Caskey Phase Two, Phase Three and Phase Four investigations, and the investigations by the Sussex Police.

47 Following the commencement of this Inquiry, a number of applicants to our Inquiry said that they were abused whilst they were resident in Kincora, and on 4 September 2013 when we announced the first thirteen institutions that we intended to investigate, Kincora was included. The constitutional division of responsibilities between the Government at Westminster and the Northern Ireland Executive gives the Northern Ireland Executive responsibility for, and the Northern Ireland Assembly the legislative competence to deal with, only those functions that had been devolved to Northern Ireland. This meant that our investigation into Kincora would necessarily be restricted to considering those organisations such as the Belfast Welfare Authority, the EHSSB, and the police, which were at some time in the past the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Government of the time.

48 Our statutory powers are contained in the Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse Act (Northern Ireland) 2013, (the 2013 Act), which is an Act of the Northern Ireland Assembly passed to enable our Inquiry to investigate institutional abuse in Northern Ireland in those homes within our Terms of Reference between 1922 and 1995, as set out in a statement to the Assembly made by the First Minister and deputy First Minister acting jointly on 18 October 2012. Section 9(2) and 9(3) of the 2013 Act embodied that restriction by limiting our powers to require individuals to give evidence and to produce documents or any other thing to the Inquiry. The announcement in 2014 by the then Home Secretary, the Rt Hon Theresa May, that she intended to set up an independent Inquiry into child abuse in England and Wales resulted in calls within Northern Ireland that matters relating to Kincora should be examined by that Inquiry. In response to questions posed by the then First Minister, the Rt Hon Peter Robinson MLA on 17 July 2014 the Chairman replied to the effect that whilst the Inquiry was already committed to investigating whether there were systemic failings in relation to Kincora, unless Westminster departments such as the MoD and the Home Office,

> "Voluntarily agreed to co-operate they cannot be compelled to produce documents, nor can we compel anyone from those departments, serving or past to assist the HIA Inquiry in the way we can when dealing with institutions or official bodies in Northern Ireland".

49 However, the situation changed when, in the Autumn of 2014, the Northern Ireland Office approached the Inquiry to ascertain what our view would be were Her Majesty's Government to enhance the work of the Inquiry to enable all the allegations relating to Kincora to be properly investigated by this Inquiry, a matter that was being considered by the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. As the result of a meeting between the Chairman, the Inquiry Secretary and Inquiry Solicitor with the Permanent Under Secretary of the Northern Ireland Office and his officials on 16 October 2014 the Chairman set out out four requirements that would have to be met by Her Majesty's Government before the Chairman could accept the suggested enhancement of the role of this Inquiry.

(a) Details of all files relating to Kincora held by all UK Government Departments and agencies would be provided to this Inquiry.

(b) A senior civil servant will confirm to the Inquiry at a suitable time that all relevant files have been produced or accounted for.

(c) That the additional cost that the Inquiry would incur in investigating the non-devolved UK Government Departments and agencies that the Inquiry may have to investigate would be covered in principle by HM Government.

(d) That a suitable form of immunity would be provided by the Attorney General for England and Wales for witnesses who co-operate with the Inquiry and in particular that undertaking would relate to any allegation of an offence arising under the Official Secrets Acts.

50 On 21 October 2014 the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced to the House of Commons that they felt that as this Inquiry was already in being and intended to investigate Kincora, and that as the protection of children was a devolved matter, it was felt that this Inquiry was the better forum to investigate all aspects of what happened at Kincora. The Secretary of State then gave a number of assurances which met the Chairman's four requirements. In particular she said:

> "There will be the fullest possible degree of co-operation by all of HM Government and its agencies to determine the facts";

and

> "All government departments and agencies who receive a request for information or documents from the Inquiry will co-operate to the best of their ability in determining what material they hold that might be relevant to it on matters for which they have responsibility in accordance with the Terms of Reference of the Inquiry".

51 The Inquiry welcomed these assurances, saying that:

> "As we have already announced, and as the Secretary of State has said, the HIA Inquiry is investigating Kincora, and so her announcement does not extend the Terms of Reference of our Inquiry. On the contrary, it now provides our Inquiry with the means to investigate the activities of non-devolved Government Departments and agencies.
>
> We are satisfied that the assurances of full co-operation by all Government Departments and agencies, and the satisfactory resolution by HM Government of the other issues the Inquiry has raised with it, will provide our HIA Inquiry with the ability and financial resources to carry out an effective and thorough investigation into all the Kincora allegations.
>
> However, should it become apparent during our work that it is necessary to have powers under the Inquiries Act 2005 then we will ask OFMDFM and HM Government to confer such powers on our Inquiry".

52 Following the assurances given by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to the House of Commons, the Inquiry immediately put in train the steps we considered necessary to expand the scope of our investigations to enable it to investigate the actions of the non-devolved departments and agencies relating to Kincora, particularly the MoD regarding Army Intelligence, the Security Service (MI5), the Secret Intelligence Service (MI6), the Northern Ireland Office and the Cabinet Office. As part of the process, we requested the Police Service of Northern Ireland to make available to us a large quantity of material relating to the various investigations carried out by the Royal Ulster Constabulary, including relevant files held by RUC Special Branch.

The Hoy judicial review

53 The decision by the Secretary of State to request the Inquiry to expand its investigation into Kincora was challenged in an application to the High Court for judicial review brought by Gary Hoy, a former resident of Kincora and applicant to the Inquiry. The judicial review was initiated in 2015 and brought against the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and the Inquiry. In addition to affidavits sworn by Gary Hoy himself, supporting affidavits were filed by a number of individuals, including Richard Kerr to whom we refer in the next chapter. The judicial review application was based on a number of grounds which can be seen from the judgment of Mr Justice Treacy, and that of the Lord Chief Justice when delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

54 From the Inquiry's perspective, the key issues were firstly whether the Inquiry's investigation into any involvement in the sexual abuse of residents at Kincora on the part of state agencies had to comply with the provisions of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Secondly, if the Inquiry had to comply with Article 3, whether its powers and procedures were capable of complying with Article 3. The Inquiry's position was that irrespective of whether or not Article 3 applied, if the Inquiry felt that it was not receiving full assistance from British Government Departments and Agencies, it would not hesitate to say so and, if necessary, request the First Minister and deputy First Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to confer on the Inquiry such powers under the Inquiries Act 2005 as might be necessary. The Inquiry also submitted that in any event the application was premature, and that the time to consider whether Article 3 applied, and if so whether it had been complied with, was after the Inquiry had conducted its investigations and delivered its Report.

55 On 8 April 2016 Mr Justice Treacy dismissed the application, describing it as "premature and misconceived". On 27 May 2016 the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, stating that the Inquiry was entitled to proceed along the path mapped out by it, and on 31 May 2016 the Inquiry started its public hearings into Kincora.

The Inquiry's investigation into Kincora

56 Following the assurances given by the Secretary of State to the Inquiry in October 2014 the Inquiry expanded its investigation into Kincora to include the non-devolved departments and agencies, and we shall explain our work in that area in greater detail in the appropriate chapter. At this stage we need only briefly outline the steps taken. The Inquiry asked for details of all files relevant to Kincora held by all the non-devolved departments of Government, as well as those held by the Secret Intelligence Service and by the Security Service, to be notified to the Inquiry. Once details of those files were given to the Inquiry the work of examining the files got underway as soon as other Inquiry commitments permitted. The examination of the files which seemed likely to contain the most important and relevant documents was given priority by the Inquiry, and started in April 2015. This work continued despite the judicial review so that the Inquiry would be in a position to start its public hearings at the conclusions of the judicial review proceedings if the courts upheld the Inquiry's position. Had the Inquiry not taken the precaution of proceeding with its investigative work during the judicial review, even at the risk of an unfavourable outcome for the Inquiry, it would have been impossible for us to have completed our public hearings by 18 July 2016 as we were required to do within the revised timetable given to us by the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly when we were given an extra year to complete our work.

57 At the beginning of the hearings held by the Inquiry into Kincora on 31 May 2016 the Chairman explained that the Inquiry intended to investigate the following issues.

(a) The nature and extent of sexual abuse perpetrated on residents of Kincora; abuse that resulted in the arrest, conviction and sentence of Mains, Semple and McGrath.

(b) Who perpetrated that abuse.

(c) Whether the abuse of boys resident in Kincora occurred in Kincora itself or elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

(d) When such abuse occurred.

58 He explained that the Inquiry intended to investigate "whether there were systemic failures to prevent such abuse on the part of those responsible for the management of Kincora or on the part of other state entities". He explained that the following entities would be investigated.

(a) Belfast County Borough Welfare Committee and Department and its successor the Eastern Health and Social Services Board.

(b) The Royal Ulster Constabulary.

(c) The Secret Intelligence Service.

(d) The Security Service.

(e) The Ministry of Defence.

(f) The Northern Ireland Office.

59 He then explained that in relation to each of these entities the Inquiry intended to investigate the following matters.

(a) Whether members of the organisation or body concerned knew of the abuse.

(b) What they knew.

(c) When they knew.

(d) What did they do with any knowledge they had.

(e) What should they have done with any knowledge they had.

He explained that the Inquiry intended to consider:

> "The full ambit of previous investigations carried out into Kincora arising from, or connected with, these matters, as well as the responses of these organisations or bodies to those investigations. This will include the Hughes Inquiry, several investigations by the RUC, and the investigation carried out by the Sussex Constabulary under the direction of Sir George Terry. It will also involve the examination of the steps taken in later years by the RUC, the Secret Intelligence Service, the Security Service, the Ministry of Defence, the Northern Ireland Office and the Cabinet Office to address the allegations made in the media and elsewhere about what the various state agencies did, or did not know, about the sexual abuse of children in Kincora, and what those agencies did, or should have done with any such knowledge."

60 Having pointed out that the Inquiry did not need to resort to powers of compulsion "when there is voluntary and full co-operation, by those from whom information and documents are sought", the Chairman confirmed that the Inquiry had been provided with full and voluntary co-operation by all HM Government departments and agencies. He also confirmed that we were satisfied that we had been able to inspect all relevant material held by the PSNI, as the successor to the RUC, which the Inquiry considered relevant to its work.

61 We want to repeat what was stated by Junior Counsel to the Inquiry on several occasions during the nineteen sitting days devoted to an examination of events relating to Kincora, namely that we have been able to examine in unredacted form all documents which we have had produced to us. Although there is a very substantial quantity of hitherto secret material (including the four voluminous Caskey files to which we have already referred) held by the SIS, by the Security Services, by the RUC Special Branch, by the NIO and by the Cabinet Office, these documents, or extracts from them, are part of an even greater quantity of material held by these various agencies and departments which the Inquiry has examined as part of its work. We have been given complete access to all the files we wished to see, and the Inquiry has studied all of the material contained in those files, and not just the material which it has publicly referred to. We did not consider that every page of every file, or every part of every page, needed to be produced or examined in public. Some of the material was not relevant to the issues we set ourselves to examine. Other parts that were relevant, such as the identity of serving or retired officers of the security services, or agents of any of these agencies, or others who were engaged in intelligence work, could not be published in case the safety of those individuals or the interests of national security were endangered. Whilst we took into account the views of the security services, and of Government departments, when deciding what should be published or what should be redacted (that is, blacked out in the text) we have been able to publish everything that we believed was necessary to be published.

62 From the beginning of our work on Kincora we have proceeded on the basis that as much as can be properly put before the public must be, and has been made, publicly available, thereby enabling everyone who wishes to know what happened in Kincora to see the documents which we had publicly examined. In the interest of maximum disclosure, wherever reasonably possible, we did this in completely open sessions, so that our total commitment to carrying out a comprehensive and thorough investigation can be scrutinised. In doing so, and having decided for ourselves the extent and manner to which we should carry out our investigations, we have been conscious throughout that, in the words of the Lord Chief Justice in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Hoy case:

> "There is a suggestion in this case that children in Kincora were abused and prostituted in order to satisfy the interest of national security. If that is true it must be exposed. ...If the suggestion is not true the rumour and suspicion surrounding this should be allayed".

Chapter 26:

Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Home

PART FIVE

PART SIX

PART SEVEN

PART EIGHT

The Nature and Extent of the Sexual Abuse of Adolescent Boys Resident in Kincora

PART ONE

Introduction

1 In the first part of this chapter we examine the accounts given by ex-residents to the Caskey Phase One and Phase Two investigations, to the Sussex Police, and to the Hughes Inquiry. We also consider accounts given by some residents on other occasions, whether in the form of newspaper or television interviews, or as in the case of Gary Hoy and others, in affidavits made by them which were then lodged in the course of legal proceedings. Finally, we examine the accounts given by the former residents and others who gave evidence to this Inquiry. In addition to the accounts given by ex-residents, we also consider the accounts given by others who had relevant contact with Kincora, such as social workers and former officials of the Belfast Welfare Authority or the EHSSB. Almost all of this material was examined in considerable detail during the public hearings devoted to Kincora, and may be found in the daily transcripts of those hearings on our Inquiry's website, or in the documents referred to during the hearings; documents which we have also placed on our website. Whilst on occasion it will be necessary to set out relevant matters in some detail, in general we confine ourselves to summarising those parts of the evidence to be found in the transcripts and documents on our website that are relevant to the issues we consider.

2 As will become apparent, the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora varied in intensity and in the nature of the abuse at various stages of the almost 22 years existence of the hostel, and so we examine these stages over five distinct periods. The first of these relates to the six years and four months from the opening of the hostel in 1958 until September 1964 when Raymond Semple joined Joseph Mains as assistant warden.

3 As we explained in the previous chapter many boys were admitted to Kincora on more than one occasion, and allowing for this a total 309 boys resided in Kincora from its opening in 1958 until its closure in 1980. The Caskey Phase One investigation took 1963 as its starting point, and stated that 186 boys resided in Kincora between 1963 and 1980. However, an analysis of the admissions register by the PSNI for the purposes of this Inquiry concluded there were 245 boys in Kincora between 1963 and 1980. 104 boys from that period were traced and interviewed during Caskey Phase One, or 42% of former residents during that time.[1] As we shall see a number of others came forward at various times and made allegations about their experiences in Kincora.

Period One: May 1958 to September 1964

4 As we have explained, during this period of over six years warden Mains was the only care staff member in Kincora, apart from eight months in 1962, and eleven months from July 1963 until May 1964, when he was given the services of an assistant warden. Between May 1958 and the end of September 1964, 89 boys were admitted to Kincora although some of these were admitted on more than one occasion. Of the 89, four said that they were abused by Mains during this period, and we examine their accounts separately.

The Evidence of R 2

5 R 2 was not an applicant to our Inquiry, but did give evidence to the Hughes Inquiry which gave him the designation R 2, and we have given him the same designation. Although several boys had been admitted to Kincora before he arrived at the beginning of January 1959, R 2 was one of the earliest to be admitted, and he remained a resident for two years and two and a half months until he left in mid-March 1961. He was readmitted at his own request in mid-June 1961, and remained a resident in Kincora until he was discharged a second time in September 1961. He was therefore in Kincora for almost two and a half years. He was fifteen and eight months of age when he first arrived, and nineteen and a half when he left for the last time.

6 R 2 was only questioned by the RUC in 1980 because other ex-residents had told the police that he visited Kincora regularly after he left. R 2 was almost 38 when he was traced by the RUC. When he made his first statement, R 2 admitted that he had had sex with Mains every two or three months for almost twenty years until 1978. Sex would take place in Mains's flat at Kincora, that is the extension added at the back of the building where Mains had a bedroom and an office. In his first statement to the RUC during the Caskey Phase One investigation in April 1980 R 2 said that this relationship only started after he left Kincora, and that nothing happened between them whilst he was a resident in Kincora. Mains had given a similar account to the RUC when he was questioned. When R 2 was medically examined on behalf of the police in 1980 he repeated to Dr Irwin that he had not been sexually abused at Kincora.[2]

1 KIN 1582.

7 When questioned a second time by the RUC in May 1980 Mains admitted engaging in masturbation with R 2 whilst R 2 was a resident in Kincora, and, as he had already admitted, anal intercourse with R 2 in Kincora, but after R 2 ceased to be a resident there. Consensual anal sex between adults was still a criminal offence in Northern Ireland at that time. At his trial in 1981 Mains only faced one charge of gross indecency in respect of the masturbation of R 2 whilst a resident in Kincora. He faced a second charge of buggery, which covered the entire period of their relationship up to 1979.[3] This was in accordance with the usual practice of only laying a single charge which covered a lengthy period of time, rather than have numerous charges covering a longer period and thereby complicating the task of the court and the jury, if a jury had to deal with a case.

8 Although the sex between Mains and R 2 usually took place in Mains's bedroom in Kincora during a period after R 2 stopped being a resident, R 2 said that on one occasion he had sex with Mains in the home of BAR 1 who was Mains's girlfriend, although she was not there at the time.

9 After Mains had been sentenced to a total of six years imprisonment at the end of 1981, R 2 subsequently gave a significantly different account. As explained in the previous chapter, by early 1982 there were numerous articles in newspapers making allegations about Kincora. On 19 February 1982 R 2 wrote a letter to Gerry Fitt MP asking a number of questions about Kincora, and he gave a copy of this letter to the police on 1 March 1982. On that date he made a further police statement, and on 30 March 1982 that was followed by another statement. In these statements R 2 described how Mains viewed him in the bath and then fondled and kissed him. This was followed by persistent overtures by Mains that R 2 go to bed with him, to which R 2 eventually succumbed. Oral and anal intercourse then took place on approximately ten occasions in Mains's room upstairs in Kincora, spread over both periods when R 2 was resident in the hostel. R 2 said that he had kept up the relationship because he felt unable to cope, and as Mains was in "such a high and respected position I felt trapped". He explained he did not complain to the welfare officers who visited Kincora because they did not pay any heed to the children, and because "I felt that my complaints would not have been heeded or even looked into in any depth".[4] It is clear from this later account that R 2 was persuaded, that is seduced, by Mains when he took part in sexual activity with Mains in Kincora as a resident.

2 KIN 10715.
3 KIN 101069.

10 When questioned about these allegations, Mains maintained that the relationship did not start until after R 2 left Kincora. D/Supt Caskey recommended no further proceedings against Mains, pointing out that had this additional information been made known when Mains was sentenced it was unlikely to have resulted in a heavier sentence.[5] This is a common position taken by police, prosecutors and judges when further allegations of similar offences that have already been dealt with are later brought against an accused who has already been sentenced.

11 We shall return to R 2 later, but before leaving him at this stage there are four matters that deserve to be mentioned. The first is that R 2 maintained that Mains was the only man with whom he had sexual relations. Secondly, over the years of their relationship he visited Kincora and stayed overnight with Mains on occasions. Thirdly, the relationship lasted for many years after R 2 ceased to be a resident in Kincora. R 2 told the police in 1980 that he "didn't like any kind of sex but I didn't like to refuse because I treated Joe as a personal friend and not as a sexual partner".[6] Finally, R 2 served for a time in the RUC Reserve, and sometimes visited Mains at Kincora whilst wearing his police uniform.

4 KIN 21247.
5 KIN 20199.
6 KIN 10151.

The Evidence of R 3/HIA 199 (Hugh Quinn)

12 Whatever R 2 may have believed the nature of the relationship between Mains and himself to be, he was not the only boy sexually abused by Mains whilst R 2 was a Kincora resident because Mains was also abusing R 3 during the period. R 3 also gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry and we have continued his designation although he gave evidence to our Inquiry under the designation HIA 199. For the sake of consistency we shall refer to him as R 3 in this Report as well. He spent at least three periods in Kincora between February 1960 and August 1963. After R 3 left Kincora he returned from time to time to see Mains, and stayed over on occasions.

13 R 3 was first admitted to Kincora in February 1960 when he was just over fourteen, and he remained there for sixteen months until he left in June 1961. Only two weeks later he was re-admitted, and remained in Kincora for a further thirteen months until he was discharged in July 1962 aged sixteen to attend the National Sea Training School at Gravesend in Kent. This did not work out and he was re-admitted in early August 1962. He remained a resident in Kincora until he was finally discharged a year later in August 1963, by which time he was seventeen and eight months of age. We note that the Hughes Inquiry believed that he was discharged aged eighteen and a half in May 1964. As we have already explained, R 3 was one of those boys who was well under fifteen when admitted, and who remained a resident in Kincora for a long time.

14 R 3 did not make any complaints about Mains until he was identified to the RUC by other ex-residents as someone who had regularly returned to Kincora. Mains was therefore questioned about R 3 before R 3 had been interviewed by the RUC. Mains initially only admitted masturbation with R 3 whilst R 3 was a resident, but in a second interview later that day admitted that he had anal sex with R 3 on several occasions in 1963 and 1964 while R 3 was living in Kincora. Mains admitted being the dominant partner in these acts of anal intercourse, saying that R 3 was the first person with whom he had anal sex.[7] R 3 gave evidence to our Inquiry under the designation HIA 199. He described how he was sometimes punched and slapped by Mains in his office or in the bedroom, and he believed that this was to remind him of the consequences if he did not submit to Mains's sexual demands.[8] Mains accepted that he had made a remark to the effect that if R 3 did not pull himself together, "the next step for him would be Borstal". Whether intended as a threat or not, it was entirely understandable that R 3 interpreted the remark as a threat. At the trial Mains was charged with two offences against R 3, one of buggery for which he received six years imprisonment, and one of gross indecency to represent the masturbation for which he received two years in prison.

7 KIN 10420.

15 R 3 also gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry. He returned to Kincora on several occasions after he left, as well as sending cards. He told the Hughes Inquiry that he returned every year until around 1969, but did not return again until 1979. His visits are corroborated by an entry in the Kincora registers that he stayed for two weeks between 22 December 1965 and 2 January 1966. R 3 was emphatic to us that the relationship between Mains and himself was not consensual, as Mains claimed to the police, but was one where R 3 felt that he was forced by a mixture of threats, such as the reference to Borstal, gifts and privileges, such as being taught to drive, and the fear of being disbelieved.[9] He explained that despite what Mains had done, R 3 felt that he was safe in returning to Kincora[10] because he regarded Mains as a father figure and as Kincora was the only home he still had, and because the abuse had stopped when he told Mains he would tell on him.

The Evidence of KIN 1

16 R 2 and R 3 overlapped at Kincora between February 1960 and September 1961 and so it is clear that Mains did not confine his sexual abuse to one boy at a time during that period. That pattern was repeated with KIN 1 who overlapped with R 3 between February and August 1963. KIN 1 came to Kincora at the beginning of May 1963, when he was fifteen and nine months, and remained there until he left aged seventeen and four months in early November 1964. His allegations against Mains were of less gravity than those of R 2 and R 3. They were confined to two episodes where he described Mains adopting a pretext to touch him around his private parts. The first was when KIN 1 told Mains he had a pain in his groin, whereupon Mains told him to

8 Day 209, pp.81 and 82.
9 Day 209, p.89.
10 Day 209, p.91.

drop his trousers and underpants and then felt around his private parts. Two or three months later he described how he was told to go and have a bath. Mains then came in, locked the bathroom door behind him and washed around the private parts of KIN 1 with his hands. KIN 1 told him he was old enough to do this himself and Mains left because someone called him.[11] KIN 1 made complaints relating to three occasions when he said R 3 made unmistakable sexual approaches to him whilst both boys were resident in Kincora. R 3 denied these allegations, as well as the allegation by KIN 1 that it was general talk amongst the boys that R 3 was interfering with other boys in the hostel, something he said he witnessed for himself in his bedroom when he was supposed to be asleep.

17 Although a charge of indecent assault was brought against Mains based on the allegations by KIN 1, Mains pleaded not guilty to that charge at his trial, and the prosecution did not proceed with the charge because Mains was pleading guilty to the other charges against him. Again that is a usual course for the prosecution to take in such circumstances.

The Experiences of R 7

18 The last boy to be admitted to Kincora during this first period and who was abused by Mains was R 7. He spent three periods in Kincora, arriving in August 1964 aged fifteen years and two months, and remaining until December 1965 when he was sixteen and a half. He was abused by Mains during this period. He was then discharged but was re-admitted in March 1966, and remained in Kincora for a further six and a half months until September 1966. During this time he was abused by Semple but not by Mains. R 7 was re-admitted in November 1968 for a third time. By now he was seventeen and five months of age and he remained in Kincora for a further two and a half months until he was discharged for the third and last time in January 1968 aged nineteen and a half. We should say there is some uncertainty about when he was discharged, with various accounts giving January or December 1968. However, this is not significant because R 7 has not alleged that he was abused during this third and final period in Kincora. Although the first period he spent in Kincora straddles the end of the first period that we are presently considering, we consider his accounts of his experiences with Mains fall more conveniently into this first period, and we will return to his accounts of his experiences with Semple when we consider the next period.

11 KIN 10160.

19 R 7 said that shortly after he first arrived in Kincora, and so presumably in, or not long after, August 1964 when he was aged fifteen Mains made his first sexual approach to him. This was when he was getting out of the bath and Mains grabbed him around the testicles. About a week later he described how Mains invited him into his bedroom, and after feeling around his testicles, pulled down R 7's trousers and underpants. He then pushed him face down on the bed and attempted to anally penetrate him. R 7 pulled away, whereupon Mains said something to the effect that R 7 wasn't much good and let him leave the bedroom.

20 When questioned, Mains denied the attempted anal penetration, but admitted he had been involved in masturbation with R 7. At his trial Mains was charged with attempted buggery of R 7, to which he pleaded not guilty, but he admitted the offence of gross indecency with R 7 in respect of the masturbation. As Mains had pleaded guilty to other offences of buggery the prosecution did not proceed with the charge of attempted buggery of R 7.

21 It can be seen from these descriptions that Mains picked on some boys, usually making the first approach when the boy was bathing. Then he would make a further approach when he would attempt to persuade, or to force, the boy to submit to anal intercourse. If the boy agreed, or gave in, anal intercourse would take place and be repeated on other occasions. If the boy rejected his advances then Mains would turn elsewhere. It is significant that Mains would make his first sexual advance when he was alone with the boy, and that later offences were committed in secret in Mains's bedroom, which at that time was on the first floor of Kincora. As R 3 said to the Hughes Inquiry, "all sex activity in Kincora was secretive, otherwise we would have been discussing it with each other".[12] R 3 also explained to the Hughes Inquiry that Mains told him to go to his bedroom after dark when the lights were out and the other boys were asleep, and in the morning to wait until the cook had gone into the kitchen before returning to his own bed.[13]

12 KIN 71316.
13 KIN 71333.

22 A similar account of the way Mains carried out his crimes was given by R 2. He wrote that his bed was in the bedroom adjacent to Mains's bedroom on the first floor. He described how Mains's:

> "method to get me sneaked into his room was, by the way he was checking around the rooms and would close each door on his way out where he would stand on the landing beckoning me to cross over into his room saying all was clear".[14]

23 Given the secrecy in which these offences were committed, it is not surprising that Mains was successful in concealing from others what was happening. Another factor in his concealment of his crimes was because he only approached some boys and not others. This is illustrated by the evidence of KIN 3 in his statements to the RUC in 1980, and to the Sussex police in 1982. KIN 3 was in Kincora from April 1963, when he was fifteen and two months of age, until the end of July 1964 when he left aged sixteen and a half. During the sixteen months he spent in Kincora he said:

> "I didn't know of anything going on. I was out nearly all the time and only slept there. I was never approached in a sexual way".[15]

As we have already explained, apart from two periods totalling approximately nineteen months when there was an assistant warden, for the rest of the time we are presently considering, Mains was the sole member of the care staff, and as such the only person in the building apart from the cook, and she was unaware of what was happening. That Mains was alone in the building for long periods of time, and many of the boys were either out or otherwise engaged, meant that he had ample opportunity which he made use of in order to commit offences on boys in his care without either being discovered or arousing suspicion.

PART TWO

Period two: 8 September 1964 to 28 February 1966

24 During this eighteen-month period 50 boys were resident in Kincora, including KIN 1, R 3 and R 7. Leaving KIN 1 and R 3 out of account because their experiences of abuse were confined to period one, which we have already considered, that leaves 48 other residents during period

14 KIN 21250.
15 KIN 11585.

two. Of those 48, twelve were traced and interviewed by the police, either as part of the Caskey Phase One investigation or subsequently, as in the case of KIN 127, who approached the police himself in 1982. Of the twelve who have been traced at some stage it has been established that six boys were sexually abused by Mains, and of these six, two (R 1 and R 7) were also abused by Semple. This period of eighteen months has been chosen because it covers the first period of Semple's two periods of employment as assistant warden at Kincora. We consider the accounts of the boys who were abused first, and then we consider the accounts of the other six residents who were traced but did not allege that they had been sexually abused during this period.

The Experiences of R 7

25 As we have already described, R 7 was abused by Mains during period one. Semple first joined the care staff as assistant warden in September 1964. R 7 was one of those residents who were admitted to Kincora on more than one occasion, and his first period in the hostel came to an end just before Christmas 1965. He returned for a second time two and a half months later at the beginning of March 1966. He alleged that during his second period in Kincora, that is from March 1966 onwards, he was sexually molested by Semple who came into the bathroom, dried his bottom and then made R 7 face him and pulled R 7 towards him. R 7 gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry and said that Semple left him alone when he rejected his advances. He said he thought that Semple's actions were more about getting a cheap thrill, and although he did not regard Semple's advances as very serious, he did not want them to continue. Significantly, he described Semple as a very kind hearted person who was liked by the boys, most of whom got on very well with him.[16]

26 As R 7 did not return to Kincora until after Semple left in February 1966, R 7 may have been mistaken when he attributed Semple's actions to the period when R 7 was in Kincora for the second time. That is because Semple did not return, at least on a permanent basis, until 1969, although he did help out in a voluntary capacity for some months before he returned to the permanent staff. However, the exact timing is of no significance because Semple admitted to the police that he followed R 7 into the bathroom because he fancied the boy, then rubbed R 7's private parts and his bottom while he was bathing, Semple then became aroused and pulled R 7 against him. Semple pleaded guilty to a single charge of gross indecency and was sentenced to two years imprisonment.

16 KIN 71411.

The Experiences of R 1

27 R 1 arrived in Kincora in February 1965 aged sixteen and a half, having been in Bawnmore Children's Home from the age of fourteen. Before that he had been in Manor House, Lisburn, from March 1961. Whilst in Manor House he behaved in a highly sexualised fashion, making sexual approaches to other boys and girls in the home.[17] He was moved from Manor House to Bawnmore aged fourteen, and we consider his time there in the Bawnmore chapter of this Report. What is significant about R 1's time in Bawnmore from the Kincora perspective is that he alleged that he was repeatedly sexually abused in Bawnmore by S 1, a member of the staff there. Whilst Mains denied having a sustained sexual relationship with S 1, he did admit that they had sex on one occasion in Mains bedroom in Kincora.[18] Although Mains denied that when R 1 was transferred to Kincora S 1 told him about having homosexual relations with R 1, we cannot exclude the strong possibility that some such remark about R 1 was made to Mains by S 1, given the highly sexualised behaviour by R 1 reported whilst he was at Manor House, and that S 1 and Mains had sex together.

28 R 1 knew R 7 when they both were in Bawnmore, and in his March 1980 police statement R 1 alleged that when he arrived in Kincora he was warned by R 7 to watch out for Mains and Semple because they would interfere with him. He went on to say that a few days later Mains called him into his room and asked R 1 to masturbate him, saying that he had been told that R 1 did that sort of thing. Although R 1 initially refused he did masturbate Mains, who felt his testicles. According to R 1 this became an almost daily occurrence between them. Mains denied that any of these things happened, and maintained that position at his trial, where the prosecution decided not to proceed with the charges.

17 KIN 76471.
18 KIN 10479.

29 When considering the accuracy of R 1's account it is relevant that in February 1982 he spoke to Jim Cusack, a journalist on the Belfast Telegraph. On 8 March 1982 R 1 merely said that a journalist spoke to him at his home and asked if he knew "names of people mixed up in the Kincora situation. I told him that I did not".[19] Jim Cusack's account was that R 1 contacted him on the telephone on one or two occasions, saying that he (R 1) thought the information he had about Kincora, "might be worth money to him", mentioning £50 and then £30. He was told that it was not the policy of the newspaper to pay for information.[20] We mention this because one of the factors that has to be given due weight when assessing the reliability of the account given by any witness is whether the witness has profited, or sought to profit, from information he or she says they have. This is a relevant consideration when we consider the account given by R 1 about Mains involvement in an alleged vice ring in Bangor to which we refer later.

The Involvement of R 1 with Semple

30 Unlike the position between Mains and R 1, it is common ground that an active homosexual relationship developed between R 1 and Semple. This involved each having anal penetrative sex with the other on numerous occasions. Ultimately Semple pleaded guilty to two charges of buggery, and one of gross indecency, against R 1, and received an overall sentence of five years imprisonment. Semple's account to the police in his statement of 1 April 1980 was that the initial suggestion came from R 1 who came into his room, invited Semple to masturbate him and they then masturbated each other. On subsequent occasions they engaged in mutual masturbation, oral sex and anal intercourse.[21] R 1's account was that Semple made the initial approach to him, asking R 1 to masturbate him, saying that if R 1 could do it for Mains R 1 could do it for him. He also said that the anal sex started at Semple's instigation.[22] Whether R 1 or Semple initiated their sexual relationship, it certainly had a significant consensual aspect as it developed.

19 KIN 20568.
20 KIN 20570.
21 KIN 10357.
22 KIN 10141.

Semple's departure from Kincora

31 In February 1966 Semple resigned as assistant warden at Kincora, ostensibly for family reasons. However, in 1980 he admitted to the police that Mains spoke to him, saying that R 1 had told Mains what was happening between Semple and himself. Mains said that he told Semple this had to stop. Semple then stopped for about a week, but then resumed having sex with R 1. Again Mains called him in and told him to stop. Mains admitted that R 1 told him what was happening between himself and Semple. Mains knew that Semple's mother was unwell, so he suggested to Semple that he resign and Semple did so.[23] Whether Semple's mother was ill or not, this was clearly a convenient pretext that enabled Mains to force Semple out of Kincora. Given Mains's abuse of several boys both before and during Semple's first spell as assistant warden in Kincora we are in no doubt that Mains's objective in making it clear to Semple that Semple should resign was not to protect the boys in his care, but to avoid the risk of Semple's behaviour coming to light, and as a result imperilling Mains's position. Mains admitted that he did not tell his superiors what Semple had been doing; clearly he could not take the risk that his own sexual abuse of residents would come to light if he said what Semple was doing, with a result that he could lose his job and end up in prison.

The Experiences of KIN 4

32 KIN 4 first entered Kincora in March 1965 aged fifteen and five months, and remained for four months until he was discharged in July 1965. He was readmitted on an unknown date and remained in Kincora until he was discharged on his sixteenth birthday in September 1965. He was traced by the RUC during the Caskey Phase One investigation, and said that Mains came into the bathroom when he was naked, commented disparagingly on the size of his penis and patted KIN 4 on the backside. He made no other complaint about Mains. No charges were directed by the DPP in respect of his allegations, all of which Mains denied. KIN 4 commented that the talk amongst the boys was that Mains and Semple were "bent", and he referred to an occasion when he saw Semple lying on the beds in a room, although he did not witness any homosexual acts.

23 KIN 10415.

The Experiences of R 4

33 R 4 gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, and for consistency we refer to him by that designation, rather than as HIA 534, although he gave evidence to our Inquiry under both designations. He arrived in Kincora in August 1965 when he was about sixteen and three months of age, leaving fifteen months later in November 1966 aged seventeen and a half. Mains told the police that his first encounter with R 4 was when he bathed R 4 because R 4 would not wash, but he denied that anything else occurred. In 1980 during the Caskey Phase One investigation R 4 told the RUC that he regarded Mains as being like a father to him. He described how Mains got him to massage his bare back with cream in Mains bedroom. Nothing else happened at that time, but Mains asked him to massage his back with cream on other occasions, and on the second time Mains felt around R 4's genitals, although outside his trousers. The third time R 4 was in his pyjamas, and on this occasion was masturbated by Mains. The next time mutual masturbation occurred. This happened on other occasions, as well as oral sex. R 4 said he refused Mains request to have anal sex with him. These sexual acts all took place in Kincora, except on one occasion when the boys went on a summer camping holiday in Magilligan, Co Londonderry, when Mains performed oral sex on him when they were sharing a tent.

34 R 4 explained that his sexual relationship with Mains continued after R 4 left Kincora. He described how he returned to Kincora from time to time over many years. On these occasions he engaged in mutual masturbation with Mains, or Mains would perform oral sex on him. This practice lasted until Christmas 1979 when Mains allowed R 4 to stay in his home. R 4 described how they engaged in mutual masturbation, and Mains performed oral sex on him when Mains's girlfriend BAR 1 had gone to bed. By this time R 4 was 30.

35 R 4 explained that his sexual experiences were not confined to Mains, and he described engaging in mutual masturbation and/or anal intercourse with three other boys during his visits after he had left Kincora. One of these was R 9 who was in Kincora in the mid-seventies and said that he masturbated and performed oral sex on R 4 on one of R 4's visits to Kincora. R 4 also claimed he engaged in oral sex with R 17 in the garden of Kincora on one of his visits. R 17 denied that that occurred, although he did describe an occasion when he returned to Kincora, went out for a drink with R 4, and when they went back to the hostel R 4 exposed himself to R 17 in the yard. R 17 said he just went back into the hostel and nothing occurred.[24] The third boy was R 18 who said he masturbated R 4 and then asked R 4 to masturbate him on one occasion when they were both in the living room at the front of Kincora.[25] As R 4 explained to the Hughes Inquiry, although he disliked what was happening when it started, "I just got used to it as a way of life".[26]

36 R 4 admitted that in later life he had a number of homosexual relationships with adult males, but none of these had any connection with Kincora. He also admitted sexually assaulting the eight-year-old-son of a family with whom he was lodging at the time; he was prosecuted for that offence in October 1981 and sentenced to six months imprisonment.

37 Given that Mains did not admit the allegations made by R 4, but had admitted to other similar offences, and that the circumstances of the alleged offence committed by Mains against R 4 would have been highly unlikely to have resulted in an increased sentence for Mains, it is understandable that the DPP did not direct a prosecution of Mains based on the allegations by R 4.

38 The description of his experiences by R 4 are significant for a number of reasons, not just because he was one of several boys who returned to Kincora for visits after they left. Given that for many it was the last childhood home they had, return visits were not surprising. We heard of similar instances of former residents of other children's homes doing so in homes we investigated, as well as keeping in touch with staff, even though in some cases they had been abused in one form or another in the home. What was different in the case of R 4 was that on some of his return visits he engaged in consensual homosexual activity with Mains, which took place over many years in Kincora itself, and on some visits he also engaged in consensual homosexual activity with residents. R 4 was therefore one of those ex-residents who returned to the hostel, and when they did so had sex with Mains, and with adolescent residents in Kincora who were willing to do so.

The Experiences of KIN 5

39 KIN 5 was admitted to Kincora for the first time in September 1965 when he was fifteen and a half, and he remained there for almost nineteen

24 KIN 11269.
25 KIN 10163.
26 KIN 71378.

months before being discharged aged seventeen at the beginning of April 1967. He was readmitted a week later and remained for a further three weeks. He described how he was in the bath during his first week in Kincora when Mains came in, asked why he was skinny, then put his hand into the water and pulled back KIN 5's foreskin before leaving the bathroom. On another occasion he said he walked into Mains's office to find Mains and R 4 kissing.

40 He remarked that it was a well known fact in the hostel that Mains was homosexual, and as we shall see it was in 1967 that the first recorded complaint about Mains's behaviour was made and investigated, although an earlier complaint may have been made in 1966. The 1967 complaint, and the evidence of KIN 5 and KIN 4, suggests that although Mains may have been successful in earlier years in concealing his homosexual desires and approaches to adolescent boys, he was becoming more open in his sexual approaches and this was becoming known to at least some of the boys in the hostel, although, as we shall see, not all boys seem to have been aware of what was happening. The evidence of KIN 5 was also significant because he refers to sexual behaviour by two other residents, KIN 12 and KIN 11 with whom he shared a room.

41 In addition, KIN 5 alleged that when on one occasion Mains blamed him for stealing some money, Mains punched him several times, knocking him to the ground. KIN 5 alleged that this was seen by a cleaner who reported the episode, resulting in a visit by a named social worker. The social worker could not be traced; both cleaners were interviewed and denied ever witnessing anyone being physically assaulted.

42 We will refer again to the experiences of other residents of Kincora during the second period, residents who told the police they were not abused in any way, nor were they aware of any homosexual activity in Kincora during their time there.

PART THREE

Period three: 28 February 1966 to 10 June 1969

43 This period of three years and three and a half months covers the time between Semple's resignation as assistant warden in 1966, and his reappointment to that post in 1969. Throughout that period Mains was again the only member of the care staff in the hostel, apart from a five and a half month period in 1967 when KIN 66 was working as the assistant warden. KIN 66 took up his post on 26 June 1967 and worked in Kincora until 11 December 1967 when he went on sick leave. His employment was terminated on 19 January 1968, and we later examine the difficulties that faced Belfast Welfare Authority in obtaining a replacement for KIN 66. This meant that for the greater part of three years Mains was again on his own in Kincora, apart from the domestic staff. This had been increased to two with the appointment of a cleaner as well as the existing cook, and the two ladies continued to work in Kincora until it closed.

44 During this third period a total of 85 boys were admitted to Kincora, of whom seven alleged that at one stage or another they were abused by Mains. They included R 3, R 4 and KIN 5, and as we have already considered the accounts given by R 4 and KIN 5 it is unnecessary to refer to them again when considering this period. Although KIN 38 was in Kincora during this period, he said that he was abused in the next period we consider and so we leave him out of account during this period. In this portion of this chapter we concentrate on the accounts given by the four remaining individuals who say that they were abused during this period, starting with R 3. It is not entirely clear whether he was finally discharged from Kincora in August 1963, or, as the Hughes Inquiry believed, in May 1964. By Christmas 1965 he was certainly no longer a resident in Kincora and he was living in London. As we have earlier recorded, R 3 returned at Christmas for a number of years after he had been formally discharged from Kincora, and on those visits he stayed with Mains in Kincora. The Kincora registers show that one of those occasions was between 22 December 1965 and 22 January 1966, when R 3 had just turned twenty.

45 It is incorrect to regard R 3 as a resident of Kincora during this short stay because he was no longer the responsibility of Belfast Welfare Authority, and he does not allege that he was abused in any way by Mains during this period. His stay is relevant because it is an example of the practice of Mains allowing adult males to visit Kincora, and on some occasions to stay overnight. That was the case for R 3 who stayed in Kincora although he was no longer a resident. Nevertheless his stay was open and above board, being recorded in the register as "on holidays" and it does not seem to have been considered inappropriate.

The Experiences of R 5

46 R 5 was admitted to Kincora at the end of March 1965 when he was just over sixteen, and he remained there for eight months until he was discharged at the end of November 1965. He is of particular importance because he and R 6 were the first persons known to have complained to Belfast Welfare Authority about Mains, and we shall examine the response of the Welfare Authority to their complaints at a later stage. R 5 did not give evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, nor did he apply to our Inquiry, but as well as the letter he and R 6 sent we have the statement which R 5 made to the RUC during the Caskey Phase One investigation.

47 On 8 September 1967 R 5 wrote a two-page document he called a "statement" in which he made a number of allegations. The first was that on 16 July 1967, while the Kincora boys were at a camp, Mains was visited by two named men. One of these appears to have been R 2 who was by then a former resident of Kincora and who, as we have already seen, was in a continuing, if occasional, homosexual relationship with Mains after he left Kincora. The other was KIN 265. R 5 alleged that Mains sent the boys to their tents while he and his two visitors drank a considerable quantity of whiskey to judge by the number of bottles R 5 said he saw the next day.

48 In the statement R 5 also alleged that on 5 September 1967, that is three days before, KIN 66 the assistant warden accosted him while he was washing, saying "do I not get a kiss then". He then proceeded to feel all over R 5's body before putting his hand down R 5's underpants. R 5 said that the next day he told KIN 66 he was going to tell Mains all about him.[27] In a further entry he alleged that Mains made him wash dishes and sent him to bed early because R 5 had been associating with someone of whom Mains disapproved. He also alleged that on a different occasion Mains grabbed him and told him not to answer back. When R 5 was interviewed by the RUC in 1980 he gave a fuller account of the camp episode, repeating that whiskey had been drunk by Mains and the same visitors, but making no allegation about KIN 66.

49 Regarding Mains, R 5 said that when he had been at Kincora for six months or so he "realised there was something wrong as far as Mains was concerned". If R 5 is correct about the time he was describing, this would suggest that he came to this view around September 1967. He described Mains coming into the washroom, putting his arms round the chests of the boys who were washing and holding them tightly against them. He also described Mains touching boys, including himself, on the behind as they walked past. Finally, he described one incident in the washroom when he was on his own washing himself whilst stripped to the waist. He said Mains came in, said "do I get a kiss then", put his arms around R 5 and then rubbed his hand up and down R 5's naked torso from the armpit to the waist. Mains then slid his hand down inside R 5's trousers. R 5 said he pulled Mains's hand away, told him to "F'-off", whereupon Mains walked out of the washroom. R 5 described this as happening before the camp episode.

27 KIN 11004.

50 In his police statement he described how he and R 6 went to Mr Ross of social services where he made the September 1967 statement. He said that when he and R 6 returned to Kincora and told Mains what they had done Mains became very angry. When R 5 said to Mains that Mains would not be hitting him again because he had reported him to the Welfare who would be coming to see him, and had told them everything, he said Mains became very frightened, giving them cigarettes, and, R 5 was nearly sure, money. He said that he remembered two people coming from the Welfare to see Mains, but he did not know what happened. About a month afterwards, he left Kincora.[28]

51 When questioned by the police Mains denied that anything sexual had occurred. He did admit pulling R 5's pants back in the bathroom to check whether R 5 had changed his underwear because he said R 5 did not change his clothes. Mains attributed the allegations to a personal grudge both boys had against him, although he admitted that he had used a cane to give R 5 "a hiding" because R 5 had approached the Welfare.[29] The DPP directed that Mains face one charge of indecent assault on R 5, but did not proceed with the charge when Mains maintained his plea of not guilty at the trial.

The Experiences of R 6

52 R 6 was admitted to Kincora in mid-August 1967 aged seventeen, and remained there for almost a year until he was discharged at the beginning of August 1968 when he turned eighteen. He therefore overlapped with R 5 in Kincora for four months, and so was not long into his stay when he and R 5 complained to the Belfast Welfare Authority. The RUC were not able to trace him in 1980, and so he did not give evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, and he did not apply to our Inquiry.

28 KIN 10168 and 10169.
29 KIN 10421.

53 His allegations against Mains are to be found in a brief, hand-written statement. The hand writing and spelling are not good and suggest that R 6 may have had literacy problems. He made a number of allegations.

(1) On Friday 1 September 1967 Mains came into his room and felt around his body. He said Mains smelt of drink on this occasion.

(2) On Saturday 2 September Mains came to call him for work in his underpants and said "give me a kiss".

(3) On Wednesday 7 September while he was having a bath, Mains entered and said to him, "you look lovely in the water".

(4) On what would appear to be Thursday (although the day is mis-spelt and the date is given as Wednesday 7) he said Mains again said to him, "give me a kiss".

(5) Mains went out every Friday and Saturday night and got drunk.

(6) Apparently referring to KIN 66, because the name is mis-spelt, R 6 said KIN 66 told him Mains was very good at getting drunk;

(7) Told KIN 66 to watch what he said because Mains was a, "very bad man".[30]

54 When questioned by the police during the Caskey Phase One investigation in 1980 Mains denied these allegations, repeating that they were concocted by R 5 and R 6 because of a grudge, and there was nothing sexual in his actions.

The Experiences of R 8

55 R 8 was admitted to Kincora aged fifteen and two months at the end of April 1968, and remained there for three years and four months, leaving aged eighteen and five months at the beginning of August 1971. He therefore overlaps with the fourth period, but it would seem from his allegations made in 1971 that they happened before Semple resumed working in Kincora in September 1969. As we shall see, the allegations which R 8 made led to the second investigation by Belfast Welfare Authority into allegations about Mains and Kincora. R 8 did not give evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, nor did he apply to our Inquiry.

30 KIN 11039.

56 His account is contained in a five-page hand-written letter he wrote on 12 August 1971, which he sent with an almost identical copy to the Belfast Welfare Authority in August 1971. We shall consider later how the Welfare Authority reacted to these letters, but for present purposes it is sufficient to consider the form and content of the letter. In the letter, which is well written and detailed, R 8 made three specific allegations about the way Mains was running Kincora, as well as a further allegation about Mains's behaviour towards himself, and we consider that first.

57 R 8 described an occasion when Mains complained about having a sore back when he asked R 8 to rub his back, saying that if he did a good job Mains would pay him five shillings (25p). Given that R 8 was fifteen at the time and short of money he agreed. He then spent some time massaging Mains naked back, as Mains lay on the bed wearing only his underpants. Afterwards Mains invited him to share his bed for the night. R 8 got into bed with Mains, who was still presumably only wearing his underpants, but R 8 said that he kept his jeans on. He described how within a few minutes Mains put his arms around him and he heard Mains muttering, "on to it, on to it", whereupon R 8 ran to his own bedroom as fast as he could.

58 One of R 8's other allegations against Mains related to Mains attitude towards the sexual behaviour of other boys. He alleged that he and another boy KIN 67 had experienced an obvious sexual advance by R 34, another Kincora resident. When they told Mains his response was to say that R 34 would grow out of it. It was after R 8 reported this advance by R 34 to Mains that the massage episode described in the preceding paragraph occurred.

59 R 8 also alleged that another boy R 33 told him that he had a similar experience with Mains, although it is unclear whether this meant massaging Mains's back, or getting into bed with him, or both.

60 Finally, R 8 drew attention to R 2, who was by this time an ex-resident, returning to Kincora and spending the night with Mains's in his flat. He said that when he had gone into Mains flat one morning he found R 2 lying on the bed.[31]

61 R 8 was interviewed by the RUC in 1980 during the Caskey Phase One investigation. He said the incident when he got into Mains's bed occurred when he had been in Kincora for about a year, which if correct would place it around March 1969. He also said that he had in fact spent the whole night in Mains's bed, and not just a few minutes as he had said in his 1971 statement. He explained that he could only assume that he had not admitted to spending the whole night in Mains bedroom then because he was too embarrassed to admit it.[32]

31 KIN 11019.

62 During the Caskey Phase Two investigation in 1982, following the publication of the final of the three articles in the Irish Times on 12, 13, 14 January 1982 by Ed Moloney and Andy Pollak, Ed Moloney gave D/Supt Caskey a transcript of an interview Moloney had carried out with R 8, in which R 8 appeared to confirm that the only occasion Mains made sexual advances to him was during the back massaging episode.[33]

63 When interviewed about R 8 by the RUC, Mains admitted that he had asked the boy to rub cream into his back. He explained that R 8 had come to him to complain about the advances made to him by R 34, that he had said to R 8 if he was frightened he could sleep in a chair, that R 8 did so but then got in to bed beside him. Mains had his trousers on and said nothing happened.

64 Although no charge was brought against Mains relating to R 8's allegations, it is clear from Mains's admissions that at the very least in 1967 he was sleeping with R 2 on a regular basis when R 2 visited and stayed overnight in Kincora. Contrary to what R 2 asserted, it seems that at least one boy, if not more, was aware of that liaison. Secondly, Mains was aware of sexual activity by some of the residents towards other residents, or consensual sexual activity between the residents.

The Experiences of KIN 13

65 KIN 13 came to Kincora in late March 1969 aged 16, and remained for four and a half months, until he was discharged in August 1969, just two months after Semple returned to Kincora as the assistant warden. Although KIN 13 did not allege that he had been the subject of any sexual approach by Semple, and had no complaints about Semple, he said there was general talk among the boys "That Raymond Semple and Joe Mains were homosexuals but I can't remember any particular incident referred to by any of them".[34]

32 KIN 10172.
33 KIN 21187.
34 KIN 10178.

66 KIN 13 did allege that on one occasion whilst a passenger in a car with Mains driving he was invited to steer the car. As he did so Mains first rubbed KIN 13's penis, before opening the front of KIN 13's trousers and masturbating him for a minute or two before stopping.[35] When Mains was questioned about this he said he may have taken KIN 13 out in his car, but not on his own, and this incident did not occur. The police pointed out to him that a similar allegation had been made against him by R 1 who had been in Kincora during the second period we have considered, but Mains replied, "no comment".

67 Before leaving the third period it is noteworthy that of the four boys who alleged they were sexually abused by Mains during this period, it was R 5 and R 6 who had the courage to contact the authorities, but, as we shall see later, their courage was for nothing as they were not believed.

PART FOUR

Period Four: 10 June 1969 to 22 June 1971

68 This short period of just over two years represents the period when Semple rejoined the care staff at Kincora as assistant warden, thereby returning the care staff to the complement of two on a long-term basis, and before McGrath was added to the care staff in the summer of 1971. During this two-year period, 38 boys were resident in Kincora, although some were admitted on more than one occasion. Of these 38, none claim to have been abused by Semple during this period, or for that matter during the rest of his time in Kincora. Of the 38 boys, we have already considered KIN 13 and R 8. Although they continued as residents in Kincora into this period, we have already considered the abuse that they described as occurring in the previous period. That leaves only two further residents who say that they were abused by Mains during this period, KIN 38 and KIN 27.

The Experiences of KIN 38

69 As we shall see when considering the last period, KIN 38 was in Kincora on two occasions. His first admission was in late April 1969 when he was fifteen and three months of age. He stayed for ten months until he was discharged aged sixteen and one month to join the Army. As he said nothing happened to him during that period we now consider his experiences during his second period in Kincora. This lasted from early October 1971 when he was readmitted aged seventeen and nine months until he left three months later in mid-January 1972 just after his eighteenth birthday.

35 KIN 10179.

70 KIN 38 said that during his second time in Kincora he did various jobs for Mains and other members of Mains's family. He described how he was washing out a bathroom for Mains when Mains came in, told him to take down his trousers and then masturbated him. On another occasion a couple of weeks later Mains invited him to come with him to the Stormont Hotel. It seems both had a good deal to drink and certainly KIN 38 accepted he was drunk. When they returned to Kincora some hours later Mains invited KIN 38 to join him in bed; KIN 38 agreed and they engaged in mutual masturbation before they fell asleep.

71 KIN 38 said to the police in 1980 that he only agreed to this because Mains was in charge of the hostel and he was afraid of him.[36] Whether that was the case or not, Mains admitted they had gone drinking together, and although he could not remember KIN 38 staying in his bed, he agreed he probably did masturbate KIN 38. As this was a rather qualified admission by Mains, for the purposes of the criminal law and the necessary higher standard of proof, his admissions must be regarded as somewhat equivocal. KIN 38 was serving a sentence for robbery in England at the time of the Caskey Phase One investigation, and had apparently confessed to a murder in Northern Ireland in 1972. This was investigated by the RUC who considered that irregularities in his account and insufficient corroboration meant that there should not be a prosecution,[37] therefore it is not surprising that no prosecution was directed.

The Experiences of KIN 27

72 KIN 27 entered Kincora at the beginning of April 1971 aged fifteen and seven months of age and remained there for three months until early July 1971. Although his period in Kincora just overlaps with that of McGrath he does not make any allegations against McGrath. He said that when he entered Kincora the talk in the hostel was that Mains was homosexual. He said that on several occasions while he was walking between the bathroom and his bedroom Mains patted him on the backside, and on one or two occasions slipped his hand inside the waistband of KIN 27's underpants. He also alleged that while making Mains's bed, Mains was obviously fondling himself.

36 KIN 10181.
37 KIN 40091.

73 He said that he had been caned on one occasion by Mains, and that he reported this and the sexual advances made by Mains to his female social worker but nothing was done. He reported these matters to her successor with the same result. The police were only able to trace the second social worker who said she did not remember any such complaints. Mains denied the sexual allegations, and he also denied the caning.

74 The DPP did not direct a prosecution, and given that the incidents had happened years before and were not corroborated by other witnesses, the decision was a reasonable one at the time.

75 It would seem from the accounts of KIN 38 and KIN 27 that, for whatever reason, Mains's sexual advances to the boys in Kincora during this period were less frequent and not as determined as in earlier years. Indeed, as we shall see, there is no evidence to suggest that he abused any more boys during the fifth and final period to which we now turn, that is the eight years and eight months from the arrival of McGrath in June 1971 until the suspension of Mains, Semple and McGrath on 4 March 1980.

PART FIVE

Period five: 22 June 1971 to 1980

76 During this period, 108 residents were admitted to Kincora. We have already considered the experiences of three of them, namely KIN 38, R 8 and KIN 27 whose accounts suggested that although their periods in Kincora extended into, and so overlapped with, period five, they were not abused by Mains during period five but only during period four. Apart from them, another 49 former residents were traced by the police during the Caskey Phase One/Two investigations or by the Sussex Police; 30 of the 49 made no allegations that they had been subjected to any form of sexual approach or abuse, whereas 19 alleged that they had been subjected to homosexual activity, or in one case to activity with clear homosexual overtones.

77 As we shall see, in later years nine former residents came forward, all were traced by the police, four of whom had been among the 49 former residents who had been traced earlier. Seven of the nine alleged that they had been abused, and two repeated that they had not been. As we shall see, some of those who had been interviewed as part of the Caskey Phase One and Phase Two investigations then gave further accounts of their experiences to those they had given during Caskey Phase One or Phase Two. We shall examine their accounts separately from the nineteen who alleged some form of homosexual contact or approach when they made their statements to the police in the early 1980s.

Allegations made against McGrath in Caskey Phases One and Two, and to Sussex Police

78 All those who were interviewed in the 1980s and said that they were abused during this fifth period told the police that they were only abused by McGrath, and it is to their accounts that we now turn. Given the numbers of those who made allegations, as well as the similarity of many of their accounts, we do not consider it necessary to refer to each and every account, or to every detail of those accounts. What we endeavour to convey in the following paragraphs is the full extent of McGrath's behaviour, and the salient aspects of the abuse he perpetrated.

McGrath's behaviour when waking boys in the Hostel

79 At the time of his appointment as a housefather at Kincora in June 1971, McGrath was living with his family at 4 Greenwood Avenue, just off the Upper Newtownards Road. This is a short distance further out of the city than Kincora. Not long afterwards McGrath and his family moved to 188 Upper Newtownards Road, a house very close to Kincora at 236. Although he was required to work at least 40 hours a week, McGrath was only required to live in during the absence of other staff on annual, sick, or other leave.[38] Although he was a non-resident member of staff, part of McGrath's duties required him to wake boys in the morning to get them ready to go out to work. As he lived so close to Kincora this was obviously not difficult for him.

38 KIN1215.

80 A number of the former residents traced by the police during the Caskey Phase One and Two investigations described how they would find McGrath's hand touching their private parts under the blankets as he woke them. A typical experience was that of Clinton Massey who waived his anonymity when he gave evidence to our inquiry on Day 209,[39] although he is referred to in the transcription as HIA 145 / R 11, being the inquiry designations and the designation given to him by the Hughes Inquiry. He did not speak to the Hughes Inquiry. He went to Kincora at the end of April 1973 aged fifteen and eight months, and remained there almost six months, leaving in late October aged sixteen and two months. He did not spend the entire six months in Kincora, because in June 1973 he went on a two-week camping trip with old friends from Marmion House in Holywood where he had been before he went to Kincora.

81 Mr Massey told the police in March 1980 that he was awoken by McGrath on two occasions in the morning to find McGrath with his hand under the bedclothes masturbating him. After that, McGrath would just tap him on the shoulder to wake him. In his inquiry statement, and in his oral evidence to us, Mr Massey said that he was "raped" in the morning almost every other day by McGrath who then made Mr Massey perform oral sex on him before ejaculating over his face. From this evidence to us it is clear that by "raped" Mr Massey meant being masturbated and being made to perform oral sex by McGrath. Although this account contradicts his 1980 police statement, which says that he was only masturbated twice by McGrath, there is no doubt that Mr Massey was sexually abused by McGrath, because McGrath pleaded guilty to a single charge of indecent assault on Mr Massey for which he was sentenced to two years imprisonment.

82 Another resident who woke to find McGrath's hand under the bedclothes was HIA 533, who was admitted to Kincora in late June 1976 when he was three months short of his sixteenth birthday. He remained there for fifteen months until he left in late September 1977 on his seventeenth birthday. He explained to the police in 1980 that after he had been in Kincora for a couple of months he woke to find a hand under the back of his underpants. He turned to find McGrath sitting on the bed with his hand under the bed clothes. HIA 533 was startled and pulled his body away. When McGrath left the room HIA 533 immediately got up and went to Mains's office to tell him what had happened. In the event Mains was not there, so it was a couple of hours before he was able to tell Mains what happened and that he felt like hitting McGrath.[40]

39 p.132.

83 In 1980 Mains accepted to the police that HIA 533 had made such a complaint. HIA 533 said that Mains told him he would speak to McGrath and to ensure that McGrath did not do this again would arrange for the boys to be woken in future by the housekeeper. It appears that Mains did make that change, because the housekeeper told the police that Mains asked her to wake HIA 533, although he did not give her a reason. She pointed out that before McGrath was appointed she had woken the boys, and she said that about two years later she started to do so again at Mains's direction, although the reason Mains gave her was that another boy had complained to his mother that McGrath had told him to zip up his trousers.[41] Whether her recollection as to dates is entirely accurate or not, it is clear that Mains arranged for someone else to wake HIA 533 after HIA 533 complained to him.

84 Mains's account of the steps he took after HIA 533's complaint is significant because he claimed that he then became suspicious, and tried to watch McGrath and catch McGrath himself. Whether this is true or not, Mains did not report the allegation by HIA 533 against McGrath to his superiors as he ought to have done, nor does it seem he confronted McGrath, nor did he tell him not to do this again. We regard these failures on his part as amounting to systemic failings by Mains. Given his own behaviour with residents in the past, and his continuing homosexual relationship with R 2, Mains was not in a position to report McGrath lest his own crimes came to light in any subsequent investigation.

85 Another resident who told the police he experienced McGrath making a sexual approach to him under the bed clothes in this way was R 10. He came to Kincora in late March 1973 when he was fifteen and seven months of age, and stayed there for four years, leaving in mid-April 1977 aged nineteen and eight months. He told the police he got on well with Semple, as did other boys, and he said that Mains never made any advances to him. He said that about three or four weeks after he came to Kincora, which if correct would place the episode in April 1973, he felt a hand rubbing his inner thigh and moving towards his groin. He jumped up, saw that it was McGrath and told McGrath never to do that again. He said that when McGrath asked him that night why he panicked he replied that he would kill McGrath if he ever did that again.

40 KIN10223.
41 KIN 40612.

Suspicions of other residents

86 R 10's experience confirmed what he had been told by other boys on arrival, namely that McGrath was homosexual and to beware of him. During this period several other residents said that they were given similar warnings. R 10 also said that during his years in Kincora there was talk among the boys that McGrath asked boys whether he could touch or caress them. Although R 10 was not approached again by McGrath, he said that he did not report this episode to Mains because he was scared of Mains, but he did warn others about McGrath.[42] Although he got on well with Semple and had a certain amount of respect for him, R 10 made no mention of telling Semple about this incident.

The Experiences of HIA 532

87 Other forms of behaviour on the part of McGrath with unmistakable sexual overtones, which would now be recognised as behaviour likely to lead to sexual abuse and would now be described as grooming, took the form of requests by him for boys to massage him, and approaches to boys while they were in the bathroom or using the toilet. One of the residents he approached in this way was HIA 532 who gave evidence to us on Day 208. He also gave evidence to the Hughes inquiry as B 1. HIA 532 had been in Bawnmore before he came to Kincora and we consider his experiences in Bawnmore in the Bawnmore chapter. He arrived in Kincora from Bawnmore in early April 1972 when he had just turned sixteen, and remained there for a year and four and a half months until late August 1973, when he was discharged aged seventeen and five months. He returned to Kincora two weeks later in early September, and stayed for seven weeks until he was discharged for a second time at the end of October. His third and final period in Kincora lasted two and a half months from early December 1973 until the end of February 1974, when he left a few weeks before his eighteenth birthday.

42 KIN10236.

88 HIA 532 described how he awoke to find McGrath's hand under the blankets trying to rub his penis. Despite telling McGrath to stop, HIA 532 said that McGrath behaved to him in this way throughout each of his three stays in Kincora. As McGrath only started working in Kincora in June 1971, and as HIA 532 first entered Kincora in early April 1972, he is the first known person to have been sexually abused by McGrath. His experiences of McGrath were not limited to these attempts to masturbate him in the early mornings, because he described one occasion when McGrath entered the bathroom when HIA 532 was only wearing a towel around his waist. McGrath locked the door, locked his arms around HIA before attempting to remove the towel and masturbate him, but HIA 532 managed to push him away and open the door and escape whereupon McGrath gave up.

Other forms of abuse by McGrath

89 McGrath did not confine his sexual behaviour to touching, or attempting to touch the penises of boys under the blankets. Several of those traced by the police alleged that he masturbated them, made them perform oral sex, and forced them to submit to anal rape. Eventually McGrath was charged with eighteen offences committed against eight individuals, and pleaded guilty to fifteen offences, two of buggery, five of gross indecency (that is masturbation or oral sex), and eight of indecent assault (or sexual touching). These fifteen offences covered his eight victims. Although McGrath only pleaded guilty to a single charge of buggery against two individuals, that should not be taken as meaning the prosecution accepted that this offence was committed only once against each of the two residents. All of the charges, and not just the buggery charges, appear to have been "specimen" or "sample" charges. Such charges are examples, so that it is unnecessary to have a separate charge relating to every one of what may be possibly a very large number of occasions when the same offence was committed during a particular period. This was, and continues to be, a common and proper approach by prosecution authorities.

The Experiences of HIA 409/R 14

90 HIA 409 gave evidence to the inquiry on Day 210. Although he also waived his anonymity he is referred to in the transcript by his R 14 designation. He also gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry as R 14, and so we shall refer to him as R 14 for the sake of consistency. R 14 came to Kincora aged sixteen and five months at the beginning of December 1974. He remained there until he left in June 1975 shortly before his seventeenth birthday. That includes a six-week period when he was not living in Kincora because he was remanded to Rathgael Training School under a place of safety order by the Juvenile Court. He was sent there for assessment after he had called at Palmerston Assessment Centre a few minutes walk from Kincora to see his brother. He struck his brother when his brother refused to join him on a visit to an uncle on the other side of the city.[43] Rathgael recommended that it was not a suitable place for him and R 14 was then returned by the court to Kincora, where he remained for a further four months until he was discharged in June 1975.

91 In his police statement he described, as he confirmed to our Inquiry, that initially McGrath came across as a caring, gentle and sympathetic man who often patted him on the head and asked him how he was doing. It was after R 14 was returned from Rathgael to Kincora that he was abused. He said the first sexual assault occurred around the beginning of March. He was having a bath with the door locked when McGrath tried the door and said he wanted something, so R 14 told him to wait. When he emerged from the bathroom wearing only a towel and went to the bedroom to fetch his clothes, McGrath followed him from the bedroom back into the bathroom and closed the door. He then exposed his penis and told R 14 that he was going to put this into him. When R 14 protested and said that he would tell Mains, McGrath replied that Mains would not listen to him, and he, McGrath, would hit R 14 if he did not cooperate. McGrath then made R 14 turn round grasp the toilet before he removed the towel and anally penetrated him for what R 14 thought was five or ten minutes. Before McGrath left, he told R 14 to keep quiet about it.

92 On four other occasions R 14 says McGrath forced him to submit to anal sex. One of these occasions was also in the toilet. On the other three times McGrath came to R 14 when he was in his bedroom. He says that the last occasion was the afternoon before he was due to leave Kincora for foster care and was packing. McGrath entered the bedroom and said he had heard R 14 was leaving. When R 14 replied that he was leaving McGrath said "One more time before you go". When R 14 refused,

43 KIN 76678.

McGrath threatened to tell his foster parents what R 14 was like and that he would tell them about the other times as well, presumably meaning that he would tell them that R 14 was homosexual. R 14 was scared, and obeyed McGrath when he was told to take down his trousers and lie face down on the bed. McGrath then anally raped him. There are other parts of R 14's experiences to which we shall refer later.

The Experiences of R 12

93 R 12 entered Kincora at the beginning of May 1973 aged seventeen and seven months, and stayed there for nine months until he left in January 1974 aged eighteen and three months. It would seem from the information available to the Inquiry that R 12 may have had learning difficulties, as he spent several years at a special school in Hillsborough before he went to Bawnmore where he spent a little over a year before going to Kincora.[44] He also appears to have spent a period in Muckamore Abbey Hospital (a hospital which treated children with special needs) after he left Kincora.[45] This would suggest that he was a particularly vulnerable individual.

94 R 12 was the subject of the other offence of buggery to which McGrath pleaded guilty, and as in the case of R 14, the buggery charge was a specimen charge. R 12 described to the police how the first such offence occurred when all the other residents were out. McGrath asked him to go to the toilet and when R 12 did so McGrath locked the door and told R 12 to take down his trousers and hold onto the toilet and he then anally raped him. He only stopped what he was doing because the doorbell rang. R 12 described another episode when McGrath invited him to the toilet and asked R 12 to masturbate him, which he did. The third incident involved McGrath following R 12 into the toilet, masturbating him and then getting R 12 to anally penetrate him before performing oral sex on him. The fourth and last episode occurred in the kitchen. At McGrath's direction they performed oral sex on each other before McGrath got R 12 to penetrate him.

95 The events we have described demonstrate several aspects of McGrath's behaviour. First of all, these events all occurred when R 12 was alone in the hostel at night. Secondly, McGrath appears to have picked on someone who was particularly vulnerable because of his special needs. Thirdly, although R 12 said he did not like what he was doing, he did it because he was frightened of McGrath.

44 KIN 10242.
45 KIN 10241.

Complaints to Mains or Semple

96 We have described how Mains accepted that HIA 533 told him McGrath had put his hand under the bedclothes and touched his behind. It seems clear from a number of statements to the police during the Caskey Phase One and Phase Two investigations that other residents also complained to Semple. When Semple was questioned at the beginning of his first interview he volunteered that four residents whom he named had told him that McGrath had interfered with them by rubbing his hands down their pants.[46] In a later interview he claimed that "there were a lot of complaints about [McGrath] from the boys". When asked what was done about the complaints Semple replied that Mains spoke to McGrath, and "we tried to watch McGrath to stop this".[47] As we have seen, Mains admitted that after HIA 533 complained to him about McGrath he tried to watch McGrath himself to catch him, as well as arranging for the housekeeper instead of McGrath to wake HIA 533 in the mornings.

97 Semple's admission that he had received a number of complaints came as soon as the police started to question him in his first interview and we see no reason to disbelieve his account that some boys did complain to him, although none of the four he named as complaining to him told the police that they had done so. Mains also accepted that on at least one occasion a resident other than HIA 533 complained to him about McGrath. He said that R 15 complained to him that McGrath had grabbed him by the privates but said that Mains told him to forget it and that he (Mains) would see about it.[48] Mains admitted to the police that he had spoken to McGrath about this, and that McGrath told him that he told R 15 to pull up his zip and to tidy himself before going to school, and that he [McGrath] had touched R 15 on the front of the trousers. Mains also said that he reported this to Semple, to the two ladies on the domestic staff, and to R 15's social worker, although he could not remember her name.[49] McGrath did accept that Mains spoke to him about the complaint from R 15.[50]

46 KIN 10388.
47 KIN 10367.
48 KIN10256.
49 KIN10413.
50 KIN10512.

98 While it is not entirely clear who did complain, and there is no corroboration of Mains's assertion that he told Semple or other members of staff, we are satisfied that both Mains and Semple received specific complaints about McGrath's conduct from a number of boys, including HIA 533 and R 10. The nature of those complaints was such that we are satisfied that both Mains and Semple had good reason to believe that McGrath was sexually interfering with boys in the hostel, but failed to take sufficient steps to prevent this, other than replacing McGrath with one of the female staff on the waking-up duties. We are satisfied that neither reported these complaints or their suspicions to their superiors as they ought to have done, and their failure to do so was because they were inhibited by their own homosexual abuse of residents. These failures to report McGrath were systemic failings by Mains and Semple.

Consensual sexual activity in Kincora involving, and between, residents

99 Not all the homosexual activity in Kincora during period five involved residents who were pressurised or intimidated into engaging in sexual activity with McGrath. Some of the activity which took place involving him was plainly consensual, and there was also consensual sexual activity between the residents themselves. R 17 came to Kincora in early October 1974 when he was sixteen and seven months. He remained for a year and five months until he moved out in early March 1976. Two and a half months later he was readmitted at the end of May, and stayed for three months until the end of August 1976. He described to the police how McGrath approached him one night when they were alone in the hostel, and their sexual activity ended with McGrath getting R 17 to anally penetrate him. There were several other episodes when he described various forms of sexual activity taking place between himself and McGrath, including each penetrating the other. R 17 appears to have been a willing participant in these events, which he described as continuing for three nights a week for about two years.

100 R 17's sexual activity in Kincora was not confined to McGrath. He described one occasion when he was sitting in the television room with McGrath and another resident (R 9). McGrath was sitting between them and started to masturbate R 17 and R 9 at the same time, before leaving the room with R 9. R 9 made no such reference to such an episode in his police statement, and if it did occur this was the only occasion that has come to light in Kincora in the course of the police investigations of the 1980s of more than two individuals being involved in any sexual activity in the presence of others.

101 Whether or not this incident did occur, it is clear that just as McGrath and R 17 carried on an intense sexual relationship in Kincora itself, and did so on a regular basis and throughout R 17's time there, there was also a continuing sexual relationship in the hostel between R 17 and R 9. R 17 said after the occasion when McGrath masturbated them both that he and R 9 engaged in anal sex about five nights a week, except for the weekends when R 17 went out.

102 R 9's account was somewhat different. He said that about two weeks after he entered Kincora in late October 1974 McGrath asked him to masturbate him, and then had anal sex with him. This happened on a great many occasions in R 9's bedroom and was clearly consensual. However, R 9 said that he and R 17 only had anal sex on three or four occasions. Whatever may be the truth about these particular accounts it is clear that others in the hostel knew of the sexual relationship between R 17 and R 9. Semple admitted that he was told by another resident, KIN 300, that he had seen R 17 and R 9 in bed together. KIN 300 was in Kincora from the end of July 1975 until mid-June 1976, so this incident must have occurred during that period. Semple told police that he had reported the sexual activity to Mains who said he would talk to the boys about it and therefore he (Semple) felt he had no more responsibility to the boys. Semple was pressed by the police about whether he had considered reporting the matter to the authorities and his response was revealing. He explained that he was embarrassed because he had been told off by Mains for having sex with R 1 in 1965 and therefore felt "how could I do a lot about it when boys told me about these sexual acts now".[51]

103 Another resident of Kincora who engaged in consensual sex with McGrath was R 18 whose background ranks as one of the most distressing histories of the hundreds considered by our Inquiry. He told the police his first sexual experience occurred aged eleven when he and a stranger engaged in oral sex in the toilets of a Dublin cinema.[52] Some years later when he was being allowed home from Lissue at weekends he described how he frequented the toilets in Ward Park in Bangor and engaged in masturbation with men he met there. After Lissue he was moved to Ardmore School in Downpatrick. He said his next sexual experiences were when he came to Kincora. From mid-May 1977 until July 1977 he only stayed in Kincora at weekends while he was attending Ardmore. After July 1977, by which time he was fifteen, until March 1980, when he was seventeen and ten months, he was a full-time resident in Kincora. It would seem from his police statement that during the first weekends he asked McGrath to rub cream into his back because he was suffering from psoriasis. A few weeks later McGrath came into his bedroom after R 18 had a bath, massaged him, and then at McGrath's invitation R 18 masturbated him. A pattern then developed whereby he and McGrath engaged in mutual masturbation at weekends when the hostel was empty. This continued until McGrath was suspended in 1980.

51 KIN 10392.
52 KIN 10288.

104 While R 18 was clearly an active homosexual by the time he arrived in Kincora, he describes McGrath talking to him about religion and homosexuality, saying that some people naturally felt like that.[53] It would seem that whilst R 18 was a consensual partner in the sexual activity between himself and McGrath, there may have been a form of emotional bond between them. Whether that was the case or not, R 18 was sexually active during this period in Kincora because he told police that he had anal sex with two men during that time, although both episodes occurred outside the building. One involved a hairdresser who told the police they had only engaged in masturbation in his car outside the hostel when he left R 18 home. R 18 said he met the other man at a party and didn't know who he was. There is no evidence to suggest that any other person was involved in any way with bringing these people together.

105 During the police investigations Mains and Semple admitted various homosexual offences, some of which were committed with individuals who were no longer resident in Kincora when those offences occurred. McGrath denied all the allegations put to him. The DPP directed that a total of 33 charges be brought against them, and Mains, Semple and McGrath were sent for trial on 1 September 1981. Each of them pleaded not guilty to the individual charges against them on 27 November 1981, and their trial started on 10 December 1981 before Lord Lowry, the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland. Mains and Semple then changed their pleas to guilty on various charges. Semple admitted each of the four charges against him.[54] Mains admitted six of the eleven charges against him, and the prosecution accepted those pleas and entered a nolle prosequi on the five remaining charges, thereby effectively withdrawing them.[55] McGrath maintained his pleas of not guilty to all of the charges against him, and the first witnesses were called on the afternoon of 10 December.[56] The next day McGrath changed his pleas to guilty on fifteen of the eighteen charges against him, and the prosecution entered a nolle prosequi against him on the three remaining charges.

53 KIN 10286.

106 The decision of the prosecution not to proceed with a number of the charges against Mains and McGrath reflected their assessment of the difficulty of establishing those particular charges to the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, and the decision to effectively withdraw the charges by entering a nolle prosequi was a normal and perfectly proper course for them to adopt.

107 We have not been able to gain a transcript of Lord Lowry's remarks when sentencing each of these men at Belfast Crown Court on 16 December 1981. As there were no appeals, a transcript was not prepared at the time. However a detailed report of these proceedings on 16 December 1981 appeared in the Belfast Newsletter of 17 December 1981 and contained some direct quotations from Lord Lowry's remarks.

108 The Lord Chief Justice took into account that each of the accused had pleaded guilty. Pleas of guilty had been long recognised as a mitigating factor resulting in an appropriate reduction in the sentence which would otherwise have been imposed had the accused been convicted after a plea of not guilty. In imposing the heaviest sentence on Mains, Lord Lowry pointed to Semple and McGrath as not being in similar positions of authority to Mains, because Mains held a very responsible post where the welfare, including the moral welfare, of the boys was entrusted to him. In distinguishing between the offences of buggery admitted by Mains, Semple and McGrath, the Lord Chief Justice applied another well established principle of sentencing, namely that the culpability of an offender who committed offences when in a more responsible position than his co-accused should receive a greater punishment than the others. Making the sentences concurrent is the usual practice in cases where an accused commits more than one offence. The lower sentences for indecent assault and gross indecency were in accordance with the maximum sentence permitted by statute for both indecent assault and gross indecency being two years imprisonment at that time.

54 KIN 101001.
55 KIN 101002.
56 KIN 101016.

109 Lord Lowry referred to the sentences he imposed on Mains, Semple and McGrath when delivering the judgement of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in the case of Spiers and Drake (1982) 4 Northern Ireland Judgement Bulletins. That case concerned an appeal by two defendants who had pleaded guilty to offences of mutual masturbation, oral sex and buggery. Spiers, by then 58, had corrupted Drake, who was then 21, when Drake was 14 or 15. Drake was educationally sub-normal, went to a special school and then attended a club for mentally handicapped adults. The Court of Appeal upheld a sentence of five years imprisonment on Spiers on three charges of buggery, but because Drake was educationally sub-normal and immature, and because he had been corrupted by a long course of conduct with Spiers, his sentences were reduced from three years to two years imprisonment, all to run concurrently.

110 In that case Lord Lowry referred to a a decision of the English Court of Appeal in Willis (1975) 60 Criminal Appeal Reports 146. In that case, which was regarded as the leading case on sentencing for these offences at that time, Lord Justice Lawton observed:

> "In our judgement a sentencing bracket for offences which had neither aggravating nor mitigating factors is from 3-5 years and the place on the bracket will depend on age, intelligence and education. Few offences, however, have neither aggravating nor mitigating factors, many have both. When this happens the judge has to weigh what aggravates against what mitigates."

111 In page five of his judgement of the case of Spiers and Drake Lord Lowry referred to the cases of Mains, Semple and McGrath in the following passage.

> "Secondly, no two cases are exactly the same and comparisons between cases must proceed with extreme caution. The Queen v. Semple and others, heard recently in Belfast Crown Court, is an example of one of the aggravating features mentioned by Lord Justice Lawton, a breach of trust by those placed in positions of responsibility towards young boys. The accused McGrath received a sentence of 4 years imprisonment, but his age, 65 and his cardiac condition were relevant factors justifying, or at least providing a basis for, a degree of leniency. The sentences of Semple and Mains thereafter had to relate to the sentence imposed on McGrath. It would have been possible to impose a heavier sentence on McGrath or to increase the differential between him and the other accused to reflect more strongly their lesser age, more robust health and greater degree of responsibility for boys under their control. These are difficult questions calling for an individual exercise of judgement..."

112 We have set out these passages to make it clear that the sentences of six years on Mains and four years on Semple and McGrath were entirely consistent with the relevant sentencing principles in both Northern Ireland and England and Wales at that time, and were at least as heavy as those that might have been passed in England and Wales. That may be seen by the following quotation from page 133 of the standard text book on sentencing at the time, the 1979 edition of Principles of Sentencing by D.A.Thomas:

> "The scale of fixed-term sentences extends from three years imprisonment to an upper limit of about 10 years, although in the majority of cases a sentence between three and five years will be appropriate. Longer sentences are likely to be upheld where the offence is aggravated by such elements as force or coercion, systematic seduction over a period of time, abuse of parental or other authority, or the extreme youth of the victim. Where factors such as these are present, either singularly or in combination, sentences up to ten years have been upheld, but more usually the sentence does not exceed seven years imprisonment."

Contemporary knowledge of abuse by Kincora residents

113 Over many years, allegations have been made in newspapers and on broadcast media that there was a homosexual vice ring centred on Kincora, and that a number of named individuals were involved. It has also been alleged that some of these individuals visited Kincora, or that residents of Kincora were made available to such people for homosexual purposes elsewhere. At this point we consider the information relating to these matters gathered in the various police investigations during the 1980s. As part of this process we have examined the accounts given by the very large number of former residents of Kincora who were traced by the RUC and interviewed as part of the Caskey Phase One and Phase Two Investigations, and who were spoken to by the Sussex Police.

114 As is apparent from the accounts given by former residents to the police to which we have already referred, in the 1960s Mains and Semple appeared to have been successful in concealing their homosexual abuse of residents in Kincora from others. For a considerable period Mains also managed to keep secret his homosexual relationship with the former Kincora resident R 2 despite R 2 staying overnight in Kincora with him. However, as we have described, Mains was not completely successful in concealing his relationship with R 2. It would appear that by the early 1970s a number of residents had their suspicions that Mains, Semple and McGrath (after he joined the staff at Kincora) were each homosexual, and as we have already seen some residents were warned by others that they should be aware that one or more of the three were homosexual, and in particular that McGrath was thought to make homosexual advances to boys in the home.

115 That does not mean that every resident throughout the 22 years of Kincora's existence was aware during their time in the hostel that there was any form of homosexual activity taking place. During the first two periods that we have considered, that is from 1958 until Semple left in 1966, seventeen former residents were traced, ten of whom were abused in one way or another, including R 2 and R 3, although R 3 was unaware of the relationship between Mains and R 2 that continued after R 2 left. Of the others from the first period, KIN 3 was there for one and a half years and told the police he was unaware of any sexual abuse. Of the thirteen former residents from the second period, although seven said they were abused, eleven said they had no knowledge of the abuse. The other two did not express their views. In other words, some of those who were abused did not realise at the time that others had been, or were being, abused. In the third period from February 1966 to June 1969, of eighteen former residents traced, five were interfered with whilst sixteen expressed surprise at the allegations of the sexual abuse of others. This pattern was repeated during the fourth and fifth periods. Of twelve former residents traced from the fourth period between June 1969 and June 1971, only one said he had been abused, eleven said that they were unaware of the abuse. In the fifth and final period of eight and a half years when McGrath was present, of 49 former residents who recounted their experiences to the RUC during Caskey Phases One and Two and to the Sussex Police, 38 said they were unaware of sexual abuse.

116 Taking the second to the fifth period together, of 92 former residents traced, 76 (or 88.33%) told the police they were surprised by the allegations of sexual abuse that were taking place during their time in Kincora, even though some of them had described how they themselves were abused, or had engaged in homosexual activity with others, whether with McGrath or other residents.

117 The overall picture of these accounts is that throughout Kincora's existence the great majority of the residents who were interviewed by the police were unaware at the time of what was going on in the hostel, and were very surprised at what had emerged afterwards. A few examples suffice. HIA 199 / R 3 who was in Kincora in the early 1960s emphasised to us that there was never any talk among the boys in his time of sexual matters involving Mains.[57] He said that Mains was very secretive and would always check to see that R 3 was out of Mains's bedroom and into his own bed by 6am in the morning before the housekeeper arrived.[58]

118 R 1 whose experiences of both Mains and Semple in the mid-1960s resulted in both men being convicted of offences relating to him, told the Sussex Police in 1982 that:

> "When I read of the goings on at Kincora in the press I was very surprised because when I was at Kincora I knew nothing of prostitution and homosexual relations with fellas outside the hostel. If that had been happening there I would [sic] known of it."[59]

119 Dr Harrison told us how one of the former residents whom she visited as a social worker in the 1970s, and who did not say that he had been abused, rang her from England when the allegations about Kincora emerged to check whether it was the same home that he had been in. She recounted how he was completely amazed that this could happen. They discussed this again when he came to Northern Ireland for a short time, and he said to her he did not have any knowledge of it. She described him as a very articulate, streetwise and astute boy who had

57 Day 209, p.120.
58 Day 209, p.117.
59 KIN 40624-40625.

told the police that he had heard rumours about McGrath inappropriately touching some boys.[60]

120 We must emphasise that it was not only the great majority of the residents, including some of those who had themselves been abused, who were unaware of what was happening to others. The two ladies who worked in Kincora as domestic staff, one of whom worked there throughout the entire time the home was open, told the police they were unaware of what was happening. It may seem strange that so many of those who were in and out of Kincora in various capacities were unaware of what was happening, but, as we have seen, there was a consistent pattern of Mains, Semple and McGrath being extremely careful to conceal in a number of ways what they were doing. First of all, they approached boys who were vulnerable, or who they thought might be easily intimidated. If their initial approaches were firmly rebuffed they generally would not approach that person again. If they did so, they went to considerable lengths to approach the boy when others were not around. As we have seen in Mains's case, he would ensure that other boys were asleep before he would bring a boy into his bedroom at night, and get the boy back to the boy's own bed before others woke or were about.

121 Singling out boys, and abusing them, when others were not about, was not difficult because the residents were normally working during the day. Clinton Massey was one of those abused. He appears in Who framed Colin Wallace as "Clinton Ferguson". He explained to our Inquiry that his job was working at the Belfast Telegraph. This was an evening newspaper at the time, and that meant that he did not leave Kincora to go to work until 9.30am or thereabouts, whereas the other boys were out before 8.00am, and those who worked in the shipyard were probably catching the bus at 7.00am.[61] His work meant that he often returned to the hostel after the evening meal, and he frequently went back to Marmion children's home in Holywood to spend time with his friends there, returning late to the hostel.[62] Others explained to the police that they would go out at night after work, and as a result, as R 18 explained to the police, the hostel was often empty at night.

60 Day 223, pp.87 to 89.
61 Day 209, p.184.
62 Day 209, p.175.

122 Because there were many occasions that there were no other residents in the building that meant there were many occasions when Mains, Semple or McGrath had the opportunity to engage in various forms of sexual activity, consensual or not, with boys when other boys were not about. During McGrath's time at Kincora he appears to have often worked in the evenings and in the mornings, when either Mains or Semple were not about, because the duties directly involving the supervision of the residents were shared by all three. However Mains had other administrative duties, and our impression is that more of the direct supervision of the residents in the 1970s was carried out by Semple or McGrath, and because of the way their duties were arranged McGrath was often on duty on his own.

Visits by outsiders to Kincora

123 Beginning with the report in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980, which alleged that boys had been recruited for homosexual prostitution and that police reports had named a number of important Northern Ireland businessmen as being involved, allegations have been made by various journalists that there were regular visits to the hostel by men with what are described as "posh accents" and that politicians, judges, and senior officials from the security services were involved in abusing children in Kincora. One of the earliest of such allegations was contained in the first of the three articles that appeared in the Irish Times in January 1982, from which we have quoted in the previous chapter. In the article published on 12 January there appeared the following paragraphs:

> "The Northern Authorities blocked an RUC investigation into a homosexual prostitution ring in 1976 which involved British officials in the Northern Ireland Office, policemen, legal figures, business men and boys in care at the Kincora Boys Home and other homes run by the Eastern Health Board, The Irish Times has learned.
>
> According to thoroughly reliable sources, it was suspected that the ring involved at least seven men, two of whom were British civil servants on secondment to the Northern Ireland Office.
>
> The ring was believed to have been in existence for at least three years. There were also strong suggestions at the time that NIO officials involved in the affair, who had been transferred back to Britain had introduced some of their successors to the ring.

> Among others suspected of involvement in the ring were police officers, East Belfast businessmen and justices of the peace. In some cases their names were supplied to the police and in others they had been traced via car registration numbers supplied to the police."[63]

124 These and similar allegations have been ventilated in many different publications and broadcasts from then until the present day, as can be seen from the following online article by a Sky News journalist on 23 July 2015. He reported that he had interviewed Mr Massey who was reported to have said that "he saw many mysterious English men with posh accents who were regular visitors to the building". The article said:

> "Allegations have persisted for years that senior figures within the security services, British military and other VIPs had free reign to sexually abuse children at the home in the 1970s and 1980s".[64]

PART SIX

The Experiences of Gary Hoy

125 Another applicant to the Inquiry who described his experiences in Kincora to the police in the 1980s, and again more recently, was Gary Hoy. In normal circumstances we would refer to Mr Hoy by his inquiry designation. However, he has appeared on television and commented to journalists on a number of occasions in connection with his judicial review application, when he has given his name and been photographed. He was not given anonymity by the High Court in those proceedings. He has publicly identified himself with Kincora, and made public comments about his time there, as well as giving an account in the judicial review proceedings. These accounts do not coincide in many respects with accounts he has given of his time in Kincora on other occasions, and we decided that in those circumstances it would be misleading to consider his accounts without referring to him by name when his public appearances and comments appear to suggest that he is content to have his identity and his experiences disclosed to the public.

63 KIN 21312
64 KIN 112261.

126 As we explained in the previous chapter, Gary Hoy brought an application for judicial review which was dismissed by Mr Justice Treacy on 8 April 2016, and his appeal was also dismissed by the Court of Appeal on 27 May 2016. After Mr Justice Treacy delivered his judgment the Inquiry legal team contacted Mr Hoy on several occasions by letter and by text, as well as writing to his solicitors, asking him to meet the Inquiry legal team in order to make a formal witness statement, because the Kincora module was due to start very soon thereafter. After he failed to keep three appointments, a fourth and final offer was sent by letter to him asking him to consult with Inquiry counsel on 2 June with a view to giving evidence to the Inquiry on 9 June 2016. This appointment was not kept either, and as Mr Hoy had failed to keep four appointments we concluded that he did not wish to give evidence to the Inquiry.

127 Despite Mr Hoy's unwillingness to assist the Inquiry we have considered the various accounts that we know he has given of his experiences whilst he was a resident of Kincora. He was admitted to Kincora in early January 1978 aged sixteen years and three months, and was discharged ten months later in November 1978 to join the Army. By that time he was aged seventeen and one month. He made a statement to the RUC in March 1980, by which time he was eighteen and living in Belfast. He explained that he had been placed in care when he was seventeen because his father had been injured in a motorbike accident and could not look after his family. In that statement he said the following:

- No homosexual approaches were made to him by staff or boys in Kincora.
- He could remember that if the boys were slow to get up William McGrath would throw the bed clothes off and look at him.
- He explained that although McGrath made no approaches to him he felt that McGrath was "gay".
- He could remember R 18 putting cream on his face and in his hair, (and this may be for the psoriasis to which we have referred already), and that he was sometimes helped with that by Mains.
- He also wanted to point out that while Mains would claim in his work diary to have taken the boys out in the minibus on pleasure trips he never took them out at all.

128 It is unclear whether Mr Hoy was formally interviewed by the Sussex Police. There is a reference in the 1983 report by Superintendent

Harrison at paragraph 493 to him being aware of gossip and rumour about McGrath but there is no formal statement to that effect. It may be that, as Mr Hoy said in 2011, he was spoken to informally by Sussex police officers. Be that as it may, he contacted the PSNI in 2011, and a note was made in the PSNI occurrence enquiry log report system after a visit to his home that "He does not recall if he ever provided [English police officers to whom he spoke] with a statement or not. He does not remember if he was physically or sexually abused but he does report emotional trauma".[65]

129 On 8 January 2013 Mr Hoy gave a lengthy account of his experiences to the PSNI. A 157-page transcript was exhibited to the High Court as part of his judicial review application. The relevant parts of this are.

- He and his younger brother were admitted to Kincora together.
- He was nine when he entered and fifteen when he left, although he also said he couldn't remember what ages he was in Kincora.
- Mains physically abused him by slapping him with his hand for things such as not keeping his room tidy.
- He remembered McGrath pulling duvets off his bed, and off the beds of other boys, to wake them up in the morning.
- Sometimes when he came out of the shower wearing only a towel Semple would come over, take off the towel, then dry him all over.
- He described an incident where Semple took him to a house in north Belfast where there was an elderly man who made him perform oral sex although he said his memory of this episode was a "wee bit blurry".
- On one occasion he went with Mains to Mains's house in the Four Winds area of south Belfast when Mains emerged from the shower and then anally raped him.
- He described a second visit to the house where Mains made Mr Hoy perform oral sex upon him.
- He described an incident where he was accosted by a man, whom he named, at a point very close to Kincora. The man had a knife and forced him into the playing fields of the school grounds adjacent to Kincora. He said the man told him to remove his clothes, but he was able to escape after maybe twenty to thirty minutes. He did not describe any sexual assault, although his account clearly implies that this may have been intended.

65 KIN 60050.

130 On 18 February 2013 Mr Hoy spoke to the Inquiry Acknowledgement Forum. Transcripts of such accounts are normally made available to the Inquiry legal team to prepare a draft witness statement for the witness to consider. We examined the transcript to ensure that we had as complete a picture as possible of what Mr Hoy has said about his time in Kincora. His account to the Acknowledgement Forum was broadly the same as that which he gave to the PSNI some weeks earlier.

131 It will be apparent from this review of the various accounts that Mr Hoy has given over the years that he has said at different times that he was not abused in Kincora; that he could not remember being physically or sexually abused; that he was sexually abused by Mains; and that Semple behaved in a manner that is certainly open to the inference that there was a sexual motive behind his actions. For whatever reason Mr Hoy did not provide the Inquiry with a formal witness statement, nor did he accept our invitation to give evidence to us. In those circumstances we are unable to resolve the significant contradictions between these various accounts, and so we have left them out of account when we reach our conclusions about what did, or did not, happen in Kincora.

The Experiences of KIN 24

132 KIN 24 was another resident interviewed in the 1980s by the RUC and the Sussex Police. He did not apply to the Inquiry, but approached the PSNI in 2015 with fresh allegations. He came to Kincora in early September 1966 when he was fifteen and three months of age, and remained there for six months until he left aged fifteen and nine months early March 1967. He was therefore in Kincora during a period when Mains was the only member of the care staff in the hostel, because Semple had resigned at the end of February 1966, and KIN 66 did not start his short period as assistant warden until June 1967. KIN 24 first spoke to the RUC in March 1980, by which time he was 38. He recalled being in Kincora for approximately two or three months during which time the person in charge was Mains, although he referred to "another tall thin bloke who was middle aged [and who] was also about the premises but I can't remember if he worked there or not". In that statement he said he was never approached by any member of staff, or boys, to do any homosexual act, and concluded his short statement "I can't recall hearing any talk about any acts of indecency going on".[66]

133 When seen by the Sussex Police at the end of June 1982, by which time he was 41, KIN 24 confirmed that he had nothing to add to his RUC statement. He also said that he had no knowledge of any prominent people of the type we have already described being connected with Kincora, with the staff and the boys, or of any boys from the hostel being involved in prostitution or a vice ring. He concluded this statement by saying "I was surprised when I heard such allegations, because to the best of my knowledge nothing like that was happening whilst I was at Kincora".[67]

134 In the summer of 2015 KIN 24 approached the PSNI with fresh allegations. On 25 August 2015 his account was recorded by the PSNI. In it he described two occasions when he brought Mains a cup of tea in the mornings as he had been asked to do. On the first occasion Mains, who was wearing nothing underneath his dressing grown, touched him on his genitals and had an erection. Mains then masturbated him and got KIN 24 to masturbate him as well. There were similar acts on a second occasion.

135 Although KIN 24's account of what happened on both occasions is in keeping with other allegations against Mains, and with Mains's admissions of his behaviour towards other boys, it is surprising that KIN 24 did not mention these events to the police in either 1980 or 1982. He told the police in 2015 that he told his father what had happened when his father came to Kincora to take him away, although he says his father did not react. KIN 24 later concluded that this may have been because his father was homosexual. Given that KIN 24 told his father when he was not yet 16 years old, we would have expected him to tell the PSNI and the Sussex Police about these events.

The Experiences of KIN 279

136 KIN 279 was the youngest of three brothers who were in Kincora for two weeks in late May and early June 1975. He and his twin brother were nine, and their older brother was there at the same time. KIN 279 was interviewed by the RUC in 1980 when he was thirteen, and again by the

66 KIN 11613.
67 KIN 40667.

Sussex police in June 1982, by which time he had just turned sixteen. On both occasions he said he was not interfered with, and was unaware of any indecent acts taking place. He told the Sussex Police that he too was unaware of any others being involved with the police, or of any prostitution ring involving boys from the hostel.

137 A police note of his initial contact with the PSNI in 2014 records that KIN 279 said that he had no memory of being abused until three and a half years before "when he fell off a roof and sustained a head injury".[68] At the start of his recorded interview he said that while working as a roofer he fell off a roof two and a half to three metres to the ground, but there wasn't anything broken. He went on to say that he developed what he described as "severe depression" and said that he saw a psychiatrist in Holland and was unable to work. He described being lifted out of bed in his pyjamas, he thinks by a man called Raymond, and then being brought to another room where he was placed on a table, penetrated by something and being subjected to oral sex. He said that he remembered McGrath being present, and seeing McGrath's exposed groin area.[69]

138 KIN 279 confirmed to Sussex Police more than 30 years before that he had not been abused in Kincora. His subsequent references to having a severe fall, a possible head injury, suffering from severe depression before recalling the events he described as happening almost 40 years before, his description of what appears to have been a violent and abusive family life before he and all his brothers and sisters were taken into care, and to undergoing psychiatric treatment, cast doubt on the reliability of his purported recall of the events he now describes.

The Experiences of KIN 135

139 KIN 135 arrived at Kincora at the beginning of January 1964 aged fifteen and one month, and left approximately seven months later in mid-August. In 2012 he contacted Greater Manchester Police and in due course gave a lengthy recorded interview in which he described his experiences in Kincora. During this interview he said that although he was aware in the past that police had been asking people to come forward who had been residents in Kincora he had been too ashamed and embarrassed to do so at the time.

68 KIN 60151.
69 KIN 60173-60207.

140 Altogether he described being raped by Mains about six times, by McGrath four or five times and once or twice by Semple. He described on one occasion Semple bringing him to Mains and then being made to perform oral sex on both. On another occasion after he had been in Kincora about six months, which would place these events around June 1964, he says Mains, Semple and McGrath took him from his bed to another bedroom. He was then slapped and punched while he felt fingers and then a penis entering his anus. On a third occasion he described being in the kitchen when McGrath took out his penis, grabbed him by the hair and forced his head down, but he was able to get away. He said that he ran away, but his father brought him back to Kincora. He said he was severely beaten by Mains, and threatened with being taken away and not being found again. He also described being regularly beaten. He said he was in Kincora for two or three years.

141 A number of aspects of these accounts cause us concern.

(1) KIN 135 was only in Kincora for seven months in 1964, not for two or three years.

(2) While Semple and Mains worked in Kincora during the time he was there, McGrath did not come to work in Kincora until June 1971. There is no evidence from any of the residents or elsewhere that McGrath was connected in any way whatever with Kincora in 1964.

(3) None of the other former residents who made allegations about Mains and Semple have alleged that each engaged in sexual abuse of residents in the presence of each other, or in the presence of McGrath, other than KIN 238.

(4) Other allegations which he made are at variance with accounts given by other residents, such as his allegation that Mains would ask boys to sit on his knee and then have an erection. If such a thing happened we would have expected others to have undergone similar experiences but no other person has made such an allegation.

The Experiences of KIN 238

142 KIN 238 was admitted to Kincora on 24 May 1977 just after his thirteenth birthday and remained there for eighteen days. It appears that the RUC attempted to contact him because he was a former resident at the time of the Caskey Phase One investigation but he was serving with the Army in Germany at that time. In 2003 he approached the RUC and made a statement in September 2003.[70] In the statement he alleges that three incidents took place where he was sexually abused, and in the first of those he says he was physically abused as well. On the first occasion he was beaten by Mains because he was alleged to have stolen a pen. Another person, whom KIN 238 referred to as the house-master and who the police believed answered the description of McGrath, was there. He said that Mains told him to take down his trousers and bend over the house-master's knee. KIN 238 was then caned, after which he felt the house-master inserting his finger into his anus. When KIN 238 stood up and left he saw Mains sitting in his chair and masturbating.

143 On the second occasion he says that Mains and the house-master drove him to a house further down the Newtownards Road. All three were admitted to the house by a police officer in full uniform. All four went into the living room. KIN 238 was told to take off all of his clothes. He says that Mains and McGrath then masturbated. He says that McGrath then masturbated him and performed oral sex on him while Mains and the police officer were watching and masturbating. McGrath then made KIN 238 perform oral sex on Mains before anally penetrating KIN 238.

144 He alleged the third incident occurred when Mains and McGrath took him to the same house. The police officer was again present and KIN 238 said one of the men held him by the hair while KIN 238 was made to perform oral sex on all three men.

145 There are the following unusual features of these accounts.

(1) The presence of more than one abuser at the same time. Although KIN 135 also alleged that he was abused by two men in the presence of each other, that more than one abuser was present and also engaged in abuse, is a highly unusual allegation, although one that is not unique in this Inquiry.

(2) Our experience in this Inquiry, and the experience of a multitude of criminal cases, is that sexual abuse of this type is almost invariably performed in secret when only the abuser and the abused are present. It is unusual that more than two people are present.

(3) The weight of the evidence we have heard suggests that Mains and McGrath did not like each other, and it is surprising that either would abuse a boy while the other was present if they did not like or trust each other.

70 KIN 60459/60463

The Experiences of R 4

146 We have already described R 4's account that he gave of his experiences in the 1980s. In October 2015 he gave a tape recorded account of his experiences to the PSNI.[71] In that, he added to his previous account in a number of respects.

(1) He said that on two occasions Mains put his hand down and touched his privates, his penis and tried to play with him. Mains tried to kiss him on the lips but R 4 would not let him. Mains asked R 4 to touch him and he did. This would happen in the apartment beside Mains's office. R 4 stated that he did not discuss this with anybody at the time.

(2) During the summer while he was still a resident at Kincora, he went to Mains's girlfriend's (BAR 1) house to do some gardening. When he was there he alleged that Mains told him that he wanted to ride him and tried to touch him up.[72] When BAR 1 walked in, R 4 told her that Mains had tried to touch him up and had done it before in Kincora.[73] This allegation had not been made before.

(3) R 4 said that the reason he did not tell any adults about what was happening at the time was because he was too scared and they would not believe him.[74]

147 R 4 gave evidence to us on Day 213. He was in Kincora between the ages of sixteen and seventeen for some fifteen months from August 1965 until November 1966. He emphasised that because he did not have a job he sat around the hostel all day doing chores such as cleaning, washing up and gardening, which he enjoyed. After about six months, which would place this at about February or March 1966, he brought Mains a cup of tea to his room upstairs in the hostel. A few nights later Mains asked him to rub cream on his back. When R 4 did so Mains began to fondle his privates and his backside, but R 4 refused his request to take off his trousers. About a month later the same thing happened, but this time it resulted in mutual oral sex and masturbation. This became a regular occurrence between them and continued after he left Kincora. He described how he returned to see Mains at Kincora on many occasions, although with decreasing frequency, and his last visit

71 KIN 60091-60114.
72 KIN 60108.
73 KIN 60110-60111.
74 KIN 60112.

was at Christmas 1979. On that occasion he visited Mains's house. He said that Mains let him stay overnight, and when BAR 1 had gone to bed Mains performed oral sex on him and they masturbated each other.

148 He also accepted that on his return visits as an adult he engaged in consensual sex with boys who were still living in the hostel. These were R 8, who was in Kincora between April 1968 and August 1971, and R 18 who was there between 1977 and 1980. As we have earlier seen, R 18 admitted that sexual activity took place between himself and R 4 when R 4 visited the hostel.

149 In his oral evidence R 4 confirmed that during his time in Kincora Semple never made any sexual approaches to him, nor was there any talk among the boys of either Mains or Semple being homosexual, although he accepted that he, R 4, might have been seen kissing Mains.

150 R 4 also said that there was quite a strict regime in the hostel, and he described being beaten with a leather strap by one of the temporary assistants at that time (KIN 384). R 4 is one of the very few residents of Kincora who said that they were treated harshly in a physical way.

PART SEVEN

Richard Kerr's accounts of his experiences

151 Richard Kerr was not an applicant to the Inquiry, but it came to the Inquiry's attention that in recent years he has given a number of accounts to journalists in both written and broadcast interviews, and in those accounts he described the way he was treated in Kincora and elsewhere. Because of the significance of the allegations made by Mr Kerr about the way he was treated in Kincora, and in particular his assertion that he was taken to various addresses in Northern Ireland where he engaged in sexual activity with other men, Mr Kerr was invited to become a core participant in the Inquiry. He was also requested to provide a statement to the Inquiry confirming the account he had given in an affidavit made on behalf of Gary Hoy in the judicial review application, and setting out anything else he wished to say relevant to the Inquiry's work. The Inquiry made arrangements for him to fly from Dallas in the United States where he now lives to Northern Ireland at public expense. This was so he could consult with his legal representatives, provide a witness statement to the Inquiry, and consult with the Inquiry counsel and give evidence during the module relating to Kincora. Accommodation was arranged for him in Northern Ireland, and the Inquiry also agreed to fly his aunt from England so that she could accompany him while he was in Northern Ireland.

152 At a very late stage he withdrew from his engagement with the Inquiry, despite the fact that by then his legal representatives had been provided with a substantial number of documents relating to him, and funding at the Inquiry's expense had been made available to his legal representatives to represent him. At the start of Day 211, when the Inquiry proceeded to examine over two days the material relating to Richard Kerr and the various accounts of his experiences that he has given, Christine Smith QC, Senior Counsel to the Inquiry, outlined in considerable detail the arrangements that were made to facilitate Mr Kerr coming to Northern Ireland to give evidence, the arrangements that the Inquiry made to achieve this and the circumstances which led up to his saying that he no longer wished to engage with the Inquiry.

153 Just before Mr Kerr was due to catch a flight from Dallas in the United States to Northern Ireland the Inquiry was notified by his legal representatives that he no longer wished to engage with the Inquiry and that they were withdrawing from representation for him, although the junior counsel and solicitor for whom the Inquiry had provided public funding had attended almost all of the Kincora hearings before that time. The next day his solicitors issued a lengthy statement on Mr Kerr's behalf, and whilst we accept that Mr Kerr put his name to this statement, the nature of the statement and the detail it provided leave us in no doubt that this represented the views of his legal representatives as much as it represented Mr Kerr's position. We do not intend to deal with this in any detail other than to highlight two matters. In that statement it was asserted that the Inquiry wished to conceal documents from Mr Kerr and his legal representatives. That was not correct: his legal representatives had been provided with over 700 pages of documents relating to Mr Kerr. They had accepted to the Inquiry that what the state agencies knew about the abuse perpetrated at Kincora, and the individuals perpetrating that abuse, or when they knew about it, were matters that are not within Mr Kerr's knowledge. The Inquiry had no reason to believe that Mr Kerr was able to speak of his own knowledge on the issues of state participation, and he and his legal representatives had been provided with all of the documents available to the Inquiry at that time that the Inquiry considered directly bore upon Mr Kerr or on matters that the Inquiry considered that Mr Kerr was in a position to speak about from his own knowledge.

154 We regret that Mr Kerr decided not to assist the Inquiry as a core participant, and that it did not receive a witness statement from him. However, given the nature of the issues raised by him on various occasions, we considered it was essential to examine these accounts, and to do so in the light of the other material available to the Inquiry in order to reach a conclusion upon the assertions made by or on behalf of Mr Kerr.

155 We took time during the Inquiry to carefully consider the statements Mr Kerr previously made to the police and to the media even though he chose not to give a statement to this Inquiry or give evidence in person before it. This was because Mr Kerr's statements to the media have made a significant contribution to the public perception that there was widespread sexual exploitation of boys in Kincora by prominent figures. We decided that we should examine Mr Kerr's statements in a detailed and comprehensive manner in order to ascertain as fully as possible whether they provided reliable evidence that such sexual exploitation and prostitution occurred in and/or was orchestrated through Kincora.

156 Mr Kerr has spoken to the media on many occasions, and the main headings of his allegations can be seen from a number of transcripts of interviews he has given to various media outlets. In the course of an interview given to Channel 4 television on 7 April 2015 he made a number of assertions.

(1) The first time that he was trafficked to London was in February 1977.

(2) He was taken to an apartment block known as Dolphin Square where he engaged in a sexual encounter "I could have been sixteen, fifteen, seventeen."[75]

(3) He was abused by Dr Morris Fraser in the Royal Victoria Hospital in Belfast when he was thirteen, "I was thirteen, Morris abused me, in his office, two or three times on those visits".[76]

157 On 18 July 2015 a now defunct website calling itself exaronews.com (Exaro) published an article in which, according to it, Richard Kerr named a number of people who, it was said, "were part of a cover-up of a paedophile network linked to Kincora boys home in Belfast, Northern Ireland". According to Kerr, there were:

(1) "Lord Mountbatten, a cousin of the Queen, great uncle to Prince Charles, Chief of the Defence staff from 1959 – 1965, murdered by the IRA in 1979.

75 KIN 117037.
76 KIN 117049.

(2) Sir Maurice Oldfield, Director of the Secret Intelligence Service, better known as MI6.

(3) Sir Anthony Blunt, Master of the Queen's Pictures, former officer in the Security Service, or MI5, who became a Russian spy.

(4) Sir Knox Cunningham, Unionist/Ulster Unionist MP, Parliamentary Private Secretary to Harold Macmillan the Prime Minister, and member of the Conservative party's national executive committee 1959/66."

158 This article did not give any basis for the assertions that any of these people were connected with Kincora, or were part of what is asserted to be "the cover-up of a paedophile network linked to Kincora boys' home". The article on the website continued:

> "Kerr who has been speaking to Exaro since August 2013, said previously that he was too scared to name names. Asked for his reaction to people who disbelieve his claims, Kerr said 'I am not here to try to prove it to them. I am here to tell what happened to me, and I know it happened to me and I know it happened to those other boys'.

Later in the same article the website states:

> "During the interview with the programme's Ross Coulthart, Kerr also picks out other powerful people as members of the paedophile network who sexually abused him while he was a Kincora boy;
>
> - Sir Peter Hayman, Deputy Director of MI6, previously the UK's High Commissioner to Canada,
> - Sir Nicholas Fairbairn, Conservative MP, solicitor general in Scotland,
> - Sir Cyril Smyth, Liberal MP, assaulted him in Manchester.
>
> All the men named are dead, but Kerr remained fearful about identifying them. Kerr agreed to identify the men on camera, but was unwilling to say more about some of them."

159 The article continues:

> "An intelligence source told Exaro that Mountbatten mixed with paedophiles who went to parties in the Republic of Ireland.
>
> Mountbatten is also understood to have visited Kincora, although why remains unclear.

> Kerr tells 60-minutes that he walked in on a meeting at Kincora between Oldfield and Joseph Mains, the warden of the children's home. He says that Mains immediately and forcefully ordered him out of the room. Mains was subsequently, in 1981, jailed for six years for sexual offences against boys.
>
> Kerr did not know at the time who Oldfield was, he says, and does not suggest that he abused Kincora boys.
>
> Kerr says that he recognised Blunt from his time at Kincora as one of a group of three men, the other two men sexually abused him as a boy, he says, although Blunt did not."

160 These accounts are of limited value to the Inquiry because they provide no detail to substantiate the allegations, nor is it apparent how Richard Kerr came to recognise some of the individuals to whom he referred. The article says that:

> "He picked out from photographs a series of men connected with intelligence, military, and politics – and even the royal family some he identified as paedophiles themselves."

The Inquiry cannot say how the identification of these individuals was conducted as Mr Kerr has decided not to engage with the Inquiry.

161 On 16 February 2015 he swore an affidavit which was lodged in the High Court as part of the judicial review application brought against the Inquiry by Gary Hoy. As this was made on oath and prepared with the assistance of legal representation we treat it as a more definitive and detailed account of what Richard Kerr can or cannot say about his experiences in Kincora. We summarise these as follows:

- He was born on 12 May 1961.
- He was placed in care in Williamson House in Belfast where he says he was physically and sexually abused.[77]
- He moved from Williamson House to Kincora in 1975 aged fourteen. He had two more years left at school, although he implies that it was then that Mains got him a job as a bellboy at the Europa Hotel in the centre of Belfast.[78]
- Shortly after he arrived at Kincora Mains invited him into his bedroom, offered him whiskey, and they engaged in what Richard Kerr described as "fumbling around" each other's private parts.[79]

77 KIN 119501.
78 KIN 119501.
79 KIN 119502.

- There were more encounters like this, two or three times a week.[80]
- He said that when McGrath began to "fool with me (sexually abuse me), in the bathtub. I eventually told him to back off and I told Joe Mains about it and he stopped after that."[81]
- After a while Richard Kerr began to be taken to meet people in hotels in Larne and other places he could not recall. He continued "I remember going to a Hotel on the Upper Newtownards Road, I don't remember the name but it was not far from Kincora."
- He also said "when I worked in the Europa hotel sometimes men would come and take me to their rooms and abuse me".[82]
- He said there "was a time I went to Park Avenue Hotel with Mr Mains, Mr Semple, my friend Stephen and then I met other men, and I went to a room with someone and we had a sexual encounter. I cannot remember his name or the names of the others."[83]
- He says other people abused him who never gave their names. One drove a Rolls-Royce.[84]
- He met another man in his home, "some place off the Springfield Road", who he thought was an Army captain.[85]
- He referred to men coming to pick him up in their cars, saying "these things happened to me at different times, sometimes during the week and sometimes weekends. Since I went to school, I would come home early and then go to hotels. Sometime I would be in Joseph Mains bedroom. Sometimes on the weekends, in the evenings I would go to places like Larne, Bangor, Portrush".[86]
- On one occasion he was taken to the Kilwaughter House Hotel in Ballyclare: "I remember there was some trouble there and something went wrong. I am not exactly sure what happened but the manager of the hotel told us we had to leave."[87]
- He described being taken to a hotel in Portrush by Mains, being taken upstairs to a room where a man was waiting for him who made Richard Kerr perform anal sex on him.[88]

80 KIN 119502.
81 KIN 119502.
82 KIN 119502.
83 KIN 119502.
84 KIN 119503.
85 KIN 119503.
86 KIN 119503.
87 KIN 119503.
88 KIN 119503.

- He was subjected to extreme and degrading sexual abuse, including oral sex, penetration and other matters. These included him committing anal sex on others or being subjected to anal sex.[89]
- On one occasion he remembered coming home early from school "and I remember I walked into Joe Mains's office and there were three men there in suits sitting with Mr Semple and Mr Mains. They stopped talking as soon as I came in and I got the strong feeling I'd interrupted something secret and important. I would describe them as being shocked to see me."[90]
- He described people who he said were from the terrorist organisation the UVF coming to Kincora and said that he remembered being sexually abused by people he knew were members of the UVF.[91]
- He remembered being taken to the Harbour Inn Hotel in Larne with two men who picked him up from Kincora, being given a lot of alcohol so that he became drunk and they had sex with him. "On this one occasion I was arrested by the Larne police, who said I had stolen money from a hotel room".[92]
- While in Kincora he was given treats and presents, including chocolate and sometimes small amounts of money. "As I recall most of the perpetrators told me to keep quiet or they would put me away where I couldn't speak."[93]
- He says that he doesn't know how many other boys in Kincora were abused "but I know my friend Stephen was. There were other boys there who I believed were plants as they seemed not to fit in. They were two brothers aged around 18 or 19 and I now believe they may have been placed there by the security forces or security services to keep an eye on what was going on."
- He said that "the abuse stopped when I ended up in a court room due to being charged with theft, and sent to Rathgael remand centre. Around this time I stood in the Court room and told everybody I would tell everybody what was going on in Kincora if Joseph Mains did not come down to the Courthouse for me."[94]

89 KIN 119503.
90 KIN 119504.
91 KIN 119504.
92 KIN 119504.
93 KIN 119504.
94 KIN 119505.

- He remembered being in a police station off the Holywood Road, and telling them about the abuse at Kincora. "I remember police officers who were friends with Joseph Mains hit me over the head with a telephone book and said 'what have you been saying?'".[95]
- He said "around this time my friend Stephen was sent to Rathgael. He ran away from Rathgael and got a boat to Liverpool. He was caught and put back on the boat to Belfast and he apparently jumped off the boat and died. I believe he committed suicide as a result of the abuse he had suffered, we had previously spoken about committing suicide together."[96]
- He said "after I left Kincora I was also abused at Borstal and then abused again when I was sent to Williamson House although I understand these proceedings do not relate to these institutions so I will not describe this in detail." He continued "when I left Williamson House I was told to stay in hotels. I remember a Social worker visited me at a hotel and told me I was 'an embarrassment to the government'. She also told me they had decided for me to go to England and stay with my aunt. They put me on a boat to Liverpool."

162 We will refer to these allegations later, but in order to do so it is necessary to examine in some detail the various events relating to Richard Kerr that can be established from the documents available to the Inquiry.

Richard Kerr's time in care

163 Richard Kerr was born on 12 May 1961 and was placed in care in 1966. Until he went to Kincora in July 1975 he remained in Williamson House. During that time he attended Harberton Special School for children assessed as educationally sub-normal by the EHSSB.[97] From the age of eleven until he left school he attended Mount Vernon Secondary School in north Belfast.[98]

164 He was fourteen when he moved from Williamson House to Kincora in July 1975, and therefore he was required to continue to attend school until he reached the school leaving age of sixteen. Kerr said in his affidavit that he once returned early from school. As he reached the

95 KIN 119505.
96 KIN 119505.
97 KIN 40170.
98 KIN 10194 and 10915.

age of sixteen in May 1977 that would suggest that he came back from Mount Vernon. Because that school was in a different part of Belfast, and assuming that he went by public transport, that would require him to get a bus from Kincora into the centre of Belfast and then out to Mount Vernon and then to retrace his journey in the same way after school.

165 A social worker's report prepared in 1979 said that he settled in well in Kincora, but was subdued and quiet during his first year there, staying in and playing cards and watching TV. The report also records that after he went to live in Kincora, "he settled in well and obtained a job as a porter in the Europa Hotel".[99] This, as does the passage from his affidavit quoted earlier, implies that he got the job in the Europa Hotel after he arrived in Kincora when he was only fourteen. That implication is not easily reconciled with the statement that he stayed in and played cards and was subdued during his first year in Kincora. It may therefore be that his employment at the Europa started after he reached school-leaving age in the summer of 1977, although we cannot exclude that he may have had some part-time employment there before that. As we shall see, when questioned by the police in October 1977 he was recorded as a "hotel porter" in his police statement,[100] and as working in the Europa hotel.[101]

166 In any event, not long after Richard Kerr left school in the summer of 1977, he was involved in several burglaries, as well as an attempted burglary, of a number of premises in residential areas not far from Kincora with Stephen Waring who also lived in Kincora.

Richard Kerr and Stephen Waring

167 Although the Inquiry referred to Stephen Waring by the designation R 37, which had been given to him by the Hughes Inquiry when examining Richard Kerr's evidence, we have decided to refer to Stephen Waring by his proper name in this Report for the following reasons. First of all, Richard Kerr and others have referred to Waring by name on several occasions and his name is therefore already in the public domain as a former resident of Kincora. Secondly, Richard Kerr referred to him as Stephen in his affidavit when he referred to his tragic drowning in the Irish

99 KIN 50885.
100 KIN 117562.
101 KIN 117553.

Sea in the passage already quoted, where he expressed his belief that Stephen Waring committed suicide as a result of the abuse Richard Kerr said he believed he had suffered in Kincora.[102] Therefore, given Richard Kerr's close friendship with Stephen Waring and that Stephen Waring's identity in connection with Kincora are already in the public domain, we decided that the need to present a clear and understandable narrative of these events in our Report outweighed the desirability of maintaining Stephen Waring's anonymity.

168 Stephen Waring was placed in Rathgael Training School after he was convicted of various offences of dishonesty in May and June 1974. His first contact with Kincora and with Richard Kerr appears to have occurred in February 1976 when Stephen Waring was on weekend release from Rathgael Training School. He became a full-time resident in Kincora in August 1976.[103]

169 In August 1977 Stephen Waring and Richard Kerr were held by the RUC at Musgrave Street RUC station in the centre of Belfast because they were found in possession of a diamond ring valued at £900.

170 On 22 September 1977 Richard Kerr and Stephen Waring went to Larne. According to Richard Kerr's police statement made at the time they went by taxi to the Kilwaughter House Hotel, arriving at 5pm and leaving at 7pm with two men they met there. Later that night they missed the last train to Belfast, and having unsuccessfully tried to get the police to contact the hostel, made their way to the harbour again to see if they could get a lift to Belfast. Eventually they entered a house and stole a bag, but it only contained school books. They were caught by the police shortly afterwards.[104]

171 On 26 September 1977 Robert Lindsey, a social worker, found a gold bracelet in Stephen Waring's wardrobe at Kincora, and this was reported to the police. Waring then absconded but was detained in London and returned to Kincora on 2 October 1977. On 4 October 1977 Richard Kerr and Stephen Waring were both questioned by DC Scully of Strandtown RUC. They admitted that they had committed a large number of burglaries in various parts of east Belfast stealing jewellery and money. Both were brought before the Juvenile Court and remanded in custody to Rathgael Training School until 14 October 1977.

102 KIN 119505.
103 KIN 40171.
104 KIN 117629.

172 On 14 October when he was again brought before the Juvenile Court Richard Kerr cut himself in the cells with a razor he had brought from Rathgael and managed to conceal from the authorities.[105] He and Stephen Waring again appeared before the court on 21 October 1977. Waring received a training school order committing him to Rathgael. Richard Kerr was able to persuade the court that he deserved a chance and his case was accordingly adjourned, and he was ordered to pay £5 a week as compensation to the owners of the stolen property that had not been recovered.[106]

173 Judging by the account Richard Kerr later gave to Dr Clenaghan, a psychiatrist who examined him in Rathgael on two occasions before producing a report on 20 December 1977, he was allowed to return to Kincora on 21 October 1977. However, he then stole £80 from Raymond Semple, taking £5 or £10 at a time to buy drink for two men who regularly took him out for the day from the hostel.[107]

174 Richard Kerr was therefore brought back to court and remanded in custody to Rathgael to see whether he was suitable for training school. Rathgael decided that he was not suitable, and recommended a period of Borstal training. The Juvenile Court sentenced Richard Kerr to a period of Borstal training, and he was then transferred to the male Borstal at Millisle outside Donaghadee, County Down which is the subject of a separate chapter of our Report. Although an appeal was brought against the order of the Juvenile Court sentencing him to a period of Borstal training, the appeal was unsuccessful, and except for a number of periods which he spent in hospital, Richard Kerr remained in the Borstal at Millisle until he was released in February 1979.[108]

175 In his report Dr Clenaghan recorded that on the first occasion he saw Richard Kerr he was feeling depressed, and talked at length about Stephen Waring and his tragic death. On the second visit Dr Clenaghan formed the view that Richard Kerr seemed to have got over this phase, and was more concerned about his own future. Dr Clenaghan concluded that Richard Kerr "tends to be easily led and influenced and is a slow learner".[109]

176 During his time in Borstal, Richard Kerr spent two lengthy periods in hospital. The first was from the beginning of February until the end of March 1978.

105 KIN 117574.
106 KIN 117573.
107 KIN 10915.
108 KIN 108011.
109 KIN 10916.

This came about because of a suicide attempt during which he inflicted a severe cut to his foot. This suicide attempt was made after his appeal was rejected. The nature of the injury was such that he required a period of skin grafting[110] and his stay in hospital was lengthened because he contracted smallpox.[111] He again attempted suicide on his return to Millisle, and between mid-April and mid-May was placed in the Psychiatric Wing of the Maze Prison. Altogether during this period he cut himself seven times.

Richard Kerr's Juvenile Court appearances

177 It is clear that Richard Kerr was extremely unhappy at being remanded to Rathgael in custody. His social worker recorded that when he was released on 21 October 1977 he "was very glad to be going back [to Kincora] because he had been desperately unhappy in Rathgael".[112] When he was remanded in custody to Rathgael again he wrote at least three times to Mains asking if Mains would come to see him, or come to court on his next remand. On 8 November 1977 he wrote:

> "I would like to go back to the hostel. Will you come up to court this Wednesday I am very sorry this time... It is up to the Welfare report. Please help".[113]

In his police statement of 25 February in 1980 he said "...while I was in Kincora from July 1975 to November 1977 I looked on Joe Mains as a father. I was very fond of him".[114] The tenor of the three letters he sent to Mains at this stage is that of an extremely unhappy sixteen and a half year old desperate to return to Kincora.

178 Mains did visit him in Rathgael, brought some sweets and other similar gifts for him, and told Mr Swann, the headmaster of the Reception Unit in Rathgael, that he was very concerned about Richard, and keen to have him back in Kincora. Whilst Mr Swann told the police in February 1990 that it was not unusual for hostel wardens to visit any of the boys in the reception unit, his impression was that the relationship between Mains and Richard Kerr "was closer than a staff/boy relationship, and this was borne out by comments by my members of staff who knew Richard and worked in his unit".[115]

110 KIN 108023.
111 KIN 11087.
112 KIN 11085.
113 KIN 119514 – 119515.
114 KIN 108010.
115 KIN 77183.

179 Richard Kerr's attitude towards Mains showed itself during the October Juvenile Court remand proceedings. Helen Gogarty, a trainee social worker, was Richard Kerr's social worker at the time. We will see in the next chapter how she was one of the social workers who later contacted Mr McKenna, whose article in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980 brought the allegations about sexual abuse of residents in Kincora into the public domain. In her police statement of 13 February 1980, Helen Gogarty recounted how she spoke to Richard Kerr at the Juvenile Court at one of his remands prior to his conviction. He did not want to see her, and said "why isn't Joe Mains here?" She also visited him in Rathgael twice while he was on remand, and the only verbal response she got was "where is Joe Mains and when is he coming to see me and when am I getting out".[116]

180 The burglaries for which Richard Kerr was before the Juvenile Court were investigated by DC Scully of Strandtown RUC, which was a short distance from Kincora. DC Scully had visited Kincora in the past if some of the boys got into trouble, and he knew Mains. As the investigating officer he attended the Juvenile Court during the various remands, and spoke to Richard Kerr on several occasions over that time. DC Scully gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, and explained that on several occasions during their meetings, Richard Kerr demanded that he, Richard Kerr, speak to Mains, or that Mains should come to court. DC Scully said that he was suspicious of Mains because he had seen Mains in the company of R 2, whom he described as a well known homosexual, although at that time nobody had made any complaint to him about any homosexual conduct by either staff or residents in the hostel.[117] He thought Richard Kerr was effeminate, and had what he described as "the hall marks of a homosexual".[118] Because of his suspicions, and because of Richard Kerr's repeated demands to see Mains, DC Scully asked the prosecuting inspector at the Juvenile Court on the first remand to seek a remand of Richard Kerr to Rathgael in custody rather than allow him to return to Kincora on bail.[119] His application was successful.

116 KIN 78515.
117 KIN 73116.
118 KIN 73117.
119 KIN 73118.

181 At the next remand hearing on 14 October 1977 Richard Kerr again demanded that Mains be sent for, but when he was told that Mains refused to come, he was very angry, and said that if Mains did not come he would "tell all". When DC Scully asked him if he had any sort of relationship with Mains Richard Kerr laughed at him. When pressed as to what he meant by "tell all", Richard Kerr eventually told him that this meant that Mains gave him sherry in his private quarters late at night.[120]

182 DC Scully told Sgt Sillery, who was head of the Juvenile Liaison Branch at Strandtown RUC station, of his suspicions that Richard Kerr may have made the threats about Mains because there might be some connection between them of a homosexual nature.[121] We will return to this in the next chapter.

183 In his police statement on 26 February 1980 Richard Kerr said about this episode that:

> "When I made the threats about Joe Mains to the police and social workers that if he did not come to court I would tell all, I was referring to the drinks I had in his flat, that he knew about my break-ins and also about Mr McGrath's behaviour. I thought by making these threats he would come and help me because he would be scared. I never intended to tell but just to put pressure on Joe Mains to help me."[122]

184 He also described his relationship with Mains in the following way:

> "While I was in Kincora from July 1975 to November 1977 I looked on Joe Mains as a father. I was very fond of him. When I was doing break-ins he said to me that he knew I was doing them. He asked me to tell him the whole story about the break-ins and I told him part of it, that is about doing some break-ins.
>
> I looked up to and respected Joe Mains and while I was in his flat he did not touch me or say anything to me which would have suggested anything of a homosexual nature".[123]

He also explained that he wrote twice to Mains from the Borstal at Millisle, asking Mains to visit, and Mains did so.

120 KIN 73118.
121 KIN 73121
122 KIN 108010
123 KIN 108010

The death by drowning of Stephen Waring

185 At this stage it is appropriate to turn to the tragic circumstances of the death of Stephen Waring. Richard Kerr has referred to this in his affidavit lodged in the Hoy judicial review at paragraph 23.

> "Around this time my friend Stephen was sent to Rathgael. He ran away from Rathgael and got a boat to Liverpool. He was caught and put back on the boat to Belfast and he apparently jumped off the boat and died. I believe he committed suicide as a result of the abuse he suffered. We had previously spoken about committing suicide together."[124]

186 Richard Kerr's belief that Stephen Waring committed suicide because he had been subjected to abuse has been repeated on a number of occasions, as for example in a broadcast on BBC Radio Ulster on 12 March 2015 during an interview with the presenter Stephen Nolan. In this extract from the interview Nolan wrongly referred to Stephen Waring as Stephen Warren. Having referred to Colin Wallace, Richard Kerr continued:

> "The activities of the abuse increased when I went to the Europa. I started (unclear) night by working for these people and breaking into homes, with me, Stephen and Billy (unclear) they couldn't control it anymore. We got out of control...
>
> "Stephen Nolan: and this Richard is Stephen Warren who jumped to his death on a boat to Liverpool?
>
> Richard Kerr: Yes, maybe he came back too soon...
>
> Stephen Nolan: He killed himself?
>
> Richard Kerr: ...and that's what I don't understand today, why nobody's really investigating that. If he was confined, this is what the witness says, he was confined because he made threats that he was jumping over, he had alcohol in him, but (unclear) decided to let him go and run around on the front of the boat again. That does not make sense, (unclear)."

187 The circumstances leading up to Stephen Waring's death are more complex than these references would suggest, and were explained to the Hughes Inquiry by Lindsay Conway. In 1977 he was the assistant welfare officer in Rathgael Training School, and in that capacity attended the Board of Trade Inquiry held on 9 February 1978 into Stephen Waring's death. Mr Conway explained to the Hughes Inquiry that Stephen Waring absconded from Rathgael on Friday 25 November 1977 and went to Liverpool with his elder brother. They were arrested when they were disembarking from the boat in Liverpool, were held by the authorities and then placed on the return sailing to Belfast. On Sunday 27 November 1977 the police reported to the training school that Stephen Waring had been lost overboard, and that although the ship carried out a search of waters near the Isle of Man, Stephen Waring was presumed drowned. Mr Conway told the Hughes Inquiry that the official finding of the Board of Trade Inquiry was "lost at sea, killed or drowned as a result of a fall from the vessel".[125]

124 KIN 119505.

188 Mr Conway was asked at the Hughes Inquiry,:

"Have you any reason to connect his death with his period in Kincora?

Answer: No. The evidence that was given to the Board of Trade inquiry was quite clear, that [Stephen Waring] was fooling about on the outer rail of the boat, that a soldier coming home on leave on two occasions pulled [Stephen Waring] in onto the right side, and that on the third occasion the soldier described that actually [Stephen Waring] slipped out of his grasp; so it was in no way a pre-meditated dash from any part of the boat over the side. The solider gave quite clear evidence that he'd been drinking heavily.

Chairman: That is what I was going to ask you. He had been drinking heavily?

Answer: He had been drinking heavily. Again the recollection is that it was a football supporter sort of return trip; it was a Liverpool match, and this was why the boys absconded, to go to the Liverpool match. When a number of the passengers had fallen asleep his brother recalled him going around and drinking the left-over's, so [Stephen Waring] was possibly drunk in this case, but the soldier recalled that he actually slipped out of his grasp."

125 KIN 73220.

189 At paragraph 4.197 of its Report the Hughes Inquiry stated that Stephen Waring's brother, to whom he was very close, accompanied him on the journey to Liverpool, and was sent back with him. He told the police that his brother had never mentioned anything to him with a homosexual connotation. He said his brother had been drinking heavily on the boat, and had threatened suicide, and he believed that his brother committed suicide due to a combination of being drunk and not wishing to return to Rathgael.[126]

190 Mr Conway's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, and the account given of the evidence of Stephen Waring's brother, suggests that Stephen Waring may have committed suicide because he was drunk and did not wish to return to Rathgael, and that his tragic death had nothing to do with any homosexual activity as Richard Kerr has stated in recent years.

191 It is also significant that when Richard Kerr referred to Stephen Waring's death in his police statement of 25 February 1980, he said that whilst he and Stephen Waring had discussed committing suicide, he did not go on to attribute Waring's death to sexual abuse but to the pressure he said that they were under from another boy KIN 274 who he said had planned the break-ins which Stephen Waring and himself had then helped to carry out. He continued:

> "Stephen and I felt we were under pressure from [KIN 274] and we decided if we were caught we would go to London, take a lot of drink and then take an overdose of tablets. We were intending to commit suicide. It was Stephen who suggested suicide. I did not go to London and I didn't go out drinking with him or take tablets. We were both in Rathgael Training School when he escaped and I heard a short time later that he was supposed to have jumped overboard on the Liverpool boat."[127]

Richard Kerr and William Edmonds

192 During the same police statement Richard Kerr made references to a close relationship with a prison officer named Edmonds during his time in Borstal, and as a result the police decided to make further enquiries, even though Richard Kerr did not make any specific allegation.[128]

126 KIN 75292.
127 KIN 108012.
128 KIN 108004.

Edmonds was interviewed under caution by the police on 10 April 1980. He described how he worked as a hospital officer in Millisle Borstal giving out medicines and tending to minor injuries. He said that after Richard Kerr had been in Millisle for about six weeks, Edmonds saw him in the surgery for medical treatment. He described how Kerr was only wearing a dressing gown, whereupon Edmonds fondled Richard Kerr's genitals and buttocks. He then asked whether he could have anal sex, to which Richard Kerr agreed, but before Edmonds could perform the act they were disturbed by the arrival of another officer.[129] Subsequently he tried unsuccessfully to masturbate Richard Kerr in the surgery on a couple of occasions;[130] Richard Kerr was taken to Musgrave Park Hospital for a period and nothing occurred between them after he returned to Millisle.

193 He went on to say that Richard Kerr asked him to come to see him when he was released. About a year later he visited Richard Kerr in the Park Avenue Hotel, where he said Richard Kerr was staying at the time. On this occasion he described how they were interrupted as he was having anal sex with Richard Kerr by a phone call from the night porter saying that he had to go.[131]

194 When Richard Kerr was interviewed by the Sussex Police in 1982 he said that whilst nothing occurred between Edmonds and himself in Millisle, after he left Millisle Edmonds committed anal sex on him in Edmonds's home, and attempted to have sex with him twice after that, but Richard Kerr refused on each occasion. He said that he had not admitted this in 1980 because he had been too embarrassed, and because he thought the police were only interested in Kincora.[132] If Edmonds's version of events was correct, namely that the sexual encounter took place in the Park Avenue Hotel, that probably would have been during the period after Richard Kerr was moved from Williamson House to the Bishop's Court Hotel on 15 March, and before he left to go to Preston in Lancashire on 19 May 1979.

129 KIN 108018.
130 KIN 108019.
131 KIN 108019.
132 KIN 40796.

Richard Kerr's life in Northern Ireland after his release from Borstal

195 By the time Richard Kerr was discharged from Millisle Borstal on 9 February 1979 he had not lived in Kincora for some fifteen months since he was remanded in custody for stealing £80 from Raymond Semple. There was considerable difficulty in arranging somewhere for him to live, which was compounded by a dispute between social services and the Probation Board as to his care. Although Richard Kerr had been discharged from Borstal he was on licence, and so was the responsibility of the Probation Board. Social services were involved because the Probation Board asked the EHSSB to find accommodation for Richard Kerr. A serious dispute developed between the EHSSB and the Probation Board about Richard Kerr's behaviour, and about the most suitable accommodation for him, a position further complicated by the need for the Probation Board to find work for him. These disputes were examined by the Hughes Inquiry and it is unnecessary for our purposes to consider why they arose.

196 The dispute appears to have continued until Richard Kerr left Northern Ireland to go to live with his aunt in Preston in May 1979. Such was the dispute that the District Social Services Officer wrote to the Assistant Chief Probation Officer on 14 March 1979 expressing his concern.[133] By then Richard Kerr had been living in Williamson House for some weeks in what was clearly meant to be a temporary arrangement until more suitable accommodation could be found for him. It appears that bed and breakfast accommodation was not felt to be appropriate because all concerned believed that he needed a sheltered environment. Social services explored the possibility of a placement for him with the Corrymeela Community outside Ballycastle, Co Antrim. However, this was many miles away from Belfast and was obviously impracticable when social services learned that the probation officer had arranged a job at the Stormont Hotel in east Belfast for him.

197 The five weeks that Richard Kerr spent in Williamson House are significant for a number of reasons. Williamson House was a children's home, and although Richard Kerr was still legally within the age group that could be accommodated there, it was not really suitable because he was so much older than the children in the home, and on the face of it a hostel such as Kincora would have been more suitable, as his social worker Mrs Kennedy confirmed to the Hughes Inquiry.[134] We shall refer to her again in the next chapter when considering her views at that time as to why Kincora was unsuitable.

133 KIN 50882.

198 Because there was no room for him in Williamson house, Richard Kerr was placed in the flat in the building occupied by Eric Witchell who was the officer in charge. Mrs Kennedy reported on 14 March 1979 that this arrangement was causing significant problems because of what she termed "the enormous demands", Richard Kerr was making on Eric Witchell's time. She said:

> "Eric is frequently up until the early hours of the morning talking to [Richard Kerr] and unless he actually leaves the house Eric's off duty time is usually interrupted by [Richard Kerr]".[135]

199 This was not the only problem because, as the District Social Services Officer wrote to the Assistant Chief Probation Officer in his letter of 14 March 1979, there were four areas of concern for the staff at Williamson House.

(1) Richard Kerr had returned home in a drunken state on a number of occasions; that happening three times in the last four days. On the last occasion he was brought from the Europa Hotel by a number of drunken men who caused such a fracas that the police were called.

(2) Both the residential staff and social work staff believed he was consorting with a number of men he previously knew in the Belfast area, that he was engaged in homosexual activity and had come into a considerable amount of money. There were "strong suspicions which suggest that the money was procured", that is that he had been paid for engaging in homosexual activity.[136]

(3) Richard Kerr had begun to talk again about committing suicide, which was of concern because of his previous history of suicide attempts.

(4) He was in contact with his sister who was also in care, and as a result his sister had taken considerable amounts of alcohol. There were also concerns about the nature of his relationship with his sister.

134 KIN 73596.
135 KIN 50887.
136 KIN 50882.

200 The District Social Services Officer said that Richard Kerr was obviously unhappy and unsettled in Williamson House, had been a most disruptive and disturbing influence, was now beyond the control of social services, and asked the Probation Board to take immediate steps to remove him to "a more suitable supervised environment to afford adequate protection for his safety and the safety of the children in our care."[137]

201 This letter appears to have been written following the report submitted to her superiors by Mrs Kennedy on the same day. She told the Hughes Inquiry that she had been up with Richard Kerr nearly every night that week, she felt that probation should be helping more, and "so the purpose of that report was to enlist the help of my senior management in settling that dispute, one way or another with probation".

202 In the event, although she had planned to put Richard Kerr into bed and breakfast accommodation, because he found the idea that intolerable she made a case for him to stay in a hotel,[138] and the next day, 15 March, she moved him to the Bishop's Court Hotel.[139] She said there were two moves before he went to Preston on 19 May.

203 The move to the Bishop's Court Hotel on the Upper Newtownards Road was to an address not far from Kincora, but that appears to have been a coincidence; there is no evidence to show that Richard Kerr had any contact with Kincora during this period between his release from Borstal in February and his going to Preston. At some stage before he went to Preston it seems that he moved to the Park Avenue Hotel from the Bishop's Court Hotel, because he told the police in 1980 that Edmonds visited him there twice after he left Kincora. It would seem that his stay in the Park Avenue Hotel was after he left the Bishop's Court Hotel.

Other causes of concern in 1977 about Richard Kerr's relationships

204 The concerns about Richard Kerr's homosexuality expressed in the letter of 14 March by the District Social Services Officer were not the only ones expressed in and around this time. As we have already seen, DC Scully considered that Richard Kerr had what he called "all the hallmarks of a homosexual" when dealing with the burglary investigations in October

137 KIN 50883.
138 KIN 73599.
139 KIN 73598.

1977.[140] His associations with the men with whom he travelled to Larne in October 1977 when he stole money from behind the reception desk in the Highways Hotel have also to be considered in this context. In his police statement in 1980 Richard Kerr said that while he was in Williamson House he got to know KIN 340 who visited his son in Williamson House and brought the boys sweets. KIN 341 drove KIN 340 to the home, and sometimes came in and spoke to the boys. Richard Kerr said he got to know them better when he was in Kincora, saying that he used to visit KIN 341's house and had drinks there. He said that the night he stole money from the hotel in Larne was the only night KIN 340 and KIN 341 collected him from Kincora. KIN 341 had hired a car for 24 hours.

205 Richard Kerr continued:

> "The three of us were out that evening for a drink. It was [KIN 341's] idea that we should go there for the Country and Western music. I went out with these older men because I had no friends and I knew them from their visits to Williamson House. There was no other reason – just as friends. They phoned me to Kincora and made the arrangements to go out. I had no prior arrangements with them."[141]

206 KIN 340 was interviewed by the police on 20 March 1980. By that time he was 37 years old. He said that he got to know Richard Kerr when his son was in Williamson House, and that Richard Kerr stayed on the settee on two or three occasions when KIN 340 was squatting in a house next door to Richard Kerr's family. He said Richard Kerr also visited him to take his dog out when he moved to another address. He described Richard Kerr contacting him whilst he was in Kincora to say that he wanted to hire a car. He claimed that Richard Kerr would arrange for KIN 341 to hire a car and would pay. This allegedly happened on about a dozen occasions, during which they went to several hotels, including the Park Avenue and Kilwaughter House and once to Kilkeel. On one occasion he said Kerr and he went to the Park Avenue Hotel, hired a room and played cards until 4am. He said that Richard Kerr always seemed to have lots of money, and bought the drink as well as paying for the car.[142] He denied that any homosexual activity occurred between Richard Kerr and himself.[143]

140 KIN 73117.
141 KIN 108010.
142 KIN 10199.
143 KIN 10200.

207 KIN 341 also made a police statement in 1980. By then he was 30 years old. He said that "on about two occasions" Richard Kerr provided the money for him to hire a car, and he then drove the three of them about. On the other occasions when the three went out together he said they went in his own car. One of those occasions was the night they went to Larne, although he wrongly called the hotel the Highwayman rather than the Highways. He claimed Richard Kerr "always seemed to have money and try [sic] to show off with the money though he was not a big spender". When he took the others out they would go to various hotels where they generally drank.[144] He said he only collected Richard Kerr from Kincora twice, and that was at Richard Kerr's suggestion. He said he never made any homosexual approaches to him.[145]

208 Whatever the true nature of the relationship between Richard Kerr and these two much older men, on any showing he was associating with them on many occasions and they were drinking together. If their accounts are to be believed, Richard Kerr had enough money to pay for their cars and drinks, something that would not normally be the case for a sixteen year old whose only income was his pay as a hotel porter. That these men were exploiting a teenager and not worrying about how he came by his money is incontrovertible. They were extremely unsuitable companions for Richard Kerr and that he was able to go on these expeditions is surprising. However, it must be recalled that Kincora was a hostel and not a children's home, and this could mean that boys might well get into unsuitable company outside the hostel without adverse comment from Mains or the other staff. It is noteworthy that when DC Scully came to Kincora on the morning of 4 October to speak to Richard Kerr he found him the worse for drink.

Richard Kerr and Eric Witchell

209 Eric Witchell was one of the six men who, including Mains, Semple and McGrath, were prosecuted for various sexual offences involving children who were in care and he was sentenced by Lord Lowry on 19 December 1981. Witchell, who was a member of an Anglican religious order, was sentenced to eight months imprisonment on each of six charges of indecent assault and gross indecency committed against three boys who were residents of Williamson House while he was in charge. The prosecution did not proceed with a further charge of attempted buggery alleged to have been committed against one of the three boys.[146] As we explained in the previous chapter these offences were investigated as part of the Caskey Phase One investigations, which covered not just Kincora but several other institutions as well.

144 KIN 10202.
145 KIN 10204.

210 In his RUC statements of 25 and 26 February 1980 Richard Kerr referred to his time in Williamson House. He made no allegations that he had been subjected to any sexual abuse during his time there, although he volunteered at the end of his statement of 26 February that KIN 46 was found naked in bed in Williamson House with another boy, and was also found under a bed there with Richard Kerr's sister.[147]

211 Richard Kerr was interviewed by the Sussex Police and made a statement to them on 26 October 1982 when he said that during the time he stayed with Witchell in Witchell's flat in Williamson House, Witchell gave him alcohol and had anal sex with him three times. He said this was the first time he had anal sex. Witchell was questioned but denied these allegations. The police recommended no prosecution of Witchell, saying that whilst Richard Kerr may be telling the truth, there was no corroborative evidence to support his allegations, and as he had been interviewed twice in February 1980 and not made any allegation against Witchell his "reliability as a witness is extremely suspect".[148]

Richard Kerr's move to Preston

212 On 12 May 1979 Richard Kerr reached the age of eighteen, and so social services ceased to be responsible for him. On or about 19 May 1979 he left Northern Ireland and went to live with his maternal aunt in Preston in Lancashire. The possibility of his going to Preston appears to have been first raised almost eighteen months earlier during one of the remand hearings at Belfast Juvenile Court. In Mrs Gogarty's undated report she says that his "father was also there and the subject was brought up of [Richard Kerr] going to stay with Mrs Kerr's sister in Preston, Lancs". This implies that the suggestion was made by his father, and it commonly happens that when a teenager is before the courts in Northern Ireland having committed offences that may result in his being given a custodial sentence a parent would suggest that an alternative would be for him to go to live with a relative elsewhere so that he could stay out of trouble. The magistrate requested a social report into the home circumstances of Richard Kerr's aunt in Preston, and adjourned the case for two weeks. However, when the case came back to court the report was unfavourable. Her accommodation, and other family commitments with another baby on the way, meant that although she was very concerned for him, his aunt was doubtful if she could help.[149]

146 KIN 40221.
147 KIN 50863.
148 KIN 50848.

213 The possibility of Richard Kerr moving to Preston appears to have been revived in April 1979. Mrs Kennedy, who was his social worker by that time, told the Hughes Inquiry that in April Richard Kerr went over to Preston "for a holiday and he decided he wanted to go back and settle there", which he did on or about 19 May when his hotel accommodation in Northern Ireland stopped.[150] In his police statement of 25 February 1980 Richard Kerr said that Mrs Kennedy gave him the money for his fare to Preston.[151] It is entirely probable that given his situation at the time he was provided with his fare to Preston.

Richard Kerr's time in Preston

214 In his statement of 25 February 1980 Richard Kerr said that in August 1979 he had met a man in Preston who he named. He said that by then he was having difficult times with his aunt so he moved into this man's house as a lodger, got a job and paid him rent. He then said "there is nothing going on between him and I".[152] However, when he was interviewed by Sussex Police in October 1982 he gave a different account of his relationship with this man, saying that he "and I maintained a homosexual relationship for two years, he didn't force me into the relationship".[153] Richard Kerr was now 21 and the statement concluded with him saying "I continue to have casual homosexual relationships in London where I live and work. I consider myself to be bi-sexual".[154]

Richard Kerr, Williamson House and Dr Morris Fraser

215 Dr Roderick Morrison Fraser, generally known as Dr Morris Fraser, graduated from the Queens University, Belfast, as a doctor and

149 KIN 11086.
150 KIN 73598.
151 KIN 108011.
152 KIN 108012.
153 KIN 50864.
154 KIN 50865.

subsequently specialised in child psychiatry, becoming a senior registrar at the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children. On 17 May 1972 Dr Fraser pleaded guilty to a charge of sexually assaulting a child and was bound over for three years at Bow Street Magistrates Court in London. Following this, in 1973 he was brought before the Fitness to Practice Committee of the doctors' regulatory body, the General Medical Council. The Committee adjourned his case from time to time on the basis that he was receiving treatment. In July 1975 the committee determined that his response to treatment enabled them to feel satisfied that it would be proper to discharge him. The result was therefore that no disciplinary action was recorded against him.

216 On 12 July 2015 an article on Dr Fraser appeared on the website of the Independent newspaper pointing out that Dr Fraser had been allowed to practice after his conviction at Bow Street despite being convicted by a court in New York on other charges of sexual abuse. The article linked Dr Fraser to Kincora, and quoted Richard Kerr as saying:

> "I was 13. Morris abused me, in his office, two or three times on those visits. I will never forget that face. That black hair. I have never forgotten it. He was in contact with children's homes all over Belfast".[155]

217 Dr Niall Meehan is an academic in the Journalism and Media Faculty of Griffith College Dublin who has published a study of Dr Fraser and his career entitled Morris Fraser, Child Abuse, Corruption and Collusion in Britain and Northern Ireland. On 31 March 2016 Dr Meehan took part in a discussion of Dr Fraser and his activities on the BBC Good Morning Ulster radio programme. In that discussion he asserted that Fraser "dealt with children, everyday, and vulnerable children at that, and allocated them to institutions in Belfast, including Whiteabbey, Lissue Children's Hospital and also Kincora..."[156]

218 Richard Kerr was interviewed on the same programme later that morning. He described seeing Dr Fraser on two occasions in a hospital when he believed he was "probably about eleven or twelve". On the first occasion he was accompanied by his sister, but on the second occasion he said he was on his own. He said that he was being molested in Williamson House before that, and was wetting the bed. He said that Dr Fraser asked him to take down his shorts. Although he does not say his genitals were exposed as a result, it is a reasonable inference that that was the position because he said that Dr Fraser took some pictures "with a kind of Polaroid camera".[157]

155 KIN 117049.
156 KIN 117052 and KIN 117053.

219 During the interview Richard Kerr also said that he believed Dr Fraser knew Mains. He said "…they all came up to Williamson House and they all had a meeting". He continued that two months later his sister was sent to Whiteabbey Training School for Girls:

> "…the next day I was taken out of Williamson House, by Joseph Mains in a car and taken up to Kincora at the age of fourteen. And Kincora was for working boys, not for boys that still go to secondary school".[158]

220 Dr Meehan sent a copy of his article on Dr Fraser to the Inquiry. In it, and in his contribution to the Good Morning Ulster programme, he raised a number of matters, including claims that the newspapers did not adequately report or investigate Dr Fraser's conduct following his conviction, and why Dr Fraser was able to continue working with children until he volunteered to stop by being voluntarily removed from the Medical Register in December 1995. These and a number of other matters raised by Dr Meehan about the way the medical authorities and the police dealt with Dr Fraser after his conviction in London are not matters that fall within the Terms of Reference of this Inquiry and we have not considered them. However, in this chapter we consider the allegations made by Richard Kerr relating to Dr Fraser in order to see whether he was ever treated by Dr Fraser, or, as Richard Kerr implied in the remarks quoted earlier, he was responsible for placing Richard Kerr or other children in Kincora.

221 The first thing we have to say is that, so far as we are aware, Richard Kerr never made such allegations about Dr Fraser before he took part in this programme on 31 March 2015. He made no reference whatever to Dr Fraser in his judicial review affidavit sworn on 16 February 2015, nor was it raised on his behalf by his legal representatives in subsequent correspondence with the Inquiry. His assertion that he was being abused in Williamson House before he says he went to see Dr Fraser when he was aged about eleven or twelve is difficult to reconcile with his failure to say that when he referred to sexual activity in Williamson House in the past in his police statement of 26 February 1980, or in the statement he made in 26 October 1982 to the Sussex Police.

157 KIN 117054.
158 KIN 117055.

222 In his statement of October 1982 the only reference he made to Williamson House was the allegation that Eric Witchell had anal intercourse with him on three occasions during the six weeks or so he spent in Williamson House after he was released from Borstal in February 1979, by which time he was not far short of his eighteenth birthday. If he had been abused during his period in Williamson House before he moved from there to Kincora in the summer of 1975 we would have expected him to have said so in that statement. In the same statement he did refer to an occasion aged fifteen when he was picked up by a man on the Springfield Road who took him to his house and put his hand on the inside of his leg. Given that by the time he made the statement in 1982, Richard Kerr was 21 and said in the statement that he continued to have casual sexual affairs in London and had described being the subject of anal sex with two different individuals after he was released from Borstal, it should not have embarrassed him to have discussed sexual matters relating to Williamson House. As we have already pointed out, he had made other allegations about sexual activity in Williamson House when he was interviewed in 1980 by the RUC.

223 Richard Kerr's medical records contain no reference to his being referred to Dr Fraser. His social services records show that after some months of disturbed behaviour in Williamson House, on 5 March 1975 he was referred to Dr Barcroft at the Child Guidance Clinic of Belfast's Royal Victoria Hospital.[159] Dr Barcroft attended a case conference at Williamson House on 6 May 1975.[160] The Inquiry requested that the Education Authority be contacted to see whether it held Richard Kerr's school records in case these would show if he was referred for psychiatric care by the school but we have been informed all his school records were routinely destroyed some years ago.[161]

224 He was examined by an educational psychologist in 1967 when he was living in Williamson House before he attended Harberton Special School.[162] It may well be that while he was living in Williamson House Richard Kerr was examined from time to time by an educational psychologist whilst he was attending Harberton Special School. In her report of 30 January 1979 his then social worker, Mrs Kennedy, noted "the last educational

159 KIN 119639 and 119653.
160 KIN 119726.
161 KIN 119736.
162 KIN 119633.

assessment of [Richard Kerr] was made in 1977 and concluded that he was capable of holding down a job".[163] This implies that he was assessed on more than one occasion. Following his reaching the school leaving age of sixteen in May 1977, on 18 July 1977 the Belfast Education and Library Board sent a pro-forma letter to Kincora stating that it intended to notify the [Eastern] Health and Social Services Board that it was in Richard Kerr's interest that "further care, treatment or supervision should be provided". The notice stated that amongst the advice received was that of the Senior Schools Psychologist.[164]

225 All of the available evidence suggests that Richard Kerr is mistaken in his belief that he was seen by Dr Fraser.

226 We have also considered the implication that Dr Fraser was in some way responsible for Richard Kerr being moved from Williamson House to Kincora when he was fourteen. That would have been in 1975. There is no evidence to suggest that Dr Fraser had any responsibility for, or involvement in, the decision that Richard Kerr be moved. Decisions as to whether a child in care in one institution should be moved to live in another institution were made by social services. In Richard Kerr's case it appears that the decision was approved by the District Social Services Officer.[165]

Richard Kerr and William McGrath

227 In his police statement of 25 February 1980 Richard Kerr stated that he looked up to and respected Mains, saying that "He did not touch me or say anything to me which would have suggested anything of a homosexual nature". He then said that McGrath "was known as a homosexual. Boys in the hostel had told me that he had tried it on them". He also said:

> "McGrath used to play around with me by pulling my jumper and wrestling with me. He would pull me close to him, his front to my back and press his belly up against me. It wasn't normal wrestling and I knew he was enjoying it in a homosexual way. The boys used to tell me that McGrath put his hands round their private parts. ...the boys told me that [Mains] had been told".[166]

163 KIN 117683.
164 KIN 119512.
165 KIN 12027.
166 KIN 10195.

However, in the judicial review affidavit of February 2015 he said that:

> "William McGrath began to fool with me (sexually abuse me), in the bath tub. I eventually told him to back off and I told Joe Mains about it and he stopped after that".[167]

This account is significantly different from his earlier account of McGrath's behaviour in his 1980 police statement.

Review of Richard Kerr's various accounts of his experiences

228 We have considered the information available to us in some detail because of the relevance of this information to the assertions that Richard Kerr has made in recent years about his experiences as a child in care, assertions which have not been confined to his time in Kincora. These assertions can be summarised by saying that he was abused by Dr Fraser during a hospital visit while he was resident in Williamson House, and that Dr Fraser was in some way instrumental in Richard Kerr being sent to Kincora when he was aged fourteen. He alleges that he was abused in Williamson House before he was moved to Kincora. During his time as a resident in Kincora he was abused there, and was taken to hotels where he was subjected to sexual abuse by various men. On other occasions he was collected from Kincora by various men. Eventually he was "trafficked" to London and sexually exploited there. It is clear from the various accounts that Richard Kerr has given in recent years, to which we have referred, that he asserts that not only was he sexually abused by Mains and McGrath in Kincora, but he was taken to other locations to be sexually exploited by homosexual men.

229 We should make it clear that the Terms of Reference of our Inquiry do not extend to what may have occurred when Richard Kerr was living in London or elsewhere, and we express no view on what he has said about his experiences in London or elsewhere, other than in respect of his move to Preston. If his allegations about his experiences in London or other parts of England are to be investigated that will be a matter for the Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse (the IICSA). As we have stated earlier, Richard Kerr was offered the opportunity to be a core participant in this Inquiry and was awarded legal representation to enable him to do so. His legal representatives were provided with over 700 pages of documents relating to him. He did not provide the Inquiry with a statement, nor did he come to Northern Ireland. We have therefore had to assess his assertions on the basis of the material we have considered without having the benefit of whatever he might say to the Inquiry about these matters.

167 KIN 119502.

230 Based on our examination of the material to which we have referred we have reached the following conclusions:

(1) There is no evidence to support his assertion that he was ever examined by Dr Morris Fraser.

(2) There is no evidence to support his assertion that Dr Fraser played any part whatsoever in his move from Williamson House to Kincora.

(3) His assertions many years later that he was abused in Williamson House before he was transferred to Kincora contradict the reference he made in his RUC statement in 1980 when he referred to his time in Williamson House. It also contradicts his explicit statement to the RUC in 1980 that:

> "Before I left Northern Ireland and during the time I was in homes and other institutions I did not make any complaints about indecent behaviour by anyone to any members of the Welfare. There were no complaints to make". (emphasis added)[168]

This was one of the things that he confirmed in his statement to the Sussex Police in 1982 were true.[169]

(4) There is no evidence to support his claim that he was "trafficked to London" aged seventeen. The irrefutable evidence examined by us is that from 4 October 1977 until February 1979, except for the few days between 21 October and 7 November when he was on bail before being remanded back into custody when he stole from Semple, he was in secure custody in Rathgael Training School, and then in Millisle Borstal. He left Northern Ireland in mid-May 1979 when he reached the age of eighteen and was automatically discharged from care. He then made the decision to go and live with his aunt in Preston. After a few months living in Preston he formed a homosexual relationship with a man there and in October 1982 he told the Sussex Police he lived with this man for two years. By the time Richard Kerr made that statement he was living in London, so that timeframe would suggest he stayed in Preston until some time in mid or late 1981, more than two years after he left Northern Ireland.

168 KIN 10196.
169 KIN 40796.

(5) The decision that he should leave Northern Ireland in May 1979 and go to Preston to live with his aunt was clearly his own decision. That possibility had been floated while he was on remand in 1977. Between his release from Borstal in February until he went to Preston in May social services found it extremely difficult to cope with him. By the time he went to Preston he was eighteen and there was nothing unusual about his being given his fare by his social worker to enable him to get to Preston. On 20 March 1979 the Assistant Chief Probation Officer commented in his response to the letter of 14 March from the District Social Service Officer to which we have already referred which outlined the difficulties caused by Richard Kerr's behaviour. He said:

> "No doubt, however, this young man will continue to be a headache for the Community and for agencies charged with his care and control. I would like to think we could contain him in the Community for a few more months even if a return to Borstal in the end proved inevitable".[170]

(6) As it transpired, Richard Kerr did not end up in Borstal again, but went of his own volition to live with his aunt in Preston.

(7) Although in 1980 he described McGrath's behaviour in a fashion that clearly had sexual overtones, he explicitly exonerated Mains from making any sexual approach to him. He confirmed this in his account to the Sussex Police in 1982. By then both Mains and McGrath had been imprisoned for sexual offences against residents in Kincora. It is therefore difficult to understand why Richard Kerr did not then make the allegations against them that he has since made more than thirty years after the event in his judicial review affidavit.

(8) We are satisfied that Richard Kerr was emotionally very close to Mains, and regarded him as a father figure. However, by 1982, Mains had been exposed as a sexual predator. Given that in 1982 Richard Kerr had described to the police how he was anally penetrated by both Edmonds and Witchell, that he had lived with a man in a homosexual relationship for two years in Preston, and continued to have casual homosexual encounters in London. We consider it highly unlikely that he did not mention this matter because of embarrassment.

170 KIN 11080.

(9) Richard Kerr has also said that men came on various occasions to collect him from Kincora, that he was taken to the Park Avenue Hotel and to other hotels where he had sex with men. He has said that Mains took him to Portrush for this purpose on one occasion. He also described engaging in sexual activity with male guests in the Europa Hotel when he worked there. There is ample contemporary evidence in the material to which we have referred that he was associating with undesirable individuals, such as KIN 340 and KIN 341. At the least those two individuals were taking advantage of the surprising amount of money Richard Kerr had. When he was living in Williamson House the staff were clearly concerned that he was being paid for sex and that that accounted for his having a lot of money.

(10) As he told the police in 1980 he was drinking with KIN 340 and KIN 341 on their car trips to hotels. DC Scully found him the worse for wear from drink on 4 October 1977 when he came to question him about the burglaries. After his release from Borstal he came back drunk to Williamson House on several occasions.

(11) The picture that emerges from the contemporary information of Richard Kerr's life between 1977 and 1979 is that he was a highly vulnerable young man who was easily led and who craved attention. He was associating with older men outside Kincora who provided him with drink, and with other men who exploited his vulnerability to persuade him to agree to homosexual activity with them. Whilst this activity may have been consensual, it was nevertheless exploitive, abusive and illegal. There is nothing whatever to show that such behaviour was occurring in Kincora, or that Mains was arranging, or conniving at, sexual exploitation which appears to have been happening elsewhere.

(12) Richard Kerr appears to base his statement to the police that the security services or others were involved in his abuse on two matters. The first is that as a school boy he returned early to Kincora one day, walked into Mains's office and found Mains and Semple with "three men in suits". He said he got the strong feeling he "had interrupted something secret and important, I would describe them as being shocked to see me".[171] He does not say that any of the three men spoke. As we shall see in the next chapter and as has already been confirmed by many of the other residents, officials from social services regularly visited Kincora during his time there. No doubt others did so in plain clothes, such as DC Scully. Any reputable visitor would have been surprised at a school boy entering the office and interrupting their business in that fashion. To infer from his description that he interrupted something improper is to place a sinister construction on the occasion without a shred of evidence to justify it.

(13) Up to and including his affidavit of February 2015 the only individuals Richard Kerr named as having performed any sexual acts on him were McGrath, Edmonds and Witchell. On the Exaro website in March 2015 he was reported to have picked out three individuals who, it was claimed, "sexually abused him while he was a Kincora boy". As he was only in Kincora between the ages of fourteen and seventeen this allegation can only relate to the period between his arrival at Kincora in July 1975 until he went into custody in November 1977. So far as we are aware, Richard Kerr has provided no evidence to support the allegations against the three men.

(14) One of the three men he named was the late Sir Cyril Smith, who was MP for Rochdale between 1972 and 1992. Sir Cyril Smith died in 2010, and since then allegations have been made that he was involved in the sexual abuse of children. On 27 November 2012 the Crown Prosecution Service in England and Wales stated that although investigations into allegations against Smith were undertaken in 1970, 1988 and 1999, he was not charged. The IICSA is investigating allegations relating to Sir Cyril Smith and it would be inappropriate for this Inquiry to make any comment on the allegations relating to him in England or Wales. None of the material this Inquiry has seen supports the apparent assertion made by Richard Kerr that he went to Manchester while he was a resident in Kincora between 1975 and 1977.

171 KIN 119504.

(15) Other than trips with the Boys' Brigade to camps at Bridlington in Yorkshire in June 1973 when he was twelve,[172] and to Southport in Lancashire in 1974 when he was thirteen, there are no records of any trips to Manchester or London, nor to his absconding for periods that would have enabled him to go to either place.

(16) Richard Kerr claims to have seen Sir Maurice Oldfield in Mains's office when he walked into a meeting. It is unclear whether this is the occasion already referred to when Richard Kerr says he entered Mains office to find Mains and Semple with three men in suits. We shall refer to Sir Maurice Oldfield in our chapter on the security services; it is sufficient to say at this stage that if there was such an episode involving Sir Maurice Oldfield, Richard Kerr did not identify him in his affidavit sworn in February 2015.

231 Richard Kerr's recent accounts of his experiences in Williamson House and Kincora are very substantially different from the detailed accounts he gave in the past. When these recent accounts are compared with the accounts he gave in the 1970s and 1980s, and with other documents from that era, a very different picture emerges from that which he now portrays. Having carefully examined all the material available to us we are satisfied that his more recent accounts are not to be relied upon.

232 We are satisfied that Mr Kerr was sexually exploited and abused as a boy and young man and are in no doubt that this had an adverse impact on his life. However, we cannot set aside or ignore the inconsistencies in his accounts of the abuse he said he suffered.

PART EIGHT

R 14

233 We now return to consider other aspect of the evidence given by R 14 as we said earlier that we would do. There are a number of matters which we will consider at this point. Before doing so, we record that McGrath pleaded guilty to one charge of buggery, one charge of indecent assault and one charge of gross indecency with R 14. There is therefore no doubt that R 14 was subjected to sexual abuse by McGrath.

172 KIN 119729.

234 R 14 discussed his experiences with the journalist Chris Moore, and appears as "Sammy", in chapter eight of Moore's book 'The Kincora Scandal'. R 14 told the Inquiry that he did not say to Moore, or if he did it was not true, that he had told a social worker about what had happened but she just laughed. He told us that he did not tell the social worker what had happened, nor was there an incident when the social worker called him in after raising his allegations with Mains and McGrath when McGrath called him a liar in front of the social worker, nor did Mains turn his back on him.[173]

235 Another matter relates to R 14's account to the Inquiry that McGrath put a gun in his mouth during one of his last sexual assaults upon him. He did not mention the gun incident to the police, nor did he mention the gun to Chris Moore who recorded him as saying that he was never aware of McGrath having a gun. When he gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry he was legally represented and his own counsel asked him whether McGrath had threatened him in any way and he did not make any mention of the gun.

236 Finally, in his Inquiry statement he described another incident when he said Mains took him and two or three other boys to Bangor in the Kincora minibus. He said that Mains told them, "You're going to do what your told here". The other boys were sent in one by one, and when they came back they were crying. Before he could be sent into the hotel a police landrover pulled up nearby, and they were then taken back to Kincora. The clear implication is that this party of boys were taken to a hotel in Bangor by Mains for the purpose of, and were subjected to, sexual abuse. R 14 was not able to say why he never mentioned this episode to the police when he made his statement in 1980. He told us that he now believes the boys were abused in the hotel based upon what he heard years afterwards.[174]

237 We find it difficult to understand how R 14 did not tell the police about any of these three occasions when he gave his statements in 1980. They were all dramatic and plainly relevant to the police enquiries, notably the reference to his telling the social worker who then confronted Mains and McGrath with the allegations, allegations which were subsequently confirmed by McGrath's pleas of guilty to the offences against him.

173 Day 210, pp.32 to 34.
174 Day 210, pp.15 and 16.

The post-2000 allegations

238 The various allegations that have been made in recent years by those whose evidence we have examined in this section of this chapter are almost all materially different from the accounts they have given in the past. Where those accounts can be compared with contemporary records they are contradicted by those records. Some of the episodes described do not ring true, others are significantly different from the patterns of abuse described by many other residents. Taking all these matters into consideration we have come to the conclusion that we cannot regard the post-2000 accounts to which we have referred as sufficiently reliable to enable us to take them into account when reaching our conclusions about the way in which the residents were abused in Kincora.

Chapter 27:

Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Home

PART FIVE

PART SIX

PART SEVEN

PART EIGHT

PART NINE

PART TEN

PART ELEVEN

PART ONE

The Role of Social Services and the Police

1 In this Chapter we focus on the role of the Belfast Welfare Authority and its successor the Eastern Health and Social Services Board (EHSSB) in setting up, staffing and running the Kincora Boys' Hostel, as well as their roles in investigating complaints of sexual abuse of the boys who were resident in Kincora. As part of that process we examine the history of the hostel, the philosophy behind it during the 22 years of its operation, the way it was staffed and run, and the extent to which it was inspected by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) and its successor the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS).

2 The way in which several complaints were dealt with by the Belfast Welfare Authority in 1967 and 1971, and by the EHSSB and the RUC on a number of other occasions during the 1970s, are closely interlinked. It therefore seemed sensible to consider all of these issues together. Although it will be necessary to make some reference to the role of the RUC Special Branch when examining the material relating to the RUC, because of the complex relationship between the RUC Special Branch and the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), or MI6 as it is commonly called, the Security Service or MI5, British Army Intelligence, the Ministry of Defence, the Northern Ireland Office, and the Cabinet Office, it will be necessary to examine the actions of the RUC Special Branch in greater detail in the next chapter as well, and to that extent there will necessarily be some overlap between the two chapters.

The Hughes Inquiry

3 As we explained in a previous chapter, a committee under the chairmanship of His Honour William Hughes was set up in 1984 to examine allegations of sexual abuse of residents in a number of children's homes in Northern Ireland. Those Terms of Reference were somewhat different to ours. Nevertheless, the Hughes Inquiry thoroughly and comprehensively examined many of the issues relating to Kincora, and, as will become apparent, we have made considerable use of those parts of the transcripts of the relevant 60 days of public hearings of the Hughes Inquiry containing the evidence of witnesses which related to Kincora, as well as drawing heavily on those parts of the Hughes Inquiry Report dealing with Kincora.

4 More than thirty years have elapsed since the Hughes Inquiry. Many of the individuals who gave evidence to that Inquiry and whose evidence is relevant to Kincora are no longer alive, or were unfit to give evidence to us. In any event, the recollections of the witnesses to events in the 1960s and 1970s may be expected to be better when they gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry than they would be now. The evidence of witnesses to the Hughes Inquiry was in many cases subjected to vigorous cross examination, and so the transcripts of their evidence provide an extremely valuable source of information on many matters. This is subject to the qualification that a 'cold' transcript cannot completely convey those nuances that may be gleaned from the demeanour of the witness while giving evidence, such as firmness of recollection or uncertainty, evasiveness, or the transparent conviction of a witness trying to do their honest best, to name only some considerations.

5 Although the analogy between this Inquiry and an appeal court sitting in an appeal from a judge conducting a trial without a jury is not an exact one in many respects, our approach to the evidence given to the Hughes Inquiry, and to its factual findings and the conclusions based on those findings as contained in its Report, has been to follow the approach of an appeal court to the findings of a trial judge sitting without a jury. Lord Lowry, then the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, in giving the decision of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland in the case of Northern Ireland Railway Company v Tweed [1982] 15 Northern Ireland Judgement Bulletin at pages 10-11 gave an authoritative exposition of the relevant law and principles.

6 Adapting Lord Lowry's principles to the position of this Inquiry when considering the evidence given to, and the Report of, the Hughes Inquiry we have applied the following principles:

(1) The findings of the Hughes Inquiry on primary facts should rarely be departed from by this Inquiry if there is evidence to support those findings. This principle applies strongly to assessments of credibility, accuracy, powers of observation, memory and general reliability of the witnesses.

(2) This Inquiry is in as good a position as the Hughes Inquiry to draw inferences from documents and from facts which are clear, but even here must give weight to the conclusions of the Hughes Inquiry.

(3) This Inquiry can more readily depart from the findings of fact and conclusions of the Hughes Report if the Hughes Inquiry misunderstood or misused the facts, and may thereby have reached a wrong conclusion.

(4) This Inquiry should not resort to conjecture or to its own estimate of the probabilities of a balanced situation as a means of rejecting the conclusions of the Hughes Inquiry on a disputed matter.

Ages of residents in Kincora

7 Kincora Boys' Hostel was opened by Belfast Welfare Authority on 6 May 1958, and until it finally closed in October 1980, 370 young people resided in Kincora.[1] As the name 'hostel' implied, Kincora was not a children's home. As a report of 28 February 1958 by the Belfast City Welfare Officer explained, it was intended from the outset to be:

> "a hostel used to provide accommodation for boys over school age and particularly those who it has not been possible to Board out [that is to foster] i.e. those who may have a parent who wishes to visit, and any that are difficult socially".

8 It was recognised from the outset that whilst the boys would normally pass out of care when they reached the age of eighteen:

> "It may be necessary to permit some to remain in the hostel until they are 21. In those circumstances, the necessary approval will be sought from the Ministry of Home Affairs".[2]

This reflected the requirements of S. 96 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, and its successor, S.121 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968. That Kincora was a hostel for boys and not a children's home was, as Mr Bunting pointed out when he gave evidence to this Inquiry, emphasised by the title of "warden" given to the officer in charge, something that was, "more like a youth hostel term". [3]

9 The school leaving age was fifteen in 1958, and was raised to sixteen in 1973. This meant that between 1958 and April 1973 the hostel was intended for boys who were over fifteen and under 21, and from 1973 to 1980 between the ages of sixteen and 21. However, as the City

1 KIN 1086.
2 KIN 1129.
3 Day 218, pp.87 and 88.

Welfare Officer explained in 1958, "boys would normally pass out of care on reaching the age of eighteen years"; in practice the older males in Kincora at any given time were up to eighteen years old. Therefore the position was anticipated as being that between 1958 and 1973 the residents would be between fifteen and eighteen years of age, and from 1973 to 1980 between sixteen and eighteen years of age. However, it was frequently the case that boys under school age were resident in Kincora, sometimes for lengthy periods.

10 As part of its closing submissions after the completion of the public hearings into Kincora the HSCB carried out an analysis of the Kincora admissions register.[4] The HSCB concluded that between 1958 and 1973:

> "The vast majority of admissions were for boys over fifteen, which was the relevant age for compulsory school age at that time. Admission of boys under fifteen were, in the main, of a short-term nature with long-term admissions of boys aged under fifteen relating to those that [were] aged fourteen years six months or older". (Emphasis added)[5]

Dealing with the position after the raising of the compulsory school age to sixteen in April 1973 the HSCB observed that:

> "The change seen, however, is that the majority of admissions to the Hostel were now made up of admissions of boys aged under compulsory school age".[6]

11 Although these statements are correct as far as they go, in our view they do not address the reality that throughout its existence an unacceptable number of boys were resident in Kincora when they were too young and were there for too long. This can be demonstrated by the histories of four boys under fifteen who were admitted between 1960 and 1967 considered at 4.12 of the HSCB submissions. For example, HIA 199 was only fourteen and two months when admitted to Kincora in February 1960. He remained there for fifteen and a half months until June 1961, so for ten months of that period he was well under the minimum age at which he should have been admitted. HIA 199 was subsequently readmitted on other occasions. Others were also admitted who were aged up to fourteen and four months of age, and whose subsequent stays until they passed the age of fifteen ranged from six months in the case of KIN 24, to eight months in the cases of KIN 136 and KIN 127, and ten months in the case of KIN 2.

4 KIN 143205-143216.
5 KIN 143149.
6 KIN 143151.

12 There were also a significant number of children who were well under the age of fifteen when they were admitted, even though they were only admitted for a few nights.[7] For example one child aged thirteen and two months was admitted for three nights, and in September 1968 a boy aged ten and eleven months was admitted with his brother aged nine and ten months for six nights whilst their mother was in hospital.[8] In 1975, of a total of twelve boys admitted that year, six were under sixteen. Three of the six were brothers, two of whom were aged nine, and the third was aged ten and ten months. These three boys were in Kincora for eleven nights before being discharged to Corrymeela.[9] This pattern continued. In 1977, out of thirteen admissions, eleven were under sixteen, including three brothers aged eleven, twelve and thirteen and a half.[10] In 1978, of twelve admissions, seven were under sixteen, and of those, three were under fifteen; one of the three was only fourteen and three months on the date of his admission.[11] In 1979 six out of eight admissions were under sixteen and one who was fourteen and three months remained in Kincora for almost three months.[12] The last boy to be admitted to the home was thirteen and five months old when he was admitted in January 1980.

13 Whilst many of those were just under "the cusp" of fifteen, or sixteen when the school leaving age was raised, throughout Kincora's existence there was a consistent pattern of the admission of young boys who were well under school leaving age, even if in many cases those boys only spent a few nights in Kincora. Whilst the onset of severe civil unrest, and subsequent community violence and terrorism after October 1968 undoubtedly placed severe strains on social services, the practice of placing young boys in Kincora pre-dated 1968 and was to become more pronounced in the late 1970s. Whilst the intention was that this was something to be avoided if at all possible, and only resorted to in the

7 KIN 143209.
8 KIN 143210.
9 KIN 143213.
10 KIN 143214.
11 KIN 143215.
12 KIN 14216.

most exceptional circumstances, in practice that was ignored on many occasions. In our opinion that should not have happened as frequently as it did, and the absence of contemporary comment, or steps being taken to prevent it happening, suggest that in practice it was accepted as a necessary evil.

14 As the HSCB recognised, the facilities at Kincora were not designed for young children. Mr Bunting, who was Children's Officer in the Belfast Welfare Authority, accepted when he gave evidence on Day 218 that children's officers would have been aware that younger children had to be accommodated in the hostels, usually in an emergency and on a short-stay basis because of the inadequacy of the residential provision, particularly for Protestant children during the 1950s and the 1960s. He also made the point that there was an increased demand for residential care in the EHSSB area, which extended into the 1980s.[13]

15 Whist we recognise that it would not have been possible to completely avoid placing young boys in Kincora in emergencies for very short periods of time, this should always have been regarded as something that should never have lasted for more than two or three days at most, because Kincora was not a children's home. It had no recreational activities for young children other than watching television; the staff were not trained or experienced in looking after young children; and, most important of all, this was an environment for young men who were working and approaching manhood. It was therefore a completely unsuitable environment for young children, with the risk of bullying and introducing younger boys to undesirable habits such as drinking and smoking, not to mention the risks of peer sexual abuse that we have referred to in the previous chapter.

16 In later years it also seems to have been the position that a practice developed of placing boys in Kincora who were disturbed and could not be placed elsewhere, such as Richard Kerr whose accounts of life in Kincora we considered in the previous chapter. There were clearly no grounds for moving boys presenting difficult behaviour in other homes to Kincora because of better staffing levels or better trained staff, and it is possible that social workers felt that the boys' patterns of behaviour were more suited to an older peer group, where the other residents would be more capable of coping with the situation than the younger children in the other homes. On occasions, children were placed there because more suitable accommodation was unavailable, as when places at the Palmerston Assessment Centre were unavailable. Whilst some of these problems may have been exacerbated by the dramatic increase in demand due to the civil unrest in Belfast and surrounding areas, that the problems persisted led us to conclude that there was a systemic failing because of a lack of a strategic, co-ordinated overview of the problem.

13 Day 218, pp. 88 and 89.

Staffing numbers and accommodation

17 It is axiomatic that a hostel or children's home must have sufficient staff to enable it to meet the requirements of the institution. The issues of the number of staff, and the quality of staff, are interrelated to a considerable degree, but before we consider these complex matters, it is necessary to examine what was contained in the concept of the Kincora Hostel for Working Boys, and the term working boys includes those who were trying to get work.

18 Although the number of boys in Kincora fluctuated slightly, with as many as thirteen in the hostel in October 1964,[14] until the use of attic accommodation was discontinued the hostel normally accommodated eleven residents, and this was reduced to nine once the attic was taken out of use. The building is a Victorian, detached structure with two floors and an attic; the attic being reached by a narrow, steep, staircase from the first floor landing. The attic contained two rooms which seem to have been used as sleeping accommodation in the early years of the hostel. When the hostel was opened, a contemporary newspaper report said that it had accommodation for nine residents, the sitting room for general use, and an additional reading and study room.[15] A sketch of the floor plan for each part of the building which seems to have been prepared during the Caskey Phase One investigation in 1980 shows that by that time there were three rooms on the first floor each described as a 'dormitory', one bedroom, two bathrooms and a toilet. On the ground floor there was a third bathroom and a second toilet, and a fourth bedroom. At the front of the house there was an office, a kitchen, a dining room and another large room which, together with the dining room, opened off the hall and faced the Upper Newtownards

14 KIN 140533.
15 KIN 1118.

Road. In 1967 a single-storey extension had been added at the rear of the building containing a bedroom and an office. The bedroom was occupied by Mains, but until the extension was built Mains occupied a room on the first floor where he shared the toilet and washing facilities with the boys.

19 As well as being responsible for the control and management of the hostel, attending to the general welfare of the boys living in the hostel, and carrying out any other duties required of him from time to time, the warden had four other specific duties contained in the conditions of appointment which are worthy of mention:

> "(c) To make contacts with reputable industrial firms, which afford opportunities for apprenticeships.
>
> (d) To encourage the boys to have savings accounts.
>
> (e) To encourage the boys to attend evening classes pertaining to their trade.
>
> (f) To encourage the boys to develop any handy craft abilities in their leisure time".[16]

20 The conditions of appointment stipulated that remuneration included full board, lodging and laundry free of charge, with an entitlement to 21 days annual leave (including statutory holidays). In particular they stated that:

> "The position is a full time one and the person appointed shall devote his entire time to the duties of the office. The hours of duty will be a 96 hour fortnight (exclusive of meal times)."

Given that the only other member of staff for the first four years of Kincora's existence was a cook, this meant that in practical terms Mains could never have any time off. It seems that, apart from a period of approximately six weeks in September of 1958 when he was ill,[17] or was absent in December 1960 for two weeks when he was on annual leave and when a gardener/handyman was seconded to cover his duties,[18] he was on duty all the time.

16 KIN 1146 and 1147.
17 KIN 140016.
18 KIN 140318.

21 It was not until March 1962 that a second member of the care staff was appointed as assistant warden, but he only remained in post until late October that year. A replacement was not secured until July 1963, and he only remained in post until the end of May 1964. Semple was then appointed as assistant warden and served in that capacity from September 1964 until he resigned in February 1966. Some assistance was given between May and September 1966 for up to twenty hours a week. It was not until Semple was re-appointed as assistant warden in June 1969 that the post was filled, having been unsuccessfully advertised on five occasions in 1968.

22 The lengthy periods when there was no assistant warden to help Mains resulted in the Welfare Committee being given permission by the Ministry of Home Affairs to make two payments, one of £100 in July 1968 and one of £125 in May 1969, in recognition of the, "additional responsibility and hours worked", and his inability to take leave, "owing to the post of assistant warden being vacant the greater part of the last few years". Given that for the first period of 1968 the Welfare Authority did not have to pay £825 in salary for the vacant post, an honorarium of £100 was hardly generous when:

> "He has had to be available on duty each day [i.e. 7 days a week every week] for the whole of twenty months. Consequently, he has not only been working under a considerable strain, but has had to give service considerably in excess off what would normally be expected".[19]

23 In 1971 it was recognised that the complement of two care staff was insufficient, and McGrath took up employment at Kincora as a house-father. Thereafter the care staff complement remained with Mains as the officer in charge, with Semple as his assistant, and McGrath as a house-father until all three were suspended on 4 March 1980.

24 In addition to the cook who was continuously employed at Kincora throughout its existence, a second domestic member of staff was added in November 1966, and she remained in post until the hostel closed. She initially worked from 7.00am until 12.30pm, although her hours were reduced to 8.00am to 12 noon after McGrath was appointed. Some two years later she reverted to her previous hours, and resumed the practice of waking the boys as she had done before, in addition to her main cleaning and laundry duties.[20]

19 KIN 1158.
20 KIN 143157.

25 In its written submission the HSCB accepted that the staffing establishment in Kincora between March 1958 and December 1961, "was unacceptably low".[21] It recognised that, as Fionnula McAndrew said:

> "there were enormous challenges in terms of recruiting and getting staff for the hostel. Clearly it is not a satisfactory position that you have somebody who is working alone with a group of boys..."[22]

26 The whole issue of staffing numbers in homes and hostels is complex, but in our view there were serious deficiencies in the care staff complement at Kincora throughout its existence, and not just between March 1958 and December 1961. If Kincora was intended to provide accommodation akin to someone being in lodgings, making their own meals and doing their own laundry, with a staff member present to support after-care, then appointing only one member of staff as warden would be understandable. Such a person would not be expected to remain on the premises all the time, and the boys would essentially be living independently.

27 As we have already seen, the warden was expected to be on duty for long hours, and to perform various administrative and other tasks such as helping the boys to find work, tasks that cumulatively required a considerable period of time. In addition (a) a significant proportion of the boys at various times were of school age, (b) some were moved there because children's home staff could not cope with them, (c) they were in dormitories, rather than having independent flats, (d) they were provided with pocket money, food and laundry, such that Kincora was essentially run as if it was a children's home, and (e) it was run in accordance with the Children's Home Regulations.

28 From the very beginning Kincora represented a hybrid model of institution, and as such it needed a higher level of staffing from the start. In England the Castle Priory Report in 1969 gave worked examples for a 12-bed working boys' or girls' hostel, and suggested two levels of staffing, depending on whether a ratio of one member of staff to every five residents was applied, or one to six. They also provided examples for both a 40-hour working week and a 45-hour week. We have applied the more generous 40-hour week and the less generous ratio of 1:6 to the circumstances of Kincora.

21 KIN 143158.
22 Day 215, p.161.

29 In our view, for Kincora with nine beds and staff working a 40-hour week, the necessary staffing applying the Castle Priory recommendations would amount to the following:

Head and deputy	1.50 posts providing 60 hours per week
Day time weekday office cover	0.75 post providing 30 hours per week
Weekend care cover 2 days x 18 hours x 1.5 staff)	1.35 posts providing 54 hours per week
Weekday care cover 5 days x 12 hours x 1.5 staff)	2.25 posts providing 90 hours per week
Holiday Relief	0.40 post providing 16 hours per week
Total	6.25 posts providing 250 hours per week

We consider these figures to be reasonable, especially if they were offset by reducing some of the domestic hours.

30 Our view is that the staffing level when Kincora was opened in 1958 was grossly inadequate, and the appointment of a deputy warden in March 1962, although welcome, meant that the staffing level was still woefully insufficient. When McGrath was appointed as a house-father in 1971, the staffing cover became more realistic, but still fell short of the level required. Had the Castle Priory recommendations been applied, the establishment required was 6.25 full-time equivalents, which might have been offset by some reduction in ancillary staff. The significance of the inadequate number of staff was that it placed undue stress on individual members of staff, and created a set of circumstances that permitted those who wished to abuse boys to work for long periods as the sole member of staff on duty without the likelihood that they would be observed or disturbed.

31 In arriving at these conclusions we have not overlooked that Bob Bunting said that Castle Priory recommendations for a Group 3 home were met, however, as Kincora was re-graded to Group 2 and it was a hostel, rather than a home, its staffing did not meet Castle Priory levels. It appears that the DHSS issued staffing guidelines in April 1974 to the effect that one member of staff was required for every 3.5 young people in a hostel.[23] This would only have resulted in a staffing establishment of 2.6 staff, but assuming that Kincora was serving nine young people at this time, and the numbers at times exceeded that, this was still inadequate because it was lower than the Castle Priory standards. Irrespective of the Castle Priory recommendations we consider that there should have been at least three care staff provided for at Kincora from its inception. The failure to provide adequate care staff represented a systemic failing.

23 KIN 199.

32 The result of the wholly inadequate staffing was that Mains worked for very long periods of time without any relief. Indeed on one occasion he was reprimanded for not being on duty on one day. Working at that pressure and without the opportunity for rest and recreation increases the risk of inappropriate behaviour on the part of staff, such as excessive drinking and seeking emotional or sexual solace from the boys. Even when the complement did increase to three, we consider that it was still inadequate. The way it was operated in practice meant that often there was only one adult male in the building at a time, and this meant that the opportunity for abuse was greatly increased. As the evidence of the residents we examined in the previous chapter showed, this was something that McGrath was able to exploit in his abuse of the boys in Kincora.

PART TWO

Qualifications of care staff

33 Semple and McGrath did not have any formal childcare experience or training when they were appointed to their posts of assistant warden and house-father in 1964 and 1971 respectively. This was commonly, indeed predominantly, the case throughout the United Kingdom in the 1960s. Although the standards of professionalism were improving, particularly in the late 1960s and early 1970s, as late as the early 1970s it was still often the case that care staff such as house parents lacked any formal qualifications or previous experience when they were appointed. The hours for such staff were very long and the remuneration low, and as a result there was a high turnover of staff. Social workers who had, or acquired, professional qualifications often left residential childcare for field social work where the hours were shorter and remuneration better. We have referred to many such examples of unqualified staff in other institutions we have examined elsewhere in our Report, and it was only as a result of the recommendations of the Hughes Report that the overall level of qualified staff in Northern Ireland was improved. This meant that where there had been fewer professionally qualified staff in residential childcare in Northern Ireland before the 1980s than the rest of the United Kingdom, after the Hughes Report the proportion of professional staff in residential childcare in Northern Ireland became higher than elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Joseph Mains

34 When Mains applied for the position of warden in 1958 the conditions of employment required candidates to have:

> "Suitable working knowledge of the running of a children's home and preference will be given to a person having had experience in the care of boys in the age group 14-21 years".[24]

Of the four candidates for the post, two did not meet that criterion,[25] whereas Mains and the remaining candidate did. Mains was 28 and had been a male nurse at Purdysburn Hospital for seven years before he was appointed resident warden at Park Lodge Boys' Home for fourteen months until February 1957. When Park Lodge closed, Mains was transferred to work in an old people's home, and worked there for a further nine months until appointed warden of Kincora.[26] The Hughes Inquiry found nothing in his background that might have alerted either the Belfast Welfare Authority or the MoHA to possible homosexual tendencies on his part at that time. A MoHA inspector who knew him from his previous childcare work was complimentary in recommending his appointment to the Ministry. We do not consider that the decision to appoint Mains as warden can be criticised.

Raymond Semple

35 Semple applied for the post of resident assistant warden at Kincora when it became vacant in 1964. He was 42 and had worked as a store-man in the Harland and Wolff shipyard for seventeen years. He had no childcare experience, but had been an officer in the St John's Ambulance Brigade for fifteen years with Mains. Mains provided Semple with one of his two references, saying that he had:

> "Found [Semple] to be a man of good character, honest, reliable and indeed very keen on all aspects of youth work".

24 KIN 1146.
25 KIN 1145.
26 KIN 1140.

As the Hughes Inquiry said in its Report at 3.16[27] in retrospect:

> "It may just be possible to feel some uneasiness in the fact that Mr Mains and Mr Semple were single, were known to each other and that Mains acted as referee for Mr Semple in his application for a post involving the care of teenage boys."

We considered it poor practice that the recruitment processes were such that it was acceptable for Mr Mains to provide a reference for an applicant for a post for which he was the line manager. Nevertheless, we agree with the Hughes Inquiry when it said that it would not be realistic to suppose that these matters were suggestive of a pattern of homosexuality on the part of Mains and Semple in 1964. To do so would be acting with the advantage of hindsight, as would saying that because both were unmarried males working in a boys home, those facts alone should have raised a suspicion that both were, or might be, capable of sexually abusing boys in their care.

36 We now know that Mains pressured Semple into resigning as assistant warden in February 1966 because he knew of Semple's homosexual behaviour with R 1. That knowledge was not revealed by Mains to his superiors, who therefore had no reason to doubt the explanation Semple gave in his letter of resignation in 1966 that he had applied for a better-paid job which would enable him to assist his family more.[28] When he applied again for the post of assistant warden in May 1969, Semple explained in his application form that his elderly mother was not in good health at the time he resigned and was living alone.[29] When Semple was reappointed assistant warden in 1969, although he did not have a childcare qualification, he had working knowledge of the childcare requirements of the post from his previous experience working in Kincora. In his earlier employment he had also attended a two-week residential refresher course in Manchester University in 1967 on the emotional problems of adolescent boys.[30]

37 Mains concealed his knowledge of Semple's homosexual behaviour with boys in Kincora, and, at this time there were no known contemporary allegations against Semple. To all appearances he had been a satisfactory employee in the past, and he had shown his commitment to Kincora by doing some voluntary work there during the six months before his application in 1969.

27 KIN 75219.
28 KIN 1190.
29 KIN 1195.
30 KIN 1192.

38 By this time the Belfast Welfare Authority had been attempting to fill the assistant warden's position since January 1968. The post had been publicly advertised five times before a candidate was appointed, but the successful candidate failed to take up the post. As can be seen from a memorandum of 4 April 1969 giving brief details of the nineteen candidates considered in 1968, even after the salary was increased it was extremely difficult to attract suitable staff who were prepared to live in when required.[31] It is not unreasonable to infer that when Semple reapplied in 1969, and there was no apparent reason why he should not be reappointed, the Belfast Welfare Authority was relieved to find someone who they had reason to believe had been a suitable person in the past who was willing to take the job. In those circumstances, like the Hughes Inquiry, we consider there is no basis upon which to criticise the Belfast Welfare Authority for re-employing Semple in 1969.

The Appointment of William McGrath in 1971

39 In 1971 it was decided to augment the care staff at Kincora by appointing a house-father to assist the warden and the assistant warden. Unlike them the house-father was not required to do sleeping-in duties. At that time McGrath was working as a clerk in a firm of estate agents at a salary of £600 a year.[32] The House Parent Grade II position had a salary scale starting at £663, rising to £867 per annum, together with a further £219 per annum in place of "emoluments", (that is full board, lodging, light, fuel and laundry all provided free of charge),[33] although in due course the MoHA only approved his appointment at what was described as the "minimum point of MJC Asst House Parent Grade I scale".[34]

40 At that time McGrath was 54, married with three teenage children,[35] and the prospect of a significant increase in his income, together with the security which the position would involve, must have been very attractive to him. This would be particularly the case given the financial difficulties he was in following the dispute with Roy Garland to which we refer later. McGrath had no relevant qualifications or experience, but had favourable references from two ministers of religion, although, as

31 KIN 1175.
32 KIN 1209.
33 KIN 1215.
34 KIN 1221.
35 KIN 1209.

the Hughes Inquiry observed, those references were of limited value in determining his suitability for work in residential childcare.[36] As with Mains and Semple, there was nothing in his background that could have alerted the Belfast Welfare Authority to McGrath's predilection for homosexual abuse of adolescent boys.

41 We therefore agree with the Hughes Inquiry that at the time all three appointments were made, there was nothing to alert either the Belfast Welfare Authority as the prospective employer, or the MoHA whose approval was required for such appointments, to their homosexual and sexually abusive tendencies. Whilst we agree that it is regrettable that none had any formal childcare qualifications, and only Mains had any previous relevant childcare experience, as we have already pointed out these deficiencies were typical of many who worked in residential childcare at that time in Northern Ireland and in Great Britain. Pay levels for residential child care workers at this time were very low. Pay was negotiated nationally and there would have been limited discretion for welfare authorities in applying the national rates. The authority had attempted to improve the pay of Kincora staff by regrading the home, but the rates of pay would still have been lower than those of care staff in training schools. Yet the demands on Kincora staff were very similar to those of training school staff. There would have been some discretion in appointing staff higher on the incremental scales, but it may have been policy always to appoint on the lowest increment, as was the case with McGrath. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that there were difficulties recruiting staff to Kincora. We do not consider that the appointments of Mains, Semple and McGrath to their respective positions at Kincora involved any systemic failings on the part of either the Belfast Welfare Authority or the MoHA. However, later in this chapter we will consider the question of how it was that three homosexual abusers of young males came to occupy all three care staff positions in Kincora.

The Effectiveness of Kincora as a boys' hostel

42 We have already drawn attention to the requirement that the warden helped boys to find apprenticeships. It was clear that this was an important part of Mains's duties as warden, and one which the evidence before us suggests he took seriously. HIA 199, who was in Kincora between 1961 and 1963, appreciated that the purpose of Kincora "was to get us into the work environment...It was to ready you for what was ahead".[37] Mains seems to have gone to some lengths to find jobs for boys in Kincora to judge by the records he kept for HIA 199, although that may have been influenced to some extent at least by his sexual relationship with HIA 199 at that time. However, Dr Hilary Harrison, then Hilary Reid, was a frequent visitor to Kincora as a young and newly qualified social worker in the 1970s. She considered that this was a task that Mains performed very well. Her evidence was that some of these boys "were not the easiest to place in employment, Mains probably had more employment networks than social workers at the time".[38]

36 KIN 75220.

43 Dr Harrison's description of Kincora during Mains's stewardship was:

> "that it was a very efficiently run home with an officer in charge or superintendent who gave the impression of being extremely competent. He was very good at communicating with social workers in relation to what was happening with the boys in his care".

Despite Mains's lack of professional training, she described Mains as "extremely competent".[39]

Preparation for life after care

44 By the 1970s it was becoming apparent that Kincora, like many other residential institutions for children and young people, was not preparing them for independent living, with the result that when the children left the home, or the hostel in the case of Kincora, they were ill-equipped for the challenges brought by independent living. This was, in part at least, because they were being fed, their laundry was being done for them, and they did little, if anything, to help with household cleaning duties. This led the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) inspector to report on his visit in August 1979 that he doubted that there was any systematic instruction in Kincora of independent living skills and how to acquire a general capacity to cope with issues in daily living. He observed that, "If all or nearly all the domestic and social needs of the adolescent are being met by the adults around him, he is actually being taught to be dependent".[40]

37 Day 209, p.71.
38 Day 223, pp.90 to 91.
39 Day 223, p.92.
40 KIN 1136.

45 We consider it was another significant flaw in the way Kincora actually functioned that such a criticism could justifiably be made after the home had been functioning for more than twenty years. We have already described Kincora as a "hybrid" between a children's home and a hostel. In our opinion one of the reflections of that "hybrid" institution was inadequate preparation of the boys for independent living when the time came to leave the hostel for those who were not going to return home but who would live elsewhere, something we regard as a systemic failing.

Systemic failings to date

46 In those matters we have so far considered we find that there were the following systemic failings in the way Kincora operated:

(1) Too many children were admitted into Kincora who were too young to be placed in such an environment.

(2) Too many of these children spent too long in an unsuitable environment when they were admitted.

(3) There were insufficient care staff throughout its entire existence, and in particular to deal with the younger children who were placed in Kincora from time to time.

(4) The way the adolescents were looked after in Kincora created an attitude of dependence, exacerbated by inadequate preparation for independent living after they left Kincora.

(5) Inadequate pay and poor terms and conditions of employment for care staff.

PART THREE

Monitoring and inspections 1958 to 1973

47 In this part of the chapter we first of all examine the extent to which the hostel was monitored and inspected. There were several ways in which the day-to-day running of Kincora, and the welfare of the boys resident there, could be supervised. These were considered by the Hughes Inquiry during two periods, the first being from 1960 to 1973, and the second being from 1973 onwards, when the EHSSB took over responsibility for Kincora on the reorganisation of local government. The Hughes Inquiry dealt with these in some detail from 3.23 of their Report onwards, and as we are in general agreement with their comments it is unnecessary for us to cover the same ground in the same amount of detail.

48 The first level of monitoring was through the monthly visits to the hostel required by Regulation 5 (2) of the Children and Young Persons (Welfare Authorities Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952 (The 1952 Welfare Authorities Homes Regulations). This required the Children's Officer to visit the hostel once a month. The Hughes Inquiry found that from 1960 to 1962, when Miss Brown was the Children's Officer, only about 50% of the required reports were minuted. In February 1963 the monitoring visits were delegated to Mrs Wilson, the Homes Officer, who completed the visits except for minor omissions until September 1965 when responsibility reverted to Miss Brown. From September 1965 to the end of 1967 the visits were undertaken with occasional omissions by either Miss Brown or her assistant Mr Moore. Mrs Wilson resumed the visits from January 1968 on her appointment as Assistant Children's Officer. The Hughes Inquiry found that Mrs Wilson's records from January 1968 to September 1973, when the Belfast Welfare Authority ceased to exist, demonstrated almost full compliance with the statutory requirements except for very occasional gaps during the summer holiday periods.[41]

49 The next level of monitoring was provided by the monthly visits made by a member of either the Welfare Committee or of the Children's sub-committee of the Welfare Committee. These visits were required by Regulation 5 (1) of the 1952 Welfare Authorities Homes Regulations. The Hughes Inquiry found that whilst this requirement was largely met between 1960 and 1965, the frequency of visits declined thereafter, with several three-month breaks in 1967 and 1968. In 1971 the pattern again deteriorated, and between January 1972 and September 1973 only two visits were minuted. Whilst it may be that some visits were not recorded, nevertheless we are satisfied that there were many occasions when, as the Hughes Inquiry put it at 3.37, "it is nonetheless unsatisfactory that the Committee should have substantially neglected its statutory duty in this respect".[42]

50 The Hughes Inquiry only found records of two inspections by the Ministry of Home Affairs between 1960 and 1973, and these were carried out in

41 KIN 75221.
42 KIN 75223.

1965 and in 1972. However, the Kincora record book showed that there were twelve other occasions when MoHA inspectors visited. However, it is likely that these other visits involved less formal contacts between the MoHA inspectors and the hostel staff.[43] The Hughes Inquiry was unequivocal on this level of frequency of inspections, saying, "we do not believe that there can be any defence of the Ministry's record of formal inspections of Kincora", and that two inspections between 1960 and 1973, "was insufficient to discharge central government's responsibilities for ensuring the well-being of the children". We agree, and we consider this was a systemic failing.

51 The period following the reorganisation of local government in 1973 until 1980 was more satisfactory in some respects. The post of Children's Officer no longer existed after 1973, and from 1 December 1975 a Direction was given by the DHSS which required a social worker to visit homes and hostels at least once a month. In the EHSSB the task had already been delegated to members of the R&DC (Residential and Day Care) management team from October 1973. The Hughes Inquiry examined the EHSSB records and found that the monthly inspections were carried out in full from October 1973 until late 1979, although the requirement to "sign in" to show that an inspection had taken place was only very occasional after the retirement of Mrs Wilson in July 1975. The reports themselves were often short and stereotyped.

52 In addition, all homes and hostels, including Kincora, were required to submit a weekly report to the District Management. The Hughes Inquiry found that observance of these administrative requirements was good.

53 The final layer of inspection was provided by the monthly visiting and reporting requirements inherited from the 1952 Welfare Authorities Homes Regulations. From December 1975 these visits were placed on a quarterly basis by the 1975 Direction from the DHSS to which we have already referred. These visits were performed by members of the Personal and Social Services Committee (PSSC) of the EHSSB. From the third quarter of 1977, the Hughes Inquiry found at 4.13 that the pattern of quarterly visits was; "of less than full compliance of the statutory requirements", but concluded at 4.14 that, "visiting was regarded as more than a purely formal exercise".[44]

43 KIN 75224.
44 KIN 75254.

The 1979 SWAG Report

54 As we already mentioned, the first inspection after the 1973 reorganisation of local government by the DHSS came with a SWAG Report following an inspection on 20 June 1979. The Department of Health (which replaced the DHSSPS during the course of our Inquiry) advanced a hypothesis through Dr Harrison that this was the result of the change in emphasis towards advising those responsible for homes or hostels, rather than inspecting them. In its closing submissions on the Kincora module the DoH adopted its submissions regarding Bawnmore where it said:

> "that [the DoH] feels the Hughes Inquiry did not have the benefit of a clear exposition from the witnesses [that] the Seebohm Report played in the apparent change of practice post the 1973 reorganisation of social services".

It went on to submit that:

> "the retraction of inspection activity was not a gradual lapse into complacency, but a change of focus to supportive and advisory relationships with social care providers and an emphasis on visits rather than regimented inspections".[45]

55 We explain elsewhere in this Report why we do not accept this general proposition. In the context of inspections of Kincora, it is sufficient to point out that this hypothesis is completely at variance with what the Hughes Inquiry recorded in its Report at 4.17 as being the case. We consider it appropriate to set out the relevant paragraph in full:

> "In February 1976 SWAG also introduced a policy objective of annual inspection of all day care and residential facilities for children and young persons. Mr Patrick Armstrong, then Deputy Chief Social Work Advisor and from August 1983 the Department's Chief Social Work Advisor, gave evidence that it had not been possible in practice to meet this objective. This was partly because it took a year to recruit a suitable replacement for a Social Work Advisor who had retired in December 1976 and partly because the newly-recruited officer had to go through a period of induction before taking up the full range of duties, including the inspection of children's homes and hostels. Mr Armstrong also stated that SWAG tended to devote more attention to voluntary homes than to statutory homes because it was felt that voluntary organisations, with exceptions such as Barnardo's, did not have such well defined structures for the administration and management of homes and that they needed more professional attention. In connection with the introduction of the annual inspection policy from February 1976 an additional Social Work Advisor was allocated to childcare from August 1975, bringing SWAG's childcare complement to three Social Work Advisors. This complement was maintained until 1980 except for the period December 1976 to December 1977 when the retirement referred to above reduced the complement to two".

45 KIN 143105.

56 At 4.18 the Hughes Inquiry reinforced this conclusion:

"The Department's evidence satisfied us that the low frequency of inspections arose more from constraints of professional resources than from inspections being given a deliberately low priority by the Social Work Advisors. Given these constraints, the annual inspection target introduced in February 1976 could not be achieved. It is regrettable that the Department did not establish accurately the resource implications of annual inspections before adopting such a policy objective. Nor did it react to its own subsequent experience, which demonstrated clearly that the objective was not being met, either by adjusting SWAG's priorities or increasing its resources."

57 As the evidence given to the Hughes Inquiry on behalf of the Department was given by the Chief Social Work Advisor at the time, someone who had previously been the Deputy Chief Social Work Advisor, in our view the implication 30 years after the event that, "the backdrop of the policy content [had not] been properly explored", in Mr Armstrong's evidence is unsustainable. Had the Seebohm Report provided an explanation when Mr Armstrong gave evidence we are sure he would have relied upon it. We explain in Chapter Two why we did not accept the Department's argument, and we consider that the Department's failure to maintain an adequate inspection regime, and the same failure by its predecessor the MoHA, were systemic failings on the part of both.

The effect of the failures to properly inspect Kincora

58 Whilst we regard the failure of Belfast Welfare Authority and the EHSSB to have regular monthly inspections, and the failure of the MoHA and then SWAG to have regular inspections, as systems failures by each of these bodies, the most important question is whether these failures caused, or at least contributed to, a continuing failure to detect the sexual abuse of residents that was taking place in Kincora. We accept, as did the Hughes Inquiry, that while more regular and perceptive inspections might have helped the children to establish a sufficient relationship of trust with visitors to encourage the children to confide in persons of authority that they were being abused, that cannot be assumed for a number of reasons. First of all, their experiences were seen by the boys as shameful and that made it very hard for them to confide in anyone. Secondly, to disclose what happened meant doing so to individuals such as councillors or inspectors who the boys regarded as remote and unsympathetic. Thirdly, many assumed that if they did complain they would not be believed. Tragically that perception was entirely justified by the repeated failures to take complaints seriously that we will consider later in this chapter. Finally, as confirmed by the evidence of sexual abuse in other institutions we have examined, and the evidence relating to the sexual abuse in Kincora, conduct of that sort is invariably carried out in secret and is extremely hard to detect until a child has the courage to complain to someone who takes what they have to say very seriously.

59 It is noteworthy that despite Mrs Wilson having been known to, and liked by, a number of Kincora residents who had been in her care when she had previously been matron of the Brefne Children's Home, no-one felt sufficiently emboldened to complain to her of abuse. By the same token, neither of the domestic staff, nor many boys who were resident in Kincora but who were not abused, realised what was happening. There were no obvious signs of tension or unhappiness evident to visitors or inspectors. For example, Dr Hilary Harrison recalled how when the allegations surfaced a former resident whose social worker she had been rang her from England to say that he was completely amazed that this could have happened, something he repeated when he returned later to Northern Ireland and discussed this with her.[46]

60 We have therefore concluded that although there were a number of systemic failings by the Belfast Welfare Authority, by the EHSSB, by the members of the Welfare Committee and by the DHSS in failing to properly supervise and inspect Kincora throughout its existence, we cannot say that if these failures had not occurred that would have prevented any further sexual abuse taking place.

46 Day 223, p.87.

61 Before turning to consider the sexual abuse that did occur, we must observe that the outward appearance of Kincora in general was that the material standards in the hostel were high, and that Mains was in other respects an effective, hard working, conscientious officer in charge, properly discharging his duties to the adolescent boys under his care. However, as is now known, he abused the trust placed in him by his superiors in order to abuse some of those in his care, and certainly in the case of Semple turned a blind eye to the risks to boys created by other staff.

PART FOUR

Investigation of complaints of abuse by Social Services

62 In this section we examine a number of occasions when the Belfast Welfare Authority and the EHSSB investigated complaints or rumours of sexually inappropriate behaviour towards Kincora residents by staff. There were at least fourteen such occasions (treating two occasions in 1974 involving R 20 as a single episode), and there were two further occasions when Mains did not report matters relating to the behaviour of Semple and McGrath. Almost all of these occasions were considered in great detail by the Hughes Inquiry, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to set out the relevant evidence in similar detail. Our Terms of Reference are different to those of the Hughes Inquiry, and so we have examined those occasions in the context of our Terms of Reference, although in almost every instance our conclusions and those of the Hughes Inquiry are effectively the same. In the following paragraphs we consider each of these fourteen occasions in turn, and, as will become apparent, in respect of almost every aspect of each occasion the HSCB accepts that there were systemic failings on the part of either the Belfast Welfare Authority or the EHSSB.

The 1966 letter written by R 6

63 R 7 told the Hughes Inquiry that in 1966 he and three other residents were suspicious that Mains was having a homosexual relationship with R 4, and that R 6 wrote a letter about this to the College Street headquarters of the Belfast Welfare Authority. R 7 said that he saw R 6 post the letter in the post box on the corner of North Road opposite the hostel. No such letter has ever been traced. As the Hughes Inquiry observed at 3.95 of its Report, given that R 6 was barely literate, "whether this had a bearing on the letter's actual arrival at its destination, or on what weight attached to it if it did arrive at College Street, is a matter of speculation".[47] The Hughes Inquiry did not suggest that R 7's evidence about the letter being composed or sent was unreliable, and we therefore accept it was written. We agree that whether it arrived, or if it did, what weight was attached to it, can only be a matter of speculation.

The 1967 complaints by R 5 and R 6

64 In the previous chapter we set out the nature of the allegations made by R 5 in the "statement" he wrote when he went to the headquarters of the Belfast Welfare Authority in College Street in early 1967. In this document R 5 made three allegations about Mains. The first was that he had been drinking on a summer camp attended by the Kincora boys, and was getting drunk every Friday and Saturday night when he left the hostel. The second allegation was that he had asked R 5 for a kiss, feeling his body and putting his hands down R 5's underpants while R 5 was washing. The third was that Mains had made a number of approaches to R 6, (a) by coming to his bed and feeling around R 6's body; (b) telling R 6, "you look lovely in the water" when R 6 was taking a bath; (c) calling R 6 for work whilst Mains was only wearing his underpants; and (d) saying, "give me a kiss" to R 6.[48]

65 Robert Moore told the Hughes Inquiry he could not recall taking the statements of R 5 and R 6, but accepted it was quite likely he did. However the boys told the police Mr Ross took the statements. Mr Mason, who had been the City Welfare Officer, and hence the chief officer in the Belfast Welfare Authority, since 1960, interviewed Mains about these allegations on 8 September 1967. Mr Mason recorded the answers Mains gave to each of the allegations in typewritten notes he prepared on 11 September 1967. Mains denied drinking excessively, either at the camp or when he went out from Kincora on Fridays and Saturdays. Mr Mason appeared amused by these allegations, adding that to his knowledge Mains, "was a very light drinker of intoxicating liquor", although he did not explain how he came by that knowledge. This is at least open to the inference that Mr Mason had been present with Mains on social occasions. Mr Mason noted that Mains was uneasy and apprehensive early in the interview but as it progressed became more confident and self assured.

47 KIN 75234.
48 KIN 75236.

66 Mains said that both R 5 and R 6 wore their hair long, and he asked them both for a kiss to get them to cut their hair. He said that he put his hand down R 5's underpants to check that R 5 had changed his underpants because he was inclined not to do so. He said that he washed R 6's long hair because R 6 would not bath himself. He said he checked R 6's clothing in bed because R 6 was one of the worst of those boys who would wear their day clothing (presumably meaning their vest and/or underpants) under their pyjamas. He said he woke R 6 as soon as he (Mains) got up because R 6 was a bad riser, and he might have forgotten to put on a dressing gown. Finally, he said that both R 5 and R 6 had been troublesome, and he had to chastise R 5 the day before R 5 had gone to College Street.

67 Mr Mason concluded that R 5 and R 6 had stated, "facts, most of them agreed by (Mr Mains) to be true, but that they might have tried to put a construction upon them for malicious reasons". He went on to conclude that, "taken as it stands it does not present prima facie indication of wrongful conduct". He then made a number of recommendations to which we shall refer shortly. The Hughes Inquiry accepted that he referred the matter to the then Town Clerk, John Dunlop. Mr Dunlop had retired by the time of the Hughes Inquiry, and it would seem that it was only discovered that he was still alive at a late stage of the Inquiry. He did not give oral evidence, but submitted a written statement saying he had no recollection of the papers.[49]

68 We accept that Mr Mason took these complaints seriously, and they were investigated carefully and thoroughly by him as the chief officer of the Welfare Authority. In our view there were clearly possible sexual overtones when Mains's admissions were taken together. Whilst asking two long-haired boys for a kiss could have been explained as an example of a type of banter common at that time, we do not accept that Mains's explanation for putting his hands down R 5's underpants can be regarded as plausible. At the very least this should have raised a suspicion of a sexual motive on Main's part for behaving in this way, and which was therefore capable of putting the remainder of his admitted actions in a different light. Whilst we accept that Mr Mason's judgement was a genuine one, we consider that he made the wrong assessment of Mains's behaviour. In reaching this conclusion we have given very careful consideration to the views of the Hughes Inquiry on these events, and their conclusion at 3.117 of their report that Mains's explanations "were individually plausible", and that they could understand Mr Mason's conclusion that the evidence did not constitute prima facie indication of wrongful conduct.[50] In our view, the evidence did constitute prima facie indication of wrongful conduct on the part of Mains.

49 KIN 75237.

69 That is not to say that we consider that the matter should have been referred to the police. Mains was a hitherto reliable employee against whom there were no previous allegations. We cannot exclude the possibility that Mr Mason may have been influenced to some degree by a concern that if Mains was reported to the police, or subjected to disciplinary action, finding a suitable replacement may not have been easy in the light of the difficulty in filling the assistant warden's post, to which we have already referred. On balance, and not without some hesitation, we do not consider that Mr Mason's wrong assessment of the possible significance of Mains admitted conduct, and the consequent failure to consider reporting the matter to the police, amounted to systemic failings. This was a borderline case, and one in respect of which views could legitimately differ when it came to reporting the matter to the police.

70 Mr Mason put the documents relating to this matter into a file which became known as "the Mason file", and we shall refer to it in that way. As we shall see, the contents of the Mason file were to be highly significant on a number of occasions during the 1970s. Mr Mason told the Hughes Inquiry that he gave Mains the benefit of the doubt, and that he sent the file, including his recommendations, to the Town Clerk's department. In his report Mr Mason made three recommendations:

(1) "Mr Moore [should] interview the boys again and explain to them the reason for the incidents;

(2) A closer supervision of Kincora;

(3) A careful sifting of any further information which might come our way".[51]

71 When Mr Mason was asked at the Hughes Inquiry why he directed the careful sifting of information, he said he had a doubt in his mind about Mains's supervision of the boys and how Mains saw his role as a supervisor. He ultimately accepted that to some degree he suspected

50 KIN 75238.
51 KIN 75237.

that Mains was a homosexual, and that was a dangerous possibility as he was in charge of boys.[52] In our view, Mr Mason's decision to give the benefit of the doubt to Mains, and to make his recommendations as he did, should not have been the end of the matter. On any showing, Mains's admitted behaviour was not just unwise, but required formal censure. Whilst we do not consider that such censure should have gone as far as dismissal, at the very least Mains should have been given a formal and strong warning about his actions and his further conduct, coupled with clear instructions as to how he should behave in the future. None of these steps were taken. Mr Mason's warning to Mains that, "all staff in charge of boys have to be extra careful as they were vulnerable to these forms of complaints" did not go far enough.[53]

72 It is clear from the Welfare Committee minutes that we have seen that the Committee closely supervised the operation of its homes and hostels, and we consider that the chairman of the Committee should have been kept informed, although the approval of the chairman for the action taken would not have been necessary. The Committee was the elected body responsible for Kincora, and as such its chairman should have been made aware of these matters even if his approval for the action taken was not necessary.

73 The last of the three recommendations made by Mr Mason, namely that there should be, "a careful sifting of any further information which might come our way", implied that steps should have been taken to ensure that any further allegation, or other relevant information, was placed on the Mason file, so that it could be considered in the light of these allegations and not simply as an isolated matter. To be effective, that required a clear procedure to be put in place for reporting such allegations, not just from Kincora but from other homes and hostels, and in the case of Kincora adding them to the Mason file. Such a procedure should not have been confined solely to Kincora, but should have required all such allegations relating to any staff in any home or hostel run by the Belfast Welfare Authority to be reported by staff to Mr Mason or the current holder of his office so that the complaints could be centrally collated and then considered for appropriate action. No such procedure was put in place.

52 KIN 71589.
53 KIN 75237.

74 We consider the following amount to systemic failings on the part of the Belfast Welfare Authority and the Town Clerk's department in the way in which they addressed the 1967 complaints.

(1) Mr Mason should not have decided that Mains's conduct did not constitute prima facie indication of wrongful conduct.

(2) The Town Clerk's department should have given a clear response to Mr Mason's recommendations, and the response should have been properly recorded.

(3) Clear procedures should have been devised and put in place to ensure that any further complaints in relation to Kincora were reported to the City Welfare Officer.

(4) Clear instructions should have been issued in written form to Mr Moore, setting out the steps he was to take, especially to ensure closer supervision of Kincora in the future.

(5) Mains should have been given a strong and formal warning as to his conduct on this occasion, together with explicit instructions as to how he was and was not to behave in future.

Comments said to have been made by KIN 66

75 As we have already explained, KIN 66 was employed as the assistant warden at Kincora for five and a half months in the second half of 1967. KIN 14 was a resident in Kincora at this time, and in his RUC statement of 1980 said that KIN 66 was like a father to him, and he got on very well with KIN 66. In this statement he said that KIN 66 told him to be careful of R 2 or Mains when he was having a bath or a shower, or when he was changing. He incorrectly believed that R 2 worked for the Welfare, and he knew that R 2 stayed in Mains's room at weekends, where there was only a double bed.[54] The RUC were unable to trace KIN 66. If KIN 14's allegation about what KIN 66 said to him were correct then it would seem that in 1967 KIN 66 entertained suspicions about Mains's behaviour, suspicions that he should have passed to his superiors. However, as KIN 66 was never traced, and consequently was never asked whether he did give such a warning, and, if so, what his reasons were for not doing so, we do not consider that we can take this matter any further.

54 KIN 10147.

R 7 and the "funny" remark to Mr Maybin

76 As we have seen in the previous chapter, R 7 said that he was abused during two of the three periods he spent in Kincora, in the first by Mains and in the second by Semple. He was discharged at the end of the third and last period in January 1968 when he was nineteen and a half. Because of his experiences in Kincora he was concerned that his younger brother was going to be moved from the children's home that he had been in to Kincora when he reached the school-leaving age. R 7 was one of the clients of Mr Maybin, who was appointed a social welfare officer in the South Belfast division of the Belfast Welfare Authority based in their offices at Lower Crescent. Mr Maybin's recollection was that R 7 came to Lower Crescent and told him that he, "had not had a particularly good experience in Kincora himself", and made a comment that Mains was "funny". When asked by Mr Maybin what he meant, Mr Maybin said that R 7 did not elaborate. Mr Maybin told the Hughes Inquiry that he did not pursue the matter any further because he had already decided that R 7's brother would not be placed in Kincora but be fostered.

77 R 7 told the Hughes Inquiry that he did not say to Mr Maybin that Mains was "funny",[55] but even if he did use that expression, as Mr Maybin had already decided to foster R 7's brother, we agree with the Hughes Inquiry that it was not surprising that Mr Maybin did not pursue the matter further and we agree that he could not be criticised for not doing so. He could not have been expected to report the matter to Mr Mason, because he knew nothing of the 1967 complaints and therefore had no reason to attach any great significance to such a remark. We consider that he cannot be blamed for not passing the matter upwards. That Mr Maybin had not been told of the need to report anything of a suspicious nature regarding Mains is, we believe, an illustration of the failure of Belfast Welfare Authority to put in place a proper system whereby its officers were alerted to the need to make such reports. If such a system had been in place after 1967, or had Mr Maybin been alerted to the 1967 complaints, or both, then it is at least possible that he might have been more concerned by the "funny" comment, if it was made. However, to infer that this was an opportunity to uncover the behaviour of Mains and Semple would, in our view, be speculation.

55 KIN 75234.

Mr McCaffrey and the buttock slapping episode

78 From December 1969 Anthony McCaffrey was the Assistant Children's Officer with responsibility for field work services. Sometime thereafter he was asked by Mr Moore to investigate a complaint that Mains had slapped a boy on the buttocks, either the previous evening or two nights before. The Hughes Inquiry dealt with this episode at 3.133 and following of its Report. Mr McCaffrey spoke to Mains who said there had been some misbehaviour or horse play in the dormitory or upstairs, and a slap on the buttocks had been administered. Mr McCaffrey accepted this explanation for what the Hughes Inquiry described as a minor breach of the statutory regulations regarding corporal punishment in children's homes. It went on to consider in considerable detail how the incident was investigated, and we do not wish to add anything to their comments.

79 The significance of this episode was that Mr McCaffrey was unaware of the 1967 complaint, and Mr Moore, who was, did not make any connection with the 1967 complaint. Whilst we agree with the Hughes Inquiry that the slapping incident contained no obvious homosexual colour, and that Mr Moore should not have been expected to have linked it to the 1967 episode, it is significant that Mr McCaffrey was unaware of the 1967 episode. That is yet a further indication that proper procedures were not put in place after the 1967 complaints as they should have been. Had they been, then we would have expected an officer of his rank to have been made aware of such procedures following his appointment.

80 It would be wrong to imply that no steps were taken in respect of all of the recommendations Mr Mason made in his report on the 1967 complaints. It appears that steps were put in place for closer supervision of Kincora to be exercised thereafter. In his evidence on Day 218, Mr Bunting confirmed that when Mrs Wilson returned from undergoing professional training she was appointed to carry out this task from 1 January 1968. She made weekly visits to Kincora, the evenings being chosen because that was when the working boys would be there. With the civil unrest from October 1968 onwards there were occasions when the disturbed state of the city meant that she could not get to Kincora, and the Hughes Inquiry Report recorded at 3.129[56] that some of these visits were carried out by Mr Mason because she was not able to do them herself for that reason. We consider the introduction of weekly evening visits was a suitable, and well resourced, level of monitoring, and one which was particularly commendable given the greatly increased pressure on the Belfast Welfare Authority due to the consequences of the civil unrest, such as a displacement of large numbers of families. Evening visits were appropriate because this provided an opportunity to develop relationships with the residents. However, none of these visits resulted in further allegations about Mains, or about Semple, coming to light.

56 KIN 75240.

PART FIVE

The 1971 complaints by R 8

81 In the previous chapter we referred to the experiences of R 8, who left Kincora on 22 August 1971 aged eighteen, having been a resident in Kincora for almost three and a half years. Shortly afterwards he wrote two letters about Kincora. One was addressed to his social worker and bore the legend, "to be handed in at Central Police Station".[57] That was never done. This letter was delivered by him by hand on 12 August 1971 to the Townsend Street office of the West Belfast Division of the Belfast Welfare Authority where Mrs Robinson, his social worker, was based. The Hughes Inquiry considered how that letter was dealt with at 3.144 to 3.147, and it is unnecessary for us to go over that ground again. It is sufficient to say that Mrs Robinson informed her superior, Miss Nicholl, and Miss Nicholl told her superior, Mr Bunting, when he returned to the office from leave. Mrs Robinson was informed by headquarters at College Street that she was not to do anything with the letter because a similar letter had been received at College Street and was being dealt with by Mr Mason, and so no further action was taken on the matter by the Townsend Street office.

82 It would seem that on 12 August 1971 R 8 delivered the other copy to the College Street headquarters of the Belfast Welfare Authority addressed to Mr Moore. He had been the Children's Officer, but had left in June to take up the post of Deputy Welfare Officer with the Down County Welfare Office. He was not replaced until Mr Bunting took up the post of Children's Officer in October 1971. As the Hughes Inquiry explained at 3.148, although the letter was addressed to Mr Moore, it was passed to Mr Mason because Mr Moore had left. It is probable that this occurred on 12 August, although the first documentary record relating to it was not created until 23 August, the day the Town Clerk returned to his office after two weeks leave. The letter from R 8 which made its way to Mr Mason consisted of five large, hand-written sheets. It seems that R 8 was studying for, or had studied for, A-Levels to judge by his comments in a letter to KIN 342 written around the same time.[58] The letter to Mr Moore was well written and clear. In it he made no allegations about McGrath, who had only just started work at Kincora in June 1971, but he made a number of detailed allegations about both Mains, and to a limited degree, about Semple.

57 KIN 10947.

(1) They were incompetent.

(2) He and another boy R 38 had been sexually approached by another boy R 34 when they were in bed.

(3) When they told Mains about the behaviour of R 34 Mains only laughed, saying R 34 would grow out of it and didn't mean any harm.

(4) Mains had asked him to rub cream into his back whilst lying on his bed wearing only his underpants in return for five shillings.

(5) Mains persuaded him to sleep in his bed, but when he felt Mains's arm around him he fled to his own room.

(6) He implied that money he had earned at work had been misappropriated.

(7) He said Mains was regularly visited overnight by a friend R 2 with whom he had shared a bed in Mains's room in Kincora.

(8) R 8 concluded by saying:

> "I think his [Mains's] open approach to homosexuality is disgusting, he has a filthy mind, and a mind like that is not fit to look after growing boys".[59]

83 On 23 August Mr Mason spoke to the Town Clerk who directed his deputy William Johnston to take part in an investigation. R 8 was interviewed the same day by Mr Johnston, Mr Mason and Mr McCaffrey in Mr

58 KIN 11008.
59 KIN 11019.

Johnston's office at the City Hall. On 25 August Mr Mason prepared a memorandum, which he sent to the Town Solicitor Mr Young. In the memorandum Mr Mason commented that while R 8 did not appear a convincing witness he had reaffirmed the allegations contained in his letter. He also said that R 34, one of the boys referred to in the letter as having been the subject of similar approaches, had been interviewed on 24 August, and said he had experienced similar approaches. No statements had been taken from either boy, but Mr Mason sent with the memorandum the file relating to the 1967 complaints later described as "the Mason file". The memorandum contained the following crucial paragraph:

> "No other investigations have been carried out regarding the rest of the statements made, but it is thought that there are sufficient grounds to have the matter considered as one which should be referred to the police in view of the allegations which were made against the same officer in September 1967. A copy of the results of the departmental Inquiry into these allegations is contained in the file."[60]

84 It appears that a decision was made that the allegations were not to be referred to the police. This is a matter of inference because no record was made of any of these matters at the time the decision appears to have been made not to accept the recommendation that the 1971 allegations, taken together with the 1967 allegations, should be reported to the police. How and why that decision was made, and how it was communicated to Mr Mason, were the subject of exhaustive investigations by the RUC, by the Sussex Police and by the Hughes Inquiry. Despite these investigations, the absence of any written record explaining why the matter was not referred to the police means that it has been impossible to establish why that decision not to report the matter to the police was taken.

85 No evidence has emerged from our investigation to throw any new light on this crucial question, and we do not consider it necessary to review in detail the evidence given to, and the conclusions of, the Hughes Inquiry which had the advantage of hearing the evidence of those involved, apart from Mr Young, the Town Solicitor, and Mr Jamison, the Town Clerk. By the time of the Caskey Phase One investigation both Mr Young and Mr Jamison were dead. That Mr Young and Mr Jamison did discuss Mr Mason's recommendation seems probable. The Town Clerk's diary records that the two were to meet on 28 September 1971 (and not 1970 as erroneously stated in the Caskey Phase One Report),[61] but the Caskey Phase One investigation found no indication that the meeting took place, or if it did, which subject(s) were discussed. Mr Mason conceded to the Hughes Inquiry that although he could not remember when, or how, or in what manner it happened, he must have been made aware by someone in authority in the City Hall that a decision had been made not to report the matter to the police.[62] We consider it reasonable to infer that Mr Jamison and Mr Young must have discussed the Mason file for such a decision to have been made. It is also reasonable to infer that any such discussion ought to have involved an assessment by the Town Solicitor as the senior legal officer of the City Council of the significance of the allegations made in 1967 and 1971, and whether they were capable of amounting to criminal offences.

60 KIN 11006.

86 Had such an assessment been made and discussed, in our opinion the only decision that could properly have been made would have been to refer the allegation to the police for further and more detailed investigation. The allegations suggested:

(1) Homosexual acts were occurring between Mains and R 2, when R 2 stayed overnight in Kincora.

(2) An indecent assault may have been committed by Mains on R 5 in 1967 when Mains put his hand down R 5's underpants.

(3) An indecent assault on R 8 may have been committed when Mains put his arms round R 8 when R 8 was sharing Mains bed.

(4) Possible indecent assaults had been committed by Mains when he persuaded R 8 and R 38 to massage his back with cream in circumstances that suggest Mains was sexually stimulated by this.

87 Although the views of the Town Solicitor would be of great weight in such discussions, we consider that the ultimate decision whether or not to refer the allegations to the police was one which ought to be taken by the Town Clerk as the chief executive of the Council, although he might have sought the views of the chairman of the Welfare Committee before he reached a final decision. Mr Mason's evidence to the Hughes

61 KIN 10077.
62 KIN 71915.

Inquiry suggests that, whatever the reasons were for not accepting his recommendation that the allegations be reported to the police, those reasons were never explained to him, although he does appear to have been made aware of the decision. In the absence of any such explanation, and in the absence of any contemporary documentation to explain the reasons for not reporting the allegations, we are left to speculate as to what the reasons might be. We should make it clear that the Hughes Inquiry considered whether there may have been an informal discussion with the police, but considered that the circumstantial evidence was not sufficiently strong to enable it to be inferred that the police were consulted in that way, and we see no reason to take a different view.

88 One reason advanced by Chris Moore in his book The Kincora Scandal, was that the Mason file "disappeared with no evidence of any response, let alone action from the Town Solicitor's office".[63] The Mason file did not "disappear", because, as the Hughes Inquiry established, and as we shall see, it remained in existence and was to play an important part in later events. Moore then speculated:

> "Indeed there may be a very simple explanation for this apparent "inaction", on the part of the Town Solicitor. The late John Young was a practising homosexual active in a small coterie of men which included Joe Mains. As the police were to discover, the third member of this group was a Unionist Councillor, Joshua 'Joss' Cardwell.
>
> With John Young, Semple and Mains formed a homosexual triumvirate that was undoubtedly able to keep complaints from the young male residents under wraps, at the same time safeguarding its own dark secret."

89 No evidence was given for the assertion that Mr Young was a practising homosexual, or active in a coterie consisting of himself, Mains and Councillor Cardwell. We shall refer to Councillor Cardwell later. Mr Young and Mr Cardwell are dead and we have seen no evidence that supports Mr Moore's assertion that any advice given by Mr Young, or action taken by him in this matter, may have been due to any improper motive on his part. Other possible reasons that could have contributed to the decision not to refer the allegations to the police were (1) a mistaken belief that the allegations were insufficient to constitute criminal matters suitable to be referred to the police; or (2) a desire to avoid the embarrassment that the Welfare Authority could face if a criminal investigation were to be launched, something that could lead to the prosecutions of one of its employees. Our experience with other institutions in this Inquiry has shown that at that time it was a common view taken by institutions of all sorts that such allegations should not be referred to outside agencies including the police.

63 KIN 5051.

90 However, all of these explanations, including Mr Moore's, are speculative because of the absence of other evidence, and the absence of evidence means that we cannot account for the decision not to refer the matter to the police. What can be said is that we can conceive of no justifiable reason for not referring the matter to the police, and we are satisfied that the failure to do so was a systemic failing by the Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor. Other systemic failings relating to the 1971 allegations were:

(1) The failure to record the initial interviews of R 8 and R 38 so that these could be added to the Mason file before it was sent to the Town Solicitor;

(2) The failure to record the reasons for not referring the matter to the police; and

(3) The apparent failure to inform the chairman of the Welfare Committee of the allegations and the decision not to refer them to the police.

The approach of the Belfast Welfare Authority after the decision not to refer R 8's allegations to the Police

91 Considerable attention was devoted at the Hughes Inquiry to exploring with Mr Mason and Mr Johnston why they did not challenge, or at least ask for an explanation for, the decision not to refer the allegations to the police. In essence their response was that it was not their decision but that of their superiors, and it was not for them to challenge their superiors. We accept they cannot be criticised for not doing so, but there were steps which we consider Mr Mason should have taken as head of the Welfare Authority after he learnt of the decision not to refer the matter to the police. The first should have been to reiterate what he should have told Mains in 1967, but did not, namely that Mains should avoid doing anything with the residents that could lead to allegations of impropriety on his part. Secondly, he should have informed Mrs Wilson and Mr Bunting, who had now succeeded Mr Moore as Children's Officer, of the allegations and instructed them to keep a very close eye on both Mains and Kincora. Thirdly, he should have put in place a formal procedure within the department in order to ensure that any further allegations about Kincora, and indeed any home or hostel that was the responsibility of the Welfare Authority, should be collated and referred to him, or in his absence to his deputy, for immediate attention. We regard the failure to take each of these steps as systemic failings on the part of the Belfast Welfare Authority, and they replicate the inadequate steps taken by Mr Mason after the 1967 complaints.

The transfer of the Mason file in 1973

92 Mr Mason retired on the reorganisation of local government in 1973 when the Belfast Welfare Authority disappeared and its responsibilities were subsumed into the new EHSSB. The EHSSB had a significantly wider geographical remit than its predecessor, because it took in large areas adjoining Belfast in Co. Down and Co. Antrim, and became responsible for hospitals and other aspects of medical services that were now combined for the first time with social services. Mr Bunting became an Assistant Director of Social Services in the EHSSB. He explained to us that this was not a managerial post because the District Social Services Officers, who were the rank below Assistant Director and now responsible for all of the personal social services, reported directly to the Director of Social Services.[64] His role, and that of his colleagues, was to be a professional advisor monitoring the work of the programme planning teams whose task it was to plan and deliver services.

93 Mr Bunting's recollection was that on the day Mr Mason retired he gave Mr Bunting the Mason file, and advised him to retain it in case anything further came up about Kincora. Although Mr Bunting had been told about the letter received in Townsend Street in 1971, he had not been otherwise engaged because the matter was being dealt with at headquarters. When he took over the post of Children's Officer in October 1971, despite being now responsible for all children's services in Belfast including Kincora, he had not been briefed on the 1971 allegations by Mr Mason, and he knew nothing about the previous allegations in 1967. He did know that Mrs Wilson was continuing the supervision of Kincora, and so the Mason file was not of any particular significance to him in 1973. He therefore put it in a drawer and forgot about it until he was approached by DC Cullen of the RUC in 1976, something we deal with later in this chapter.

64 Day 218, p.114.

94 With the advantage of hindsight it is tempting to find that Mr Bunting should have familiarised himself with the Mason file when it was given to him in 1973. If he had done so, then no doubt he would have realised that procedures needed to be put in place to ensure that complaints and concerns about Kincora in general, and Mains in particular, were passed to the appropriate level of senior management, and then devised and put such procedures in place. However, we consider that would have been to ask too much of Mr Bunting, and we do not criticise him for not doing any of these things. He had no knowledge of the 1967 complaints, and only limited knowledge of the 1971 allegations. He had not been briefed about the outcome of the 1971 allegations, and in 1973 when handing over the file Mr Mason did not enlighten him in any way about what had occurred. Mr Bunting was in the midst of the creation of a completely new and complex organisation, which had a significantly different geographical and organisational remit. In all the circumstances we do not consider that he can be criticised for failing to enquire further into the significance and contents of the Mason file. If he had, because he did not have operational responsibility for Kincora in the new structure, the appropriate step would have been to pass it to the District Social Services Officer responsible for the East Belfast & Castlereagh Unit of the EHSSB within which Kincora now fell.

PART SIX

The anonymous 1974 phone call about McGrath

95 On 23 January 1974 an anonymous phone call was received by Mr Colin McKay in the Holywood Road office of the EHSSB. He was a senior social worker in that fieldwork office, which, although not far from Kincora, was not responsible for Kincora because the hostel was the responsibility of a different department of the EHSSB. In 1982 Roy Garland told D/Supt Caskey that he made an anonymous call to Holywood Road Social Services, and we are satisfied that it was probably he who made the 23 January 1974 call. Later in this chapter we examine Mr Garland's role in these events. Mr McKay reported the call to his superior, Brian Todd, who then telephoned Mrs Mary Wilson. It appears that she was the first person to make a note of what had been said by the anonymous caller, to judge by the outcome of subsequent police enquiries following remarks Mr Todd made in an interview carried in the Social Work Today issue of 12 January 1982. We shall have occasion to refer to that publication later in this chapter.

96 Mrs Wilson was at home when she received the call from Mr Todd, who recounted to her what Mr McKay had told him the anonymous caller had said to him. Because the details were being recounted third hand to Mrs Wilson they may have become somewhat distorted, but her note of what she was told was as follows:

> "Mr McGrath (house-father) had made improper suggestions to the boys; had gone to live in the hostel for this purpose and had written a note to one of the boys making improper suggestions".[65]

97 These allegations were significant for a number of reasons. Firstly, they were the first allegations received by the EHSSB or its predecessor relating to McGrath. Secondly, they did not allege homosexual acts by McGrath involving any of the boys in Kincora, but "improper suggestions". Thirdly, McGrath was said to have made such improper suggestions in a note to one of the boys, suggesting the caller had specific information about the existence of such a note. Fourthly, the caller alleged McGrath was living in Kincora to enable him to make such improper suggestions. Mrs Wilson immediately phoned Kincora and checked with Mains to be told that McGrath did not sleep in the hostel at any time.

98 It was not until 29 January that Mrs Wilson went to Kincora. McGrath was not there because he was not due to work at that time and she spoke to Mains. He told her that the allegations were untrue, and there was a political reason for them. She recorded, "apparently the police had a similar call about Mr McGrath a few months ago and told Mr Mains about it, and their opinion was that someone was trying to get at McGrath because of his connection with the Orange Order".[66]

99 She and Mr McKay went to Kincora on 4 February 1974, when they spoke to McGrath. Her notes of that occasion record that McGrath was not surprised when she told him why they were there. That might suggest that he had already been told what the allegations were by Mains. In any event, he said that he had received a copy of an anonymous letter saying he was a homosexual. This information was a new element in what was being recounted to Mrs Wilson and Mr McKay. He then went on to attribute the allegations to "an organisation he was associated with", presumably meaning Tara. He said he was probably in danger because of his connection with the Orange Order, and denied making any improper suggestions to boys in the hostel.

65 KIN 114014.
66 KIN 114015.

100 Mr McKay and Mrs Wilson both accepted his explanation, and felt there was no need to pursue the matter any further. Mr McKay had visited Kincora on several occasions in the course of his work and everything appeared normal to him on those occasions. Mrs Wilson said to the Hughes Inquiry that this was her first experience of an allegation of sexual impropriety in a boys' home, although she went on to explain she had investigated an "unspecified" complaint about Mains previously, but she thought this was a coincidence. It did not occur to her that two different members of staff would be involved in the same practices within the same home. She trusted Mains, and this was the first time she had heard anything about McGrath, who was a family man that seemed concerned about the boys in his care.

101 Before she went to visit McGrath, Mrs Wilson had spoken to her superior, Mr Scoular, and she reported back to Mr Scoular after the visit. Neither she nor Mr Scoular knew anything about the 1967 or 1971 allegations against Mains, nor did they know anything about the Mason file. Despite McGrath's admission that there had been an anonymous letter alleging he was a homosexual, and Mains telling Mrs Wilson that there had been an earlier phone call to the police, no significance appears to have been attached by either of them to the conjunction of a number of different allegations at this time. Nor did Mr Scoular report any of this to his superiors, presumably because neither he nor Mrs Wilson felt that there was any substance to the allegations, especially in the light of the incorrect allegation that McGrath had been sleeping in the hostel. Had they known about the earlier allegations and about the Mason file, as they should have if a procedure had been put in place by Mr Mason for allegations or concerns about Kincora to be reported to the senior official responsible for the hostel, we accept a very different approach may have been taken. This is a further illustration of the way in which matters were being dealt with by officials of the EHSSB in ignorance of the 1971 allegations, and an example of the significance of the failure to put proper reporting procedures in place. We agree with the Hughes

Inquiry that the allegations should have been referred to the Director of Social Services, and then reported to the police. No matter how plausible McGrath appeared, the allegation that he had written a note containing improper suggestions to a boy, taken with the realisation that there had already been a complaint to the police about McGrath, was sufficient to require the allegations to be reported to the police, even though they were from an anonymous source, something which creates considerable difficulties for the police when seeking to investigate any form of allegation. Notwithstanding that difficulty, we regard the failures to report the matter to the Director of Social Services, and to the police, to be systemic failings on the part of the EHSSB.

The complaints by R 15 in May and September 1974

102 R 15 and his brother had been placed in care under Fit Person Orders. The Hughes Inquiry recorded that conditions in the family home were poor, and there had been a lack of cooperation with Social Services and other agencies such as other agencies dealing with Public Health. R 15's father gave evidence to the Hughes Inquiry and agreed that it would be reasonable to describe his wife as "having had a running battle with the Welfare Services for many years".[67] This difficult background undoubtedly influenced the way in which complaints made by R 15 in May and September 1974 were viewed by the EHSSB staff.

103 R 15 was grabbed by the genitals by McGrath in November 1973, and in 1981 McGrath pleaded guilty to a single charge of indecent assault on R 15. R 15 told his brother about the incident the next day, and told Mains about it the day after that. Mains said he would do something about it, but he did not report the matter to his superiors as he should have done. It is unclear whether it was R 15 or his brother who told their mother about the incident, but R 15's father told the Hughes Inquiry that he and his wife thought R 15 had made the story up and so did not pursue the matter. Following a second incident where McGrath again grabbed R 15 by the genitals, which R 15 also told his brother about, his brother told their mother, and she then made a complaint about McGrath to the EHSSB.

104 Her complaint was made to the local office of the North and West Belfast District of the EHSSB at College Street on 17 May 1974. It was received by Miss Sharon McClean (later Mrs Grey), who was a trainee social worker. She said she would speak to Mains about the allegations. She consulted her supervising senior social worker Ronnie Orr, and some days later she telephoned Mains. This was during the Ulster Workers' strike when there was widespread disruption in Belfast and other areas, and travel across the city was difficult. Mains told her that R 15's mother had made an identical complaint to him; he had questioned McGrath and decided there was no truth in the matter. It seems that Miss McClean saw R 15 sometime later in the presence of his mother, but was unable to obtain any more information from him.

67 KIN 75262.

105 Nothing further was done until R 15's mother called again at College Street in September 1974, probably on 16 September. Miss McClean saw her and recorded that his mother, "covered the same ground as always", and said that McGrath had tried to interfere with R 15 again. While this would suggest a third assault, R 15 told the Hughes Inquiry that there were only two episodes. On 17 September Mr Orr met R 15's mother, but it would seem from notes made of that meeting that there was no reference to the McGrath complaints, but the case of R 15 was discussed in general terms. On 20 September the decision was made that R 15 and his brother would be discharged from Kincora provided they lived with their sister.

106 The Hughes Inquiry concluded that the complaints were treated with scepticism by Mr Orr because of the history of difficult relations between the family and Social Services. We agree, and we also agree that he should have taken part in the interview of R 15 and his mother by Miss McClean in May 1974. He was much more experienced, and that experience might have enabled him to draw out more information from R 15. We consider his failure to be more closely involved was one of several systemic failings in the way these complaints were dealt with. The other systemic failings were:

(1) Mains did not make a written record of the complaint to him by R 15;

(2) Mains did not report R 15's complaint, nor the complaint made to him by R 15's mother, to his line management; and

(3) the College Street office did not refer the complaints it received from R 15's mother in May and September to Residential & Day Care Management in the East Belfast & Castlereagh District, as the district responsible for Kincora.

The anonymous phone call by Colin Wallace in 1975

107 In the next chapter we examine a claim by Colin Wallace that in 1975 he made an anonymous phone call about Kincora to the Welfare Department. It is sufficient to say at this stage that no trace of any such call has been found.

Mr Maybin's evidence about rumours in 1975

108 In 1975, and for sometime thereafter, Michael Maybin was an assistant principal social worker with the EHSSB in fieldwork services in East Belfast and Castlereagh. He had worked in Kincora in the summer of 1966 for a short period helping Mains in the evenings because Kincora was short staffed at the time. He had also been the social worker of R 7 in the 1960s after R 7 reached school-leaving age. R 7 had been in Kincora for several periods in the mid-1960s. When Mr Maybin was interviewed by the Sussex Police in September 1982 he told them that on a number of occasions after he transferred to the East Belfast and Castlereagh District in 1975, he heard a rumour within social work circles that Mains was a homosexual. He also said that in the late 1970s he heard another rumour that Mains was sexually interfering with the boys in his custody at Kincora. He said he could not recall passing any of this information to his seniors or anyone else.[68] He told the Hughes Inquiry he regarded the 1975 rumour as "low level gossip" with no detail or supporting evidence.[69]

109 We agree with the Hughes Inquiry that these rumours should have been passed to senior management within the East Belfast and Castlereagh District. The HSCB accepts this should have been done. We consider that the failure by any of those in social work circles, whether in the EHSSB or elsewhere, who were privy to such rumours to report them to their senior managers or to an appropriate person in the EHSSB if they themselves were not employed by that Board, amounted to a systemic failing. Whilst of limited value in themselves, had these rumours been reported they would have provided an element of additional material showing that there were concerns about Kincora. We also agree with the Hughes Inquiry that as these rumours only came to light because Mr Maybin disclosed them to the Sussex Police he is to be commended for doing so.

68 KIN 40920.
69 KIN 75267.

The information received from Elizabeth Fiddis in 1976

110 Mrs Elizabeth Fiddis was a health visitor employed by the EHSSB in the East Belfast & Castlereagh District. As such, her work and her responsibilities did not extend to childcare matters relating to Kincora. Sometime in the first half of 1976 during a social occasion unconnected with her professional duties she heard a vague rumour which she understood emanated from Valerie Shaw, a lady she had never met but knew to be a Christian missionary to the Jews. Miss Shaw was also connected with the late Dr Ian Paisley MP at one time, and in later years there was a dispute between them as to what she did or did not say to him about Kincora. That dispute is not relevant to our investigations as we are concerned with what Social Services, the police and the security agencies knew, or did not know, about sexual abuse in Kincora. As we shall see, Miss Shaw also appears in another context relevant to Kincora.

111 The rumour that Mrs Fiddis heard on this occasion was that there was some unspecified form of sexual malpractice going on at a home in East Belfast, although she did not know the name of the home.[70] The rumour was supposed to have come from Valerie Shaw, and because Mrs Fiddis knew of Valerie Shaw this gave added weight to the concern Mrs Fiddis felt about this vague rumour from both a moral and professional prospective. She decided that she should pass the rumour to colleagues in the EHSSB, and so she went to the Holywood Road office where she spoke to Marian Reynolds, who was the duty social worker in the office on that day. The Hughes Inquiry concluded that this was in either February or March 1976. There were some differences between the recollection of Mrs Fiddis and Miss Reynolds as to what was said on that occasion, and the Hughes Inquiry concluded that Miss Reynolds's recollection was substantially correct. Although Mrs Fiddis may not have mentioned either Mains or Kincora by name, Miss Reynolds was able to identify both from what Mrs Fiddis told her. Miss Reynolds said that Mrs Fiddis told her she had obtained some information that a boy had received some inpatient treatment for depression at Purdysburn Hospital. The Hughes Inquiry concluded that this person was possibly R 2, who did receive psychiatric treatment there in 1973 and again in March 1976.

70 KIN 72782.

112 At this stage, Miss Reynolds had only limited knowledge of Kincora and so she suggested Mrs Fiddis speak to Hilary Reid (now Dr Hilary Harrison) who Mrs Fiddis knew both professionally and socially. Miss Reid arrived in the office later and was present when Miss Reynolds rang Miss McGrath. Miss McGrath was the newly appointed Principal Social Worker (Residential & Day Care) for East Belfast & Castlereagh and as such was responsible for Kincora. She was based in the offices at Purdysburn Hospital. There was some confusion as to whether it was left that Miss McGrath was to contact Mrs Fiddis or Mrs Fiddis was to contact her. That is of no significance, because Miss McGrath accepted that she received Mrs Reynolds's phone call. Miss McGrath told the Hughes Inquiry that the information she received related to sexual impropriety, but she had no clear recollection of the detail. She did not make a note of what she was told, and did not take the matter any further because the call went out of her mind. She explained that she was new in her post and was under extreme pressure at the time; the office was under staffed and she accepted that she may not have allowed enough time to talk to Miss Reynolds, and she did not appreciate the importance of what she was being told.[71] Because she did not remember to do so, the matter was never taken forward, and so she did not inform her superior, Mr Clive Scoular, of the call.

113 We consider there were a number of systemic failings in the way Mrs Fiddis's report was dealt with by the EHSSB.

(1) No written record was made of what she had to say.

(2) Miss McGrath did not follow the matter up by contacting Mrs Fiddis to see whether she could add anything to the account she had given to Miss Reynolds.

(3) Miss McGrath did not tell Mr Scoular about the call.

PART SEVEN

March 1976 and the visit by DC Cullen

114 DC Cullen contacted the EHSSB in March 1976 and spoke to Mr Bunting about allegations that had been made about McGrath to DC Cullen. We shall return to this when we consider the way the RUC dealt with the information it had received about McGrath, but at this stage we examine how the EHSSB responded to what it was told by DC Cullen. To put the matter in context it is necessary to explain briefly that in 1974 Roy Garland made a number of allegations about McGrath to DC Cullen, who immediately contacted Assistant Chief Constable Meharg, who was the head of the Crime Department of the RUC at the time. We examine later in this chapter why these allegations were not properly investigated in 1974. Roy Garland spoke to DC Cullen about the matter again in 1976; DC Cullen again consulted ACC Meharg who instructed him to contact the EHSSB.

71 KIN 75269.

115 As a result of ACC Meharg's instructions, DC Cullen contacted the EHSSB and met Mr Bunting on 19 February 1976. Mr Bunting was the Assistant Director in charge of Family Child Care Services in the EHSSB. During their meeting DC Cullen gave Mr Bunting a general outline of the nature of his enquiries into McGrath, and in the course of the discussion he referred to Mains as the senior member of the residential staff at Kincora. The reference to Mains prompted Mr Bunting to recall the Mason file, which he then produced to DC Cullen and allowed him to read it. DC Cullen asked him for a copy. Mr Bunting explained that he considered he did not have authority to provide that but he would seek instructions. He subsequently contacted Mr Gilliland, who was the Director of Social Services, and told him about the meeting with DC Cullen.

116 At this point in the sequence of events we emphasise the following aspects of what the EHSSB and the RUC learnt as a result of the meeting between Mr Bunting and DC Cullen. Until then Mr Bunting and Mr Gilliland had no reason to believe that there were any concerns about Kincora, because none of the matters to which we have referred that occurred after 1971 had been communicated to them. When Mr Bunting received the Mason file from Mr Mason in 1973 he put it in a drawer in his office where it lay until Mr Bunting produced it to DC Cullen during the meeting. The comments by DC Cullen revealed that there were also concerns about McGrath who was the subject of a police investigation. This meant that the EHSSB were now made aware of fresh allegations post-dating the 1971 allegations, although at that point DC Cullen had revealed very little detail about the more recent allegations. It is clear that Mr Bunting immediately appreciated that the Mason file could be relevant to the matters being investigated by DC Cullen because he remembered the existence of the file, produced it and showed it to DC Cullen. DC Cullen, and the RUC in the broader sense, learned for the first time that there had been more allegations about Kincora that were known to the EHSSB but which had not been revealed to the police. These related to Mains, and so DC Cullen now knew that there were allegations about a second member of the staff at Kincora. This information was clearly relevant to, and added a new dimension to, his investigations into McGrath.

117 Mr Gilliland and Mr Bunting met DC Cullen on 15 March 1976. They agreed DC Cullen could copy the Mason file and he took it away for that purpose, returning the original in due course. By the end of both meetings the EHSSB had only limited information about the nature of DC Cullen's investigations. He had told them that these were extremely confidential, that his senior officers were not aware of the investigation but he was reporting to ACC Meharg at RUC Headquarters. During their first meeting he told Mr Bunting that he was inquiring into homosexuality and paramilitary activities, and that "prominent people" were involved. At some stage he also referred to a letter, or letters, written by McGrath which indicated homosexual tendencies. He expressed concern that McGrath should be working in Kincora, because of the allegations made to him by his informant about McGrath's homosexuality. It is unclear whether DC Cullen went into detail about what that may have involved. DC Cullen, unfortunately was not in a condition to be interviewed for the purposes of our Inquiry and sadly has since died. He told the Hughes Inquiry that he would have told Mr Bunting about the type of behaviour in which McGrath had been engaged in the past, but Messrs Gilliland and Bunting said the only detail they received was about the letters, and the Hughes Inquiry was inclined to accept their evidence.[72] We therefore proceed on the basis that the recollection of Messrs Gilliland and Bunting is to be preferred.

118 It was common ground that DC Cullen accepted that Mr Gilliland and Mr Bunting would have to inform Mr Scoular of the allegations because he was the District Social Services Officer responsible for Kincora. Either at the second meeting, or subsequently, but more likely afterwards, DC Cullen was provided with a list of all the boys who had been discharged from Kincora from the time McGrath started working there until that date.[73] At the end of the 15 March meeting it was agreed that DC Cullen would inform them of any information that would enable them to take action in relation to the staff at Kincora.[74]

72 KIN 75272.
73 KIN 72409.
74 KIN 75272.

The EHSSB actions after the meeting with DC Cullen

119 Mr Bunting briefed Mr Scoular on the Cullen/Meharg investigation when he went to Mr Scoular's office, and he gave Mr Scoular a copy of the Mason file. Mr Scoular was asked to prepare the list of those discharged from Kincora during McGrath's time, and he did so. It therefore seems the list was provided to DC Cullen after the 15 March meeting. Mr Scoular told the Hughes Inquiry that although he was not given any written directions or advice as to the action to take with the information he was given, he was told that he was to brief his senior residential & day care management staff about the matter. However, Mr Scoular did not tell Mr Bunting about the anonymous phone call received by Mr McKay at the Holywood Road office on 23 January 1974, nor did he make any reference to Mrs Wilson's subsequent investigation. Whilst an anonymous call is by its very nature difficult to assess, and may, depending on the detail of its content, be of little or no value to the person to whom it is made, had Mr Bunting been told about that call it would have provided another piece of evidence to be added to the Mason file. Whilst it is unlikely that it would have been regarded as significant by itself, had it been added to the information from DC Cullen it may have caused some additional concern to Mr Bunting and Mr Gilliland. We consider that it was a systemic failing by Mr Scoular not to tell Mr Bunting about the January anonymous call when Mr Bunting briefed him on the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

120 We examine later what happened afterwards so far as the RUC and the Cullen/Meharg investigation was concerned. We are satisfied that the EHSSB was in a difficult position after the meeting on 15 March. Mr Gilliland and Mr Bunting had provided DC Cullen with the Mason file and he had made a copy. They also provided him with a list of residents of Kincora that he requested. They knew that a police investigation of a highly confidential nature was underway which was being overseen by an assistant chief constable. Whilst this investigation concerned one of their staff at the hostel he was apparently not the only person, because they had been told that others were involved but were given no information about the others, other than they were "prominent people". Nor were they told what the involvement of these "prominent people" with McGrath or Kincora might be, other than the investigation was into homosexuality and paramilitary activities. It would seem that they were told nothing more about the alleged homosexuality other than McGrath had written letters which indicated homosexual tendencies, although DC Cullen had expressed concern that McGrath was working in Kincora. This concern was presumably to suggest at least that a homosexual male could pose a threat to the boys in his care. Although this might be a concern shared by many at the time, it was not something that was justifiable, or which a responsible employer in the childcare field could regard as sufficient in itself to take action against the employee concerned. In any event, DC Cullen also told them that the allegations related to some time in the past and that there was no allegation of homosexual activities at Kincora.[75]

121 If the EHSSB were to take independent and overt action to question McGrath or other staff or residents at Kincora about homosexuality, this might well interfere with the police investigation, which clearly should have taken precedence. However, there were some steps that could have been taken, and as we have already explained, Mr Bunting briefed Mr Scoular, but no written directions were given to Mr Scoular as to what was to be done. Mr Gilliland told the Hughes Inquiry he gave a verbal direction through Mr Bunting that closer supervision of Kincora should take place. Mr Higham was an assistant principal social worker who was appointed Mains's line manager in the Residential & Day Care management team in August 1976. After his appointment, the frequency of inspections of Kincora increased and exceeded the statutory requirement of monthly visits. The Hughes Inquiry noted it was not unusual for three or four visits to be recorded in a single month.[76] However, as we now know, these visits did not deter McGrath from committing further offences.

122 The usefulness of such visits may have been reduced, because it is unclear exactly how much information Mr Scoular did pass on to his subordinates, who were directly responsible for Kincora. Miss McGrath was responsible until she was succeeded by Mr Higham in August 1976. Mr Scoular told the Hughes Inquiry that Miss McGrath was made aware of the Cullen/Meharg investigation and shown the Mason file in the spring of 1976. She said she learned of the Cullen/Meharg investigation through Mr Bunting, and her recollection was that she was shown the file after Mr Higham read it. Mr Higham said he had no information about suspected homosexual activity at Kincora before October 1977, and did not become aware of the Cullen/Meharg investigation, or see the Mason file, until then.[77] Whatever the correct position was, we accept the situation was a delicate one, and that care needed to be taken to ensure that information about the Cullen/Meharg investigation should not be widely or loosely disseminated. Nevertheless, we regard it as unacceptable that there was any confusion or uncertainty about who had seen what. This should not have occurred if clear written instructions had been issued to the Residential & Day Care management team explaining exactly what was to be done and why.

75 KIN 75272.
76 KIN 75253.

123 These were not the only unsatisfactory aspects of the handling of the information from DC Cullen on the part of the EHSSB. At least the chair of the Personal Social Services Committee (PSSC) of the Board, and the chair of the Board should have been informed on a confidential basis. Secondly, the Department of Health and Social Services should have been informed. It was unsatisfactory that none of these individuals or bodies were alerted to what was happening, even if that was done on a very limited basis without mentioning Kincora itself, or referring to McGrath or Mains. Depending upon the outcome of the Cullen/Meharg investigations this was potentially a very serious matter for the Board, and both the chair of the PSSC and the chair of the Board and the Department should have been informed on a confidential basis of at least the outline of what was happening at that stage.

124 Mr Bunting told the Hughes Inquiry that following the 17 March meeting he made three or four telephone calls to DC Cullen, who agreed that was the case. Mr Gilliland, who was aware of them, suggested the calls may have extended over more than eighteen months. If that was the case, it would suggest that the last call may have been made in the autumn or early winter of 1977. No record was made of these calls. Mr Bunting's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, which we infer it accepted, was that in the last conversation he had with DC Cullen he was told that a report had gone to ACC Meharg, and that there was no evidence on which the Board could take action. Mr Bunting also got the impression that either DC Cullen's informant could not substantiate what he had said, or had ceased to provide information.

125 As we shall see, there is no evidence that any final report was ever submitted to ACC Meharg, or anyone else in the RUC, by DC Cullen. ACC Meharg is dead, and DC Cullen was unfit to give evidence and has since died. It is therefore impossible for us at this remove to resolve how Mr Bunting came to be given such information or impression, because such information as is now available suggests the Cullen/Meharg investigation simply petered out without ever being brought to a formal or final conclusion.

77 KIN 75274.

126 We are satisfied that more should have been done by the EHSSB to find out from the RUC what stage their investigation had reached, and when the outcome might be known. Despite the sensitivity of that investigation, Mr Gilliland and Mr Bunting had been told that it was being overseen by ACC Meharg, and we consider that it was not enough to phone DC Cullen from time to time once an extended period had elapsed. We consider a formal written enquiry should have been made to ACC Meharg by Mr Gilliland as the Director of Social Services asking what the position was, and at the very latest such a letter should have been sent in March 1977 when a year had gone by.

127 Once Mr Bunting learned from DC Cullen that there was no evidence on which the Board could take action it is unsurprising that the EHSSB did not take further steps. All it had been told was that McGrath was suspected of being homosexual on the basis of letters written to someone in the past. There was no suggestion that that person had been a resident of Kincora and, as the Hughes Inquiry explained, DC Cullen did not transmit any allegation that McGrath was engaging in homosexual activity with residents at Kincora.[78] In our view the end result of the Cullen/Meharg investigation so far as the EHSSB was aware was that the only allegation was that McGrath was suspected of being a homosexual. The Board had never seen the letters on which the suspicion was based. Other than to take steps to ensure that McGrath and Kincora were closely monitored and that any further suspicions or concerns about McGrath's behaviour, or indeed the behaviour of Mains, were reported to senior management at Board headquarters there was nothing they could do. This was because there was nothing on which an internal investigation, let alone possible disciplinary action, could be based because an allegation of homosexuality alone would not justify such an internal investigation unless there was a sustainable allegation of improper behaviour of some sort by McGrath or Mains, and so far as the Board's officers were aware there was none. Had the Board officers been told of the rumours and anonymous phone calls received by their subordinates in recent years that might well have increased their concern, but they needed more than rumours lacking specific detail before they could take disciplinary action.

78 KIN 75276.

128 Nevertheless, as we have indicated, there were a number of unsatisfactory aspects to the response of the EHSSB to the news of the Cullen/Meharg investigation, and we consider that there were the following systemic failings in their response.

(1) The Director of Social Services should have given clear written instructions to Mr Scoular to (a) increase supervision of Kincora, McGrath and Mains; and (b) to share the Mason file with Miss McGrath and Mr Higham when he succeeded her.

(2) Mr Scoular should have told Mr Bunting about the January 1974 anonymous phone call.

(3) (a) The Chairman of the EHSSB, (b) the Chairman of the Personal Social Services Committee, and (c) the DHSS, should all have been informed of the existence of the Cullen/Meharg investigation on a confidential basis, and that it involved a member of the EHSSB staff working in a residential hostel.

(4) Written approaches should have been made by the Director of Social Services to ACC Meharg at regular intervals, starting no later than 17 March 1977, in order to find out what was happening to the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

(5) All communications within the Board relating to these matters should have been properly minuted or recorded and added to the Mason file.

Valerie Shaw and Rita Johnston

129 In 1976 Rita Johnston was employed by the EHSSB and was in charge of the St Martin's Day Centre in East Belfast, which provided occupation for adults through various crafts. Although employed by the Board, Mrs Johnston was a handicrafts instructress and not a social worker. The Day Centre was also the responsibility of the East Belfast & Castlereagh District Residential & Day Care management team. The Hughes Inquiry established that in October or November 1976 Mrs Johnston was introduced to Valerie Shaw at a prayer meeting in the home of a mutual friend. Mrs Johnston was told by Miss Shaw that the wife of R 36, who was an outpatient at the Day Centre, was distraught because her husband was suicidal as a result of a previous homosexual relationship with McGrath. This man had never been a resident in Kincora, and the relationship, which developed elsewhere, related to the 1940s and 1950s. Significantly, there was no allegation of homosexual misconduct occurring at the hostel.[79] Miss Shaw also told Mrs Johnston about the letters from McGrath which DC Cullen had described to Mr Bunting, but she did not show them to Mrs Johnston. Miss Shaw said McGrath was employed in a boys' home somewhere on the Newtownards Road, but it was not clear to the Hughes Inquiry whether she mentioned Kincora by name.

130 Mrs Johnston suggested to Miss Shaw that Miss Shaw contact the management at Purdysburn, although she could not remember if she gave Mrs McGrath's name as the person to contact there. In any event, Miss Shaw did not follow up that suggestion. However, Mrs Johnston checked with R 36's social worker in the psychiatric unit at Purdysburn Hospital because she was concerned that R 36 had access to dangerous tools in her Day Centre. His social worker reassured her that R 36 was not a danger to himself or others. Miss Shaw and Mrs Johnston met again at a subsequent prayer meeting in February 1977; their recollections as to what was said on that occasion differed. Mrs Johnston said she received very little information from Miss Shaw, and in our view she acted entirely properly by suggesting to Miss Shaw that she should approach management in Purdysburn. As we have already recorded, Miss Shaw decided not to do that. We do not consider that Mrs Johnston should have taken any further steps.

The Reverend Martin Smyth MP

131 The Reverend Martin Smyth told the Hughes Inquiry in a written statement that in 1976 he telephoned the EHSSB because of concerns he had about McGrath as a result of what both Miss Shaw and another (unnamed) source said to him. He said he believed that he spoke to a Mr Jackson at the University Street office of the Board, but as there is no record of such a call, and the police enquiries at the time failed to identify anyone called Jackson who could have been the person concerned, we cannot take the matter any further.

79 KIN 75277.

Anna Hyland and R 18

132 In the previous chapter we examined R 18's experiences in Kincora. Although it was later established that McGrath engaged in sexual activity with him, and McGrath subsequently pleaded guilty to a charge of gross indecency involving him, in August 1977 R 18 gave a much less explicit account to Mrs Hyland. She was his social worker at the time, and during a discussion on 16 August 1977 when asked how he was getting on with the staff at Kincora R 18 was very hesitant. After some probing on her part, he said he was concerned about the attitude of one staff member towards him. Although she did not name McGrath as the person in her memorandum of 9 September 1977 it is common cause that the staff member was McGrath. R 18 told her that McGrath had been having long and intimate discussions with him about sex, and had "embraced" him on a number of occasions. R 18 said that he had told Mains about this, and emphasised to Mrs Hyland that he did not want there to be any unpleasantness about it, or for McGrath to lose his job. She gave R 18 advice as to how to deal with the matter if this should happen again. She spoke to R 18 again on 1 September, and he told her there had been no more incidents, he had had little contact since with McGrath, and was no longer worried about the situation.

133 Although her memorandum of 9 September 1977 does not say so, Mains later accepted he had been told these things by R 18, but had done nothing about it until Mrs Hyland spoke to him. She discussed these matters with Mains on 17 August, and he said he would consider whether he should discuss the matter with Mr Higham, who, it will be recalled, had succeeded Mrs McGrath as the line manager for Kincora the previous year. Mrs Hyland did not leave the matter there because she discussed it with her principal social worker. They agreed that McGrath's actions could simply have been an affectionate response, and that the evidence from R 18 was not sufficient to suggest any kind of improper assault. They agreed she should mention the matter informally to Mr Higham.[80]

134 A meeting took place between Mrs Hyland, Mr Higham and Mains on 12 October 1977. Mains produced a report dated 11 October 1977 in which he referred to the "embracing", but added some significant detail about the second incident, which he said happened in the bathroom

80 KIN 11047.

while R 18 was only wearing pyjamas. Mains referred to that embrace as R 18 being "caressed", which implies more significant physical contact than a mere "embrace". Even more significantly, Mains recounted a different episode when R 18 alleged that McGrath approached him in the bathroom whilst R 18 was applying medical cream to his body, saying to R 18 that he would look better without the towel around his waist, and that he (McGrath) had been a qualified masseur. R 18 also alleged that McGrath then attempted to massage R 18's shoulders.[81]

135 Mr Higham sent a report of the meeting of 12 October, together with the memoranda from Mrs Hyland and Mains, to Mr Scoular. In his covering memorandum, Mr Higham described what happened between R 18 and McGrath as "questionable". He concluded that, "nothing of a sexual nature appeared to happen at any time" which seems a surprising conclusion in the light of Mains's reference to McGrath's alleged action in saying R 18 would look better without the towel round him and massaging R 18's shoulders. Mr Higham recommended that whilst no, "direct action should be taken against Mr McGrath", Mains and Mrs Hyland, "would keep a particularly close eye on the whole situation".[82] Nowhere in Mr Higham's memorandum did he suggest that Mains had been asked why he had not drawn these episodes to Mr Higham's attention. In his response to the Inquiry Warning Letter Mr Higham explained that at the time he assumed Mains was fulfilling his duties as the officer in charge and could be trusted with regard to his dealings with McGrath. Therefore there seemed no need to question Mains's actions which appeared to be appropriate. Mr Higham observed "It was assumed that Mains was a watchdog in the situation and not a perpetrator himself." We accepted this explanation.

136 Mr Scoular responded in a memorandum dated 20 October 1977. In view of its content this deserves to be quoted in full:

> "I have read the reports you sent me concerning [R 18]. I am still unhappy about Mr McGrath's relationships with the boys in the Hostel. Whilst I appreciate that his 'extra curricular' activities have probably some bearing on the situation, I feel we will have to 'grasp the nettle' and in some way discuss the whole situation with Mr McGrath in the near future. I well appreciate that the situation is further complicated by Mr Mains's reticence about freely discussing what goes on in Kincora with you. I think it would be valuable for Mrs McGrath and yourself to have an early discussion with me.

81 KIN 10960.
82 KIN 10958.

As I mentioned to you yesterday I find the content of Mrs Hyland's report and the content of that prepared by Mr Mains to be almost two different stories. I will try and make some discrete enquiries and see what I can find out."[83]

137 We consider the following aspects of this memo to be significant:

(1) Mr Scoular was unhappy about McGrath's "relationship with the boys in the hostel", implying McGrath's relationship with others apart from R 18.

(2) He appears to have recognised, albeit in an oblique fashion, that Mains was not prepared to freely discuss what was going on in Kincora with Mr Higham, which was presumably an acknowledgment that Mains had not reported these matters as he should have done to Mr Higham.

(3) That it was necessary to, "grasp the nettle", that is to discuss the whole situation with McGrath in the near future.

(4) His reference to McGrath's "extra curricular activities" appears to be a reference to his paramilitary involvement with Tara, and we return to this shortly.

138 By this time Mr Scoular was aware of the Mason file and the Cullen/Meharg investigation, and had been instructed to keep a close watch on McGrath and Kincora. In our view he should have immediately referred this matter to Mr Bunting, together with the memoranda from Mrs Hyland and from Mains. He did not do so, nor did he "grasp the nettle" as he had accepted was necessary. We are satisfied that a contributory factor to his failure to do so, if not the entire reason, lies in his reference to McGrath's "extra curricular activities". The Hughes Inquiry concluded that:

"Mr Scoular was apprehensive of Mr McGrath's alleged paramilitary links to some degree, and that this, in conjunction with the fact that the homosexual implications of the [R 18] and [Richard Kerr] cases were unsubstantiated, clouded his judgement as to whether Mr McGrath should be interviewed or these cases should be referred to Board Headquarters".[84]

83 KIN 10965.
84 KIN 75291.

139 We are satisfied that Mr Scoular's failure to "grasp the nettle", and to report these matters to Board headquarters, was a systemic failing. Had he done so then, in our view, his superiors would have had no option but to report the matter to the police. Whatever view might be taken of R 18's allegations against McGrath, we consider that there were clear sexual overtones to these allegations, and the matter should have been reported to the police. Had it been, then at the very least it would have provided a reason to consider the point reached by the Meharg investigation, and reactivate that investigation if necessary. It should also have prompted the Board to consider disciplinary action against Mains for his failure to bring R 18's complaints to the attention of Mr Higham.

The concerns of DC Scully in October 1977

140 DC Scully was the investigating officer for the burglary offences that led to Richard Kerr being brought before the Juvenile Court in October 1977. In the last chapter we recorded that DC Scully spoke to Sgt Sillery of the Juvenile Liaison Branch at Strandtown RUC about his suspicion that there might be some connection of a homosexual nature between Mains and Richard Kerr. DC Scully told Mrs Helen Gogarty, Richard Kerr's social worker, of his suspicions and she told Mr David Morrow, her senior social worker. As a result Mr Morrow went to the next remand hearing and spoke to DC Scully. Mr Morrow and Mrs Gogarty then went to the Purdysburn offices of the Residential & Day Centre management where they discussed DC Scully's concerns with Mr Higham. It will be recalled that Mr Higham was also involved around this time in the discussions with Mrs Hyland, which we have already considered. Although Mr Higham's manuscript note of that meeting was dated 2 October, the Hughes Inquiry explained that date was a mistake, and the meeting probably took place on 21 October, which was the day of Richard Kerr's next court appearance. The note makes it clear that the meeting discussed several matters that might be relevant to the question as to whether there might be a homosexual relationship between Mains and Richard Kerr:

(1) Mains was a friend of R 2, who was a known homosexual.

(2) Mains had shown a preference for Richard Kerr.

(3) There were references to the drinking of sherry, something Richard Kerr had disclosed when explaining his threat to "tell all" about Mains if Mains did not attend the hearings in the Juvenile Court.

(4) Richard Kerr was friends with two middle-aged men, a comment that appears to relate to KIN 340 and KIN 341 who had been with Richard Kerr on the expedition to Larne.

(5) An entry "Mr X/nights" appears to refer to one of these two men.

(6) Other police officers consulted by DC Scully were also of the opinion that Mains was homosexual.

(7) Mr Lindsay Conway, who it will be recalled was the social worker at Rathgael Training School to which Richard Kerr had been remanded by the Juvenile Court, had concerns about the lack of control over the criminal behaviour of Kincora residents such as Stephen Waring.[85]

141 Two further meetings were held to discuss these issues, both taking place on 14 November. The first was at the Purdysburn offices of the Residential & Day Care section and was attended by Mr Scoular, Mrs McGrath, Mr Higham, Mr Morrow and Mr Conway. There was some dispute before the Hughes Inquiry as to what was actually decided at this meeting, but later that day Mr Scoular and Mr Higham went to Strandtown RUC Station where they spoke to Sgt Sillery. Mr Sillery later produced a note which he said was made contemporaneously. This was quoted by the Hughes Inquiry, and it is sufficient to note that it recorded the following points:

(1) Mains was thought by certain CID officers to be homosexual and had been seen in the company of known homosexuals.

(2) It could be inferred that some of the staff at Kincora were homosexual, which would suggest at least one other staff member apart from Mains.

(3) Sgt Sillery had a good opinion of Mains, and was of the view "that if [Mains] was homosexual he would have had the sense not to let his desire take him in the direction of the boys".

(4) Since there had been no allegations for fifteen years (since Kincora came into existence), "the chances are that there was no story to break".

(5) Sgt Sillery had no knowledge of the Cullen/Meharg investigations, and neither it nor the Mason file appear to have been mentioned during the meeting. No doubt if he had been told about either, or both, his opinion as to the likelihood of Mains sexually interfering with the residents of Kincora might have been significantly different.

85 KIN 75285.

142 The existence of the Mason file and the Cullen/Meharg investigations were of course known to both Mr Scoular and Mr Higham by this stage, and by 14 November Mr Scoular had responded to Mr Higham's memorandum about R 18. Nevertheless it would seem that he did not mention that matter either to Sgt Sillery on that occasion, although the Hughes Inquiry inferred that Mr Scoular did refer to it at a later meeting with Sgt Sillery and DC Scully on 5 December.[86]

143 Although Mr Scoular spoke to Mr Bunting by phone about these matters, the Hughes Inquiry concluded that Mr Scoular did not tell Mr Bunting about Richard Kerr, nor about R 18. We are satisfied that he should have done so. As we have seen, in October he clearly recognised there were important issues about McGrath's behaviour and the failure of Mains to inform Mr Higham about R 18's reference to McGrath's behaviour. Mr Scoular's failure to pass on information relating to Richard Kerr and in relation to R 18 was indefensible. He did institute a daily monitoring report that was to be submitted to Residential & Day Care on a weekly basis, but the Hughes Inquiry concluded this was directed at the disciplinary problems, such as coming in late or getting into trouble with the police, that were a matter of serious concern at the time.[87] We consider that the failure by Mr Scoular to report the matters relating to R 18 and Richard Kerr to Board Headquarters amounted to a systemic failing.

January 1978

144 On 11 January 1978 Mrs Hyland telephoned Mr Higham to tell him that R 18 had told her Mains had come in drunk the previous Friday night, wakened him and asked him if anything was wrong. Mr Higham questioned Mains, who denied being inebriated, but he said that R 18 had not been asleep and that he had asked him how R 18 was getting on with McGrath. We consider this matter was properly investigated, and in the absence of any corroborating evidence for R 18's account would not have justified any disciplinary action against Mains.

86 KIN 75289.
87 KIN 75290.

Speculation about Richard Kerr and Kincora by social services staff in 1979

145 When dealing with Richard Kerr's experiences after he was discharged from Borstal in February 1979 in the previous chapter we referred to a memorandum written by Mrs Judith Kennedy. By that time she had succeeded Mrs Helen Gogarty as Kerr's de facto social worker, although he was also the responsibility of the Probation Board because he remained on licence following his discharge from Borstal. We now consider why Mrs Kennedy felt that Kincora was unsuitable for Richard Kerr at that time. She confirmed to the Hughes Inquiry that as Richard Kerr was now nearly eighteen Kincora was the obvious place for him to reside after he left Borstal, but as we have seen in the previous chapter he went to live in Williamson House for several weeks. In her memorandum of 14 March 1979 Mrs Kennedy dealt with the issue of his accommodation in the following passage, which we take from 4.200 of the Hughes Inquiry Report, because part of the original was obliterated for reasons we shall discuss shortly. Relating to accommodation for Richard Kerr, Mrs Kennedy wrote:

> "We all felt he needed a sheltered environment. Kincora Hostel was ruled out because apparently Kincora is under investigation because of the Warden's alleged involvement with a homosexual circle. This investigation has apparently been going on for several years and Kincora is still admitting boys. The indications that [Richard Kerr] has homosexual tendencies are tenuous, indeed (Borstal) reported that throughout his stay there was no sign of homosexual inclinations." (emphasis added)[88]

146 The words underlined in this passage, and the reasons for their inclusion and for the later deletion of them, were examined in great detail by the Hughes Inquiry at 4.200 to 4.213 of their Report, not just for their significance in their own right but as part of a wider examination of what Mrs Kennedy and Mrs Gogarty believed to be the position at Kincora as the result of what they were told by Mr Morrow. That was significant because it was Mrs Kennedy and Mrs Gogarty who approached Mr McKenna through a third party, and his article in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980 was instrumental in the establishment of the Caskey Phase One investigations which resulted in the imprisonment of Mains,

88 KIN 75293.

Semple and McGrath. As well as hearing from Mrs Kennedy and Mrs Gogarty, the Hughes Inquiry heard from Mr Morrow, and other relevant witnesses, and as we agree with the analysis and conclusions of the Hughes Inquiry on this matter, it is sufficient to refer to their findings in general terms.

147 The Hughes Inquiry concluded that the underlined passage represented the views of Mrs Kennedy's superior, Mr Morrow, who saw the hostel as unsatisfactory and suspected (correctly as it turned out) that Richard Kerr was homosexual. Mrs Kennedy told the Hughes Inquiry that Mr Morrow told her that Kincora was under police investigation, and referred to his involvement in a previous case concerning a resident of the Valetta Park Hostel in Newtownards. She told the Sussex Police in 1982 that there was some link between that case and Mains. Mr Morrow accepted to the Hughes Inquiry that he was mistaken in his belief that the boy in the Valetta Park case had been resident in Kincora, and he accepted that the connection between that case and Mains had been pure speculation on his part.[89]

148 Mrs Kennedy's report was considered in its original form by Mr Blair, who was the Principal Social Worker (Fieldwork Services) for the North & West Belfast District which had responsibility for Richard Kerr at that time. Although the exact sequence of events was not clear, Mr Blair queried the underlined passage about Kincora with Mrs Kennedy, and it seems that she accepted that these words should be deleted because it would be unfair to include them as they came from one or two people talking in the office and she did not wish to name them. In fact, Mrs Kennedy's only source was Mr Morrow. Mr Blair then deleted the offending passage from the Report, although the original version remained unaltered in his office. He accepted that Kincora would be an unsuitable placement for Richard Kerr owing to his homosexual susceptibilities and the undesirability of putting him among other young men of his age.[90]

149 Mr Blair had no knowledge of any previous concerns about the Kincora staff, and Mr Morrow had not told Mr Blair about his concerns.[91] We accept that Mr Blair did not make these deletions from Mrs Kennedy's report for any improper reason. He had asked Mrs Kennedy what the basis for them was, and when she said it was only rumour he understandably concluded that it would be wrong to give the rumours credence by allowing the passage to remain in a document that would inevitably have a fairly wide circulation. However, we agree with the Hughes Inquiry that Mr Blair should have insisted that Mrs Kennedy reveal to him the information she had, and her sources, so that any relevant information could be passed to the East Belfast and Castlereagh Residential and Day Care management and to Board Headquarters if necessary, for their consideration. He should also have contacted the East Belfast & Castlereagh Residential and Care management directly to ask them whether there was any substance in what Mrs Kennedy had said to him, even though after his discussion with her he regarded the references as based on rumour and did not believe that there was anything in it.[92]

89 KIN 75293.
90 KIN 75294.
91 KIN 75295.

150 Had Mr Blair done so, that would have been an additional fragment of information that could have been added to the other rumours and allegations that had come to the attention of the management of East Belfast and Castlereagh Residential and Day Care. We consider Mr Blair's failure to find out more about the basis of Mrs Kennedy's concerns, and to tell the East Belfast and Castlereagh Residential and Day Care management about them, were systemic failings.

151 By late 1979 it is clear that Mrs Kennedy and Mrs Gogarty had become concerned that something was amiss with Kincora, that police had investigated it in the past, but despite concerns that Mains was homosexual he remained in charge of Kincora. In December 1979 Mrs Gogarty and Mrs Kennedy met socially and discussed Kincora. As a result they decided to approach the press, and Mrs Gogarty did so through a friend, and this culminated in Mr McKenna's article in the Irish Independent. Their concerns consisted largely of what Mr Morrow said to them. He was their superior, and, as the Hughes Inquiry recorded, he acknowledged to them in evidence that he, "speculated freely about matters for which he had no evidence in fact".[93] The Hughes Inquiry went on to say that because Mrs Gogarty "was an impressionable and inexperienced officer [she] accepted Mr Morrow's speculations at face value and retailed them on that basis". [94]

92 KIN 75295.
93 KIN 75297.
94 KIN 75297.

152 Mrs Gogarty was asked at the Hughes Inquiry what led her to approach a journalist, and she agreed that it was because of the events involving Richard Kerr in the autumn of 1977, which involved the concerns about a relationship between Mains and Richard Kerr, and their feeling in 1979 that although Richard Kerr was no longer in Kincora, "there were other boys there and we both felt that if you had been at risk then other boys were at risk as well".[95] When asked why she did not take her concerns to Mr Gilliland, who was the Director of Social Services, or to Mr Bunting as an Assistant Director of Social Services, she explained, "... I was afraid to do that because I had been told that the decision to remove [Richard Kerr] from Kincora was taken from the very top. I didn't know what that meant".[96] It became clear that Mrs Gogarty felt at the time that Mr Gilliland might have been involved in some way in the decision to prevent Richard Kerr going to Kincora, but she conceded to the Hughes Inquiry that on the basis of her greater experience by that time it would be most unlikely that Mr Gilliland made any recommendation in respect of Richard Kerr.[97]

153 The Hughes Inquiry concluded that Mr Gilliland's involvement was limited to the question of where legal responsibility for Richard Kerr's accommodation rested once he was released from Borstal.[98] It will be recalled from the previous chapter that there was a serious dispute between the Probation Board and the EHSSB about where Richard Kerr should live in the weeks after his release from Borstal and before he was discharged from care. Whilst it is clear Mrs Gogarty and Mrs Kennedy were mistaken when they believed that there was a homosexual connection between Mains and another boy in Kincora as had been suggested by Mr Morrow, or that Richard Kerr had been removed from Kincora for some improper reason, it is likely that their concerns were also influenced by the events of October 1977 when Richard Kerr was committing offences and when DC Scully expressed concerns at that time about the relationship between Mains and Richard Kerr. It is also clear that they were strongly influenced by Mr Morrow's "speculating freely about matters for which he had no evidence in fact". However, despite their mistaken beliefs, it would be wrong to criticise Mrs Kennedy or Mrs Gogarty for taking their concerns to the press. Had they not done so, then it is likely that the highly unsatisfactory way

95 KIN 73274.
96 KIN 73274.
97 KIN 73287.
98 KIN 75294.

the EHSSB had approached concerns brought to it by residents and others about Mains and McGrath would have continued for some time because of the many failings by the Board to properly evaluate the information the Board's employees had received, and after 1971 the repeated failures to pass information to the proper authorities, all of which contributed to the continuation of unchecked sexual abuse of residents of Kincora. We agree with the conclusion of the Hughes Inquiry that Mrs Kennedy and Mrs Gogarty acted with integrity, and their approach was prompted by their genuine concern for the welfare of the children in care, and was crucial in bringing about a long overdue and thorough police investigation of Kincora.

PART EIGHT

Roy Garland and the RUC involvement with Kincora in the 1970s

154 In this chapter, and in the previous chapter, we have referred to suspicions expressed by DC Scully in 1977 about a possible homosexual connection between Mains and Richard Kerr; suspicions that were supported at the time by Sgt Sillery, and which were considered by Mr Scoular and others at that time. Unknown to DC Scully and Sgt Sillery, there had been no fewer than four previous occasions when other RUC officers had been alerted to concerns about Kincora.

(1) An anonymous Robophone message on 23 May 1973.

(2) The meeting between Roy Garland and DC Cullen on 1 March 1974, and DC Cullen's subsequent meetings with ACC Meharg in 1974.

(3) A meeting between Valerie Shaw and D/Supt John Graham in June 1974.

(4) Another meeting between Roy Garland and DC Cullen in January 1976, which led to further contact between DC Cullen and ACC Meharg resulting in DC Cullen's contact with Mr Bunting on 19 February 1976. We have already considered the response of the EHSSB to that meeting, and in the remaining parts of this chapter we examine the response of the RUC to each of these events.

155 Although in chronological sequence the meeting between Valerie Shaw and D/Supt Graham occurred between (2) and (4) above, we shall refer to (2) and (4) as the Cullen/Meharg investigations for the sake of convenience. It is easier to follow what were in many respects separate events if we examine the Robophone message first, then Valerie Shaw's meeting with D/Supt Graham, followed by the two stages of the Cullen/Meharg investigation. Although these four episodes were distinct in many ways in so far as the RUC were concerned, each had a common link to the actions of Roy Garland. It is therefore appropriate to examine his connection with these matters first because his actions were central to each of them, and that was due to his connections with William McGrath.

Roy Garland

156 Because of his involvement in the matters we are about to consider, the Inquiry invited Roy Garland to be a core participant in the Inquiry, and offered to provide him with legal representation at the Inquiry's expense, subject to his means. He was also requested to provide a witness statement to the Inquiry dealing with questions we considered could assist our work. He declined the offer to become a core participant, and did not provide a witness statement. As will be apparent, the Inquiry obtained a considerable volume of material relating to Roy Garland, and we therefore considered it unnecessary to exercise our power to compel him to provide a witness statement and/or documents, or to give evidence. The correspondence between Roy Garland and the Inquiry about these matters in which he gave his reasons for not co-operating with our Inquiry can be found on the Inquiry website in the Module 15 section at Day 204.

157 On 31 May 2016, Day 204 of the Inquiry's public hearings, the Chairman stated that even though Roy Garland and others had decided not to accept the invitation to be core participants, and had not provided witness statements, the door was still open to them if they wanted to change their minds. He said:

> "If they change their minds and are prepared to provide the witness statements and answer the questions we have posed to them by close of business on Friday 10 June, then we will allow them to take part in the remainder of the Module as core participants. After that it will be too late for the Inquiry to receive, consider, and investigate whatever they wish to say, and to give sufficient time for the other core participants to respond."

158 Roy Garland did not take that opportunity. On 28 September 2016, more than two months after the end of the public hearings into Kincora on 8 July 2016, the Inquiry received a 33-page document signed by Roy Garland, and two additional pages dated 27 September 2016 (whilst the document was dated 26 September on the first page). Despite the disruption to the Inquiry's programme by the provision of this document at such a late stage, despite the fact that Mr Garland did not accept the Inquiry's invitation to become a core participant, and despite his failure to provide a witness statement as requested, the Inquiry has considered and taken into account the contents of all 35 pages of the document.

159 We note that when compiling his document Mr Garland appears to have had access to, and made use of parts of, a lengthy document sent to the Inquiry by Colin Wallace, which the Inquiry received on 12 September 2016. The final section of Mr Garland's document under the heading "Conclusion" is identical to the final section of Colin Wallace's document under the heading "Request to the HIA Inquiry", and it therefore seems that although both had the opportunity to be core participants and to provide statements to the Inquiry, and did not do so, they have been in touch with each other at some stage since. Brian Gemmell also declined to engage with the Inquiry, and Roy Garland's reference in his letter to Brian Gemmell having "recently commented through emails" suggests that he and Brian Gemmell have discussed matters relating to the Inquiry's work.[99] Roy Garland's document has been added to the Inquiry evidence bundle and included in that part of the Inquiry website dealing with Kincora.

160 Roy Garland again wrote to the Inquiry on 14 October 2016, and repeated a number of points he had made before. He also said that he had taken legal advice and is now willing to be interviewed by the Inquiry:

> "....should the Tribunal now feel that the information I have given and concerns I have expressed would best be tested at interview I will be willing to present myself for that purpose"

161 The Inquiry did not invite Roy Garland to be interviewed. Had he engaged with the Inquiry and provided a witness statement as requested almost six months earlier the Inquiry would have called him to give evidence in public during its public hearings. It was no longer possible to do that as the last date by statute and the Inquiry's Terms of Reference by which public hearings could be held was 18 July 2016, and the Inquiry was in the final stages of preparing its report in order to submit it by mid January 2017 in accordance with its Terms of Reference. The Inquiry provided Mr Garland with a copy of parts of the draft report and invited him to make any response that he wished. He provided a twenty-two page unsigned response dated 30 November 2016. The Inquiry has nevertheless taken the letter of 14 October 2016 and the response of 30 November 2016 into account when preparing its Report.

99 KIN 130022.

162 When considering the weight to be given to the points Mr Garland made in all three documents he submitted to the Inquiry we take into account that by refusing to participate in the Inquiry, submitting these documents some months after the deadline set by the Inquiry, and then making a belated offer to be interviewed he has not fully engaged with the Inquiry as others have done. As a result, the Inquiry has not had the benefit of his oral evidence on matters that the Inquiry considers relevant, as opposed to being presented by him with his views in a manner that prevents his account being examined by the Inquiry in the way that the evidence of those who have come forward and given evidence on oath has been examined. We do not consider it necessary to refer to every point made by Roy Garland in his documents. They will be available on our website and those who wish to do so can consider their contents for themselves.

163 Nevertheless, we wish to make a number of observations about some specific matters he raised. First of all, Roy Garland was not being "accused" of anything by the Inquiry as he has alleged.[100] As our examination of the events relating to McGrath and Kincora shows, Roy Garland was an important figure in those events, and that is why the Inquiry offered him the opportunity to be a core participant. Because he was closely involved in many of the events we have to consider it was necessary for the Inquiry to examine what he did or did not say, or did or did not do. In doing so it was necessary for the Inquiry to refer to many documents relating to him, such as intelligence reports or statements by others. Inquiry counsel made it clear that allegations in such documents should not necessarily be taken as being true; they were referred to in order to see what light, if any, their contents shed on the matters we were investigating.

100 KIN 130024.

164 In the Appendix to his letter he refers to his not attending the Inquiry in the following passage:

> "I did not attend the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry (HIA) firstly because the Government did not give the same legal powers to the HIA Inquiry as to the Goddard Inquiry in London – yet both Inquiries were charged with investigating historical child sexual abuse. To me, this seemed wrong as a matter of principle and unfair to the victims in Northern Ireland. Secondly the HIA would not examine Faith House, an evangelical institution that provided William McGrath with opportunities for the abuse of young Christians."[101]

165 Roy Garland had not previously suggested that we investigate Faith House, and in any event it was not within our Terms of Reference. If this was among Roy Garland's reasons for not engaging with the Inquiry he did not put it forward before.

166 We will have occasion to refer to Roy Garland again in the next chapter, but at this stage it is necessary to examine the nature of his relationship with William McGrath in order to explain the actions Roy Garland took, and why he took them, in the 1970s. In doing so it is necessary for us to refer to the sexual aspect of that relationship, because that was inextricably intertwined with the events we will consider and because the reaction of the RUC has to be viewed against the detail of what they were told. The detail is central to an understanding of the RUC response and so it had to be included. We appreciate that Mr Garland found it distressing for these matters to be examined, and we tried to avoid unnecessary detail of the sexual aspect of their relationship as much as possible. However, some details had to be given if a distorted picture of that relationship were not to be created by omitting details that were essential to an understanding of what it was that Roy Garland said, or did not say, or did, or did not do, about McGrath on the occasions we proposed to examine.

167 Roy Garland came from a strongly religious and Protestant background. In one of three articles he wrote for the Irish Times in April 1982 he said his father was the associate pastor of a mission on the Shankill Road in Belfast, as well as being a member of an Orange Lodge that only admitted "saved" men. In this context "saved" is generally taken in Northern Ireland to mean that the person has undergone a form of religious experience or conversion leading him or her to dedicate their lives to Jesus Christ, irrespective of which Christian denomination, if any, they had been members of. Roy Garland said he was saved at a mission, meaning in this context a religious meeting held in his father's lodge in 1948 when he was aged seven. He described how he came to further dedicate his life to Christ's service at a religious crusade in 1955, and a few months later heard McGrath preach in the mission hall, presumably meaning his father's mission hall. McGrath invited Roy Garland to meet him at Faith House in Finaghy in South Belfast, which Roy Garland did a few months later when he was aged fifteen. He had left school the previous summer aged fourteen. McGrath explained to him on this occasion that Faith House was a "fellowship" where men lived a form of communal life, pooling their wages, "to be used for the salvation of Ireland". McGrath was the full-time secretary of a body known as, "The Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade". The description by Roy Garland of the religious and political beliefs which McGrath expounded to him as a teenager suggests that these were a potent mixture of anti-Catholic Protestant fundamentalism mixed with anti-communism and homosexuality.

101 KIN 130047.

168 McGrath evidently became a significant figure in Roy Garland's life in succeeding years, lending him books and suggesting that he attend Bible college. Roy Garland described going to England to a Bible college near Windsor in September 1960, by which time he was presumably nineteen or thereabouts. During his time in Windsor they kept in touch, meeting in London in January 1961 while McGrath was carrying out a religious campaign in mission halls and churches in England. McGrath wrote to Roy Garland on several occasions between 1960 and 1962. Some of these letters survived and Roy Garland gave them to DC Cullen in 1974. In the Irish Times article Roy Garland explained that when his father died in September 1962 McGrath suggested that he should return to Northern Ireland and carry on his father's small business. Roy Garland did not return to the Bible college, and thereafter devoted his efforts to trying to build up the business, as well as delivering religious tracts for McGrath.

The business and political relationship of Roy Garland and William McGrath in the 1960s

169 According to a report compiled by DC Cullen at a later stage of these events, Roy Garland purchased a small business in 1964 on the basis that McGrath would contribute half the purchase price. However,

McGrath did not do so. Whilst DC Cullen recorded that the business did quite well, Roy Garland told him that McGrath had borrowed £2,000 from him and incurred debts in his name. It would seem that during this time McGrath carried on a business selling carpets, but his business ventures do not seem to have been successful, no doubt in part at least due to the amount of time he devoted to his religious and political activities. As we have seen in the previous chapter, before McGrath joined the staff at Kincora in June 1971 he had been working as a counter clerk in a Belfast estate agent's office. By February 1972 the financial relationship between Roy Garland and McGrath had deteriorated to such an extent that Roy Garland obtained a court judgment against McGrath for £1,280.40.[102] In today's values this may not appear a significant amount, but it was a substantial amount at that time, and would be worth more than £16,300 today, (£16,345.60 according to www.thisismoney.co.uk accessed 16 September 2016). It is clear from Roy Garland's Irish Times article of 15 April 1982 that he and McGrath fell out in an extremely acrimonious fashion at that time because of this debt.[103]

170 In the mid-1960s that acrimonious ending to their business relationship lay several years in the future. It is clear that until then the relationship between the two men remained extremely close throughout the latter part of the 1960s, not least because of their shared interest in Northern Ireland politics from a Unionist perspective. As we shall see in greater detail in the next chapter, both were active in one of the many political groupings that emerged on what might be called the Unionist spectrum of political activity in Northern Ireland in the 1960s, an extremely tense period in the history of Northern Ireland.

171 In his Irish Times article of 15 April 1982 Roy Garland described how McGrath invited him to become a member of a "Cell", which he described in the article in the following passage:

> "A private ginger group of Orange men chaired by a Church of Ireland minister. Members of District, County and Grand Orange Lodges took part. The objective seemed to be to encourage leadership in Orangeism…In November 1966 the name of the group was changed to [Tara] and McGrath became Chairman".[104]

102 KIN 1684.
103 KIN 55015.
104 KIN 55012.

172 As can be seen from his letter to the Inquiry, it is clear that Roy Garland was politically active in the increasingly volatile and turbulent political and social period in the late 1960s in Northern Ireland. He was the publicity officer of the Young Unionist Council in 1969-1970,[105] and in the Irish Times article of 14 April 1982 described one event of those turbulent times in the following passage:

> "Many loyalists felt under considerable threat during the violence of August 1969 and it is not surprising that McGrath and Paisley were talking about the need for a 'Peoples Militia'. What is surprising is that at the height of this violence McGrath, Paisley, myself and a man called Black from Armagh were talking to the Prime Minister, Major James Chichester-Clark about it. This was during the early hours of Thursday, 14 August, 1969 at Knock RUC Headquarters. We were demanding that the "B" Specials be mobilised and a 'Peoples Militia' be formed."[106]

173 Roy Garland refers to that meeting in his letter to the Inquiry,[107] and it is clear from his letter, and his account of his activities in his Irish Times articles, that McGrath and he were close political associates, as can be seen from the preceding passage, and from his description of the development of Tara from a political "ginger group" to a very different organisation. It developed a paramilitary structure with McGrath as commanding officer and Roy Garland as second in command, with "Platoons" led by "Sergeants", who attended central meetings, although Roy Garland said there was little liaison. He said in the same Irish Times article:

> "There were said to be weapons stockpiled though I saw none of these. For the most part the objective was to prepare and wait for the appropriate moment when, if the right political leadership existed, Tara could be offered to the Security Forces to work alongside them. I felt that officers should be trained as well. It did not seem right that we should expect men to train to fight without being prepared to use guns ourselves. This idea got little support."[108]

174 Although he did not refer to the UVF in his Irish Times articles, in his letter to the Inquiry Roy Garland described how the UVF, a proscribed Loyalist

105 KIN 55011.
106 KIN 55014.
107 KIN 130028.
108 KIN 55013.

terrorist organisation, was closely involved with Tara at that stage:

> "The UVF was an intrinsic part of Tara from its formation in late 1969 until summer/early autumn of 1971 when I left Tara, and the UVF followed shortly afterwards when told of my reasons for leaving."[109]

175 In the third of the Irish Times articles on 15 April 1982 Roy Garland said he stopped attending Tara meetings in early August 1971:

> "I knew that this was putting me in an extremely dangerous situation but I felt there was no other course. I visited a man who had been in the Tara group in 1968 but who had left in mysterious circumstances. What he had to say confirmed that I was making the right decision, but it also made me feel very angry and disillusioned. Many Loyalist leaders had known of McGrath's homosexual activities for years and had done little or nothing about them.
>
> I decided that it was my duty to warn young men I had introduced to Tara, to McGrath's prayer meetings and to Ireland's Heritage Lodge. Most of them confirmed my worst fears that McGrath had been attempting to corrupt them, although none of them had, to my knowledge, been corrupted in the sense of becoming homosexuals.
>
> McGrath appeared to be able to exert a strong influence over these young men. I felt that he was using sex to brainwash them into his political ideas."

The reference to "Ireland's Heritage Lodge" was to an Orange lodge with this title founded by McGrath. From Roy Garland's comments it implies that he was himself a member of this lodge.

176 In his letter to the Inquiry he confirmed that he left Tara and the Young Unionists in 1971, saying he also drifted away from the senior Unionist Party and had stopped attending the Free Presbyterian Church. He left the Orange Order a few months later.[110] In these articles Roy Garland described McGrath's views about homosexuality at some length, and in the first of them said that at one point in his discussion with McGrath during his first visit to Faith House in 1955, McGrath had twice touched him on the leg, asking him what this meant; he felt shocked and replied to McGrath that it meant nothing.

177 It can be seen from this necessarily brief summary of Roy Garland's longer descriptions of the relationship between himself and McGrath from 1955, when he was a boy of fifteen, until 1971, when he was thirty or thereabouts, that the relationship between himself and McGrath was extremely close financially, politically and personally for many years until they fell out and Roy Garland distanced himself from McGrath from the summer of 1971 onwards. As we shall see, after McGrath and Roy Garland fell out, Roy Garland spoke to many people expressing his concerns about McGrath.

109 KIN 130028.
110 KIN 130031.

178 These concerns are only relevant to this Inquiry in so far as he expressed himself anonymously to the police and to social services, and as we shall see in the next chapter to Brian Gemmell, and in person to DC Cullen and to Valerie Shaw. As we have seen and will see, Valerie Shaw conveyed her understanding of them to social services through Mrs Fiddis and Mrs Johnston, and directly to D/Supt Graham. Roy Garland was directly or indirectly the source of all of these contacts, whether they were conveyed anonymously or directly by him, and in the next portion of this chapter we examine what he actually said on these occasions and in what form he conveyed his concerns about McGrath, and McGrath's position in Kincora, to social services and to the police.

179 In chronological terms the first occasion we know of that Roy Garland tried to convey these concerns to social services was when he made the anonymous phone call to the Holywood Road office of the EHSSB, which was received by Colin McKay on 23 January 1974. As we have already noted in our earlier consideration of this episode, the only contemporary record of what was actually said in that anonymous phone call was the third-hand account recorded by Mrs Wilson. This was to the effect that McGrath had made "improper suggestions" to boys in Kincora, including writing a note containing such "improper suggestions" to one of the boys, and had gone to live in Kincora for that purpose. What the "improper suggestions" may actually have been does not appear, but the overall tenor of this note is that the caller was implying that McGrath may have been making homosexual approaches of some sort to the boys in his care at Kincora. It does not seem that an allegation was being made that he had gone further than that and actually sexually abused any boy, and as we shall see on the numerous occasions when Roy Garland conveyed his concerns to others he does not appear to have ever alleged that he knew of any actual sexual offences being committed by McGrath against boys in Kincora, nor has he suggested in his letter to the Inquiry that he knew of offences committed by McGrath against any residents of Kincora. His concern was that such offences were being committed by McGrath against boys in Kincora, because of Roy Garland's own experiences. We therefore consider it likely that the details of Roy Garland's allegations in the anonymous phone call of 23 January 1974 were as Mrs Wilson recorded them.

180 Roy Garland also expressed his concerns to those directly in authority when he made the Robophone call on 23 May 1973. The Robophone system was a confidential phone line that allowed individuals to bring matters to the attention of the police, and to do so anonymously if they wished. This was a widely used facility and this particular call was numbered 2024 of 1973. In his letter to the Inquiry, Roy Garland criticised the Inquiry for revealing that he made this confidential phone call:

> "However to name me in this way after making a telephone call to a secure line was a breach of my confidentiality. In addition it is wrongly suggested that I am an informer. This is untrue and a dangerous assertion because...There was a serious danger to my life for years and even today this is still possible given that some hard line paramilitaries will be reading these transcripts."[111]

181 This phone call was a very important occasion in the events relating to Kincora, and, as Roy Garland confirmed in his letter, he went to great lengths to alert various individuals, and through them the authorities, to the danger he correctly believed McGrath posed to the residents of Kincora. As he said about Valerie Shaw and Jim McCormick, "almost everything they knew came from me".[112] We make clear in our conclusions that we commend him for his efforts to ensure that police and social services were alerted to the risks posed by McGrath to the boys in Kincora. Were the Inquiry to conceal that Roy Garland made this call, that would be to create an incomplete and significantly misleading account of his actions at that time.

182 In view of the importance of this call we set it out in full:

> "There appears to be a vice ring which is centred in Wm. McGrath, 188 Upper Newtownards Road, who is employed as a Social Worker at Kincora Boys' Hostel, 236 Upper Newtownards Road. McGrath practices various kinds of homosexual perversion, but is known to be indulging in other kinds of perversion as well. He is deeply > involved in underground politics and boys of his are involved in all shades of Unionist Politics, most of these young men would have been involved in perversion with him personally and he is not adverse to pressurising them into adopting policies according to his political objections [sic] which are unknown. He has contact with certain local MPs who are known for their homosexuality and it is thought that this is the lever used to obtain his job as a Social Worker. He has contacts throughout N. Ireland and also in London and beyond. He is constantly in financial difficulty. He leads a secret Militant Organisation known as "Tara", he is widely known among Loyalists and others, but mainly because of the shame and danger attached to exposing him and the repercussions he is allowed to continue. His methods of dealing with boys is to suggest homosexual activities will cure a variety of complaints. McGrath claims the boys are suffering. Once they allow McGrath to get his hands on them they are wide open to exploitation, sexually, politically and financially."[113]

111 KIN 130017.
112 KIN 130020.

183 Whilst the record is a précis of the call, and therefore not a verbatim transcript of what was said, it is clear from the references to McGrath working in Kincora at number 236, and living at 188, Upper Newtownards Road that Roy Garland knew where McGrath was working and living by this time. As the author of the call, Roy Garland also refers at length to McGrath's membership of Tara and to his political activities. He also alleged that there appeared to be a vice ring centred on McGrath, and that, "boys of [McGrath's] are involved in all shades of Unionist Politics". Whilst the reference to "boys" on its own would be capable of being interpreted as referring to residents at Kincora, the expression is clearly qualified by the reference to them being involved in politics. This qualification might suggest that the people concerned are adults, as indeed the following words make clear when the anonymous caller is recorded as saying that "most of these young men would have been involved in perversion with him personally". (emphasis added) As we shall see, these allegations echo what Roy Garland was to say to others subsequently.

184 The anonymous call was received at RUC Headquarters at 3:05pm on 23 May 1973, and forwarded to the Divisional Commander at E Division the next day with the instruction:

> "Please cause this information to be investigated and report successful results".

113 KIN 30343.

E Division at RUC Mountpottinger was the headquarters for the area including Kincora, and as Kincora lay within the sub-division at Strandtown RUC the Divisional Commander sent the message through his chain of command to that station.

185 Ultimately Constable Long of Strandtown was instructed to investigate. Constable Long was not a detective but a uniformed officer. He visited Kincora on 4 June 1973 and spoke to Mains about the allegations. From his report it does not seem that he confronted McGrath with the allegations. By this time it is probable that McGrath had already started to sexually approach boys in Kincora. As we explained in the previous chapter, HIA 532 who entered Kincora for the first time in April 1972, later described to the police how McGrath attempted to masturbate him when he woke HIA 532 in the mornings. It is therefore probable that McGrath had done this to him before Constable Long came to Kincora on 4 June 1973. Of the four former residents who were in Kincora by 4 June 1973 and who later alleged McGrath made sexual approaches to them, only R 10, who arrived on 23 March 1973, and HIA 145, who arrived on 30 April 1973, definitely dated their experiences of abuse as happening before 4 June. Their experiences were similar to those of HIA 532, as R 10 awoke to find McGrath fondling his genitals, and HIA 145 awoke to find McGrath fondling his inner thigh. It would therefore seem that by the date of Constable Long's visit, McGrath's approaches to the residents had not progressed to the severity they did later. It is also relevant to recall that by June 1973 Mains and Semple were no longer engaging in sexual activity with boys in Kincora, although as we have seen they had done so in the past before McGrath arrived.

186 Because the investigations into Mains's behaviour in 1967 and 1971 had never been referred to the police, the uniformed police at Mountpottinger and Strandtown had no reason to suspect that Mains had been engaged in sexual behaviour when Constable Long spoke to him on 4 June 1973. He told Mains about the telephone allegations, and Mains said that he was unaware of any "perversion" going on, and if there was he would be sure to know of it. Mains clearly knew something of McGrath's previous financial difficulties because he told Constable Long that McGrath had lost £2,000 in the carpet business. He described McGrath as a very decent type of chap of deep religious convictions who was high up in the Orange Order. He said that he had no idea who might have passed on this information over the phone, and he was satisfied the information came from a crank, and was convinced no one at the hostel would be capable of this, presumably meaning no one at the hostel made the call.

187 It is unclear whether anything relating to McGrath had come to the attention of Mains by then, and so it may be that Mains's response to these allegations was accurate within his knowledge at that time so far as McGrath was concerned. Of course Mains was lying when he said he was unaware of any perversions at Kincora, because he had engaged in such behaviour with several boys in the past, and his homosexual relationship with R 2 was continuing during R 2's overnight visits to Kincora. Mains also knew about Semple's behaviour in the past, but no doubt felt a considerable degree of relief as it appeared Constable Long was only making enquiries about McGrath, and that there were no allegations relating to either Semple or himself. Constable Long reported his enquiries to his inspector, who duly reported up the chain of command back to the Divisional Commander, and none of the superior officers through whose hands the report progressed suggested that any further action should be taken.

188 The Robophone message did not specifically allege that homosexual offences were being perpetrated in Kincora, although, as we have seen, it referred to "boys". However, its tenor plainly related to McGrath's homosexual activity with "young men" who were his political associates. We are satisfied that the RUC should have gone further and contacted the EHSSB at a higher level than Mains, as was eventually done by DC Cullen when he spoke to Robert Bunting in 1976. It has to be remembered in this context that 1973 was the most violent year of the entire period of violence in Northern Ireland, during which there were 250 deaths, 2,651 injuries, as well as huge numbers of shootings, bombings and other forms of terrorist violence.[114] The intensity of the violence placed a great strain on the RUC at the time, and in addition there was not then the practice of sharing information and having a multi-agency approach to investigating abuse.

189 This was an anonymous report with no specific allegations about Kincora as opposed to those about McGrath. Despite the limitations of any anonymous allegation and the pressures on the police at this time we consider that the failure of the RUC to approach the EHSSB at a higher level than Mains was a systemic failing on the part of the police in the 114 Cmnd 7009, the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights' Report The Protection of Human Rights by Law in Northern Ireland, p.6.

RUC division to whom the anonymous call was referred for investigation. We have not so far referred to the information held by RUC Special Branch on McGrath by this time and we shall do so in the next chapter.

Valerie Shaw and D/Supt John Graham

190 Miss Shaw explained to the Sussex police in 1982 that a Mrs Greenwood told her that she had been told by a Mr McCormick of the activities of a man in the Orange Order, in Christian circles and in political circles who was a homosexual, who had used his position to corrupt or attempt to corrupt young men and boys into homosexual practices and who was extending his activities into the Free Presbyterian Church. Miss Shaw had been a member of that church for many years and was concerned about this. She spoke to Mr McCormick on a number of occasions, and he ultimately told her that the man was McGrath and that his information came from Roy Garland. She then approached Roy Garland. She said that he told her about Faith House in Finaghy, about McGrath's political views, that McGrath was homosexual and that he was employed in a boys' home called Kincora. It would appear from her 1982 statement that Roy Garland did not explain to her why he thought McGrath was homosexual. She then approached Dr Ian Paisley MP who was also the Moderator of the Free Presbyterian Church and Minister of the Martyrs Memorial Church where she worked at the time. She claimed she spoke to Dr Paisley about her concerns on at least seven occasions, but he disputed this. Be that as it may, and as we have already explained we are not concerned with what others apart from the police and social services did or did not know, Miss Shaw failed to make progress in that way and mentioned her concerns about McGrath to others. Although it is not entirely clear how the contact came to be brought about, there is no doubt that she spoke to D/Supt Graham not long before he retired from the RUC on 30 June 1974.

191 At that time he was head of the CID in Belfast. It would seem from what D/Ch/Supt Clarke told the Inquiry that in that capacity he did not report to ACC Meharg, to whom we shall refer again shortly, but was responsible to the ACC for Belfast. D/Supt Graham did not give oral evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, unlike Valerie Shaw, although he did respond in writing to a request for information from that Inquiry. He did give a statement to the RUC in 1980 and to the Sussex Police in 1982. Mr Graham is now dead. From his statement to the Sussex Police, and from Valerie Shaw's accounts, it is clear that they met in his car and spoke about McGrath for some time. She told him McGrath was homosexual, was employed in Kincora and that she was concerned by that. He told her the police would need to obtain evidence, and that one way of obtaining that evidence would be to maintain observation on Kincora or on McGrath's house. She said that she mentioned Roy Garland's name during that conversation[115] although Mr Graham, as he was by that time, did not refer to Mr Garland, either in his RUC statement in 1980[116] or in his 1982 statement to the Sussex Police.[117] As it is common ground that there was a reference to the need for surveillance, it may be that Roy Garland's name was not mentioned, because that would have been a crucially important piece of information. However, whether Roy Garland's name was mentioned or not, D/Supt Graham accepted that he was concerned about what he was told, and he said that he reported the matter to the CID at Mountpottinger RUC Station.

192 No trace of any such report by him was found. In the subsequent RUC investigation in 1980, and in the Sussex Police investigation in 1982, the relevant CID officers in Mountpottinger denied ever receiving any report, either oral or written, from D/Supt Graham. In the event, if he did make such a report the matter was never followed up, and so nothing came of this initiative by Miss Shaw who had attempted to bring her concerns, supported as they were by what Roy Garland had told her, to the attention of the RUC at a high level. As in the Robophone call in 1973, there is nothing to suggest that Roy Garland revealed to Miss Shaw his own experiences with McGrath in the past. Her concerns reflected his stated concern that McGrath was homosexual, had corrupted young men or boys in the past, and because of that past corruption it was believed that he now posed a risk to the boys in the hostel. However, on the face of it that risk was being represented as a possibility, because it was not an allegation that McGrath was believed to have committed a sexual offence on any resident of Kincora.

193 So far as D/Supt Graham was aware at the time, he was the highest ranking police officer to whom these concerns had been expressed. He knew nothing of either the anonymous phone call made by Roy Garland in 1973, nor Roy Garland's discussions not long before with DC Cullen,

115 KIN 40713.
116 KIN 10795.
117 KIN 40718.

discussions which resulted in the Cullen/Meharg investigation which had started earlier in 1974. D/Supt Graham's own accounts leave no reason for doubt that he accepted what Miss Shaw told him, and on the basis of that concluded that the matter needed to be pursued. He said he gave instructions to that effect to Mountpottinger CID. However, nothing was done, and the PSNI concede that D/Supt Graham's response to what Miss Shaw told him amounted to a significant personal failing and neglect of duty on his part.[118] We are satisfied that was the case for the following reasons:

(1) D/Supt Graham was an extremely experienced and very senior detective, yet he failed to keep any record of his meeting with Miss Shaw or what she told him, or of his subsequent actions.

(2) He clearly recognised that these were allegations of possible homosexuality, child abuse and paramilitary involvement all relating to McGrath, yet he failed to take adequate steps to launch an investigation by him giving a formal instruction to one of his CID subordinates to institute an immediate police investigation.

(3) An oral instruction was not enough. It would not have been difficult for him to give a brief written instruction to the D/Ch Inspector in Mountpottinger, supporting this with a brief statement of what Miss Shaw had told him and where she could be contacted. Such written instructions need not have been very detailed and could have been supplemented by a more detailed oral briefing of the officer or officers instructed to carry out the investigation.

(4) Having failed to take these steps, he then failed to follow the matter up or ensure that instructions were left for his successor so that his successor could be informed and could take the matter up. D/Ch/Supt Clarke said in his statement to the Inquiry that the failure of D/Supt Graham to do anything with the information he received from Valerie Shaw was inexplicable.[119] In his evidence to the Inquiry in Day 219 at page 154 he summarised the failings of the D/Supt when he said that the D/Supt "makes no provision and takes no steps to ensure that it [Miss Shaw's allegation] is dealt with…and I don't think as a senior detective that is the level of professional drive or vigour I would expect".

118 KIN 1854.
119 KIN 1854.

194 The steps which should have been taken by D/Supt Graham were simple and elementary. We consider a possible reason why he did not show the necessary drive or vigour was because D/Supt Graham was due to retire from a very demanding post in a few weeks time, and for whatever reason did not give the matter the attention it deserved. Had these elementary steps been taken to institute a proper investigation by trained detectives, such an investigation should at least have discovered the record of the 1973 anonymous call. Whether such an investigation, even with that added information conveyed by the 1973 call, would have led the investigating police to contact the EHSSB at a higher level is speculative. Had they done so, those officers would have been provided with the Mason file and learnt for the first time of the 1967 and 1971 allegations against Mains. The failure to take these steps amounted to systemic failings.

The Cullen/Meharg investigation in 1974

195 We now turn to consider the events of 1973 and 1974 which resulted in DC Cullen of the RUC Drug Squad at Belfast Donegall Pass RUC Station informing ACC Meharg, the head of "Crime" Branch of the RUC between 1971 and 1981, of what he had been told by Roy Garland, which resulted in what has been called the Cullen/Meharg investigation. As we explained in an earlier chapter, the Cullen/Meharg investigation had a second stage in 1976. ACC Meharg died in 2011. Mr Cullen, who retired from the RUC in 1988 after 30 years service, was still alive during our public hearings, but unfortunately his mental condition was such that he was unable to assist the Inquiry. Sadly he died in September 2016. Both gave oral evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, and were cross examined about what they said to each other, and what each did, or did not, do. Whilst there was considerable common ground in their accounts, there were also disagreements about a number of matters. Whilst we have the transcripts of their evidence, the Hughes Inquiry had the advantage of reaching its views having seen and heard both witnesses.

196 Before we consider the Cullen/Meharg investigation we wish to make it clear that the only reason the Inquiry was concerned with whatever happened between Roy Garland and McGrath of a sexual nature was because what happened was the most important aspect of the material that became known to DC Cullen. The Inquiry had to investigate these matters in order to establish as far as possible what information was conveyed to DC Cullen, because the nature and extent of that information led to the Cullen/Meharg investigation, and in order to establish how that investigation came about, and was conducted, the Inquiry had to examine these matters.

197 Contrary to Roy Garland's assertion in his letter, the Inquiry has sought to understand why McGrath's activity was not stopped at an earlier stage.[120] As part of that process, the Inquiry had to examine in detail what Roy Garland did, or did not, say to the police. In his letter to the Inquiry Roy Garland emphasised that he was not homosexual at any stage:

> "It is misleading to suggest I was involved in homosexual activity…I was not and never was at any stage homosexual. I was abused in a limited way and one that was neither continuous nor prolonged as has been suggested because I rejected it. William McGrath tried desperately to convince me that relations between males were normal…In truth he was deeply attracted to young boys and men. I was never attracted to homosexuality, which greatly annoyed him."[121]

198 The Inquiry does not suggest that Roy Garland was a homosexual or was attracted to homosexual activity, but it is clear from what Roy Garland said to the Sussex Police in 1982 that McGrath engaged in sexual acts involving him on more than one occasion over a number of years. He said to the Inquiry in his letter:

> "As far as I was concerned the attempts were infrequent and lasted for relatively few years…I rejected McGrath's approaches, which were usually minor and not necessarily homosexual".[122]

In his Response to the Inquiry of 30 November 2016 he was rather more specific as to how long this lasted, saying:

> "The abuse, such as it was, had stopped at an early stage in the early 1960s"[123]

The relevance of these matters to the Inquiry is the light they shed on McGrath's actions, and what the RUC learnt about them, because the extent of McGrath's behaviour is crucial to any examination of what led to the Cullen/Meharg investigation, and how that investigation should have been conducted.

120 KIN 130025.
121 KIN 130025.
122 KIN 130042.
123 KIN 130058.

199 Roy Garland said in his letter to our Inquiry that while he agreed to appear at the Hughes Inquiry he was not invited.[124] He was not called to give evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, something that caused considerable controversy at that Inquiry. He was asked to provide our Inquiry with a written statement addressing a number of questions posed to him by the Inquiry, but declined to do so. In his letter to the Inquiry Roy Garland refers to two matters he was asked to address by the Inquiry in a witness statement,[125] although, as can be seen from the correspondence between him and the Inquiry at Day 204, the Inquiry posed several other questions as well. Whilst Roy Garland spoke to the RUC in March 1980 during the Caskey Phase One investigation he was not willing to make a written statement at that time. He did make two statements to the Sussex police in 1982. There are a number of areas where we are dependent upon notes made at various times by DC Cullen when we seek to establish exactly what Roy Garland did tell DC Cullen about the extent and nature of the relationship between himself and McGrath, compared to more limited accounts Roy Garland gave on various occasions in the past. Roy Garland has since given some further information about what he did, or did not, say to DC Cullen in his letter to the Inquiry, and we consider what Roy Garland said in his letter to our Inquiry in due course.

200 By late 1973 DC Cullen had almost fifteen years service in the RUC. Since 1970 he had been attached to the Drugs Squad, which was based in Donegall Pass RUC Station, and he was a part-time dog handler with the drug squad. Although he was a DC it seems that he had little or no formal detective training until he went on the Hendon CID Initial Training Course between 3 December 1973 and 9 February 1974.[126] His contact with Roy Garland came about as a result of a meeting DC Cullen had with William McCormick in November 1973. We have already referred to Mr McCormick and will have occasion to do so again in the next chapter. Mr McCormick was a veterinary surgeon who lived on the outskirts of Belfast in Carryduff, County Down, although he told the Sussex Police in 1982 that he considered his vocation to be that of a Christian evangelist.[127] In that capacity he provided counselling for a number of people of all ages who came to him for advice on a wide variety of matters. One of these was Mrs Greenwood, to whom

124 KIN 130024.
125 KIN 130017.
126 KIN 72124 and 40113.
127 KIN 40702 and KIN 721123.

reference has already been made. It would seem that he told her about McGrath, and as we have already explained it was Mrs Greenwood who then told Valerie Shaw about McGrath. As we shall see in the next chapter, Brian Gemmell was also in contact with Mr McCormick, and through him with Roy Garland. Mr McCormick died in August 1989.

201 It would appear from what Mr McCormick told the Sussex Police that his knowledge of McGrath's activities came from Roy Garland who spoke to Mr McCormick shortly before the events we are about to examine, which would suggest that it was sometime not long before November 1973 that Roy Garland told Mr McCormick of his concerns about McGrath.[128] In his statement of 10 March 1982 to the Sussex Police Mr McCormick recounted that Roy Garland explained McGrath's seduction technique in the following way:

> "...McGrath operated by having Garland arranging for boys to see him individually. McGrath after telling the boy of his potential would then convince him that he had an emotional block. He would demonstrate by inviting the boy to touch his private parts and then use the refusal as evidence of the block. McGrath would then suggest that the boy needed liberating and in that manner induce them into homosexual acts. Garland said he had arranged for some twenty boys to be seen by McGrath for this purpose during the 60s."[129]

202 It is clear from the following quotation from his letter to the Inquiry that Roy Garland denies saying any of these things to Mr McCormick, and does not believe Mr McCormick said them:

> "I never said any of this and it did not happen. Neither do I believe Jim McCormick made such a hurtful and disgusting suggestion."

203 He also said that Brian Gemmell had written to him that:

> "I am certain Jim McC would never have said such a thing. He was a man concerned with the truth and would not have made up things or embellished a story".[130]

204 It is clear that Mr McCormick did say these things in his police statement, and far from being "an obscure document" as Roy Garland described it, this was a statement which the maker said was true and acknowledged could render him liable to prosecution if he had "wilfully stated anything

128 KIN 40702.
129 KIN 40702.
130 KIN 130022.

in it which I know to be false or do not believe to be true". We see no reason to believe that Mr McCormick made up his account of what he said Roy Garland said to him, or embellished the truth. The reference by Mr McCormick to being told that about twenty boys had been introduced to McGrath by Roy Garland, and by implication the suggestion that some of them at least may have become involved in homosexual acts with McGrath, accords with Roy Garland's reference in his Irish Times article of 15 April 1982 to his having warned young men he had introduced to Tara, and McGrath, although he said, "none of them had, to my knowledge, been corrupted in the sense of becoming homosexuals".[131]

205 DC Cullen explained to the Hughes Inquiry that at this time a lot of allegations about the occult were emerging in the drug scene, and he had been given Mr McCormick's name as someone who had knowledge of the occult and exorcism. He asked for an appointment with Mr McCormick to see if he could gain any information that would be of assistance to the police.[132] The meeting took place in November 1973. Roy Garland was not present at that meeting, but Mr McCormick told DC Cullen the information that Roy Garland had given to him about McGrath, presumably because Mr McCormick felt this was information which should be passed on to the police. DC Cullen did not pursue the matter at that time, but after he returned from his Hendon CID course in February 1974 he thought about what he had been told. He decided that he would contact Mr McCormick again to see if Mr McCormick would put him in contact with the person who had given the information about McGrath, "to see if there was any substance in it", as he put it to the Hughes Inquiry.[133] A meeting was arranged with Roy Garland, and it took place in Mr McCormick's house on 1 March 1974.

206 DC Cullen was accompanied by DC Duff, a colleague from the Drug Squad at Donegall Pass. DC Cullen explained to the Hughes Inquiry that Roy Garland had been very reluctant to speak to the police at all, and had to be persuaded to come to speak to him. By now Roy Garland was in his early thirties, married with children, and a mature student at Queen's University.[134] It would appear that he explained his relationship with McGrath to DC Cullen in some detail, saying it ceased when they parted company because of a business dispute. DC Cullen told the Hughes Inquiry that Roy Garland told him that McGrath:

131 KIN 55015.
132 KIN 72187 and KIN 72188.
133 KIN 72124.
134 KIN 72130.

> "...had interfered with him as a teenager, homosexually, and these meetings took place as a result of attending religious meetings and other organisations"

in the early 1960s.[135]

207 It would seem that Roy Garland never made any allegations that there had been any incidents in Kincora, or related to anyone who was at Kincora, either at that meeting or at any stage of his lengthy involvement with DC Cullen.[136]

208 DC Cullen explained to the Hughes Inquiry that Roy Garland was, "very concerned about his family, his children, and the stigma that would be attached to any investigation to which his name would be attached."[137] He was also concerned for his safety because he believed McGrath, "had some association with subversives".[138]

209 Roy Garland said in his letter to the Inquiry that he believed he was not asked if he was prepared to be a witness if necessary:

> "I was never to the best of my knowledge asked, 'to step forward'...I am quite confident that I was not asked to 'step forward'".[139]
>
> "To the best of my knowledge I was never asked by DC Cullen to make a statement. I probably would have given him one if asked even though this would have been very risky."[140]

210 DC Cullen also told the Hughes Inquiry that Roy Garland was reluctant to give evidence:

> "...at that stage he wasn't prepared to come out into the open and give evidence, that's where the difficulty arose. If he had been prepared to give evidence I think a different situation would have arisen...because we had a witness then who could have given evidence about Mr McGrath's homosexual behaviour."[141]

211 All the evidence of Roy Garland's actions in the 1970s shows that whilst he was making considerable efforts to draw the attention of social services and the police to McGrath, on every other occasion he did so in a way that would not require him to be publicly identified, as when he

135 KIN 72124.
136 KIN 72126.
137 KIN 72138.
138 KIN 72130.
139 KIN 130036.
140 KIN 130041.
141 KIN 72202.

spoke to Valerie Shaw and Jim McCormick, or made anonymous phone calls to the police and social services. We prefer DC Cullen's evidence on oath to the Hughes Inquiry that Roy Garland was not willing to be a witness in 1974, supported as it is by Roy Garland's unwillingness to make a formal witness statement to DS Elliott in 1980.

212 It is clear that at that first meeting DC Cullen had reservations about some of the things that he was being told. He said to the Hughes Inquiry that some of the background associations and activities of McGrath, "sounded a bit bizarre, something that you would read in a novel somewhere",[142] and, he had to keep:

> "an open mind because [Garland] had run afoul of Mr McGrath in the past, ...there were court proceedings in relation to money and things. I had to keep an open mind in the whole situation".[143]

He said:

> "... I wasn't sure, even at that time, if his allegations were meant to hurt Mr McGrath and cause him some more problems out of spite, or whether the facts were true. That is why I sought advice; that is why I furthered my Inquiries in relation to the information and tried to do a bit more ground work on it." [144]

213 DC Cullen said there were a number of other matters that caused him concern, namely, "the involvement in paramilitary activities and alleged homosexuality", and he was also concerned about Roy Garland's safety or security, and that of his immediate family, "because of his association with McGrath".[145]

214 The next day, 2 March 1974, DC Cullen requested and was given a meeting with ACC Meharg at RUC Headquarters. It is one of several unsatisfactory features of the Cullen/Meharg investigation that no notes seem to have been made of any of his meetings at the time by DC Cullen, whether with Roy Garland or ACC Meharg. Nor were any notes made, or written directions given, by ACC Meharg. There are a number of typewritten documents which appear to have been prepared by DC Cullen at various stages, as well as what seemed to be hand-written drafts of the typewritten documents, but it is not easy to establish exactly when all were written, or in what sequence. DC Cullen produced

142 KIN 72132.
143 KIN 72139.
144 KIN 72139.
145 KIN 72132.

these, and later documents dated 1980, during subsequent police investigations. The contents of the 1980 document suggest that some parts were taken from the earlier documents, whilst other information was added later. The origins of these typed and hand-written documents were explained by DC Cullen during his evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, but what he told ACC Meharg, and what ACC Meharg said to him, on 2 March and on later occasions was disputed.

215 In those circumstances we do not intend to seek to reconcile any discrepancies between the various documents; rather we examine what we regard as the salient matters that occurred during the 1974 stage of the Cullen/Meharg investigation. What followed was by any showing an extraordinary and inept series of events, and to describe them as an "investigation" is to imply that whatever took place followed a systematic and conventional course whereas, as we shall see, what transpired was neither conventional nor systematic, nor was it competently organised or executed.

216 The typewritten document later referred to as DBE 16 was addressed to ACC Meharg and refers to the meeting on 2 March 1974 in the first paragraph. This document was plainly compiled by DC Cullen and is dated 21 March 1974. In it he refers to their meeting of 2 March 1974, but does not say in any detail what was said to him at that meeting. For that, we are dependent on his evidence and that of ACC Meharg to the Hughes Inquiry, which is reviewed at 4.102 and subsequent passages of their Report.

217 It would seem that there was at least one further meeting between DC Cullen and Roy Garland after the meeting of 1 March 1974 at which Roy Garland gave him a number of letters that he had received from McGrath in the early 1960s. He appears to have done so to support his allegation that McGrath was homosexual. In his response of 30 November 2016 to the Inquiry Roy Garland confirmed that there were more meetings, saying "most were informal and took place in the street".[146] When that second meeting took place is not known, nor is the date of a second meeting between DC Cullen and ACC Meharg at which ACC Meharg was given the letters. He read them and returned them later to DC Cullen, which would suggest that there may have been a further, third meeting between himself and DC Cullen

146 KIN 130061.

218 Although the DBE 16 document is dated 21 March 1974, its contents do not throw any light on when the other meetings occurred between DC Cullen and ACC Meharg, or between DC Cullen and Roy Garland. The DBE 16 document may only have been a draft, because there are several blank spaces in its 23 paragraphs which appear to have been left to enable names and other relevant personal details of identifiable individuals to be inserted later.[147] JC 2 is a hand-written document also dated 21 March 1974 and is almost identical to the typed document DBE 16, except it contains three extra numbered and typed paragraphs.[148] JC 2 is undated, and bears the handwritten inscription, "Intelligence Log William McGrath". The typed first paragraph referring to the meeting of 2 March 1974 of ACC Meharg and DC Cullen has been replaced by a hand-written first paragraph, "Intelligence of an unconfirmed nature relating to William McGrath, 50/60 years, 188 Upper N'Ards Road, Belfast, and other people who have associated in some measure with subject".[149] These alterations suggest that DC Cullen adapted the DBE 16 document to produce a second related, and largely identical, document, in the form of an "Intelligence Log" intended for ACC Meharg.

219 JC 3 was a third document and was hand written. It was undated, and followed the text and layout of DBE 16 up to paragraph 23. It also contained the three numbered paragraphs 24, 25 and 26 to be found in JC 3, but is a significantly longer document. It runs to 54 numbered paragraphs with a great deal of additional information about McGrath's political activities, his associates and his sexual proclivities. It is noteworthy that the references to McGrath's sexual proclivities are more detailed than in the other two documents, although the reference to a sexual device in paragraph 14 of JC 2 does not appear in Paragraph 14 of JC 3, or for that matter in paragraph 14 of DBE 16. JC 3 also refers to pornography held in a locked filing cabinet accessible only to McGrath. It also includes a reference to Roy Garland being asked by McGrath to write letters to girls about sexual matters.[150]

220 DC Cullen's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry was that all the information he received had been gathered by him by July 1974, when his enquiries lapsed after he received no further instructions from ACC Meharg.[151]

147 KIN 114098-114100.
148 KIN 114068.
149 KIN 114066.
150 KIN 114069 to 114083.
151 KIN 75270.

Apart from the letters he had given to ACC Meharg, DC Cullen was unable to say to the Hughes Inquiry that all these documents had been shown to ACC Meharg, but he said the information contained in them was made known to the ACC. Crucially, he maintained he told ACC Meharg that McGrath had attempted to touch Roy Garland's genitals when the latter was a teenager.

221 ACC Meharg accepted he was told that Roy Garland alleged that McGrath was homosexual, worked in Kincora, was possibly connected with paramilitary activities, and that he had read the letters given to him. He was not satisfied that the letters were of a homosexual nature. However, he said he was told by DC Cullen that no homosexual acts had taken place between McGrath and Roy Garland, saying that if he had been told he would have had no hesitation in having the matter fully investigated.[152]

222 The Hughes Inquiry did not refer expressly to this conflict between ACC Meharg and DC Cullen, saying only that, "we accept that all of the information contained in the documents produced by DC Cullen was available to him in 1974, and these included allegations that McGrath had been involved in homosexual activity with young men some considerable number of years previously".[153]

223 In his letter to the Inquiry Roy Garland denied saying things that are recorded in these notes, stating that they "are so ridiculous they should have been laughed out of court".[154] We note that some of the details were recounted by Roy Garland to DS Elliott on 6 March 1980 in the interview referred to below, when Roy Garland said McGrath kept vibrators and the like at his house in a locker with drawers.[155]

224 Roy Garland also referred in his letter to introducing DC Cullen to a "young victim who talked freely about being seriously abused".[156] However, DC Cullen never suggested to the Hughes Inquiry that he received information from anyone other than Roy Garland. So far as we are aware, Roy Garland's statement that he introduced another victim to DC Cullen, someone who might therefore have provided some or all of the evidence of abuse recorded by DC Cullen, has never been made before, and as we explain below none of the material we have examined supports Roy Garland's assertion that he introduced such a person to DC Cullen.

152 KIN 75271.
153 KIN 75271.
154 KIN 130018.
155 KIN 12192.
156 KIN 130036.

225 Roy Garland was interviewed by DS Elliott of the RUC on 6 March 1980, and DS Elliott makes no reference to such a person in his witness statement.[157] DS Elliott later prepared a seven-page resumé of that meeting of 6 March in preparation for McGrath's interview by the RUC on 1 April 1980. Whilst the resumé refers to "a source" who wishes to remain anonymous it is clear from the reference to 6 March, and from the detail in the document, that the source was Roy Garland. There is no reference to Roy Garland mentioning another potential witness in the resumé.[158]

226 Roy Garland did not refer to any such individual in his statement to the Sussex Police in 1982.[159] DC Cullen's references in these documents to "my informant" when giving details that clearly came from Roy Garland, such as the details of Roy Garland's business and financial relationship with McGrath,[160] support his evidence to the Hughes Inquiry that the information he passed to ACC Meharg came from Informant B, that is from Roy Garland.

227 Mr McCormick did not refer to any other person being present at Roy Garland's meetings with DC Cullen, which Mr McCormick also attended, in his 1982 Sussex Police statement to which we referred earlier, nor did he do so in his 1980 statement to the RUC.[161] In his response to the Inquiry of 30 November 2016 Roy Garland made a number of references to a meeting between "a young man and DC Cullen", and pointed to his reference to introducing a twenty-year-old friend to DC Cullen in his statement to the Sussex Police. However, the only reference to such a person being introduced to DC Cullen comes from Roy Garland, and is not supported by any other evidence, nor has any such person ever come forward.

228 These details were of crucial importance to establishing what DC Cullen told ACC Meharg, because the details were fundamental to any decision by the police to start an investigation into what Roy Garland had told the police. A single episode when McGrath was alleged to have put his hand on Garland's leg many years before was unlikely to have been considered something worthy of a police investigation. An allegation of sexual activity between males that occurred on more than one occasion was a very different matter. We are satisfied ACC Meharg did ask DC Cullen what the extent of any contact had been for that reason, and so

157 KIN 10762.
158 KIN 12188-12194.
159 KIN 40688 to 40691.
160 KIN 114066 and 114067.
161 KIN 10761.

the account of that sexual activity recorded at the time by DC Cullen, which Roy Garland disputes, would have been a very important area to be explored by DC Cullen with Roy Garland at the time.

229 Whilst we took into account Roy Garland's denials that he said these things attributed to him by DC Cullen, from the material we have examined we saw no reason to conclude that DC Cullen made up, misunderstood or distorted what he recorded at the time as coming from Roy Garland.

230 We have very carefully considered the conflict between the recollections of ACC Meharg and DC Cullen as to whether the latter told the former that homosexual acts had occurred between Roy Garland and McGrath in the 1960s. Although Roy Garland had not said so expressly, and his accounts in his Irish Times article of 13 April 1982 said only that McGrath touched him on the leg,[162] he gave a different account to the Sussex Police of McGrath's approach to him during their first meeting in Faith House. In his Sussex Police statement of 1982 he said that after McGrath touched him on the leg McGrath then opened, "the front of my trousers and touched my private parts", adding that McGrath, "continued to make this type of approach to me throughout my teens until I went to the All Nations Bible College, Maidenhead, in 1962".[163]

231 We are satisfied the detail given in the 1974 documents of McGrath's sexual activity with Roy Garland could only have come from Roy Garland and is consistent with what Roy Garland told the Sussex Police in 1982, although the account in the 1974 documents was more detailed and explicit. A single act of touching of the leg would not have been sufficient to justify any discussion with, let alone an approach to, an ACC. Any discussion between ACC Meharg and DC Cullen would, in our opinion, have inevitably included the key question as to whether any explicitly homosexual acts had occurred between McGrath and Roy Garland. We consider it probable that DC Cullen did tell ACC Meharg that actual homosexual contact had taken place between McGrath and Roy Garland.

232 The 1974 documents show that DC Cullen accumulated considerable information about McGrath and all his activities, by far the greater part of which must have come from Roy Garland, probably over more than one meeting. DC Cullen certainly saw Roy Garland at least once more after the initial meeting of 1 March 1974 when he was given the letters he showed to ACC Meharg. The title of the JC 2 document as an "Intelligence Log" relating to McGrath, and its contents, show that this was indeed the case. As DC Cullen had gone to see ACC Meharg, we consider it most unlikely that he continued to have contact with Roy Garland after 1 March 1974 and gathered so much information, unless he believed that this was what ACC Meharg wanted him to do.

162 KIN 55012.
163 KIN 40689.

233 Why then was the "investigation" effectively no longer being pursued by July 1974? DC Cullen told the Hughes Inquiry he had approached the ACC several times and felt that as a DC perhaps he was overstepping the mark, so he left it to the ACC to make a decision and come back to him.[164] It is clear the ACC never did so, and ACC Meharg told the Hughes Inquiry it was his understanding that if there were any developments DC Cullen would keep him informed.[165]

234 We consider the information given to DC Cullen by Roy Garland in 1974 was sufficient to require a thorough investigation to be started at that time. We accept that DC Cullen was told by Roy Garland that he had been subjected to a homosexual assault many years before. The suspicion that McGrath was homosexual by itself did not justify a police investigation. That McGrath committed at least one and possibly several homosexual assaults on Roy Garland when Roy Garland was a teenager was a crucial difference from a police perspective. Because there was now a sexual crime or crimes being alleged, even though they happened years before, the necessity for an investigation was surely strengthened by McGrath's position as an employee in a boys' hostel, because that gave him the opportunity to sexually assault other boys. Although Roy Garland seems never to have suggested that he knew of any such assaults, his experiences as recounted to the police clearly indicated that there was a substantial risk that such sexual assaults might have taken place in Kincora. The tragedy is that we now know that this suspicion was fully justified.

235 However, according to DC Cullen's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, to which we have already referred, the matter was further complicated by Roy Garland's stated reluctance to assist the police further by being prepared to be a witness. The absence of a willing witness creates considerable practical difficulties for the police when considering whether or not to launch an investigation. If there is no other evidence, then a witness who is not prepared to give evidence may not have provided sufficient information to justify starting an investigation, no matter how strong the suspicion.

164 KIN 72187.
165 KIN 72229.

236 It also has to be remembered that at this time the police did not know of the existence of the Mason file. Had ACC Meharg placed the matter in the hands of a more senior and experienced detective, and not left the matter in the hands of DC Cullen, then at the very least it is reasonable to surmise that a more experienced officer might well have approached the EHSSB and been told of the existence of the Mason file, as did happen in 1976. In that eventuality the situation in 1974 would have been transformed because the RUC would have learned also of the allegations against Mains that gave rise to concern in 1967 and 1971.

237 We are satisfied there are a number of unsatisfactory aspects of this first stage of the Cullen/Meharg investigation. First of all, why did DC Cullen react to the information given to him on 1 March 1974 by contacting a very senior officer the next day instead of going through the normal reporting chain by first reporting this matter to his immediate superiors, if necessary by seeking out his DCI in the absence of his DI?

238 In his letter to the Inquiry, Roy Garland said that he suggested to DC Cullen that he should avoid giving anything to the RUC at Donegall Pass because he believed McGrath had contacts there:

> "The reason why DC Cullen went straight to ACC Meharg was because I told him to avoid giving anything to the RUC at Donegall Pass because I believed McGrath had contacts there. I did not expect senior police officers to be involved with him at that time so it was rank and file constables that I was concerned about."[166]

239 If Roy Garland did make such a suggestion, and DC Cullen did not refer to such a suggestion in his evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, it does not explain why DC Cullen followed his advice and bypassed every one of his superiors to approach ACC Meharg in the fashion he did. DC Cullen's explanation for this remarkable action on his part was that it was a very sensitive matter. We are satisfied that he considered it sensitive primarily because of McGrath's political connections. The longer intelligence log, the JC 3 document, is replete with details of McGrath's political activities and associates, and we agree with the conclusion of the Hughes Inquiry "that the connection between [McGrath's] alleged homosexuality and his employment at Kincora was not their sole or main preoccupation".[167]

166 KIN 130038.
167 KIN 75271.

In our view that conclusion is reinforced by the remarkable way DC Cullen approached ACC Meharg. Mr Caskey, a former D/Ch/Supt of great experience, described that as "extraordinary". We agree.

240 There is one more matter in Roy Garland's letter to the Inquiry which it is appropriate to consider at this stage, and that is his statement that:

> "...Jim McCormick was able to tell me earlier that there were three abusers employed at the Kincora Hostel. In desperation I agreed to speak to a policeman in 1973 followed by a member of Military Intelligence in 1975."[168]

and:

> "By the mid-70s I was informed that three abusers were employed there."[169]

However, in his response to the Inquiry of 30 November 2016 Mr Garland said this about when he learnt of the three abusers.

> "I did not know about three abusers at Kincora 'Before (I) saw D.C. Cullen' in March 1974. However, I may have learnt about the three abusers in the latter part of 1974".[170]

This is material in two respects. First of all, he now says that he learnt about this after he spoke to DC Cullen on several occasions in the earlier part of 1974 and not in 1973 as his earlier account clearly implies. Secondly, he appears to indicate that he is uncertain when he learnt that there were three abusers.

241 Mr McCormick did not make mention of this in his police statements. He is now dead. Roy Garland never mentioned it to the RUC or to Sussex Police in later years. Roy Garland did not say that in his Robophone message in 1973, nor to anyone such as Valerie Shaw or DC Cullen, nor in his articles in the Irish Times in 1982. If Roy Garland was told this at the time it means Mr McCormick and he knew something that has never been revealed before. If Mr McCormick had said something of such importance to Roy Garland before he saw DC Cullen we find it very hard to understand why Roy Garland said this for the first time so many years after these events when he has described his actions on so many occasions in the past, and that he has significantly changed the dates on which he learnt this. We do not find his evidence on this matter persuasive.

168 KIN 130048.
169 KIN 130048.
170 KIN 130064-130065.

Roy Garland's Contribution

242 Although Roy Garland never said to anyone that McGrath had abused boys in Kincora, because there is nothing to suggest that he ever said that he had evidence to that effect, he was concerned throughout that McGrath would abuse boys in Kincora based upon his own experiences with McGrath. He confirmed this in his response to the Inquiry of 30 November 2016 when he said:

> "My allegation [to D/C Cullen] was that abuse was highly likely at Kincora and that this should be investigated."[171]

Almost all of the complaints from January 1973 onwards emanated directly or indirectly from Roy Garland. Throughout, he was in an extremely invidious position. He had been involved in homosexual acts with McGrath from his teenage years for a considerable period of time. He had been very involved with McGrath for many years in both business and politics until their business and political relationship ended extremely acrimoniously. If he went to the police or to the newspapers with his suspicions of McGrath his sexual relationship with McGrath in earlier years would be examined, and he was clearly reluctant to fully disclose the extent of that relationship. For example, although in April 1982 he admitted to the Sussex Police that on their first meeting McGrath had opened his trousers and touched him on the genitals, when interviewed by D/Supt Caskey on 12 April 1982 he said the Sussex Police had got him to explain further about McGrath and himself than he would have liked, and that he would have preferred not to have this matter discussed in depth.[172]

243 Nevertheless, despite this reluctance, he told DC Cullen much more about what had occurred, as can be seen from DC Cullen's 1974 documents. We accept that despite his reluctance to discuss the detail of sexual activity with others, Roy Garland disclosed much more relevant detail to DC Cullen.

244 We wish to emphasise that we do not criticise Roy Garland for his reluctance to disclose such detail, nor for his reluctance to be a witness when he spoke to DC Cullen. We repeat that he was in an extremely invidious position. By 1974 he had broken with McGrath, and was making a new life. He was then married with children and a mature student at university. Were he to become a witness, this would inevitably require him to disclose the full extent of the homosexual acts, and in the atmosphere of the time that would undoubtedly have resulted in considerable stigma attaching to himself and probably to members of his family.

171 KIN 130063.
172 KIN 20247 and 20248.

245 In those circumstances it required considerable courage on his part to speak to DC Cullen at all, and to do so in the way that he did, and we commend Roy Garland for doing so. We also commend him for his unsuccessful efforts before that to ensure that the police and social services were alerted to the risks posed by McGrath to the boys in Kincora. When it was obvious to him that his anonymous and indirect attempts through others to bring these risks to the attention of social services had failed, he was prepared to approach DC Cullen in the fashion that we have described. It was not Roy Garland's fault that his efforts fell on stony ground.

246 We consider that there were several systemic failings of the Cullen/Meharg investigation in 1974.

(1) ACC Meharg should never have taken personal control of the matter, but should have directed DC Cullen to report the matter to an officer of suitable rank. Whilst it may be that ACC Meharg made himself available to officers of all ranks who sought advice, as the Sussex Police acidly observed:

> "In continuing to liaise with DC Cullen over this matter, he was acting not so much as an Assistant Chief Constable, but as a Detective Sergeant, with the disadvantage that unlike a Sergeant he had not worked sufficiently closely with Detective Constable Cullen to fairly assess the officer's capabilities".[173]

(2) ACC Meharg also failed to ensure that DC Cullen recorded everything said to him by Mr McCormick or by Roy Garland, and failed to ensure that DC Cullen submitted regular written reports on the progress of the investigation.

(3) ACC Meharg failed to properly assess the significance of the sexual allegations, and then failed to issue clear and specific instructions as to what steps should be taken by DC Cullen.

173 KIN 40126.

PART NINE

The 1976 stage of the Cullen/Meharg investigation

247 The Cullen/Meharg investigations remained dormant from July 1974 until January 1976. The Hughes Inquiry stated at 4.109 of their Report that Roy Garland (whom they referred to as Informant B) contacted DC Cullen in January 1976, and expressed his concern that McGrath was still employed at Kincora,[174] although again DC Cullen made no contemporary note of what was said. Roy Garland did not comment on this in his letter to the Inquiry, from which we infer that he confirms he did contact DC Cullen again at this stage. It is clear that DC Cullen was spurred into action by this further approach from Roy Garland because he contacted ACC Meharg on 21 January 1976, when he was instructed to report to RUC Headquarters, "and to bring file".[175] The reference to bringing a file to the meeting implies that he may have told ACC Meharg something of what he had done since their previous meetings in 1974. It also suggests that DC Cullen had compiled some material by then.

248 In any event, they met on 24 January 1976. No record of what was discussed appears to have been made by either DC Cullen or ACC Meharg. We consider it reasonable to assume that because approximately eighteen months had passed since they last met or discussed this matter, ACC Meharg would have asked DC Cullen to remind him about the nature of the allegations, and to say what steps he had taken, and what information, if any, he had gathered. Whatever may have been said, ACC Meharg was sufficiently persuaded that the allegations should continue to be investigated to direct DC Cullen to approach the EHSSB, as McGrath's employers. Why he decided at that time that this should be done cannot now be established. It was an obvious next step and one we consider should have been taken in 1974. That is because if DC Cullen did tell ACC Meharg in 1974 that McGrath had engaged in homosexual acts with Roy Garland in the past, none of the other information DC Cullen had gathered, to judge by the information in the three 1974 documents we have considered, added to that crucial aspect. On the other hand, it may be that it was not until January 1976 that ACC Meharg was told, or fully appreciated, that homosexual acts had occurred, because that might explain why he revived the dormant investigation by instructing DC Cullen to approach McGrath's employers. However, as nothing was recorded by either officer we cannot take that any further.

174 KIN 75271.
175 KIN 40950.

249 Following ACC Meharg's instructions, DC Cullen arranged to meet Mr Bunting and did so on 19 February 1976. We have already considered this meeting, and the subsequent events, when considering the response of the EHSSB to DC Cullen's approach. It is therefore unnecessary to go over those matters again. It is sufficient to repeat that whilst the meeting was about McGrath, DC Cullen made a passing reference to Mains as being the warden or officer in charge of Kincora. That prompted Mr Bunting to remember the Mason file, retrieve it from a drawer and show it to DC Cullen. He read it, and asked if he could have a copy. Mr Bunting told him he felt that he did not have authority to provide a copy but would seek instructions.

250 At a later meeting on 15 March 1976 between DC Cullen and Mr Bunting, a meeting also attended by Mr Gilliland, DC Cullen was given the Mason file. He took it away, copied it and returned the original later. It would appear he also requested a list of those residents of Kincora who had been there since McGrath's employment started, because he was provided with such a list. It would seem that the list was provided later, because Mr Bunting directed Mr Scoular to have it compiled, and that direction appears to have been given after the meeting on 15 March.

251 In any event, DC Cullen had now obtained significant new information. This was in addition to the allegation against McGrath, which was an allegation from a person who was not willing to be a formal witness. The new information was that a second member of staff at Kincora had sexually approached a number of named individuals. This created an entirely new situation and suggested that there was good reason to believe that another staff member had sexually approached individuals who were named and who should be regarded as important witnesses. Because they were named, they should be traced and interviewed if possible. As well, the police had obtained a list of other residents, past and present, who could be interviewed to see if they had been sexually approached by either McGrath or Mains.

252 ACC Meharg told the Hughes Inquiry that DC Cullen told him about the existence of the Mason file, and although he said he thought it related to McGrath, he directed DC Cullen to obtain a copy.[176] It is therefore clear that DC Cullen must have reported to ACC Meharg after his first meeting with Mr Bunting on 19 February and before the second meeting on 15 March, although no contemporary record of such a report or meeting exists. ACC Meharg told the Hughes Inquiry that DC Cullen came to see him and discussed the Mason file, and at that meeting he directed DC Cullen to get a copy because he was very anxious to see that file.[177] ACC Meharg insisted to the Hughes Inquiry that although he was anxious to see the file he never received it from DC Cullen.

Transmission of the Mason file to ACC Meharg

253 ACC Meharg told the Hughes Inquiry that he expected DC Cullen to bring the Mason file to him in his office.[178] DC Cullen on the other hand told the Hughes Inquiry that he did not take the copy of the Mason file to ACC Meharg in person, but sent it to him through the internal RUC mail system. He did not make a record of doing so because it was so sensitive. We do not find the implication that the Mason file was never received by ACC Meharg because it got lost in the internal mail system convincing. According to DC Cullen the envelope was addressed to ACC Meharg by name. The comment on this by the Sussex Police is significant:

> "There is, of course, a question mark as to whether Detective Constable Cullen posted a copy of the Harry Mason file to Mr Meharg or not. His previous practice, after obtaining information, was to pass it personally to Assistant Chief Constable Meharg, but when he departed from this habit, the copy of the file went missing. Although papers can go missing in any postal system, in this instance I think it would be wrong to unquestioningly accept that the papers were lost in the internal mail. The envelope containing the copy of the Harry Mason file was addressed to an Assistant Chief Constable, whose name was familiar to everyone using the system. One can accept that letters can be delayed or misdirected, but within an internal system typical of the type commonly in use throughout the United Kingdom Police Forces, letters marked up for Assistant Chief Constables rarely go astray."[179]

176 KIN 72218.
177 KIN 72232.
178 KIN 72235.
179 KIN 40127.

254 Not only did ACC Meharg expect DC Cullen to bring him the Mason file; that DC Cullen would do so would be entirely in keeping with his procedure throughout, because he always communicated significant information to the ACC in person. We consider it improbable that DC Cullen entrusted the Mason file to the internal RUC mail system, or that it got lost in that system. We consider it probable that he did report in person to ACC Meharg that he had complied with his direction, obtained a copy of the Mason file and then gave a copy of that file to ACC Meharg.

255 ACC Meharg accepted to the Hughes Inquiry that although he expected to receive the Mason file, he never followed up when he had not apparently received it. The only explanation he could give for not following that up was that he was in charge of a very busy department.[180] He accepted that the police failed in their duty to investigate,[181] and that it was unfortunate that he failed to follow-up the allegation,[182] and that in neither 1974 or 1976 was there a proper investigation.[183]

256 We are satisfied that ACC Meharg's concessions to the Hughes Inquiry were an acceptance by him that what we have described as the Cullen/Meharg investigation in 1974 and in 1976 was not a proper investigation. We have already expressed our view on the failings of the 1974 stage of the investigation, and it is clear that some of these failings were repeated at the 1976 stage. Proper records were not made by DC Cullen or by ACC Meharg as to what was reported by DC Cullen, nor of the directions that ACC Meharg gave orally to DC Cullen. The direction he did give was apparently limited to obtaining the Mason file, because no subsequent direction appears ever to have been given. He did not pursue with DC Cullen whether the file had been obtained and if so why it had not been passed to him.

257 Given our conclusion that it is probable that DC Cullen did give his copy of the Mason file to ACC Meharg, in those circumstances we consider that it was ACC Meharg's responsibility to give further and adequate directions to someone to ensure that the investigation proceeded. ACC Meharg had taken personal responsibility for the investigation; he should not have done so, either in 1974 or again in 1976, because he should have passed the matter to a senior subordinate to pursue. That

180 KIN 72234.
181 KIN 72378.
182 KIN 72385.
183 KIN 72363.

was particularly the case in 1976, because he should have passed the Mason file to a senior and competent person for further investigation.

258 We consider that the Cullen/Meharg investigation was inept and inadequate at both the 1974 and 1976 stages. We are satisfied there were the following systemic failings: it was not properly directed nor supervised by ACC Meharg; it was not properly pursued when the existence and contents of the Mason file were made known to the police in 1976 it was not pursued properly in 1976 because no instructions to do so were given to DC Cullen or to anyone else by ACC Meharg. We consider that the responsibility for these failures rests with ACC Meharg. We have only the explanation that he gave to the Hughes Inquiry why he did not take these steps, namely that it was in effect an oversight on his part because he was in charge of a very busy department. No other explanation has been advanced.

259 The HSCB, as the successor of the Belfast Welfare Authority and the EHSSB, and the PSNI, as the successor of the RUC, both recognise that there were a series of missed opportunities for the discovery of the sexual offences that are now known to have been perpetrated in Kincora against the residents of the hostel during its existence. The term "missed opportunity" can perhaps be applied to some of the failings when they are considered in isolation, such as the failure to take unsubstantiated rumours seriously, or to pursue the RUC more vigorously after learning of the Cullen/Meharg investigation in 1976. However, many of the failings were more serious, notably the failure to refer the Mason file to the police in 1971, the failure of D/Supt Graham in 1974, and the failures of ACC Meharg in 1974 and 1976. We consider a more accurate description of the events we have examined in this chapter is that they amounted to a catalogue of errors on the part of the Belfast Welfare Authority, the EHSSB and the RUC, the cumulative effect of which was to fail to bring the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora to an end. That was only achieved when a thorough police investigation was put in train following the revelations in the Irish Independent article of 24 January 1980. Whatever the inaccuracies of that article, and we consider some parts of the article in the next chapter, had the article not been written then these crimes could well have continued unchecked.

PART TEN

Other allegations

260 Some further matters were alleged in the Irish Independent article to which we now turn, although as they were examined by the Hughes Inquiry and found by it to be groundless we can deal with them briefly. The first was an allegation that reports on certain cases were destroyed under orders from a senior member of the "Social Services Department". No evidence has ever been forthcoming to show that any such reports were destroyed. Mrs Gogarty told the Sussex Police in 1982 that Mr Morrow told her that Mr Higham told him that Mr Higham had been taken to Stormont and shown a file that "made his hair stand on end". Mr Morrow told the Sussex Police he remembered Mr Higham saying something to the effect that he had seen a file on Kincora which would "make his hair stand on end", but he had automatically assumed that a reference to headquarters meant the DHSS at Stormont. The Hughes Inquiry was satisfied that the DHSS never received the Mason file, and that:

> "Mr Morrow embellished what he was told by Mr Higham when passing it on to Mrs Gogarty, who was thereby misinformed".[184]

261 Another allegation related to a report in the journal Social Work Today on 12 January 1982 which said that Brian Todd, who was involved with the 23 January 1974 anonymous call received at the Holywood Road office, claimed to have:

> "Relayed in 1976 information from an anonymous complainant living near the home [i.e. Kincora] that she had seen a member of staff interfering with a boy inside the establishment".[185]

The article went on to say that Mr Todd told Mrs Wilson, and filed a report on the incident which was now (i.e. in 1982) in the hands of the police, and which was one of two complaints that resulted in no prosecution.[186] There is no trace of any such complaint in 1976 ever being received by the EHSSB, or having been investigated by the police. This matter was thoroughly investigated in the Caskey Phase Two investigation. D/Supt Caskey, as he was then, concluded that this was a reference to the 23 January 1974 anonymous call, and observed that Mr Todd said in an interview with DC Mack that he had a vivid imagination which sometimes ran wild with him.[187] This would appear to be a further example of a mistaken recollection of events from a number of years before being distorted in the account that that person then placed in the public domain.

184 KIN 75287.
185 KIN 21072.
186 KIN 21073.

262 The Hughes Inquiry established that there was no file on the allegations in Strandtown RUC Station, unless of course the investigation following the anonymous phone call in 1973 could be said to be such a file. Nor was there a file in Donegall Pass RUC Station, unless the papers put together by DC Cullen could be so described. No file on any of the allegations had been submitted to the DPP by this stage because no such files existed.

Joss Cardwell

263 Joshua Cardwell, or "Joss" Cardwell as he was always known, was a Belfast councillor for many years. In that capacity he served on the relevant committees that were responsible for Kincora. Until the hostel became the responsibility of the EHSSB in 1973 he was the chairman of the relevant committee, and after 1973 continued his involvement with the hostel as a member of the EHSSB's Personal Social Services Committee. Both these bodies were required by law to have regular visits to Kincora carried out by their members, and he therefore visited Kincora regularly in his official capacity. After 1973 he did so on a rota basis. His name therefore appeared in the Kincora visitors' book on many occasions.

264 On page 101 of "The Kincora Scandal" Chris Moore claimed that Joss Cardwell was a member of a small homosexual coterie which included Mains and the late John Young, who was the Town Solicitor in 1971 when the decision was made not to refer the Mason file to the police. At pages 110-113 Mr Moore described in some detail the nature and reasons for his suspicions that Joss Cardwell had been sexually abusing children who were residents at Kincora. At page 113 he concluded:

> "It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Cardwell, with his personal knowledge of Mains, must have been aware of some of the complaints about Kincora going back over the years he served as councillor. He must have seen Mains in homosexual activity with some of the more willing participants and as an elected representative his duty was certainly to the welfare of young men in care. Given that Mains was known to treat boys at Kincora by taking them out and about in his car, it is very difficult to believe that Cardwell did not have suspicions."

187 KIN 20520.

265 No evidence was given to support the suspicions that Cardwell either sexually abused residents at Kincora himself, or was present when others did so. George Caskey, now retired from the police, gave evidence to our Inquiry in a written statement and in person on Day 217. He confirmed that Joss Cardwell was only questioned by the police because his name was brought up by a journalist, in other words by Mr Moore. He was interviewed by the then D/Supt Caskey and DI Mack on 23 March 1982. He explained that he visited Kincora on many occasions in his capacity as a councillor, but denied ever taking boys out, or having them in his home. He denied attending religious meetings held by McGrath, or knowing that Mains, Semple or McGrath were homosexuals. He recounted that some weeks before, Mr Moore called at his home and said he would like to discuss Kincora. Mr Cardwell also said that he had received a phone call from the representatives of a Dublin newspaper on the same subject. He told both members of the press he would not discuss the matter.[188]

266 On 25 April 1982 Mr Cardwell was found dead in his garage, and an inquest on 28 July 1982 found he died as a result of carbon monoxide poisoning from the exhaust of his car. When re-interviewed on 2 July 1982 by D/Supt Caskey as to the source of his remarks, Mr Moore would not reveal the source of his information, even though Joss Cardwell was now dead.[189]

267 No evidence was given to support the suspicions that Joss Cardwell may have sexually abused residents at Kincora, or been aware of such abuse. In his evidence to the Inquiry on Day 217, Mr Caskey confirmed that at no time during his investigations did anyone make any allegations against Mr Cardwell. So far as our Inquiry has been able to ascertain, no one has ever done so.

188 KIN 20082.
189 KIN 20520.

Concluding remarks

268 In this chapter we have examined the concept of Kincora, the way it was staffed, organised, supervised and inspected. We have also examined the manner in which the Belfast Welfare Authority, followed by the EHSSB and then the RUC responded to concerns that were made known to them about Kincora in various ways and at various times from 1967 onwards. We have expressed our conclusions on the way each of those organisations responded to what they were told. We repeat that it was not simply the case that there were missed opportunities, because we consider there was a catalogue of failure on the part of each of these organisations. It is inevitably speculation, to some degree at least, to try to assess after the event what might have been the result had each failure or missed opportunity been avoided.

269 Nevertheless we are satisfied that there were four major occasions when a thorough police investigation could and should have been brought about. These were the recommendation by Mr Mason in 1971 that the allegations be referred to the police, D/Supt Graham's failure to give proper instructions to Mountpottinger CID, and the initiatives taken by Roy Garland in 1974 and 1976 in approaching DC Cullen that brought about the Cullen/Meharg investigation. We have explained why we consider that the investigation was inept, inadequate and fell far short of being thorough. Each of these occasions could have, and perhaps would have, led to investigations which exposed what had happened so far and as a consequence prevented other residents from being abused.

270 It is true that so far as McGrath was concerned he made no admissions when he was questioned by the police, but Mains and Semple did. Semple was arrested at his home at 8:20am on 1 April 1980, and questioned under caution from 9am onwards. The statement of D/Sgt Graham shows that after a few questions Semple admitted sexual activity with one of the residents. By the time the first interview finished some three and a half hours later, Semple had made a large number of admissions and incriminating remarks implicating Mains and McGrath. Mains was being interviewed at the same time, and by the end of his first interview had also made damaging admissions. Therefore within less than three months from the start of the investigation the RUC had traced, and obtained statements from, several former residents of Kincora, and two of the three members of staff questioned as a result had admitted sexual offences. Had a similar investigation been started by competent and experienced detectives even as late as 1976, we see no reason to doubt that it would have been successful in exposing what had happened by then. That could have prevented the abuse that was perpetrated by McGrath after 1976 at the latest. Perhaps even in 1974 a similar investigation would have exposed what had happened by then, although McGrath had only assaulted some of the residents that it became clear he had assaulted in later years. Given that any such investigation in 1974 would have involved Semple, who was plainly the most likely of the three to have confessed as he did in 1980, we consider it reasonable to infer that even in 1974 a thorough and competent investigation may have been successful.

PART ELEVEN

Communication from Councillor Jeffrey Dudgeon

271 The Inquiry's programme of public hearings concluded on 8 July 2016 at the end of Module 15. On 14 July 2016 Councillor Jeffrey Dudgeon sent an email to the Inquiry in which he referred to action by the RUC in January 1976 when he and a large number of other individuals were questioned on suspicion of homosexual offences and other matters. Councillor Dudgeon suggested that the RUC actions at that time may explain why ACC Meharg did not pursue the matters reported to him by DC Cullen in January 1976. Mr Dudgeon pointed out that he had been arrested on 21 January 1976 and had been driven home by an officer he thought was DC Cullen. He said this officer:

> "...indicated he was unhappy with what was happening and could not understand why the gay aspect needed pursued in our case. He almost apologised."

272 Mr Dudgeon said this at the end of his email:

> "In conclusion, the RUC Gay Squad was in my opinion acting to stamp out what was felt to be a criminal conspiracy by gay organisations and it would appear that this was the view of ACC Meharg who presumably set the squad up and put the extensive process in train. Plainly it dominated his mind and endeavours over the months from January 1976 (and perhaps a littler [sic] earlier) and as a result, I would suggest, Kincora was not considered worth pursuing. If accurate, it would seem he was well aware and well informed of the subject matter and its complexities."

273 Although the Inquiry concluded its public hearings into Kincora on 8 July 2016, further investigative work was carried out by the Inquiry after that date. Part of that involved a request from the Inquiry to the PSNI to provide a response to Mr Dudgeon's email. The Inquiry subsequently received a further statement from Detective Chief Superintendent Clarke relating to these matters. We are satisfied that Mr Dudgeon is mistaken in his belief that the officer who drove him home on 21 January 1974 may have been DC Cullen. Police records show that it was a different officer, and there is nothing to suggest that DC Cullen, or indeed DC Scully to whom Mr Dudgeon also referred, were involved in any way in these events.

274 We are satisfied there was a police investigation in 1976 which was instigated following a complaint to the police. This investigation, and the manner in which it was carried out, was the subject of complaints by Mr Dudgeon and a number of the individuals involved, relating to matters which do not bear on this Inquiry's consideration of Kincora. We are satisfied that none of those questioned had any connection whatever to Kincora. We are satisfied that ACC Meharg was kept informed of the progress of the investigation, supervised it, briefed colleagues on it, and that it was he who sought and received directions from the DPP.

275 We consider the only relevance of this investigation to the work of this Inquiry is that ACC Meharg supervised what appears to have been a substantial police investigation into alleged homosexual offences during the early part of 1976. The information provided to the Inquiry about that investigation suggests that it appears to have proceeded in a conventional fashion so far as police procedures were concerned; that is quite unlike the way the Cullen/Meharg investigation was conducted in 1974 or in 1976. As can be seen from the events we have examined earlier in this chapter, the Cullen/Meharg investigation was revived in January 1976 following Roy Garland's renewed approach to DC Cullen. We see no reason to believe that the arrest of Mr Dudgeon and others on 21 January 1976, the same day that DC Cullen contacted ACC Meharg, were connected in any fashion. That ACC Meharg behaved in a conventional procedural fashion in relation to one investigation but did not do so in relation to the Cullen/Meharg investigation is clear from our examination of the way in which that was carried out. Events referred to us by Mr Dudgeon do not enable us to explain why there was such a difference in the way in which ACC Meharg dealt with the investigation involving Mr Dudgeon and others and the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

Summary of systemic failings

Belfast Welfare Authority and the EHSSB

276 There were the following systemic failings in the way Kincora operated.

(1) Too many children were admitted into Kincora who were too young to be placed in such an environment.

(2) Too many of these children spent too long in an unsuitable environment when they were admitted.

(3) There were insufficient care staff throughout its entire existence, and in particular to deal with the younger children who were placed in Kincora from time to time.

(4) The way the adolescents were looked after in Kincora created an attitude of dependence, exacerbated by inadequate preparation for independent living after they left Kincora.

(5) There were poor terms and conditions of employment for care staff.

277 The way the 1967 complaints were addressed.

(1) Mr Mason should have decided that Main's conduct constituted prima facie indication of wrongful conduct.

(2) The Town Clerk's department should have given a clear response to Mr Mason's recommendations, and the response should have been properly recorded.

(3) Clear procedures should have been devised and put in place to ensure that any further complaints in relation to Kincora were reported to the City Welfare Officer.

(4) Clear instructions should have been issued in written form to Mr Moore, setting out the steps he was to take, especially to ensure closer supervision of Kincora in the future.

(5) Mains should have been given a strong and formal warning as to his conduct on this occasion, together with explicit instructions as to how he was and was not to behave in future.

278 The way the 1971 allegations were addressed.

(1) The failure by the Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor to refer the 1971 allegations to the Police.

(2) The failure to record the initial interviews of R 8 and R 38 so that these could be added to the Mason file before it was sent to the Town Solicitor.

(3) The apparent failure to record the reasons for not referring the matter to the police.

(4) The failure to inform the chairman of the Welfare Committee of the allegations and the decision not to refer them to the police.

(5) The failure of Mr Mason to take each of the following steps after the 1971 decision not to refer the allegations to the police.

(i) To reiterate that Mains should avoid doing anything with the residents that could lead to allegations of impropriety on his part.

(ii) He should have informed Mrs Wilson and Mr Bunting of the allegations and instructed them to keep a very close eye on both Mains and Kincora.

(iii) He should have put in place a formal procedure within the department in order to ensure that any further allegations about Kincora, and indeed any home or hostel that was the responsibility of the Welfare Authority, should be collated and referred to him, or in his absence to his deputy, for immediate attention.

279 The failure by Mr Scoular to report the investigation into the allegations against McGrath to the Director of Social Services, and to the police.

280 The failure by any of those in social work circles, whether in the EHSSB or elsewhere, who were privy to such rumours to report them to their senior managers or to an appropriate person in the EHSSB if they themselves were employed by the EHSSB.

281 The way Mrs Fiddis's report was dealt with by the EHSSB.

(1) No written record was made of what she had to say.

(2) Miss McGrath did not follow the matter up by contacting Mrs Fiddis to see whether she could add anything to the account she had given to Miss Reynolds.

(3) Miss McGrath did not tell Mr Scoular about the call.

282 The failure of Mr Scoular to tell Mr Bunting about the January anonymous call when Mr Bunting briefed him on the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

283 The response to the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

(1) The Director of Social Services should have given clear written instructions to Mr Scoular to: (a) increase supervision of Kincora, McGrath and Mains; and (b) to share the Mason file with Miss McGrath and Mr Higham when he succeeded her.

(2) Mr Scoular should have told Mr Bunting about the January 1974 anonymous phone call.

(3) The Chairman and members of the EHSSB, the Chairman of the Personal Social Services Committee, and the DHSS, should all have been informed of the existence of the Cullen/Meharg investigation on a confidential basis, and that it involved a member of the EHSSB staff working in a residential hostel.

(4) Written approaches should have been made by the Director of Social Services to ACC Meharg at regular intervals, starting no later than 17 March 1977, in order to find out what was happening to the Cullen/Meharg investigation.

284 Mr Scoular's failure to "grasp the nettle", and to report R 18's allegations about McGrath to Board headquarters.

285 All communications within the Board relating to these matters should have been properly minuted or recorded and added to the Mason file.

286 The failure by Mr Scoular to report the matters relating to R 18 and Richard Kerr to Board Headquarters.

287 Mr Blair's failure to find out more about the basis of Mrs Kennedy's concerns, and to tell the East Belfast and Castlereagh Residential and Day Care management about them.

The Ministry of Home Affairs and the DHSS

288 There were insufficient inspections of KIncora by central government.

The RUC

289 The failure of the RUC to approach the EHSSB at a higher level than Mains was a systemic failing on the part of the police in the RUC division to whom the anonymous call was referred for investigation in 1973.

290 The failures by D/Supt Graham to take the following steps.

(a) Make a record of his meeting with Miss Shaw.

(b) Take adequate steps to launch a formal police investigation.

(c) To give a written instruction for that to be done.

(d) To follow the matter up and leave instructions for his successor.

The Cullen/Meharg investigation

291 (1) ACC Meharg should never have taken personal control of the matter, but should have directed DC Cullen to report the matter to an officer of suitable rank.

(2) ACC Meharg failed to ensure that DC Cullen recorded everything said to him by Mr McCormick or by Roy Garland, and failed to ensure that DC Cullen submitted regular written reports on the progress of the investigation.

(3) ACC Meharg failed to properly assess the significance of the sexual allegations, and then failed to issue clear and specific instructions as to what steps should be taken by DC Cullen.

(4) ACC Meharg did not properly direct or supervise DC Cullen.

(5) The investigation was not properly pursued when the existence and contents of the Mason file were made known to the police in 1976 because no instructions to do so were given to DC Cullen or to anyone else by ACC Meharg.

Contents

Chapter 28:

Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Home (Part 2)

Para

PART ONE

PART TWO

PART THREE

PART FOUR

PART FIVE

PART SIX

PART SEVEN

PART EIGHT

PART NINE

PART TEN

PART ELEVEN

PART TWELVE

PART THIRTEEN

PART FOURTEEN

PART FIFTEEN

PART SIXTEEN

PART SEVENTEEN

Kincora, the Intelligence Agencies and HM Government

PART ONE

Introduction

1 This chapter is devoted to an examination of what the security services knew of the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora that we have examined in a previous chapter, and whether any of those agencies exploited, connived in, or ignored the sexual abuse of residents at Kincora (and by security services in this context we refer to the RUC Special Branch, the Security Service (also known as MI5), the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS, sometimes referred to as MI6) and British Army Intelligence). It is essential to bear in mind that this was the focus of our investigation, because although the Inquiry examined a large volume of material in relation to the Security Services this was to see what relevance this might have to Kincora. We were not engaged in a general review of the way intelligence activities were conducted in Northern Ireland in the 1970s, although we have to refer to some aspects of the work of the security services at that time in order to put issues relating to Kincora in their proper context.

2 In this chapter we also examine the responses of various Government departments and agencies over the years to allegations relating to Kincora. As part of that examination we consider the way in which each of the four agencies we have already referred to responded to the allegations that had been made. We also examine the responses by the Ministry of Defence (MoD) and by the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) as the departments of central government primarily involved with the work of the Army and the RUC in Northern Ireland. When we express a critical view of the activities of the non-devolved departments and agencies we do not describe the criticism as a "systemic failing" because we reserve that term for use in connection with the institutions and other bodies examined under our Terms of Reference from the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

The Inquiry's objective

3 In previous chapters we have examined the nature of the sexual abuse perpetrated on residents of Kincora, and the way in which the social services and the police responded to the allegations of actual or suspected sexual abuse of those residents. In this chapter we examine what the security services and Government departments:

1 knew of that sexual abuse;

2 when they knew of it;

3 what they did with any knowledge they had; and

4 what they should have done with any knowledge they had.

4 As part of that examination we considered the various investigations carried out by the RUC which we have referred to as Caskey Phase Two, Phase Three and Phase Four in the 1980s, each of which had a bearing on these issues. In that context we also examined the contacts between MI5 and the RUC, between MI5 and the Attorney General and the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland (DPP) prior to the DPP issuing directions in May 1983 following his consideration of the reports on the Caskey Phase Two and Phase Three investigations. We also examined the report issued by Sir George Terry following his investigation, and the circumstances leading to the setting up of the Hughes Inquiry. As we have explained in earlier chapters, many of the allegations relating to what the security services did or did not know about Kincora have come from various individuals, including Colin Wallace and Brian Gemmell among others. It was therefore necessary for us to examine what Colin Wallace in particular has said in considerable detail, as well as the responses of the Prime Minister, various secretaries of state and other ministers in the NIO, the MoD and the Home Office to the matters raised by Colin Wallace over many years. As we shall see, some of the matters raised by Colin Wallace in his voluminous correspondence with ministers, officials, members of parliament and others over many years were not solely related to Kincora, but some reference to those matters will be necessary to place in context matters that did relate to Kincora. We do not consider it necessary to refer to every document we have examined, or to the evidence of every witness, or to every submission by the core participants, or every document sent to us by others such as Roy Garland and Colin Wallace and the arguments advanced by them in correspondence with the Inquiry. We have carefully considered them all and taken them into account.

The structure of our investigations

5 As we have explained, when HM Government approached our Inquiry in the Autumn of 2014 we required, and were given, the following assurances:

1 Details of all files relating to Kincora held by all UK Government departments and agencies would be provided to the Inquiry.

2 A senior civil servant will confirm to the Inquiry at a suitable time whether all relevant files have been produced or accounted for.

3 All the additional costs the Inquiry would incur in investigating the non-devolved UK Government departments and agencies investigated by the Inquiry would be covered in principle by HM Government.

4 That a suitable form of immunity would be provided by the Attorney General for England and Wales for witnesses who cooperate with the Inquiry, and in particular that undertaking would relate to any allegation of an offence arising under the Official Secrets Act.

6 Up to 30 November 2016 the Inquiry spent £532,442 on its investigations into the non-devolved aspects of Kincora, although the final figure will be greater to reflect time spent upon this aspect of our work up to the end of the Inquiry.

7 On 7 January 2015 the Attorney General provided such an undertaking, stating that for the avoidance of doubt:

> "…the undertaking covers any allegation of an offence arising under the Official Secrets Act."[1]

8 On 21 October 2014 the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland also said that:

> "…there will be the fullest possible degree of co-operation by all of HM Government and its agencies to determine the facts.
>
> All Government departments, who receive a request for information or documents from the Inquiry will co-operate to the utmost of their ability in determining what material they hold that might be relevant to it, on matters for which they have responsibility in accordance with the terms of reference of the Inquiry."

1 The undertaking can be found in the Background, Legislation, Protocols, Procedures and Rulings section on the Inquiry website.

Examination of relevant documents

9 Following that assurance the Inquiry provided a list of search terms to the NIO so that all UK departments and agencies could search their records for material which the Inquiry considered might have relevance to its investigation. As can be seen from the list of terms in Appendix 1 this list covered a wide range of subjects and titles. Sir Jonathan Stephens, the Permanent Under Secretary of the NIO, then wrote to all UK government departments and agencies asking them to provide lists of any files held by them which related to the search terms. Not surprisingly some departments and agencies had no contact or connection with Kincora and made nil returns.

10 The Inquiry then examined the lists provided, identified those files which appeared most likely to be relevant to the Inquiry's work, and requested their production. Given the nature of many of the files disclosed to the Inquiry, except for the Chairman it was necessary for those who had not been subject to developed vetting already to be developed vetted before they could examine the files. Developed vetting is the most detailed and comprehensive form of security clearance in the United Kingdom, and is required for individuals who require frequent and uncontrolled access to documents with the highest levels of security classification. References in this chapter to documents being examined by the Inquiry mean that the documents were examined in their un-redacted and complete form, as were the files in which they were contained, by one or more of seven individuals on behalf of the Inquiry. These were the Chairman, both panel members, the Secretary to the Inquiry, the Solicitor to the Inquiry and senior and junior counsel to the Inquiry. Given the nature of the allegations that have been made about Kincora we considered all documents which we examined with a degree of scepticism, whether they emanated from the security agencies or other bodies or individuals.

11 As can be seen from the following list, the Inquiry examined a very large number of files, mainly, but not exclusively, from the departments listed below. For example we examined a small number of files made available to us by the Public Prosecution Service which it had inherited from the Department of Public Prosecutions, and a small number of files were produced to us by the National Crime Agency.

1 The RUC Special Branch[2]

2 KIN 55001-55119.

2 The Security Service[3]
3 The Secret Intelligence Service[4]
4 The Ministry of Defence[5]
5 The Northern Ireland Office[6]
6 The Cabinet Office[7]
7 The Foreign and Commonwealth Office[8]
8 The Home Office.[9]

12 These totals include many files that were not on the original file lists produced to the Inquiry. During our examination of files originally identified to us we identified other files that we considered might be relevant, and asked that these files be produced as well. The department or agency concerned searched for every file the Inquiry asked for, and in the few cases where the file could not be found the reasons why it could not be found were explained to us.

13 Those which appeared to us to be most likely to be of greatest relevance to our work were examined by the Inquiry between May 2015 and the conclusion of the public hearings on Kincora on 8 July 2016. After 8 July 2016 the Inquiry continued to examine the remaining files identified by it as being possibly relevant to ensure that every file that might have some value, however slight, to our work was considered. As part of this post 8 July examination process we identified and examined a substantial number of additional files and documents which had not been previously identified as possibly relevant, and therefore had not been disclosed to the Inquiry, which we considered had some relevance to the issues we examine in this chapter. These documents have been added in redacted form to the evidence bundle for the Kincora Module, and, where relevant, will be added to the other documents displayed on our website. Inquiry counsel and the Inquiry solicitor spent a considerable amount of time on the examination of the additional material, and the process was substantially completed by 28 November 2016. Where we consider the additional documents throw some light on these issues we refer to them in this chapter.

3 KIN 105001-105543.
4 KIN 3501-3648.
5 KIN 102001-102869 and KIN 190001-190217.
6 KIN 103001-103370.
7 KIN 104001-104324.
8 KIN 200501-200614.
9 KIN 185001-185020.

14 As part of its investigation into what the non devolved departments and agencies, and the RUC, knew or did not know about the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora, and what they did or did not do with that knowledge the Inquiry examined and considered many thousands of pages of documents in these files in addition to those to which we referred during the public hearings, those to which we refer in this chapter and those which appear in the evidence bundle. These files are not paginated and we have not sought to count the total number of documents we have examined in different locations. The best way we can describe their volume is that if they were all to be brought together in one location and placed on their sides we estimate they would take up at least 20 metres of shelf space. As will be appreciated from the number and size of the files that were examined, it was an extremely laborious and time consuming process to examine them all before and after the public hearings.

15 We emphasise that in every case where the Inquiry examined a file we examined every part of every document in the file we considered relevant. Many of the files held by the RUC Special Branch, the Secret Intelligence Service, the Security Service and the Ministry of Defence in particular contain references to individuals whose identity was only given in the form of a code name or number in the documents. In every instance where the Inquiry asked for the identity of the person to be disclosed to us that was done. While a great deal of the information contained in many of the files we examined was not relevant to our work, we insisted that all the documents, or parts of documents, that we identified as being relevant be produced to the Inquiry in a form that would enable the relevant part or parts of the document to be publicly disclosed by the Inquiry. As can be seen from the transcripts from the public hearings, the documents, or contents of the documents, were then brought up and displayed by the Inquiry during the public hearings relating to Kincora. The process of checking the remaining files after the end of the public hearings identified more documents which we considered were of some relevance.

16 A senior officer of each department or agency has provided the Inquiry with a statement confirming that their department or agency has identified every file requested by the Inquiry, and produced those they have been able to find. Where they have not been able to find a file because they believe that it has been destroyed they have explained why that has been done, and, so far as they can, when the file may have been destroyed. Lists of every file examined by the Inquiry in the possession of the PSNI, SIS, MI5, the MoD and the other non-devolved departments and agencies have been compiled by each department or agency and countersigned on behalf of the Inquiry as having been examined by the Inquiry. By nature of their subject the titles of these files themselves contain secret information. The Inquiry required the agencies concerned to provide the Inquiry with file lists and then place them in a secure location known to the Inquiry, and the agencies have undertaken to preserve these lists so that if it is necessary in the future for these lists to be examined they will be available for examination by appropriately authorised individuals.

Publication and redaction of documents

17 Throughout our work on this Module in particular, the Inquiry was conscious of the understandable public interest in documents that have not been publicly available in the past. Throughout we have insisted to all the departments and agencies that all documents that we considered relevant to the issues we set ourselves to examine in relation to Kincora would be made publicly available to the greatest possible extent. As a result of our work, the Inquiry has obtained a considerable quantity of material that has not been previously available. Some of this material would not normally be publicly available, such as reports submitted by investigating officers, for example Detective Superintendent Caskey in the Caskey Phase One, Two, Three and Four investigations, the report (s) by Detective Superintendants Harrison and Flenley of the Sussex Police that were part of the investigation carried out by Sir George Terry, or internal papers of the DPP.

18 While some material that we produced might find its way in due course to The National Archives, other material would not. For example, we have examined files from the MoD, the NIO and the Cabinet Office that fall into this category. As a result of our work we have required material to be made publicly available that normally would never be disclosed publicly. This includes material from files held by the PSNI which it inherited from the RUC Special Branch, and files from the Security Service, from SIS and from the MoD relating to intelligence matters. Wherever possible we required such material to be disclosed in un-redacted form so that it could be made publicly available during the public hearings and eventually placed on our website.

19 We recognised that the contents of some documents we considered relevant could not be disclosed in full. Some of the contents were not relevant, whilst other parts could reveal information that we considered it was not in the public interest to reveal, such as the identities of agents or of those who worked in the intelligence services, whether past or present officers in the RUC Special Branch, members of the SIS or the Security Service, or Army and UDR personnel. In such cases, although we examined the entirety of each document before they were redacted, and, where we considered it necessary, were told the identity of the individuals concerned, portions of documents that we intend to publish have been redacted, i.e. blacked out. Where it is necessary to explain the nature of the identity of an individual, that person has been given a designation, and explanations have been included in the text as necessary to explain the nature of the document.

20 Where the Inquiry identified an individual member of any of the intelligence agencies, a soldier or other person we considered might be able to assist the Inquiry we requested the agency concerned to trace that individual and the Inquiry spoke to them where necessary. Many of those closely involved in these matters are dead, but as we shall see at various stages in the past they described their connection with, or knowledge of, relevant events. With the exception of Brian Gemmell and Colin Wallace those who were still alive and able to give evidence were prepared to do so.

PART TWO

The political and security background

21 The events relating to Kincora that we examine in this chapter have William McGrath and Tara at their centre. We touched upon both in the previous chapter when examining Roy Garland's role during our consideration of the responses of social services and the police to the allegations made about sexual abuse in Kincora. It will be necessary to examine what was, or was not, known about McGrath and Tara in this chapter, but before doing so it is appropriate to briefly describe the wider political and security background of the time. That is because the events we examine in this chapter happened several decades ago, some as far back as 50 years ago, and those events have to be viewed against the background of very different times to those of the present day.

22 What follows is a very brief summary of some of the main political and security events in Northern Ireland between October 1968 and the publication of the Irish Independent article of 24 January 1980, to which we referred to in previous chapters. We selected October 1968 as our starting date because the confrontation between civil rights marchers and the RUC at a march in Derry which had been banned by the Minister of Home Affairs is generally regarded as marking the start of what proved to be more than three decades of unprecedented violence and political instability in Northern Ireland. 1980 has been chosen because that was when the investigations into Kincora may be said to have started following the commencement of the RUC investigation to which we have already referred and which we describe as Caskey Phase One.

23 The first relevant event involving McGrath happened in 1966, and as most of the events with which we are primarily concerned happened more than 40 years ago, some of those referred to in this chapter are dead. The history of Northern Ireland throughout these decades was extremely complex and highly contentious. It has been the subject of many scholarly works, as well as innumerable polemic works, newspapers articles, radio and television programmes, some of which we refer to later in this chapter. It is not the task of this Inquiry to attempt to review the wider history of Northern Ireland during this period, but in order to place the matters we have considered in their proper context it is necessary to make some reference to parts of that wider history.

In the following paragraphs we only refer to some important dates and events in order to indicate something of the gravity and complexity of the political and security landscape relating to Northern Ireland affairs at that time. As some of these events remind us, violence relating to Northern Ireland was not confined to the geographical area of Northern Ireland, as Loyalist and Republican bombings in the Republic of Ireland and in Great Britain which caused major loss of life demonstrated.

Some key dates and events

24

- 5 October 1968 – confrontation between civil rights marchers and RUC at a banned march in Derry.
- 21 April 1969 – British troops from 39 Brigade were sent to guard public buildings and utilities.
- 24 April 1969 – Terence O'Neill resigned as Prime Minister of Northern Ireland.
- 12 August 1969 – prolonged rioting spread to other areas in Northern Ireland resulting in sectarian clashes, notably in Belfast where hundreds of houses were destroyed by fire. It was later estimated that 1.6% of all households in Belfast were forced to move in July, August and September 1969. 1,505 of these were Roman Catholic families, 315 were Protestant. These amounted to 5.3% of all Roman Catholic families, and 0.4% of all Protestant families in Belfast.
- In succeeding years, thousands of people from both communities were forced to move from areas where they were in the minority. In 1974 the Community Relations Council estimated that 60,000 in Belfast, more than 10% of the population, had moved by February 1973. Other areas outside Belfast saw smaller but significant population movements.
- 14 and 15 August 1969 – the United Kingdom Government agreed to the deployment of regular Army troops in Derry and Belfast.
- 1 April 1970 – the Ulster Defence Regiment (UDR) was inaugurated. This was a locally recruited unit of the British Army under Army command.
- 30 April 1970 – the Ulster Special Constabulary was disbanded. A largely part-time force, the B-Specials as they were generally known, consisted of over 8,000 part-time armed special constables.

- 18 June 1970 – the United Kingdom general election resulted in the defeat of the Labour Government which was replaced by a Conservative Government with Edward Heath as Prime Minister.
- 9 August 1971 – suspected terrorists were detained without trial under the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act (Northern Ireland) 1921 (commonly known as the Special Powers Act). Internment, as this was generally known, lasted until 5 December 1975. During this time 1,981 individuals were detained; 1,874 were regarded as Catholic/Republican, 107 were regarded as Protestant/Loyalists.
- 30 January 1972 – thirteen men were shot dead and seventeen wounded by members of the Parachute Regiment in Derry.
- 24 March 1972 – the United Kingdom Government announced the suspension of the Northern Ireland Government, and the prorogation of the Northern Ireland Parliament, a decision which received legal effect on 30 March 1972 with the enactment of the Northern Ireland (Temporary Provisions) Act 1972.
- 31 July 1972 – the British Army carried out 'Operation Motorman' during which thousands of troops removed barriers around what had been known as 'no go areas' in Belfast and Derry. These were areas where barriers or barricades had prevented the security forces from entering various areas of the cities.
- 28 June 1973 – elections were held for a new Northern Ireland Assembly.
- 22 November 1973 – a new power-sharing Northern Ireland Executive was announced.
- 28 February 1974 – a United Kingdom general election resulted in the formation of a minority Labour Government on 4 March with Harold Wilson as Prime Minister.
- 15 May 1974 – the Ulster Workers Council, a loyalist group, threatened widespread civil disobedience unless fresh elections were held in Northern Ireland.
- 17 May 1974 – car bombs in Dublin and Monaghan in the Irish Republic killed 33 people and injured over 120.
- Widespread power cuts and factory closures across Northern Ireland followed the call from the Ulster Workers Council.
- 19 May 1974 – the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland declared a State of Emergency.

- 27 May 1974 – the British Army took over a number of petrol stations in Northern Ireland to ensure the maintenance of petrol supplies.
- 28 May 1974 – the Chief Executive and other Unionist members of the Northern Ireland Executive resigned.
- 10 October 1974 – following a further general election the minority Labour Government was returned to office with an overall majority of three seats.
- 22 November 1974 – nineteen people were killed and 182 injured in explosions at two public houses in Birmingham.
- 20 December 1974 – the Provisional IRA declared a temporary ceasefire lasting from 22 December 1974 until 2 January 1975. The temporary ceasefire was later extended to 17 January 1975.
- 1 May 1975 – elections were held in Northern Ireland for a Constitutional Convention.
- 3 May 1979 – the United Kingdom general election resulted in the return of a Conservative administration with Margaret Thatcher as Prime Minister.

The level of violence

25 The intensity of the violence in Northern Ireland during the years 1969 to June 1977 can be seen from the following figures.[10]

1969 to 1977
Deaths	1,768
Injuries	19,947
Shootings involving the security forces	16,465
Shootings not involving security forces	9,636
1970 to 1977
Bomb attacks	8,314
Vehicles hijacked	4,143
Malicious fires	2,086

10 Cmnd. 7009 The Protection of Human Rights by Law in Northern Ireland, p.6. (published November 1977).

1969 to 1976

Compensation for personal injuries £25,498,153

1971 to 1976

Compensation for damage to property £190,585,130

26 As we shall see when we consider Colin Wallace's allegations, 1974 was a very violent year. In the eleven months up to and including 30 November 1974 there were 205 deaths, 648 explosions and 3,052 shootings.[11]

27 We have given this relatively brief survey of the political developments, and the scale of the violence, to convey something of the gravity and complexity of events in Northern Ireland throughout the last years of the 1960s and the 1970s. When examining the events relating to William McGrath, Tara, Kincora and the various individuals, it is easy to fall into the trap of ignoring the backdrop of events within which the departments, agencies and individuals whose actions we examine in this chapter were operating.

The structure of Government

28 Following the suspension of the Northern Ireland Government in March 1972 a new department of the United Kingdom Government was created. The Northern Ireland Office (NIO) was responsible for administering Northern Ireland. It was under the leadership of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and as such its function was essentially two-fold. As part of the United Kingdom Government the Secretary of State was answerable to Parliament for the actions of the entirety of government in Northern Ireland.

29 The structure of devolved departments and administrative structures of the Northern Ireland Government that existed before direct rule continued to function largely as before under the control of the Secretary of State and his junior ministers. The Secretary of State and his junior ministers were therefore also answerable to Parliament for all of those aspects of government which previously had been the responsibility of the devolved Northern Ireland Parliament, the Northern Ireland Government and its ministers. This included the Department of Health and Social Services, which was the Northern Ireland department responsible for childcare matters, although the administration of the childcare services was the responsibility of four regional health and social services boards. As we have seen in previous chapters, Kincora Boys' Hostel was the responsibility of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board.

11 Cmnd. 5847 Report of a Committee to Consider, in the Context of Human Rights, Measures to Deal with Terrorism in Northern Ireland, p62.

The Security Services

30 Before we turn to examine the material relating to the individual security services it is appropriate to explain their respective structures and functions. As was the case with other United Kingdom police forces, the RUC had a separate Special Branch which was responsible for gathering information relating to terrorist organisations, and those organisations and individuals who might be considered to be involved in, or who might be thought to be likely to become involved in, terrorist crime. Special Branch was a separate department within the RUC structure, with its own officers stationed in each RUC division across Northern Ireland. The RUC Special Branch was answerable to the head of the RUC. The chief officer of the RUC in 1969 was the Inspector General, and after that for almost all of the period with which this Inquiry is concerned was the Chief Constable. Whilst the Chief Constable exercised operational independence, he was answerable to the Secretary of State.

31 The Ministry of Defence was responsible for the British Army and related bodies operating in Northern Ireland in aid of the civil power. The involvement of the British Army in peace-keeping operations in Northern Ireland from August 1969 meant that very soon there were several thousand regular troops serving in Northern Ireland at any given time. From April 1970 they were supported by the locally recruited Ulster Defence Regiment (UDR) which grew until it comprised several thousand full-time and part-time soldiers. The UDR was organised in battalions on a territorial basis and commanded by regular Army officers.

32 The regular Army units and UDR were under the control of the General Officer Commanding in Northern Ireland (GOC) who was a lieutenant general. Under the GOC was the Commander Land Forces in Northern Ireland (CLF), who was a major general and responsible for the day-to-day control and direction of all regular Army and UDR units in Northern Ireland. These units were in turn attached to one of three brigades, each of which had responsibility for a specific geographical area. The GOC and CLF were based at Army Headquarters for Northern Ireland (HQNI) at Thiepval barracks on the outskirts of Lisburn.

33 Both regular Army and UDR units engaged in intelligence gathering about individuals and matters they considered had a bearing on their operations, and this was carried out at a number of levels. HQNI had a number of officers whose task this was, as did each brigade and each unit. Our attention focused primarily on the HQNI and brigade intelligence, but it will be necessary at some point to make reference to other Army intelligence personnel.

34 Both the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) and the Security Service (MI5) operated in Northern Ireland during this period. In the initial period of their involvement it is clear to us that there was considerable confusion about their respective roles, and the roles of the Army and the RUC, as well as a lack of effective coordination between the police, Army, the SIS and MI5. It was not until the establishment of direct rule in 1972 that an Irish Joint Section (IJS) was established by MI5 and SIS with jointly staffed offices in both Belfast and London.[12]

35 MI5 described the role of the IJS in Northern Ireland to the Inquiry

> "…as comprising a small number of Security Service and SIS agent running officers focused on obtaining strategic and political intelligence about the plans and intentions of paramilitary organisations."[13]

It is apparent from the material we have examined that when MI5 and the SIS ran agents under the auspices of IJS it is not always straightforward to establish now which of the two agencies was responsible for a particular agent at a given time.

36 From 1969 MI5 had a liaison officer attached to RUC Headquarters at Knock. In 1972 the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland established the post of Director and Coordinator of Intelligence (DCI) to act as both his personal security advisor and his main link with the GOC and Chief Constable. The first DCI was appointed from outside MI5 because no-one of sufficient seniority was prepared to accept the post. However the post was held by MI5 officers from 1973 onwards. In his The Defence of the Realm the Authorised History of MI5 Christopher Andrew described the DCI's role.

> "The title…was a partial misnomer. DCIs never directed intelligence operations in Northern Ireland. Their main function was intelligence liaison and coordination, which in the early 1970s were difficult and sometimes thankless tasks."[14]

12 KIN 3505.
13 KIN 4079.
14 p.261.

37 The DCI had two subordinates in Northern Ireland who acted as senior liaison officers with the RUC and the Army. The DCI Rep Knock was stationed at RUC HQ, whilst his representative at Army HQNI at Thiepval operated under the cover title of Assistant Secretary (Political) or ASP. According to MI5, the IJS was not under the direct control of the DCI.[15]

38 By the end of 1974 the DCI, according to Christopher Andrew, had become an influential figure. He had become the chief intelligence advisor of the Secretary of State, ran an office which produced daily intelligence summaries, and acted as the channel for passing intelligence on Northern Ireland to the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) in London.[16] We have occasion to refer to the DCI and the daily intelligence summaries later. However, it is clear from the material we have examined that the DCI was not the sole channel of intelligence from Northern Ireland, because both SIS and MI5 officers reported to their respective colleagues in London on an extremely frequent basis.

39 Whilst there was a significant sharing of information between the RUC, MI5, the SIS and the Army at various levels, to a considerable degree each operated independently of the others. On occasions some information gathered by one organisation might be shared with another by individual officers on an unofficial, personal basis, the receiving agency then being wary of revealing to the other agency that it had obtained such information. A further complication is that it was official policy that certain information was withheld from the RUC because of fears of leaks from within the RUC to paramilitary organisations or political figures. In order to establish what each agency did or did not know at any given time is therefore not always straightforward.

15 KIN 4079.
16 p.62.6

PART THREE

William McGrath and Tara

40 Whilst we have already referred to William McGrath and Tara in the previous chapter in connection with Roy Garland, it is necessary to examine again what Tara was doing in order to understand why it, and individuals believed to be associated with it, were of interest to the RUC Special Branch, Army Intelligence, MI5 and SIS.

41 William McGrath was born on 11 December 1916. Throughout his adult life it appears he devoted the greater part of his time to preaching the Christian Gospel as a Protestant wherever and whenever he found a willing audience. His audiences appear to have been like-minded individuals in mission halls, churches and Orange halls throughout Northern Ireland, but on occasion he appears to have operated elsewhere, for example in England, in the early 1960s. Much of this activity was organised by him under the auspices of a body describing itself as the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade, of which he was the secretary. In the 1940s and 1950s he was also the principal figure amongst a group of young men who lived a form of communal life in premises known as Faith House in Finaghy in south Belfast. By the mid-1960s the Finaghy premises had been sold and the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade was based in 15 Wellington Park, Belfast.

42 By 1969 he had bought a house at 4 Greenwood Avenue in east Belfast, not far from Kincora. He lived at Greenwood Avenue with his wife and three children, one of whom was his son William Worthington McGrath.[17] Although McGrath appears to have devoted most of his time and energy to his religious work, he also carried on a business selling carpets, saying in his application form in 1971 for the post at Kincora that he had been employed for most of his life in the carpet import business.[18] As we have seen in an earlier chapter, although little is known of his financial affairs, these do not appear to have prospered. By 1971, when he obtained the post at Kincora, he was working as a counter clerk in an estate agent's office in Belfast city centre. In June 1971 he took up the position of housefather in Kincora at 236 Upper Newtownards Road.

17 KIN 55073-55074.
18 KIN 1213.

43 We have already referred to the business relationship between William McGrath and Roy Garland in the previous chapter, and it is sufficient to say that the relationship ended acrimoniously with Garland obtaining a judgement against McGrath for the then substantial sum of £1,280.40 in February 1972.[19] Following his appointment to the post at Kincora, McGrath sold the house at Greenwood Avenue and moved to a house at 188 Upper Newtownards Road. This was very close to Kincora, although when he actually made the move is unknown.

44 McGrath's involvement with the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade continued when he moved to 4 Greenwood Avenue to judge by a leaflet issued by that body with the address 4 Greenwood Avenue which was found at Manchester airport on 17 December 1971, and notified to RUC Special Branch amongst others by Cheshire Constabulary.[20]

45 McGrath was also active in the Orange Order, and in 1970 was instrumental in the formation of a new Orange Lodge known as "Ireland's Heritage". From the mid-1960s onwards his political views found expression in various ways, notably through Tara. In the previous chapter we have considered Tara in the context of Roy Garland's involvement with it and with McGrath. For present purposes it is sufficient to say that according to Roy Garland the origins of Tara were to be found in a "private group of Orange men" which he joined in 1965. In 1966 he said the group changed its name to Tara and McGrath became chairman. Tara's members were supporters of the Union between Northern Ireland and Great Britain, and in its early years it would appear that many of its members, such as Roy Garland and others, were young and active in the Unionist Party. In his Irish Times article of 14 April 1982, Roy Garland described how Tara evolved in the period from November 1969 and January 1970 into a paramilitary group which met in the Clifton Street Orange Hall in north Belfast under the cover name of "the Orange Discussion Group".[21]

46 Tara was organised on a paramilitary basis with McGrath as the Commanding Officer (CO) and Garland as second in command. "Platoons" commanded by "Sergeants" were formed, with each platoon responsible for its own affairs. On 12 August 1971 Tara distributed

19 KIN 1684.
20 KIN 55075.
21 KIN 55014.

a statement in working class areas of Belfast, part of which reads as follows:

> "...we call on all members of our Loyalist institutions, and other responsible citizens, to organise themselves immediately into platoons of twenty under the command of someone capable of acting as Sergeant. Every effort must be made to arm these platoons with whatever weapons are available. The first duty of each platoon will be to formulate a plan for the defence of its own street or road in co-operation with platoons in adjoining areas. A structural Command is already in existence and the various platoons will eventually be linked in a co-ordinated effort. ...We are loyalists, we are Queen's men! Our enemies are the forces of Romanism and Communism which must be destroyed."[22]

47 A clandestine organisation avowedly organised on paramilitary lines, claiming to have a command structure, ostensibly seeking armed members, and, as subsequently became apparent, a large proportion of whose members at one stage were members of a loyalist terrorist organisation, would naturally be of considerable and legitimate concern to the various intelligence agencies. Their duty would be to find out as much as possible about the membership, structure and objectives of such an organisation in order to see whether the organisation posed a threat to others, or might do so in the future, and to enable the Government to react accordingly if necessary. When considering what the various departments and agencies we examine in this chapter did, or did not know, it is essential to bear in mind throughout why Tara was of interest to those departments and agencies.

The efforts of RUC Special Branch and MI5 to identify the officer commanding of Tara 48 In this chapter we refer to various documents that have emanated from the agencies which we are examining. In each case the Inquiry has examined not only the original of that document in unredacted form but the entire file or group of files containing that document. The documents to which we expressly refer have all been examined by the Inquiry and we only consider it necessary to refer to some of those documents. The documents we consider relevant can be examined in their full redacted form when placed on the Inquiry website.

22 KIN 55014.

49 When examining the contents of the documents that contain information about McGrath, Tara and other individuals named in the documents, it is essential to bear in mind throughout that the information gathered was not necessarily true, or accurate in every respect. The files we are considering plainly contain information of varying degrees of reliability that had to be assessed or verified. Depending on the source from which it came, the information could range from the well-informed and authentic at one extreme to idle and ill-informed malicious gossip at the other, that had no foundation in fact and may have been circulated to smear individuals. Whilst we now know that McGrath committed sexual crimes of a homosexual nature against residents in Kincora, it does not follow that references at the time to him being homosexual were necessarily accepted as true. Put simply, everything in the files is not and was not necessarily true.

50 The RUC Special Branch files show that the first time McGrath came to the attention of the RUC Special Branch was on 7 July 1966 when he was reported as being present on the platform at a rally held by the Reverend Ian Paisley in the Ulster Hall in Belfast. Further details were obtained, and by 5 August 1966 the records listed his date of birth, address and occupation as secretary of the "Christian Fellowship and Irish Emancipation Crusade". That body was described as a "pro-loyalist organisation and every opportunity is taken to display the Union Jack on its premises".[23]

51 The RUC Special Branch does not appear to have had any interest in, or information about, Tara until June 1971 when it received a report from MI5 with information dated 16 June 1971. This report contained some information about Tara and its leader based on a report of a meeting attended by a source who referred to "the officer commanding, a man called McGrath".[24] The Special Branch then opened a file on the "Tara Brigade" in June 1971[25] and it is probable that the file was opened because of the information received from MI5.

52 A reference in the MI5 document to the Commanding Officer being "a man called McGrath" is significant because there were no other details apart from the surname to enable the person to be further identified. The response of Special Branch was to issue two sets of instructions on 31 August 1971. The first, by the Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) Special Branch was directed to "All Special Branch Officers" and commenced with the following sentence:

23 KIN 55068.
24 KIN 55100.
25 KIN 55085.

> "In recent times we have had intelligence to the effect that a Protestant/Loyalist organisation known as the 'Tara Brigade' exists in the Province."

The document went on to describe what was known about the membership, structure, geographical spread and objectives of Tara. The penultimate sentence read:

> "Give this matter close attention. Where confirmation already exists report immediately. Where it does not, developments should be reported as they come to hand."[26]

53 The second document issued on that date took the form of an instruction from a superintendent at RUC HQ on behalf of the ACC Special Branch to the detective sergeant of Special Branch at Dungannon RUC station in which the writer said about Tara that:

> "It has not to date been identified with U.S.C. [Ulster Special Constabulary] Associations or any of the other well known loyalist groups."

Referring to the "man named McGrath" the instruction continued that it had been suggested that this person "might be identical with George McGrath" whose Dungannon address was given. Details of the appearance of the "man named McGrath" were given and a photograph believed to be that of George McGrath was attached. The recipient was directed to report with a full description and "if at all possible a recent photograph".[27]

54 On 24 September 1971 RUC Special Branch sent MI5 two copies of a photograph of George McGrath.[28] On what appears to be 20 October 1971 MI5 responded by saying that the source had been shown the photographs and confirmed that George McGrath was not the same person named "McGrath" he had seen at the Tara meeting earlier in the summer of 1971.[29] On 23 November 1971 Special Branch headquarters wrote to the detective sergeant in Dungannon Special Branch confirming

26 KIN 55087.
27 KIN 55088.
28 KIN 55089.
29 KIN 55113-55114.

that George McGrath of Dungannon was not the person sought.[30] We must make it clear that the George McGrath of Dungannon referred to in these exchanges had no connection whatsoever with William McGrath.

55 A Special Branch HQ two-page instruction of 3 December 1971 to four Special Branch local offices giving more details of the membership and activity of the Tara brigade concluded with the sentence that the commander:

> "…is said to be a George McGrath and the Intelligence Officer Clifford Smith."[31]

So although George McGrath had been eliminated as a candidate for the McGrath said to be leader of the Tara brigade, Special Branch still believed that the McGrath was called George, or perhaps had simply mistakenly continued to call that person George McGrath.

56 We have already referred to the communication to RUC Special Branch (amongst others) from Cheshire Special Branch of 18 December 1971 relating to the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade leaflet found at Manchester airport the day before. That communication appears to have prompted RUC Special Branch to enquire into that organisation on 10 January 1972, when RUC HQ said that "a William McGrath" was the occupier of 4 Greenwood Avenue, Belfast. It is noted that the person on record at that address was William Worthington McGrath, who was William McGrath's son. The request to Belfast Special Branch was:

> "Please have discrete enquiries made and furnish a report of what can be learned of McGrath and his activities and of the 'Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade'."

57 That request resulted in the 1966 entry on William McGrath being copied by the local Special Branch to Special Branch headquarters. As we have seen, the 1966 record identified William McGrath as the organiser, gave his date of birth and his address as 15 Wellington Park. It is noteworthy that the conclusion of the writer was that "this person [ie William McGrath] is obviously the father of William Worthington McGrath".[32]

30 KIN 55115.
31 KIN 55091.
32 KIN 55067.

58 William Worthington McGrath, but not his father, was already the subject of a Special Branch file, and the other Special Branch file referred to dealt with the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade, and not Tara. That suggests William McGrath only came to the notice of the RUC Special Branch again in January 1972 when he was identified as being connected with his son Worthington and with the leaflet found at Manchester airport the previous month. The possibility that William McGrath might be the person named as "McGrath" believed to be the commander of the Tara brigade was not suggested.

59 The next indication of RUC Special Branch information on Tara is to be found in a Special Branch report of 15 March 1972, which referred to:

> "...reports that the Tara brigade is now finally disbanded. McGrath, who was its leader, has not been seen since the first two weeks in December 1971. McGrath is a Civil Servant who was last working on the problem of drug addiction in Northern Ireland it is believed. He also holds the M.B.E."[33]

60 So far as the identity of the person referred to as McGrath was concerned, the information given in the March 1972 report was clearly inaccurate in so far as William McGrath was concerned. Although he was now working in Kincora and therefore was an employee of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, and so could perhaps be mistakenly described as a civil servant, there is nothing to suggest that he ever worked on drug problems in Northern Ireland or held the M.B.E. Not only is the information inaccurate as far as he was concerned, but again the William McGrath of 4 Greenwood Avenue does not appear in the document as connected with Kincora.

61 RUC headquarters informed Belfast Special Branch on 6 April 1972 that "the Tara brigade is now disbanded. McGrath who was its leader has not been seen since December 1971."[34] The report also referred by name to various other individuals who it was said held subordinate positions in the Tara brigade.

62 The last 1972 record relating to Tara is a document dated 7 April 1972, which appears to have emanated from MI5 in London. This document refers to Clifford Smith as the "IO [Intelligence Officer] of the Tara brigade" who was thought to have "changed political horses".[35] It was not until a year later that either RUC Special Branch or MI5 files contained any reference to Tara or the identity of its Commanding Officer.

33 KIN 55092.
34 KIN 55093.

63 The next record relating to Tara on the RUC Special Branch files is a report from a Special Branch officer stationed at Newtownards in County Down dated 17 April 1973. This report referred to a press announcement about Tara of 11 April 1973, and gave details of Tara's structure and some of its leading figures, including its Commanding Officer who was named as William McGrath of 3 Greenwood Avenue.[36]

64 This document is significant for a number of reasons. First of all, although William McGrath had been identified on Special Branch records in 1966, and identified in January 1972 as the occupier of 4 and not 3 Greenwood Avenue, in both instances he had been identified as the secretary of the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade, not as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade. The records suggest that it was not until April 1973 therefore that he was identified by Special Branch as being the person who had been first named in June 1971 as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade. Thereafter it appears to have taken some 20 months for Special Branch to connect the William McGrath of Greenwood Avenue with the person named McGrath who had been named as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade. William McGrath had been working as a housefather in Kincora since June 1971, and so he had been working there for almost exactly the same length of time that had elapsed during which some efforts had been made – unsuccessfully – to identify the McGrath named as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade in June 1971.

65 Secondly, until the press announcement in April 1973 the Tara Brigade had not been known publicly, although some named individuals had been reported as being amongst its senior personnel in earlier Special Branch records. This is an indication of the clandestine nature of the existence of the Tara Brigade at that stage.

66 Thirdly, the report said that the membership of the Tara Brigade "had been falling drastically and they went public to create a myth about its size". That suggests that the assessment of the author of the report was that this meant that the Tara Brigade was of less significance because of its falling membership.

35 KIN 55020.
36 KIN 55076.

67 Fourthly, the report referred to McGrath's sexual behaviour in the final passage in the following terms:

> "The C.O. McGrath is a reputed homosexual and he is alleged to have kept members ensnared in the organisation by threatening to reveal homosexual activities which he had initiated. He used the Irish Emancipation Christian Fellowship, Wellington Park, Belfast as a front for Tara. Membership has been falling drastically and they went public to create a myth about their size".[37]

The officer submitting the report commented that "Further details, when obtained will be submitted."

68 It is noteworthy that the report refers to McGrath as "a reputed homosexual" without giving any details as to whatever information was available to support that assertion. The reference to McGrath being "alleged to have kept members ensnared in the organisation by threatening to reveal homosexual activities which he had initiated", strikingly anticipates the tenor of the anonymous Robophone message from Roy Garland to which we have referred in the previous chapter and which we examine again in the next paragraph. It is significant that the entire emphasis of this report is on the Tara Brigade.

Special Branch and the Robophone message

69 The next document received by RUC Special Branch relating to McGrath came some five weeks later when it received a copy of the anonymous Robophone message of 23 May 1973 from Roy Garland. We have set out the text of the Robophone message in full in the previous chapter, and it is therefore unnecessary to set it out again. The Robophone message expressly linked McGrath to what it called "a secret Militant Organisation known as Tara", and that was no doubt why it was sent to Special Branch for consideration.[38] The Robophone message was also sent to the Divisional Commander of E Division in which Kincora was located, and as we have stated in the previous chapter there then followed an investigation by the local police from Strandtown RUC Station, who duly reported on their findings through the chain of command to Divisional Headquarters and then to RUC Headquarters.

37 KIN 55076.
38 KIN 55077.

70 The Robophone message alleged that McGrath was centred in a "Vice Ring" based in his new address at 188 Upper Newtownards Road, and his occupation was given as a "social worker at Kincora Boys' Hostel, 236 Upper Newtownards Road". The details of McGrath's home address, occupation and work address added considerably to the information about McGrath which was now available to Special Branch and which we have so far considered.

71 Although Special Branch had received information only five weeks earlier that alleged McGrath was a "reputed homosexual" who was "alleged to have kept members ensnared in [Tara] by threatening to reveal homosexual activities which he had initiated", there is nothing to suggest that Special Branch shared this information with their CID or uniformed colleagues. The information was clearly of some relevance to the enquiries that had been put in train in relation to the Robophone message. On the face of it, the Special Branch Report of 17 April suggested that there was another source or sources known to Special Branch who alleged that McGrath was a reputed homosexual, who "ensnared" members of Tara and had initiated homosexual activities. This information placed the allegations about McGrath on a more substantial basis than was the case so far as the Robophone message was concerned, because CID could then have requested Special Branch to approach the source or sources of their information to see whether there were individuals to whom CID or Special Branch could speak, or lines of enquiry which could be followed, in order to see whether there was other evidence to corroborate the serious allegations made by the anonymous author of the Robophone message.

72 Whilst the source or sources of the information on which the 17 April 1973 Report was based might not have been able or willing to advance the investigations, the information in the Report of 17 April was potentially relevant to the Inquiry that had been ordered by RUC Headquarters. We believe that that Report should have been shared by Special Branch with CID in the first instance. If there was Special Branch concern about revealing a source, that was something that should have been discussed at an appropriate level within the RUC. There is nothing whatever to suggest that that was done, even though Special Branch was kept informed of that investigation, because a copy of the Report on Constable Long's investigation was placed on the Special Branch file on McGrath.[39]

39 KIN 55079.

73 We are satisfied that Special Branch should have made the information contained in the 17 April 1973 Report known to the appropriate level of CID so that that information could be shared in an appropriate way with those carrying out the investigation directed as a result of the Robophone message. We consider that the failure of Special Branch to share this information, or even consider how it could be shared, with their CID colleagues in the first instance was a systemic failing on the part of Special Branch. Whether that would have materially affected the outcome of the investigation that was carried out by Strandtown RUC is clearly a matter of speculation because we do not know what additional information the source or sources upon which the 17 April 1973 document was based could have contributed.

PART FOUR

RUC Special Branch interest in Tara and McGrath after the Robophone message

74 The Special Branch records we have examined show that from time to time over the following months throughout the remainder of 1973 Special Branch received additional intelligence relating to McGrath. A report of 17 October 1973 dealt with information from a source on another matter, in the course of which the source referred to Tara. The source said that it was a splinter group formed from the UVF and was run by McGrath from his house on the Holywood Road, that he had been told Tara had 500 Thompson machine guns and that "Tara was 'very secret' and was not generally known to exist". This suggests that the source was not particularly well informed, because McGrath was never known to have lived on the Holywood Road, and as Tara had issued a press release earlier that year it could not be said to be 'not generally known to exist'.[40]

75 Another brief Special Branch report referred to McGrath as being of the Christian Fellowship Centre at 188 Upper Newtownards Road, and to have a supervisor named "Mayne", presumably a mistake for Mains.[41]

76 The next, and a more significant, Special Branch document relating to McGrath is a letter to MI5 by RUC Headquarters dated 22 November 1973. This letter was copied to the DCI at Stormont Castle. The letter said it was believed McGrath was intending to visit Amsterdam on an unknown date, to visit a named person for an unknown purpose and that the person named was not known to Special Branch. Two parts of the letter are relevant to the issues for this Inquiry. The first is that the letter identified McGrath by name, date of birth, occupation, place of work and national insurance number. Although Kincora was mentioned as McGrath's place of work, the greater part of the letter referred to his role in Tara, saying that he "has been the subject of a number of reports as being the Officer Commanding Tara Brigade in Northern Ireland". The letter continued:

> "Intelligence on this group, which is believed to have close links with the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Orange Order, show that it was > dormant for some time prior to the 11 April 1973 when it made a public announcement in the press of its re-formation. Little threat is offered by this group at present and while it has claimed a large membership throughout Northern Ireland it is in fact a small group of people operating in Belfast with a very small membership."[42]

40 KIN 55098.
41 KIN 55097.

77 Whether or not all of the information was accurate, the references by Special Branch to Tara, that it was believed to pose "very little threat" and it being "a small group of people operating in Belfast with a very small membership", are indications that by that time Special Branch considered the Tara Brigade to be a relatively insignificant group.

78 It is not until the summer of the following year that there are to be found any Special Branch documents relating to Tara or the Tara Brigade. It appears that an advertisement was placed in the Belfast Newsletter on 20 June 1974 by Tara, and this sparked a query from an Assistant Chief Constable at RUC Headquarters to the superintendent at Belfast's Special Branch the same day. The ACC wrote:

> "It is now sometime since we heard of the Tara Brigade which we first heard of as a par-amilitary outfit...please update as to present constitution, personalities, aims, objects, etc."[43]

79 This request appears not to have been responded to by Special Branch until November 1974 when a superintendent replied. Having described the origins of the Tara Brigade he wrote:

> "...the Tara Brigade we now know are not activists or militants, but are a group of people who are genuinely concerned about the situation in Northern Ireland.
>
> The following persons are known to be associated with the Tara Brigade:
>
> (1) William McGRATH, DOB 11.12/1916.
>
> This man was Secretary of the Christian Fellowship and Irish Emancipation Crusade".[44]

80 Coincidently, shortly after the ACC's requests of 20 June 1974, the arrest of a boy at Kincora for theft resulted in the discovery of Tara leaflets in his locker in the home, and Special Branch was notified.

42 KIN 105010.
43 KIN 55045.
44 KIN 55046.

Entries on a Special Branch Records Action Slip of 6 July 1974 and 30 July 1974 noted that McGrath was a housefather at Kincora, and that a pamphlet written by him had been published by the Christian Fellowship and Irish Emancipation Crusade of 15 Wellington Park, Belfast.[45]

81 No further references to McGrath had been found on Special Branch files until April/May when MI5 sought information about the Tara Brigade and William McGrath because of its interests in the Liverpool UVF. The RUC response referred to both William McGrath and his son Worthington McGrath, giving some background information about Tara and concluding with the following passage:

> "The McGrath's are regarded as being somewhat eccentric and unstable. Reports had been received that McGrath Senior is a homosexual, though we have nothing to confirm. It is possible that he was involved in the beginning of the re-birth of the UVF in 1972."[46]

82 The absence of any Special Branch records relating to McGrath thereafter, other than being told about a leaflet sent to the Chief Constable by McGrath on behalf of Tara in May 1977,[47] suggests that McGrath was of little interest to Special Branch after 1975 or thereabouts. Other than occasional newspaper articles that referred to Tara and were noted in passing, Special Branch appear to have had no interest in Tara or the Tara Brigade for several years prior to the publication of the Irish Independent article of 24 January 1980[48] to judge by a lengthy report submitted on 4 February 1980.[49]

83 As part of our examination of material relating to what RUC Special Branch did or did not know, and did or did not do, in respect of Kincora, we examined the two-part Special Branch File on the Tara Brigade, a file called the Kincora Boys' Home Scandal, and files on the following nine individuals:

1 William McGrath[50]

2 Worthington McGrath[51]

3 George McGrath[52]

45 KIN 55044.
46 KIN 55103.
47 KIN 55026.
48 KIN 11529.
49 KIN 55047.
50 KIN 55072.
51 KIN 55065.
52 KIN 55112.

4 Roy Garland[53]

5 Clifford Smith[54]

6 James Millar[55]

7 Colin Wallace[56]

8 Robert Fisk[57]

9 Maurice Oldfield[58]

84 We also examined a number of other Special Branch files that might have some relevance to the issues we are considering in this Report. The documents to which we have specifically referred in the preceding paragraphs are the only documents from all of these files that are relevant to Kincora that were created by RUC Special Branch, or received by it from other RUC departments or from MI5. The contents of the small number of documents to which we have referred from all of these files suggest that RUC Special Branch first learned of McGrath in 1966. From June 1971 until April 1973 they were attempting to identify the individual who was identified only by the surname of McGrath and reported to be the Officer Commanding of a clandestine group known by Special Branch as the Tara Brigade. In January 1972 Special Branch learnt William McGrath was the author of a pamphlet published by the Christian Fellowship Centre and Irish Emancipation Crusade, of which McGrath was the secretary.

85 Special Branch do not appear to have made the connection between William McGrath in that capacity and the person named McGrath whom they were attempting to identify as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade until April 1973. Thereafter, their interest in him was clearly because of his position as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade. As the Tara Brigade was not believed to be a threat, and was believed to have significantly reduced in numbers, it is clear from the content of the documents we have described that Special Branch had no real interest in Tara, and therefore in William McGrath, from November 1973 onwards.

53 KIN 55006.
54 KIN 55017.
55 KIN 55001.
56 KIN 55023.
57 KIN 55105.
58 KIN 55053.

86 We have explained why we regard the failure of RUC Special Branch to tell their colleagues in CID of the Special Branch Intelligence that McGrath was "a reputed homosexual" who was alleged to have kept members of Tara ensnared by threatening to reveal homosexual activities he initiated to be a systemic failing by Special Branch. During our comprehensive examination of the Special Branch files we found nothing whatever that suggests McGrath was ever a Special Branch agent, or that Special Branch were aware of any allegations that McGrath was abusing residents in Kincora.

87 Tara was a clandestine paramilitary organisation and, as such, other RUC officers examining allegations that referred to McGrath and others alleged to have some connection with Tara should have thought to explore with Special Branch whether it had any intelligence relating to the allegations that McGrath was homosexual and believed to be a risk to the boys in Kincora where he worked. Just as Special Branch did not tell their CID colleagues about the intelligence Special Branch received in April 1973, there is nothing to suggest that D/Supt Graham, DC Cullen, or ACC Meharg ever contacted their Special Branch colleagues to see if Special Branch had any information about McGrath's links with Tara, or about the allegations he was homosexual and the possible implications of that for boys at Kincora. We consider the failure of D/Supt Graham, DC Cullen and ACC Meharg to contact their Special Branch colleagues to find out if Special Branch had any information about McGrath that might assist their enquiries to be a systemic failing.

McGrath's links with MI5 and Tara between June 1971 and January 1976

88 Before we consider the evidence relating to MI5, McGrath and Tara it is appropriate to repeat that the Inquiry has examined a large number of files held by MI5 which we considered might be relevant in some way to the issues we examine in this report. When we examined many of those files we were satisfied that by far the greater part of the files were not relevant to these issues. Some files did contain material that could be said to have had some relevance to those issues, however slight, but even those files contained substantial numbers of documents which were not relevant to those issues in any way.

89 Other documents which were relevant also contained irrelevant information, or information which we accepted had to be redacted to protect the identities of officers of MI5 or SIS, or those who are now referred to in the current terminology as a Covert Human Intelligence Source or CHIS.

90 Throughout our work we have approached our task on the basis that the Inquiry would make as much of an original document publically available as possible so that the authenticity of the document can be seen, and we have taken the same approach when dealing with MI5 and the other intelligence agencies. Many of the documents from MI5 were referred to during the public hearings relating to Kincora. After the public hearings were completed the Inquiry examined other MI5 documents, which we requested to see, or which were disclosed to us by MI5. Where the Inquiry considered that part or all of those other documents had some relevance to our work they have been produced to the Inquiry in the same redacted form as earlier documents, and will be included in the MI5 documents placed on our website at the conclusion of the Inquiry. While we have not considered it necessary in this report to refer to every document, or every part of a document, produced to us during the public hearings or subsequently, the result of our work has been that a large number of MI5 documents whose contents would never have been shown to those who were not members of the Security Service have been examined in their unredacted entirety by us, and made publicly available for the first time, albeit in redacted form.

91 We have already explained something of the structure of MI5 in Northern Ireland during the period we have considered, and it is appropriate at this stage to consider what the role of MI5 was. This was explained to the Inquiry by a member of the Security Service referred to as Officer 9004, whose identity is known to the Inquiry. He made a number of witness statements, to some of which were exhibited disclosed MI5 documents. Two of these statements were made for the public hearings. The first statement of 30 May 2016 was effectively superseded by the second statement of 20 June 2016 which repeated the material in the previous statement, but dealt with an additional issue. At the conclusion of the Inquiry's post-hearing examination of other MI5 documents, Officer 9004 produced a further statement dated 29 November 2016. That statement, and the documents exhibited to it, can be found at KIN 4135 onwards in the Kincora documents.

92 During the public hearings Officer 9004 gave evidence to the Inquiry by live TV link, and his evidence can be found on the Inquiry website on Day 219. In addition to those parts of the structure we have already described, he explained that although the first Assistant Secretary Political (ASP) was a member of SIS, the subsequent ASPs all came from MI5.

93 The role of the Irish Joint Section (IJS) which consisted of the SIS and MI5 was to:

> "...help to illuminate the security situation as it was developing in Northern Ireland at that time, bearing in mind that the Province was politically very unstable and there were an awful lot of worries that the situation might get out of control or it might even approach civil war".[59]

94 He went on to explain that the focus of the IJS was:

> "...very much on the strategic and the sort of political at the top end of the paramilitary spectrum. The police were heavily engaged at the time in the insurgency that the Provisional IRA and the Loyalist Paramilitaries [sic] continue groups were mounting. Our focus was much less tactical that than. It was much more strategic, and some of the agents that we were running at the time were providing effectively political intelligence that was not directly relevant to counter-terrorist policing work."[60]

95 The evidence of Officer 9004 was that whilst McGrath was identified as one of the leaders of what he described as "a potentially threatening organisation", namely Tara, "he just wasn't all that important to us at the time".[61] He also said:

> "Tara was a potential threat, not an actual threat at most stages, and McGrath was a relatively peripheral figure to us".[62]

96 It is noteworthy that MI5 did not create a permanent file on McGrath until May 1977,[63] and the references to McGrath and to Tara or the Tara Brigade during the 1970s were few in number and intermittent. The first reference to McGrath is to be found in a report in mid-June 1971 by

59 Day 219, p.14.
60 Day 219, p.15.
61 Day 219, p.27.
62 Day 219, p.116.
63 KIN 4051.

an MI5 CHIS on a meeting he attended with a large number of loyalists which was addressed by a person who the source only referred to "as a man named McGrath" who was the "Officer Commanding" of "the Tara Brigade". This man explained:

> "...the aims of the organisation as the preparation of an effective defence force against the day when it would be required. He emphasised that those joining would not be required to undertake offensive action, but would be required to carry out drill and a certain amount of intelligence work".[64]

97 In the previous chapter we referred to the public statement issued by Tara in working class loyalist areas in August 1971, and the record of the June 1971 report also says that a new MI5 file was being opened entitled "the Tara Brigade". It is not until April 1972 that the next reference to the person named McGrath in the June 1971 Report is to be found. That came in a letter written by James Miller dated 7 April 1972 in which he reported being told by a third party:

> "...that Tara CO McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys and that he could not account for any cash that had been handed to him over a period of twelve months".[65]

We consider the significance of the reference to the accusation that McGrath "had been assaulting small boys" later in this chapter, and at a later stage we shall also refer to the letter when considering what James Miller did or did not say in an article in the Sunday Times issue of 29 March 1987.

98 Earlier in this chapter we described the efforts by the RUC and MI5 from June 1971 onwards, to establish the identity of the man called McGrath identified in the June 1971 Report, as the Officer Commanding of the Tara Brigade. The next MI5 record relating to McGrath does not appear until a report of 18 April 1973 was recorded on a card index. This described him as the "leader of the refurbished form of the Tara Brigade".[66] We have found no report relating to that entry, but the date of 18 April 1973 suggests this information may well have come from the RUC Special Branch note typed on 17 April 1973, to which we have already referred.[67]

64 KIN 15002.
65 KIN 105005.
66 KIN 105008.
67 KIN 55076.

99 The next entry on the card is to a document of 29 November 1973 which states:

> "he runs the Christian Fellowship Centre qv (same ref as above) Subject "gets them young and preaches religion to them" which means he preaches bigotry and anti-catholic sermons. Possibly also a member of the UVF."

The card then contains a further reference to a document of 13 November 1973 before adding:

> "188 Upper Newtownards Road, Belfast. OCC: Boys Hostel Warder [sic] at Kincora Boys' Hostel, Belfast. He runs the Irish Emancipation Crusade, 4 Greenwood Avenue, Belfast, which sent threatening letters to Birmingham firms. Reported to be homosexual. He has long made a practice of exploiting other people's sexual deviations and Paisley has expressed strong animosity towards subject".[68]

100 The date of 29 November 1973, the details of McGrath's address and occupation, are consistent with having come from the RUC letter of 22 November 1973,[69] and the references to McGrath being homosexual and "exploiting other peoples' sexual deviations" echoes the RUC Special Branch Report of 17 April 1973 and so may have come from RUC Special Branch. However the references to the "Irish Emancipation Crusade" having "sent threatening letters to Birmingham firms", would suggest that information had been gathered outside Northern Ireland.

101 A Daily Intelligence Summary of 17 January 1976 referred to a report in March 1975 that McGrath was the Warden of the Kincora Boys' Hostel. In April 1975 the Army passed information to MI5 in the form of a summary of allegations about McGrath which was said to have come from Valerie Shaw, to whom we have referred in another chapter.[70] Apart from referring to McGrath's address of 188 Upper Newtownards Road, and to his being the "Warden" of Kincora, this document dealt primarily with McGrath's relationship with the Reverend Ian Paisley and with Roy Garland.

102 In May 1975 Merseyside Police Special Branch sent a message to MI5 relating to the origins of the UVF and saying that it had grown out of Tara. The message did not name McGrath, but referred to the instigator of the Liverpool Tara as a:

68 KIN 105008 and 105009.
69 KIN 55118.
70 KIN 105011-105013.

> "'queer' [who] returned to Belfast where he was investigated by Loyalists who decided because of his homosexual tendencies he constituted a security risk".[71]

Although the person is unnamed we agree with Officer 9004 that it is likely that the person referred to was McGrath.

103 The Daily Intelligence Summary was a summary sent by the DCI to a wide range of recipients. That of 17 January 1976 was numbered 725A, and the extract relating to McGrath is as follows:

> "comment: William McGrath was reported in March 1975 to be Warden of Kincora Boys' Hostel. He has previous Tara traces and is said...to be a homosexual. Another regular and reliable source has recently indicated that the UDA, and also William Craig, may be aware of this Tara / UVF activity in the arms field."[72]

104 Pausing at January 1976, the very occasional and sparse references to McGrath in the contemporary MI5 records suggest a number of things. Firstly, MI5's interest in the Tara Brigade was because it was part of what Officer 9004 aptly described as "the quite grey, murky area between Protestant Paramilitarism and the Protestant Politics of the day".[73] Secondly, it was because someone named McGrath had been identified as the Commanding Officer of the Tara Brigade that this person came to their attention. Thirdly, it was not until April 1973 at the earliest, possibly not until November 1973, that MI5 were able to establish completely that the man named McGrath and believed to be the Officer Commanding of the Tara Brigade was one and the same as the William McGrath who worked in Kincora. Fourthly, the references to McGrath's homosexuality are not associated with his work at Kincora.

Ian Cameron, Roy Garland and Brian Gemmell

105 In the previous chapter we examined the various efforts made by Roy Garland to alert social services and the police to the dangers he believed (correctly as events have shown) which McGrath posed to the residents of Kincora. In his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016 Roy Garland said that he "also agreed to speak with a Christian Military Intelligence Officer in 1975", and described being taken to Thiepval

71 KIN 4048.
72 KIN 4046.
73 Day 219, pp. 34 and 35.

Barracks by "another MIO". Later in the letter Roy Garland said that Jim McCormick, to whom we have also referred in the previous chapter in connection with Roy Garland, introduced him to Brian Gemmell in 1975. Although Roy Garland did not say who it was they discussed, it is reasonable to infer that the "Christian Military Intelligence Officer" was Brian Gemmell. It is therefore appropriate to describe who Brian Gemmell was and how he came into contact with Roy Garland. Before we do so, we should point out that Brian Gemmell also declined the Inquiry's invitation to become a core participant. He was requested to provide a witness statement to the Inquiry but did not do so, although it would appear from references in Roy Garland's letter of 26 September 2016 that Brian Gemmell and he had corresponded about evidence considered by the Inquiry during the public hearings relating to Kincora.[74]

106 Brian Gemmell was a graduate of Strathclyde University, where he was active in student politics. Before he graduated he had decided to join the Army and hoped to get a short service commission, if possible in the Intelligence Corps. In February 1971 he applied to join MI5, but was advised to get more experience and to return some years later if he was still interested.[75] He then joined the regular Army, was commissioned into the Intelligence Corps and served in Northern Ireland between December 1974 and 1976 as a captain attached to 123 Intelligence Section of 39 Brigade based in Lisburn and Belfast.[76]

107 Brian Gemmell was an Evangelical Christian, and through his contacts in those circles he was introduced to the Carryduff veterinary surgeon Jim McCormick, who introduced DC Cullen of the RUC to Roy Garland in 1974. We have examined what transpired between DC Cullen and Roy Garland as a result of that introduction in the previous chapter when we considered the Cullen/Meharg investigations. In his police statement of 16 July 1982 made during the Caskey Phase Three investigation Brian Gemmell said, "it was well into my tour that I met Roy Garland through James McCormick of Carryduff".[77] He said that there were two meetings, one in McCormick's house and the second in Lisburn when he was accompanied by his Sergeant, witness Q. Garland said in his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016 that he was introduced to

74 KIN 130022.
75 KIN 105001.
76 KIN 30145.
77 KIN 30145-30147.

Brian Gemmell in 1975, and witness Q said in his police statement that it may have been in the summer of 1975, and that witness Q left the province in February 1976.[78]

108 In October 1976 Captain Gemmell met two officers who, unknown to him, were officers in SIS and not, as he believed, MI5 Officers. He gave them two documents that SIS recorded him as describing as coming from his Army files. One of these came from 3 Brigade in Lurgan[79] and was signed by Major Halford McLeod. We shall refer to this again later in this chapter. However it is appropriate to point out that this document is an example of how one intelligence agency might come into possession of a document belonging to another intelligence agency unofficially. At the time SIS said the document "was obtained unofficially",[80] although on 31 January 1977 it was recorded that Gemmell had no objection to it being discussed with the Army.[81]

109 The other document was described as:

> "Notes on interview with Roy Garland. These were made by Gemmell and an NCO after a "one off" debrief sanctioned by Ian Cameron".[82]

Ian Cameron was an MI5 officer attached to HQNI at that time as the ASP, and was a significant figure in the events we examine in this chapter. The NCO was witness Q.

110 In 1982, in his police statement, Brian Gemmell said that after his second meeting with Roy Garland he wrote a four page Military Intelligence Source Report or MISR.[83] We shall refer to the MISR again when we consider the connection of the Ministry of Defence with Kincora in due course. There is an issue as to whether or not Brian Gemmell took part in a second meeting with Roy Garland, or whether that meeting was with witness Q, and we shall consider the evidence relating to that shortly. The document which we are satisfied was prepared by Brian Gemmell after a meeting with Roy Garland runs to just over one page. It is inexpertly typed, which would suggest it was a rough note or aide memoire rather than a finished document.[84] The information in the note refers to the history of Tara,

78 KIN 2569.
79 KIN 3510.
80 KIN 3508.
81 KIN 3510.
82 KIN 3509.
83 KIN 30146.
84 KIN 30313 and 30314.

and to a number of individuals who were alleged to be members of, or sympathetic to, Tara. The information clearly came from Roy Garland, who is described in the document as "RG" and who "claims to have been 2IC [second in command] to [McGrath]".

111 The sole reference in this document to McGrath's sexual proclivities is where it is recorded what are referred to as "youngsters"

> "...held meetings themselves and [McGrath] would single them out after meeting. [McGrath] attempted to seduce them by claiming to show them emotional freedom. To this end he made them feel guilty by admitting to masturbation, therefore showing up their guilt complex. This is important to emphasis as it is the very beginning of [McGrath's] hold on them".[85]

112 The other document handed over by Brian Gemmell at the same time was headed "Note to file 3350/18 Volume II" and dated 14 October 1976. It is a three page, typed document and provides considerable detail about the origins of Tara, its structure and objectives. Whilst the report refers to 'sources' some of the information appears in the note of the meeting with Roy Garland. Other references suggest that the author(s) had access to other sources of information, such as the statement:

> "Military intelligence and RUC Special Branch records have about 30 names of members or former members of the organisation in the Belfast area".

The OC is described as "William McGrath, 5 Greenwood Avenue, may be stood down due to ill health".[86]

The inaccurate reference to 5 and not 4 Greenwood Avenue, when McGrath had been living at 188 Upper Newtownards Road since at least 1973, is an indication of how details in such documents may be inaccurate.

113 The only reference in a long three-page, closely typed document to McGrath's sexual proclivities is a single sentence:

> "There is evidence that a number of the members are sexual deviant; William McGrath the past OC almost certainly is bisexual and there were homosexuals in his immediate circle of TARA associates".[87]

85 KIN 30313.
86 KIN 105029.
87 KIN 105027.

114 There are a number of significant features of the information contained in these documents when both documents are considered together. First of all, the emphasis throughout is predominantly on the Tara Brigade, its origins, membership, aims and objectives. Secondly, McGrath is named because it is thought that he may still be the leader, although there is clearly some doubt about that. Thirdly, although there are references to his sexual proclivities in seducing 'youngsters' the context clearly relates to members of the Tara Brigade. Fourthly, there is no reference to Kincora or to McGrath's position there, or to residents of Kincora being sexually abused by McGrath. Finally, there is no reference either to other abusers being on the staff at Kincora either then or in the past. In the previous chapter we have referred to Roy Garland's allegation in his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016 that Jim McCormick told him "that there were three abusers employed at the Kincora Hostel".[88] It is significant that there is no such reference in either of the two contemporary documents in which Brian Gemmell referred to McGrath and referred to what Roy Garland had told him. The first such reference that the Inquiry is aware of appears to have been made by Brian Gemmell in a Belfast Telegraph article of 6 August 2014, where he is reported as saying that:

> "The third source was Mr McCormick, an evangelical Christian, who set up a meeting between Mr Garland and Mr Gemmell in 1974. Mr McCormick said at the meeting that there were three child abusers working at Kincora."[89]

Witness Q

115 He was initially a corporal, and then a sergeant, who served in Northern Ireland under Brian Gemmell, who was then Captain Brian Gemmell. Witness Q made a statement in 1982 during the Caskey Phase Three investigation when he described how he met Roy Garland with Captain Gemmell "about the summer of 1975" at Jim McCormick's house.[90] It was arranged at that meeting that he would meet Roy Garland again and bring him to 123 Section HQ at Thiepval, but the meeting did not take place as planned because he was told by Captain Gemmell that an instruction had been given that it was forbidden to see Roy Garland

88 KIN 130039.
89 KIN 3544.
90 KIN 30148-30149.

again. However, that decision was changed and a second meeting did then take place.[91] It would seem likely that witness Q was therefore the second Military Intelligence Officer (MIO) to whom Roy Garland referred in his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016.[92]

116 In addition to providing a statement to the Inquiry, witness Q gave evidence by Livelink on the morning of Day 223, the last day of the Inquiry's public hearings into Kincora and the last day of the Inquiry's programme of public hearings. Witness Q made it clear that before he met Roy Garland he was aware from Jim McCormick's comments that Roy Garland said that he had suffered some sexual abuse from McGrath in the past. When he met Roy Garland he thought that what Roy Garland described was not ongoing, but had happened before. From the outset of their discussions, witness Q was aware that McGrath was a figure of some authority in a boys' home. He recalled that it was probable that he prepared either a hand-written, or a typed, note of what had transpired at the second interview which he provided to Brian Gemmell who then translated that into the poorly typed document to which we have referred[93] before witness Q destroyed his original notes. He was positive that Brian Gemmell did not attend the second meeting that he had with Roy Garland. He described how he was told before the second meeting that he was to keep the discussion to Protestant extremism and to stay away from any sexual references.

117 In the event it proved almost impossible to steer Roy Garland away from McGrath's sexual perversions. He particularly recalled Roy Garland saying that McGrath "tried to get us to go with animals", something that stuck in his mind over the years. He was emphatic that the name of the boys' home was never mentioned and that he had never heard of Kincora until it became news in the 1980s.

118 We found witness Q to be a straightforward witness who was doing his best to help the Inquiry by recalling events that occurred over 40 years ago. We are satisfied that, as Roy Garland said in his letters to the Inquiry, there were two meetings, and that witness Q was present at both. The first took place in Jim McCormick's home. The first meeting between Brian Gemmell and McCormick appears to have taken place on 25 March 1975 according to MI 5 records, which refer to ASP

91 KIN 2570.
92 KIN 130019.
93 KIN 30313.

authorising a meeting with Garland on 4 April 1975 after an earlier meeting with McCormick on 25 March 1975. Both meetings with Roy Garland are therefore likely to have taken place in 1975 on dates after 4 April 1975.[94]

119 Witness Q was present when Roy Garland spoke to Brian Gemmell at the first meeting. We accept that the second meeting took place at Thiepval, and are satisfied that Brian Gemmell was not present when witness Q interviewed Roy Garland on that occasion. We accept that witness Q subsequently reported the details of that meeting to Brian Gemmell, and having done so then followed the usual procedure by destroying his notes of that second interview.

120 We are satisfied that after the first interview it was clear to both Brian Gemmell and witness Q that Roy Garland's purpose in speaking to them was to convey his concerns about McGrath's sexual proclivities and that after the first meeting that must have been reported to the ASP. Ian Cameron was the ASP and initially decided that there should be no further contact with Roy Garland, but changed his mind and agreed that a second meeting could be arranged. Ian Cameron ordered that the meeting should concentrate solely on Tara and Protestant extremism.

121 We are satisfied that after his experience with the first interview, witness Q believed that it would prove very difficult to prevent Roy Garland from talking about McGrath's sexual proclivities, and it is noteworthy that the reference to going with animals quite understandably remained in his mind to the present day, given the nature of the allegation.

122 It is clear from witness Q's account of the second meeting with Roy Garland that, as he anticipated, it proved very difficult to keep Roy Garland to the topic of Tara. We are satisfied that during both meetings witness Q believed from what Roy Garland was saying that Roy Garland's experiences with McGrath had happened in the past and were not current. We are also satisfied that although witness Q was aware of McGrath before the first meeting, and aware of rumours that McGrath was homosexual, and believed him to be a person of some authority in a boys' home, the name Kincora was never mentioned to witness Q, and witness Q believed that Roy Garland's concerns about McGrath were based on his past experiences and not on any current connection with McGrath.

94 KIN 4134.

123 In paragraph 17 of his Inquiry witness statement witness Q said that in the second interview Roy Garland:

> "...again referred to the abuse of boys at a boys' home connected to the Protestant community".[95]

When asked by Inquiry Counsel whether he might have conflated the references to abuse of boys with his knowledge that McGrath worked in a boys' home, witness Q said that while he still had the impression that Roy Garland was saying that McGrath was abusing boys in a boys' home, he could not discount that he had conflated the two pieces of information.

124 We consider it significant that Kincora was never mentioned, and that there is no evidence to suggest that Roy Garland ever alleged to anyone that McGrath was abusing boys in Kincora. The entire thrust of all of the accounts that had been recorded by numerous individuals, or in accounts that he has given, was that he believed boys in Kincora were at risk of being abused. It is also significant that the notes made by Brian Gemmell of his meeting with Roy Garland do not mention Kincora or refer to abuse of boys in Kincora, but do refer to McGrath's sexual proclivities.[96] Nor did Brian Gemmell mention Kincora or record that McGrath was believed to be abusing boys in Kincora, in the much longer and more detailed three-page report dated 14 October 1976 which he handed over on 15 October 1976 to two people who he mistakenly believed to be MI5 officers (but were in fact MI6 officers).

125 We have considered the possibility that, because witness Q and Brian Gemmell had been told not to become involved in discussions about homosexuality with Roy Garland, when they reported the outcome of that discussion they left out references to Kincora and boys in Kincora. We can see no reason for their doing so, and there were references to McGrath's homosexuality in the contemporary documents created by Brian Gemmell which suggest that they did report the allegations about McGrath's homosexuality that came from Roy Garland even though the instruction from Ian Cameron had been to steer away from the issue of homosexuality.

95 KIN 2562.
96 KIN 30313 and 30314.

126 Having carefully considered witness Q's evidence, we were satisfied that in this instance he mistakenly conflated what Roy Garland told him about McGrath abusing young people such as himself in the past with his prior knowledge that McGrath was in a position of some authority in an unknown boys' home. We are satisfied that Roy Garland did not mention Kincora by name, or say that McGrath was abusing boys in Kincora, but said he was concerned that McGrath could be abusing boys without specifying the location or the circumstances.

PART FIVE

Ian Cameron, Brian Gemmell and the MISR

127 In the preceding paragraphs we have referred to instructions given by Ian Cameron in his position as ASP to Brian Gemmell about what topics were to be considered when Brian Gemmell and witness Q spoke to Roy Garland, and the MISR Brian Gemmell said in 1982 that he had submitted. Ian Cameron was an MI5 Officer seconded to HQNI, where he served as the ASP and discussions with Brian Gemmell are important in establishing what MI5 did or did not know about McGrath's abuse of residents of Kincora. As we shall see when we come to examine the efforts by the RUC to question Ian Cameron as part of the Caskey Phase Three investigations, what Ian Cameron did or did not say to Brian Gemmell in the context of the discussions between Brian Gemmell and Roy Garland, and whether or not there ever was a MISR, are intertwined. It is therefore convenient to discuss the evidence relating to all of these matters at this stage.

128 Brian Gemmell was one of those whom the Inquiry invited to become a Core Participant in Module 15. At the same time he was also requested to provide the Inquiry with a witness statement addressing a number of questions posed to him by the Inquiry. He did not accept our invitation, nor did he produce a witness statement. The correspondence between him and the Inquiry in which these questions were set out can be found on our website at Day 204. Whilst Brian Gemmell explained his reasons for not wishing to participate in the Inquiry or give a witness statement, the Inquiry is aware that in the past he has given media interviews and contributed to newspaper articles about the issues we are examining in this module, and in particular which we now examine. We are also aware that he has been in contact with Roy Garland about some of the evidence given to the Inquiry during the public hearings relating to Kincora, to judge by Roy Garland's reference to their correspondence at page 9 of his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016.[97] The Inquiry was not therefore given the benefit of whatever Brian Gemmell wishes to say about the matters that we now propose to discuss.

97 KIN 130022.

129 As we have already explained, in 1975 Brian Gemmell was serving in Northern Ireland and commanding 123 Intelligence Section attached to 39 Infantry Brigade. As part of the Caskey Phase Three investigations he was interviewed by D/Supt Caskey and made a detailed statement on 16 July 1982. By that time he had left the Army, where he had held the rank of captain. In his police statement he said that his particular responsibility as Commanding Officer of 123 Intelligence Section was to collate and disseminate intelligence on Protestant paramilitary groups. He described how his personal contacts in Christian evangelical circles led him to meet James McCormick who raised the topic of McGrath with him.

> "The question of Tara was raised at one stage and that its leader William McGrath was a homosexual pervert. It was McCormick who actually spoke to me about this and he suggested that I should speak to Roy Garland who was ex-Tara and Garland was trying to expose Tara and McGrath."[98]

130 He then described what Roy Garland said to him in the following passage in the police statement:

> "I was introduced to Garland by McCormick and I remember the gist of what he said. Garland was afraid of McGrath and he mentioned that McGrath owed him a lot of money and also owed other people money. He told me how McGrath had recruited young boys into his circle of influence and it was partly religious and partly sexual – masturbation being the main theme – how McGrath had spoken to small boys about this subject. This occurred back in the 1960s and Garland was one of these boys. Some of it developed into homosexuality and I believe this also included Garland. I recollect Garland saying something about McGrath pursuing him after Garland got married and this was causing him distress and that it might break up his marriage."[99]

131 He went on to describe a second meeting with Roy Garland:

> "Again McGrath's homosexual tendencies, his background and all aspects of Tara were discussed. Although I can't remember if it was named I do know that Garland told me about McGrath being in charge of a boys' home. However, I do remember going to the Newtownards

98 KIN 30145.
99 KIN 30145-30146.

Road area looking for this home. I went there to get the picture in my mind as to what we were working on. I remember seeing a large detached house which I thought it was. I did not go into this house. I remember that Garland was quite outraged that McGrath should be in charge of a boys' home. I didn't feel too happy about it myself especially for potential victims and the fact that McGrath was presenting an evangelical front."[100]

132 He later described what he did to report these matters:

"I made a written report of my second meeting with Garland. I believe that this was a four side MISOR [sic], which would have been graded SECRET-UK eyes A. Because of the political implications surrounding Tara the information was only passed to Headquarters N Ireland and retained at 39 Infantry Brigade HQ. After this interview I was debriefed by the Assistant Secretary (Political) in his office at HQNI. I believe it was on a Saturday morning just prior to lunch. The Assistant Secretary, Mr Ian Cameron, was told by me the details of the interview I had with Garland. I believe that the interview I had with the Assistant Secretary was either tape recorded or his secretary, a female, took notes. When I told Mr Cameron about the homosexual involvement of various persons in Tara he reacted very strongly and said that we did not want to be involved in this kind of thing. He was abrupt to the point of being rude and instructed me to terminate my enquiries concerning Tara and in particular to get rid of another informant with whom I had been associating. This other informant was not throwing any light on the subject in question, i.e. the homosexuality. However, other events took place shortly afterwards which resulted in the Assistant Secretary reversing his decisions and allowing me to pursue the enquiry concerning Tara through the other informant. I can't remember any other specific information regarding McGrath and the boys' home. As I said I only had two meetings with Garland and it was he who gave me this information about McGrath and the home."[101]

133 There are several aspects of the account given by Brian Gemmell in this statement that are significant. First of all, although he says that he had two meetings with Roy Garland, the evidence of witness Q was that Brian Gemmell was not present at the second meeting with Roy Garland, and indeed the accounts given by Roy Garland of the meetings in his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016 support the recollection of witness Q on this point. We are satisfied from the evidence given by witness Q that Brian Gemmell is mistaken in his belief that he took part in a second meeting with Roy Garland, and we consider it probable that what Brian Gemmell described as the information conveyed to him by Roy Garland in the second meeting came to him from the report from witness Q of his meeting with Roy Garland, or it may have been said by Roy Garland in their first meeting.

100 KIN 30146.
101 KIN 30146 and 30147.

134 Secondly, Brian Gemmell refers to the four-page MISR but no such document has ever been traced, despite exhaustive efforts over the years by MI5, by the Army and, most recently, by this Inquiry to find it. So far as MI5 was concerned these efforts started within days of Brian Gemmell making his statement to D/Supt Caskey because MI5 received a report by a member of the Army Special Investigation Branch (SIB) who accompanied D/Supt Caskey during the interview.

135 On either 19 or 20 July 1982 MI5 noted that Brian Gemmell said that the MISR had a restricted circulation of three copies, and that Brian Gemmell was sure he had given one to Ian Cameron.[102] MI5 said about Garland that:

> "We have no other papers on him nor do we... know where the MISR was filed. The Army are now attempting to locate this document."[103]

136 The Caskey Phase Three investigation pursued the existence of the MISR with the Army. In a lengthy two-page police statement dated 17 December 1982, Major Saunders described in considerable detail the documents he had been able to locate in both HQNI and HQ 39 Infantry Brigade (being the brigade to which Brian Gemmell and 123 Intelligence Section were attached), and where one would expect to find either or both of the two Army copies of the MISR described by Brian Gemmell.[104] The eleven documents Major Saunders did locate can be found in full at KIN 30296 to 30341 with their RUC identification labels attached.

137 None of these documents corresponds to Brian Gemmell's description of the document he compiled as being a four-page MISR. In a further police statement of 17 December 1982, Major Saunders confirmed that

102 KIN 4133.
103 KIN 105047.
104 KIN 30156 and 30157.

none of his searches at HQNI and 39 Infantry Brigade "produced a four sided MISR relating to Roy Garland which was allegedly submitted by Captain Brian Smart Gemmell".[105]

138 Despite repeated searches over the years by the Army no such MISR has been found. In 1990 the author of the internal Ministry of Defence Rucker Report, who had access to all the surviving Ministry of Defence files, said it had not been found then.[106]

139 If, as Brian Gemmell claimed, he gave one of the three copies of the MISR to Ian Cameron then one would expect that if it exists it should be in an MI5 file, or at least we would have expected to have found a reference to it, or to it having existed at some time. No copy of any such document, and no reference to one, has been found by the Inquiry in all of the MI5 and MoD files which the Inquiry has examined.

140 However, the Inquiry has identified two documents which we believe are relevant when we try to establish whether a four-page MISR was compiled by Brian Gemmell as he has subsequently claimed. The first document was listed by Major Saunders as SWS3 in his 17 December 1982 statement.[107] As can be seen from the document, it is a MISR. It is clear from the layout of the document that a MISR was a printed form on which the necessary information was then entered. The printed form contains various spaces for information such as dates, distribution and for "Comment/Assessment/Action by Superior HQ". This MISR is dated 22 May 1975 and is said to come from a person identified as "CONCO East Belfast" located at Castlereagh. In that portion of the document in which the report should be entered it contains three typed paragraphs totalling in all four lines. In addition three handwritten lines had been added:

> "Letters appear to be to Roy Garland who was studying at Bournemouth Bible College 1963/64. The letters probably date from then".

141 In the space provided on the document for comment are two sets of initials, one of which appears to be "BSG" followed by 24/5. We infer from this that BSG means Brian Smart Gemmell and that he saw and initialled the report on 24 May. Given that the report was submitted on 22 May 1975 it seems reasonable to infer that it was 24 May 1975 that

105 KIN 30173.
106 Day 220, p.104.
107 KIN 30305-30306.

Brian Gemmell saw and initialled the report. Whether he, or someone else, added the handwritten entries, or the handwritten inscription "Tara file" which also appears in the face of the document we cannot say.

142 Although this document is a MISR and refers to Roy Garland, and is initialled by Brian Gemmell on 24 May 1975, it does not in any way correspond with Brian Gemmell's description of the MISR as being a four-page document. However, the Inquiry identified another document which, although not on a MISR printed form, in its size and content more closely corresponds to the description of the MISR by Brian Gemmell as a four-page document. This document was initially found in an SIS file. We have already referred to the document Brian Gemmell handed to two members of the SIS whom he believed at the time were members of MI5. He had a meeting on 15 October 1976 to discuss other matters with those individuals on that day as his term of duty in Northern Ireland was coming to an end. During that meeting he gave those individuals this document and the earlier document, the notes of the "one off debrief sanctioned by Ian Cameron" to which we have already referred.[108]

143 Both documents were noted on 19 October 1976 by SIS as having been obtained by Brian Gemmell from his Army files, and the other document is described as:

> "Tara – Not [sic] to File 3350/18 VOL II this paper was written by Gemmell and is based on his file on Tara".[109]

The meeting was on 15 October, and that document is dated 14 October 1976. It extends to two-and-a-half typed pages and follows the layout characteristic of other Army documents we have examined. It is very different to the scrappy, badly typed, rough notes of the debrief with Garland to which we have already referred. The 14 October 1976 document contains a detailed account of the origins of Tara, its structure, how many members it is believed to have, its geographical distribution across Northern Ireland and other such matters. As we have already observed, there is no reference whatever to Kincora or to the abuse of boys there. The only reference to McGrath is the phrase "OC-William McGrath, 5 Greenwood Ave. May be stood down due to ill health".[110] By 1976 McGrath had long since ceased to live in Greenwood Avenue, and when he did live there it was at number 4 and not number 5. This, and the reference to McGrath as having possibly stood down as the OC of Tara due to ill health, suggests that the information about McGrath was of some vintage.

108 KIN 3509.
109 KIN 105030.
110 KIN 105029.

144 There are other indications that Brian Gemmell's recollection of the events relating to his contact with Roy Garland may not be entirely accurate. On 1 June 1990 Brian Gemmell gave an interview which was carried as part of a BBC Public Eye programme under the title "Kincora – The MI5 Connection", although the person speaking in the relevant part of the programme appears under the pseudonym "James" we are satisfied from the content of the discussion that James was Brian Gemmell. During the programme the following exchange between Brian Gemmell and the interviewer takes place:

"Question:	Does Roy Garland mention Kincora?
(Brian Gemmell):	Yes he tells me that at that stage McGrath has a position in Kincora and that Kincora is a boys' home, he's very concerned about that.
Question:	Does he mention Kincora by name or does he just say boys' home?
(Brian Gemmell):	I believe it's by name, I can't remember exactly but I believe it's by name. He doesn't know exactly what is going on but we are putting 2 and 2 together and making 4 when history shows that we should have made 6.
Question:	Does he say that he believes that boys or young people are being abused in the boys' home?
(Brian Gemmell):	I think he says he believes it but he doesn't know it to be true.
Question:	No evidence?
(Brian Gemmell):	I do not think he has been into the boys' home, put it that way.
Question:	Are you concerned at the allegation?
(Brian Gemmell):	I am concerned at the allegation. Yes.
Question:	Did you believe him?
(Brian Gemmell):	I believed that Mr Garland believes he is telling me the truth. It obviously has to be investigated and enquired into."

The programme continues with the statement that:

> "James wrote a report of his meeting and sent it up to his Army superiors as a matter of routine. He says it was then passed to MI5 who shared the same building at Army Head Quarters".[111]

145 Contrary to what he says in that extract from the Public Eye interview, in none of his contemporary records does Brian Gemmell refer to Kincora or to McGrath abusing boys there. By 1982 when he made his statement to D/Supt Caskey, McGrath and the others in Kincora had been exposed, convicted and sentenced, and the events relating to Kincora were subject to widespread publicity over the previous two years or so before he made his police statement in July 1982. Whilst Brian Gemmell correctly viewed McGrath as "an evil man", "a sexual deviant who undoubtedly corrupted the boys in his care", as the SIB officer present at the police interview appears to have reported afterwards,[112] if, as he said to the Belfast Telegraph in 2014, Mr McCormick had told him there were three abusers in Kincora it is extremely hard to see why he would not have remembered that, would not have thought that it was plainly relevant to what he was being asked about, and said it in his police statement. No reference to such an assertion by Mr McCormick appears in any of the contemporary documents written by Brian Gemmell.

146 A further indication that Brian Gemmell's recollection in subsequent years may not be entirely reliable can be seen from his reference in the Belfast Telegraph article to his assertion that he severed his relationship with the Intelligence Services when he left the Army in 1976. He is quoted as saying:

> "It was a profession in which lies and cover-up were tools of the trade. As a Christian, I could not make that separation between private and professional morality".[113]

We observe that whilst that appears to be Mr Gemmell's view today, by the end of his military service he renewed his attempt to join MI5. He had a meeting about that with MI5 Officers on 7 September 1976,[114] and on 23 November 1976, a few weeks after he handed over the documents on 15 October 1976 he was interviewed by MI5 but was

111 KIN 3549.
112 KIN 105045.
113 KIN 3545.
114 KIN 4015 and 105036.

rejected as a candidate for that service.[115] He appears to have been applying for continuing work in the intelligence field on a permanent basis by working for the Security Service at the end of two years working in Military Intelligence in Northern Ireland, and that suggests to us that his present views as to the immorality of such work do not represent his views at the end of his military service in Northern Ireland in 1976.

147 The position is that since July 1982 no one has been able to find the MISR which Brian Gemmell said at that time he wrote and gave one copy of to Ian Cameron. The context of the account he gave in his 1982 police statement as to when he did that suggests that it must have been written in 1975 when the contemporary records show that he was in contact with Roy Garland, and indeed as Roy Garland himself says. We consider it probable that when Brian Gemmell compiled the October 1976 Tara Report in which he referred to McGrath, but did not refer to Kincora, he was relying on his 1975 notes of his meeting with Roy Garland, as well as possibly relying on other material in his Army file.

148 No document has been found corresponding to his description of the document he prepared as a four-page MISR. The MISR which he signed on 24 May 1975 cannot be that document because it has only a few lines of typed and hand written information on it. However, the two-and-a-half page 14 October 1976 document, although it is not on a MISR form, and is two-and-a-half and not four pages in length, corresponds much more closely in content with what would be expected to be in a MISR dealing with Tara.

149 In his statement to the Inquiry, Dennis referred to discussions he had with Brian Gemmell.

> "I later had several discussions with Captain Gemmell at HQ 39 Bde during one of which he described how the report had been disseminated up to HQNI, in the normal way, but that a strongly worded rebuke had come back from them to drop the matter immediately – whether this rebuke was in written or verbal form, or by whom, I do not know. I do know from other, later, discussions with him that he continued privately to pursue the matter of TARA and reports of the abuse of boys at the Kincora premises. Capt Gemmell eventually left the Province, I believe prematurely, and I later heard that he had resigned his commission."[116]

115 KIN 4062 and 105031.
116 KIN 190219.

150 It is unclear from this whether Dennis had these discussions with Brian Gemmell before Brian Gemmell left the Province, or subsequently, although the implication is that the discussions were before Brian Gemmell left Northern Ireland. However, in his 1982 police statement Brian Gemmell made no reference to his having known that boys were being abused in Kincora, his belief was there were potential victims because McGrath was in charge of a boys' home, and that was based on what Roy Garland had told him of his experiences with McGrath years before McGrath worked at Kincora. We consider it probable that Dennis's memory of these discussions has been tainted by what he may have heard about Kincora in later years; we therefore prefer what Brian Gemmell said to the police in 1982.

151 It is clear from witness Q's evidence that from the military perspective the object of speaking to Roy Garland in 1975 was to obtain information about Tara. We have referred to other aspects of Brian Gemmell's recollection of what he did or did not say in 1975, and we consider that he was mistaken in 1982 when he said that he prepared three copies of a four-page MISR, and gave one copy to Ian Cameron. We are satisfied that he has mistakenly conflated the short May 1975 MISR and the 14 October 1976 document into his recollection of a single MISR. It is easy to see how this could have happened. By the time he made his July 1982 statement he was no longer in the Army and therefore did not have access to the files to refresh his memory or check his recollection. In addition, the events he described happened between five-and-a-half and nearly seven years before. In his reply to the Inquiry Warning Letter Mr Gemmell informed us that although he maintained there were numerous inaccuracies and unjustified assumptions in that portion of the Draft Report provided to him by the Inquiry with the Warning Letter he did not wish to respond to the Warning Letter.

152 In the 1 June 1990 Public Eye programme Brian Gemmell referred to other matters which we have considered. In particular he described the reaction of Ian Cameron to his discussions with Roy Garland. These were investigated by D/Supt Caskey in 1982 and 1983 as part of the Caskey Phase Three investigations, and it is therefore more convenient to examine Ian Cameron's version of those discussions in the context of the unsuccessful efforts of D/Supt Caskey to interview Ian Cameron in person at that time. At this point we therefore turn to examine two other matters which may have a bearing on the issues we have to consider. The first relates to MI5's attitude towards John McKeague, and the second concerns MI5's attitude to Tara in 1977.

MI5 and John McKeague's homosexuality

153 In the 1 June 1980 Public Eye programme Brian Gemmell referred to a meeting he said he had with two MI5 officers in London when there was a discussion about the chances of using John McKeague, who was a prominent suspected loyalist terrorist figure of the time, as an informant. McKeague was widely believed to be the founder of the proscribed loyalist terrorist organisation called the Red Hand Commando, and to be homosexual. He was murdered in 1982.

154 The transcript of the programme to which we have earlier referred contains the following exchange between the interviewer and Brian Gemmell:

> "(Brian Gemmell): According to them they have some compromising film of a homosexual nature of John McKeague which they wonder could it be used to make Mr McKeague co-operative as an informant.
>
> (Interviewer): Are you sure they are suggesting or asking your advice on using Mr McKeague's alleged homosexuality as a way of blackmailing him into co-operating with the Security Service?
>
> (Brian Gemmell): I don't think that the word blackmail was actually ever used in our discussions. Enticing, encouraging, putting pressure on; I'm quite certain about that.
>
> (Interviewer): Does it surprise you when you are asked that kind of question involving the alleged homosexuality of a person?
>
> (Brian Gemmell): Not really, I am more surprised at the protestations that intelligence forces do not deal with a thing like that."

155 The response of MI5 to this is contained in the statement of Officer 9004 of 20 June 2016 at paragraph 72-81.[117] He said the following at paragraph 74:

> "We have examined this allegation and established that MI5 had no compromising film of McKeague and never made any attempt to blackmail him. However, one MI5 officer did put forward an operational proposal (which was never endorsed) which involved using McKeague's homosexual activities in London in an attempt to recruit him. We describe the chronology of events below."

117 KIN 4068 and 4069.

156 Officer 9004 went on to describe how McKeague was the subject of surveillance during a visit to London in June 1976 when he was suspected of being part of a UVF arms procurement operation. Photographs were taken of him in public places which suggested to those conducting a surveillance that McKeague had contact with young men to establish homosexual assignations. On 7 September 1976 Gemmell had an informal lunch meeting with an MI5 officer. There is no record of what was said, but we consider it probable this is the meeting to which Brian Gemmell was referring in his Public Eye comments, although he did meet two MI5 officers in London on 10 May 1976 in connection with the handling of an agent unrelated to McKeague.[118]

157 Officer 9004 said that there was a proposal in November 1976 by the MI5 officer with whom Brian Gemmell had lunch in September that "serious consideration should be given to using [McKeague's] homosexual tendencies to recruit him".[119] Officer 9004 related that although the proposal was examined by other officers, including management, it was not endorsed. He also said that MI5 neither took nor possessed any compromising photographs of McKeague.

158 That such a suggestion was made in November 1976 renders it quite possible that there may have been some discussions between MI5 officers and Brian Gemmell of the type Brian Gemmell described in the Public Eye programme. The Inquiry examined the original records relating to this proposal and to the meetings between Brian Gemmell and MI5 in the Autumn of 1976. These records support the account given to the Inquiry by Officer 9004. We are satisfied there was a discussion of a general nature by an MI5 officer with Brian Gemmell, a discussion which probably took place at the lunch in September 1976, when the possibility of exploiting McKeague's homosexuality was discussed. We are satisfied that although that possibility was considered and examined by MI5 it never progressed to the stage of being more than a proposal. We are also satisfied that no photographs were taken of a compromising nature.

118 KIN 4068.
119 KIN 4069.

159 As we have already pointed out, by September 1976 Brian Gemmell had served the best part of two years in an intelligence capacity in Northern Ireland. His visit to London on 7 September 1976 was because he was pursuing his earlier ambition to join MI5, and he had a meeting for that purpose that afternoon. The discussion about the possibility of exploiting McKeague's homosexuality does not appear to have deterred him from pursuing his application to join MI5 at that stage because he was interviewed for that purpose in November 1976 but was rejected.[120]

MI5 and Tara in 1977

160 On 19 October 1976 MI5 received from SIS a copy of the lengthy intelligence report on Tara prepared at 3 Brigade dated 28 January 1976.[121] The full report can be found at KIN 30297–30302. It runs to six pages and gives considerable detail about what was known about Tara, its origins, membership, structures and objectives. The information was said to have come from three contacts. In that portion relating to McGrath appears the following paragraph:

> "McGrath is a homosexual and makes a practice of seducing promising young men".[122]

Having given a number of names, in the next paragraph there are references to intelligence which gave "distinct impressions that McGrath was somehow associated with communism". At the end of paragraph 7 there appears the following:

> "McGrath is currently described from the 1975 Belfast Street Directory as a Welfare Officer. He is thought to be running some form of boys' home".[123]

161 It will be apparent from the document that whilst it describes McGrath as a homosexual "who makes a practice of seducing promising young men", it is clear from the names and descriptions of the "young men" then referred to that they were young men active in politics and not residents of Kincora. Whilst there is a reference to McGrath being "thought to be running some form of boys' home" there is no reference to Kincora as such, and the reference is clearly incidental to a discussion of his financial position and means of support. We consider it significant that

120 KIN 4062.
121 KIN 3508.
122 KIN 30298.
123 KIN 30298.

there is no reference of any sort in this document to McGrath engaging in the seduction of, or sexual activity with, residents of Kincora.

162 The receipt of this document from SIS on 19 October 1976 appears to have prompted MI5 to pay further attention to Tara, because on 31 January 1977 an SIS officer in London referred to the 28 January 1976 report, and explained that MI5 have asked if "the source mentioned in the letter could be retasked for further information".[124] An intelligence officer in Northern Ireland replied on 2 February 1977 by saying that they did not have a copy of the letter, nor did they know who the source was.[125] It is clear that the interest of the security services at this stage came about because they wished to explore what was described as "RIS [Russian Intelligence Service] involvement with the Protestant Extremists in Northern Ireland".[126]

163 Following further exchanges about Tara, on 11 February 1977 an SIS officer in London wrote:

> "We look forward to learning more about the orbat [sic] and finances of this organisation. When we have such information we may be able to put Tara in its proper perspective".

The writer then made two requests to intelligence staff in Northern Ireland and to MI5, one of which was:

> "Would the Tara recruiting campaign offer... a loophole to penetrate Tara, if we consider it a worthwhile target".[127]

164 We regard this document as being of considerable significance. So far the documents and events we have examined show that both MI5 and SIS were interested in Tara and sought to obtain information about it. One of the details MI5 had attempted to establish from June 1971 onwards was who was the person described as McGrath, and it appears to have taken until 1973 before that was fully accomplished. Thereafter there are occasional documents relating to Tara and McGrath. The events from 1975 and 1976 involving Brian Gemmell strongly suggest that by that stage MI5, SIS and the Army were still gathering such information as they could about Tara, including confirmation that McGrath remained the commanding officer. It is in that context that the references to McGrath that we have examined occur.

124 KIN 105032.
125 KIN 105204.
126 KIN 105205.
127 KIN 105208.

165 On 15 February 1977 SIS asked MI5 if Tara was a worthwhile target to penetrate. If, as has been suggested by various journalists and commentators, McGrath had been an agent of SIS for many years, or was an agent of MI5, and in either event was controlled by either or both agencies, it is extremely surprising that all the contemporary records from MI5 and SIS show that both had devoted much effort to finding out who McGrath was, and as much as they could about Tara. That they were doing so suggests that he was not an agent of either agency. What would be the point of considering penetrating Tara in February 1977 if, as alleged, he was an agent of either agency? On the other hand, if he were not an agent, then all the efforts that were made to gather the information that we have examined are entirely consistent with, and indicative of, the fact that he was not such an agent of either agency. Later in this chapter we examine other material that bears on this question.

The interaction between Brian Gemmell and Ian Cameron in 1976

166 We have already quoted what Brian Gemmell said to the police in his 1982 statement about the occasions on which he spoke to Roy Garland in 1975, and what he claimed was Ian Cameron's response. We also refer to this in the context of the Public Eye programme when he described being summoned to see "the senior MI5 officer", meaning Ian Cameron.

> "I can't honestly say I was expecting three gold stars but I went up feeling fairly positive, expecting a normal meeting".[128]

In the 6 August 2014 Belfast Telegraph article he is quoted as saying:

> "Ian Cameron was very much a father figure to me at the time, ...I was in my mid-20s and he was in his early 60s. He was a very nice chap, but he reacted very strongly. He told me that MI5 did not concern itself with what homosexuals did and he ordered me to stop using an agent I had within Tara..."[129]

167 In seeking to establish at this remove many years later what Ian Cameron said to Brian Gemmell, and his response to the information Brian Gemmell gave him after his initial meeting with Roy Garland, it is necessary to consider what Ian Cameron said about this when D/Supt Caskey pursued this issue as part of the Caskey Phase Three investigations. We have already explained why we believe there was only one meeting between Gemmell and Garland, and because witness Q made clear to us that after Brian Gemmell and he spoke to Roy Garland at Mr McCormick's house, the intended second meeting with Roy Garland at Thiepval was cancelled. However, it was reinstated when Brian Gemmell was instructed that there could be a second meeting, but the focus was to be on Protestant extremism, meaning Tara, and not the sexual matters relating to McGrath that Roy Garland had described at the first meeting.

128 KIN 3549.
129 KIN 3545.

168 There is no contemporary reference to discussions between Brian Gemmell and Ian Cameron, apart from the note for file that Gemmell and witness Q were told they could interview Garland,[130] an instruction given after the meeting with Jim McCormick. A file note of 9 June 1975 by Ian Cameron referring to instructions he gave Brian Gemmell to break off contact, did not refer to contact with Roy Garland, but to contact with an agent whose identity is known to the Inquiry. Brian Gemmell acknowledged that there was another informant in his 1982 police statement.[131] It is likely that Brian Gemmell mistakenly conflated the separate sets of instructions when he gave his interview with the Belfast Telegraph of 6 August 2014 to which we have referred. This conflation may account for Ian Cameron's answer to Q10 of the Caskey 30 questions when it was recorded that;

> "…he does not accept that he reversed his decision but is not sure what the police are getting at".[132]

The evidence of Officer 9347

169 Before turning to consider other matters which may bear on the issue of what Brian Gemmell said to Ian Cameron, or what Ian Cameron said to Brian Gemmell, it is convenient to consider the evidence of Officer 9347, who gave evidence to the Inquiry on Day 221. He is a retired officer of the Security Service who served as the ASP at Thiepval between 1981 and 1983. Although his period as ASP was some years after Ian Cameron, he knew Ian Cameron. Officer 9347 explained that because he was the ASP in post in 1982 he became involved in the response of the Intelligence Services to the Caskey Phase Three investigation. More specifically, he was aware of that part of it which involved the questioning of Brian Gemmell by D/Supt Caskey. We have already explained that this part of the investigation was dealt with in a separate secret report to the DPP which we call Caskey Phase Three. As part of that he prepared the 4-page report of 19/20 July 1982 to which we have already referred and which is to be found at KIN 105044-KIN 105047.

130 KIN 4134.
131 KIN 30146.
132 KIN 105059.

170 Officer 9347 explained that while he cannot now remember the documents on which he based this report, and particularly those which he must have consulted when preparing paragraph 8, he did have access to those documents at the time. We are satisfied that those documents were held on a local file in Thiepval, which has now been destroyed.[133] We are therefore reliant on Officer 9347's evidence of what he must have seen in 1982 when he wrote paragraph 8. It is in the following terms.

> "Gemmel's [sic] interview with McCormick on 25 March 1975 (which included a request for authority to approach Garland) is filed on [codeword] PF. Responding to this request [MI5 Officer] wrote a note for file recording that Gemmel [sic] and [MOD Officer Q] were told on 4 April 1975 by ASP and [staff des] that quote it was in order for Garland to be interviewed on the strict undzerstanding [sic] that the overt and clearly expressed reason was a requirement for information on Tara. It was emphasised that the Army had no interest in investigation of deviant sexual activities or religious aspects of the group which was solely the function of a specialist section of the RUC. Therefore this discussion should be steered away from this type of issue. Anything Garland might say about peresonalities [sic] involving particularly [codeword's] would be of interest."[134]

171 In effect, Officer 9347's evidence was that in 1982 the file on which he based paragraph 8 enabled him to say that in 1975 Ian Cameron recorded that he had instructed Brian Gemmell that (1) the reason for the interview with Roy Garland was to gather information on Tara; (2) the Army was not interested in investigating deviant sexual activities or religious aspects of Tara; because (3) those were solely the function of a specialist section of the RUC. What was meant by "a specialist section of the RUC" is not clear. At that time the RUC did not have a specialist CARE (Child Abuse and Rape Enquiry) Unit, and so the reference to a "specialist section" may have referred to RUC Special Branch.

133 Day 221, p.103 and KIN 4011.
134 KIN 105046 and 105047.

172 Paragraph 8 clearly contained a direct quote from another document, as indicated by the standard MI5 usage in such telegrams of the words quote and unquote rather than placing a quotation in inadverted commas. We see no reason not to accept the evidence of Officer 9347 that paragraph 8 was an accurate record of what he saw in the file in 1982. That is relevant when we come to consider the interaction between Brian Gemmell and Ian Cameron in 1976, because the use in paragraph 8 of a direct quotation from a contemporary document which no longer exists provides support for Ian Cameron's 1982 account of these events. As we shall see, by that time he had retired from MI5.

Ian Cameron's account of these events in 1982

173 Ian Cameron died some years ago, and so we are dependent upon his answers to questions posed to him during the Caskey Phase Three investigations as recorded at the time by the legal adviser of MI5. We shall examine why Ian Cameron was not interviewed in person by D/Supt Caskey in the next part of this chapter. At this stage we concentrate on what Ian Cameron is recorded as saying in answer to the list of 30 questions drawn up by D/Supt Caskey in order to establish what Ian Cameron's responses were to what Brian Gemmell had said about Ian Cameron's approach to Brian Gemmell's contacts with Roy Garland.

174 The 30 questions are to be found at KIN 105055-105058, and the answers are set out KIN 105059 and 105060. When considering the answers it has to be borne in mind throughout that the answers do not purport to be the actual words of Ian Cameron, but are the answers as recorded in the third person by Bernard Sheldon, the former MI5 legal adviser, following a conversation he held with Ian Cameron on 1 November 1982 when Ian Cameron was about to go abroad. By then Ian Cameron had retired from the Security Service.[135]

175 For the purposes of the present issue as to the instructions Ian Cameron gave Brian Gemmell, and how Ian Cameron reacted, the relevant answers are to questions 6 to 17 inclusive. These indicate that in

135 KIN 105063

November 1982, some six-and-half years after the events (that period being calculated on the basis that the interviews with Roy Garland were in the spring or early summer of 1975) Ian Cameron's recollections can be said to be as follows:

1 He received information from Brian Gemmell that McGrath was a homosexual.

2 He had no recollection of any details, or of any reference to a boys' home.

3 He did not accept that he reversed his decision.

4 In response to Brian Gemmell's account to the police that he, Ian Cameron, reacted very strongly when told of the homosexual involvement of various persons in Tara he did not comment.

5 He agreed that he would have told Brian Gemmell not to pursue the allegations of homosexuality, and would have told him that the Army should not handle investigations in this field.

176 As we are satisfied from witness Q's evidence that Ian Cameron decided that there should not be a second interview of Roy Garland, and then reversed that decision, we are satisfied Ian Cameron was mistaken when he said that he did not reverse his decision. Ian Cameron agreed with Brian Gemmell that Brian Gemmell told him McGrath was homosexual and that he, Ian Cameron, told Brian Gemmell not to pursue the allegation of homosexuality, meaning McGrath's homosexuality, because the Army should not carry out investigations in that field. However, Ian Cameron did not respond to the assertion that he had reacted very strongly when Brian Gemmell told him about the homosexual involvement of various people in Tara. We consider that his failure to comment on the assertion that he had reacted "very strongly" means that we should infer that he did not dispute that assertion.

177 It is also relevant that he accepted he told Brian Gemmell not to pursue McGrath's homosexuality because this was not a matter for the Army. Ian Cameron did not address the assertion that he told Brian Gemmell to terminate his enquiries concerning Tara. The file note of 4 April 1975 by an MI5 officer who had been present at the meeting with Gemmell and witness Q made it clear that the Army's only interest in permitting Brian Gemmell to speak to Roy Garland was to obtain information about Tara, and that Brian Gemmell should not pursue the allegation of homosexuality, which in this context clearly meant Garland's allegations about McGrath's homosexuality.

Whether he put it in such stark terms as Brian Gemmell alleged or not, we are satisfied that the effective result was that Ian Cameron took the position that Roy Garland's allegations about McGrath were not matters for the Army.

178 Ian Cameron's response to the effect that he had no recollection of any reference to a boys' home, does not necessarily mean that a boys' home was not mentioned. We are satisfied that while Brian Gemmell did tell Ian Cameron about McGrath's homosexuality, and that Ian Cameron may have reacted strongly in order to emphasise that this was not a suitable topic to be pursued, the effective result was that Roy Garland was to be interviewed to see if he had anything useful to say about Tara and not about anything else.

D/Supt Caskey, Ian Cameron and MI5

179 We have referred to the answers given by Ian Cameron in November 1982 to the 30 questions prepared by D/Supt Caskey, and at this stage we examine the circumstances relating to the preparation of those questions, how they were answered, and whether the answers were made available to the RUC or the Director of Public Prosecutions, Sir Barry Shaw QC. The background to those circumstances was that, as part of the Caskey Phase Two investigation into whether there had been a cover-up which might amount to criminal offences by anyone who may have had knowledge about sexual offences committed against residents of Kincora, D/Supt Caskey agreed with the DPP that he would submit a separate secret report on that part of the investigation that related to the Intelligence Services. We refer to this report, and the related enquiries, as Caskey Phase Three.

180 Sir John Hermon, the Chief Constable of the RUC had invited Sir George Terry to investigate both the way in which the RUC carried out the Caskey Phase One investigation, which led to the conviction of McGrath and others, and to oversee the Caskey Phase Two investigation at the same time. The Caskey Phase Three investigation was therefore in effect a separate sub-part of the Caskey Phase Two investigation which was being carried out by the RUC, but subject to the oversight of Sir George Terry. That is relevant when we come to examine Sir George Terry's part in the events we now consider.

181 By 1 July 1982 MI5 were aware that D/Supt Caskey wished to interview Brian Gemmell, and MI5 were concerned that the interview with Gemmell might result in information relating to intelligence matters being disclosed to the RUC, and subsequently disclosed in any public inquiry that might follow the RUC investigation.[136] A meeting took place between an MI5 officer, the MI5 officer who was the DCI Rep Knock (i.e. the MI5 officer attached to RUC headquarters) and D/Supt Caskey during which the MI5 representatives "emphasised that our sole concern was to ensure that intelligence matters did not get an airing in public".[137]

182 After D/Supt Caskey's interview with Brian Gemmell on 18 July 1982 the Army Special Investigation Branch Officer present reported on the content of the interview, and we have already referred to that report when examining what Brian Gemmell said in the statement. MI5 anticipated that D/Supt Caskey would then seek to interview Ian Cameron about the allegations Brian Gemmell made to him about the nature of Ian Cameron's instructions to him. A meeting took place at RUC headquarters on 4 August 1982 which was the subject of an MI5 report of 5 August 1982. During the meeting MI5 explained their position to Caskey about Ian Cameron being interviewed in this way.

> "…I explained your principle – that no serving or former member of the Security Service should be interviewed by the Police".[138]

183 The MI5 note also explains a number of matters about which D/Supt Caskey wished to interview Ian Cameron, as well as the suggestion as to how the information might be obtained.

> "(Letter three) Caskey made a number of points:
>
> A. One of the aspects of the enquiry that he is pursuing is that "military intelligence" was aware that McGrath was committing criminal offences but they concealed this or did not report it for their own reasons: this, if true was a criminal offence. Garland has alleged this and Wallace has hinted at it to Caskey."[139]
>
> "G. Caskey would be prepared to meet LA [legal advisor], explain to him what questions he wanted Cameron to answer and then receive a written statement drawn up by LA and Cameron. Caskey returns from leave on 23 August and would like to meet LA soon afterwards if this idea is accepted."[140]

136 KIN 105039.
137 KIN 105043.
138 KIN 105049.
139 KIN 105049.
140 KIN 105050.

184 It is clear that throughout the autumn MI5 were still extremely concerned about the prospect of Ian Cameron being interviewed by the RUC. Their legal adviser, Bernard Sheldon, raised this concern with the Attorney General and the DPP on a number of occasions. A memorandum from Bernard Sheldon of 1 October 1982 refers to his having at least two meetings with the Attorney General, and the DPP was present at one of them. Although the date of the meeting is not given, it appears to have been before another meeting between the Attorney General and DPP on 24 September 1982 at which Bernard Sheldon does not appear to have been present, but about which he was informed by a senior official in the Attorney General's office. A full memorandum can be found at KIN 105052 and 105053. In the memorandum Bernard Sheldon made a number of points to the Attorney General and DPP:

1 He confirmed that the RUC wished to interview Ian Cameron.

2 He explained that MI5 had spoken to Ian Cameron and set out in brief terms what Ian Cameron had said in answer to the assertions by Brian Gemmell.

3 He explained why MI5 were reluctant to allow Ian Cameron to be interviewed.

> "I said that this had been reported to the RUC but we had been unwilling to allow Cameron to make a formal statement. He had no personal knowledge which was relevant to any alleged offence and it also appeared that the RUC thought that they were collecting evidence for an enquiry as well as investigating criminal offences. If there were other factors which had not been declared to us, we would of course reconsider the position and equally if there should be a public enquiry we would discuss the handing of any relevant information which we might have (and I thought we had none) with those responsible for setting it up. We were not, however, willing to create statements which did not appear to assist in the criminal investigation and which might touch upon the organisation of intelligence in Northern Ireland – particularly as we had no idea who would have access to the statements or whether their creation might not automatically lead to their disclosure in the event of an enquiry."[141]

141 KIN 105052.

185 It is significant that Bernard Sheldon recorded the Attorney General as commenting that any information which Cameron could give:

> "would appear to be 'hearsay upon hearsay'".[142]

The DPP's response appears to have been more non-committal, as he was recorded as saying that this problem had not been reported to him and he would ascertain the position.

186 It appears from the memorandum that the Attorney General and the DPP had discussed the request beforehand and the DPP's view was that he needed to know whether Cameron had made a report to people in the Northern Ireland Office where there were some suspects. Their failure to take action in that event might be significant. It would seem that that discussion must have taken place after the earlier meeting referred to in the memorandum. A suggestion was then made by James Nursaw, who was the Attorney General's legal secretary at the time, that the police should set out a clear list of questions to which they wished to have answers. Bernard Sheldon recorded that his response was:

> "I said that we would consider any such request on its merits but the police would also have to come clean with us about their objectives. If there was a real as opposed to a fanciful problem we would certainly wish to find ways of helping".[143]

187 It would seem that that may have been the origin of, or at least played a part in, the genesis of the list of 30 questions, because on 11 October 1982 D/Supt Caskey submitted the 30 questions to ACC Whiteside. As can be seen from the opening paragraphs of the memorandum to the ACC, D/Supt Caskey's view now was that there should be an interview of Ian Cameron by the RUC.

> "It is essential to the Kincora Enquiry that Mr Ian Cameron is interviewed by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in relation to intelligence concerning Kincora Boys' Hostel allegedly passed to him by Military Intelligence Officers.
>
> I hereby submit a list of questions to be put to Mr Cameron.
>
> It will be necessary in the first instance to ask Mr Cameron to provide such personal details as full name, age, occupation, address or contact address.

142 KIN 105052.
143 KIN 105053.

> Whilst it is intended to adhere to the list of questions now supplied, answers to these questions may demand a follow-up question or questions:"[144]

188 There can be no doubt that the request was for a face-to-face interview with Ian Cameron by the RUC; during that interview they would ask him the 30 questions but there may well have been other matters that would emerge which would demand a follow-up question or questions.

189 The list of questions was forwarded by ACC Whiteside to the Northern Ireland Office the same day. The recipient of the letter had had a conversation with the Chief Constable and the RUC position was set out in clear and unmistakable terms.

> "The questions are all relevant and clearly define the area of police interest. It may be that if Mr Cameron answers certain questions in a certain way further unscripted questions may have to be asked in order to clarify some points so raised. I mention this lest there would be any misunderstanding about unscripted questions being asked."[145]

190 The documents we have examined show that after that memorandum from the ACC, MI5 maintained its position that it was not prepared to make Ian Cameron available to the RUC for interview. The reasons for this were set out at some length by Bernard Sheldon in a note to the Director General of MI5 dated 3 November 1982.

> "2. I have made it plain to Nursaw and to Barry Shaw and the Attorney General that our unwillingness to authorise Cameron to give a statement should not be taken as meaning that we have anything to hide in connection with homosexual offences or that we wish to be obstructive. We believe that we have nothing to contribute to any criminal investigation and are unwilling to allow statements to be taken from Cameron which will disclose intelligence arrangements to those who have no need to know. We are conscious that once a statement has been taken we will have no control over who has access to it and that its very existence could cause problems if an enquiry is ordered. If an enquiry is ordered, we would of course be in touch with those responsible for arranging evidence for it (this would normally be the Treasury Solicitors) if it was thought that we had some contribution to make. Nursaw has suggested that it might be sensible to explain the position informally to the Chief Constable and to stress that we have no knowledge of criminal offences."[146]

144 KIN 105055.
145 KIN 105054.

191 Bernard Sheldon subsequently spoke to the Chief Constable of the RUC on 11 November 1982 explaining why MI5 did not believe that Ian Cameron could deal with the questions because he was retired and remained subject to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act.[147] D/Supt Caskey pursued his investigations and traced and took statements from Army personnel in Germany. Bernard Sheldon then went to Lewes to the headquarters of the Sussex Constabulary where he explained MI5's position to Sir George Terry. Having outlined in considerable detail MI5's position, and the various meetings that had taken place, in the course of the memorandum he referred to:

"f. the list of questions prepared by the RUC which they wished to put to Cameron. These confirmed our fears that, if permitted, they would lead to an unacceptable identification of UK Intelligence Officers and their functions,"[148]

192 The RUC position remained that they wished to interview Ian Cameron, and when no such interview was forthcoming by 24 February 1983 ACC Whiteside again wrote to the NIO. His memorandum makes it abundantly clear that Ian Cameron was not being made available for interview, and that no replies to the 30 questions had been communicated to the RUC. The letter made it clear that the RUC wanted an interview with Cameron, or at least wished to obtain a statement from him.[149]

193 Although Ian Cameron was by now retired, he remained subject to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act and therefore required authorisation from MI5 in order to discuss anything relating to his duties as the Assistant Secretary (Political). We are satisfied that the documents to which we have referred make it abundantly clear that MI5 were not prepared to allow him to be interviewed under any circumstances because, as it was put on 5 August 1982, it was their "principle that no serving or former member of the Security Service should be interviewed by the police". That position was maintained throughout by MI5 despite repeated formal requests by the RUC that Ian Cameron should be made

146 KIN 105061.
147 KIN 105063.
148 KIN 105066.
149 KIN 100015.

available for interview. Ian Cameron was never made available for interview by the RUC, nor was any statement prepared by him to the RUC in which he answered the 30 questions, nor is there any record to show that the text of his answers as recorded by Bernard Sheldon were ever communicated to the RUC.

194 We appreciate the concern of MI5 that intelligence matters might be exposed, perhaps inadvertently, by an interview with Ian Cameron. However, this could have been dealt with by an RUC officer of higher rank and experience, such as a Detective Chief Superintendent or even an Assistant Chief Constable, carrying out the interview in the presence of an MI5 Officer of suitable standing. That such a high ranking officer would conduct an interview was by no means unknown at this stage, certainly in the RUC and indeed Sir George Terry himself took part in an interview with the Rev Ian Paisley during the course of his enquiries. If there were arguments about whether irrelevant intelligence matters were being explored, then those questions could be considered as necessary by either the DPP personally or the Attorney General personally. We consider that MI5's "principle that no serving or former Officer of the Security agencies should be interviewed by the police" in the course of a criminal investigation was wholly unjustified. We are satisfied that in the ultimate analysis it was for the RUC and not for MI5 to decide what was relevant to that criminal investigation. We criticise MI5 for consistently obstructing a proper line of enquiry by the RUC by their refusal to allow the RUC to interview Ian Cameron, and by their refusal to authorise Ian Cameron to provide a written statement answering the 30 questions. We are also satisfied that MI5 did not communicate the full details of the answers to the RUC that Ian Cameron gave to Bernard Sheldon on 1 November 1982. We noted that in its response to the Inquiry Warning Letter, MI5 did not accept that it had obstructed the RUC in its efforts to interview Ian Cameron.

195 Whilst we accept that MI5 were entitled to make their concerns known to the Chief Constable of the RUC, the DPP, and to the Attorney General about the implications of the questioning of Ian Cameron, we have reservations about the frequency of these representations. We are satisfied that the approach to Sir George Terry was made so that he could put pressure on the RUC not to pursue this line of enquiry.

196 That MI5 felt it could approach Sir George Terry to enlist his support in MI5's efforts to prevent RUC officers interviewing Ian Cameron demonstrated a weakness in the arrangement whereby Sir George had been invited to oversee the Caskey Phase Two investigation, and therefore the associated secret Phase Three investigation as well. It is unclear to us what oversight meant in practice. It is clear that Sir George was not directing the RUC investigation because that remained very firmly under the control of the RUC as is clear from the approaches by MI5 to Sir John Hermon, the correspondence between ACC Whiteside and the NIO, and that it was the RUC who submitted D/Supt Caskey's report to the DPP. If Sir George was expected to give advice during the investigation, how was that to be done? Was it just that he would offer advice (but not directions) if his advice was sought by Sir John Hermon or his subordinates, or was Sir George free to offer unsolicited advice to D/Supt Caskey and his team? We were struck by the lack of clarity in what oversight meant in practice.

197 We do not accept that it was proper for MI5 to approach Sir George Terry in an attempt to enlist his support. This was an RUC investigation, and although it was being overseen by Sir George we do not consider that that gave him the right to interfere in the way that it was being conducted. It was of course open to him to offer advice to Sir John Hermon if Sir George thought that was necessary or if Sir John Hermon sought that advice.

The DPP and Ian Cameron's responses to the 30 questions

198 In order to ascertain whether Sir Barry Shaw received and considered the responses to the 30 questions made by Ian Cameron and recorded by Bernard Sheldon we are dependent upon MI5 records to which we have referred. This is because there do not appear to be any surviving records held by the Public Prosecution Service in Northern Ireland relating to meetings held between Sir Barry Shaw and the Attorney General in relation to the Caskey Phase Three investigation. When we asked the Attorney General's Office in London to produce any papers they held regarding these meetings we were informed that the files they held in relation to Kincora had been destroyed in 2004. In response to the Inquiry Warning Letter the Attorney General's Office informed us a mistake had been made (for which they apologised) and that the relevant file was destroyed in 2009. We criticise the destruction of files relating to Kincora in view of the persistent allegations that there had been over many years about wrongdoing at Kincora.

199 The original files relating to the decision of the DPP to issue a direction on 17 May 1983 that there should be no prosecution in respect of the matters considered in the Caskey Phase Three secret report have survived, and the Inquiry has examined them. We have also had the benefit of a helpful written statement from Mr Roy Junkin, a former Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions in Northern Ireland who was an Assistant Director of Public Prosecutions in May 1983. Mr Junkin signed the direction of 17 May 1983.

200 Mr Junkin explained that the Director and the Attorney General met regularly and discussed a wide range of matters, including high profile or sensitive cases, or of particular concern, including cases where the Attorney General as a Law Officer might be required to answer Parliamentary Questions. However, unless the consent of the Attorney General was specifically required by legislation, the general understanding of their working relationship was that decisions in, and professional responsibility for, the conduct of criminal proceedings in Northern Ireland were regarded as a matter for the Director. As we shall see, an instance where the Attorney General's consent was required arose in 1975 when the then Attorney General was asked for his consent in respect of a possible prosecution of Colin Wallace for offences under the Official Secrets Act, a matter to which we refer later in this chapter.

201 We are satisfied that there was nothing unusual or improper about the Director and Attorney General discussing the implications of the RUC requests to interview and question Ian Cameron. Anything to do with Kincora was likely to be a high profile matter, and the decision of the Director to request that the Caskey Phase Three report should be submitted to him in the form of a secret report was justified, given the sensitivity of the matters being examined in the Caskey Phase Three investigation.

202 The MI5 documents show that whilst the Director was understandably sceptical about the evidential value of the general line of questioning which the RUC wished to pursue with Ian Cameron, as early as 12 February 1982 he made it clear that his interest as Director was:

> "...to have the way clear for any prosecutions which ought to be brought. I therefore favoured police investigations continuing".[150]

150 KIN 100003.

203 Whilst the Director or his staff might advise the RUC on a potential line of enquiry if the RUC sought advice, as Bernard Sheldon recognised in his memorandum of 3 February 1982, Sir Barry Shaw was known for his:

> "Unwillingness to give directions to the investigating officers. We had inferred that this was connected with his well known desire to maintain the integrity of his office".[151]

204 It is noteworthy that on 1 October 1982 Bernard Sheldon recorded a conversation with the Attorney General's office in which he was told that the Director:

> "...had developed an argument that he needed to know whether Cameron had made a report to people in the Northern Ireland Office where there were some suspects. Their failure to take action in that event might be significant".[152]

205 However, this is not easily reconciled with the view expressed a short time later by the Attorney General's Legal Secretary to Bernard Sheldon that the Director "gave Nursaw to understand that he would not be concerned one way or the other whether they were answered".[153]

Was the DPP informed of Ian Cameron's answers to the 30 questions?

206 We have examined the original DPP file in which consideration was given to the Caskey Phase Three secret report, and we are satisfied that Sir Barry Shaw personally examined the papers, and then drafted the direction issued under Mr Junkin's signature on 17 May 1983. On 8 April 1983 Sir Barry Shaw agreed with the recommendations of Mr Junkin and Mr Junkin's superior Mr Cossham, both of whom were of the opinion that there was no basis for a prosecution on the Caskey Phase Three papers.[154] Sir Barry Shaw's request on 16 May 1983 to Mr Junkin to consider the draft direction satisfies us that Sir Barry Shaw drafted the direction himself after consideration of the file.

207 The direction is important and we therefore set it out in full.

> "Such information and evidence as is contained in this file does not warrant the initiation of criminal proceedings against any person.

151 KIN 105068.
152 KIN 105053.
153 KIN 105061.
154 KIN 100023.

> It is however, appropriate for me to refer expressly to two particular lines of enquiry which the investigating officer has sought to follow. Firstly, from the course of the interviews of Mr J C Wallace it seems that no information or evidence of materiality is likely to be made available to police by him. Either he has no such information or evidence or, if he has, he is unwilling to impart it. Further, I am not satisfied that he could be put forward as a credible witness upon any issue dependent on his testimony. Secondly, although Mr Cameron has not been and is not available to the police for interview, it does not appear that there is any admissible evidence which can be given by him relevant to any crime or crimes known to the police.
>
> In such circumstances and in the light of the whole of the careful and protracted investigations which Superintendent Caskey has conducted, it does not appear to be necessary or appropriate for me to request further investigation of whatever matters are or may be within the knowledge of either Wallace or Cameron. I have concluded that without their full and voluntary co-operation consideration of possible criminal proceedings cannot be advanced. Accordingly, but subject to consideration of any further facts or information which may otherwise come to light, I direct that this file may be marked no prosecution."[155]

208 So far as Ian Cameron is concerned, the relevant passage relates to his not being thought to be able to give any relevant admissible evidence relating to any crime or crimes known to the police. We consider that this was an inevitable, and legally impeccable, decision. Ian Cameron's answers to the 30 questions showed that, in the phrase attributed to the attorney general, the evidence of Ian Cameron was 'hearsay upon hearsay'. As the criminal law stood at that time there was no evidence that Ian Cameron could give that could be used in criminal proceedings. All he knew was what Brian Gemmell told him what Roy Garland had told him, and there was nothing to show that Roy Garland had personal knowledge of any criminal offences that had been committed by McGrath involving residents at Kincora, as opposed to Roy Garland's belief that McGrath was a person who might commit such offences. There was simply no legally admissible evidence to support a prosecution.

209 Did the Director have sight of the text of the replies of Ian Cameron to the 30 questions as recorded by Bernard Sheldon before he drafted this direction? We have found no documentary evidence that directly shows that he did. Mr Junkin expressed his view at paragraph 7 of his witness statement where he said:

155 KIN 100020.

> "...I believe everyone, whether in the legal profession in Northern Ireland or otherwise, who knew him well would have regarded Sir Barry Shaw as a person who was very conscious of his responsibilities as a Public Prosecutor and who was meticulous and thorough in the conduct of his professional duties as the Director. Certainly that was my own experience of his approach to his work. If a document was available with the full answers I would be surprised if he accepted a gist of it or that he did not insist on seeing it in order to reach his decision in the case".[156]

210 A note made by the then Director Sir Alasdair Fraser QC (Sir Barry Shaw's successor) with Juliet Wheldon (then of the Attorney General's office) recorded that Miss Wheldon told him in 1990 that there had been a conference, presumably meaning a conference with the Attorney General, at which the Director was present. Sir Alasdair's note said that he would not be surprised if the conference took place between 6 April 1983 (when the Director agreed there was no evidence) and 17 May 1983 when the direction drafted by Sir Barry Shaw was issued. That suggests Miss Wheldon did not have a date for the meeting. Miss Wheldon and Sir Alastair Fraser are both dead. The absence of any contemporary document makes it difficult to be certain, but it seems to us that the most likely occasion on which the Director may have been shown Ian Cameron's answers to the 30 questions would be the meeting which it appears may well have taken place after 6 April and before 17 May 1983.

211 On balance we are satisfied that Sir Barry Shaw was shown the full text of the answers provided by Ian Cameron as recorded by Bernard Sheldon at some point prior to drafting the Direction that there should be no prosecution on 16 May 1983, and did not accept a mere gist or summary. As the RUC never received the answers, the text of the answers could only have come to Sir Barry Shaw either directly from MI5, or more likely was produced to him at his request so that he considered them before he reached his decision.

156 KIN 4504.

Holroyd and the DPP

212 There is material which indirectly throws some light on what Sir Barry Shaw's approach to this would have been. Mr Holroyd made allegations about allegedly unlawful actions by a number of military personnel engaged in operations in Northern Ireland. As a result, a large-scale RUC investigation led by D/Supt Caskey was launched. The prospect of this investigation involving the questioning of Army personnel, and the risk that this would damage the confidentiality of intelligence structures in Northern Ireland, caused considerable concern to the Government, and it is clear that these concerns were raised with Sir Barry Shaw.

213 On 3 February 1983 a meeting took place at which there was discussion about whether the RUC investigations into the allegations by Mr Wallace relating to Kincora, and the allegations made by Mr Holroyd about Army personnel, impinged on intelligence matters. Those present included Sir John Hermon, the Chief Constable of the RUC, Sir George Terry, the Chief Constable of Sussex, Mr Nurshaw, the Attorney General's Legal Secretary, the Director and Coordinator of Intelligence at the NIO (an MI5 Officer), Bernard Sheldon, (the Legal Advisor to MI5), as well as Sir Philip Woodfield, the Permanent Under Secretary of the NIO.

214 A note of the meeting made by Bernard Sheldon recorded that there was considerable discussion of the issues raised in both cases. During the discussion Mr Sheldon noted that Sir Philip Woodfield,

> "...reverted to the general problem of reconciling Police enquiries with the need to protect HMG's intelligence interests. He asked that in future any problems which might arise should be elevated to a more senior level. He thought this was preferable to, for example, CASKEY pursuing his enquiries by other means. We all agreed that this was an acceptable way to behave."[157]

215 It would appear that efforts were made after that meeting to agree a procedure along the lines suggested by Sir Philip Woodfield. On 4 March 1983 he wrote to the DPP following a meeting earlier that week with Sir Barry Shaw and outlined a procedure that could be adopted in such circumstances.

1 Any requests by the RUC would go to a named Colonel at HQNI indicating the intended line of questioning.

157 KIN 105493.

2 The request would be discussed at HQNI and then referred to Major General Garrett in London. He was the head of Army Security.

3 If General Garrett felt there was no objection then the RUC could go ahead with their questioning.

4 But if General Garrett concluded that the RUC's line of questioning would be likely to take them into the area of intelligence work he would discuss it with the RUC at an appropriate level.

5 If the RUC were not persuaded, the matter would then be referred to the DPP himself to decide the relevance of, and importance to, the information being sought to the police investigations.[158]

216 Sir Philip Woodfield commented that:

> "When we met and discussed this procedure in outline, you were kind enough to say that on the basis of the information I had given you, you saw no objections to the procedure in general and would be happy to play the part envisaged for you in particular. I should be grateful if, after you have reflected on the terms of this letter, on which I understand you may wish to consult the Attorney General, you would let me know if that remains your view. If it does, the next step will be for the GOC to put the new arrangements to the Chief Constable for his consideration, indicating that I have been consulted and am in agreement. I would also contemplate seeing the Chief Constable myself if that seemed helpful. Can you confirm that you are content that the Chief Constable should be told that you are aware of what is proposed and are prepared to play your part?"[159]

217 The matter was then discussed with the Attorney General on 22 March 1983, and again with the Attorney General and Sir Barry Shaw on 29 March 1983, according to a note for file prepared by Bernard Sheldon of MI5 on 30 March 1983.[160] Following these meetings the Legal Secretary to the Attorney General wrote to the Permanent Under Secretary of the NIO confirming the position of the Attorney General and the DPP in respect of the proposed procedure. He said that the Attorney General

> "…acknowledged that in the last analysis the decision must be taken by the Service or Security authorities and he said that, if the decision

158 KIN 190185-190187.
159 KIN 190186-190187.
160 KIN 105495-KIN 105498.

were that the information could not safely be made available, he and the Director of Public Prosecutions must accept this".[161]

The Legal Secretary confirmed that the Attorney General and Sir Barry Shaw had seen the letter in draft and were content with it.

218 The Inquiry has examined the DPP file on the Holroyd Case held by the PPS and found no document recording a response by Sir Barry Shaw to Sir Philip Woodfield's letter, or comment on the Legal Secretary's letter. However, given the approach to which he was said to have given his approval it appears to us probable that he would have acquainted himself with the responses by Ian Cameron to the 30 questions before he reached his decision on whether any prosecution should follow from the Caskey Phase Three Report. For him to do so would be in accordance with the approach mooted in the Holroyd Case. Whilst the two cases did not overlap, they presented similar issues as to how the police investigations were to be handled by the Army in the Holroyd Case and therefore offered a relevant precedent to be applied to the Caskey Phase Three investigation which was considered by the Director in April and May of that year.

161 KIN 105500.

PART SIX

James Miller and the Sunday Times in 1987

219 We now return to the letter written by James Miller on 7 April 1972 to which we have already referred. On 25 March 1987 the Irish Times carried an article saying that James Miller had been asked by MI5 to infiltrate Tara, to compile information on its leader William McGrath, and that Miller passed on this information to MI5 in 1970. The article said that Miller would not say if the information he compiled related to McGrath's homosexual or paedophiliac activities. This article appeared after a long article in the Sunday Times edition of 22 March 1987 referring to allegations made by Miller that MI5 had been active in promoting the UWC (Ulster Workers Council) strike. In a second article in the Sunday Times of 29 March it was said that:

> "...Miller claims that the Intelligence Services had known about the activities at Kincora for a number of years, and believes the boys' home was used to entrap men who would be blackmailed into providing information".[162]

220 A note to the Cabinet Office dated 30 March 1987 said that Miller had contacted officials the day before saying that he had not spoken to the author of the article since an earlier discussion. The note recorded that Miller confirmed that he had mentioned his acquaintanceship with McGrath to the author of the article, Barrie Penrose, whose second article Miller claimed was "built on machinations" and scraps of detail he (presumably Penrose) had not used in his original story.[163]

221 As a result Miller was interviewed by two officials on 6 April 1987, and their account of his explanation can be found at KIN 105072 to 105079. We note Miller's assertions that the statements attributed to him were a mixture of "pure fiction and gross distortion", and that he did not request money for his "revelations", nor was it offered to him. The reference at KIN 105075 to the follow-up article of 22 March appears to be a mistake for 29 March. Miller's position about what was attributed to him about Kincora is contained in the following passage from the report of his meeting with the two officials.

162 KIN 105071.
163 KIN 105080.

> "Kincora Boys' home (29 March Article). The reference to 'new claims' by [Miller] about the Kincora Boys' home was pure fabrication. The implication that [Miller] had made further revelations to PENROSE since the 22 March article was false. [Miller] had indeed been questioned by PENROSE about the Kincora Scandal but had told him honestly that he knew nothing about this episode except what he had read in the newspapers. His [officials] had never given him any reason to suppose that MI5 were interested in the place. He told PENROSE that he had fleeting contact with William McGrath in the latter's capacity as leader of the Tara Brigade. [Miller's] membership of Tara was short lived; he resigned from the organisation when it became clear that he was under suspicion as possible security forces infiltration agent. Though there had been speculation in Loyalist circles that McGrath was a homosexual, [Miller] did not know him well enough to comment on these allegations, and was unaware at the time of his 'housefather' role at Kincora.[164]

222 Of those involved in the preparation of the article, Miller has since died, as has Liam Clarke who was the other journalist mentioned in Miller's report. We approach Miller's account on the basis that the references attributed to him in the Sunday Times article of 29 March were accurately reported. As can be seen from the above quotation, the explanation Miller is recorded as providing to the officials of what he claimed he said to the journalist was significantly different from the terms of the article. He said that although there had been speculation in Loyalist circles that McGrath was a homosexual, Miller did not know McGrath well enough to comment on these allegations, and was unaware in 1971 and 1972 of McGrath's housefather role at Kincora.

223 We have examined all of the documents relating to James Miller held by MI5, and have found nothing to support the account he is said to have given to the Sunday Times other than the extract from his letter of 7 April 1972. In that letter he said that he had been told:

> "that the Tara OC McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys and that he [McGrath] could not account for any cash that had been handed to him over a period of 12 months."[165]

164 KIN 105076.
165 KIN 4073.

Whatever the implication of the phrase that "McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys", had Miller known of McGrath's employment at Kincora, or that Kincora was believed to be being used to entrap men we can see no reason why he would not have said so in 1972 in this brief reference just quoted. That he did not make any such reference in 1972, and that no other information has been found by us in the MI5 documents we have examined to support what the article claimed Miller said, led us to conclude that whatever he did or did not say to the Sunday Times reporters in 1987 did not represent what Miller actually knew in 1972.

224 When viewed in isolation the 1972 reference to the man known as McGrath who was the OC of Tara (and it will be remembered how difficult it was for the Security Services to establish who the man named McGrath was in 1971-73) having "been accused of assaulting small boys" could be said to imply either physical or sexual assaults of children. Given the notorious perpetration of physical violence by all terrorist groups in Northern Ireland, whether Loyalist or Republican, towards members of what they saw as "their" communities, it should not be assumed that the obvious meaning in April 1972 of "assaulting small boys" inevitably meant sexual assault.

225 By November 1973 MI5 had been told by the RUC that McGrath worked in Kincora, and their records show that McGrath was reported to be homosexual and to exploit other people's sexual deviations.[166] It is easy in retrospect to suggest that because McGrath was reported to be homosexual it should have been appreciated that he posed a risk that he would sexually abuse children, and therefore the reference to "assaulting small boys" should have been interpreted as indicating that he was sexually assaulting residents in Kincora.

226 However, we do not accept that that was an inevitable or correct deduction that should have been made at the time. We agree with Officer 9004 when he said to the Inquiry that "...the mere fact that someone who happened to be a homosexual in a boys' home" would not have met MI5's criteria for reporting such information to the police.[167] We cannot emphasise strongly enough that just because a man was homosexual did not mean then, any more than it does now, that he was capable of sexually abusing children. Child sexual abusers, although overwhelmingly male in our experience, can be either homosexual or heterosexual males, as shown by the number of married fathers who have sexually abused children, whether their own children or others.

166 KIN 105008 and 105009.
167 Day 219, p 97.

227 We are satisfied that it was not until 1980 that MI5, the SIS, the MoD and RUC Special Branch became aware that McGrath had been sexually abusing residents of Kincora when that became a public allegation. All four agencies were aware that McGrath was alleged to be a homosexual, but had no proof of that. They were aware he worked in a boys' hostel where he was in a position of authority. They were aware of allegations that he had abused Roy Garland a long time before McGrath went to work in Kincora.

228 However, by November 1973 MI5, unlike the other three agencies, were also aware that the person who had by then been identified as William McGrath had been accused of "assaulting small boys". By virtue of section 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 MI5 were subject to the same legal obligation as everyone else in Northern Ireland to report the commission of an "arrestable offence" (that is an offence punishable with five years imprisonment) to the police where they knew or believed that such an offence, or some other arrestable offence had been committed. An alleged assault on small boys could, depending on the nature of the alleged assault, have been an arrestable offence which ought to have been reported to the police.

229 With the benefit of hindsight, and in the light of what is now known about McGrath's abuse of residents in Kincora, it might be argued it was the duty of MI5 to bring to the attention of RUC Special Branch that MI5 had received a report that McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys, and that by not doing so the MI5 officers who had this information were in breach of that duty. However, we consider that to take that view would be unjustified for several reasons. First of all, although the information was known to MI5 because it had been received eighteen months before, eighteen months separated the receipt of that information and the information confirming the identity of William McGrath as the leader of TARA. Secondly, the information came to MI5 in a letter from James Miller who was simply reporting what an unidentified source said at a time when unsubstantiated allegations of discreditable behaviour by TARA members about each other were commonplace, and the report was therefore assessed as being of dubious reliability. Thirdly, the MI5 officers were concentrating on establishing what sort of organisation TARA was, and whether it could be a possible Loyalist terrorist group in the context of the extremely volatile political and security circumstances of that time. In all of those circumstances we do not criticise them for failing to appreciate the significance of this information.

230 We have earlier referred to the practice whereby intelligence services did not always share information with colleagues in other agencies, especially the RUC. The failure by MI5 to pass this information to RUC Special Branch may have been influenced by a desire to protect the existence of their source, and to ensure that his position was not compromised by any leak from the RUC, because it is clear that the other intelligence agencies were concerned that leaks to terrorist organisations, or hostile political figures, of a Loyalist and Unionist persuasion might occur.

231 We consider that had this information been passed to the RUC Special Branch and by it to their uniform colleagues, it may still not have made a significant difference to the approach of the RUC. It received much more detailed allegations from the Robophone message and from Valerie Shaw's conversation with D/Supt Graham, as well as Roy Garland's conversations with D/C Cullen that brought about the Cullen/Meharg investigations. An anonymous allegation of assault on small boys in an unspecified context passed to MI5 might not have added much, if anything, to that information. On the other hand, it might have prompted the RUC to look more closely at the information it held about McGrath and to investigate it more robustly.

232 There is nothing whatever in these references, or in the many files and documents that we have examined relating to the period from June 1971 to January 1976, to suggest in any way that McGrath was an MI5 agent, or was believed by MI5 to be an agent of any other British intelligence agency. It took from June 1971 until at least April 1973 to establish that the William McGrath who worked at Kincora and the William McGrath reported to the security agencies were one and the same. This strongly suggests that McGrath was not an agent.

PART SEVEN

The Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) and Kincora

233 We have already explained that the SIS was part of the Irish Joint Section and provided the first person to hold the post of Director and Coordinator of Intelligence (DCI). We have already referred to the exchanges of information between the Security Service and the SIS in 1976 and 1977 when the SIS obtained a copy of the 3 Brigade Intelligence Report on Tara dated 28 January 1976, and it is unnecessary to repeat the details of those exchanges. We have also examined the documents handed over by Brian Gemmell to two SIS officers on 15 October 1976[168] when Brian Gemmell was apparently under the impression that he was speaking to MI5 officers. However, the request of 31 January 1977 by an SIS officer in London to MI5 merits further examination. This was a request to MI5 and intelligence staff in Northern Ireland to consider whether the source mentioned in the 3 Brigade letter "could be retasked for further information".[169] The response of intelligence staff in Northern Ireland to the suggestion that Tara could be "a worthwhile target", and that they supported recruitment to penetrate Tara, was revealing.

> "Beyond knowing that there is a recruiting campaign in Tara, we know little about it, so are not sure whether we are yet in a position to discover a loophole that could be exploited by IJS. We do not know, for instance, where Tara seeks its recruits, apart from other organisations" [Intelligence Staff NI] certainly considers Tara to be a worthwhile target. Both [blank] and [blank] have been briefed to find traces of this elusive organisation".[170]

234 It has been alleged that McGrath had been an SIS agent for many years, perhaps from as long ago as 1958, for example by Chris Moore at pages 29 and 30 in his book, "The Kincora Scandal". If that were the case, it is remarkable that in 1977 the SIS where saying that they knew very little about Tara, and describing it as an "elusive organisation". If McGrath had been an SIS agent for many years, then SIS was in a position to find out whatever it needed to know about the Tara Brigade whenever it wished, if its leader was in fact one of their agents. That the SIS knew very little about Tara in 1977 strongly suggests that McGrath was not an SIS agent either then or at any other time.

168 Day 218, p 26.
169 KIN 3510.
170 KIN 3512.

The SIS and homosexuality

235 In his witness statement of 27 May 2016, Officer A explained the approach of the SIS to a question of homosexuality in the following way.

> "SIS does not exploit children or vulnerable adults for operational purposes, nor tolerate their abuse either by their staff, or those who work on their behalf or in their support including SIS agents. In dealing with cases of child abuse or exploitation, our guiding principle is, as is set out in the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child and in the Children Act, that the best interest of the child should always prevail."[171]

236 However, that is a statement of the SIS approach at the present day. Was that the position at the time the Inquiry has to consider?

237 In his evidence on Day 218, Officer A explained that while homosexuality was of interest to the SIS, SIS would not use homosexuality to pressurise an individual, but because homosexuality would make others vulnerable to blackmail it would be of interest to SIS. He expressed that in this way.

> "Our concern.. Our concern would have been.. The concern around that would have been that people who were practising homosexuals at the time, at a time when it was possibly illegal in some parts, or certainly not as socially acceptable in other areas, might come under pressure from hostile foreign intelligence services or others seeking to undermine our National Security."[172]
>
> "I mean, I would say SIS at that time and... would not use blackmail in that way, but our concern would have been over other... others using blackmail on people who were homosexual. So that's why we would have had concern for that vulnerability."[173]

238 We have examined all the material held by the SIS on McGrath and Tara that has been disclosed to us, as well as other documents held by the SIS which we asked to see and which were provided to us. We found nothing whatever that suggests that McGrath was ever an agent of the SIS, or that the SIS had any knowledge of McGrath or Tara other than the information and documents to which we have referred. Nor have we found any evidence to suggest that the SIS knew anything more than MI5 knew before the revelations in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980 made public the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora by McGrath and others.

171 KIN 3525.
172 Day 218, p. 25.
173 Day 218, p. 26.

239 For the same reasons that we have explained in respect of MI5's knowledge of McGrath's homosexuality, information which came from the RUC, MI5 or the Army, we are satisfied that the Secret Intelligence Service cannot be legitimately criticised for its failure to appreciate that McGrath was in fact abusing residents in Kincora because we are satisfied it had no other information which suggested that he had abused, or might abuse, residents in his care at Kincora other than that he was homosexual.

Sir George Terry's report

240 On several occasions we have referred to the investigation carried out by Sir George Terry, the Chief Constable of Sussex, and his officers, at the invitation of the Chief Constable of the RUC. Sir George Terry's Terms of Reference were summarised by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to the House of Commons on 18 February 1982 as being:

> "To investigate allegations about the way in which the Police have conducted their enquiries and in addition to have general oversight of the continuing investigations."[174]

This meant that Sir George Terry's remit was firstly to examine the manner in which the RUC conducted the Caskey Phase One investigation, and secondly to oversee both the Caskey Phase Two and Phase Three investigations, because Caskey Phase Three was the secret part of the Caskey Phase Two.

241 Sir George Terry and his team carried out an exhaustive re-examination of the Caskey Phase One investigations, as can be seen from the extremely detailed reports and associated witness statements and exhibits prepared and compiled by D/Supt Harrison and D/Supt Flenley. In doing so, the Sussex Police interviewed all those former residents of Kincora who had been interviewed by the RUC, as well as many other witnesses, and we have previously referred to parts of the Sussex Police reports and to some of the witness statements taken by the Sussex

174 KIN 40003.

Police. In his report which was published on 28 October 1983,[175] Sir George Terry did not confine himself to his Terms of Reference, but expressed his views on a number of matters. These included the shortcomings as he saw them of the Social Services relating to Kincora, and steps that he considered should be taken to remedy those shortcomings. Those matters were not within his Terms of Reference. They had been examined in considerable detail by the Hughes Inquiry, and we have examined them in our Report, so it is unnecessary to make any comment on his views on those matters.

242 A matter which was within his Terms of Reference related to the approach of the RUC to the events in 1974 and 1976, which we have examined in considerable detail in the previous chapter. He said at No 51 (b):

> "There was no cover-up or concealment of evidence or disciplinary breechs by the RUC personnel. There was some degree of lack of awareness over information / intelligence but this was at a time of intense terrorist activity which placed an excessive strain on Police resources and undoubtedly dictated priorities. There was, therefore, at this time an understandable inability [sic] to recognise that extremely vague information which arose in 1974, if probed thoroughly, may well have revealed that which was finally discovered in your 1980 investigations. In 1976 there was some other information which was not thoroughly recognised as relating to that which came to hand in 1974. In no way, however, by any stretch of imagination was this a question of a cover-up, only, I repeat, a lack of awareness, of interpretation and recognition. Any later critics had the benefit of what never exists at the time, namely, hindsight. In fact, it was D/Superintendent Caskey's excellent work which ultimately focused attention upon this!".[176]

243 In the previous chapter we have expressed our views on the manner in which the RUC investigated the Robophone message in 1973; the way in which D/Supt Graham dealt with the information he was given in 1974; and, the Cullen/Meharg investigations of 1974 and 1976. It will be apparent that our views do not coincide with Sir George Terry's assessment of the competence displayed by the RUC in relation to those matters.

175 KIN 102162.
176 KIN 40019 and 40020.

244 At 51 (k) he expressed the following conclusion.

> "The media have also given a degree of prominence to the fact that some Military Circles were aware of homosexual mis-practice in the Kincora Boys' Hostel. The Military sources had been very frank with me and perfectly open during the ongoing enquiry by your own team under D/Superintendent Caskey. Let me say quite clearly that once more I sought evidence from all sources including the media with negative result."[177]

245 Sir George Terry's assertion that military sources were "very frank" and "perfectly open during the ongoing enquiry by your own team under D/Superintendent Caskey" is difficult to understand. Whilst Ian Cameron was an officer of the Security Service, it is clear that his role at Army HQNI was such that he should have been regarded by Sir George Terry as coming within his description of "Military sources". Whatever Sir George Terry may have been told about Ian Cameron, and what Ian Cameron did or did not say or do, appears to have come only from MI5 through Bernard Sheldon. As we have seen, Sir George Terry was aware of MI5's efforts to prevent the RUC from interviewing Ian Cameron about the allegations made by Brian Gemmell.

246 We regard Sir George Terry's assertion that military sources had been frank with him and perfectly open with D/Supt Caskey as unjustified.

The reasons for setting up the Hughes Inquiry

247 In an earlier chapter we recalled that on 18 February 1982 the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced that he did not intend to reconstitute the McGonagle Inquiry, but intended to appoint another Inquiry after the current police investigations were complete (that is Caskey Phase Two and Phase Three and the Terry Inquiry).

> "...with a High Court Judge as Chairman sitting in public. The Terms of Reference of such an Inquiry and the powers it might need cannot be determined until the results of the present investigations are known. But I am anxious that there should be no lasting cause for public disquiet that the truth has not been wholly discovered."[178]

177 KIN 40023 and 40024.
178 KIN 21274.

248 Following the statement by the Secretary of State, the following exchange took place between him and Mr Gerry Fitt MP. Mr Fitt asked whether the Inquiry:

> "Would enable Mr Colin Wallace, a former British Army Security Spokesman, who gave an interview to journalists in 1975 and made them aware of all the aspects of Kincora, to be brought before the Inquiry or the Courts?"[179]

249 The Secretary of State replied by saying:

> "The hon gentlemen asked about the powers of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act [1921]. He asked whether, if we decided on that type of Inquiry, the Inquiry would have power to call for people who had been imprisoned for one offence or another. Such an Inquiry has complete powers to call for evidence from whomsoever it desires. Therefore, the answer to his question is 'Yes'."[180]

250 The statement by the Secretary of State, and the exchanges between himself and Mr Fitt MP, were significant for a number of reasons. While there was a call for an Inquiry to be set up under The Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921 (The 1921 Act) the Secretary of State did not definitely commit himself to establishing an Inquiry under that Act. However, he had committed the Government to there being an Inquiry which would be chaired by a High Court Judge, which would sit in public and call witnesses. Significantly the reference to Colin Wallace, at that time serving a prison sentence for manslaughter, being brought before such an Inquiry identified one of the reasons that contributed to the ultimate decision that there would not be a public inquiry held under the 1921 Act.

251 It was not until the DPP issued his direction of no prosecution on 18 May 1983 following consideration of the Caskey Phase Three Report, and the publications of Sir George Terry's conclusions on 28 October 1983, that the way was clear for a decision to be taken on the form the promised inquiry should take and its Terms of Reference. Pending the delivery of the Terry Report, since 1982 the Northern Ireland Office had been giving considerable thought to whether the proposed Inquiry should be held under the 1921 Act or, as was eventually the case, a more limited form of Inquiry should be held under the provisions of Article 54 and Schedule 8 of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order, 1972 (The 1972 Order).

179 KIN 21275.
180 KIN 21275.

252 The NIO considered a 1921 Act Inquiry would have had a number of disadvantages. Lord Salmon's 1966 Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry had suggested that the use of the 1921 Act should be "limited to matters of public importance concerning which there is something of a nationwide crisis of confidence". Officials doubted whether a local concern in Northern Ireland could be said to come within the category of a nationwide crisis of confidence. In any event, a debate in Parliament would be required to set up such an Inquiry.

253 A further factor was that it was anticipated that a 1921 Act Inquiry would be very long and very costly. It was later estimated that it might cost as much as £2 million.[181]

254 Another consideration was that a general immunity from prosecution for witnesses would normally be considered necessary, although some form of immunity would still be required for any Inquiry, whether under the 1921 Act or the 1972 Order.

255 A particular consideration appears to have been the concern that public hearings would attract public attention, and perhaps provide a platform for "those anxious to make political mileage or satisfy personal grudges."[182] A 1972 Order inquiry was thought to be speedier and less likely to become a media circus.[183]

256 An important technical point was that although a 1921 Act Inquiry would have power to subpoena witnesses throughout the entirety of the United Kingdom, as the Secretary of State had expressly recognised in his reference to Colin Wallace in the exchanges in the House of Commons already quoted, a 1972 Order inquiry could only subpoena witnesses in Northern Ireland, something which was to prove significant when the Hughes Inquiry tried to interview Colin Wallace.

257 Notwithstanding the disadvantages of a 1921 Act inquiry, a meeting of Northern Ireland Office officials chaired by the Permanent Under Secretary on 30 March 1982 decided that:

> "public expectations had been aroused; and the wider powers of subpoena of the [1921] Act gave it an advantage over the 1972 Order. It was agreed that, in the absence of powerful arguments to the contrary, a 1921 Act would be required."[184]

181 KIN 102159.
182 KIN 102156.
183 KIN 102156.
184 KIN 102157.

258 Early in 1983, as the expected date of publication of the Terry report approached, discussions within the Northern Ireland Office on the form of inquiry resumed in earnest. At this stage it was still considered that only a 1921 Act inquiry was appropriate. As a meeting of officials on 28 April 1983 presciently concluded:

> "It was likely that the extent of concern in the Province would mean that only the institution of such a wide ranging and powerful Inquiry [under the 1921 Act] would represent a sufficient response by Government".[185]

259 We have not considered it necessary to recite the details of every meeting or discussion of the arguments for or against a 1921 Act inquiry because, as a helpful Northern Ireland Office survey of events prepared in 1990 observed, "the picture began to shift" by 30 June 1983 when further considerations were examined. One was that the Security Service was concerned about the likely intrusion of the proposed inquiry into intelligence matters if the Terms of Reference were as wide as the NIO had in mind. The reference to there being at least two witnesses who it was thought could come forward with evidence which might, perhaps gratuitously, reveal information about the structure and range of activities of the Intelligence Services at the time in question was significant. One of the two possible witnesses was Colin Wallace, who was explicitly referred to in advice given to the Secretary of State on 20 July 1983 as a person serving a prison sentence for a manslaughter charge. The other, who was referred to as "a born again Christian who served in Military Intelligence" was obviously Brian Gemmell.[186]

260 A further concern was that the Chief Constable of the RUC was expressing the view very strongly against any public inquiry with Terms of Reference that would allow "all the rumours to be aired yet again".[187]

261 Advice tendered to the Secretary of State on 20 July 1983 examined three possibilities.

1 A 1921 Act Inquiry

2 A 1972 Order Inquiry.

3 A non-statutory Inquiry without formal powers.

185 KIN 102158.
186 KIN 102159.
187 KIN 102158.

The Secretary of State considered the advice and discussed it with Sir Philip Woodfield, the Permanent Under-Secretary of the NIO. The Secretary of State was apparently attracted to the suggestion of a 1972 Order Inquiry chaired by a Northern Ireland High Court Judge, expressing the hope that:

> "Whilst much would depend on public reaction to the publication of the Terry Report, it would be possible to resist establishing an Inquiry under the 1921 Act".[188]

262 In the event, what emerged was a 1972 Order Inquiry. The Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland had been consulted about making a Northern Ireland High Court Judge available as Chairman, but his lack of enthusiasm for that suggestion was evident. The Secretary of State announced the setting-up of the Hughes Inquiry on 18 January 1984. It had the following Terms of Reference:

> "to
>
> a. inquire into the administration of children's homes and young person's hostels whose residents were subjected to homosexual offences which led to convictions by the Courts or where homosexual misconduct led to disciplinary action against members of the staff, and into the extent to which those responsible for the provision of residential care for children and young person's could have prevented the commission of such acts or detected their occurrence at an earlier stage;
>
> b. consider the implications for present procedures and practices within the system of residential care, including in particular the adequacy and effectiveness of arrangements for the supervision and protection of children and young persons in residential care; and
>
> c. make recommendations with a view to promoting the welfare of such children and young persons and preventing any future malpractice."[189]

263 The Hughes Inquiry Terms of Reference therefore excluded any examination of the Security Services. In the event, the Hughes Inquiry only examined in a restricted fashion the RUC's action in the 1970s insofar as it considered the Cullen/Meharg investigations of 1974 and

188 KIN 102159.
189 KIN 75380.

1976. That was in the context of what was or was not disclosed to social services at the time, and did not examine the wider issues of the adequacy of the RUC response because that was clearly outside the Terms of Reference of the Hughes Inquiry.

264 The NIO officials recognised in 1982 that despite the strength of the arguments against holding a 1921 Act Inquiry, a 1972 Order inquiry was not likely to allay public concern about Kincora. We are satisfied that the balance of the argument tipped away from a 1921 inquiry in favour of a 1972 Order inquiry because of the concerns expressed in 1983 by the Security Services about the risks to intelligence operations if witnesses such as Colin Wallace or Brian Gemmell had a public platform on which to advance their arguments. A further factor was the objections of the Chief Constable to a public inquiry which would permit, "all the rumours to be aired again". The Chief Constable's view is entirely understandable given the decisive views expressed in the Caskey Phase One, Two and Three Reports. Together these rejected allegations of abuse of residents by public figures and others, and dismissed the allegation of a cover-up. These conclusions were reached after an extremely extensive and thorough investigation. The Chief Constable no doubt anticipated that a public inquiry which was empowered to look at allegations relating to the Security Services would inevitably involve going over the same ground as had been covered by the RUC investigations to date. This was particularly as the outcome of the Sussex Police investigations under Sir George Terry supported the RUC findings.

265 Whilst there were valid and strong arguments against a 1921 Act inquiry as opposed to a 1972 Order inquiry, it was always possible that a 1972 Order inquiry would not allay the public concerns for the reasons identified by Northern Ireland Office officials on 28 April 1983.

266 The concerns about revelations of intelligence methods in Northern Ireland cannot be dismissed as merely an excuse for avoiding the examination of matters which might result in inconvenient truths being established. MI5 had repeatedly asserted that it had nothing to hide in respect of a criminal investigation, but the security and political environment was still extremely complex. Terrorist murders, bombings and shootings were still occurring at a very high level of frequency, and to that point all initiatives to bring about a political solution in Northern Ireland had foundered. Although we recognise the weight of the arguments against a wide-ranging public inquiry under the 1921 Act at the time, as anticipated in April 1983 it proved in practice that the 1972 Order option did not bring an end to the rumours and innuendo about what did or did not happen in Kincora so far as the police and intelligence agencies were concerned.

267 We are surprised that greater consideration was not given to a variation of the third option, namely a non-statutory inquiry without formal powers. The direction of the DPP that there should be no prosecution merely established that there were no grounds for criminal proceedings. Without a prosecution the full nature and extent of the extremely thorough Caskey Phase Two and Three Investigations and the equally thorough Sussex Police investigations would never be made public. Only Sir George Terry's conclusions were published. Therefore, so far as the public, politicians and the media were concerned they were being asked to take on trust that the role of the Security Services had been examined.

268 However, as we have concluded in our consideration of Sir George Terry's Report, it appears to be the case that he accepted the assurances of MI5 without investigating the Ian Cameron issue, and officials in the NIO were aware at the highest level that the RUC had been obstructed in their efforts to interview Ian Cameron.

269 We are satisfied that the NIO were not justified in forming their belief that the RUC investigations, the decision of the DPP, and Sir George Terry's Report, taken together, provided a firm basis upon which to argue against an inquiry into the role of the Security Services. We recognise the validity of the concerns of the Security Services if intelligence methods were to be examined in public at a time of continuing serious terrorist activity and political instability. Nevertheless, we consider that it should have been possible to establish a non-statutory inquiry conducted by a senior judge or retired judge from outside Northern Ireland which would sit in private, but have access to all the relevant witnesses and documents. There was a recent precedent for an Inquiry of that general type in the form of the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Police Interrogations Procedures in Northern Ireland[190] under the chairmanship of His Honour Judge H G Bennett QC, which reported in 1979. That committee sat in private but heard oral evidence on fourteen days at Stormont and on three days in London, as well as hearing from 58 witnesses.[191]

190 Cmnd. 7497 Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Police Interrogations Procedures in Northern Ireland.
191 Ibid, pp.3 and 4.

270 An Inquiry of that type presided over by a senior judge from outside Northern Ireland, such as either a serving or a retired lord of appeal or a lord justice of appeal, would have provided a mechanism whereby an authoritative and thorough investigation could be carried out of those issues which were not possible because of the Terms of Reference of the Hughes Inquiry. Such an Inquiry could have been provided with suitable Terms of Reference which would have enabled it to proceed in private in parallel with, or to be held immediately following, the Hughes Inquiry. Whilst it would be held in private, the Report could have provided sufficient detail to explain why it reached its conclusions without imperilling intelligence operations. We have seen nothing to suggest that such an option was seriously considered, let alone explored in detail.

271 Whilst it could be argued that such an inquiry should have been set up is to view the matter with the advantage of hindsight, we do not accept that that is the case because in July 1982 NIO Officials accurately foresaw the very problem which was not answered by the deliberately narrow terms of the Hughes Inquiry, namely that such a limited inquiry would not provide answers to many of the questions which were being raised at the time. The decision that was made to rely on the basis of the DPP's direction of no prosecution and the outcome of the Terry Report was misguided.

PART EIGHT

Military intelligence, Tara and McGrath

272 When considering Brian Gemmell and Ian Cameron, we have examined whether there was a MISR as Brian Gemmell claimed to the police when interviewed by D/Supt Caskey on 16 July 1982. For the reasons we have already given, we concluded that Brian Gemmell mistakenly conflated the short 1975 MISR and the 14 October 1976 document that he prepared and then handed to two members of the SIS on 15 October 1976. We now turn to consider other material that is relevant to establishing what military intelligence knew about McGrath. By military intelligence we mean the Intelligence Units of the Regular Army and Intelligence or information obtained by Intelligence Officers in the UDR.

273 As Junior Counsel to the Inquiry explained on Day 220, the Ministry of Defence have not been able to find two files which it is clear were still in existence in 1990, because they were referred to in the supplementary Rucker Report prepared in 1990. This was an internal Ministry of Defence Report to which we refer later. The two files were the HQNI Tara file and the 39 Brigade Tara file, which appear to have been passed to the Security Service at some point in 1990. Officer 9004's evidence on behalf of the Security Service was that the two files were in the possession of the Security Services as late as 18 June 1990, but it was not possible to say with any certainty what happened to them after that. He speculated that they might have been returned to the Ministry of Defence, or destroyed for one reason or another.[192]

274 We have already considered the evidence of Major Saunders, who examined the HQNI Tara file and the 39 Infantry Brigade file and as a result produced eleven documents which he gave to D/Supt Caskey. Some of these came from the HQNI file, 5523/6, others from a file 3350/16, which was recovered from 39 Infantry Brigade. The documents from 39 Infantry Brigade included the 22 May 1975 MISR. Although neither the HQNI Tara file nor the 39 Infantry Brigade file can now be found, their contents were examined at various dates between 1982 and 1990 by Major Saunders, by Mr Noakes who was an MoD researcher, and by Mr Rucker. We have the eleven documents produced from both files by Major Saunders and which he provided to the RUC. This makes it possible to establish with reasonable confidence that nothing else of relevance to this Inquiry was in the two files, although we cannot say that with complete certainty as the files cannot now be found.

192 Day 219, p.45.

Witness C

275 On Day 222 we heard evidence from witness C who was a Major serving in the Intelligence Branch at HQNI at Thiepval, known as G Int in 1974 and 1975. He explained that he was a desk officer responsible for looking at terrorist or extremist protestant groups. As such it was his task to receive reports from field officers, and then to make assessments about the reports before disseminating that information as he considered appropriate.[193] One of those groups was Tara.

276 Witness C wrote a report on Tara dated 6 July 1974 in which he said that Tara's existence had been known since 1972, and that little had been heard of it until the appearance of posters in Belfast on 11 April 1973. He went on to say that:

> "…very little is known about TARA which has always been shrouded in mystery. (It claims to be a secret organisation). Some personalities known are:-
>
> a William McGrath, 5 Greenwood Avenue, Upper Newtownards Road, Belfast, CO of Tara, has communist leanings and a reputed homosexual".[194]

277 This assessment is interesting for a number of reasons. First of all, the address given for McGrath of 5 Greenwood Avenue was wrong, and in any event out of date. When he lived at Greenwood Avenue it was at number 4 and not at number 5 and he had been living at 188 Upper Newtownards Road for a considerable period of time. Secondly, although the report refers to McGrath as a "reputed homosexual", it makes no reference to his employment at Kincora, or to Kincora in any form. Thirdly, witness C's view of Tara was revealing when he commented to us that at the time his branch did not regard Tara as a secret organisation, saying "to us they were just an organisation".[195] In his inquiry witness statement he said that Tara was an organisation of limited interest to the Army.[196] He also told us that the reference to McGrath's homosexuality was a piece of information that would not have been of great importance to him in his work.[197]

193 Day 222, p.44.
194 KIN 2513.
195 Day 222, p.49.
196 KIN 2506.
197 Day 222, p49.

278 Witness C explained that he had asked Colin Wallace for a copy of a sheet he knew Wallace had on Tara, and he believed that he based his report of 6 July 1974 on the document Colin Wallace gave him.[198] That document contains the following reference to McGrath.

> "Other information that has come to light includes the name of the OC-William McGrath. He is said to be a homosexual and has conned many people into membership by threatening them with revealing homosexual activities which he had initiated. He is also thought to owe more allegiance to the Red Flag than to either the Union Jack or the Tricolour".[199]

279 If witness C is correct that he obtained this document from Colin Wallace, then it must have been created by Colin Wallace at some time before witness C drew on it to prepare his 4 July 1974 report on Tara. We consider it significant that the document Colin Wallace prepared makes no reference to Kincora, or to McGrath's employment there, or to McGrath being believed to sexually assault residents at Kincora. We are satisfied from the passage quoted above that the reference to McGrath having conned many people into membership relates to membership of Tara. We refer to this document again when we examine Colin Wallace's account of events.

280 The next Army document in chronological sequence that refers to McGrath was written by witness C on 26 February 1975, and was addressed to RO 2. We are satisfied that RO 2 was a subordinate of Ian Cameron. Given the importance of this document we set it out in full.

> "William McGrath (Tara) – 188 Upper Newtownards Rd
>
> 1. Subject first came to notice in April 1973 when Jean Coulter said he was leading Tara and that his son was also involved. Enquiries with PR HQNI indicated that McGrath was homosexual and had communist tendencies. Clifford Smyth (Tara and DUP) was reported to be living at McGrath's house at that time.
> 2. By Oct 73, further reports confirmed that McGrath was homosexual and was using the Puritan Printing Co for propaganda purposes. During October and November 73, police reports indicated that McGrath received a visitor from England, a Miss De Verne, and 2 Dutch journalists, one of them called Elisabeth

198 Day 222, p.51.
199 KIN 2515.

Schaait. We do not know the purpose of these visits but on 6 Nov 73 an A2 report stated that McGrath intended to visit KIN 390 of Amsterdam.

3. McGrath again came to light in September 1974 when a Tara/ULA propaganda cassette tape was transcribed which exhorted the listener to send funds to McGrath, giving his previous address, 5 Greenwood Avenue, Belfast.
4. An intelligent though devious man, who needs extremely careful 'handling'. I do not at present fully trust him but he is undoubtedly a mine of useful information on past incidents, organisation and personalities."[200]

281 This assessment of McGrath incorporated some new information. It correctly gave his address as 188 Upper Newtownards Road. Whilst the reference to "PR HQNI" suggests that this was referring to the document received from Colin Wallace in July 1974, because it echoes the assertion in that document that McGrath was homosexual and had communist tendencies, the reference in paragraph 3 to McGrath coming to attention again in September 1974 is a reference to events which must have occurred after witness C wrote his July 1974 report.

282 It is paragraph 4 that is of particular significance to the Inquiry. On reading paragraph 4 one possible construction of that paragraph is that witness C had formed his assessment of McGrath because he had met him, and that McGrath was providing information to the Army. However, we consider that, looked at in isolation, the other construction is that it was an assessment arrived at by the author after considering other information available to him. Witness C explained to us that what he did was to prepare an overall assessment based on the information that his desk, that is the Protestant/loyalist extremist desk, had on McGrath at the time. He was emphatic that he never met McGrath, nor that he intended to do so at the time. As he put it, "that's a pure paper assessment".[201]

283 There is no other material which we have so far examined which provided any basis for a suggestion that McGrath was an Army agent. The way in which he was referred to in the contemporary records shows that he was a person who was of only limited interest, and that interest was because he was the commanding officer of Tara. It is also clear that relatively little was known about him. These considerations suggest to us that the explanation witness C gave for the way he wrote paragraph 4 was entirely plausible, and having seen and heard him give evidence we accept that his evidence on what he wrote and why he wrote it, and what he meant, was credible and reliable.

200 KIN 2518.
201 Day 222, p.58.

284 The next Army document in chronological terms that we examined in this context was dated 22 March 1975. This came from a Sergeant and a Corporal attached to an Army Intelligence Unit based at Castlereagh in East Belfast which reported to 39 Infantry Brigade. They reported that since 1974 they had been working on Tara, and had been given information by an RUC constable attached to what they described as the SPG (Special Patrol Group) "Int", that is intelligence. The Special Patrol Group was an RUC uniformed unit that performed various policing tasks as necessary whenever and wherever it was needed, such as quelling riots or carrying out large scale police searches. The SPG was a predecessor of the present day PSNI Mobile Support Units which perform broadly similar functions.

285 The 22 March 1975 Report contained a great deal of background information on McGrath, and on his relations with other figures including Roy Garland. The Report said that much of the information was attributed to Miss Shaw, and that "Miss Shaw has a grievance to settle with McGrath, whom she dislikes intently for moral reasons".[202] While the report refers to McGrath as the "warden of Kincora Boys Hostel", and states that there were letters "written by McGrath to one Roy Garland when they were having an affair", it contains no reference to McGrath abusing residents in Kincora.

286 As we have already considered the events involving Brian Gemmell and Ian Cameron that occurred in the months following this report of 22 March 1975 we now turn to examine the document dated 28 January 1976. It will be remembered that this is the document which had made its way unofficially to MI5 in October 1976, when a copy was handed over by Brian Gemmell on 15 October 1976. The 28 January 1976 document came from 3 Infantry Brigade in Lurgan and was signed by Major Halford McLeod. The document was sent to both GI "Int" HQNI and GI "Int" HQ39 Infantry Brigade: it consisted of four pages and two pages of press cuttings which were attached. The report explained that the information came from three sources. It contained considerable detail about, and observations upon, McGrath, his religious and political views and his associates.

202 KIN 105013.

287 The following three passages are relevant.

a) Paragraph 6 "McGrath is a homosexual and makes a practice of seducing promising young men".[203]

b) Paragraph 7 "McGrath is currently described from the 1975 Belfast Street Directory as a Welfare Officer. He is thought to be running some form of boys' home".[204]

c) Paragraph 17 heading conclusion

> "The picture is confused. You [HQNI and HQ39 Infantry Brigade] are in a better position to assess the information than we are. Perhaps the most interesting aspect is the [sic] many contradictions around the central figure, McGrath".[205]

288 The reference to McGrath "seducing promising young men" clearly refers to adults involved at some stage with Tara, as can be seen from the names of those whom McGrath was said to have seduced. The reference to his being "thought to be running some form of boys' home" is clearly incidental to McGrath's financial and work history. The boys' home was apparently unknown, and there is no reference to Kincora, or to McGrath sexually abusing residents.

289 When interviewed by D/Supt Caskey in September 1982 Major Halford McLeod said he was not aware in which boys' home McGrath was employed. He continued:

> "I cannot recall any specific boys' home being mentioned. When I was preparing this report I was not so much interested in McGrath's homosexual activity but rather in his involvement with Tara and possible Communist links and links with Ian Paisley and his links with security forces."[206]

290 Major Halford McLeod said that he had received the information upon which this report was based from UDR Major H who was a UDR officer, and from a source to whom he was introduced by UDR Major H, but

203 KIN 30298.
204 KIN 30298.
205 KIN 30299.
206 KIN 30151.

he could not remember who the source was. At this time 3 UDR to whom UDR Major H was attached was under the command of 3 Infantry Brigade.[207] UDR Major H told the police in 1982 that Major Halford McLeod did not meet three people whom Major Halford McLeod had named through him, one of whom was Roy Garland. He said in his 1982 police statement that at the time he was the 3 UDR Intelligence Officer and that he collected information on McGrath. He said:

> "I cannot remember exactly what all Garland told me but I do remember Garland saying that McGrath was a homosexual and was employed in a boys' home. He did not tell me what home McGrath was employed in or that McGrath had committed any offences."[208]

291 UDR Captain N also served in 3 UDR. He explained what he told UDR Major H in a statement he made to D/Supt Caskey on 28 September 1982 in this way:

> "The information I passed was that I believe McGrath to be a homosexual and his association with up and coming young men in Unionist Politics, including his involvement with TARA. I knew Roy Garland and it was me who introduced Garland to [UDR Major H]. It was Garland who referred to the fact that he believed that McGrath was working in a boys' home. The name of the home, was to the best of my knowledge, not stated."[209]

292 When the accounts given by Major Halford McLeod, UDR Major H and UDR Captain N are compared with the contents of Major Halford McLeod's January 1976 report they indicate that whilst a number of Army and UDR officers believed McGrath to be homosexual, or that he was reputed to be, and that McGrath was alleged to have seduced "promising young men", the young men were adults connected with McGrath through Tara. Although it was established that McGrath worked in a boys' home, Kincora was not mentioned by name, nor was any allegation made that he was abusing the residents of any boys' home, whatever he was said to have done in the past so far as Roy Garland was concerned. All these officers, including WITNESS C, were interested in McGrath solely because he was the Commanding Officer of Tara. That McGrath worked in a boys' home was merely incidental to their interest in him and that interest was because of his connection with Tara.

207 KIN 30151.
208 KIN 30152.
209 KIN 30154.

PART NINE

The allegations of Colin Wallace

293 Mr Colin Wallace is a former civilian employee of the Ministry of Defence who was employed as a Senior Information Officer at HQNI when he was moved to a post in Lancashire in January 1975 and then dismissed later that year. Mr Wallace has made many statements over the years to the effect that the Army were aware that residents of Kincora were being sexually abused by McGrath and did not intervene to stop it. In particular, he claims to have prepared a long memorandum dated 8 November 1974 which recommended that the Army, amongst other steps, make a final attempt to get the RUC to investigate the matter. This memorandum appears in Who Framed Colin Wallace? by Paul Foot, first published in 1989. The references which we make to that book are taken from the paperback edition published in 1990. Who Framed Colin Wallace? considered this memorandum as well as other matters relating to Colin Wallace, including the circumstances leading to his conviction for the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis in 1980.

294 From its investigations the Inquiry was aware that over the years Mr Wallace had written many letters to prime ministers, ministers, civil servants, members of parliament, as well as speaking to many journalists, about his allegations relating to Kincora. The Inquiry examined letters from him in the possession of various Government departments and these, and the allegations contained therein, led us to decide that he should be invited to help the Inquiry with its investigations into Kincora because of what he had said and written in the past. The Inquiry therefore contacted Mr Wallace through his solicitors by letter dated 19 April 2016. We invited him to become a core participant in the Kincora module, and made it clear that if he was prepared to become a core participant, depending upon his financial circumstances, he may be eligible for legal representation at the Inquiry at the Inquiry's expense. In addition, we requested that in any event he provide the Inquiry with a witness statement dealing with 32 questions which the Inquiry regarded as relevant to the issues it identified.

295 Mr Wallace's response by way of an email of 26 April 2016 from his solicitor was to request details of witnesses and documents in order to assist him to decide whether "he wishes to engage with the Inquiry in any capacity". The Inquiry responded to Mr Wallace's solicitors on 28 April 2016 pointing out that it was not the Inquiry's practice to disclose details of this nature before the opening of the module, and it saw no reason to depart from that practice. The Inquiry repeated the invitation to Mr Wallace to become a core participant, and again pointed out that he may be eligible for funding for legal assistance to enable him to prepare the witness statement the Inquiry had already requested him to provide. This letter from the Inquiry solicitor concludes:

> "If Mr Wallace does not wish to assist the Inquiry in its work by providing a witness statement in which he answers the questions set out in my letter of 19 April, questions which are plainly relevant to the Inquiry's work, the Inquiry will have no alternative but to conclude that Mr Wallace refuses to answer any questions and will proceed accordingly."[210]

296 Mr Wallace's solicitors replied by email on 29 April 2016 saying that he "will not engage in any capacity with the Inquiry".

297 Despite Mr Wallace's attitude, on 31 May 2016 on the opening day of the Inquiry's public hearings into Kincora the Chairman stated that although Mr Wallace, Brian Gemmell and Roy Garland had each refused to become core participants, and had not provided witness statements dealing with the various questions posed to them by the Inquiry, if they changed their minds by Friday 10 June 2016 and provided the witness statements requested, they could still take part in the hearings as core participants. If they did not do so by 10 June it would be too late. Mr Wallace did not respond to that invitation, and the public hearings into Kincora ended on 8 July 2016.

298 Two months after the public hearings ended, Mr Wallace wrote to the Inquiry on 9 September 2016 attaching a 51-page document headed "Response to the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry by Colin Wallace September 2016". He attached a large number of documents to that letter. From the document and the attachments it was clear that Mr Wallace had closely analysed the transcripts of the public hearings during the intervening period of two months.

299 He subsequently sent four further letters.

1. On 26 September 2016 he sent a further two-page letter to the Inquiry, to which he attached two further documents.

210 KIN 123332.

2. On 17 October he sent a nine-page letter to the Inquiry attaching seven further documents.
3. On 27 October 2016 he sent a three-page letter to the Inquiry attaching three further documents.
4. On 7 November 2016 he sent a two-page letter to the Inquiry attaching four further documents.

The Inquiry has considered each of these letters and documents, and we took them all into account. In due course these will be placed on the Inquiry's website.

300 As will become apparent, Mr Wallace has engaged in voluminous correspondence about Kincora over the years. We do not intend in this Report to refer to each and every letter he has written, or to every document or press cutting to which he has referred, nor to every document referred to by the Inquiry in the Kincora module transcripts which may touch on Mr Wallace. The Inquiry has examined and considered them all. For the Inquiry to respond to each and every one of those documents, many of which contain repetitions of the same or similar points made in other documents, or refer to matters that are not relevant to Kincora would be out of all proportion to their relevance to the issues which the Inquiry has considered.

301 When assessing the credibility of the various accounts Mr Wallace has given about his knowledge of Kincora we have taken into account that he has not provided a witness statement to this Inquiry dealing with the questions posed to him, and that in the past he has refused to answer pertinent questions about Kincora which had been put to him by the RUC and by the Hughes Inquiry. In his response to the Inquiry Warning Letter Mr Wallace complained that he had been given insufficient time to respond to, and comment upon, the extracts of the Draft Report sent to him which referred to him and in which he was criticised. However, he produced a 45 page response with some attachments in which he again avoided responding to relevant matters within his knowledge to which the Inquiry referred in the draft sent to him, but concentrated on points and material which were of little value to the Inquiry. We have taken into account his continued failure to provide relevant information.

302 Mr Wallace's history is unusual in many respects, as will be apparent from the following brief résumé of some of the principal events in which he was concerned. Some of these events, particularly his conviction for the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis, are only indirectly relevant to the issues which this Inquiry considered it necessary to examine, but because they are closely interwoven with those issues some reference to them is inevitable when his allegations about Kincora are being examined.

303 In 1975 Mr Wallace was dismissed from his post as a Senior Information Officer by the Ministry of Defence after he attempted to pass classified Ministry of Defence documents to a journalist. As we shall explain, the documents were found and handed to the RUC before the journalist could receive them. Mr Wallace appealed his dismissal to the Civil Service Appeals Board (CSAB), which ultimately suggested that he be permitted to resign. He and the Ministry of Defence accepted this with the result that Mr Wallace resigned from his employment with effect from 31 December 1975.

304 At the time, Mr Wallace contended that the nature of his work was such that he was acting properly in attempting to pass the documents to the journalist, and that this would be apparent from an examination of his job description. The full job description was not produced, although some reference was made to its scope by Mr Wallace's representatives in their submissions to the CSAB. The failure to produce a full description, and what Mr Wallace maintained was therefore a distortion of his true position, was a major grievance on his part at that time, and remains so.

305 Unknown to him at the time, but as has since been established, the MoD approached the Chairman of the CSAB before the hearing and secretly briefed him about the reasons relating to Mr Wallace's dismissal. When this emerged in 1989, the then Conservative Government appointed David Calcutt QC to review the matter. Mr Calcutt concluded that representatives of the MoD had been in private communication with the Chairman before the appeal, and that the full range of Mr Wallace's work was not made plain to the CSAB. He concluded that Mr Wallace should not have been dismissed and recommended that he receive £30,000 compensation.

306 Mr Wallace has long contended that prior to his dismissal he was involved with a project known as "Clockwork Orange". For many years the Government denied that there was such a project, but in 1989 documents which led to the revelation about the approach to the CSAB also confirmed that, in the Government's view, whilst there had been a discussion of such a project it never came to fruition. The denials that Clockwork Orange existed continue to annoy Mr Wallace to the present day, as can be seen from correspondence to which we later refer. It was the discovery of documents relating to Clockwork Orange that set in train the events that led to the appointment of David Calcutt QC to review the hearing before the CSAB.

307 Mr Wallace has also claimed that his dismissal in 1975 was because of what he knew about Kincora. On 17 February 2004, when giving evidence to a committee of Dáil Éireann (the lower house of the Irish Parliament) in connection with a report prepared by Mr Justice Barron on the Dublin and Monaghan bombings, Mr Wallace said:

> "I was forced out of Northern Ireland as a result of a dispute with the security service over the Kincora Boys' Home scandal in Belfast..."[211]

308 As we shall see, Mr Wallace was posted from Thiepval to a new posting in Preston in Lancashire early in 1975. If, as he claims, that posting came about because of a dispute with the Security Service over what was happening in Kincora that would be an important matter supporting his general credibility. For that reason we have examined the circumstances surrounding his leaving Northern Ireland and which led to his dismissal from his post as a Senior Information Officer, and the events surrounding the appeal before the Civil Service Appeal Board.

309 Following his resignation from his MoD employment at the end of 1975, Mr Wallace took up employment with a local authority in the South of England. In 1980 he was charged with the murder, and convicted of the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. His initial appeal against his conviction was dismissed. Subsequently, his conviction was referred back to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) which quashed the conviction and decided not to order a retrial. Much of the correspondence to which we refer in which Mr Wallace engaged while he was in prison serving the sentence on the manslaughter charge related to his conviction on that charge. Those circumstances are not relevant to the issues considered by the Inquiry which relate to Kincora.

211 KIN 122004.

310 The 8 November 1974 document to which we have already referred is of great significance. If it was compiled in November 1974, as it purports to have been, it very strongly supports the credibility of Mr Wallace's account of what he knew and what he claims others in HQNI knew about sexual abuse in Kincora in 1974. The document first came to the notice of the RUC when it was passed to Sussex Police by Mr Holroyd in 1984. In due course we examine issues which have been raised about its authenticity, but we consider it appropriate to examine those issues, and the nature and content of the document, when we come to consider other material relating to events in 1974 and 1975. We examined the relevant events relating to Mr Wallace and Kincora in a broadly chronological form, but before turning to them we consider it appropriate at this stage to refer to his background and work at Thiepval.

Colin Wallace's background

311 Although different dates are given in the documents we have examined it appears that Mr Wallace was born on 6 June 1943, and is now 73. He was educated at Ballymena Academy in County Antrim, leaving in 1960 after passing eight O-levels. He then appears to have attended Belfast Technical College before working for a number of years in a pharmaceutical company in Ballymena. In 1964 he joined the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve (TAVR) and was commissioned as a Captain in the Army Cadet Force (ACF). He also served in the Ulster Special Constabulary (USC, commonly known as the 'B' Specials) from 28 December 1965 until 1968.[212] On 17 January 1972 he became a part-time member of the UDR,[213] and in May 1972 was granted a commission as a Second Lieutenant, with the acting rank of Captain backdated to 18 January 1972. During his service with the ACF he undertook a number of courses. It is clear from the details of the courses he went on between 1966 and 1971, which included parachute courses at the French Free Fall School at Pau, the US Parachute School at Fort Benning in Georgia, and the New Zealand SAS (Special Air Service) Patrol Course, that he was a very active part-time soldier, and in particular became an enthusiastic free fall parachutist.[214]

212 KIN 30007.
213 KIN 30361.
214 KIN 30363.

312 On 1 May 1968 he became a civilian employee of the Army Information Service based at Lisburn as an Assistant Information Officer, and by the end of 1974 had recently been promoted to Senior Information Officer. We consider his role in the Army Information Service when we examine the events of 1974 and 1975 which culminated in his dismissal and appeal to the CSAB, but at this stage we examine the circumstances in which he has claimed that he first heard of concerns about the abuse of boys who were resident in Kincora.

Contact by a social worker in 1972

313 In 1982 Mr Wallace described the circumstances in which he first became aware of what he described as "the situation at Kincora" in the following passage of a longer document he prepared at that time:

> "I believe it was in early 1972 that I was first made aware of the situation at Kincora. I had just returned to HQ Northern Ireland from Londonderry where I had been on detached duty for the 'Bloody Sunday' tribunal. At this time I had been running an Army Free Fall Parachute Team (The Phantoms) as an Information Policy/Community Relations Project. The team had been a very popular attraction and appeared at numerous events and functions, including many where the Security Forces would otherwise have been very unwelcome. Shortly after one such display I was telephoned by a woman who claimed to be a social worker and who said that she had been given my name by a clergyman at whose church fete the Parachute team had recently given a display. She said she had some information to give me in confidence and I agreed to meet her in Belfast. When I met her she told me that she had a young boy in her charge who was a resident in the Kincora Boys' Home and who claimed that he had been sexually assaulted by the staff of the Home. She went on to say that there had been similar claims by other inmates of the Home and that although the matter had been reported to the RUC no action had been taken. She asked if, through Army channels, I could get the police to take action. Quite clearly she was very distressed and she asked me to ensure that her identity was not disclosed."[215]

314 There are a number of aspects of this account that are curious. First of all, it is difficult to understand why Mr Wallace's name would have been given to this lady by a clergyman. If she were concerned about her charge we would have expected her to be pointed elsewhere and not to an Army Information Officer. There is no suggestion in this account that this lady had approached more obvious candidates, such as an MP or journalist, if the RUC were not taking action. Secondly, this conversation is said to have taken place sometime after the Widgery Hearings ended. Those hearings ended in Northern Ireland on 14 March 1972, and the first resident of Kincora known to have been sexually assaulted by McGrath was HIA 532 who arrived at Kincora on 9 April 1972. He gave evidence to us on Day 208, and said that Mains and Semple never abused him but McGrath abused him on each of his three periods in Kincora, the first of which started on 9 April 1972. He told us that he never reported the abuse to anybody, and that his social worker was a male.[216] HIA 532 could not therefore be the person about whom the female social worker was speaking. If such a conversation took place, it must have related to abuse of other residents by either Semple or Mains before 1972. As is now known, Mains had been the subject of complaints in 1971, which were not reported to the police, nor were the earlier 1967 complaints about him reported to the police. There were no complaints known about Semple until the Caskey Phase One RUC investigation in 1980. It is therefore difficult to understand who this lady could have referred to, or how a reference came to be made by her in 1972 to a report to the police and the RUC not taking action when no report had been made to the Police in any shape until 1973.

215 KIN 102801 and 102802.

315 The identity of the female social worker to whom Mr Wallace referred was clearly something which is important to any examination of his account, and there had been a number of attempts to obtain further information about this lady to see whether she could be traced in order to establish whether Mr Wallace's account could be confirmed. On 21 April 1985 Mr Wallace wrote to his solicitor responding to an enquiry by the Hughes Inquiry as to whether he would be prepared to assist it. The Inquiry had asked whether Mr Wallace had any preconditions, and he said that there were three, the third being > "…an acceptance of the fact that I would not be prepared to disclose the name of any of my sources or members of the Intelligence Services."[217]

216 Day 208, p.134.
217 KIN 35387.

316 The most surprising aspect of this account is that Mr Wallace said that the lady told him that the boy "had been assaulted by the staff of the Home". (Emphasis added) Whilst McGrath joined the staff at Kincora in 1971, he is not referred to by name in this account, although by 1982 when Mr Wallace wrote the account McGrath's name had been at the centre of references to Kincora in the media following his conviction and sentence at the end of December 1981. However, when Who Framed Colin Wallace? appeared in 1989 Mr Wallace claimed the lady told him that it was McGrath who was abusing the boy and no reference was made to other staff, that is to Mains and Semple, abusing residents, and Kincora was not referred to at all.

> "She said that she had been in charge of a youngster who had alleged that he had been assaulted by William McGrath. She said the matter had been referred to the police, but the police didn't seem to be doing anything about it."[218]

Given the attention to the smallest detail that is a characteristic of Mr Wallace's communications the change between 1982 when it is "the staff" who are responsible for the abuse described by the lady, to McGrath being the abuser is striking. We regarded this as a significant inconsistency between accounts Mr Wallace has given of this conversation.

317 On Friday 13 December 1985 Mr Mercier, the solicitor to the Hughes Inquiry, went to Lewes Prison to see Mr Wallace. Two of the questions he wished to put to Mr Wallace on behalf of the Inquiry were the name of the social worker and the name of the boy assaulted. Mr Mercier's note of that meeting stated that Mr Wallace's response, after consulting his solicitor, was to say that there was no point in answering questions in the narrow context suggested by the Hughes Inquiry. His answers could be taken out of context and used to create a story which was not true.[219] Mr Wallace's letter to his solicitor the next day accepted by implication that he was not prepared to answer these questions.[220]

318 Our Inquiry also wished to establish if at all possible the identity of this person and Mr Wallace was asked to answer the following questions:

1 Give the identity of the woman who is described at p134 of Who Framed Colin Wallace? as approaching him in 1972 to voice concerns about Kincora.

218 Page 134 of the book, KIN 5200.
219 KIN 75521.
220 KIN 104104.

2 If he does not know her name, please give any information, such as her age, hair colouring, size or any other feature that might help to identify her.

3 Did she say the address or department in which she worked?

4 Did he make any record then or subsequently of the conversation? If so, if he still has such a record please produce the original to the Inquiry."[221]

None of these questions have been answered.

319 Mr Wallace's 1982 account strongly implies the social worker did identify herself to him at the time in some way, because he says she asked him to protect her identity. We can conceive of no valid reason why Mr Wallace has not been prepared to provide the name, or any information that would assist in identifying this social worker. By his account of her actions she was performing a public duty. She would not have been subject to the Official Secrets Act. Mr Wallace's consistent refusals to identify the social worker, and the strange, even bizarre, account as to how and why the social worker approached him, raised considerable reservations in our minds as to the credibility of his account. His refusal to provide any information that could help to identify her without any good reason suggests that this social worker may not even have existed.

Colin Wallace, the press and "psyops"

320 Mr Wallace's role as a Senior Information Officer was an unusual one. Between July 1973 and September 1974 Peter Broderick was the head of the Army Information Service unit at HQNI, and as such Mr Wallace's superior until Mr Broderick left Northern Ireland in September 1974 for a new appointment elsewhere in the Civil Service. In a lengthy statement which he submitted to the CSAB in 1975 in support of Mr Wallace, he described how there were two distinct sections or branches within the AIS at HQNI. One was PR (Public Relations) which dealt with what we regard as conventional public relations work on behalf of the Army by issuing press releases, liaising with journalists and matters of that sort. The other section was a separate military unit with the title IP (Information Policy). Mr Broderick explained that the brief of IP was:

221 KIN 123326.

> "…to use psychological means to assist operations strategically and tactically. It is a skill that requires sensitivity, political finesse, and a thorough knowledge of the situation".[222]

321 While Mr Wallace worked closely with IP, Mr Wallace's primary job, according to Mr Broderick, was working with the press. Mr Broderick described that task in another passage from his statement to the CSAB.

> "Though on the staff of public relations, he was used by Information Policy as their outlet to the press. He also had knowledge of the Irish situation which was totally unique in the Headquarters and surpassed that even of most of the Intelligence Branch. As time progressed, he was not only the main briefer of the press, but also the advisor on Irish matters to the whole Headquarters and – because of his personal talents – contributed much creative thought to the Information Policy Unit. In order to do his job he had constant and free access to information of high classification and extreme sensitivity."

322 "Wallace's primary job was to win friends among the press and to gain their total confidence as a reliable source of information. By agreement with Intelligence in each case, he was supplied with selected information about terrorists, their activities, their sources of money and arms at home and overseas, of the allegiances of so-called innocents and such matters. This – together with his long-term and intimate knowledge of the Irish scene – made him an invaluable contact for the press. Almost all of his background briefings he gave non-attributably – and it is a measure of his skill and the regard for him by the press – that I cannot recall a single occasion when any reporter, even from the hostile papers, disclosed the source of the briefings."[223]

323 Although a part-time officer in the ACF, and later in the UDR, Wallace was not a Military Officer at HQNI, but a civilian employee. Nevertheless it is clear that he worked very closely with the Military IP section, and no doubt his part-time military role helped him to understand, and so to work closely with, and be of use to, the military staff in Information Policy.

222 KIN 102118.
223 KIN 102119.

324 It is clear that Mr Wallace was highly regarded by his military colleagues, and by Mr Broderick, as can be seen from another passage in his CSAB statement.

> "I do not hesitate to say that Colin Wallace is the best thing that ever happened to Army Public Relations in Northern Ireland; that if it had not been for his talents, knowledge and efforts, the Army could well have lost the propaganda war; and I could not wish to meet anyone more dedicated to the Army than he was and, so obviously, still is."[224]

325 In 1975, in a document which we refer to as the "Damage Assessment", Ian Cameron, the then ASP at HQNI, recognised Mr Wallace's value to AIS and HQNI.

> "Wallace's experience, knowledge and advice was invaluable to the AIS in maintaining good relations with the Press, and in projecting the Army's interests through the Media."[225]

In the Damage Assessment Ian Cameron drew a distinction between Information Policy and Information Planning, referring to the latter as IP, but it was unnecessary for us to dwell on these distinctions.[226]

326 The reference by Mr Broderick to the role of Information Policy requires some elaboration. Mr Wallace has claimed on many occasions over the years that his work involved activities designed to deceive the media and others in order to damage the public perception of individuals or organisations perceived to be hostile to the Army and to the state.

327 Some of the activities he has described are commonly referred to under various titles, such as "Black Propaganda". As the following description by Ian Cameron in the Damage Assessment indicates, propaganda can be divided into different categories depending on the identification of its source of origin.

> "a. Black Propaganda. Any propaganda, the origin of which is completely concealed from the target audience; > b. Grey Propaganda. Any propaganda, the origin of which is left in doubt. This category also covers propaganda the origin of which may be initially concealed but which may subsequently become known to the target audience.
>

224 KIN 102120.
225 KIN 190196.
226 KIN 190192.

c. White Propaganda. Any propaganda the origin of which is readily apparent."[227]

328 That may take many forms, such as a press briefing to plant a story in a newspaper or in radio or TV programme, or the creation of forged documents designed to provide direct or indirect support for the apparent truthfulness of the false information. the…'It is not for this Inquiry to decide whether or not such practices as were undertaken by elements of the Army in Northern Ireland in the early 1970s, particularly the creation of false documents, that is forgery, were legitimate tactics or weapons used in Northern Ireland in the early 1970s. That such practices did exist and were part of the stock in trade of Mr Wallace and others will be clear from documents we examine later in the chapter.

329 Over many years much ink has been spilt over what exactly Mr Wallace did or did not do, and what he was allowed to do. In a letter to the Prime Minister of 21 July 1990 Mr Wallace described his activities in this way:

"The MoD has been totally dishonest through this whole affair in that the department knowingly employed me for a number of years to disseminate disinformation including forged documents and faked classified information to the press, but now not only deny that most of these activities ever took place but also refuse to investigate any corroborating evidence which I submit to them. It is probably true to say that most of my disinformation work from 1971 to 1975 was in direct conflict with Civil Service Codes of Conduct, however, I was not only commended and promoted for my work, I was also recommended on three occasions for the MBE for my performance of such duties."[228]

330 Recommendations for honours are not revealed and so the Inquiry has proceeded on the basis that Mr Wallace was recommended on three occasions for the award of an MBE.

331 That Mr Wallace did engage in black information and propaganda was ultimately recognised by the Ministry of Defence in 1989. We refer later to the circumstances in which documents which led to that recognition came to light. In the present context relating to the nature of the work Mr Wallace did, it is sufficient to refer to the following description of his work contained in a note attached to the letter sent by the Secretary of State for Defence to the Prime Minister on 25 September 1989.[229]

227 KIN 190193.
228 KIN 104251.
229 KIN 104026.

332 In the note the work Mr Wallace did was described as follows.

> "(1) Wallace dealt frequently with issues which were classified within HQNI at least up to the time at which details were provided unattributably to the media. It is possible – but cannot now be confirmed – that extracts from (or copies of) documents so classified may have been handed unattributably to members of the press; Wallace should only have engaged in the later actions when authorised to do so by his superiors but available evidence suggests that they may have given him considerable latitude to use his own judgement.
>
> (2) Wallace was directly or indirectly involved in a number of projects which involved spreading misinformation: documents recently recovered from Archive suggest that on occasions the information disseminated was false."[230]

333 Mr Wallace's "job description" was described in this way.

> "c. Wallace's formal job description referred only to normal PR and public information duties; the MoD gave this document to the CSAB. But whilst at HQNI Wallace also became involved in supplementary work relating to black propaganda and misinformation. At one stage the Chief Information Officer sought approval for the issue of a supplementary document which identified and would have regularised Wallace's involvement in the latter activities. No record has been found to confirm that the supplementary job description was approved and issued. But Wallace has indicated a clear knowledge of what the draft document covered and he sought to have it presented in evidence to the CSAB. No such document was given to the CSAB but Wallace's Union Representative, who had been briefed in confidence by the MoD about the broad nature of Wallace's supplementary duties, drew the CSAB's attention to them, as did the Chief Information Officer in his evidence to the CSAB."[231]

The Chief Information Officer was Mr Broderick.

Mr Wallace and the need for clearance of proposals

334 For the MoD a central issue was that Mr Wallace had acted without authorisation as can be seen from the letter from the Secretary of State to the Prime Minister in the passage just quoted above where he said,

230 KIN 104027 and 104028.
231 KIN 104027 and 104028.

> "...Wallace should only have engaged in the latter actions when authorised by his superiors".

In his Damage Assessment prepared in 1975 Ian Cameron described the procedures for obtaining clearance for specific IP Projects.

> "21. The planning and production of specific I.P. Projects is more closely controlled than the exploitation of themes in the course of unattributable briefings. Unless they are of no more than trifling importance they are discussed formally in a committee meeting presided over by the GSO I IP and attended by the GSC III IP and the SIO; the latter being present to advise on production and dissemination. [The SIO would have been Mr Wallace] When a draft outline plan has been agreed and approved by the CIO clearance is sought from the appropriate authority; the initiation of major schemes or those which could have serious repercussions have to be referred to the CLF; those with a political content have to be cleared in consultation with the NIO. The GSO I IP has discretion to carry out low level projects provided their aims are within the scope of already laid down policy.
>
> 22. Execution is undertaken only when the appropriate clearances have been obtained. Dissemination of printed material is normally facilitated through units on the ground or through the post."[232]

335 From the Army perspective there were therefore five relevant points.

1. The project had to be formally discussed and approved by the CIO, and until September 1974 that was Mr Broderick. At the meeting to discuss it the SIO, at that time Mr Wallace, would have been present in order to advise on production and dissemination.
2. Clearance had then to be sought from the appropriate authority.
3. This meant that projects with serious repercussions had to be referred to the Commander Land Forces. At that time the CLF was Major General Peter Leng.
4. Those with a political content had to be cleared in consultation with the NIO.
5. Execution of the project would only be undertaken after the appropriate clearances had been obtained.

336 That Mr Wallace had "considerable latitude" as to how he acted was acknowledged in a note prepared in July 1975 in advance of a meeting between Sir Michael Cary, the Permanent Under Secretary of the MoD, and Bill McCall of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants, the Union representing Mr Wallace at the forthcoming CSAB hearing. The relevant part for present purposes was:

232 KIN 190195.

> "To judge by what Wallace has told us, his case will hinge on the extent of his discretion. And there is no doubt that Wallace was permitted a wide degree of discretion. But one thing, as you will no doubt now know, Wallace was a key man in the Army's "information policy" or black propaganda activities in Northern Ireland, and secondly he had an encyclopaedic knowledge of the Irish scene."[233]

337 As we shall see in due course, the nature of Mr Wallace's work was central to the events which led to his dismissal. These events, and his dismissal, are only relevant to this Inquiry in so far as they relate to the assertions Mr Wallace has made that he was forced out of Northern Ireland because of what he knew about Kincora, and to whether the contemporary documents support the claims he has made about his knowledge, and the actions of the Army, in relation to Kincora between 1972 and 1975.

Colin Wallace and the Bill Fuller episode

338 An example of the way in which such IP activity was conducted is the way in which material was placed in the media which would show an American named Bill Fuller in an unflattering light because of his perceived support for the IRA. This episode is enlightening for a number of reasons. It illustrates how such material was created, and Mr Wallace's part in disseminating it. It is also relevant because it is apparent that although SIS were involved, SIS went to considerable lengths to conceal their involvement from Mr Wallace.

339 In the 1970s a major concern for all Government departments and agencies directly involved with Northern Ireland, such as the NIO, MoD and the security agencies, was the level of public sympathy and financial support for terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland from individuals and organisations in the USA. One of those individuals was Bill Fuller, described by SIS in a 21 March 1975 summary of Wallace's RUC interview of 12 March 1975 as "an American millionaire who provides bail and funds for the IRA".[234] Throughout 1974 SIS provided information about Mr Fuller to Mr Wallace to enable Mr Wallace to pass that information on to a sympathetic journalist. The information was not passed directly to Mr Wallace by SIS, but through G Int at HQNI.

233 KIN 102090.

340 The use of G Int as a conduit was to provide a "cut out" to avoid Mr Wallace suspecting where the information he was being given came from.[235] The intention was that when the journalist discussed the story with Mr Wallace he would then refer queries back to G Int, and G Int would then obtain information which would be given to Mr Wallace to give to the journalist. G Int obtained the information from SIS and/or the Army as required. The information was given to Mr Wallace who, it was believed by SIS, would understand that the information had been compiled by G Int, that is by the Army, and not by the security agencies.[236]

341 SIS maintained that in this instance false information was not provided, but true facts were passed on in this fashion.

> "We can therefore be confident that SIS had no conscious operational involvement with WALLACE of any kind. It appears that we used WALLACE only once, on an unconscious basis, than using G Int as a cut-out. This was in the FULLER case, a straight information operation. Our role was to provide true facts through G Int for PR HQNI to pass on without attribution to suitable journalists..."[237]

The reference to using Mr Wallace "on an unconscious basis" implies that he would not realise that the facts emanated from SIS.

342 In this instance it appears that the procedure adopted was that MoD Officer J showed what was described as a "sanitised write-up" to Mr Wallace who then intended to add further details which he had obtained from his "press sources" and could then add to the information by giving it orally to the journalist concerned.[238]

343 A telegram to SIS in London from the IJS at HQNI asked for further information which was being requested by the newspaper concerned. This suggests that in this particular instance SIS were simply providing information in response to requests by a journalist to Mr Wallace, but

234 KIN 3585.
235 KIN 3598.
236 KIN 3578.
237 KIN 3602.
238 KIN 3578 and 3579.

doing so in a way in which they intended would conceal from Mr Wallace that they were involved. However, in 1990, after a detailed search of their records, SIS recognised that Mr Wallace may have realised what the true source of the operation was.

> "It is unclear whether WALLACE was aware that SIS was one of the original providers of this information. Strictly speaking WALLACE should not have known, and the files indicate the care that was taken by [IJS HQNI] to ensure that he did not find out. However, WALLACE must have known that the detailed information he was given could not have come from Army sources alone. We are therefore dependent to a considerable extent on the Army's own security in this case, and must hope that knowing winks and glances were not exchanged. Otherwise WALLACE could claim that he was part of an SIS/MI5 dirty tricks operation, and provide sufficient details to be believed."[239]

344 Whether or not Mr Wallace did know, or suspect, that the facts about Bill Fuller came from SIS, he played his part in preparing the information for dissemination to the journalist concerned. An SIS memo of 7/8 April 1975 contains the following reference to Mr Wallace's efforts in this respect.

> "The sanitised write-up on Bill FULLER (copy attached). In handing this to [redacted], WALLACE photocopied on to the last page some of his own information, ie that contained in para 3 of our tel [SIS LONDON] of 7 June 74."[240]

345 The reference to Mr Wallace photocopying his own material onto the last page suggests that he may have put together the document he later passed to the journalist by using a photocopier to join two documents together, that which he received from G Int and some of his own information. That could of course have been a perfectly innocent means of compiling a document which would still clearly reveal that it had at least two distinct origins. The alternative is that that could be a device to conceal that the document had two distinct origins by making it appear that it was a single document. Whichever was the position, at best it is a possible example of the skills Mr Wallace clearly possessed in view of his own admission that he regularly created false documents.

239 KIN 3599.
240 KIN 3587.

PART TEN

Mr Wallace's knowledge of sexual abuse in Kincora in 1973 and 1974

346 In 1982 Mr Wallace prepared a long document entitled "Political and Security Implications regarding the disclosure of Security Classified Information to assist in the investigation of the allegations relating to the Kincora Boys' Hostel, Belfast." For convenience we refer to this as "Political and Security Implications", and it is to be found in full from KIN 102798 onwards. In it Mr Wallace described what he did after meeting the social worker to whom we have already referred, and who, he said, reported abuse at Kincora to him.

> "I reported my conversation with the social worker to a member of the Intelligence staff when I returned to Lisburn and asked if he could raise the matter with the RUC through our liaison channels. Some days later the officer with whom I had raised the matter came to my office and asked me to leave the incident alone because it was already under consideration by other people. I did not regard this as unusual at the time because it frequently happened when two agencies became involved in the same activity or with the same target. I had no further information about Kincora for almost a year and I do not know if my information was ever passed to the RUC. However, in 1973 a Senior Officer at HQNI gave me a written brief relating to McGrath and his activities and asked if I could get a reporter to investigate the matter. I did pass the information on to several journalists but I do not think any of the information was ever published."[241]

347 From this passage it is apparent that Mr Wallace was saying that he reported his conversation with the social worker to a member of the intelligence staff shortly after the conversation took place. That would indicate that the discussion was around the early spring of 1972. The account clearly indicates that the member of the intelligence staff concerned took the matter away and then returned and told him that it was being dealt with. The identity of the officer concerned is clearly of the utmost importance in establishing whether or not any such information was ever passed to him by Mr Wallace, and if so what the nature of the information was. If there was such a conversation or conversations in the terms suggested by Mr Wallace that would also be of the utmost importance when considering the credibility of his account. The Inquiry asked Mr Wallace to answer the following questions:

241 KIN 102802.

5 Please identify the "Intelligence Officers" or "Intelligence Officer" who said to him that this is already being dealt with; See p.135 of Who Framed Colin Wallace?.

6 When and where did that person or persons say this?"

348 Mr Wallace has not answered these questions. If he is concerned about revealing the identity of a member of the Intelligence Services, and that identity consequently being disclosed to the public, he could have asked the Inquiry to treat the name in confidence. From his close study of the transcripts of Module 15 he must be well aware that the Inquiry gave designations to several present and retired witnesses from MI5, MI6 and the Army in order to protect their identities. We can see no reason whatever why Mr Wallace has not answered these questions.

349 In the extract above from the 1982 document Mr Wallace claims that he did pass what the social worker told him to a number of journalists. In Who Framed Colin Wallace? at page 136 the following journalists are named as being provided with a "briefing paper" by Mr Wallace.[242] We will have occasion to consider the document or documents to which such a description may apply in due course, but each of the four journalists named below was interviewed as part of the RUC Caskey Phase Three investigation in 1982. A fifth journalist, Conor O'Cleary, was interviewed in 1985 because he had been out of the jurisdiction in 1982 during Caskey Phase Three.

350 Each of these journalists recalled they were told various details about Mr McGrath, and that he was homosexual, but none recalled Kincora being mentioned to them at any time. The journalists, and the papers to which they were attached at the time, were as follows:

1 David Blundy (Sunday Times) said Kincora was never mentioned at any Army briefing, nor homosexuality at any home in Northern Ireland, nor had he any knowledge of homosexuality in any children's home in Northern Ireland in 1973 or 1974.[243]

242 KIN 5201.
243 KIN 30075.

2 David McKittrick (Irish Times) said Mr Wallace did not tell him that McGrath worked with children.[244]

3 Kevin Dowling (Sunday Mirror) provided a copy of a telex he had sent to his editor in 1973. Having said that according to Mr Wallace the CO of Tara was William McGrath and a homosexual the telex continues:

> "McGrath apparently uses a non-existent evangelical mission as a front to entice young Protestant men into homosexuality. Once in they are potential blackmail victims and soldiers of Tara."[245]

4 Jim Campbell (Sunday World) said he received two documents from Mr Wallace through the post in the mid-1970s. It would appear that no mention was made of abuse of children in Kincora at that time.[246]

5 Conor O'Cleary (Irish Times) said that he had no recollection of any discussion with Mr Wallace about Kincora, or any other boys' home.[247]

351 At page 16 of his submission to the Inquiry of 9 September 2016 Mr Wallace provided the following explanation for not naming Kincora to journalists.

> "The name "Kincora" was not used in any of the documents or briefings produced by Information Policy because I was specifically instructed not to for reasons associated with the RUC. In any event, the name "Kincora" had no significance whatsoever for the press in the mid-1970s. The address of the property was believed to be sufficient to give the press a clear indication of the building and what it was used for. I believe the redacted words on the document were "Faith House". McGrath called his previous residences by that name, but I seem to recall that he did not use that name after he moved from Greenwood Avenue to the 188 Newtownards Road, hence the removal of the name from the briefing sheet.
>
> The Inquiry appears to be confused over the two press briefings used by me. One document was designed to be given to the appropriate press contacts, the other one, for legal and security reasons, was only

244 KIN 30079.
245 KIN 30231.
246 KIN 30081.
247 KIN 124648 and 124649.

to be referred to during un-attributable briefings. It was not designed to be given to the press. In other words, if a journalist claimed to have been given the names of any of the non-Tara personalities, such as Thomas Passmore, or William McGrath's address or telephone number, then that information would have come from the second version. We were aware that some journalists had very close relationships with the RUC and that information obtained from us would almost certainly be passed to the police. It had to appear that we were focusing on William McGrath and Tara as paramilitary entities, and not on allegations of sexual abuse at the hostel."[248]

352 The assertions in it that the focus was on William McGrath and Tara as paramilitary entities, and not on allegations of sexual abuse at the hostel, are irreconcilable with the account he gave in 1982 when he says he did pass the information he received from the social worker to journalists. The accounts by the five journalists in 1982 and 1985 do not support the 1982 account either.

353 We have already examined the document Wallace provided to witness C before the latter prepared his report of 4 July 1974. Mr Wallace's document made no reference to Kincora, nor to McGrath's employment at Kincora, nor to McGrath being believed to sexually assault residents in Kincora.[249] We can see no reason why, if Mr Wallace possessed the information he says he possessed about abuse at Kincora in 1972 and 1973, he did not refer to those matters when he gave information to the Major who was in charge of the HQNI Intelligence Branch desk in G Int responsible for Protestant terrorist or extremist groups.

The 1974 investigation leading to Mr Wallace's removal from Northern Ireland

354 We have already noted that Mr Wallace claims that he was forced out of Northern Ireland as a result of a dispute with the Security Services over what he termed the "Kincora Boys' Home Scandal in Belfast".[250] If he were forced out of Northern Ireland for that reason that would be an important matter supporting his credibility. For that reason we now consider the evidence relating to the events which led up to his dismissal in order to establish why he was dismissed.

248 KIN 124648 and 124649.
249 KIN 2512516.
250 KIN 122004.

355 As we have previously observed, Mr Broderick's evidence to the CSAB in 1975 was that Mr Wallace was highly regarded by his colleagues for his energy and professionalism. As Mr Wallace justifiably points out, his annual confidential reports that were placed before the CSAB in October 1975 show that was the case. For example, in 1972 it was said that he "continues to demonstrate that his talents in the PR field are of the very highest standard". In 1974 "his total dedication and sheer professionalism" were commended.[251]

356 However, some aspects of Mr Wallace's conduct attracted unfavourable comments from military personnel in 1974. In July 1974 there was a query whether he had gone to Hungary with a parachute team. At that time Hungary was a Communist country and as a civil servant Mr Wallace required permission to go there.[252] Mr Broderick pointed out that Mr Wallace had notified him of the trip, but the venue had been changed to Austria at the last minute.[253] Mr Wallace duly went on holiday but did not return as scheduled. Mr Broderick recorded Mr Wallace's explanation that he had missed his flight (presumably to Austria) at Shannon, gave up the idea and had an ordinary holiday in the Republic of Ireland. Mr Broderick felt that disciplinary action was not appropriate.[254]

357 Whilst the matter was relatively unimportant, indeed trivial, that was not the way it was viewed at the time by the Command Secretariat at HQNI to judge by comments in a letter of 3 October 1974. The writer said that he would not have recommended Mr Wallace for the promotion which he had by then received to Senior Information Officer, describing Mr Wallace as having "shown himself to be irresponsible to say the least", and that he had warned CM (Civilian Management) of Mr Wallace's irresponsibility in July.[255] Civilian Management was that part of the MoD responsible for civilian employees such as Mr Wallace, and these comments are an indication that not everyone at HQNI may have shared the high opinion of Mr Broderick and others of Mr Wallace.

358 Not everyone at Army HQ was as impressed by Mr Wallace as Mr Broderick. Mr Hugh Mooney served there on secondment from the Information Research Department (IRD) of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office

251 KIN 104047.
252 KIN 190061.
253 KIN 190062.
254 KIN 190064.
255 KIN 190065.

from 1971 until 1973. In later years Mr Mooney became disenchanted with Mr Wallace for a number of reasons, and approached the FCO for advice and assistance in how to deal with what he perceived as allegations made by Mr Wallace which were damaging to Mr Mooney. On 9 April 1990 Mr Mooney met Miss Spencer, an Assistant Under Secretary in the FCO. In her note of their discussion she recorded Mr Mooney's views on Mr Wallace, on Clockwork Orange and on Kincora.

> "5 Wallace was officially a member of PR but was used by IP when necessary to exploit stories. He squared his contacts with IP within the PR system and the two to some extent became enmeshed. Mr Mooney now believes that Wallace played one side against the other. He was a civilian but involved on the fringes of the Army in every way possible. He was very active in making contacts ("a great runner-around") who never realised the importance of timing a story. Ultimately Wallace seemed to be fighting what he saw as the Army's battles against everyone, including other Government departments, though not at the Army's behest. Wallace had had a pretty freehand after promotion (to Senior Information Officer – technically after Mooney had left Belfast, but in practice changes seem to have taken place before his departure).
>
> 6 Mr Mooney said that he had known nothing about Clockwork Orange. He recalled one meeting referring to the Kincora Boys' Home, but no reference to it as a homosexual honey-trap run by MI5. IP had only been interested in Tara, the alleged protestant paramilitary group."[256]

359 Whilst Mr Mooney's comments must be treated with caution because of his ill feeling towards Mr Wallace, the picture he painted of Mr Wallace having "a pretty free hand" both before and after his promotion to SIO echo what others were to say about the latitude extended to Mr Wallace in 1975. Mr Mooney's recollections of references to Kincora are consistent with the contemporary references by the MoD, MI5, SIS and RUC Special Branch records that we have already examined.

360 Mr Mooney's contemporary comments on Mr Wallace were more favourable. On 20 March 1975 he recorded in a memorandum that a conversation with an MoD official the day before resulted in his learning that Colin Wallace was leaving Northern Ireland and had been disciplined in some way following an investigation into the leaking of information to the press.

256 KIN 200535.

> "4 I was somewhat shattered to hear this, since, like Brigadier [MOD Official] I considered Wallace the most valuable member of the Army Information Services, who throughout the time I was there launched many very damaging stories against the IRA and other extremists."[257]

361 The IRD Official to whom he addressed the memorandum noted on 24 March 1975 that "...Mr Mooney fears that [Mr Wallace] may have been the victim of a "terrible injustice" since, in his view, he may have received insufficient guidance from the Army IP Section on the clearance of classified material for unattributable briefing."[258]

362 The reference in the letter of 3 October 1974 to "Wallace is still under investigation" may have referred to the matters we now consider. On 24 September 1974 the Times quoted from what it described as a "confidential memorandum within the Northern Ireland Office", that was said to have been written just before Robert Fisk's:

> "Disclosures in the Times of August 31 and September 2 of plans to expand local part-time security forces and to withdraw 1000 British troops from Northern Ireland".

The NIO believed the section quoted in the article to be;

> "verbatim from an internal minute classified CONFIDENTIAL sent by the NIO Security Operations Division located in Dundonald House Belfast. There were two addressees and nine copy addressees. It is an accurate word-for-word-quote from that document".[259]

363 Such was the concern of the NIO about the nature of this leak that, apart from instituting an investigation within the Belfast and London offices of the NIO, the Permanent Under Secretary, Sir Frank Cooper, asked the head of the Security Service, (Sir Michael Hanley) to provide an officer from MI5 to handle the investigation. Sir Frank Cooper wrote to Sir Douglas Allen, the recently appointed Head of the Home Civil Service, on 25 September 1974 to inform him of the investigation. He explained his reasons for asking the Security Service to conduct the investigation in this way.

257 KIN 200507.
258 KIN 200508.
259 KIN 102002.

> "In view of the extremely unusual and delicate circumstances in which we are operating and the special seriousness which we must attach at the present time (following the recent assassinations of a Judge and Resident Magistrate and further threats to judicial officers and civil servants) to the unauthorised disclosure of sensitive information on law and order matters in Northern Ireland, I have already asked the Security Service for their assistance in conducting the necessary investigations, and I would be most grateful for all help which Michael Hanley, to whom I am copying this, can give us. In these special circumstances, and because my own staff are so fully extended, I would greatly appreciate it if an Officer from his Service could handle the investigation as an exception to what of course I understand is the usual advisory role. Speed is important."[260]

The letter was copied to Sir Michael Cary, the Permanent Under Secretary of the MoD.

364 When considering the reaction of the Northern Ireland Office to this leak it has to be remembered that the terrorist activity was continuing at a very high level. The reference in the letter to the assassinations by the IRA of members of the judiciary was to the murders of Judge Conaghan QC and Martin McBirney QC, a Resident Magistrate, at their homes on 16 September 1974. On the wider political front the Ulster Workers Strike brought about the collapse of the Northern Ireland Power Sharing Executive, and the Prorogation of the Northern Ireland Assembly at the end of May 1974. We consider that the Government was entirely justified in regarding "the unauthorised disclosure of sensitive information on law and order matters in Northern Ireland as warranting action at the highest level, and the instigation of an investigation. That it was being addressed at the highest level, i.e. Permanent Under Secretaries of two departments, enlisting the assistance of the Director General of the Security Service and reporting the matter to the Head of the Home Civil Service demonstrates the level of concern within Government at the time.

365 It would appear from comments made by Ian Cameron in May 1987 when he took up his post at HQNI as ASP that he had concerns about AIS in general, and Mr Wallace in particular, even before Mr Wallace came under suspicion in the MoD leak inquiry set in train at the request of Sir Frank Cooper of the NIO in late September and which we examine below. A letter from MI5 to SIS on 18 December 1989 contained the following reference:

260 KIN 102002.

> "I must tell you that at a late stage we discovered a note of May 1987, interestingly by [MI5 Officer 1] himself, of an informal conversation he had with Ian Cameron [SIS Officer B]'s successor as ASP at HQNI) in which Cameron had said that on arrival at HQNI in June 1974 he had found that [SIS Officer B] had had dealings of some sort with WALLACE. Being the cautious man he was, Cameron had then issued instructions to his staff not to speak to WALLACE"[261]

366 In 1990 Ian Cameron confirmed that he gave these instructions when he spoke to MI5 Officer 1 not long before 12 March 1990. On that date an SIS Officer made the following note of what MI5 Officer 1 told him about the conversation.

> "2.[MI5 Officer 1] told me that he had been to see Ian CAMERON recently. They discussed CAMERON's recollection of possible [SIS Officer B] – WALLACE contact in the light of CAMERON's earlier conjecture [MI5 Officer 2] letter of 18 December to [SIS Officer O] that [SIS Officer B] had some dealings with WALLACE.
>
> 3. CAMERON took over from [redacted] in July 1974 and had a handover lasting only three days, at the end of which he was not much the wiser. It was only after [redacted]'s departure that CAMERON discovered some file which [redacted] had kept and which contained details of a few journalists. There wasn't very much in the files but as CAMERON also heard that [redacted] had been in the habit of meeting journalists he suspected that [redacted] had been studying journalists for some undisclosed purpose. [the references to "redacted" are to SIS Officer B].
>
> 4. It was because everybody at Lisburn regarded WALLACE as the local guru on every subject, and because whenever anything cropped up the immediate reaction was to 'ask WALLACE', that CAMERON told his staff to keep well away from the Army Information Services and from WALLACE in particular. This of course was well before WALLACE had fallen under any sort of suspicion."[262]

261 KIN 3592.
262 KIN 3596.

367 Ian Cameron's directions suggest that even before Mr Wallace fell under suspicion Ian Cameron's instruction to his staff would have insured minimal contact between Mr Wallace and MI5 Officers.

The MI5 investigation of the leaks

368 It is likely from the reference in the letter of 3 October 1974 to Mr Wallace being "still under investigation" that he very soon came under suspicion as a possible source for the leak. The Security Service investigation culminated in a seven-page report of 9 December 1974. The full report can be seen at KIN 102004 to 102010. The report examined seven leaks in all. The first, described as "Leakage number 1" related to the items referred to in The Times of 31 August and 2 September 1974 referred to in Sir Frank Cooper's letter of 25 September 1974. Three others related to leaks believed to be connected to the journalist Robert Fisk in 1973 and 1974. Three further leaks were believed to have occurred after Leakage number 1. Two of the three, leakages Number 6 and Number 7, must have occurred after the publication of the quotation in The Times of 24 September 1974. In other words, the report established that further leaks had taken place, the most recent being leakage Number 7 relating to an article by Robert Fisk in The Times of 5 December 1974.

369 The report contained the following comments on Mr Fisk and the concerns of the Army that "his indiscretions could lead to loss of life".

> "Fisk emerges from the investigations as a competent and highly ambitious reporter who is determined to make his name professionally in Northern Ireland. He is highly regarded by the Times management and hopes to be rewarded for his work in Belfast with an important foreign posting. Fisk prefers to exploit his own contacts rather than use the press facilities provided by Stormont Castle and Lisburn; he also enjoys needling the authorities when the opportunity arises. The Army have expressed fears that under some circumstances his indiscretions could lead to loss of life."[263]

370 The report suggested that Mr Wallace was "a strong candidate" as the principal source of Mr Fisk's information.

> "It is of course possible that these several leakages of information were from a number of sources. But someone who figures as a common factor in all the incidents and must be considered a strong candidate as the principal source of Fisk's unauthorised information and of leakage Number 1 in particular is Collin [sic] Wallace, Information Officer in the Press Office at HQNI Lisburn."[264]

263 KIN 102004.

371 Under the heading "Future Action" the report concluded with the following passage.

"It can be seen that the evidence for WALLACE being a source of unauthorised disclosure to FISK is all circumstantial, although its cumulative weight is strong. For his involvement in some of the leakages to FISK WALLACE might be able to produce an explanation compatible with a generous view of his discretion as Information Officer (as with the disclosure of the Blue Card). But the pattern of the relationship between him and FISK and, in particular, its clandestine elements, are very difficult to reconcile with innocence. In an accompanying note the possible courses of action to deal with this situation are examined."[265]

372 The accompanying note referred to, also dated 9 December 1974, suggested three possible courses of action "subject to the decision by the Attorney General". The reference to the Attorney General was because his consent would be required if a prosecution were to be brought against Mr Fisk under the Official Secrets Act. Therefore, whether the other possible courses could be adopted depended upon whether the Attorney General would consent to a prosecution, or would be content if the matter were to be dealt with administratively. The "possible courses document" suggested three options.

1 To leave Mr Wallace where he was and continue the investigation.

2 To now challenge Wallace as being the source of Fisk's information.[266]

3 The removal of Mr Wallace from his post at HQNI.[267]

373 Following receipt of the Security Service Report and accompanying note Sir Frank Cooper wrote to Sir Michael Cary, the Permanent Under Secretary of the MoD, on 11 December 1974. He explained that there was a "cumulative weight of evidence" that Mr Wallace was a source

264 KIN 102006.
265 KIN 102010.
266 KIN 102019.
267 KIN 102021.

of leakage to Robert Fisk,[268] and having considered the three courses of action suggested by the Security Service, asked whether Sir Michael would:

> "agree to arrange for Wallace's posting away from HQNI as soon as possible, and that this should be done without confrontation".[269]

374 Sir Frank Cooper emphasised the need for a speedy action.

> "From NIO's point of view our overriding objective must be to eradicate quickly the source of FISK's access to classified information. I should say at this point that the GOC has been brought fully into the picture by the Head of [DCIS Staff], and would also take the view that steps be taken urgently to stop any further potential source of leakage."[270]

375 The meeting between Sir Michael Cary, Sir Frank Cooper, the Director General of the Security Service and the Deputy Under Secretary in the Ministry of Defence responsible for Civilian Management on 17 December 1974 decided to adopt the third option. It was decided that Mr Wallace would be given the choice of moving to a vacant post in the North West District based at Preston in Lancashire. If he did not agree to go to the GOCNI Lieutenant General Sir Frank King would see him, obviously in an effort to underline the necessity for him to accept the posting. If Mr Wallace refused to accept the posting then action would be taken by Civilian Management. What that might be was not spelt out, but it is clear from subsequent developments that this would result in Mr Wallace being forced to resign.[271]

376 On 24 December 1975 (Christmas Eve) Mr Wallace was interviewed and offered the posting to Preston. He explained why he did not wish to accept for both career and family reasons, but was told that if he did not accept the move the Ministry of Defence would ask for his resignation. He asked for, and was given, time to consider the matter until early the following week.[272]

377 By 3 January 1975 Mr Wallace had not given his response, and the delay in resolving this matter clearly concerned the NIO. The documents

268 KIN 103323.
269 KIN 103325.
270 KIN 103323-103324.
271 KIN 102022 and 102023.
272 KIN 102024 and 102025.

show that the NIO was pressing the MoD very hard, as can be seen from the following note of the NIO views made on 3 January 1975.

> "There were now two further important considerations [John Waterfield] of the NIO wished to put forward in favour of rapid action. The first was that very delicate negotiations were now in progress which could be sabotaged by premature disclosure. The second was that NIO owed a report to Number 10 on the previous leaks which they were now in a position to make. They really could not report that they had conclusively established the source of the leaks but were unable to take prompt action accordingly. Waterfield also told me that he had received confirmation of a new leak through the same channels (the helicopter story)."[273]

378 The reference to "very delicate negotiations [which] were now in progress which could be sabotaged by premature disclosures" very probably referred to efforts that were being made by the Government to persuade the Provisional IRA to extend the Christmas cease-fire, which the IRA had announced on 20 December 1974, to last from 22 December to 2 January. That cease-fire had been extended by the Provisional IRA on 2 January to 17 January. Although the IRA planted four bombs which exploded in London, and 19 people were injured in another explosion in Manchester, on 9 February 1975 the Provisional IRA announced an indefinite cease-fire to begin the following day.

379 These, and other important occurrences, were all taking place at the time of the events described in this part of the report and we are satisfied that the Government was entitled to take a very serious view indeed of the disclosures that were being made, and to take action to identify the source(s) of the leaks and to attempt to prevent further leaks.

380 By 7 January 1975 Mr Wallace had agreed to accept the posting to Lancashire, and arrangements were then made relating to his travel back to Northern Ireland from time to time to visit a sick relative, and for him to hand over his HQNI post to his replacement and to travel to England on 4 February 1975.

381 However, prior to Mr Wallace's move to England the MoD was informed that Mr Wallace was believed to be in contact with Robert Fisk, and to have promised significant information to him. The Security Service provided the Inquiry with a gist summarising the contents of the material that became available.

273 KIN 102026.

> "In January 1975 reliable information obtained by the Security Service in the course of a leak inquiry indicated that Colin Wallace intended to remain in contact with the journalist Robert Fisk after Wallace's departure from Northern Ireland, and that he promised to provide Fisk with a significant news story."[274]

The Inquiry has examined the documents to which the gist relates and is satisfied that the gist is a correct statement of the content of those documents.

382 In his 9 September 2016 letter to the Inquiry Mr Wallace confirmed the accuracy of that information when he stated:

> "It is correct that I was going to release a sensational story to Robert Fisk. Indeed, I did release it as part of "Clockwork Orange" and with the full agreement of my superiors. It was probably the last piece of Psy Ops work I did before leaving Northern Ireland and involved demonstrating not only how the IRA obtained arms and money from the USA, but also some business people and organisation in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic, who were involved."[275]

We examine his reference to Clockwork Orange later.

383 In the previous paragraph of his letter, Mr Wallace made the following points.

> "Setting aside that fact that my role was to "leak" information to the press, neither MIS [sic] nor any of my superiors ever questioned me about such an allegation. Moreover, if I had been guilty of such an activity, it is simply not credible that I would have been permitted to retain my security clearance and be offered a post at the same rank in another Army HQ in England."

384 The events that we have described relating to the leak Inquiry make it very clear why Mr Wallace was not questioned by MI5 or his superiors. To have done so would have revealed to him the nature and extent of their concerns and that was something they understandably did not wish to do. The action they took was to permit him to retain his security clearance by offering him a post at the same rank at Preston as part of a process designed to avoid him suspecting that the real reason for his posting was because he was suspected of leaking information to Robert Fisk. The true reasons for moving Mr Wallace to Preston could not be explained to him, and so it was necessary to provide him with reasons for the move which were misleading and so untrue.

274 KIN 4213.
275 KIN 124669.

385 There was strong circumstantial evidence that it was Mr Wallace who was providing Robert Fisk with at least some material which the Army understandably believed to be damaging, and was intending to pass further information to Robert Fisk. As he now admits, he also intended to provide Mr Fisk with "a sensational story" before he went to Preston and this related to the events surrounding his arrest to which we now turn. Subsequently he admitted to Mr Groves that he had supplied Robert Fisk with information about helicopter spares.[276]

Mr Wallace's arrest

386 In preparation for his move to Preston, arrangements were made for Mr Wallace to hand over all documents to his successor. On the evening of 4 February 1975 Mr Wallace left Lisburn to travel by boat to take up his position in Preston. At some stage during the day before he left for the boat he left HQNI and drove to 6 Harry's Road, Hillsborough, where he expected to find Robert Fisk. Mr Fisk was not there. Mr Wallace then put a bundle of papers (referred to hereafter as "the document") through the door and left for the boat. 6 Harry's Road was the home of Prof Green, with whom Robert Fisk had been staying for some time. Prof Green was away that weekend, and his next door neighbour's wife looked after the house for him and kept it clean. She told the police that on the afternoon of Tuesday 4 February 1975 she went to number 6 intending to tidy but found that some papers were blocking the door. She had to move the papers to open the door and when she lifted them she saw "Restricted" on every page, and references to the IRA. She was alarmed and took the papers next door to her house and showed them to her husband when he returned from work later that afternoon. He was an RUC Constable and he immediately alerted his superiors. An investigation was immediately set in train and the form it took was described by SB 11 in an interim report he prepared on 10 February 1975.[277]

276 KIN 102033.
277 KIN 50963-50964.

387 The next day police went to 6 Harry's Road and spoke to Mr Fisk. He was shown the document and denied having any knowledge of it or who had left it there. He was not prepared to make a statement to the police without the advice of his editor and of his newspaper's legal department. It seems that Mr Fisk went to Dublin believing that the house would be searched, having gathered up all his papers, including restricted documents, and putting them in his car. That at least was the account he gave to Mr Gilliland, the Chief Information Officer of the NIO.[278]

388 On 5 February 1975 SB 11 was flown to Preston where he briefed SB 12 of Lancashire County Constabulary Special Branch. On 6 February 1975 both officers were given background information on Mr Wallace by an MI5 Officer. SB 11 and SB 12 then questioned Mr Wallace who made a written statement under caution (the first statement). In the first statement he admitted going to 6 Harry's Road on 4 February but strenuously denied leaving any documents at the house.[279]

389 On 11 February 1975 Mr Wallace was in London and asked to see Mr Groves, the Chief of Public Relations at the MoD. When Mr Wallace saw Mr Groves, he told Mr Groves that he had in fact delivered the document to the house for Fisk. Mr Groves advised him to tell the police the truth at the earliest opportunity. Mr Wallace said initially that the document was not "Classified", but when Mr Groves pointed out that it was "Restricted", Mr Wallace agreed that was a classification. When he was asked why he denied putting the document through the letter-box when he was interviewed by the police, Mr Wallace replied,

> "One of the policemen who interviewed me in Lancashire was an RUC Officer. I did not feel that I should reveal to the RUC information about the Army's information policy activities".

390 Mr Groves also told him that he would have to inform the Permanent Under Secretary, to which he noted Mr Wallace as replying,

> "I understand. I have not given Fiske [sic] any other classified document. I did tell him about the shortage of spares for helicopters in Northern Ireland."[280]

278 KIN 50933.
279 KIN 50949-50950.
280 KIN 100121.

391 On 12 February 1975 Mr Wallace was again questioned by SB 11 and SB 12 and made a further statement (the second statement). In the second statement he started by saying that he wished to clear up one or two points following the previous interview, saying he,

> "was not at liberty to give you the full facts of the matter because of security implications".[281]

392 Mr Wallace explained in the second statement that he had decided to give the document to Fisk in an effort to demonstrate,

> "that the Army was not involved in Black Propaganda activities".

He concluded by saying,

> "My handling of this incident may seem irregular, however, in the course of my job I frequently had to adopt unconventional methods to influence the press or plant stories in support of Security Forces activities. I have never given classified information or documents to any journalist except with prior clearance."[282]

393 On 12 March 1975 Mr Wallace was again interviewed by RUC officers and proceeded to explain in considerable detail how he said the Army did engage in black propaganda. He said he had two jobs.

> "I had two jobs – my official one as Head of Productions for Public Relations, HQ, Northern Ireland, was my white or front job. My second job was unattributable briefing and psychological warfare known as Psyops. This was my black job."

394 One of the things he described was getting a Republican paper or leaflet "and we would then produce a doctored version which we then distributed in republican areas and also in overseas areas especially in communist countries and America".[283]

395 At this point we observe that not only did Mr Wallace lie to the police in the first statement, but by his own account he was saying in the second statement that he was attempting to deceive Robert Fisk in to believing that the Army did not in fact engage in black propaganda when according to Mr Wallace, that was what part of his job involved.

281 KIN 50951.
282 KIN 50953.
283 KIN 51016.

PART ELEVEN

The decision to dismiss Mr Wallace

396 The document which Mr Wallace put through the letter-box at 6 Harry's Road was the text of an IP/PR Presentation prepared for what was described on the front as the "CLF's Study Day 31 Jan 1975". The full document can be found at KIN 102035 to 102064. It contained a detailed explanation of the Army's approach to taking what it described as "the propaganda initiative".[284]

397 The RUC Report to the DPP on their investigations dated 19 March 1975 contained the following observation from the Chief Superintendent who forwarded the report.

> "Although the official Army view is that the actions of Wallace in relation to the document in question was [sic] totally wrong and would never have been approved by them, nevertheless, the investigation officers whilst speaking to Lt.-Col Railton, General Staff Officer, Information and Planning, HQ, NI, gained the impression that he was of the opinion Wallace's actions were more an error of judgement than criminal."[285]

Lt Col Railton was Wallace's superior and if that was a correct assessment of his view by the RUC, that view was certainly not shared by more senior officers. It is a measure of the importance that the Army attached to this whole matter that the CGS – the Chief of the General Staff and therefore the professional head of the Army – wrote to the Permanent Under Secretary of the MoD about this on 25 February 1975. The relevant portions of the CGS's minute are as follows.

> "3 Because of its specialised purpose and limited audience it is, emphatically, not the kind of document which anybody would wish to see communicated to the press – any more than a minister would want to see reported, say, an informal debrief to his senior officials of an exchange with his colleagues, or I would my obiter dicta in the Chiefs of Staff Committee or ECAB or you would your franker asides at one of your weekly meetings with your own senior staff.
>
> 4 To my mind the facts [sic] that Wallace should have selected a document of this kind for disclosure to a journalist adds a new dimension to his culpability. Straightforward unauthorised disclosure is quite bad enough. But to lift a script of a colleague's remarks on a privileged occasion is worse, to the extent that it superimposes [on] an official impropriety a total lack of the human qualities of trustworthiness and discretion upon which relationships between colleagues depend.

284 KIN 102035.
285 KIN 50971.

5 With Frank King [the GOCNI] I feel strongly that, if the evidence is sufficient, Wallace should be prosecuted. However this turns out to be it is obvious that behaviour of this kind makes him an entirely impossible colleague in any environment, official or other."[286]

398 When their investigations were complete, the RUC submitted their report to the Director of Public Prosecutions in Northern Ireland. As the offences being investigated may have been committed under the Official Secrets Act the consent of the Attorney General was required to any prosecution and the papers were passed to him. On 14 May 1975 his office informed the DPP that the Attorney General would not consent to a prosecution.

"The Attorney General is of the opinion that the interim report discloses clear evidence of an offence under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. Both the Attorney General and its predecessors have felt it proper, in exercising their discretion on the granting of a consent to a prosecution under section 2, to take account of the circumstances of the offence, the nature of the document or information which has been disclosed, and the balance of public interest. Further, the Attorney General has in mind the recommendation of the Franks Committee in this regard. Having considered these factors, including the probability that the public interest might be better served by disciplinary proceedings than by a prosecution, the Attorney General has decided that he would not consent to a prosecution in the present case."[287]

The DPP then issued a direction to the RUC that there should be no prosecution.

399 This decision formally cleared the way for Mr Wallace to be dealt with administratively. On 30 April 1975 Sir Michael Cary, the Permanent Under Secretary of the Ministry of Defence, wrote to his Secretary of

286 KIN 102034.
287 KIN 100189.

State that the Attorney General felt legal action was inappropriate, and in any event unlikely to succeed. The Attorney General felt that the appropriate course would be for departmental disciplinary action to be taken against Mr Wallace.[288] The agreement of the Secretary of State was transmitted on 9 May 1975.[289]

400 With the submission to the Secretary of State of 30 April 1975 was sent Annex B, a list of what were described as "Examples of Information Policy Activities of the Army Information Service known to Colin Wallace". Six episodes were described, one of which was "The Clockwork Orange".[290] We return to Clockwork Orange later.

401 By this time Ian Cameron had prepared the very detailed Damage Assessment to which we have already referred. Its full title was:

> "Damage assessment on disclosures of information policy made by Mr Colin Wallace following his suspension from duty in December of 1974."[291]

The Inquiry has examined the full text of the Damage Assessment. The Damage Assessment also referred to various incidents involving Mr Wallace. At KIN 190198 Ian Cameron set out in some detail under the heading "Assessment of the Extent of Wallace's Discretion" a number of factors he considered relevant. He concluded:

> There can be no doubt that, whatever his motive for doing so, Wallace in passing a classified document to Fisk without prior authority, must have been aware that he was exceeding his discretion, was breaching a departmental ground rule, and was in contravention of his security regulation. Moreover, what he passed was not the kind of document which would in any circumstances be released to the media."[292]

That succinctly summarised the view of the officials who considered Mr Wallace's conduct.

402 We have considered these events in some detail because of the allegation Mr Wallace has made that he was removed from Northern Ireland because of what he knew about Kincora. Nowhere in any of the documents or correspondence connected to the circumstances leading

288 KIN 102065.
289 KIN 102071.
290 KIN 102070.
291 KIN 190191.
292 KIN 190198.

up to Mr Wallace's transfer to Preston, nor in the police investigation, nor in Annex B or in the episodes considered in Ian Cameron's damage assessment, is there any reference whatever, either direct or indirect, to McGrath, Kincora or to the sexual abuse of children. There is nothing to support Mr Wallace's allegation that he was removed from Northern Ireland because of his knowledge of, and actions in respect of, Kincora. The overwhelming evidence is that he was transferred to Preston and then arrested and ultimately dismissed because there was concern at the very highest levels that Mr Wallace was engaged in leaking important information and classified documents to journalists and to Robert Fisk in particular. He was believed to have behaved in a completely improper manner by doing so, and, whatever latitude he had been given, or had been able to exercise, he had behaved in a manner that meant he could no longer be regarded as a trustworthy employee of the Ministry of Defence. We have no doubt whatever that his dismissal was for those reasons and those reasons only.

Colin Wallace and the CSAB

403 Following the decision by the Attorney General, Mr Wallace was served with four disciplinary charges, and in accordance with Civil Service procedure was given the opportunity to make representations to Mr Groves. This occurred on 30 May 1975 (and not 10 May as mistakenly stated on the summary note). Afterwards Mr Wallace was provided with a copy, to which he made a number of amendments on 5 June 1975. The amendments were accepted by Mr Groves. Mr Wallace also provided an additional short statement. The note and other documents are to be found at KIN 102075 to 102084.

404 Given the outcome of his subsequent appeal to the CSAB and what was disclosed about the approach by the MoD to the Chairman, and then the deputy Chairman, of the CSAB before the hearing of Mr Wallace's appeal actually took place, it is unnecessary to examine the details of what Mr Wallace said on 30 May 1975. The following points are sufficient.

1 He accepted that the document he left for Robert Fisk was a classified document. He said he did so to safeguard IP Operations.[293]

293 KIN 102077.

2 He accepted that he had untruthfully told the RUC that the last time he had seen the document it had been in his in-tray.[294]

3 Any information he gave to Robert Fisk was on the basis that it would be "treated as 'off the record' or in specific parts, 'unattributable'".[295]

4 On 25 June 1975 he was informed that two of the four charges against him had been proved and he was to be dismissed from his employment in the Civil Service.

> "I regret that I have to inform you that the first two charges against you – namely the unauthorised retention of a classified document and the improper passing of it to a person not authorised to have access to it - have been held to be proved. A most serious view is taken of these breaches of trust by an officer in the position which you held. It has accordingly been decided that you should be dismissed from your employment in the Civil Service."[296]

He was told that it had been decided to take no action on the third and fourth charges and was informed of his right to appeal to the Civil Service Appeal Board (CSAB). In the interim he was suspended without pay from 1 July 1975.

405 Mr Wallace exercised his right of appeal, and after a hearing on 17 October 1975 the CSAB upheld the dismissal, but recommended that,

> "…having regard to his previous good record of service, if Mr Wallace wishes to offer his resignation we recommend that the Department should accept this as an alternative to dismissal."[297]

The MoD and Mr Wallace accepted the suggestion, and on 27 November 1975 he resigned with effect from 31 December 1975.

406 A number of aspects of the CSAB proceedings require comment. The first is that the MoD approached the Chairman of the CSAB before the hearing, and secretly briefed him about the background of the dismissal. The first stage in the process of briefing the Chairman occurred on 3 July 1975 when the Permanent Under Secretary of the MoD spoke to the

294 KIN 102078.
295 KIN 102084.
296 KIN 102085.
297 KIN 102113.

Chairman and sounded him out as to whether he, Sir John (Jock) Shaw, would find it useful to be briefed about the general background to the case. Writing to the Director General of MI5 the next day, Sir Michael Cary said that in anticipation of the appeal to the CSAB

> "...I had a strictly private and personal word yesterday with Jock Shaw, the Chairman of the Civil Service Appeals Board. I started out by: > a) Rehearsing the charges against Wallace.
>
>
> b) Outlining in the most general terms the Wallace's connection with "information policy" in Northern Ireland.
>
> c) Explaining that both the circumstances and the nature of the man made it possible that the hearing would be attended by damaging publicity.
>
> I went on to say that I had asked Jock for this meeting for two reasons. First, while we had no wish to embarrass him by pressing on him information which did not relate strictly to the charges and would not be used in "Open Court", the fact was that, as he no doubt realised, the formal charge was merely the tip of the iceberg and, if you would find it useful, I would be prepared to consider arranging for him to have a briefing on the general background to the case. I added that the decision was not up to me since other departments, such as the NIO, were involved but that if he were interested I would see what could be done."[298]

407 Sir Michael suggested to the Permanent Under Secretary of the NIO and to the Director General of the Security Service that a dossier of key documents would be put together and presented to the Chairman to read. Mr Shaw agreed to this proposal.[299]

408 Sir Michael Cary described this approach as "somewhat unorthodox", but it is clear from his letter of 4 July that the Chairman did not object to the approach.

409 On 23 July 1975 Sir Michael wrote to Sir Frank Cooper of the NIO, copying the letter to the Director General of the Security Service to confirm that the briefing had taken place. He said

> "Shaw departed saying that he had been convinced, particularly by the [redacted], that the Department's decision was fully justified."[300]

298 KIN 102087 and 102088.
299 KIN 102088 and 102089.
300 KIN 102093.

410 In the event, Mr Shaw was unable to preside at the hearing of the Civil Service Appeal Board, and Sir Leslie Williams, the Deputy Chairman of the CSAB, sat in his place. It is clear that Sir Leslie Williams had been informed of the briefing which Mr Shaw had received, presumably by Mr Shaw, and on 4 October 1975 he requested a similar briefing.[301] That briefing was given. On 12 December 1989 the Secretary of State for Defence explained to the Prime Minister that:

> "The CSAB Chairman was briefed privately, and shown evidence, that Mr Wallace was likely to have been responsible for other more serious leaks, which were never put to Mr Wallace; and it appears that he told his two fellow Assessors that he was aware of additional sensitive material but that he would not tell them what it was. So this evidence was in the minds of the Appeal Board but was not put openly to them in a way which would have given Mr Wallace an opportunity to offer a defence."[302]

411 We consider that the fact that National Security was involved did not excuse the approach that was taken. Courts and other quasi-judicial bodies have in more recent times developed procedures to deal with the difficult issues that can arise when dealing with sensitive information. For example, special advocates can now be appointed in certain circumstances. Such procedures did not exist at that time. As a later chairman of the CSAB confirmed, it had no power to hear information in camera. At the time the MoD faced a stark choice, either to reveal more information to the CSAB and to Mr Wallace, with the attendent risk that this information may be more widely disseminated, or to take the risk that the CSAB would find in Mr Wallace's favour. In that case he would presumably have been entitled to some form of remedy, such as being reinstated completely, or subject to some form of penalty such as demotion or other financial penalty, or to compensation if he were not reinstated. The Ministry of Defence chose to rest its case on a narrow basis, but to avoid the risk of losing decided to secretly brief the Chairman in order to influence the outcome of the case and so increase the prospect of a successful outcome from the point of view of the Ministry of Defence.

301 KIN 102105.
302 KIN 104008 and 104009.

412 What happened in this instance was that the processes of the Board were deliberately interfered with by the Ministry of Defence in order to ensure that the outcome of Mr Wallace's appeal was unsuccessful. We criticise all of those involved in what occurred in the strongest terms. Mr Wallace's observation in his letter to the Inquiry of 9 September 2016 that the outcome of the Inquiry was "rigged" was entirely justified.[303]

The job specification

413 Mr Wallace has been, and remains, intensely aggrieved that his full job description was not produced by the MoD at the CSAB hearing, and that the Ministry of Defence did not concede at the time, or for a considerable number of years subsequently, that he was engaged in "black" operations. For many years the MoD asserted that his job description did not include such activities.

414 In his letter to the Inquiry of 9 September 2016 Mr Wallace asserted that the real job description was approximately four or five pages in length, was shown to him in draft by Peter Broderick, and shown to him again after it had been approved and his promotion ratified. He says that there were several copies of his "secret" job description available in 1974 and suggests that it is "...very strange that my job description has apparently not been made available to the Inquiry".[304]

415 We understand the MoD position to be that whilst there was a revised job specification, it existed only in draft form, although Mr Wallace almost certainly knew,

> "...at least in general terms, the thrust of the wording of the draft covert job description, [but] probably did not see the exact wording and almost certainly was not issued with formal written Terms of Reference concerning his covert duties."[305]

On 12 December 1989 the Secretary of State for Defence explained that matter to the Prime Minister in the following terms.

> "[Wallace] had no formal directive of that kind, so far as can be seen. But such a job specification was drafted... to justify the establishment of his post and it is reasonable to assume that Mr Wallace was told what it contained, even though it was never endorsed at Ministerial level. MoD did not contest Mr Wallace's evidence that such a job specification had been prepared; but nor did MoD acknowledge it or make a copy available."[306]

303 KIN 124640.
304 KIN 124642.
305 KIN 102918.

416 We understand why Mr Wallace continues to attach such importance to the question why his job description was not revealed to the CSAB by the MoD, and the denials for many years that there was a revised job specification, or that Mr Wallace was engaged in "black" operations. However, we consider the job specification issue to be of peripheral relevance to what Mr Wallace did or did not know about Kincora, and when he knew what he did know. At the CSAB hearing Mr Wallace's representatives explained in some detail to the Board, although in somewhat general terms, what Mr Wallace did. The passages from Mr Broderick's statements to the CSAB on Mr Wallace's behalf which we have already quoted supported the general thrust of Mr Wallace's argument.

417 We have taken what Mr Wallace has said about the job specification, and the approach to it by the MoD over the years, into account because on one view it may be said to support the wider case which Mr Wallace makes, which is that the MoD, MI5 and the Government as a whole have lied about what he did. We have taken all of this into account when examining all the material the Inquiry has obtained, and assessing the various points made by the Government through the various non-devolved departments and agencies which have been core participants in the Kincora Module.

418 When considering what Mr Wallace did or did not know about Kincora, and what he did with whatever knowledge he had, in 1974 and 1975 we took into account that he did not mention Kincora to Mr Groves at the MoD, nor did he mention it to the RUC when describing what Mr Wallace clearly regarded as the significant matters he was engaged in before his arrest, nor did he refer to it in any of the materials placed before the CSAB by him or on his behalf.

419 We examined a very large number of contemporary documents from 1974 and 1975 relating to Mr Wallace and his dismissal. As can be seen from the documents to which we have referred, and the other documents examined which have come from the MoD, the NIO, and MI5 which relate to Kincora, and in which, if Mr Wallace had the knowledge of Kincora that he has claimed, we would expect to find some reference, however slight or indirect, to two matters that Mr Wallace says were of importance. These are Kincora and Clockwork Orange. So far as Kincora is concerned, we found no such material.

306 KIN 104008.

420 Following the first statement Mr Wallace made to SB 12 and SB 11 on 6 February 1975, and his second statement to SB 12 on 12 February 1975, Mr Wallace was interviewed a third time. On this occasion it was by SB 11 and SB 13 of the RUC at Preston on 12 March 1975. No written statement was taken on that occasion, but notes were made of the questions and the answers. We have already referred to some of what Mr Wallace said about his operations. We should point out that the note of that interview is erroneously dated 12 February 1975, when it should be 12 March 1975. That is clear from the report submitted to the DPP on 19 March 1975 by a Chief Superintendent.[307] The notes of that interview contain no reference to Tara, McGrath, Kincora or abuse of children.[308]

421 The only document Mr Wallace has put forward which he says were contemporary documents created by him are the 8 November 1974 document and a reference in a letter dated 29 September 1975, which he says he sent to Cliff Crook of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants who represented him before the CSAB.[309] We examine both of these documents later.

422 Annex B of the paper submitted to the Secretary of State listed six "Examples of Information Policy Activities of the Army Information Service known to Mr Wallace". Whilst one of these referred to Clockwork Orange, none referred to Kincora in any way.[310]

423 The Damage Assessment prepared by Ian Cameron after Mr Wallace's arrest, to which we have already referred, catalogued "Wallace's IP Activities" over some six pages. Ian Cameron observed that

> "...Grounds for embarrassment are certainly present but their significance and the extent of the potential damage involved will very much depend upon the nature and scope of what was in fact undertaken with Wallace's knowledge and what, in his particular circumstances, he would wish to disclose."[311]

307 KIN 100070.
308 KIN 51016-51019.
309 KIN 124726.
310 KIN 102070.
311 KIN 190200.

424 The Ministry of Defence subsequently agreed to provide the entire Damage Assessment in unredacted form and this will be placed on the Inquiry website in due course. The Inquiry has examined the full text of the original document, and considered the various matters described in it. There is no reference in those documents to Tara, Kincora, McGrath or the sexual abuse of children in Kincora. If there was any such knowledge on the part of MI5, the MoD or the NIO of Wallace's 8 November 1974 document at that time, we can see no reason why Ian Cameron would not have referred to it. That he did not refer to it suggests that either Ian Cameron was unaware of it, or that the 8 November 1974 document did not exist at that time. Another explanation could be that Ian Cameron felt that it was too damaging to even admit in the document that Mr Wallace had completed the 8 November 1974 document. Given that Mr Cameron did refer to Clockwork Orange, we consider it most unlikely that he would have omitted any reference to the 8 November 1974 document, or to Kincora and sexual abuse had he known of these matters.

Clockwork Orange

425 Mr Wallace has consistently placed great emphasis on the refusal by the MoD for many years to acknowledge the existence of Clockwork Orange until it admitted in 1990 that there was such a project. He relies on this denial to support his assertion that the MoD, MI5 and the Government misled Parliament and have misled this Inquiry. We have taken these arguments into account when considering Clockwork Orange, and when we assess the significance of the documents we have examined and the submissions on behalf of the non-devolved core participants.

426 When Mr Holroyd produced the GC80 document to Essex Police in August 1984 he told Essex Police that Mr Wallace sent the document "to an MI5 Officer at HQ Northern Ireland office".[312] If Mr Holroyd did say this, that information must have come from Mr Wallace, yet, as we shall see, Mr Wallace has said he did not know who received the GC80 document once it was submitted. If an MI5 Officer was the recipient, there is no record or evidence to support that. If the MI5 Officer was Ian Cameron it is surprising that he did not refer to it in his Damage Assessment because in that he referred to other matters that could cause embarrassment to the Government.

312 KIN 51074.

427 In the Damage Assessment at paragraph 56 Ian Cameron referred to Clockwork Orange.

> "56 This was the title of a project involving the 'planting' of an account of the organisation and activities of the PIRA purporting to have been written by a PIRA deserter. It was not in fact issued but it is of interest in at least two respects. It is a fair measure of Wallace's competence in the IP field and his encyclopaedic knowledge of the subversive scene in Northern Ireland. It also demonstrates Wallace's determination – with whatever intention – to take an independent line even to the point of disobeying instructions. Although, in this instance, he had been instructed not to proceed he nevertheless addressed a catchment letter in the form of a forgery to Gerard Kemp of the Daily Telegraph whose response entailed the CIO attending a meeting with Kemp in the Europa Hotel. Despite the embargo on premature action Wallace nevertheless – in advance of clearance – again acted independently by offering a story to another correspondent and in doing so enlisted the services of an NCO in the AIS. For a variety of reasons the project has not been cleared."[313]

428 We have already referred to the letter of the Secretary of State for Defence to the Prime Minister in December 1989 relating to Clockwork Orange, and to the CSAB Hearing. The Government recognised that it was necessary to correct what had been said in the past about Clockwork Orange, and a statement was made to the House of Commons on 30 January 1990 explaining what had happened.[314]

429 An internal investigation into how it was that the Clockwork Orange document had been overlooked was carried out by Mr Heyhoe, a Senior Official in the Ministry of Defence. His report can be found at KIN 103315 and following. The nub of Mr Heyhoe's conclusion was that so far as Clockwork Orange was concerned:

> "(e) When the case next came to light in 1982 it was in the different context of Inquiries over Kincora, subsequently, "Clockwork Orange" emerged by name in 1984. Neither of these subjects appeared to play any part in Mr Wallace's disciplinary proceedings in 1975.

313 KIN 190205.
314 KIN 124850-124852.

(f) The result of these developments was to leave General Staff Secretariat, an extremely busy operational division supporting the Army, to deal with a difficult personal case on a basis of incomplete records and a total discontinuity of collective memory.

(g) All this took place against a background of more than ten years' individual and organisational change inevitable in a large and complex Department of State."[315]

430 The Inquiry has examined the Heyhoe Report and the papers associated with it, including the statements from the various officials who were involved with the documents, and we see no reason to disagree with Mr Heyhoe's conclusion, that with the passage of time, changes in personnel and organisation resulting in a break in collective memory, meant that the Clockwork Orange documents were genuinely overlooked.[316] As a result, incomplete information was given to Government and on the basis of that incomplete and inaccurate information the Government took a stance on Clockwork Orange which it is now clear was unjustified. The Ministry of Defence accepted that in the statement to the House of Commons on 30 January 1990.

431 A further aspect of the Clockwork Orange matter that may be of some relevance to Kincora is whether Mr Wallace's account of his involvement in Clockwork Orange has been consistent over the years. In Paul Foot's Who Framed Colin Wallace? at page 113 he describes how he became disenchanted with Clockwork Orange.

> "One afternoon early in October [1974] I saw "John Shaw" from MI5. I sat having a quiet drink with him at the White Gables Hotel, near Hillsborough. At one stage, I told him I didn't want to go any further with Clockwork Orange without political clearance. He seemed surprised and suggested that I already had clearance. But I made it clear I wanted some proof that the whole programme had been seen and approved by a Minister.
>
> Of course I was pretty certain that 'Shaw' couldn't get a ministerial clearance for Clockwork Orange. I was pretty sure that no minister had a clue that Clockwork Orange even existed. But I knew I couldn't go on doing it, and I wanted to get on with other things."[317]

315 KIN 103319.
316 KIN 103315-103320.
317 KIN 5189.

432 At page 147 there is a similar assertion[318] and at page 158[319] it is stated that:

> "Colin felt, however, that after his refusal to do any more for Clockwork Orange and his testy memorandum about Tara and the boys' home in Belfast, a powerful effort was being made by MI5 to take charge of Psyops and to push him to one side in the process."

433 We are satisfied that the proper inference to draw from these passages is that Mr Wallace did no more work on Clockwork Orange after October 1974. However, he told Mr Groves on 30 May 1975 that he still had six briefings for the press to do after he left Northern Ireland, and in his letter to the Inquiry of 17 October 2016 he said that he was still engaged on that work.[320]

434 We consider there to be a significant inconsistency between the account of his involvement in Clockwork Orange contained in Who Framed Colin Wallace? and his accounts to Mr Groves in 1975 and to the Inquiry in October 2016.

The 1975 phone call to Social Services

435 Mr Wallace has asserted that in 1975 he made a phone call about Kincora to Social Services in Belfast. No trace of any such call has ever been found. In his recent communications with the Inquiry Mr Wallace has not volunteered any information that might assist the Inquiry in establishing whether or not such a phone call was made.

318 KIN 5206.
319 KIN 5212.
320 KIN 124812.

PART TWELVE

Mr Wallace and Kincora between 1976 and 1980

436 Mr Wallace married in 1975, and by December 1975 was living in London. On 10 December 1975 he wrote to Mr Groves thanking him

> "...for all your kindness and understanding during my recent problems. My apologies for all the embarrassment caused to you and your staff, I hope the matter now dies.
>
> Naturally I feel very bitter at the whole episode but I realise that to contest the outcome any further would not be in anyone's interest."[321]

Despite Mr Wallace's hope that "the matter now dies", from the beginning of 1976 until his arrest in 1980 for the murder of Jonathan Lewis Mr Wallace devoted considerable time and energy to pursuing various matters relating to his time in Northern Ireland in various quarters.

437 At the beginning of 1976 Mr Wallace found it hard to find a suitable post. When he applied for posts in Government departments or in public bodies the Ministry of Defence response was to give favourable comments on his duties and to give the reason for the termination of his appointment as "resignation by mutual agreement following a breach of discipline." Whilst Mr Wallace resented this, and clearly it made it very difficult for him to obtain positions in the public sector, the Ministry of Defence understandably felt that they could not recommend him for appointments in other departments. Given the circumstances leading up to his dismissal that attitude was justified. Later in 1976 Mr Wallace was appointed to the post of Information Liaison Officer with Arun District Council in West Sussex, and he and his wife moved to Arundel.

438 Between 1976 and 1980 Mr Wallace did not confine himself to his duties with the Council. Before and after his appointment he wrote to, or spoke to, many different individuals about matters relating to his dismissal and his activities in Northern Ireland. We examined the material held by the non-devolved departments and agencies, and the material sent to the Inquiry by Mr Wallace, to see whether there was anything to suggest that during this period Mr Wallace repeated the allegations contained in the 8 November 1974 document.

321 KIN 102115.

439 Early in 1976 when Mr Wallace was living in London and attempting to find employment, he approached his constituency MP, the Labour MP Roland Moyle, who at that time was a Junior Minister in the Northern Ireland Office. It appears that at that time the concerns which Mr Wallace made known to Mr Moyle related to his safety, and whether Mr Wallace could put his case about his dismissal to the Secretary of State for Defence. Mr Moyle discussed Mr Wallace's concerns with the NIO on 6 May 1976[322] and later that month.[323] The records relating to both meetings do not suggest that Mr Wallace had raised either Kincora or Clockwork Orange with Mr Moyle.

440 On 18 July 1976 Mr and Mrs Wallace paid a social visit to Mr Broderick, who was by that time working in the Department of the Environment in London. Mr Broderick described the conversation in a letter he wrote the next day to the Ministry of Defence. He recorded that Mr Wallace was considering appealing to an industrial tribunal against the CSAB decision, and identified what he described as two "grievances" held by Mr Wallace at the time. One was about the terms of his reference from the Ministry of Defence, which he felt made it very difficult for him to get a new job. The other was that Mr Wallace believed that he was being blamed "for the Army's past misdeeds", presumably meaning the Army's activities in the area of Black Propaganda. There is no reference to Mr Wallace raising Kincora or Clockwork Orange with Mr Broderick.

441 Mr Broderick's comments on Mr Wallace's behaviour at that time are revealing, particularly as Mr Broderick had spoken so strongly on Mr Wallace's behalf at the CSAB hearing.

> "I thought you ought to know that he is still, in my opinion, unable to separate fact from fiction".[324]
>
> "Wallace is just not acting rationally or responsibly."[325]

442 Mr Wallace's contacts with the Labour Government during these years were not just with Mr Moyle. In 1977 he wrote to the former Labour Prime Minister Harold Wilson MP to assure Mr Wilson that Mr Wilson's fears when he was Prime Minister that he was the subject of attempts by MI5 to discredit him were well founded. In Who Framed Colin Wallace?

322 KIN 102117.
323 KIN 105304.
324 KIN 102121.
325 KIN 102122.

page 179,[326] it is stated that he (Wallace) and Information Policy had disseminated information hostile to the Government and its Ministers. He gave "tasty examples" from the Clockwork Orange material, and asked for an interview in which he could put the whole story. It appears from this account that his request was turned down. We note that no suggestion was made at that time that Mr Wallace referred to Kincora or the 8 November 1974 document.

443 Mr Wallace did not confine his contacts to members of the then Labour Government, because he was in contact at that time with Airey Neave MP, at the time a Conservative Party opposition MP. Pages 172 and 173 of Who Framed Colin Wallace? describe the contacts between Mr Wallace and Mr Neave in 1976 during which

> "Colin happily supplied the MP with much of the information he had gleaned during his compilation of the material for Clockwork Orange".[327]

444 During these years Mr Wallace continued his contact with journalists. At page 174 of Who Framed Colin Wallace? there is a description of a newspaper article that Mr Wallace wrote for the Daily Telegraph on 26 October 1976 "based on the Clockwork Orange document", for which he was paid £70. Paul Foot wrote:

> "That £70 was the only tangible advantage which Colin got from his brief association with Airey Neave. He had hoped through the association to raise once more his treatment at the hands of the Ministry of Defence. Airey Neave listened sympathetically to his story, but did nothing to help."[328]

445 Mr Wallace's contacts with the press between 1976 and 1980 were not limited to this article for the Daily Telegraph. One of the journalists to whom he spoke in 1977 was David Blundy of the Sunday Times. David Blundy and Mr Wallace met on several occasions in 1976 and 1977 according to Who Framed Colin Wallace? They collaborated on a front-page article on 13 March 1977 headlined "The Army's secret war" which claimed the material came from "our sources", the chief of whom, according to page 175 of Who Framed Colin Wallace? "was Colin Wallace".[329]

326 KIN 5222.
327 Page 173 of the book, KIN 5219.
328 KIN 5220.
329 KIN 5220.

446 During an interview with the RUC on 10 December 1982 Mr Blundy told the police that Mr Wallace was one of his sources for a story he wrote about the abduction of Thomas Niedermeyer, the German Managing Director of the Grundig Factory on the outskirts of Belfast. Mr Niedermeyer was murdered by the IRA, and his body was not discovered for several years. During the December 1982 police interview Mr Blundy was asked about Kincora as can be seen from the following questions and answers.

> "Q: Did you or Wallace at any of the briefings or conversations ever mention Kincora?
>
> A: No, never.
>
> Q: Did anyone at any briefing mention Kincora?
>
> A: To my knowledge – not.
>
> Q: Was any mention made of homosexuality at any home in Northern Ireland?
>
> A: To my knowledge – no.
>
> Q: Did you have any knowledge of homosexuality in any children's home in Northern Ireland in 1973 – 1974 period?
>
> A: No."[330]

As Mr Blundy was clearly on good terms with Mr Wallace in 1976 and 1977, and received a lot of assistance from him, if Mr Wallace had the GC80 document and/or knowledge of abuse of residents in Kincora we believe he would have shared that information with Mr Blundy. He did not according to Mr Blundy.

447 After Mr Wallace was dismissed from the Army Information Service the Army believed that he was still in contact with other journalists as well as Mr Blundy to judge by a report from HQNI of 4 August 1977 which referred to Mr Blundy and Mr McKittrick of the Irish Times investigating stories on Black Propaganda and NUJ cards. The Army suspected that Mr Wallace was a source for some of the material in the press at the time.[331]

448 In June 1976 Lt Col Sillitoe made a complaint to the Press Council about the way in which The Times published part of a manuscript by Lt Col Sillitoe which was his private property, and which he intended to use for a book, and had deliberately misrepresented the document as a confidential Army memorandum. We do not consider it necessary to examine the contents of this letter in detail. It is sufficient to say that Lt Col Sillitoe repeatedly refers to having provided a copy of his manuscript to a person whom he describes as:

330 KIN 30075.
331 KIN 190167.

> "a civil servant and former colleague for help with research, and that I made it quite clear to him that the material I had sent was private and for publication in a book".[332]

449 It is clear from the letter that the "civil servant and former colleague" to whom Lt Col Sillitoe referred was Mr Wallace. Lt Col Sillitoe made it clear that he believed Mr Wallace passed the manuscript to Mr Fisk, despite Lt Col Sillitoe repeatedly asking Mr Wallace to return the document. Lt Col Sillitoe alleged that not only did Mr Wallace pass on the manuscript, before he did so Mr Wallace had caused the manuscript to be typed and represented as a "report".

> "If, at some later stage, he caused my manuscript to be typed and communicated to someone else as a 'report' he was acting improperly."[333]

The relevance of this matter to the Inquiry is that, if Lt Col Sillitoe's allegations about Mr Wallace were correct, it shows Mr Wallace had had no scruples about passing other material to Mr Fisk apart from the documents and material examined in the Security Service Leak Report, and was prepared to alter a document and represent it to be a 'report' when it was not. Lt Col Sillitoe's letter to the Press Council can be found at KIN 200502 to 200506.

450 Mr McKittrick made his statement to the RUC on 25 February 1982, in which he said,

> "In 1979 I interviewed Wallace extensively about Army Intelligence matters but Kincora or McGrath were never mentioned".[334]

As Mr McKittrick worked for the Irish Times he might well be the person to whom Mr Wallace referred in a letter from Lewes Prison to Mr Holroyd in which he wrote on 27 May 1984,

332 KIN 200503.
333 KIN 200503.
334 KIN 30079.

> "I am also fairly certain that a Dublin journalist asked me about you in 1979/80..."[335]

Whether or not the "Dublin journalist" was Mr McKittrick, this remark shows that Mr Wallace's contacts with journalists were not limited to those who worked for United Kingdom newspapers.

451 The same letter contains a reference to Mr Wallace's "discussions with a senior conservative MP in 1979 about another matter", Airey Neave MP was such a person and, as we have seen, Mr Wallace had considerable contact with Mr Neave in 1976.

452 In his letter to the Inquiry of 27 October 2016, Mr Wallace said that he had been told by a reporter, "...in 1976, a year after I left the MoD" that the reporter had recently been given a copy of the Folio Document by an official at the NIO.[336] Although this reporter is not named, it is a further indication of the number of contacts with journalists that Mr Wallace had after he left Northern Ireland after his dismissal.

453 As we have seen, Mr Wallace has claimed that he was moved from Northern Ireland to Preston because of what he knew about Kincora, and he has claimed that in 1974 he prepared the document dated 8 November 1974. He has claimed that he was aware from 1972 of allegations that residents in Kincora had been sexually abused, and that he was very concerned about what he was told. When considering the credibility of his accounts we consider it relevant to take into account whether Mr Wallace did anything to bring what he had been told, and the information he had gathered, about Kincora and the sexual abuse of residents there to light, and to bring to justice those who he had reason to believe from what he had been told had abused residents in Kincora, and thereby prevent further abuse as well. He claims he made a phone call to social services in 1975. There is no record of such a call. By his own account he was in contact with his Labour MP about his dismissal, and with Airey Neave MP about Clockwork Orange. He wrote to a former Prime Minister. He was in contact with several journalists.

454 There is no evidence to show that despite all of these contacts over several years he did anything to alert anyone to his concerns about Kincora, nor is there any evidence to corroborate his assertions as to what he did do.

335 KIN 51079.
336 KIN 124834.

455 If Mr Wallace had been concerned about the residents in Kincora during those years we consider it was his duty to give his information to the police. If, as a result of his experiences which led to his arrest and questioning by the police in 1975, he did not trust the RUC, we see no reason why he could not have given the information, and the 8 November 1974 document, to Mr Moyle MP, to Mr Neave MP, or to the various journalists with whom he was in frequent contact. All of the evidence shows that he did not do so.

Mr Wallace's arrest in 1980, conviction and imprisonment

456 The existence of the 8 November 1974 document did not become known until 1984. Before we examine the document, and how its existence became known to the police and others, it is necessary to place the issues relating to Kincora against the backdrop of Mr Wallace's circumstances from the summer of 1980 onwards. This is because for several years he was in prison. The reasons for his conviction, and the eventual quashing of his conviction, are not relevant to this Inquiry. Throughout his years in prison, much, but not all, of Mr Wallace's voluminous correspondence related to his efforts to establish his innocence and overturn his conviction. Many of the letters he sent during this time dealt with his conviction and his efforts to establish his innocence. They also refer to other matters such as the circumstances leading up to and relating to his dismissal, Clockwork Orange and Kincora. Whilst the Inquiry has examined all of Mr Wallace's correspondence to and from the Government ministers and officials, including two Prime Ministers, MPs, the Hughes Inquiry, and others held by the PSNI and the core participants in the Kincora module, only that which we considered touched directly or indirectly on Kincora is referred to in this portion of our Report.

457 As will be apparent, Mr Wallace was, and remains, an indefatigable correspondent whose letters contain a wealth of detail. Much of what is contained in the correspondence we have examined consists of repetition of the same arguments and references. Many of the documents to which he refers, such as newspaper articles, were of little assistance to the Inquiry. We have carefully considered all his correspondence, and the documents referred to therein. We only refer to those which, in our view, are of sufficient relevance to the issues we examine in this chapter.

458 The following dates in the 1980s and 1990s form part of the backdrop to the matters that we now examine.

6 August 1980	–	death of Jonathan Lewis at Arundel, West Sussex.
18 September 1980	–	Mr Wallace was charged with the murder of Jonathan Lewis.
20 March 1981	–	Mr Wallace was convicted of the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis and sentenced to 10 years imprisonment.
12 February 1982	–	Mr Wallace was refused leave to appeal (the first appeal)
5 December 1986	–	Mr Wallace was released from Lewes Prison on parole.
9 October 1996	–	Mr Wallace's conviction was quashed after the case was referred to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) by the Home Secretary, (the second appeal).[337]

459 Following Mr Wallace's arrest his house was searched by Sussex Police, and two notebooks were seized. These were later passed to the SIS.[338] One contained lists of individuals, most of whom were alleged to be members of Loyalist or Republican terrorist organisations, or organisations and publications which were believed to be sympathetic to such terrorist organisations. This volume can be described as containing information of a miscellaneous nature related to terrorist activity in Northern Ireland. The other volume contains miscellaneous entries relating to intelligence and political matters in both the United Kingdom and other countries. Many of the entries relate to notorious episodes of international terrorism at the time, such as the hijacking of an EL AL flight from Zurich to Tel Aviv in February 1969. While most of the notes in the second volume relate to matters predating Mr Wallace's departure from Northern Ireland, there are later entries, such as one relating to events in 1976.[339] The only significance of both documents and the information contained therein is that they show that Mr Wallace

337 KIN 122058-122070.
338 KIN 3515.
339 KIN 190114.

had long been in the habit of recording information in relation to political and security matters in which he had an interest. There is no reference to Kincora in either of these volumes.

460 The SIS officer who reviewed the notebooks commented that during the six years since Mr Wallace left his position with the AIS he had:

> "…demonstrated that he is mindful of the provisions of the [Official Secrets Act] and has not in fact publicised his knowledge of the Army's intelligence activities in Northern Ireland in the way that we feared he might."[340]

However, that comment has to be read in the light of what Mr Wallace says were his efforts during those years to interest Airey Neave MP and others in Clockwork Orange.

461 At some point while he was in prison Mr Wallace produced the extremely detailed 16-page document, parts of which we have already referred to, with the following title,

> "Political and security implications regarding the disclosure of security classified information to assist in the investigation of the allegations relating to the Kincora Boys' Hostel, Belfast".[341]

Despite the reference to "the investigation of the allegations relating to the Kincora Boys' Hostel, Belfast", a great deal of this document is devoted not to Kincora but to a very detailed statement of Mr Wallace's grievances about the events leading up to his arrest and dismissal, the CSAB hearing and Clockwork Orange 2. He described in considerable detail the nature of the work that he did in Northern Ireland, and we have already quoted from, and examined, parts of this document already when we considered Mr Wallace's account of how he was contacted by a social worker about her concerns relating to Kincora, and how he leaked Kincora information to journalists which no one used.

462 We consider it noteworthy that nowhere in this exceptionally detailed document dated March 1982, in which he developed in considerable detail how he came by the knowledge he claims to have had as early as 1972, did he make any reference to the existence of the 8 November 1974 document.

340 KIN 3514.
341 KIN 102798.

463 This was not the only opportunity Mr Wallace had about that time to disclose to others the existence of the 8 November 1974 document when he was informing newspapers and others about what he knew of the sexual abuse of children at Kincora and in Northern Ireland. On 22 March 1982 the News of the World carried an article about Mr Wallace by Iain Macaskill.

> "A convicted killer holds the key to a growing sex scandal involving top members of the Establishment.
>
> Colin Wallace, serving 10 years for manslaughter, is threatening to expose the guilty men. He says he knows the names of MPs, Lawyers, Civil Servants, Councillors and policemen involved."[342]

464 Later in the article under "Secret Papers" appears the following.

> "He [Mr Wallace] wants guarantees that he will be able to give a full account of what happened, the people involved, and refer to secret papers.
>
> Then he says, he is prepared to 'blow the lid' off the whole Kincora affair.
>
> Wallace has told friends that he saw the list at Army HQ in Lisburn. The names were on three foolscap sheets.
>
> The file is said to be made up of ten portraits of people involved and details of the roles they played.
>
> The list includes names of MPs who have visited Ulster before the scandal was first exposed two years ago.
>
> Senior Civil Servants seconded from London to Belfast are also named, plus local politicians who used the vice ring, or knew about it and took part in the cover-up".[343]

465 The "list" to which the article referred was described in the article in this passage.

> "Wallace has told friends of a secret list of 60 men in the homosexual vice ring centred on Kincora House, a school for deprived children in Belfast".[344]

342 KIN 50159.
343 KIN 50159.
344 KIN 30234.

466 This was not the only reference by Mr Wallace to seeing such a list. On 4 March 1984 Mr Wallace was reported as saying in the Sunday World that he saw a three-page hand written document containing the names of many individuals involved in a paedophile ring in Northern Ireland.[345] This appears to be a reference to the list which Mr Wallace was reported to have seen containing 60 names according to the News of the World report. The Inquiry asked Mr Wallace to (a) say who showed the document to him, where and when, (b) the circumstances in which he saw the document and (c) to "give any of the names on the document that he can remember."[346] Mr Wallace has ignored this request.

467 As we see below, Mr Wallace admitted to the police in 1982 that he had seen Mr Macaskill, yet in his letter to the Inquiry of 17 October 2016 he implied that he had not done so. Mr Wallace referred to a report in the News of the World of 21 February 1982 and said,

> "…I assume that [the reporter] was probably given the information verbally by someone who had access to my disciplinary hearing procedure. I was in Wormwood Scrubs prison in February 1982 and had no contact with the press".[347]

468 We can conceive of no proper reason why Mr Wallace is not prepared to provide this Inquiry or the police with whatever information he can provide about the names that appear on that list. As the many documents to which we have referred amply illustrate, Mr Wallace has recounted over the years in great detail the names and functions of many of those in relation to whom he says he worked or in respect of whom he has made allegations. It is the duty of anyone who holds information that may lead to the identification and apprehension of those who are believed to have committed serious crimes, such as the sexual abuse of children, no matter how long ago that may have occurred to inform the police so that the police can investigate to see whether the alleged offenders are still alive, and if they are alive to question them.

469 If Mr Wallace has that information he should have provided it to the police, and he should provide it now. If he does not provide it, we can only consider that his reason for not doing so is because he did not have and does not have the information. Mr Wallace has not provided this

345 KIN 112363.
346 KIN 123328.
347 KIN 124810.

Inquiry with any of this information. We can see no reason whatever for his failure to do so if this information is, or ever was, within his possession.

470 On 29 April 1982 Mr Macaskill gave D/Insp Mack and D/S Elliott of the RUC two documents which they marked SRM 9 and SRM 9A. Mr Macaskill said he had received these through the post, and he could only assume they came from Mr Wallace. He told the police that he had not used any of the contents of either in any publications as he was not satisfied of the truthfulness of their content.[348] SRM 9 can be found at KIN 30235 – 30268. It included the grounds of Mr Wallace's appeal against conviction in a document which appears to have been signed by his counsel. It also included a hand written 27-page document setting out grounds for appeal. This appears to be in Mr Wallace's handwriting; it is not relevant to Kincora and we only mention it for the sake of completeness.

471 SRM 9A is to be found at KIN 30270 – 30271 and appears to be in Mr Wallace's handwriting, and consists of three parts, two of which relate to matters connected with his trial and conviction. An easier to read transcription can be found at KIN 30273 – 30276. Part one of this document is headed "Background information". The following passage relates to Kincora.

> "First reported the Kincora vice ring in the early 70's but no action was taken. In 1974 he complained to senior officers that a cover-up of the Kincora ring was preventing the killers of 10 year old Brian McDermott from being apprehended. Named three people thought to be linked with the vice ring who were suspected of the killing. Later an intelligence organisation planned to discredit a number of Ulster Politicians by falsely implicating them in the ring – Wallace refused to take part. He discussed Kincora with a number of journalists in 1974 and was suddenly posted out of Ulster, accused of being pro-RUC and of giving information to the press without authority. It is believed that a number of senior MP's at Westminster – including several cabinet ministers – were involved in the cover-up."[349]

The reference to having named three people thought to be linked with the vice-ring who were suspected of the killing of Brian McDermott is a matter we consider later.

348 KIN 30093.
349 KIN 30273.

472 On 25 March 1982 Mr Wallace was interviewed at Wormwood Scrubs Prison by D/Supt Caskey and D/S Elliott. During the interview he was asked about the News of the World article.

"Q If journalists were writing in the past 2 months speculating that you have information about MP, lawyers, policemen – this could not have come directly from you?

A It could not have come from me. You're referring to the News of the World. It is highly inaccurate to say the least.

Q Have you met the reporter?

A I've met the reporter.

Q What are the inaccuracies?

A I won't say there is a secret list of 60. I couldn't confirm or deny or could I give any idea of the figure.

Q If there were other children at risk in Northern Ireland and if we don't have the information to assist the investigation, do you not think it would be helpful to us if you supplied information. Are there any children at risk?

A I couldn't say that. My knowledge stopped in 1974. I support the current investigation. The difficulties I face are greater at the moment but I can't judge the wider aspect.

Q Would you say there is still a danger?

A I can't say. My direct knowledge ended in 74.

Q Your direct knowledge?

A I don't wish to answer that."[350]

473 Later in the interview the police returned to the question of Mr Wallace's knowledge about the sexual abuse of children in Kincora.

"Q You have no knowledge then of boys in care of the Health Authorities that are exposed to moral danger?

A That's true. My direct knowledge stopped in January 1975.

Q Did it apply to Kincora?

A It's wider than that. There are other children's homes.

Q Can you locate the other homes?

A I wouldn't answer that.

350 KIN 30096.

Q Does it involve military?

A I wouldn't answer that.

Q A Portadown Home?

A No.

Q Lurgan?

A I wouldn't answer that.

Q If I said Clive Fleury you wouldn't say no?

A I wouldn't answer that.

Q Do you know him?

A I wouldn't answer that.

Q If I said you knew him would it make a difference?

A Yes.

Q Is it wider than Clive Fleury?

A I wouldn't wish to get drawn into that. If I say it does or doesn't it would give an indication to my knowledge."[351]

474 On 28 May 1982 Mr Wallace was again questioned by RUC officers, on this occasion by D/I Mack and D/S Elliott. The witness statement of D/S Elliott setting out the Question and Answer exchanges can be found at KIN 30102 to 30114. A number of different issues were discussed during the interview, but the following extracts from the Questions and Answers are relevant to any consideration of what Mr Wallace knew, or did not know, about the alleged list of people referred to in the newspaper articles to which we earlier referred.

"Q Six people have been convicted, does your evidence cover matters outside them. Are there people other than those six who, in your opinion, should be convicted purely for homosexual offences?

A No I'm not sure.

Q Would your evidence then purely relate to the cover-up aspect.

A No I don't think that would be true. I looked at it from a security side and for that reason it obviously lead [sic] into various other fields, my evidence would not be aimed at homosexuality but the background to it and such lead [sic] me to be able to get more precise details.

351 KIN 30100.

Q Do you believe that your evidence would assist us?

A If I were doing the investigation I would like the information, we're shadow boxing so I don't know whether you already have my information. Your investigation, unlike Sir George Terrys [sic], seems to relate to the mechanics whereas Sir George is dealing with the cover-up.

Q No that's wrong, our investigation covers all aspects.

A I think I can say that on the basis of my evidence the RUC don't have anything to worry about.

Q You are saying that you were aware of the goings on in Kincora back in 1974.

A Yes.

Q In Lisburn you would have had information relative to the Rev Ian Paisley and people like that?

A Yes.

Q McGrath?

A Oh yes.

Q Were you aware that McGrath was homosexual?

A Oh yes, our interests would be the personalities of paramilitaries and their personality discrepancies. For obvious reasons we related to the Loyalist side in 74 with the UWC strike.

Q Did you ever speak to or receive any complaint from a Kincora boy?

A I wouldn't answer that, I certainly didn't interview them.

Q Relating to the document we have, are you prepared to answer any questions in relation to its contents?

A No.

Q Is there anything we can do for you?

A I'm stuck in the middle. I would like to help but I'm looking at my own problems first. If this had blown up after my parole it would be alright, I would be able to look after myself, my wife. I'm certainly worried about my case, the 2 stumbling blocks, the Official Secrets Act and the Legal Aid. You know I wanted something done about Kincora in 74. It upset me that things were going on.

Q Why did you not act then?

A I wasn't in a position but I can tell you it really upset me.

Q Do we take it from that that you were aware of the assaults on boys?

A You can take it that I was very upset that nothing was done.

Q You could have done something then and you didn't?

A It still upset me, knowing that I was aware.

Wallace indicated that he was reluctant to answer any further questions on this line and the interview was then terminated."[352]

475 During these interviews Mr Wallace made it clear that he was concerned about a number of matters, some of which were referred to in the previous quotation, such as the availability of legal aid and whether any information he might disclose would thereby put him at risk under the Official Secrets Act. Over the succeeding months the question of immunity for Mr Wallace under the Official Secrets Act was debated in interviews by the police with Mr Wallace and with his solicitor. On 10 July 1982 the Director of Public Prosecutions in Northern Ireland gave the following undertaking to the Chief Constable of the RUC.

> "I am writing to inform you that there will be no prosecution of John Colin Wallace for any breach by him of the Official Secrets Acts 1911-1939 in respect of any communication by him to a member or members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, of information relating to homosexual offences in Northern Ireland.
>
> Mr Wallace may be so informed. When he is interviewed you will doubtless wish to arrange that it should be made clear to Mr Wallace that it is important that he should make full disclosure of all information which he has concerning the commission of homosexual offences in Northern Ireland at any time, and that in doing so he will not be liable to prosecution for breach of the Official Secrets Acts, irrespective of the source of his information."[353]

476 On 27 July 1982 D/Supt Caskey again interviewed Mr Wallace and read the DPP's undertaking to him. Mr Wallace made it clear that he did not consider that sufficient, and that he also required the consent of the Ministry of Defence.

352 KIN 30112–30114.
353 KIN 30370.

"I have made this clear before. On previous visits I made it clear that clearance should come from Sir Frank Cooper [sic]. The copy of the Official Secrets Act, which I signed, made it quite clear that I must have the written consent of the MoD before I disclose any information.

Q You are not satisfied by the immunity granted by the DPP in Northern Ireland?

A Certainly not – in the wording conveyed during this meeting.

Q If you were to get written clearance from the MoD, are you prepared to disclose all information in your possession in relation to Kincora and other matters?

A Yes, subject to other conditions being met –

1. Firstly the legal aid situation. I would have to prepare a lengthily statement which would have to be vetted by legal representatives.
2. Because of my current circumstances I do not have the opportunity to carry out research. This would have to be done by my solicitor.
3. There is also the problem of documents and material needed by me being seen by third parties, eg prison staff, because of vetting procedures, during the production of the statements.
4. There would be a lengthy time involved, maybe 3-4 months.
5. I am unhappy about various aspects of my own case. I state again that I did not commit the offence for which I was convicted. There are, in my opinion, various matters which may be linked to various aspects of the Kincora investigation and I would therefore wish that these matters and all the evidence relating to my case be examined in the light of the information which I will supply about Kincora."[354]

477 On 25 October 1982 the Director of Security (Army) Major General Garrett, wrote the following letter to Mr Wallace.

"Under the terms of the Official Secrets Act Declaration, which you signed when you resigned your appointment with the Ministry of Defence, you undertook to seek authorisation from this Department before discussing with anyone information gained in the course of your employment. It is now necessary for the police to investigate fully allegations of criminal offences involving homosexual conduct in or connected with the Kincora Boys' Home in Belfast. The purpose of this letter is to confirm that you may disclose to Superintendent C. Gaskey [sic] and Inspector S E Cooke of the Royal Ulster Constabulary the information that is in your possession which is directly relevant to the investigation – including, where necessary, information which you gained in the course of your employment with the MoD and which is security-classified. You will, of course, appreciate that your responsibilities for safeguarding information not related to the police investigation remain unchanged and you must therefore be careful not to divulge any information other than that which is directly relevant to them."[355]

354 KIN 30119–30120.

478 On 11 November 1982 D/Supt Caskey again interviewed Mr Wallace in the presence of his solicitor at Lewes Prison, and gave Mr Wallace this letter from Major General Garrett. The following exchange took place.

"Q At an earlier interview you stated that you were bound by the Official Secrets Act and you considered if called upon to give evidence you would need legal clearance to disclose the information you have. You have now been served with a document giving you immunity by the Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Ireland) and also with the document giving you the clearance you suggested you required before you could release this information. I suggest to you that the authorities have been more than reasonable with you in meeting your demands and your concern in relation to the Official Secrets Act and I, as the police officer in charge of the investigation, can see no bar in you divulging the information you allege you possess.

A I have now made it clear to you or your representatives on four consecutive visits that owing to the legal complexities of this matter that I would require adequate legal advice relating to the disclosure of any information and on the alleged immunity which might be provided. The refusal by the authorities to allow me to have that advice leads me to believe that they do not wish all the information relating to this matter to be disclosed. I hope I have made my position very clear to you on each of these interviews with particular regard to the complexity of the information.

355 KIN 30373.

Having regard to the totally negative attitude of the authorities in this matter, I do not think that I can be of any further help to you until I am properly advised.

Q Now that you have been given the clearance you sought from the Ministry of Defence I put it to you that you are in the same position as any other citizen in relation to the law to divulge any information you possess regarding any criminal offence i.e. concerning Kincora in this instance.

A As a matter of fact your statement is incorrect. The wording of the alleged clearance given by the Director of Army Security is not the wording of the clearance which I specifically requested from you on at least 2 occasions and on the face of it, it is not only insufficient but ambiguous. I think its fruitless going on any further with this interview."[356]

479 D/Supt Caskey then started to ask Mr Wallace a further question, which he was not able to complete because Mr Wallace's solicitor advised him not to continue with the interview and both then left the room. That question was intended to ask where Mr Wallace had got his information from and where it was to be found.[357]

480 In his report to the DPP D/Supt Caskey gave the opinion that the investigating officers believed that when Mr Wallace was informed of the nature of the immunity and the undertaking he realised that the RUC had called his bluff and cut the interview short.[358]

481 We are satisfied that on several occasions over many months throughout 1982 Mr Wallace was given every opportunity to provide the police with whatever information he claimed to have that may have enabled the police to investigate other instances where boys may have been sexually abused. Despite being given what we consider to be ample assurances that he was free to do so in the form of the undertaking given by the DPP and the permission given by Major General Garrett, Mr Wallace was not prepared to disclose the names of other homes where he thought children had been abused, or any information relating to assertions he was justifiably believed to have made about a list of names and details of individuals who had been involved in such sexual abuse. We consider that, at the very latest, by the conclusion of the interview on 11 November 1982 there was no remaining reason why he could not provide the police with whatever information he had relating to the sexual abuse of children in Kincora or elsewhere. His refusal to perform that duty is a matter we have taken into account in assessing the credibility of Mr Wallace and the accounts he has provided both to this Inquiry and over the years about his purported knowledge of events at Kincora.

356 KIN 30127-30128.
357 KIN 30129.
358 KIN 30026.

PART THIRTEEN

The importance of the 8 November 1974/GC80 document

482 We now turn to the memorandum relating to Kincora which Mr Wallace says he wrote on 8 November 1974, and which we have so far referred to as "the 8 November 1974 document". This document first came to light in November 1984, and became the subject of the Caskey Phase Four investigation, where it was referred to by the RUC exhibit number GC80. The witness statements taken by the police during the Caskey Phase Four investigation, as well as references to this document in other papers, referred to the document as GC80, and we will therefore refer to it as "the 8 November 1974 document" or as "GC80", or both as the context requires.

483 As will become apparent, the version labelled GC80 differs in some respects from other published versions of the 8 November 1974 document. The exhibit GC80 is reproduced in facsimile form in Appendix 2 of this chapter. It can also be found at KIN 35081 to KIN 35084. From that version it can be seen that there are hand written comments added to the type written text, some of which appear to have been written by Mr Holroyd, notably the comments appearing on page four of the document beside Mr Wallace's signature. Other comments appear to be in Mr Wallace's writing. When we refer to the 8 November 1974 document as GC80 it is to this version.

484 The importance of the 8 November 1974 document/GC80 when considering the accounts given by Mr Wallace over the years cannot be overstated. GC80 is not just an important element in the accounts given by Mr Wallace, it is at the very centre of those accounts, and is fundamental to the credibility of the allegations made by Mr Wallace about Kincora. The authenticity of the 8 November 1974/GC80 document was called into question as long ago as 1985. ACC Mellor succinctly described the significance of the document when sending the Caskey Phase Four Report to the DPP on 4 September 1985.

> "This file is the end product of an investigation which was commenced as the result of Frederick John Holroyd handing numerous documents to the Essex Police in November 1984. In the main these documents relate to grievances harboured by Holroyd in respect of his resignation from the Army and by Wallace in respect of his conviction on a charge of manslaughter.

However, amongst the documents is one (GC80) dated 8 November 1974 under the signature of Wallace which, if authentic, would indicate that both the RUC and the Army knew of homosexual activity in the Kincora Boys' Home and of homosexual and other illegal activities by persons named in the document well before the Kincora Investigation commenced in 1980. There is, however, nothing in GC80 or the other documents of a potentially criminal nature which has not already been investigated and reported to the Director of Public Prosecution.

If the information in GC80 had been known to the RUC and the Army prior to the date on the document and had this information been deliberately suppressed then both could be severely criticised for not taking the appropriate action to ensure that the allegations were fully investigated.

There is, however, doubt as to the authenticity of document GC80 both from forensic examination and also because those who might be expected to know of its existence or content have denied knowledge of it and in some cases cast doubt on its format."[359]

485 The significance of GC80 can be illustrated by the following parts of the document. The document is headed

"'TARA' REPORTS REGARDING CRIMINAL OFFENCES ASSOCIATED WITH THE HOMOSEXUAL COMMUNITY IN BELFAST.

Reference A: Attached RUC background paper on 'Tara'

Reference B: Attached RUC report on the death of BRIAN McDERMOTT.

Reference C: Your request for a press investigation into the matters referred to above."[360]

486 On the same page paragraph four explains the relevance of Reference A in the following way.

"Reference A deals with McGRATH'S background in considerable detail but it is inaccurate in a number of respects. The Kincora Hostel in Newtownards Road where he works was opened in 1959 under the control and administration of Belfast Corporation Welfare Department. He does not, as the paper claims, "run the hostel" – he is employed as a 'housefather'. The Warden of Kincora is JOSEPH MAINS and the Deputy Warden is RAYMOND SEMPLE. MAINS was > appointed in 1959 and SEMPLE in 1964. Both men are known homosexuals. Indeed, various allegations of homosexual assaults on inmates of the hostel were investigated by senior Welfare Department staff in 1967 but no action was taken against anyone. (see notes of a report by Mr H. MASON at flag 'N')"[361]

359 KIN 35005.
360 KIN 35081.

487 On the fourth page of the document under the heading "Conclusions and Recommendations" there appears the following paragraph.

> "On the other hand, if the allegations are true then we should do everything possible to ensure that the situation is not allowed to continue. The youngsters in these hostels almost certainly come from problem families, and it is clear that no one will fight their case unless we do. Those responsible for the murder of BRIAN McDERMOTT must be brought to trial before another child is killed, and if it can be proved that there is a connection with this homosexual group, then the RUC must be forced to take action irrespective of who is involved."[362]

The circumstances surrounding the emergence of GC80

488 Before considering the contents of GC80 it is necessary to say something about the way in which GC80 emerged, as well as the physical nature of the GC80 version. When GC80 was given to the police it came in the form of a photocopy of a document which had been typed from an earlier version. It therefore appears to be the case that the photocopy of GC80 is not in fact a photocopy of what was the original version of this document, but a photocopy of a later version.

489 On 7 August 1984 ex-Capt Frederick Holroyd contacted Essex Police and arrangements were made for a meeting with him at Westcliffe Police Station. At the police station Mr Holroyd produced a Photostat, that is a photocopied copy, of GC80.[363] Detective Constable Roberts of Essex Police later told DI Cooke of the RUC that Mr Holroyd told him that GC80 had been retyped from the original and then photocopied, and that various things had been crossed out by Mr Holroyd to protect the sources.[364] In his Inquiry letter of 9 September 2016 and the submission attached thereto, Mr Wallace said that the suggestion that Mr Holroyd might have retyped this document was totally untrue.[365]

361 KIN 35081.
362 KIN 35084.
363 KIN 51074.
364 KIN 51028.
365 KIN 124637.

490 Whether GC80 is a photocopy of the version of the 8 November 1974 document is relevant to its authenticity, and the Inquiry therefore asked Mr Wallace to produce "all original versions (and not photocopies) of the memorandum – whether draft or final, for inspection by the Inquiry".[366] Mr Wallace has not done so.

491 In Who Framed Colin Wallace? it is said that forensic tests by The Irish Times "were inconclusive because the document had been photocopied".[367]

492 On 23 June 2016 Mr Holroyd wrote to the Inquiry and attached 12 pages of material which the Inquiry is satisfied were either written by, or in conjunction with, Mr Wallace. That letter refers to GC80 and stated that,

> "Paul Foot submitted a copy of the document to two of the UK's foremost document experts independently. Both experts concluded that there was no evidence that more than one typewriter and one typist had been involved in the production of the document".[368]

493 The Inquiry asked Mr Wallace to provide copies of any such reports,[369] but he has not done so.

494 In the document sent with Mr Holroyd's letter of 23 June 2016 there is a reference to Mr Wallace's hand written notes on Clockwork Orange being submitted to Dr Julius Grant, and to Dr Grant's conclusion,

> "That the documents were consistent with being written in the mid-1970's".[370]

There are references in Who Framed Colin Wallace? to Dr Grant's examination of the Clockwork Orange notes at pages 42 and 43, 357 and 358, and 379. The references in Who Framed Colin Wallace? to the reports of Dr Grant on the hand written Clockwork Orange notes contrast with the absence of any reference to forensic tests on GC80 being carried out other than by the Irish Times.

495 We consider it surprising that Mr Foot made no reference to forensic tests on GC80 being carried out at his request, when the only reference to such tests on GC80 is to the inconclusive reports apparently obtained

366 KIN 123327.
367 Page 144 of the book, KIN 5205.
368 KIN 124601.
369 KIN 123327.
370 KIN 124603.

by The Irish Times. If such reports had been obtained by Mr Foot, we consider it highly likely that Mr Wallace would have copies, yet he has ignored the Inquiry's request to produce copies of any forensic reports that he may have on GC80. We considered his failure to do so, despite his assertions that such reports exist, was relevant when considering the authenticity of GC80 and the credibility of Mr Wallace's accounts.

496 The reference to more than one typewriter and one typist being involved in the creation of the physical document which purports to be GC80, that is in the creation of the first version that physically came into existence, echoes comments that Mr Wallace used two typewriters in his work at HQNI. In May 1985 when he was shown GC80, Mr Broderick said that

> "Wallace used two different typewriters, one was kept by Wallace for his un-attributable information leaked to press".[371]

If Mr Broderick's recollection was correct, that shows that when Mr Wallace was creating false documents as part of his work at HQNI he was alert to the risk that unattributable information could be traced back to the Army if he were to use his Army issue typewriter.

497 GC80 was examined at the Northern Ireland Forensic Laboratory in 1985 as part of the Caskey Phase Four investigation. At that time Donald Budd specialised in examining documents whose authenticity was in question. In his report of 14 February 1985 he pointed to the possibility that the first page of GC80 had been interfered with, giving three reasons.

1 A horizontal line on the first page "could indicate the addition of a piece of paper to the top of this document, possible to cover other information, at the time of photocopying."

2 Differences in "the shape of the tail of the number "9" in the date of 8 November 1974 from that of 9s in the remainder of this document would appear to lend some weight to this possibility".

3 The absence of "CONFIDENTIAL" from the bottom of page 1 of document 1 [GC80] yet present though obliterated at the top and bottom of the remaining 3 pages of this document, could be further evidence of interference to page 1."[372]

371 KIN 190029.
372 KIN 35048.

498 Mr Budd's comments are cautiously expressed, and at their height the indications that GC80 had been "interfered with" are only described as "possibilities". While we do not discount Mr Budd's comments, we regard them as providing limited positive assistance in determining when GC80 was created.

The format of GC80

499 A number of military witnesses who where in HQNI in 1974, and who might be thought to be able to throw some light on the authenticity of GC80, were interviewed during the Caskey Phase Four investigation. One of those interviewed was Roy Pace, who as Warrant Officer Pace was the Chief Clerk of Public Relations Branch HQNI between June 1973 and June 1975. One of his main tasks was to maintain the Classified Documents Register, and he said that:

> "Every classified document, draft or otherwise, on receipt at my office would have been entered in the Classified Documents' Register, stamped and given a serial number. The movement of the draft classified document would have been recorded as would its destruction. I see no such stamp on this document, neither does the document have a reference number which it would have been given had it come through my office. Generally this document is incorrectly laid out and would never have been accepted by a military office. I can state that this draft would never have been presented to a senior military officer in its present form. The style of writing is as far as I can recall similar to that of Colin Wallace."[373]

500 Mr Pace pointed to a number of other differences between the layout of GC80 and what he would have expected in a military document, differences that he regarded as significant. In particular he would have expected to see all the "flagged" documents. Whilst some of these points may seem arcane and pedantic, nevertheless the overall appearance of the layout of GC80 does not conform to the rigidly formulaic structure and layout of the very large number of Army reports and memoranda examined by the Inquiry. Mr Pace said,

> "At the time that this document was apparently written, the Public Relations Branch had become part of Army Information Services. I have examined this document and do not recall ever having seen the document before. Neither do I recall any decision on the content > of the document. If such a document had existed at the time in question and had been passed to me I would have read it to establish the correctness of the service writing layout and in this I would have referred it back to the author for the following reason."[374]

373 KIN 35064.

He then went on to refer to a number of specific points where the document departed from the format he would have expected in a military document.

501 A number of other military personnel stationed at HQNI in 1974, and who might also have been expected to have been aware of, or to have seen GC80 were interviewed. Each said that they had never seen the document, or had no recollection of doing so, and had no recollection of any discussions of homosexuality. These were

1 Elizabeth Yarr, a personal secretary who worked in the Public Relations Branch.[375]

2 Major I, who worked at the Army Press Desk.[376]

3 Lt Col Peck, who was a General Staff Officer One (GSO1) until July 1974.[377]

502 His successor was Lt Col Railton who was in the Army Information Branch at HQNI from June 1974 until October 1975, and the person to whom GC80 was addressed. He was shown GC80 in July 1985 and responded as follows.

> "I have been shown a document marked GC80 which is dated 8 November 1974. I have had an opportunity to read over this document and examine it and I would say that the context in which this document appears to have been compiled does not ring true. I note that the document is addressed to me in manuscript. I can state that I do not recall having seen this document before and can categorically state that I had no knowledge of homosexual activities at Kincora Boys' Home or any knowledge of the McDermot [sic] murder other than that which appeared in the Press at the time. Had I been aware of the subject matter of GC80 I would have brought this to the attention of the appropriate authorities."[378]

503 Brigadier F was the Col GS (Intelligence) at HQNI and responsible for handling all intelligence on behalf of the GOCNI. When he was shown

374 KIN 35063.
375 KIN 35065.
376 KIN 35061 and 35062.
377 KIN 35056.
378 KIN 35049.

GC80 he said that he had never seen it before, nor had he seen any draft of it. He commented that it "is produced in the style of the alleged author John Colin Wallace". He went on to say:

> "Wallace was a very experienced and clever Press Relations Officer and produced material for media as well as counter propaganda. Wallace at any time would not have been given access to intelligence papers or papers held in the intelligence community at HQNI. In the production of this document GC80 Wallace is stating that he had access to intelligence papers from the RUC. I would state that any such documents would have come through me as Head of Intelligence and would not have gone to the Information Policy Department where Wallace was employed. If this was a genuine document and had been produced at the time it would have been brought personally to the Head of the Intelligence Department who would have had the document researched and vetted. On no account would Wallace have been given access to intelligence documents. In relation to the content of GC80 I do recall the organisation TARA but do not recall any details. I do not recall any complaints or allegations of homosexuality in Boys' Homes in N Ireland."[379]

504 In 1985 Major General H Garrett was the Director of Security (Army) at the MoD, but from November 1972 until January 1975 he was a Brigadier who was Chief of Staff at HQNI responsible for all staff including Intelligence. In 1985 he explained that in his time at HQNI the normal practice was that the majority of intelligence was briefed directly by the Col GSO Int to the Commander Land Forces (CLF). When Major General Garrett was shown GC80 he said this in his police statement of 16 July 1985.

> "I have not seen this document before and I was not aware of the content of the document during my period in N Ireland. I knew the alleged author of this document, John Colin Wallace, during my tour in N Ireland and would state that had Wallace been in possession of this information at the time he would have brought this to me at any time as he was considered part of the team and as such had easy access to me. It would have been more likely that he would have discussed this with his immediate supervisors and if he had not got satisfaction at that level would then have felt he could come to me. I do not recollect any such information being brought to my notice by Wallace or anyone else."[380]

379 KIN 35054 and 35055.
380 KIN 35053.

PART FOURTEEN

General Sir Peter Leng

505 General Sir Peter Leng died in 2009. From January 1973 until March 1975 as a Major General he was the Commander Land Forces in Northern Ireland, and as such the second in command to the GOCNI, who was Lieutenant General Sir Frank King. Mr Wallace has asserted on many occasions that in May 1974 Major General Leng was aware of the allegation about Kincora, although that allegation was not contained in Who Framed Colin Wallace?, which was first published in 1989. In the 1990 paperback edition the only reference to Major General Leng is at page 41 in the context of Clockwork Orange.

> "The Army's involvement in Clockwork Orange was approved early in 1974 by the Commander of Land Forces, Northern Ireland, Major General Peter Leng. Colonel Peter Goss, the Senior Army Intelligence Officer, Lisburn, was instructed to release to Colin secret information on terrorists. Captain "Tim Perkins", another Intelligence Officer, was appointed to do the basic research and supply Colin with the results."[381]

506 The account given at page 139 of the reasons for the creation of the 8 November 1974 / GC80 document infers that Mr Wallace composed it solely on his own initiative, and it makes no reference to his being instructed or encouraged to do so, whether by Major General Leng or by anyone else.

> "Colin wondered whether McGrath and his colleagues at Kincora were "held in place" to assist with such secret intelligence initiatives. If so, if the boys at Kincora were being sacrificed to the machinations of Intelligence, the process had gone too far. As with Clockwork Orange, the time had come to call a halt.
>
> On 8 November 1974 Colin wrote a memorandum. He is not clear today (because he only has a copy) for whom the memo was intended, but it would certainly have gone to his superior officer Jeremy Railton, Head of Information Policy, and almost certainly also to Army Intelligence and the Army's RUC Liaison Officer at Police Headquarters in Belfast."[382]

507 However, in letters he wrote to the Prime Minister in 1990, Mr Wallace alleged that Major General Leng did know about the sexual abuse at Kincora, especially in his letter to the Prime Minister of 12 May 1990 in which he referred to an interview given by General Leng to the Sunday Times and to extracts from the tape recordings upon which the Sunday Times article of 18 February 1990 was said to be based. To the present day, Mr Wallace continues to maintain that General Leng was aware of the abuse at Kincora and he refers to the Sunday Times interview and to the recordings in support of his assertions. An example is the following extract from his letter in submission to the Inquiry of 9 September 2016.

381 KIN 5153.
382 KIN 5202.

> "Moreover, General Leng makes it clear in his recorded interview with the Sunday Times in February 1990 that he was aware in 1973/74 of McGrath, where he worked and the "homosexual insinuations". General Leng also recalls writing a memo pointing out that the sexual abuse allegations were a police matter."[383]

508 After quotations relating to Clockwork Orange, Mr Wallace gives the following quotation from the transcript of the Sunday Times interview. The interviewer (the journalist Barrie Penrose) turned to the subject of Kincora.

> "PENROSE: You said in the memo according to [Mike] Taylor that the RUC and the Social Services I think ought to be brought in here because the file named men and boys who were obviously part of this abuse which we all know about since.
>
> LENG: Yes, I recall that,
>
> PENROSE: Do you? And you said take action. They waited because obviously there had been other members suggesting this from Junior Officers, but it was yours that finally convinced Taylor that this was going to happen, but of course it went on for another six or seven years, but again that wasn't your fault. It was just to remind you that there were homosexual abuses taking place, namely by the House Father named McGrath.
>
> LENG: Yes.
>
> PENROSE: who was also the leader of TARA, and of course eventually that was all proven in court some years afterwards, and also a man named McKeague, but I mean this is obviously outside...
>
> LENG: Yes, I do remember the homosexual insinuations and I do remember saying this is a police business, not ours."[384]

383 KIN 124650.
384 KIN 124651.

509 Mr Wallace had this to say about the Sunday Times article.

> "The Sunday Times story based on General Leng's recorded interview with Barrie Penrose was published in the first edition of the newspaper on 18 February 1990. I was reliably informed that the MoD put pressure on the Sunday Times to withdraw the story. Indeed, the story was withdrawn from subsequent editions. It is not difficult to understand why the MoD reacted so negatively to the story, because General Leng's comments undermine almost everything the Department and its Ministers had been saying about "Clockwork Orange" and Kincora."[385]

510 As Mr Wallace says, the Sunday Times article was withdrawn, but not for the reason he believes. The editor, Andrew Neil, listened to the recording of the interviews and concluded that the story should be withdrawn from all future editions because the recordings did not support the assertion that General Leng had authorised Clockwork Orange. Mr Neil's explanation given shortly afterwards makes it clear that he did not withdraw the story because of pressure from the MoD.

> "[It] has been suggested by several politicians in the House of Commons that, under pressure from the MoD, The Sunday Times pulled the story about the Colin Wallace affair from its first edition last Saturday night. That is untrue. The story was pulled, but there was never any pressure from the MoD or anybody [else to] do so. The facts are as follows.
>
> The Sunday Times first edition contained a page one story "General backs Wallace claims" in which it was said that General Sir Peter Leng, Commander Land Forces in Northern Ireland from 1973 to 1975, confirmed the existence of Clockwork Orange and, further, claimed it had not been authorised by the Northern Ireland Office. After the first edition went to press the MoD issued a statement which said that we had either distorted or misunderstood what the General had said. The General, said the MoD, had confirmed to the Ministry that he had said neither [of] the two statements attributed to him by the Sunday Times.
>
> My reaction was simple: the MoD, realising the import of what the general had told us, had got him to retract his statements as part of a damage limitation exercise. Luckily, I thought, our two telephone conversations with the General had been tape recorded.

385 KIN 124652.

> [I] asked to listen to the recordings so that I could pick the best quotes from [the] General in order to refute the MoD rebuttal. But after listening to the tapes I was forced to conclude that the general had neither confirmed Clockwork Orange nor its official authorisation. I had no choice, therefore, but to withdraw the story from all future editions of the Sunday Times, and issued directions to that effect at 8pm Saturday night. At no stage did the MoD [or] any other official body ask for the story to be withdrawn, or put any pressures, directly or indirectly, on the Sunday Times to do so. The decision [was] taken for purely journalistic reasons, above all for reasons of accuracy."[386]

511 Mr Wallace is therefore incorrect in his belief that the Sunday Times withdrew the story because of pressure from the MoD. The Inquiry has obtained a complete copy of the transcript made by the Sunday Times which was sent on 22 February 1990 by Mr Neil to Merlyn Rees, who was the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the Labour Government formed following the outcome of the General Election held on 28 February 1974.[387] Mr Wallace clearly had a copy of that transcript when he wrote to the Prime Minister on 12 May 1990. In that letter he said,

> "I attach for your information extracts from the tape recordings of the exchanges between General Leng and the Sunday Times. I think you will agree that they show:
>
> 1. Senior Army Officers at HQ Northern Ireland were aware in the mid 1970s of allegations of homosexual abuse at the Kincora Boys' Home.
> 2. That the "Clockwork Orange" project originated at the Northern Ireland Office and involved members of MI5.
> 3. Setting aside the first paragraph of the story which I think is much too strong, the tape recordings do support the Sunday Times account of what the General allegedly said."[388]

512 Mr Wallace has used quotations from the transcript over many years when referring to General Leng and Kincora, and has done so in his submission to this Inquiry. The transcript provided by the Sunday Times runs to 27 pages, and is to be found at KIN 124556 and following, see

386 KIN 185010.
387 KIN 124555.
388 KIN 104233 and 104234.

Appendix 3 of this chapter. It includes comments during an interview with Sir Frank King, who was the GOCNI at the time of the events the Inquiry is considering. As can be seen from the transcript both interviews took the form of telephone interviews during which the conversations were tape recorded. When the entire transcript of the questions and answers relating to General Leng are read we are satisfied that Mr Wallace's selective quotations misrepresent what General Leng actually said about Kincora.

"PENROSE: Yes. And Colin Wallace you would have known?

LENG: Well hardly. I mean no and yes, but as he was a captain working right down the chain...

PENROSE: Yes

LENG: I didn't. I mean I hardly came across him at all.

PENROSE: Because everyone, including Broderick, I must say, they speak so highly... and so do the records of him at the time, that he was hard working, and so on, but that's something that obviously... You were at a level where you wouldn't have come across him very much.

LENG: Correct.

PENROSE: But it wouldn't surprise you that he was involved along with Broderick and the others and Taylor...

LENG: If he was working under Broderick he would be involved.

PENROSE: With Clockwork Orange, Yes. And how many people would have known about Clockwork Orange? Would it... I am just wondering...

LENG: Well I think that the senior intelligence officer would have known, Broderick would have known, Mike Garrett."[389]

It is clear that General Leng was saying in 1990 that he had very little direct contact with Mr Wallace.

513 There then followed a number of exchanges about Clockwork Orange during which General Leng made clear that his memory of events more than fifteen years before was not good.

"PENROSE: Right, because there was Clockwork Orange one and two but I am sure your memory doesn't stretch back that far?

389 KIN 124559.

LENG: It doesn't I'm afraid. I've got a terribly bad memory anyhow.

PENROSE: So – I mean – when it was mentioned to you, it was mentioned to you as what?

LENG: Well, I don't want to be quoted, because I can't actually recall, but I think it was, from rough memory, it was because we have to investigate these terrorist organisations and I said "go ahead and investigate".[390]

514 Some pages further on attention turned to Kincora.

"PENROSE: Did you know there was a Clockwork Orange One and Two?

LENG: Really?

PENROSE: ...who was also the leader of TARA, and of course eventually that was all proven in court some years afterwards, and also a man called McKay, but I man [sic] ...

LENG: Yes I do remember the homosexual insinuations and I do remember saying this is a police business not ours.

PENROSE: Yes, because you probably know that since then, the suggestions had been the MI5 or others, not the Army but others, where in fact using, obviously, a blackmail hold on people like McGraph [sic] which he has since confirmed. I mean that is a matter record now, that he was blackmailed into working for intelligence to inform and so on, so you can see the tug of war that was taking place from your side, saying police, Social Services take action, and the other side saying no, we need the information...

LENG: But of course I wasn't part of the other side.

PENROSE: No, quite. Well look, I'll get this in the post..."[391]

515 When considering the entirety of these exchanges it has to be borne in mind that there were many leading and suggestive questions by the interviewer during a telephone interview with someone who was being asked to recall events many years before, apparently without

390 KIN 124558.
391 KIN 124562 and 124563.

time for reflection and who had made it clear his memory was poor. We are satisfied that when one looks at the entirety of these exchanges that although on one construction the words "yes I do remember the homosexual insinuations and I do remember saying this is a police business, not ours" suggests that General Leng did know about the abuse at the time, when the exchanges are considered as a whole the references by General Leng to boys escaping from a remand home clearly refer to St Patrick's Training School and not Kincora. Kincora was not a remand home, and as we have established when examining St Patricks Training School on the Glen Road in West Belfast, there was a serious problem there during the 1970s with boys absconding after they had been remanded by the courts to the training school when charged with terrorist and public order offences. Mr Wallace ignores this reference.

516 After the Sunday Times article appeared, General Leng and General King had a meeting with officials from the Ministry of Defence on 17 February 1990. A note of that meeting contains the following reference to what General Leng said about Kincora.

> "7. On Kincora Leng remembered discussing with the Chief of Staff the escapes of youngsters back into violence. Kincora came up in relation to escapes, he said.
>
> 8. Leng was questioned about Tara – "don't remember". MaGrath [sic] – No bells. Homosexual activity at Kincora – "I have a nagging thought about that. Len Garrett may have discussed homosexuality there with me. My recollection is unclear".[392]

517 If this note is an accurate representation of what General Leng said in 1990, his recollection of any question of homosexuality was far from clear and the references to "insinuations" in the Sunday Times transcript have to be viewed with that in mind. However, looking at both accounts, it is clear that what General Leng remembered were not discussions about homosexuality at Kincora but discussions about the problems created by boys absconding from St Patricks Training School and not from Kincora.

518 In 1985 General Leng made a statement to the police during the Caskey Phase Four investigation into the 8 November 1974 / GC80 document. In this statement General Leng said that he had never seen the GC80 document before, nor had he any knowledge of any of the hostels, or of allegations of homosexuality in children's homes in Northern Ireland. He confirmed that he was aware of St Patrick's Training School in its capacity as a remand home, and the concerns of Army Commanders that "young men" on remand for terrorist offences were absconding from St Patrick's.

392 KIN 190035.

519 In view of the significance attached to what General Leng has said about Kincora, we set out the relevant portion of his statement below.

> "I was Commander Land Forces N Ireland from Jan 1973 until March 1975. I have closely and carefully examined the document marked GC80 and I can state that I have never seen such a document before. Documents of this nature would have been handled at a lower level and if a problem arose the subject in question would be discussed in my office with either the Chief of Staff, Brigadier Garrett, or for the major part of my tour by [Brigadier F], Col GS Intelligence or in the last three months by Col M. I always insisted on personal briefing rather than having to read a mass of documents. I would not therefore have received a document in draft and usually only handled the most important policy documents in final form. Nor have I any knowledge of this document nor was the information contained in the document under question ever brought to my notice. I certainly cannot recall having heard of any of the hostels named in the document nor was I aware of any allegations of homosexuality in any boys' homes in N Ireland. However, I was aware of the remand home, St Patrick's situated in west Belfast. In 1974 the Army Belfast Commanders were concerned about the number of young men on remand for terrorist charges who were absconding from this home and re-involving themselves in terrorist activities. I was aware of the Protestant organisation Tara but cannot recall at this late stage any of the personalities involved. I do not recall the McDermot [sic] incident."[393]

520 We are satisfied that General Leng's account in his police statement in July 1985 is incompatible with everything that Mr Wallace has alleged about General Leng's knowledge of, and approach to, sexual abuse of children in Kincora in 1974. We are satisfied that General Leng's recollection as he explained it later in 1990 in the Sunday Times interview can be seen from the transcripts, and his subsequent remarks to the Ministry of Defence, as consistent with his position as stated in his July 1985 statement.

393 KIN 35051 and 35052.

521 General Leng's recollection as he set it out in July 1985, more than four years before he referred to the matter during the course of a telephone conversation with the journalist Barrie Penrose, leaves no room for doubt that General Leng was saying then that he knew nothing about Kincora nor had received any information to suggest that children were being abused in Kincora. If General Leng's statement in 1985, and his subsequent remarks, were true, they contradict and do not support Mr Wallace's assertions.

522 From the following extract of his submission to the Inquiry sent with his letter of 9 September 2016 it can be seen that Mr Wallace regards the late General Leng as a person of great integrity, and he argues that General Leng's comments in the Sunday Times interview provide powerful support for Mr Wallace's assertions about Mr Wallace's knowledge of sexual abuse in Kincora in 1974.

> "Those who served with General Leng will be well aware that he was a very professional and forthright officer who had great integrity. There is no doubt in my mind that his knowledge of McGrath and Kincora as expressed above would have been communicated very clearly and forcibly to those around him. I am amazed that the Inquiry transcripts indicate that the Inquiry made no determined attempt to challenge senior military and Intelligence witnesses over General Leng's comments. I am also disgusted that those officers and officials, including the senior Information Policy Officers, did not have the courage to speak out and confirm what General Leng had said.
>
> I believe the Inquiry must face up to this issue because General Leng's comments go to the very heart of the Inquiry's investigation into Kincora. The Inquiry must decide: do they believe General Leng, who had no reason whatsoever to lie, or do they believe MoD and Intelligence witnesses who had very good reasons to lie. It is sad and very worrying that CTI [Counsel to the Inquiry] has attempted to play down the significance of what General Leng said. If it had not been for the stance he took on this issue, I would not have been talking to the press in 1974 about McGrath's homosexual activities."[394]

394 KIN 124652.

523 As Mr Wallace concedes, General Leng had no reason to lie. General Leng's recollections in 1985 of Kincora were given significantly closer to the events he was asked about in 1974, and when he had the opportunity to study, and reflect upon, the contents of the 8 November 1974/GC80 document. They are consistent with, and supported by, the accounts of the other witnesses who were interviewed in 1985. We see no reason not to accept General Leng's account contained in his 1985 police statement.

PART FIFTEEN

524 Before we consider the other contents of the 8 November 1974 / GC80 document we should make it clear that we accept Mr Wallace was the author of the document. The issue that was raised as early as the Caskey Phase Four investigation of 1985 is whether the document was composed in November 1974 or at a later date. In this part of this chapter we examine the contents of GC80 to see whether the internal evidence assists in establishing when the document was or was not compiled.

Reference A

525 At the head of the document appears the following.

> "Reference A: Attached RUC background paper on 'Tara'."[395]

The RUC background paper referred to as Reference A is mentioned expressly in the paragraphs numbered 1, 4 and 6, and is identified as the source of much of the information referred to in paragraphs 1-9. No such RUC document has ever been found by the Ministry of Defence, by the RUC, by the PSNI, nor has this Inquiry in its exhaustive examination of files found anything that would answer that description.

526 Paragraph 4 starts,

> "Reference A deals with McGrath's background in considerable detail but it is inaccurate in a number of respects."

The remainder of the paragraph does not say in what respects the RUC "background paper on Tara" was inaccurate, but, as can be seen from paragraphs 4 and 5, the references within the text suggest that Mr Wallace had knowledge of various matters, including the Mason File.

> "4. Reference A deals with MCGRATH's background in considerable detail but it is inaccurate in a number of respects. The Kincora hostel in Newtownards Road where he works was opened in 1959 under the control and administration of Belfast Corporation Welfare Department. He does not, as the paper claims, "run the hostel" – he is employed as a 'housefather'. The Warden of Kincora is JOSEPH MAINS and the Deputy Warden is RAYMOND SEMPLE. MAINS was appointed in 1959 and SEMPLE in 1964. Both men are known > homosexuals. Indeed, various allegations of homosexual assaults on inmates of the hostel were investigated by Senior Welfare Department staff in 1967 but no action was taken against anyone. (see notes of a report by Mr H MASON at flag 'N')

395 KIN 35081.

>
> 5. It is untrue to say that allegations of assaults on the inmates of Kincora "began shortly after his appointment". As I have pointed out in para 4 above, allegations were made as early as 1967 and there is also evidence that assaults may have taken place as early as 1959, soon after MAINS was appointed."[396]

527 The reference to the "notes of a report by Mr H Mason at flag 'N'" is an unmistakable reference to the Mason File, which we considered in Chapter 27, Mr Wallace has said that he did not keep any of the documents referred to in this document, such as "reference A" or the documents described as being flagged, in this case "flag 'N'".

528 In his submission to the Inquiry sent with his letter of 9 September 2016 Mr Wallace said,

> "I did not retain the various RUC documents referred to in my memo. Neither those documents nor the memo, were designed for release – indeed, I am not convinced that the Army was even meant to see the police documents. In any event, I had no authority to retain them. Also, it is almost certain that I would have re-attached them to the memo when I submitted it to my superiors. The memo by itself would have provided an incomplete picture."[397]

Mr Wallace's explanation that he did not have any authority to retain the documents referred to as flags or References rings somewhat hollow since he clearly did retain a number of documents that he either obtained in the course of his work, or created during the course of his work, such as GC80 itself. If he kept the copy as he claims to have done, it is surprising that given its obvious importance he did not keep copies of the documents referred to in it.

529 The evidence from Mr Bunting of the EHSSB was that he received the Mason File from Mr Mason in 1973, when he took over from Mr Mason upon the reorganisation of health and childcare services and the creation of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board. Mr Bunting explained that he put the Mason File in a drawer in his office and forgot about it until he remembered it during the first meeting he had with DC Cullen in March 1976. He explained how DC Cullen then copied the Mason File and returned the original to him. There has never been any suggestion, let alone any evidence to show, that more than one copy of the Mason File had been created in 1971, nor that the RUC ever possessed a copy of the Mason File before 1976, nor that the RUC was aware of its existence before 1976.

396 KIN 35081 and 35082.
397 KIN 124665.

530 The reference to both Mains and Semple being "known homosexuals", and by inference from the context therefore known to be so in 1974, either from the RUC document or from the Mason File, is significant. As Semple's superior, Mains knew that Semple had sexually interfered with residents at Kincora as we have explained in an earlier chapter. However, there is no evidence to suggest that the RUC, the Belfast Welfare Authority, or the EHSSB as its successor, knew anything about Semple's offences until these were uncovered during the Caskey Phase One investigation which followed the allegations in the Irish Independent on 24 January 1980.

531 Paragraph 7 of GC80 contains a further reference to internal investigations by the Belfast Welfare Authority, described as "the Belfast Corporation Welfare Department" in the document. We attach no significance in the difference in terminology.

> "7. MCGRATH was himself the subject of an internal investigation by the Belfast Corporation Welfare Department in 1972/73, following allegations of more homosexual assaults on the inmates of Kincora. One of our own sources confirmed in 1972 that a number of complaints had been received about his behaviour and that, although the complaints had been passed to senior welfare staff and to the RUC, no action had been taken against him. This would appear to be confirmed, to some extent, by Mr Orr (see flag 'R') in 1973. There were, of course, similar allegations relating to other hostels during this period (see Bawnmore, Westwinds, Burnside etc.) and this conflicts with Reference A's assertion that the allegations were confined to Kincora."[398]

532 The references to "one of our own sources" may well be to Mr Wallace's assertion that he was in contact with a social worker in 1972, as we have already considered. The reference to Mr Orr providing some confirmation in 1973 requires examination. The reference to "flag 'R'" suggests that flag 'R' was a document of some sort containing references by Mr Orr to the earlier complaints "passed to senior welfare staff and to the RUC". As with the other "flags" no such document has been found.

398 KIN 35082.

533 In chapter 27 we examined the way in which complaints made by R 15 in May and September 1974 that McGrath grabbed him by the genitals were dealt with by EHSSB staff, including Mr Ronald Orr. Mr Orr was a Principal Social Worker with the EHSSB at the College Street Office on the Shankill Road. He was interviewed by D/Supt Caskey on 7 August 1985 and shown paragraph 7 of GC80. Mr Orr told D/Supt Caskey that he did not contact any police officer or soldier in relation to social work.[399] Since the only knowledge of allegations relating to McGrath possessed by Mr Orr related to events in 1974, the Inquiry is unaware of any document compiled by Mr Orr in 1973, or which could be said to support the reference in paragraph 7 of GC80 to Mr Orr possessing knowledge of allegations against Mr McGrath before May 1974.

534 Paragraph 7 goes on to refer to "similar allegations relating to other hostels during that period (see Bawnmore, Westwinds, Burnside etc.)". However, as D/Supt Caskey pointed out in the Phase Four Report, the allegations about the Westwinds home in Newtownards were not made to the RUC until 1975; the allegations about Bawnmore were not made to the RUC until 1980, and the allegations about the Burnside Hostel for boys in Craigavon were not made until after 1980.[400] The RUC documents referred to in Reference A could not therefore have existed in 1974.

Reference B

535 The reference to the "Attached RUC report on the death of BRIAN McDERMOTT" needs some explanation. Brian McDermott was a 10 year old boy who left his home in East Belfast just before 1pm on Sunday 2 September 1973 to go to the Ormeau Park beside the River Lagan. The last confirmed sighting of Brian McDermott alive was in the Ormeau Park at about 3.15pm that afternoon. On Saturday 8 September 1973 a report of what was thought to be a body floating in the River Lagan led to the level of the river being artificially lowered so that a search of the river bed could take place. At a different point on the river the search discovered a hessian sack. The sack contained a torso and a severed right hand, all of which had been subjected to severe burning. The left arm, both legs and the head were missing. The remains were those of Brian McDermott. His murder remains unsolved 43 years later, and because of the horrific nature of the crime understandably attracted considerable media attention.

399 KIN 35070.
400 KIN 35017.

536 Paragraph 9 of GC80 refers to the murder of Brian McDermott.

> "Reference 'B', which deals with the circumstances surrounding the murder of BRIAN McDERMOTT last year puts forward the theory that the killing had both sexual and witchcraft overtones. The only link that can be identified between the murder and the homosexual community is via JOHN McKEAGUE. McKEAGUE's own statements (see flag 'S') raises more questions than they answer. Certainly, his boast that he will not be prosecuted because "he knows too much about some people" merits serious investigation, but I suspect that he will not be prepared to talk until he is released. It is also rather remarkable that no charges have been preferred against him, at least during the past 3-4 years. Our own investigations of instances of alleged witchcraft or other satanic rites in the Province would tend to dismiss the RUC's theory that BRIAN McDERMOTT's murder could be part of these activities. In the past, 'Black Magic' practices etc have been mainly confined to groups operating from Republican areas, with the possible exception of three cases in County Antrim. I think, however, that from a press point of view, we would be very foolish to give any credence to such claims without the most convincing evidence. The forensic reports on the McDERMOTT murder (see flag 'T') would tend to indicate that someone tried to dispose of the body by cutting it into pieces and burning them. It would also appear that when this failed, the pieces were dumped in the river. The insinuation made in the document regarding the boy's disappearance and the proximity of the REV PAISLEY's church is dangerous nonsense."[401]

537 The reference to "flag 'T'", described as the "forensic reports", suggests that Mr Wallace had somehow obtained at least the post mortem report and probably other documents of a forensic nature. No document answering the description of "flag 'T'" has ever been found in any of the MoD files that have been examined over many years, and examined by this Inquiry, despite repeated searches. Mr Wallace says that he did not keep the documents referred to as being flagged in GC80.

401 KIN 35082 and 35083.

538 Mr Wallace said to the Inquiry that, to the best of his knowledge,

> "The Army possessed no information about the murder of Brian McDermott other than that which was received by the RUC. Initially, we were told that a police suspect was an associate of John McKeague, but that others may also have been involved.[402]
>
> "In 1974 we at British Army HQNI were given information that the RUC believed the original suspect had been protected by influential people and that attempts to prosecute him had been blocked. The Inquiry should ask the RUC for details of their investigation into Brian McDermott's murder to determine what links, if any, the original suspect had with John McKeague and/or Kincora, and if he was protected by influential people. However, as I pointed out to the police in 2008, I had no direct knowledge of the murder."[403]

539 Mr Wallace's reference to 2008 appears to be mistaken, because it was on 18 March 2004 that he made a police statement in which he said,

> "When I was writing about the McDermott case, I linked his death to witchcraft purely because it was an area I was exploring at that time. I had no evidence that witchcraft or any other occult associated with witchcraft was involved. As a result of linking the McDermott case with witchcraft, it followed that anyone associated with witchcraft became a possible suspect for the murder. One such person at that time was a paramilitary leader by the name of John McKeague, who lived and worked near the area that McDermott had gone missing. This was not based on any evidence, it was only a supposition on my part based on intelligence at hand being evaluated and linked. There were a number of issues in the 1970's and into the 1980's concerning the investigation into the abuse of children at the Kincora Boys' Home in Belfast. I had concern that the murderers of McDermott would not be apprehended due to a cover-up in relation to this investigation, however, I had no knowledge that would have linked anyone from the Kincora investigation to the murder of

402 KIN 124671.
403 KIN 124672.

> Brian McDermott. I am not in possession of any information that would link anyone to the McDermott murder. I can confirm that I am not aware of any cover-up concerning the McDermott case."[404]

540 Mr Wallace has not always been as forthright about his lack of knowledge about the McDermott murder as he was in the 2004 statement. In his interview of Mr Wallace, in the presence of Mr Wallace's solicitor, on 27 July 1982 D/Supt Caskey questioned Mr Wallace about his knowledge of the three suspects for the killing of Brian McDermott which were mentioned in the "background notes" document to which we have already referred. This was part of the SRM9A document which Mr Maccaskill of the News of the World received through the post. The portion of that document referring to Brian McDermott's murder was as follows.

> "In 1974 he complained to senior officers that a cover-up of the Kincora ring was preventing the killers of a 10 year old Brian McDermott from being apprehended. Named three people thought to be linked with the vice ring who are suspected of the killing".[405] (emphasis added)

541 We consider that Mr Wallace's response to the questions about his knowledge of the killers of Brian McDermott was revealing.

> "Q: did you see that document SRM9(a)? It is a photocopy. Are you the author of that document?
>
> A: I would not be prepared to make any comment in relation to that document.
>
> Q: I suggest to you that you are the author of that document and that, that is clearly identified by the content?
>
> A: I have already stated that I am not prepared to make any comment in relation to that document.
>
> Q: A serious allegation is made in the document that in 1974 a complaint was made to senior officers that a cover up of the 'Kincora Ring' was preventing the killers of 10 year old Brian McDermott from being apprehended and that 3 people were named who were thought to be linked with the vice ring who were suspected of the killing. Have you any comment to make about this?

404 KIN 123001 and 123002.
405 KIN 30273.

A: As I have said before I have no comment to make about this document.

Q: I put it to you that the Official Secrets Act does not extend protection to any person who has information that would lead to the detection of persons suspected of murder?

The solicitor stated that the Official Secrets Act prohibits disclosures by his client without [consent] of any relevant information in his possession.

A: If this information is so important why don't the military just give permission. It is in the public interest for the MoD to give me the permission.

Q: Do you have information that would lead to the identity of these suspected killers?

A: Again I could not reply to that question.

Q: To your knowledge, are these suspected killers still at large?

A: I cannot make any comment on that.

Q: Would you agree with me that it is a serious matter that if suspected killers are at large that every effort should be made to make them amenable to the law?

A: I could not agree more.

Q: If they are still at large, taking into account the terrorist situation in Northern Ireland, assuming that they are of the 'terrorist type' there is every likelihood of them committing further serious offences.

A: This would apply even if they weren't terrorists. Irrespective of who they were I would like to see them brought to book.

Q: If you would like this then this is the time to disclose their identity?

A: This is the time for the MoD to allow me to disclose this information.

Q: Was there an intelligence organisation within the military in Northern Ireland prepared to discredit a number of Ulster Politicians by publicly implicating them in the Kincora Vice Ring?

A: I could not make any comment on that.

Q: You are not prepared to name the 3 men even though they may be killing today?

A: I can't release any information." [406]

406 KIN 30121–30124.

542 We are satisfied Mr Wallace was the author of the SRM9A document, and that he claimed that he knew the names of the three men believed to have committed this appalling murder. We are satisfied that in 1982 he knew that he was caught out in a lie because he knew nothing about the murder of this child, but in order to avoid admitting that he had lied by claiming to have knowledge he did not have, he retreated behind the risible device of saying the Official Secrets Act prevented him from giving information which, if he really possessed it, would have enabled the men to be identified, arrested and questioned.

Reference C

543 The third reference at the head of the document is in the following terms.

> "Reference C: Your request for a press investigation into the matters referred to above".

544 Who made the request is shown in a handwritten note above the typescript.

> "Addressed to; GSO1 (Inf Pol) Jeremy Railton in response to a request from Gen Peter Leng CLF [illegible] M".[407]

It is unclear whose handwriting this is. Col M was living in the USA at the time of the Caskey Phase Four investigation in 1985 and it was decided it was unnecessary to interview him.[408] As we have seen, General Leng and Lt Col Railton both denied that any such request for a report was ever made by General Leng, or that Lt Col Railton ever received GC80 from Mr Wallace.

Reference A and the Bangor prostitution ring

545 Paragraph 10 of GC80 again refers to "Reference A" that is to the RUC background paper on Tara, and at 10(c) states;

> "Various public and political figures who hold positions of power and who are also homosexual protect each other from prosecution. The claims of a prostitution ring involving juveniles and centred on Bangor is not really substantiated, other than by GARLAND's own personal account."[409]

407 KIN 35081.
408 KIN 100192.
409 KIN 35083.

546 The reference to "a prostitution ring involving juveniles and centred on Bangor" is not elaborated in the GC80 document. The only known allegations made to the RUC that might answer this description related to allegations made in articles published in the Irish Times on January 12 1982; in a BBC News Scene Around 6 programme broadcast on 11 February 1982, and in the BBC Spotlight programme broadcast on 12 February 1982. The Irish Times article claimed that a boy alleged that he was one of a group of boys, some of whom he met while a resident in Kincora, and that some of the boys were regularly escorted by men to hotels in various locations where sexual offences took place. One of these locations was Bangor, Co Down. The boy also alleged that he had been introduced to the men in the "ring" by a close relative. An interview with the unnamed boy was played in the BBC programmes on 11 and 12 February 1982.

547 The Irish Times article claimed that the offences dated back to 1972, had been investigated by the police, and the close relative had been prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to a period of imprisonment in 1976. The Caskey Phase Two investigation identified the boy and his identity was confirmed to them by the journalist concerned. We will refer to the boy by the designation given to him by the Hughes Inquiry, R 23. The offences involving R 23 came to the knowledge of the police in 1975 following his visit to Dundonald Police Station when he said he had run away from home. He was taken into care. Subsequently he alleged to Social Services that he had been involved in homosexual relations with his uncle with whom he had been living, and with other males.

548 A lengthy police investigation then followed. R 23 told the police that no more than four men were involved; his uncle, the driver of a mini car he met in Bangor, a man named Robert and a man named Maurice. Robert and Maurice were identified as Northern Ireland barmen. Robert admitted the allegations, Maurice denied them.

549 R 23 denied being a resident of Kincora, or being aware of a homosexual ring involving NIO Officials, policemen, legal figures, business men and boys in care in Kincora.[410]

550 The authors of the Irish Times article were Ed Moloney and Andy Pollak. They told the police that a source they did not wish to name, but who they called Social Worker C, told Mr Pollak that he had been approached, "probably around late 1975 or early 1976",[411] by a boy who complained that his uncle sexually abused him and took him to hotels in the North Down Area. If any man in the group showed an interest in R 23 then his uncle permitted him to go off with the man for the night.

410 KIN 20063 and 20064.

551 The Caskey Phase Two investigation pursued these allegations in great detail and it is unnecessary for this Report to consider the wider scope and outcome of the investigation. It is sufficient to say that the account given to Mr Pollak by Social Worker C was that he had been approached by a boy "probably in late 1975 or early 1976". If that account by Social Worker C was correct, and for the purposes of this Report we assume that it was, we are satisfied that the boy was R 23. Whether Social Worker C was told what was happening by R 23 as early as late 1975, we are satisfied that the police were unaware of R 23's allegations until 1976. The events relating to R 23 cannot therefore have been described in the RUC document purporting to be Reference A because no one knew about them other than those involved in the sexual activity. This information could not therefore have been available to Mr Wallace in 1974 and cannot therefore have been referred to in the RUC document described in GC80 as the background paper on Tara provided by the RUC and which was commented upon in the passage from GC80 already quoted.

552 Paragraph 10(c) also states that "the claims of a prostitution ring involving juveniles and centred on Bangor is [sic] not really substantiated, other than by Garland's personal account".[412] This presumably relates to the reference to Mr Garland in paragraph 6 where it is stated that "flag 'O'" is "Garland's own version of events." Paragraph 6 refers to Mr Garland at some length.

> "…[McGrath's] former employer, ROY GARLAND, is well known in Unionist Party circles (see also CLIFFORD SMITH) and was for some time 2i/c of 'TARA'. Admittedly, some of the personal correspondence between the two men during this period cannot be regarded as normal between employer and employee (see flag 'M'). Whatever the real reason for the row between GARLAND and McGRATH, there is certainly considerable animosity between them at present, and GARLAND has been actively engaged in trying to have McGRATH removed from his post at Kincora. GARLAND's own version of events (see flag 'O') is, of course, very enlightening, but I would suggest that it should be treated with caution until it can be substantiated because of the antagonism between them. It would also appear that many of the RUC source reports on this matter after 1971 originated from GARLAND."[413]

411 KIN 20241.
412 KIN 35083.

553 The reference to "flag 'M'" and to the correspondence between McGrath and Mr Garland clearly relate to the letters which Mr Garland showed to DC Cullen in 1974 and which are referred to in chapter 27 from paragraph 193 onwards. We have found no evidence to suggest that in 1974 DC Cullen gave any information about Mr Garland to anyone other than ACC Meharg, and ACC Meharg gave the letters from McGrath to Mr Garland back to DC Cullen after he read them.

554 The reference to Mr Garland's "own version of events" is not elaborated, but the reference to "flag 'O'" clearly infers that a document was in existence that was either compiled by Mr Garland, or contained a record made by someone else of what Mr Garland had to say. The only documents we are aware of that could answer this description of Mr Garland's "own version of events" are the documents prepared by DC Cullen of what he learned from Mr Garland, and Mr Garland's anonymous Robophone message to the RUC of 23 May 1973. For the 1973 message to have answered the description of Mr Garland's "own version of events" the RUC background paper would have had to identify Mr Garland as the maker of the anonymous call, and then passed that information to HQNI. There is no evidence whatsoever to show that anyone in the RUC was aware in 1974 of the identity of the author of the call. We consider that the Robophone message could not therefore be what is referred to in GC80 as "Garland's own version of events".

555 DC Cullen's notes make no reference to Bangor or to youths being taken to hotels for the purposes of sexual abuse or prostitution, so the source of the information in "flag 'O'" could not have been DC Cullen. Nor could it have been anything said in the 1973 Robophone message which we have already examined and which makes no reference to Bangor.

556 Mr Garland's own comments about this passage in GC80 in his letter to the Inquiry dated 26/27 September 2016 are enlightening. Having said that "I have found Colin Wallace straight forward, intelligent and caring.

413 KIN 35082.

He knows what he is talking about", Mr Garland then quotes from the Inquiry transcript of 7 July 2016 the relevant passage from GC80 about the prostitution ring in Bangor. His document then says,

> "I never referred to Bangor in my "confidential" call, but I understand Bangor was involved.
>
> As we will see, one of the documents that's said to be available to the author is an account from Roy Garland. So Roy Garland is said in a document that is available to the author to be talking about a prostitution ring involving juveniles centred on Bangor." (this is a quotation of Counsel's remarks on 7 July 2016)
>
> Comment;
>
> Not in Bangor – I believe I said in my "confidential" anonymous telephone call that a ring existed – this was speculation based on what I saw and heard and guess work. It was an attempt to get something done."
>
> "...[McGrath] was also in sympathy with a Belfast Baptist Pastor accused of abusing two boys. I believe he did not act alone but was at least in contact with other pedophiles [sic] and probably shared some of his secrets with them. But I also understand that Bangor was involved."[414]

These remarks show that Mr Garland never mentioned Bangor at any time, and we therefore fail to see how there could have been a belief in any document that Mr Garland's own version of events was in any way relevant to the allegation in GC80 about a prostitution ring in Bangor.

557 Mr Garland and Mr Wallace had been in contact with each other before Mr Garland wrote to the Inquiry on 26/27 September 2016 as is clear from the remarks quoted above, and from the final passages in Mr Garland's document which are identical in every word to the final passages from Mr Wallace's earlier letter and accompanying submission. Had Mr Garland been aware of any document that existed in 1974 that could have answered the description of "his own version of events" in GC80 no doubt he would have said so. He has not. We consider that Mr Garland's statement does not provide any support for the authenticity of GC80; indeed it undermines the authenticity of the document.

414 KIN 130043.

Was the 8 November 1974 document sent to anyone?

558 In Who Framed Colin Wallace? at page 139 it is stated that:

> "[Mr Wallace] is not clear today (because he only has a copy) for whom the memo was intended, but it would certainly have gone to his Superior Officer Jeremy Railton Head of Information Policy, and almost certainly also to Army Intelligence and the Army's RUC Liaison Officer at Police Headquarters in Belfast."

559 Given that GC80, which bears Mr Wallace's signature, bears the handwritten words showing to whom it was addressed, namely Lt Col Railton, it is hard to see why there was any uncertainty on Mr Wallace's part as to the identity of the intended recipient(s). Lt Col Railton said in 1985 that he had no recollection of ever seeing this document. GC80 carries a handwritten note indicating that Lt Col Railton was the intended recipient. If Mr Wallace did not do so, who wrote this on the document? In his submission to the Inquiry sent with his letter of 9 September 2016 Mr Wallace had this to say about the document.

> "I do not know if my original document was re-typed after I submitted it to one of my superiors at HQNI in November 1974 and before it was passed on to other senior officers. I am only aware that General Peter Leng responded to the matter in a memo which instructed Information Policy to take action to ensure that the RUC took a more active part in the matters raised in the memo."[415]

560 We are satisfied that this makes it clear that Mr Wallace was saying that he did submit the document to one of his superiors, and therefore Lt Col Railton would have been the person who received it first, whatever may have happened to any such document afterwards.

561 Mr Wallace said in that passage that he did not know whether his original document was re-typed after he submitted it, and in the extract from Who Framed Colin Wallace? it is stated that Mr Wallace only had a copy. In 1986 Mr Wallace described the document which we believe to be GC80 as a draft, and a carbon copy of his original draft version. In a letter of 20 June 1986 to Lord Trefgarne, a Junior Minister in the Ministry of Defence at the time, Mr Wallace said that it was "the carbon copy of [his] original draft version of the one now held by your Ministry".[416]

415 KIN 124665.
416 KIN 190212.

As we have already stated, Mr Wallace was requested by the Inquiry to produce the original version of GC80 to the Inquiry and he has not done so. His 1986 description of the document as a carbon copy is important for the following reasons.

562 First of all, the carbon copy could be examined and any differences between its text and GC80 identified. Despite being requested by the Inquiry on 19 April 2016 to

> "Please produce all original versions (and not photocopies) of the memorandum – whether draft or final – for inspection by the Inquiry."[417]

Mr Wallace has ignored that request, although as will be apparent from earlier parts of this chapter he has written to the Inquiry on several occasions since then.

563 Secondly, the references to "a first draft" suggests: either (1) that as a draft the document had not reached the stage where it could be, and therefore was not, submitted to his superiors; or (2) it had been submitted before he finished work on it; or (3) there were subsequent drafts.

564 In his letter to his Member of Parliament, Mr Marshall, of 28 August 1986, and in an attachment to that letter, Mr Wallace made the following points about the authenticity of the 8 November 1974 / GC80 document.

> "As I have already made clear to Lord Trefgarne in earlier correspondence, it was nothing more than the first draft of a memorandum relating to a request I had received in 1974 to draw media attention to the overall situation relating to 'Tara', William McGrath and Kincora.
>
> The copy of the document which I have seen did not have "the names of the addressees" hand written on it and, in any event, there was only ONE addressee."[418]

565 In the letter itself, Mr Wallace referred to the question of authenticity and made the following points.

> "a. The document, was, indeed, 'authentic' in that the version published in the 'Irish Times' was entirely consistent with the memorandum written by me in 1974.

417 KIN 123327.
418 KIN 102307.

b. I have seen a photocopy of the original memorandum but, contrary to what the Kincora Inquiry said, the names of the addressees on that document were NOT hand written and, indeed, there was only ONE addressee.

c. There is no question whatsoever of the first page being tampered with nor of two typewriters being used, albeit the Forensic Report apparently claims that this is only a "possibility".

d. At no time since the document's publication in 1985 did anyone at the MoD ask me about the document or its authenticity and I find this most odd bearing in mind the apparent importance which the committee [The Hughes Inquiry] placed on it and its contents. This is even more remarkable when one considers that I was the alleged author and that I was engaged in extensive correspondence with the Department during the period.

e. I would very much like to know, however, how any alleged changes to the front page could possibly have altered the overall content of the memorandum or what the significance is of the Report's claim that two type writers were allegedly used – other than to make the alleged alteration."[419]

566 Later in the same paragraph he said,

> "Furthermore, the document's authenticity has already been confirmed independently by other sources who were aware of its existence during the period, and the 'Irish Times' report correctly claims that it was not the only official document concerning the scandal to be in circulation at the time.
>
> Despite the forgoing, the matter of the document's authenticity is important to me and I intend to pursue this at some length in due course."[420]

567 We observe at this point that in 1986 there was no reference to Mr Wallace having submitted the document for independent forensic examination. However, no doubt that may be because he has subsequently claimed that it was Mr Foot who did so and it was not until somewhere in November 1986 that it appears contact was made with Mr Foot on behalf of Mr Wallace. See the introduction to Who Framed Colin Wallace?

419 KIN 102294.
420 KIN 102295.

568 Of the paragraphs 'a. – e.' quoted above, 'a.' possibly and 'b.' certainly, imply that the original version created by Mr Wallace was not identical with GC80 because he says "the names of the addressees were not handwritten". If that is correct, then there must have been at least one other version in existence. If it is correct, then the question of what differences there were between the version with his signature on it that appears on GC80, and the Irish Times or any other version, may be important. To say that the Irish Times version is "entirely consistent with the memorandum written by me in 1974" is meaningless without the ability to compare the two versions. In any event, it does not deny that there were differences between his memorandum and the published version.

569 The phrase "nothing more than a first draft" from the passage already quoted suggests to us that such a document would not be submitted by the author to whoever was supposed to receive the document until it was complete. That is normally what a first draft means. We consider that would be particularly the case given the rigidly hierarchical structures within the Army in HQNI, and the rigidly formulaic form in which documents were to be submitted. The proposition inherent in all of Mr Wallace's accounts that a rough draft was submitted to General Leng does not bear examination. Yet the GC80 document bears Mr Wallace's hand written signature above his typed signature. If GC80 was only "a first draft" we are in no doubt that it would not have been signed. At the very least this suggests that for whatever reason Mr Wallace sought to show that the version which has become public was in fact the final version.

570 The position becomes even more confusing when we consider what Mr Wallace wrote to Lord Trefgarne on 20 June 1986. In that letter, Mr Wallace said that there were two versions, because he had produced a further version with a new "Reference D" added under the old Reference C.

> "From my examination of the document it is almost certainly the carbon copy of my original draft version of the one now held by your Ministry. You will have noticed that the only differences between the two versions relate to the fact that I was originally under the impression that the "Reference A" referred to was entirely an RUC paper, whereas, as I later discovered, one part of it comprised an Army analysis / commentary upon the police report. When this was drawn to my attention I amended the final memo i.e. the one which your ministry now has, to take into account the correct attribution of source material. As a result, in your version "Reference C" has the title "Int comments upon the above" and a new "Reference D" has been added under the old "Reference C" title."[421]

571 Mr Wallace is there saying that he amended GC80 and prepared a "final memo". If there was another such version, we consider it even less likely that his signature would appear on GC80. No such final memo has ever been traced.

The authenticity of the 8 November 1974 / GC80 document

572 Having carefully considered all of the material to which we have so far referred, we are satisfied that there is an extremely strong circumstantial case that the 8 November 1974/GC80 document was not created in November 1974 as Mr Wallace maintains, but was created in the form in which it emerged in 1984 at a considerably later date. In reaching this conclusion we have taken into account all of the various matters to which we have referred in this section of the Report, and we set out the most important matters below.

a. Mr Wallace says GC80 was prepared in response to a request by General Leng. General Leng denied doing so, or ever seeing this document.

b. Mr Wallace's description of the document as "a first draft" is inconsistent with the implication of the passage we have already quoted from page 139 of Who Framed Colin Wallace? that the memorandum was submitted to his superiors. Why would Mr Wallace sign a document that was only a first draft?

c. The evidence of the Military witnesses to the effect that a document in that form would not have been submitted to General Leng is persuasive.

d. None of the documents referred to in the document as References A, B or C, or any of the many documents referred to therein as "flags" has been shown to have existed.

421 KIN 190212.

e. Mr Wallace could not have known of the existence of the Mason File in 1974 because it lay forgotten in Mr Bunting's drawer between 1973 and 1976.

f. No one in authority, neither the police nor Social Services, had any knowledge of Semple's abuse of residents in Kincora until 1980.

g. There were no suggestions in 1974 that residents in Kincora had been taken to hotels in Bangor to be sexually abused.

   i. Mr Garland knew nothing of that.

   ii. R 23's experiences do not support the Bangor allegations because the earliest time at which anyone in authority may have known of R 23's experiences was when Social Worker C was approached in late 1975 or early 1976.

h. Despite his many contacts with Members of Parliament and journalists about matters relating to Northern Ireland after his dismissal in 1975, GC 80 did not emerge until 1984. If it existed in 1974 there were many occasions when Mr Wallace had the opportunity to produce it.

i. There is no evidence to show that he voiced his concerns about residents of Kincora being sexually abused in Kincora to anyone in the 1970s.

573 We have also taken into account Mr Wallace's response to the Inquiry's request that he provide information and documents. His response was at first to ignore our requests. Having ignored our invitations to take part in the Kincoara Module as a core participant, and to have legal representation, if necessary at public expense, several months later after carefully studying the transcripts of the public hearings into Kincora, he sent the Inquiry a number of submissions accompanied by much documentary material. Almost all of his submissions and the accompanying material had little or no bearing on the issues the Inquiry has identified, both in correspondence to Mr Wallace, and in the published transcripts of our hearings. Mr Wallace has chosen not to answer our questions or provide the documents we requested. We can conceive of no good reason for his not doing so. Mr Wallace has engaged with the Inquiry in a fashion which demonstrated that, as he has done over the years, he is adept at avoiding pertinent questions by drawing attention to other matters which do not deal with the questions he has been asked by this Inquiry, by the Hughes Inquiry or by the Police about his allegations.

PART SIXTEEN

Mr Wallace's letter to the IPCS

574 In 1975 Mr Wallace was represented by Mr Cliff Crook of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants (IPCS) at his appeal to the CSAB against his dismissal. Among the documents sent to the Inquiry with his letter and submission of 9 September 2016 was a photocopy of a letter he says he sent to Mr Crook dated 29 September 1975. In his letter to the Inquiry of 26 September 2016 Mr Wallace referred to this letter to Mr Crook, and to an article in the Guardian on 30 May 1990. The relevant passage from the letter to Mr Crook is in the following terms.

> "My concern now is that there may be an attempt by the Ministry to deny any form of official 'dirty tricks' organisation existed within the Security Forces. For example in the Ministry's summary of my oral representations made to John Groves and Mr Fairbairn on 10 May reference is made in paragraph 3 to "actions" which I was asked to launch during the UWC strike. The word "actions" appears to have been used by MoD to conceal the fact that I referred to the attempts made by the Security Service to discredit various Loyalist Politicians, including the Rev Ian Paisley by the use of forged documents and by linking the MPs with Loyalist Paramilitary figures involved in homosexual prostitution at a children's home in Belfast. [his emphasis] I can fully understand why the Ministry would not want to put such information on record, but I wonder if evidence of that nature will be made available to the Board sub-rosa.
>
> It is clear from the above, therefore, that, within six months of leaving Northern Ireland and some 5 years before the Kincora story surfaced in the Irish Independent, I had been referring to homosexual prostitution at a children's home in Belfast."[422]

575 Whilst the words underlined by Mr Wallace refer to "homosexual prostitution", the children's home is not named. Loyalist figures could include McGrath, but "homosexual prostitution" at Kincora was not what Mr Wallace said in the 8 November 1974 document. At paragraph 4 of the document he refers to Kincora and to "allegations of homosexual assaults on inmates at the hostel".[423] The use of the term "prostitution" implies that money or money's worth changed hand in return for sexual services. That is very different from "allegations of homosexual assaults on the inmates" of Kincora.

422 KIN 124805 and 124806.
423 KIN 35081.

576 At paragraph 10(c) of the document he refers to "the claims of a prostitution ring involving juveniles and centred on Bangor". The reference in the letter to Mr Crook to "homosexual prostitution at a children's home in Belfast" does not therefore sit easily with the references to Kincora and Bangor in the 8 November 1974 document he claims he compiled less than a year before.

577 The failure of Mr Wallace to refer to Kincora by name is also curious in view of his present belief that his dismissal was due to his knowledge of what was happening in Kincora. If that was his belief in 1975, the failure to refer to Kincora in this letter, or during the hearing before the CSAB, is all the more surprising. If Mr Wallace was then so concerned about Kincora to make a phone call, which he says he did to Social Services in 1975, why did he not refer to Kincora and the abuse of children there in a clear and unambiguous fashion, rather than what at best appears to be an oblique and indirect way if it is even a reference to Kincora.

578 In the extract from the 29 September 1975 letter quoted above, Mr Wallace also refers to the oral representations he made to John Groves and Mr Fairbaim on 10 May 1975, implying that he told them about the linking of MPs "with Loyalist Paramilitary figures involved in homosexual prostitution at a children's home in Belfast". In fact the oral representations were not made on 10 May but on 30 May 1975 as Mr Wallace correctly stated in his comments on the notes dated 5 June 1975.[424] The document was incorrectly dated 10 May, an error Mr Wallace perpetuates in the 29 September 1975 letter. Given his invariable practice of pointing out mistakes and omissions he says have been made by others, if he had made such a reference during his oral representations we believe that he would have insisted that it be included. That he did not so insist suggests to us that no such references were made during the oral representations. More importantly, Mr Wallace's notes of amendments to the record of representations make no reference to homosexual prostitution at a children's home in Belfast, notwithstanding that he meticulously listed his observations and corrections to the text on 5 June 1975.[425]

424 KIN 102081.
425 KIN 102080.

579 In 1990, in the aftermath of the Ministerial Statement to the House of Commons to which we have already referred, Mr Wallace complained to the Metropolitan Police about the actions of the MoD during the CSAB appeal process. As part of the complaint his solicitor sent to the Metropolitan Police a file of papers including Mr Wallace's correspondence with Mr Crook relating to the appeal. The Inquiry has obtained a copy of the file and examined the schedule of the documents sent to the police. The schedule can be found at KIN 200028 to 200032. The letter of 29 September 1975 does not appear on that list, nor is there any reference to that letter in any subsequent correspondence between Mr Crook and Mr Wallace contained within the file. We are surprised that the file sent to the Police did not contain the letter of 29 September 1975.

580 We have taken into account all the matters to which we have referred in relation to the 29 September 1975 letter when considering its authenticity, and when we consider the overall credibility of Mr Wallace's accounts of what he knew, and what he did, about the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora from 1972 onwards.

Other witnesses whose evidence may be relevant

Michael Taylor

581 Mr Taylor was born in 1938, and in 1963 moved to Northern Ireland. He joined the ACF in 1965 and got to know Mr Wallace through the ACF. In 1968 he was one of Mr Wallace's referees when Mr Wallace joined the AIS. In December 1970 Mr Taylor applied to join the AIS and Mr Wallace was one of his referees. Mr Taylor was ultimately successful in his application, and took up his appointment with the AIS as an Information Officer on 1 March 1972. He served in that capacity at HQNI from 1972 until he was posted to Berlin in January 1976.[426] His main responsibility at HQNI was as the editor of VISOR, a newspaper for Army personnel serving in Northern Ireland.[427]

582 On 9 June 1982 he was interviewed during the Caskey Phase Two investigations, when he had the following to say about Kincora.

> "I have been asked if I ever heard about Kincora Boys' Home in my capacity whatsoever. I had never seen any official document, to my knowledge, on Kincora Boys' Home although I do recognise as a result of the situation that prevailed in Northern Ireland at this time, it may have been discussed verbally. If Wallace may have discussed Kincora with me, I cannot remember any specific detail. The names McGrath and McKeague mean something to me, although I cannot connect McGrath with any verbal conversation regards Kincora. I did not know that McGrath worked at Kincora Boys' Home, but his assumed association with the Protestant Military Organisation called 'TARA' was on record."[428]

426 KIN 190054.
427 KIN 190055.

583 On 28 March 1990 the ITN Channel 4 News Programme carried a report on the allegations relating to Kincora. Mr Taylor was one of those who was interviewed. In the course of the interview he referred to two documents, and it is clear that one was the 8 November 1974 memorandum. In the following passages from the transcript the interviewer is Robert Parker. Having referred to Mr Wallace producing two memos Mr Parker introduced Mr Taylor. The transcript continues.

"Michael Taylor: They formed a file that had been established on the… all aspects of Kincora, in which we had discovered various events going on there and those events related to the possible attraction of paramilitaries and consequently the Army intelligence put together a documentation file of Kincora itself.

Robert Parker: You have no doubt at all that you've seen these documents before in 1973 and 1974.

Michael Taylor: No doubt whatsoever."[429]

584 Mr Taylor's assertion that he had seen the 1974 document as part of a file is completely at variance with what he had said in his 1982 police statement.

585 The interviewer then refers to the 1974 memo in terms which make it clear that he is referring to the GC80 document because of the references to three sources of material, the first being "reference A, an RUC background paper on Tara." After a number of quotations from that document Michael Taylor says.

"The document attached to the memorandum was signed by Sir Peter, endorsing the document to say that he agreed with the conclusions of the memorandum and that the appropriate authorities should be notified and take action. His recommendation was that this should be brought to the notice of the RUC who were the correct body for carrying out any further investigations, and if necessary, prosecuting the people concerned."[430]

428 KIN 30133.
429 KIN 80368 and 80369.

Mr Taylor's assertion that General Leng saw the 8 November 1974 document and signed a note endorsing it contradicts what he said to the police in 1982, and raises the question that if General Leng did endorse Mr Wallace's memo in writing, why was it that Mr Wallace was unaware of that endorsement of his recommendations throughout the 1980s when he made no reference whatsoever to that? We consider it significant that there is no reference in Who Framed Colin Wallace? to any such endorsement by General Leng in either the 1989 first edition or the 1990 paperback edition. In the forward to the 1990 edition Mr Taylor is described as a staunch supporter of Mr Wallace. As the book makes clear, Mr Taylor was interviewed by Mr Foot on several occasions. If Mr Taylor had seen the document and the document added in the form of a written endorsement by General Leng we are satisfied that it is inconceivable that he would not have made that known to Mr Wallace and/or Mr Foot long before the Channel 4 News Programme of 28 March 1990.

586 In his submission to the Inquiry sent with his letter of 9 September 2016 Mr Wallace claimed that in the recorded interview of General Leng in 1990 the General recalled writing a memo. We have already examined the full transcript and we do not need to repeat what is said there. The following extract is sufficient.

"Penrose: You said in the memo according to [Mike] Taylor that the RUC and the Social Services I think ought to be brought in here because the file named men and boys who were obviously part of this abuse which we all know about since.

Leng: Yes, I recall that.

Penrose: Do you? And you said take action. They waited because obviously there had been other members suggesting this from junior officers, [sic] but it was yours that finally convinced Taylor that this was going to happen, but of course it went on for another six or seven years, but again that wasn't your fault."[431]

430 KIN 80370.
431 KIN 124651.

587 Mr Wallace claimed in his submission to the Inquiry sent with his letter of 9 September 2016,

> "I do not know if my original document was retyped after I submitted it to one of my superiors at HQNI in November 1974 and before it was passed on to other officers. I am only aware that General Peter Leng responded to the matter in a memo which instructed Information Policy to take action to ensure that the RUC took a more active part in the matters raised in the memo."[432]

588 Mr Wallace does not say how he is aware that General Leng responded in a memo, but this is an obvious reference to Mr Taylor's version of events. Again we regard it as inconceivable that Mr Wallace was and is unaware of Mr Taylor's assertions in the March 1990 Channel 4 Programme. If what Mr Taylor said in that programme was correct this was a vital and highly significant piece of corroboration of Mr Wallace's accounts, but Mr Taylor's 1990 account is irreconcilable with, his 1982 police statement. We also are satisfied that it is incompatible with the accounts Mr Wallace gave throughout the 1980's, none of which contained any such assertion. We do not consider Mr Taylor's account in the 1990 Programme to be credible.

Fred Holroyd

589 Mr Holroyd has been closely associated with Mr Wallace since the early 1980s, and has corresponded with the Inquiry in support of Mr Wallace. As we have stated earlier in this chapter, Mr Holroyd has made allegations about Army misconduct in Northern Ireland relating to knowledge he gained during his service in Northern Ireland. These matters do not relate to Kincora. The only matter that does relate to Kincora relevant to him, concerns an entry he made in a notebook.

590 Mr Holroyd made two statements to the police in 1982 during the Caskey Phase Three investigations. The first was on 22 May 1982 and made to an officer of the Royal Military Police Special Investigation Branch. In that statement he explained that he served in Northern Ireland between 7 January 1974 and June 1975 as an MIO (Military Intelligence Officer) attached to the RUC J Division, which covered south Armagh. He explained that his duties required him to have close contact with RUC Special Branch and Criminal Investigation Departments. He described his knowledge of Kincora and Mr Wallace at that time.

432 KIN 124665.

> "I am unable to be specific but I would estimate that during the middle of my tour the name 'Kincora' came to my attention. I understood that Kincora was a home, (probably run by the Social Services in N Ireland) for boys.
>
> To the best of my recollection I became aware of 'Kincora' through recreational conversation in RUC stations. It certainly did not come to my notice through any official briefing or intelligence and I did not attach any significance to 'Kincora'.
>
> The only information which came to my attention was that of rumour to the effect that a homosexual liaison had been formed between certain leading politicians and a number of boys in the home. This was general talk on occasions when I was in company with RUC officers. I am unable to recall any police officer by name who mentioned the events or alleged events at 'Kincora'. It was not my understanding that this had ever been the subject of an official complaint to the RUC.
>
> I did not attach any significance to this information and did not on any occasion pass the rumour about 'Kincora' to my direct superior in the Army nor to any other officers in HQ Northern Ireland.
>
> I do not think there was any official police inquiry into 'Kincora' at that time. I am not acquainted with Colin Wallace. I was not getting any military intelligence from anyone working or involved at Kincora and my knowledge of the subject is limited to what I have outlined in this statement."[433]

591 On 8 June 1982 he made a further statement, this time to DI Mack of the RUC. In it he said that since the previous interview and statement that he had made

> "...I have found a reference to Kincora in my notebook. The note is undated but was made in May 1973 prior to the 13th. It states 'Kincora Belfast – Rev Smyth's, Paisley's lot – queers'. As far as this entry is concerned I did not act on it as it was rumour and meant nothing to me. I do not know who gave me this information but I may have got it from someone in Portadown Police Station. ...I did not hear anything about Kincora at any other police establishment. I have given thought to who may have talked to me about Kincora. I have the feeling it may have been Detective Sergeant McMahon but on this point I'm not sure."[434]

433 KIN 30164.
434 KIN 30165.

592 Whilst the notebook entry appears in the notebook prior to 13 May 1973, as Mr Holroyd's tour of duty in Northern Ireland did not start until 7 January 1974 he must have made the entry sometime between 7 January 1974 and June 1975. It appears as if he made use of an old diary as a notebook on that occasion, whenever that occasion was. The entry itself "Kincora Belfast – Rev Smyth's, Paisley's lot – queers" says nothing about sexual abuse of children in Kincora. The references are indicative of jottings containing rumours about Tara of the type we have already examined in the Special Branch document of 17 April 1973 which referred to McGrath as a reputed homosexual.[435] Other relevant information was contained in the Special Branch report of 5 July 1974, which referred to McGrath as a house father at Kincora hostel.[436] Mr Holroyd's recollection in 1982 of what he believes he was told during his tour of duty in Northern Ireland does not gain any additional support from the terms of the notebook entry. We have taken Mr Holroyd's 1982 account of his recollection of events in 1974 to 1975 into account when examining the issues relating to Kincora and when examining Mr Wallace's credibility.

Relevant opinions as to Mr Wallace's credibility in relation to other matters

593 Mr Wallace has frequently pointed to comments made upon his evidence by Mr Justice Barron who conducted an Inquiry into the Dublin and Monaghan bombings. He has also referred to the Saville Inquiry into Bloody Sunday. He has put forward both as supporting his general credibility. For example, in his submission to the Inquiry he quotes the following assessment of him by Mr Justice Barron in support of his criticism of counsel to the Inquiry for saying that Mr Wallace's evidence to that Inquiry had been rejected.

> "In a personal assessment of me and my evidence, Judge Barron said;
>
> "In person, Wallace comes across as intelligent, self assured, and possessed of a quiet yet unwavering moral conviction. Though he has reasons enough to be bitter – the abrupt and unjust ending of a promising career in Northern Ireland, five years spent in prison on a conviction which has since been quashed – he displays no outward > signs of resentment towards individuals or institutions. He remains intensly loyal to his country and to the Army: In so far as he has a quarrel, it is with individuals rather than the institutions concerned. He says he believes that much of the propaganda work undertaken by Information Policy was justifiable in the interest of defeating subversives and promoting a political solution to the troubles. When speaking of matters directly within his own experience, the Inquiry believes him to be a highly knowledgeable witness. His analyses and opinions, though derived partly from personal knowledge and partly from information gleaned since his time in Northern Ireland, should also be treated with seriousness and respect".[437]

435 KIN 55076.
436 KIN 55081.

However, at page 163 of his interim 2003 Report Mr Justice Barron made the following pertinent point about Mr Wallace.

> "The covert nature of Mr Wallace's work, and his experience in manipulating truth and untruth to serve particular ends makes it especially difficult to assess the worth of his allegations..."

594 Mr Justice Barron gave evidence to the Joint Committee on Justice, Equality, Defence and Women's Rights of the Oireachtas (The Irish Parliament), which was set up to consider the Report of his Independent Commission of Inquiry into the Dublin and Monaghan bombings. The final Report of the Joint Committee records Mr Justice Barron's views on Mr Wallace's claims about collusion between some of those involved in the bombings and RUC Special Branch and Military Intelligence.

> "2.13 Mr Justice Barron also quoted from a letter from Mr. Colin Wallace, former British Army Senior Information Officer in Army Headquarters, to a former colleague, in which he wrote on 14 August, 1975:
>
> > '...There is good evidence that the Dublin Monaghan bombings were a reprisal for the Irish Government's role in bringing about the Executive. According to one of Craig's people, some of those involved the Youngs, the Jacksons, Mulholland, Hanna, Kerr and McConnell were working closely with SB and Int at that time.'
>
> Mr Justice Barron remarked in his Report that Mr. Wallace was making these allegations as early as 1975, but noted that his letter does not contain any objective evidence to support the claims...

437 KIN 124644 and 124645.

> 2.14 Even taking into account all the information received from Colin Wallace, John Weir and Fred Holroyd, Mr. Justice Barron felt he could not go beyond the conclusions reached in his report in relation to collusion."[438]

595 We are satisfied that it is clear from these passages that Mr Justice Barron was not persuaded by Mr Wallace's evidence, and we consider that counsel was justified in describing Mr Wallace's evidence to the Barron Inquiry as "rejected".

596 Mr Wallace also calls in aid his evidence to the Saville Inquiry into Bloody Sunday. The Saville Inquiry dealt with his evidence at 9.214, 9.215 and 9.217.

> "9.214 Colin Wallace, who in January 1972 was a civilian Army Public Relations Officer based at HQNI, gave evidence to this Inquiry that Unionist Politicians took an entirely different view of events at Magilligan Strand and were furious at the apparent inability of the Parachute Regiment to deal effectively with the marchers. His recollection was that the Stormont Government was very concerned about the adverse reaction of Protestants who saw on television images of apparently illegal marches unchecked by the security forces. Colin Wallace stated that complaints from Unionist Politicians to Downing Street led to the Ministry of Defence issuing a directive to the effect that the scene such as those at Magilligan should never again appear on television screens.
>
> 9.215 No documents have been found that provide support for this evidence of Colin Wallace.
>
> 9.217 In these circumstances, we are of the view that we cannot rely on Colin Wallace's evidence on this point. We consider that his recollection in this regard is faulty."[439]

597 Again we are satisfied that counsel to the Inquiry was justified in describing Mr Wallace's evidence to the Saville Inquiry as having been rejected.

598 Although Mr Wallace has sought to rely upon the favourable view expressed of him by Mr Justice Barron, and by his evidence to the Saville Inquiry, it can be seen that on crucial matters his evidence was not accepted by either Inquiry.

438 http://www.dublinmonaghanbombings.org/DubMonFinal.pdf, pp.19 and 20.
439 KIN 124618.

599 Mr Wallace has sought to portray these as judicial commendations of his reliability, and we therefore consider it appropriate to recall the comments made by the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales in the course of delivering the judgement of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) when quashing Mr Wallace's conviction for the manslaughter of Jonathan Lewis, and considering whether to order that Mr Wallace face a retrial.

600 At page 11 of the Judgment Lord Bingham said.

> "There can be no doubt but that the appellant's [Mr Wallace] dishonest and deceptive course of conduct raised and raises a formidable case against him. It may be that even if directed in accordance with the most recent authorities and on the facts as they have now emerged, a jury would still have convicted and properly convicted. ...it seems to us possible, even if unlikely, that the appellant initially withheld reference to his meeting with the deceased out of a desire to conceal the subject matter of that meeting; and from that moment onwards he found himself drawn into an ever-increasing spiral of deception."[440]

Conclusions as to Mr Wallace's credibility

601 Because of the complexity of the various matters to which we have referred and which relate to Mr Wallace, we dealt separately and in some detail with different matters relating to the accounts he has given over the years about Kincora. Looking at these matters in their entirety we reached the following conclusions.

1 Mr Wallace was an extremely energetic and hardworking member of the Army Information Service who earned high commendations for his work from his superiors.

2 Part of that work involved him in fabricating untrue information and forging documents to provide supporting evidence for the false information.

3 He did this with the knowledge and approval of some, though not all, of those with whom he worked.

4 Mr Wallace was proud of his effectiveness and considerable ability in disseminating false information and creating forged documents.

440 KIN 122068.

5 In addition to his conventional duties in providing information to, and answering questions from, journalists he was also leaking information and documents to journalists about matters that he knew should not have been disclosed, because he admitted passing a classified document to Mr Fisk and to giving Mr Fisk information about helicopter spares.

6 The investigation carried out in 1974 by the Security Service at the request of the Northern Ireland Office produced strong circumstantial evidence to show that Mr Wallace had leaked other documents as well.

7 The contemporary records to which we have referred relating to discussions at the highest level show conclusively that Mr Wallace was not dismissed because of anything he claims he knew about Kincora but because he was believed to be leaking documents.

8 We are satisfied that Mr Wallace knew in 1975 that that was the sole reason for his dismissal, and he knows now that his dismissal had nothing whatever to do with Kincora.

9 Mr Wallace made no reference at the time of his dismissal, or in the weeks and months afterwards, to any concern he had about Kincora when he was contesting his dismissal.

10 Following his dismissal the MoD deliberately interfered with the CSAB process to secure a favourable outcome. As Mr Wallace justifiably said they "rigged" the proceedings.

11 Mr Wallace's concerns at the time related not to Kincora, but to the denial by the MoD of the full range of his responsibilities. Whether he was justifiably dismissed or not, the MoD deliberately chose not to disclose his full range of responsibilities as shown in the draft Job Specification.

12 This failure, and the secret briefing of the chairman of the CSAB, constituted major injustices which were not recognised and corrected until he was paid £30,000 compensation following the investigation by Mr Calcutt QC in 1990.

13 Mr Wallace was not concerned about Clockwork Orange or Kincora at the time of his dismissal; his concerns about Clockwork Orange surfaced later.

14 He was proved right to some degree at least that Clockwork Orange existed, when the MoD eventually admitted in 1990 that there had been a Clockwork Orange proposal, although this had been denied for many years.

15 At three crucial periods in his life Mr Wallace lied to the police. The first was when he was questioned in 1975; the second was when he was under investigation after the death of Jonathan Lewis; and the third was when he lied to D/Supt Caskey when questioned about the murder of Brian McDermott. He showed himself to be someone who is prepared to lie when it suited him.

16 Key aspects of his accounts of his knowledge of, and actions in respect of, sexual abuse at Kincora cannot be corroborated by anyone. His account of how he came to learn about sexual abuse at Kincora by meeting the Social Worker does not appear plausible, there is no record of him contacting Social Services in 1975, and those to whom he claims he spoke about Kincora after his dismissal have denied that he did so.

17 Between 1976 until his arrest in 1980 he was in frequent contact with Members of Parliament and with journalists, but none of the contemporary documents show that he raised Kincora in any way, nor did those to whom he said he spoke in some manner or other about Kincora and sexual abuse support his evidence.

18 During this period, although he had ample opportunity to do so, and might have been expected to do so if he really was concerned to prevent further abuse of residents of Kincora, the 8 November 1974 document was never referred to or produced until it emerged in 1984, many years after it purported to have been created.

19 Over the years he has consistently avoided answering relevant questions about his knowledge and the 8 November 1974 document when asked to do so by the police, by the Hughes Inquiry and by this Inquiry. Instead of answering pertinent questions frankly and openly he has reacted by seeking to divert attention by conflating matters such as Clockwork Orange and Kincora, and referring to matters that are of no relevance to the issues about which the police, the Hughes Inquiry or this Inquiry sought to obtain information.

20 The 8 November 1974 document is central to Mr Wallace's credibility. No credible witness ever saw it in and around the time when, if Mr Wallace is correct, it must have gone through several hands including those of Sir Peter Leng.

21 There are many other unanswered questions about this document, such as its layout, and the confusing and changing accounts as to how many drafts there where, or whether the document was ever submitted, and if so to whom and in what state.

22 Above all, several important pieces of information contained in, or referred to in, that document either did not exist at the time, such as the allegations clearly referring to R 13, or could not have been known to Mr Wallace in 1974 as in the case of the Mason File.

23 We do not accept that the 8 November 1974 document as contained in GC80 was created in 1974, and we are satisfied that it was created long after November 1974.

602 Taking all of these matters into consideration we are satisfied that Mr Wallace cannot be regarded as truthful in his accounts of what he knew about sexual abuse in Kincora, or what he did with that knowledge, in 1972 to 1974.

PART SEVENTEEN

Visits by officials to Kincora

603 At page 145 of his book The Kincora Scandal, Chris Moore refers to an account by a former Military Intelligence Officer he refers to as "Dennis" driving a civilian to Kincora "at the end of 1975 or early in 1976". The Inquiry has been able to identify "Dennis", and at the Inquiry's request the MoD traced Dennis who provided a witness statement to the Inquiry. In it he described how he was instructed to drive an unnamed visitor to East Belfast. He collected his passenger at HQNI at night, he believes around 7pm. At his passenger's direction he drove to a house in East Belfast that he now knows to be Kincora. His passenger entered the building where he remained for a period which Dennis describes as not being sufficiently longer or shorter than an hour, i.e., approximately one hour. When his passenger emerged Dennis drove him back to HQNI.

604 His passenger did not identify himself, but Dennis said he formed the impression his passenger was most probably civilian rather than military, something he thought little of at the time. Dennis described the man as,

> "...aged approximately mid-40s with somewhat curly dark hair, about 5ft 7 inches in height, slim build, pointed features and wearing what appeared to be a suit under a fawn coloured raincoat".[441]

This description of the episode conveys a remarkable grasp of detail of an otherwise unremarkable event 40 years before, even allowing for the possibility that Dennis was able to refresh his memory from the account he gave to Chris Moore in the course of Mr Moore's researches for The Kincora Scandal. It may be that there was a visit, but some of the detail may have been affected by the passage of time. If Dennis's account is reliable, it suggests that the Army provided transport to and from Kincora, probably in early 1976, to a person who wished to visit what was by then known to several agencies to be McGrath's place of work. That such an occasion occurred cannot be ruled out. There are two possible explanations for such a visit. The first is that there was a political, or security, intelligence purpose for the visit. Although Tara was believed to be of peripheral importance in early 1976, that does not mean it was necessarily of no importance. We cannot exclude the possibility that an official might wish to speak to McGrath about political matters, unlikely though that may appear to be in the light of all the references to which we have referred in which it is said that little was known of Tara in early 1976.

441 KIN 5073.

605 The other reason could be that it was for some form of sexual assignation or enquiry. Such a reason appears highly unlikely in view of all the evidence we examined in chapter 26 to the effect that none of the residents recall visitors by men coming to the building for such purposes.

606 If there was such a visitor, it cannot have been the occasion described by Richard Kerr. In chapter 26 we examined his description coming home early from school one day and entering a room with three men in it. Richard Kerr was at Kincora from July 1975 when he was fourteen and he reached the school leaving age of 16 in May 1977 when he was still living there. He was therefore a resident of Kincora during the winters of 1975 to 1976 and of 1976 to 1977. His account was that he came home early from school because it was snowing, so he must have returned in daylight hours. The visit described by Dennis was at night, after 7pm when it was dark.

607 As we have explained, Richard Kerr has alleged that he was sexually abused by Sir Maurice Oldfield, but the description of his passenger given by Dennis makes it clear that the passenger was not Sir Maurice Oldfield. As can be seen from the photograph that accompanied his obituary in The Times of 12 March 1981 he was not slim, did not have dark curly hair, nor had he pointed features. By early 1976 he was 61 because he was born in November 1915.[442]

Sir Maurice Oldfield

608 Apart from the allegation by Richard Kerr, allegations were made in the media after his death that Sir Maurice Oldfield visited Kincora, and/or had contact with McGrath. Sir Maurice Oldfield was a member of the SIS from 1947 and became Chief of the Service in 1973 and remained as Chief until he retired in January 1978. In October 1979 he was asked by the Prime Minister to take on the newly created post of Security Coordinator in Northern Ireland. Because of the risk to his life that this post, and his previous history, created, he was assigned police officers in London who guarded his flat, and others who accompanied him when he left the flat. As the result of a casual conversation with the porter on the desk of the block of flats in which Sir Maurice lived that took place in November 1979, one of Sir Maurice's protection officers was told that Sir Maurice was homosexual. The protection officer immediately reported this conversation to his superiors in the Metropolitan Police. The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police reported this matter to the Home Secretary, who informed the Prime Minister. On 22 November 1979 the Secretary to the Cabinet wrote to the Permanent Undersecretary of the Home Office that the Prime Minister had decided that Sir Maurice's appointment should not be extended, and should be brought to an end as soon as reasonably possible.[443]

442 KIN 104320.

609 His appointment was terminated soon afterwards and Sir Maurice returned to private life in 1980. He soon became gravely ill and died aged 65 on 11 March 1981. Despite the necessity for dispensing with his services because of the revelation of his homosexuality, the Prime Minister wrote to him thanking him for his public service to which he replied on 25 June 1980.

610 Because of the nature of his admissions and the concerns that these created that he may have been vulnerable to blackmail by foreign intelligence services there was considerable concern about the nature and extent of his homosexuality. In March 1980 he denied to the Secretary to the Cabinet that he was a practising homosexual, nevertheless a direction was given that a full review should be undertaken of his Positive Vetting clearance. An investigation was then carried out by MI5. The investigation included thirteen interviews of Sir Maurice between 25 April 1980 and 7 January 1981 during which his life since leaving school was thoroughly investigated.

611 The Director General of MI5 reported the outcome of the investigation to the Secretary of the Cabinet on 19 February 1981. In his letter to the Secretary of the Cabinet of 19 February 1981, Sir Howard Smith, the Director General of MI5, observed that whilst Sir Maurice:

> "…revealed further details of his homosexual activities during the investigation, it is probable he did not admit the full extent of those activities. It is clear that he was not very discreet in his homosexual relations and that he laid himself dangerously open to compromise [by foreign intelligence services] through his admitted homosexual relations with hotel stewards in the Far-East during the 1950s."[444]

443 KIN 104314.
444 KIN 104317-104318.

612 It is against that background of a possible, if not probable, failure by Sir Maurice Oldfield to disclose every aspect of the homosexual activities in which he had engaged that the Inquiry has examined the allegations that he may have visited Kincora, had dealings with McGrath, or may have had homosexual relations with residents of Kincora, whether as Head of the Secret Intelligence Service from 1973 until his retirement in January 1978, or during his subsequent period as Security Coordinator in Northern Ireland from October 1979.

613 One of the matters raised with him during an MI5 interview on 28 March 1980 was whether he had homosexual relations after he took up his position as Security Coordinator, to which he replied that it was quite impossible for him to have any such relations from the time he took up the "Irish appointment" and was placed under guard.[445] Insofar as that remark may have included homosexual relations in London during his time as Security Coordinator that was almost certainly untrue as the circumstances which led to the discovery of his homosexuality suggest.

614 Nevertheless, so far as his time in Northern Ireland as Security Coordinator was concerned, while he was physically present in Northern Ireland Sir Maurice Oldfield was closely guarded for his own safety. His private secretary during his time as Security Coordinator explained to the RUC in 1982 that:

> "For security reasons Sir Maurice always travelled in Northern Ireland with a police escort and was accompanied by police officers whenever he left the Stormont Estate."[446]

It would therefore have been extremely difficult for Sir Maurice Oldfield to have visited Kincora, or to have homosexual relations with anyone in Northern Ireland, without such a visit being known to his private secretary or the police officers who accompanied him, or without such relations being suspected.

615 SIS provided the Inquiry with a hand written note on a document created by another SIS Officer in 2001. The handwritten note reads:

> "MO was in N. Ireland at the time".

This follows immediately after an entry which reads:

> "[redacted] Colin Wallace the Army Officer engaged in psyops in N. Ireland in the 70s. He went to prison on a manslaughter > conviction. On release he attempted to clear his name. It was a cause celebre".[447]

445 KIN 105274.
446 KIN 1987.

616 The Inquiry asked SIS to identify any material in SIS records that would enable the meaning of the comment, or what it referred to, to be understood. SIS have told the Inquiry that the writer of the hand written paragraphs on the document is unknown, and the person who composed the type written note upon which these words were written left the Service in 2001, and efforts to contact the author had been unsuccessful.[448] In 2001 someone in SIS appears to have believed that Sir Maurice Oldfield was in Northern Ireland in the 1970s, but the basis for that belief, and whether it was accurate or not, have not been established. If the SIS are correct, Sir Maurice would not have arrived in Northern Ireland until long after Colin Wallace left, in which case the unknown author of the note was mistaken. In their response to the Inquiry Warning Letter SIS suggested that it was more likely that the annotation was no more than a 'flag' for the writer or someone else to follow up at a later stage, and that there being nothing to pursue the matter required no further comment.

617 SIS Officer F worked in the IJS on behalf of SIS at HQNI from 1973 to 1975. His statement to the Inquiry suggests that Sir Maurice did not visit Northern Ireland in the early years of his period as Head of the SIS. However, Officer F's statement does not assist in establishing whether Sir Maurice may have done so from 1975 to 1979 after Officer F's service in Northern Ireland.

618 Whilst on balance the absence of any reference in the SIS records to Sir Maurice Oldfield being in Northern Ireland before he became Security Coordinator in 1979 is indicative that he was not, however, the absence of an explanation for the note to which we have referred means that we cannot put the matter any higher than that.

The 2011 SIS note

619 In 2011 SIS Officer G examined four ring binders with material relating to Sir Maurice Oldfield, including the 1980 MI5 investigation. Officer G made the following comments at the start of his note.

> "The relationship [Oldfield] had with the Kincora Boys' Home (KBH) in Belfast and subsequent 'rent boy sex scandal' is, in my view the only remaining potential sensitivity in the papers.

447 KIN 3646.
448 KIN 3647.

> The sensitivity being that [Oldfield] may have a link to (by association through his friendship of the KBH Head) of the alleged crimes at the boys' home. Given the current climate surrounding similar cases, it may at some point emerge as an issue."[449]

620 Paragraph five of the paper written by Officer G contains the following comment.

> "More worryingly is the small collection of papers in file three which relate to the relationship [Oldfield] had with the Head of the Kincora Boys' Home (KBH) in Belfast."[450]

621 The reference to a friendship with the Head of the KBH, obviously the Kincora Boys' Home from the context, is potentially significant because, if correct, it is utterly at variance with the mass of evidence examined by the Inquiry suggesting that there could not have been any such relationship or friendship.

622 SIS Officer A has stated to the Inquiry that this was explored further with SIS Officer G in 2014 having reviewed his 2011 note, and the underlying material. Officer G commented:

> "Having been given full access to the papers, though my focus was on volumes 1-3, I conclude that my original statement was imperfectly drafted. As it stands this particular sentence is at odds with that which immediately follows it. This institution became the focus of press allegations of a homosexual vice ring – [Oldfield] was never implicated."[451]

This appears to infer that when he drafted the 2011 note Officer G did not make it sufficiently clear in the opening sentences that what he was referring to were allegations relating to Sir Maurice Oldfield, and not to material from which it might be inferred, or confirmed, that the allegations might be true.

623 This was a highly contentious issue that had received a great deal of attention inside the SIS on occasions in the past, quite apart from equally detailed attention in other Government departments, as well as critical comments in Parliament and elsewhere. We were not impressed by the bland reference to the document being "imperfectly drafted", and consider that the lack of care shown merits criticism.

449 KIN 3639.
450 KIN 3640.
451 KIN 3641.

624 The Inquiry has examined all the material held by SIS relating to Sir Maurice Oldfield as described by SIS Officer A in his statement of 8 December 2016 and found nothing to indicate that Sir Maurice Oldfield ever visited Northern Ireland before he took up his appointment as Security Coordinator in October 1979.[452]

625 Having reviewed all of the evidence we are satisfied that the allegations about Sir Maurice Oldfield's connections with Kincora have no substance.

Clifford Smyth

626 For several years Clifford Smyth was closely associated with William McGrath, both personally and politically. As we have seen from many of the documents examined, and as he accepted in his statement to the Inquiry of 5 July 2016, Clifford Smyth was closely associated with McGrath in Tara for several years. In addition, for some five years from about 1968 until he left in 1973 to get married, he was a paying lodger in the McGrath household where McGrath lived with his wife and three children.[453] Mr Smyth told the Inquiry that he did not suspect McGrath of abusing his position in Kincora, and no claims or rumours that McGrath was abusing his position in Kincora ever came to his attention until after 1980.[454]

627 In 1996 Mr Smyth contributed a lengthy forward to Chris Moore's The Kincora Scandal. He said.

> "Furthermore, the police knew that McGrath had been instrumental in founding an organisation called Tara. There is evidence to suggest that this organisation may have been controlled and manipulated by British Intelligence for its own ends.
>
> This book will argue that in forming Tara, William McGrath acted on the directions of his Intelligence handlers and that he set in motion events which led directly to the emergence of loyalist paramilitarism or counter-terrorism. He was not alone; others served similar ends. The questions that such evidence raises are devastating. Did British intelligence maintain a shadowy but firm control over loyalist paramilitarism from the early 1970's onwards? Were the innocent lives and future prospects of male adolescents sacrificed to the cynical manipulation of one of the most mysterious and intriguing figures to emerge from the tragedy of Northern Ireland?"[455]

452 KIN 3647.
453 KIN 4506 and 4507.
454 KIN 4507.
455 KIN 4513 and 4514.

628 In his statement to the Inquiry Mr Smyth accepted that he did not have, and does not have, evidence for his propositions that McGrath was an agent of the state and that Kincora involved an operation run by the Intelligence Agencies, and that he speculated because there had been years of speculation about Kincora by others, and the allegations had been largely met by silence from the authorities.[456]

Allegations about other British Officials in the Northern Ireland Office

629 In early 1982 the then Political Correspondent of the BBC in Northern Ireland, the late W (Billy) D Flackes told Mr David Gilliland, who was the Director of Information Services for the Northern Ireland Office, that four former officials of the NIO had been concerned in homosexual activity, three of whom were believed to have been involved in homosexual offences against children. Mr Gilliland later told the police that Mr Flackes named the four officials as Peter England, Brian Watkins, Leslie Imrie and Peter Bell. It was also alleged to Mr Gilliland that the person who later became Sir Maurice Oldfield's private secretary had been the subject of an attempted indecent assault by Peter England.

630 Mr Flackes was interviewed by D/Supt Caskey on 6 April 1982 about these allegations. He declined to make a written statement, but said that the information concerning the four officials was common gossip and had been for years. Mr Flackes said he had no knowledge of any criminal acts, and nothing to indicate a vice or prostitution ring.

631 Mr Hewitt who was Sir Maurice Oldfield's private secretary while Sir Maurice was Security Coordinator in Northern Ireland, told the police that he had never been assaulted by Mr England.[457] Mr England died on 24 August 1978. Mr Bell was interviewed by D/Supt Caskey on 7 April 1982. He denied the allegations relating to him.[458] Mr Imrie was interviewed on 26 April 1982 and provided a written statement dated 28 April 1982. He also denied the allegations and denied that he was homosexual. He referred to a report in Private Eye relating to his conviction in April 1979 for masturbating in a public place in London, saying that he denied the allegation and felt the outcome was unjust.

456 KIN 4506.
457 KIN 1986.
458 KIN 1983.

He denied that he was homosexual, or having homosexual relationships while he was in Northern Ireland in 1972/1973.[459]

632 Mr Flackes said these allegations were common gossip and had been circulating among journalists and others for years.[460] The Inquiry has found no evidence to support the allegations that these individuals were involved with homosexual activity connected in any way with Kincora residents.

633 During the process of examination by the Inquiry of other files after the conclusion of the public hearings, Inquiry Counsel raised a number of issues with MI5, and their response to these issues was contained in a further witness statement by Witness 9004 dated 29 November 2016. We do not consider it necessary to refer to each of the matters raised therein; they can be seen in the statement which can be found at KIN 4135 and following.

Reference by SIS Officer to an Agent 'aware of sexual malpractice'

634 A reference by SIS Officer A in his witness statement of 27 May 2016 to "at least one agent who was aware of sexual malpractice at [Kincora] and who may have mentioned this to his SIS or Security Service Case officer" prompted Officer 9004 to deal with this. A Note for File dated 17 October 1989 which was written by MI5 Officer 1 contained a record of the meeting with the SIS Officer concerned. That note refers to a particular CHIS whose identity is known to the Inquiry. MI5 Officer 1 expressed a view in that record that some of the information on the CHIS's file could be "incorrectly interpreted".[461]

635 In paragraph 9 of his witness statement Officer 9004 concluded:

> "Extensive reviews of its files enables MI5 to confirm that no MI5 CHIS produced intelligence about child abuse at Kincora prior to the media revelations of January 1980."[462]

459 KIN 1993.
460 KIN 1982.
461 KIN 4136.
462 KIN 4136.

Reference by ADCI to 'false files' in 1982

636 In a telex sent on 29/30 June 1982 by the MI5 Assistant Director and Coordinator of Intelligence (ADCI) he referred to the possibility of creating "false files" in anticipation of lines of enquiry which it was anticipated D/Supt Caskey would seek to follow in his Caskey Phase Three investigation into Kincora.[463] The use of the expression "false files" demonstrates that a senior MI5 officer considered the possibility of creating a "false", that is a misleading or untrue, file to show to the police. This reference could be interpreted to mean either (a) that such a file would be composed of fabricated documents, or (b) that genuine documents would be brought together from other files but placed in a single file in a manner that would conceal sensitive material. Whichever was in the officer's mind when he used the expression, the use of the expression "false files" was at best unwise and at worst demonstrated a willingness to deceive the police.

637 The relevant portion of the telex relates to whether MI5 should disclose the identity of one of its agents to D/Supt Caskey because MI5 had not told the RUC Special Branch that the person was an MI5 source. The MI5 officer's telex continued:

> "We will also ask HSB [Head of Special Branch]/DHSB [Deputy Head of Special Branch] about the status of this particular enquiry and what is likely to happen to any report that is produced. We assume Caskey is an astute police officer and we should be in difficulty if we attempt to deceive him and manufacture false files or deny the existence of real ones."[464]

638 The context of the telex makes it clear that the idea was only raised to be discarded by the officer concerned, and we are satisfied the suggestion was not pursued in this instance.

463 KIN 4182.
464 KIN 4182.

APPENDIX 1: List of Search Terms circulated by NIO, 18 November 2014

Search terms notified by the NIO, after consultation with the Inquiry, to HMG Departments and Agencies in Sir Jonathan Stephens's letter of 18 November 2014. Some Departments and Agencies augmented this list with additional search terms and variant spellings (the reference to "Valetta" below is to the Valetta Park Hostel in Newtownards, County Down).

Bawnmore

Bernardos, Ravelston Parade

Boy's Home and Northern Ireland

Brian Gemmell

Child abuse and Northern Ireland

Children's Homes and Northern Ireland

Colin Wallace

Hughes/Hughes Inquiry

Institutional abuse

Joseph Mains

Richard Kerr

Kincora

Kincora Boys' home

Kincora Boys' home inquiry

Mike Taylor

Nazareth Lodge

Palmerston

Rathgael

Raymond Semple

Rubane Boys' Home (in the context of which a James McGuigan was charged with criminal offences)

Tara

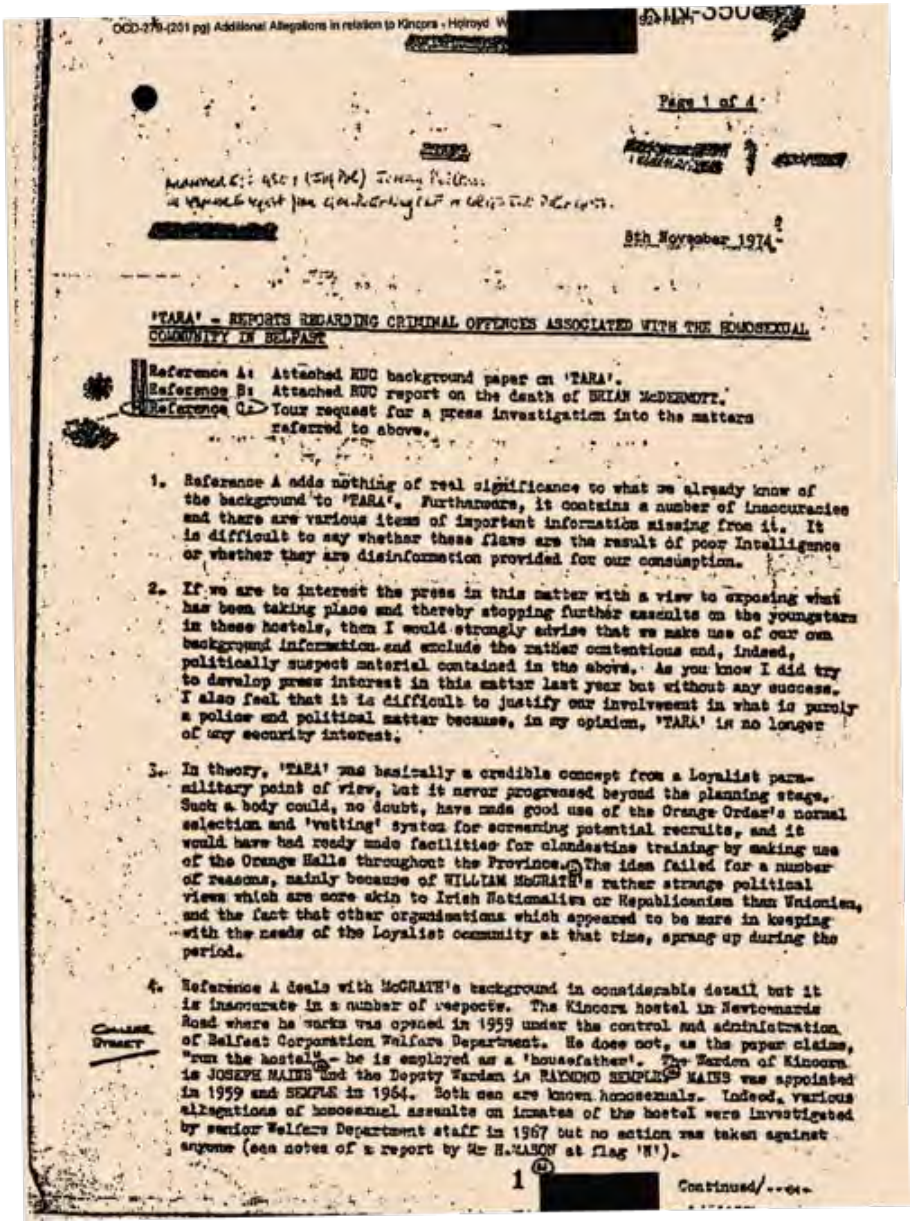
Valetta

William McGrath

Williamson House

Manor House, Lisburn

APPENDIX 2: Memorandum dated 8 November 1974 / GC80 Document



OCD-279-(201 pg) Additional Allegations in relation to Kincora - Holroyd W [redacted]

Page 1 of 4

[redacted]

8th November 1974

'TARA' - REPORTS REGARDING CRIMINAL OFFENCES ASSOCIATED WITH THE HOMOSEXUAL COMMUNITY IN BELFAST

Reference A: Attached RUC background paper on 'TARA'.
Reference B: Attached RUC report on the death of BRIAN McDERMOTT.
Reference C: Your request for a press investigation into the matters referred to above.

1. Reference A adds nothing of real significance to what we already know of the background to 'TARA'. Furthermore, it contains a number of inaccuracies and there are various items of important information missing from it. It is difficult to say whether these flaws are the result of poor Intelligence or whether they are disinformation provided for our consumption.

2. If we are to interest the press in this matter with a view to exposing what has been taking place and thereby stopping further assaults on the youngsters in these hostels, then I would strongly advise that we make use of our own background information and exclude the rather contentious and, indeed, politically suspect material contained in the above. As you know I did try to develop press interest in this matter last year but without any success. I also feel that it is difficult to justify our involvement in what is purely a police and political matter because, in my opinion, 'TARA' is no longer of any security interest.

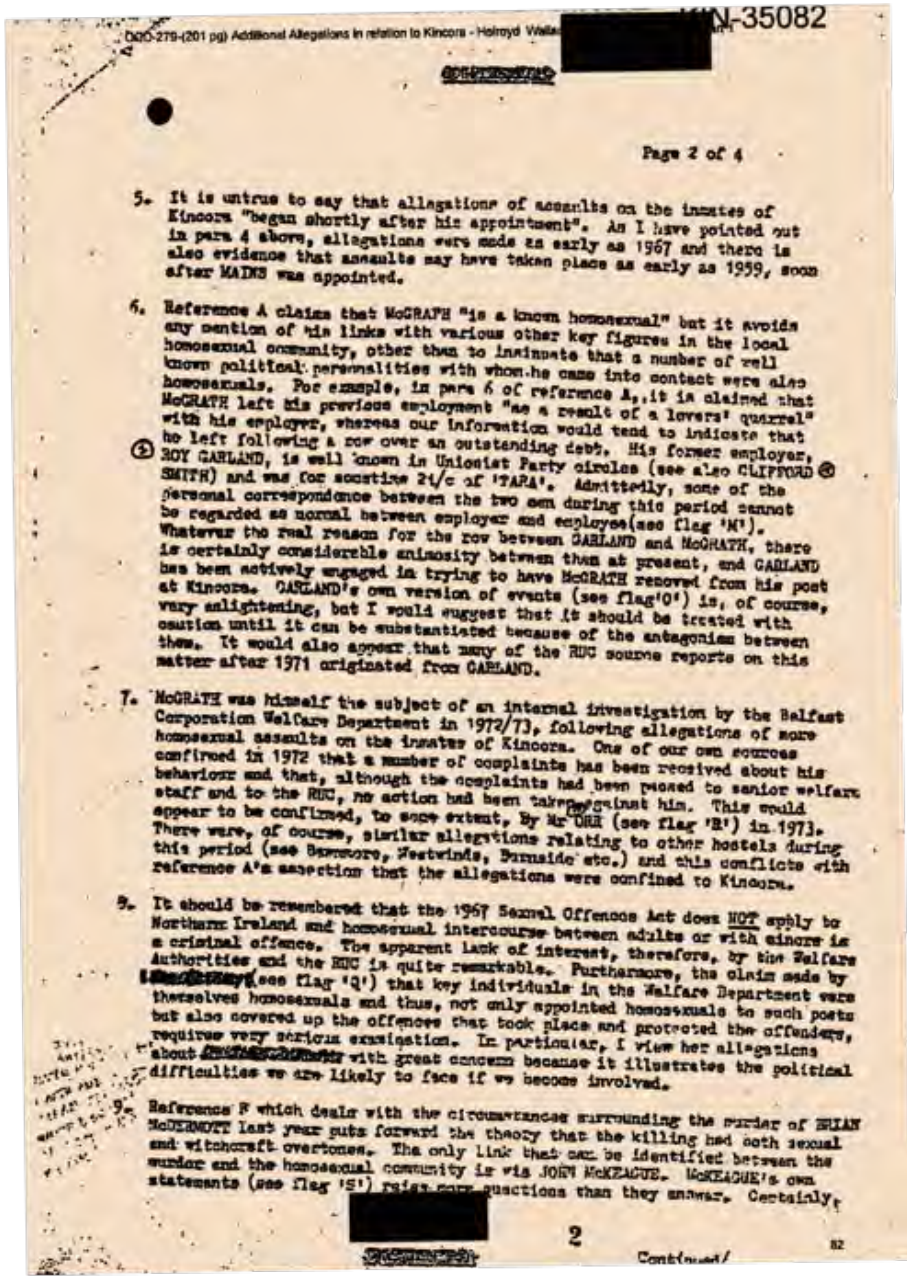
3. In theory, 'TARA' was basically a credible concept from a Loyalist para-military point of view, but it never progressed beyond the planning stage. Such a body could, no doubt, have made good use of the Orange Order's normal selection and 'vetting' system for screening potential recruits, and it would have had ready made facilities for clandestine training by making use of the Orange Halls throughout the Province. The idea failed for a number of reasons, mainly because of WILLIAM McGRATH's rather strange political views which are more akin to Irish Nationalism or Republicanism than Unionism, and the fact that other organisations which appeared to be more in keeping with the needs of the Loyalist community at that time, sprang up during the period.

4. Reference A deals with McGRATH's background in considerable detail but it is inaccurate in a number of respects. The Kincora hostel in Newtownards Road where he works was opened in 1959 under the control and administration of Belfast Corporation Welfare Department. He does not, as the paper claims, "run the hostel" - he is employed as a 'housefather'. The Warden of Kincora is JOSEPH MAINS and the Deputy Warden is RAYMOND SEMPLE. MAINS was appointed in 1959 and SEMPLE in 1964. Both men are known homosexuals. Indeed, various allegations of homosexual assaults on inmates of the hostel were investigated by senior Welfare Department staff in 1967 but no action was taken against anyone (see notes of a report by Mr H.MASON at flag 'H').

College Street

1 [redacted]

Continued/...



DOD-279-(201 pg) Additional Allegations in relation to Kincora - Holroyd Walla[redacted] KIN-35082

[redacted]

Page 2 of 4

5. It is untrue to say that allegations of assaults on the inmates of Kincora "began shortly after his appointment". As I have pointed out in para 4 above, allegations were made as early as 1967 and there is also evidence that assaults may have taken place as early as 1959, soon after MAINS was appointed.

6. Reference A claims that McGRATH "is a known homosexual" but it avoids any mention of his links with various other key figures in the local homosexual community, other than to insinuate that a number of well known political personalities with whom he came into contact were also homosexuals. For example, in para 6 of reference A, it is claimed that McGRATH left his previous employment "as a result of a lovers' quarrel" with his employer, whereas our information would tend to indicate that he left following a row over an outstanding debt. His former employer, ROY GARLAND, is well known in Unionist Party circles (see also CLIFFORD SMITH) and was for sometime P/C of 'TARA'. Admittedly, some of the personal correspondence between the two men during this period cannot be regarded as normal between employer and employee(see flag 'M'). Whatever the real reason for the row between GARLAND and McGRATH, there is certainly considerable animosity between them at present, and GARLAND has been actively engaged in trying to have McGRATH removed from his post at Kincora. GARLAND's own version of events (see flag'O') is, of course, very enlightening, but I would suggest that it should be treated with caution until it can be substantiated because of the antagonism between them. It would also appear that many of the RUC source reports on this matter after 1971 originated from GARLAND.

7. McGRATH was himself the subject of an internal investigation by the Belfast Corporation Welfare Department in 1972/73, following allegations of more homosexual assaults on the inmates of Kincora. One of our own sources confirmed in 1972 that a number of complaints has been passed to senior welfare staff and to the RUC, no action had been taken against him. This would appear to be confirmed, to some extent, by Mr ORR (see flag 'R') in 1973. There were, of course, similar allegations relating to other hostels during this period (see Bannoore, Westwinds, Barnside etc.) and this conflicts with reference A's assertion that the allegations were confined to Kincora.

8. It should be remembered that the 1967 Sexual Offences Act does NOT apply to Northern Ireland and homosexual intercourse between adults or with Kincora is a criminal offence. The apparent lack of interest, therefore, by the Welfare Authorities and the RUC is quite remarkable. Furthermore, the claim made by [redacted](see flag 'Q') that key individuals in the Welfare Department were themselves homosexuals and thus, not only appointed homosexuals to such posts but also covered up the offences that took place and protected the offenders, requires very serious examination. In particular, I view her allegations about [redacted] with great concern because it illustrates the political difficulties we are likely to face if we become involved.

9. Reference F which deals with the circumstances surrounding the murder of BRIAN McDERMOTT last year puts forward the theory that the killing had both sexual and witchcraft overtones. The only link that can be identified between the murder and the homosexual community is via JOHN McKEAGUE. McKEAGUE's own statements (see flag 'S') raise more questions than they answer. Certainly,

[redacted]

2

Continued/

82

[redacted]

9. continued..

his boast that he will not be prosecuted because "he knows too much about some people" merits serious investigation, but I suspect that he will no be prepared to talk until he is released. It is also rather remarkable that no charges have be preferred against him, at least during the past 3-4 years. Our own investigations of instances of alleged witchcraft or other satanic rites in the Province would tend to dismiss the RUC's theory that BRIAN McDERMOTT's murder could be part of these activities. In the past, 'Black Magic' practices etc have been mainly confined to groups operating from Republican areas, with the possible exception of three cases in Co Antrim. I think, however, that from a press point of view, we would be very foolish to give any credence to such claims without the most convincing evidence. The forensic reports on the McDERMOTT murder (see flag 'F') would tend to indicate that someone tried to dispose of the body by cutting it into pieces and burning them. It would also appear that when this failed, the pieces were dumped in the river. The insinuation made in the document regarding the boy's disappearance and the proximity of the Rev PAISLEY's church is dangerous nonsense.

10. Reference A claims that a number of key personalities in the political arena "are aware of" the Kincora situation and, in particular, of McGRATH's background. It does not, however, explain the extent of their awareness nor of each individual's involvement with McGRATH. In summary, it would appear that the document is claiming that:-

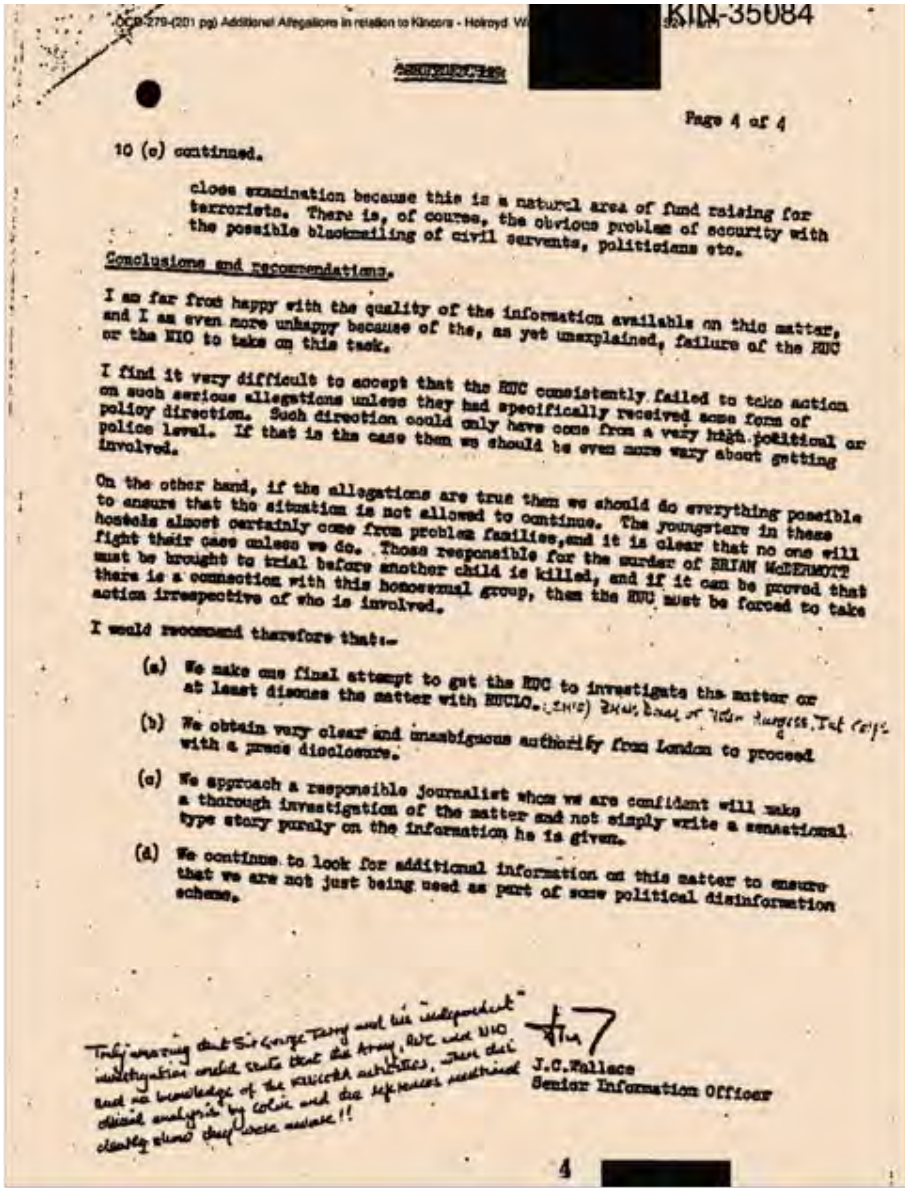
(a) Senior members of the Grand Orange Lodge are aware of the situation because of the discussions and correspondence relating to McGRATH within the Orange Order (see flag 'C'). It is further alleged that THOMAS PASSMORE and the Rev MARTIN SMYTH have blocked any action against McGRATH.

(b) The Rev PAISLEY is aware of the situation but has failed to take any action because of possible blackmail pressure owing to his connection with McGRATH, DAVID BROWN and JOHN McKEAGUE. On the face of it, the statements made by VALERIE SHAW and TOM McNEILLY (see flag 'F') would tend to support the only part of such a claim. There are also a number of inconsistencies: McGRATH would appear to be strongly anti-communist and anti-U.V.F and this conflicts with the document's views on links with TOMMY HERRON, ERSKINE 'DUKE' ELLIOTT, 'The Ulster Citizens Army' etc.

(c) Various public and political figures who hold positions of power and who are also homosexual protect each other from prosecution. The claim of a prostitution ring involving juveniles and centered on Bangor is not really substantiated, other than by GARLAND's own personal account. It would be interesting to check, however, the number of charges brought against people involved in homosexual activities in the greater Belfast area in the last 5 years. I also think that the RUC report on drug abuse in this connection merits

[redacted]

Continued/.....



OCB 279-(201 pg) Additional Allegations in relation to Kincora - Holroyd Wi [redacted] KIN-35084

[redacted]

Page 4 of 4

10 (c) continued.

close examination because this is a natural area of fund raising for terrorists. There is, of course, the obvious problem of security with the possible blackmailing of civil servants, politicians etc.

Conclusions and recommendations.

I am far from happy with the quality of the information available on this matter, and I am even more unhappy because of the, as yet unexplained, failure of the RUC or the NIO to take on this task.

I find it very difficult to accept that the RUC consistently failed to take action on such serious allegations unless they had specifically received some form of policy direction. Such direction could only have come from a very high political or police level. If that is the case then we should be even more wary about getting involved.

On the other hand, if the allegations are true then we should do everything possible to ensure that the situation is not allowed to continue. The youngsters in these hostels almost certainly come from problem families, and it is clear that no one will fight their case unless we do. Those responsible for the murder of BRIAN McERLAOTT must be brought to trial before another child is killed, and if it can be proved that there is a connection with this homosexual group, then the RUC must be forced to take action irrespective of who is involved.

I would recommend therefore that:-

(a) We make one final attempt to get the RUC to investigate the matter or at least discuss the matter with RUCLO. (NIO) [illegible]

(b) We obtain very clear and unambiguous authority from London to proceed with a press disclosure.

(c) We approach a responsible journalist whom we are confident will make a thorough investigation of the matter and not simply write a sensational type story purely on the information he is given.

(d) We continue to look for additional information on this matter to ensure that we are not just being used as part of some political disinformation scheme.

Today hearing that Sir George Terry and his "independent" investigation ended [illegible] that the Army, RUC and NIO had no knowledge of the security authorities, their [illegible] analysis by Colin and the inferences [illegible] clearly showed they were aware!!

J.C. Wallace
Senior Information Officer

4 [redacted]

APPENDIX 3: Transcript of interview with Major General Peter Leng by Barrie Penrose for Sunday Times article published on 18 February 1990

KIN - 124556

① 9 27

CATCH:TRAN62 VER:01 BY:JEN :19/02,12:14 OPR:TAGART,22/02,12:15
FG:stl DIR: PG: PDATE: LBR: MR:1
MEMO: FR:HOM19 ,20/02,18:01 STYL:
KEY: M3: 08137 WDR GR:TAGART-HWF

FIRST CONVERSATION WITH PETER LENG

PENROSE: I am doing a piece for the weekend and I was going to suggest that as I mention you just in passing, it might be courteous to read it over to you on Friday. It's only a passing mention. I tell you what it is actually. We are still Wallacing, so to speak, and on that front we mention that Michael Taylor, you probably wouldn't remember him. He has been mentioned in the press just briefly, he was information officer, and he has told me that he remembers very well indeed, and he was delighted when he saw it, that on the Kincora file that he was looking after he says that you had a strong memo saying there has got to be some action on this or something to that effect, and he said that he remembered thinking well, we'll just wait for this to happen, it was obviously going to happen quite soon but it didn't. Now this was back in 74 and your memo was actually attached to the file. And his surprise was, along with a couple of colleagues that nothing did happen and he could only think that the RUC were taking their time, and of course as we all know now its a matter of two reports since then, the Terry one and Judge Hughes, but of course nothing did happen until 1980. So basically it was just a passing reference to your memo being attached to the file.

LENG: OK.

PENROSE: So you're not obviously disagreeing about that. The other thing is did you by any chance see Paul Foot's book?

LENG: No.

PENROSE: Would you like me to send you a copy?

LENG: Yes and I'll pay you for it.

PENROSE: No, no, that's easily arranged because I have got two copies. Now the thing is that the paperback I'm told by the publishers is not out until March but the hardback copy, it does actually mention you. And if I may I'll just read ... I was just looking at it this morning, it's on page 39, but as I say I will send you the whole book but it says here – this is the mention of Clockwork Orange, which as you know is now being mentioned in the House of Commons ...

LENG: I have been away for 2 weeks, so I got only just got back two days ago, so I have missed it all you see.

PENROSE: Well I won't be in the office until tomorrow but what I will do (inaud)

KIN - 124557

(2) 1 27

MATCH: THANKS PAGE 2

is photocopy undecipherable couple of words from Leng - could be page 27 or 27... not only that, but I'll put that in the post to you, but also page 29 and also there are a couple of other things that will bring you right up to date - Let me just tell you very briefly. Peter Broderick, whose name you may recall, who was Taylor and Wallace's boss along with other people, now he came up while you were away, so this would be about 10 days ago, he came out and said he well remembers the matters of that time, so does Taylor, and they mention Clockwork Orange and in the House of Commons both Archie Hamilton and Tom King have mentioned Clockwork Orange saying that papers have been found showing that in fact it was, unfortunately, that the House had been misled, no fault of Tom King or Archie Hamilton, simply, the records had simply come to light more recently. So you probably may have picked that up already, had you or not?

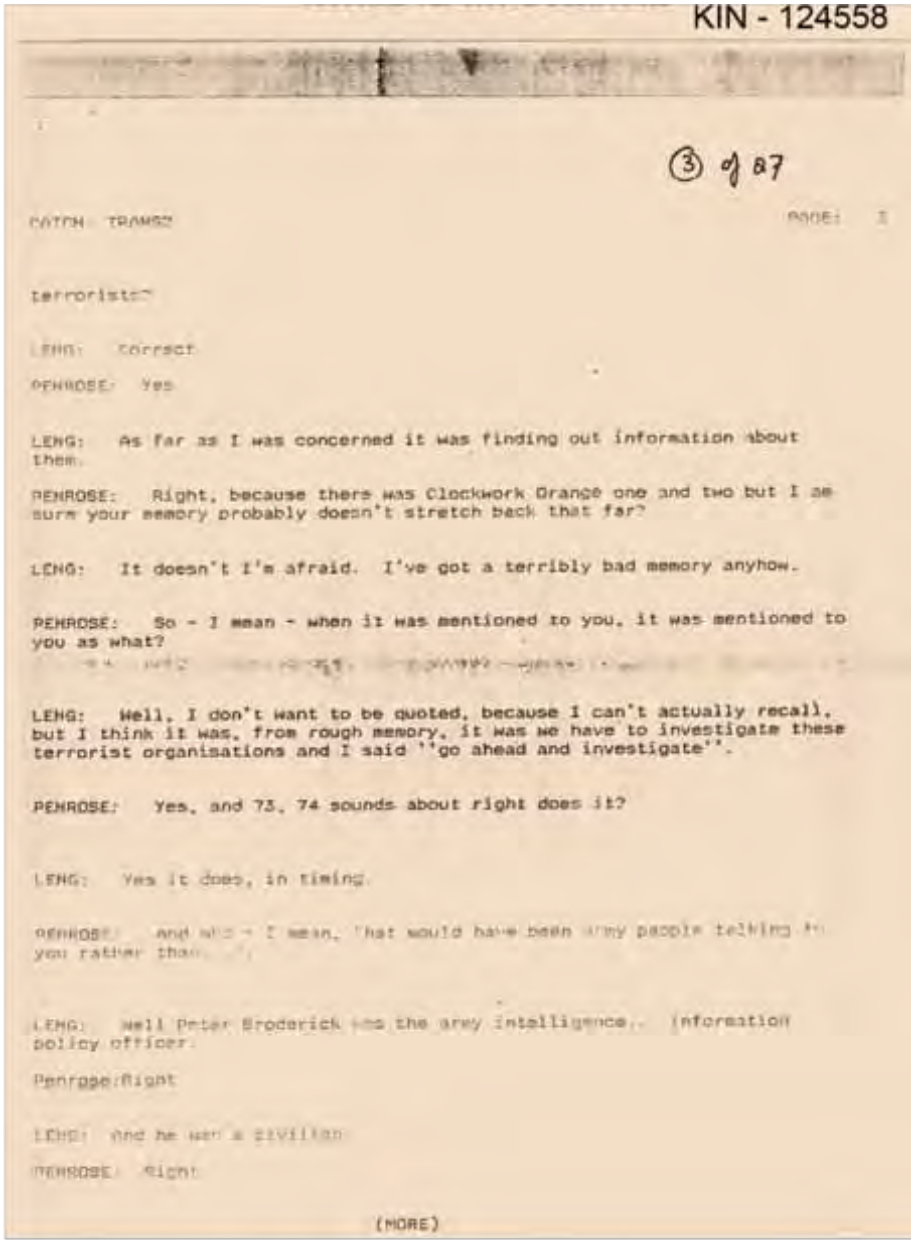
LENG: No.

PENROSE: No, you didn't. Well that is the present state of play. Now it says here on page 28 of Foot's book - the documents which were filed under Clockwork Orange were not personally available to anyone else in the information policy department. A fact which Mike Taylor, an army information officer, recalls very clearly. And then he said, well he has actually said to me as well, that he was looking after Clockwork Orange and what it contained. He then goes on to say, and this is where you are mentioned. It says here, ''the army's involvement in Clockwork Orange was approved early in 74 by the Commander of Land Forces Northern Ireland, Major General Peter Leng. Col. Peter Goss, the senior army intelligence officer at Lisburn, was instructed to release to Colin Wallace secret information on terrorists. Captain ..'' and he mentions another Captain here, another intelligence officer was appointed to do the basic research and supply Wallace with the results. And it goes on to say that this was disinformation about paramilitary groups. Then in fact it went wider and included some material about politicians, some of them in Northern Ireland, some of them on the mainland. So, I don't know whether you recall the Clockwork Orange...

LENG: Well, I hardly recall it, and certainly I had no party sic at all in anything to do with politicians and nor would I. I mean my policy at that particular stage was that we had to play the game straight. We had to find out... we obviously had to do some research into terrorists but there was to be no dirty games at all so far as I was concerned, and one or two people, and I can't recall who came up and said to me we'd like to do this, and my answer was always no. The army has got to be played clean because these things get found out in time.

PENROSE: Yes, well that's what I was told. It was not only about your role, such as it was, but also Frank King's as well, he also said the same thing. I mean the thing is I mean the Clockwork Orange operation as you recall it, if I understand you correctly, was directed against

(MORE)



KIN - 124558

③ of 87

PATH: TRANS2 PAGE: 1

terrorists?

LENG: Correct

PENROSE: Yes

LENG: As far as I was concerned it was finding out information about them.

PENROSE: Right, because there was Clockwork Orange one and two but I am sure your memory probably doesn't stretch back that far?

LENG: It doesn't I'm afraid. I've got a terribly bad memory anyhow.

PENROSE: So - I mean - when it was mentioned to you, it was mentioned to you as what?

LENG: Well, I don't want to be quoted, because I can't actually recall, but I think it was, from rough memory, it was we have to investigate these terrorist organisations and I said ''go ahead and investigate''.

PENROSE: Yes, and 73, 74 sounds about right does it?

LENG: Yes it does, in timing.

PENROSE: And who - I mean, that would have been [illegible] people talking to you rather than [illegible]?

LENG: Well Peter Broderick was the army intelligence, information policy officer.

Penrose:Right

LENG: And he was a civilian

PENROSE: Right

(MORE)

KIN - 124559

④ of 27

PATH: TRANS2 PAGE: 4

LENG: And the rest of them were army.

PENROSE: Yes. And Colin Wallace you would have known?

LENG: Well hardly. I mean known yes, but as he was a captain working right down the chain.

PENROSE: Yes

LENG: I didn't. I mean I hardly came across him at all.

PENROSE: Because everyone, including Broderick, I must say, they speak so highly ... and so do the records of him at the time, that he was hard working and so on, but that's something that obviously ... you were at a level where you wouldn't have come across him very much.

LENG: Correct.

PENROSE: But it wouldn't surprise you that he was involved along with Broderick and the others and Taylor.....

LENG: If he was working under Broderick he would be involved.

PENROSE: With Clockwork Orange, Yes. And how many people would have known about Clockwork Orange? Would it I'm just wondering.

LENG: Well I think that the senior intelligence officer would have known, Broderick would have known, Mike Garrett.

PENROSE: Yes, I remember that name.

LENG: ... who I'm afraid is very ill with leukaemia now, he would be more involved than the chief of staff, and how what I would be doing is to listen to the policy.

PENROSE: How long would an operation like that have lasted?

(MORE)

KIN - 124560

⑤ g 27

PAGE: 5

LENG: Well, as long as it takes to gather the information. It could have lasted, and this is entire guess work, a month, three months, six months, a year because it takes an awful lot of time to gather intelligence.

PENROSE: When you mentioned earlier that when anyone suggested to you that, and this is my word not yours, can we get into the black propaganda or dirty tricks and you said "No", that was when politicians were mentioned presumably?

LENG: Politicians were never mentioned to me...

PENROSE: To you.

LENG: ... I mean I have no recollection and no knowledge at all of the involvement of politicians, and the investigation of politicians, and certainly, had I known about it I would have stopped it at once. It is not our business.

PENROSE: Yes. You see what Wallace and Taylor say is that they were in a difficult position because from one side they were being told by the army and by you and your senior staff officers and saying absolutely play it clean and down the middle, and 100% on that, they then say that unfortunately the funnies as they call them, in other words MI5, were saying sometimes, well look you've got to relegate this or do this without anyone else knowing because ...

LENG: Well ... we ... I ... other than an initial briefing by MI5 and no-one before I took on my appointment, I had no contact with MI5 thereafter.

PENROSE: No. So you wouldn't have known that they had another interesting Clockwork Orange? That would have been outside you knowledge?

LENG: Completely outside.

PENROSE: Yes.

(MORE)

KIN - 124561

6 of 37

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 1

LENG: Completely, and I suspect outside Frank King's jurisdiction too.

PENROSE: Absolutely. That's absolutely right from our ... yes, I mean, that's the case. Presumably you wouldn't have actually yourself looked at Clockwork Orange as a file itself? So therefore ..

LENG: I never saw the file of Clockwork Orange whatsoever.

PENROSE: Well I think your hair would have fallen out if you had. And you would have stopped it of course then...?

LENG: Well had I known - I mean any involvement I would have stopped it...I had one or two people who came up and suggested one or two things and I turned them down flat, every single time.

PENROSE: What sort of things? ..Just to give me an idea of what sort of...

LENG: Are we off the record?

PENROSE: Oh Yes!! We are now!!!!

LENG: Well I remember a case where they wanted to go and publish a diary - it was written by IRA people

PENROSE: Mm

LENG: ... and they were then going to leak it to the press...

PENROSE: Right.

LENG: ... for a sum of money to make it look authentic.

PENROSE: Mm.

LENG: And I think they did quite a lot of preparation for this, and then they came to me and said look we would like to do this because it would

(MORE)

KIN - 124562

⑦ of 27

BATCH: TRANCE PAGE: 7

give quite a lot of evidence and would also cause the IRA perhaps to squeak. My answer as you can imagine was this is absolutely impossible to do - we are bound to be found out - stop it now.

PENROSE: Yes, otherwise it will rebound. You see on the other hand, the interesting thing is that it was never mentioned to you obviously by the people that they wanted to extend to politicians and in fact did so.

LENG: No, never.

PENROSE: Did you know there was a Clockwork Orange one and two?

LENG: Really?

PENROSE: No. And on Kincora you come out absolutely as one would expect, saying there has got to be action on Kincora. Do you recall that?

LENG: No.

PENROSE: Well, you should take your virtue because in fact Taylor says, I remember it very well and we were all delighted that the RUC were... you said in the memo according to Taylor that the RUC and the social services I think ought to be brought in here because the file named men and boys who were obviously part of this abuse which we all know about now.

LENG: Yes I recall that.

PENROSE: Do you? And you said take action. They waited because obviously there had been other members suggesting this from junior offices, but it was yours that finally convinced Taylor that this was going to happen, but of course it went on for another six or seven years, but again that wasn't your fault.

LENG: I think the action, now I recall it, was the absconding of boys, and if I've got the thing right, there were an awful lot of what I call

(MORE)

KIN - 124563

⑧ of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 8

... well I'll call them terrorist boys who were put away in the home, and they kept on absconding, and I do remember talking to the chief of staff, saying "look we've got to stop these boys escaping from this remand home and there is far too much escaping and they are going back into terrorism, so take action to stop that."

PENROSE: It was also just to remind you that there were homosexual abuses taking place, namely by the house father says McGraph...

LENG: Yes.

PENROSE: ... who was also the leader of TARA, and of course eventually that was all proven in court some years afterwards, and also a man called McKay, but I man this is obviously outside....

LENG: Yes I do remember the homosexual insinuations and I do remember saying this is a police business, not ours.

PENROSE: Yes, because you probably know that since then, the suggestions have been that MI5 or others, not the army but others, were in fact using, obviously, a blackmail hold on people like McGraph which he has since confirmed, I mean that is a matter of record now, that he was blackmailed into working for intelligence to inform and so on, so you can see the tug of war that was taking place from your side, saying police, social services take action, and the other side saying no, we need the information..

LENG: But of course, I wasn't part of the other side.

PENROSE: No, quite. We'll leave, I'll get this to the post...indecipherably few words. May I leave a number at the office so you know who you're speaking to. Its 01

LENG: Just wait one moment, I'll have to nip next door, I've just come in from the garden will you hold on?

PENROSE: Right - 01 782 5648 and my name is Penrose and it's Barry Penrose, P-E-N-R-O-S-E.

LENG: Right, Barrie, thank you very much.

(MORE)

KIN - 124564

9 of 27

PATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 9

PENROSE: And I'll pop that in the post so you'll get it Friday.

LENG: That's sweet of you.

PENROSE: Alright.

LENG: Thank you.

PENROSE: Goodbye.

LENG: Goodbye.
163

Follows Conversation with Sir Frank King 163-302
PLEASE NOTE THIS HAS NOT BEEN CHECKED AGAINST THE TAPE AS YET.
INTERVIEW WITH FRANK KING.

PENROSE: I'm doing a piece for the weekend Sunday Times on a subject that no doubt you have seen in the papers in recent weeks on the Colin Wallace affair. I just wanted to check with you, and you will understand why - there is a book called Who Framed Colin Wallace by Paul Foot.

KING: I haven't read it. I'll pay my library 32p and try and get a free copy.

PENROSE: I am sending one to a colleague of yours, Peter Long. I may as well order 2 from our library and pop one in the post for you. The paper back is out next month - I was told that by the publishers. The thing is in the book he is talking about Wallace and his problems in the early stages of '75 and everyone we have spoken to speaks very highly of his abilities when he was in Lisbon, and then you're mentioned on page 110 just in passing but I thought I ought to check it with you. Wallace says his problems with Clockwork Orange and raising the whole business about the boys home in Belfast - the Kincora business - it says - when he returned to Northern Ireland on Monday 27th January 1975 he voiced some of his fears to the general officer commanding Northern Ireland Sir Frank King.

KING: Well he never did. I don't think I've ever met him quite honestly. I am getting old now - I am 71 and I've got a very bad memory. I've been reading all this in the press with great interest and I don't recognise his face. I'm pretty sure I did meet him but he was a very junior chap in my headquarters. We had various press - I remember when I arrived the PR
(MORE)

KIN - 124565

(10) 27

PATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 10

people had a great reception for the press really to meet the new GOC and obviously Wallace would have been there but I don't quite honestly remember his face. The peculiar situation in Northern Ireland in that when General Tuzo (sorry can't quite make that name out) was there he had to governments to deal with he had the Stormont(Sorry another name I can't make out -bad quality recording) government and the Westminster government so he demanded a CLF which he got to command all the troops and the chief of staff ran the headquarters, and when I got there the security problems were still at their height so I had a lot to do with the secretary of state, I had a lot to do with the police because I was director of operations, but I had very little to do with my own headquarters. Three days a week I was going round the province... I cannot in all honesty, ever remember meeting Clive Wallace, Colin Wallace, having said that, I probably did.

PENROSE: There are, not that that proves anything, but there are ordinary army photographs taken at the time and issued to the press where Colin Wallace is in the picture along with two or three other people but one would expect that with an information officer. When I spoke to Sir Peter, he confirms two things - firstly he recalls Clockwork Orange, and says, look I told people who wanted to play about with dirty tricks, leave it alone, it will all go wrong, blow up in our faces, I want nothing to do with it. That was on Clockwork Orange. Is that something that you recall at all?

KING: I am being absolutely honest - I can never remember hearing that phrase before.

PENROSE: No, because as you know in the comsons Tom King and indeed Archie Hamilton have said that they have now found mention of it in the files that have only just surfaced, so there is nothing secret about it.

KING: I find it very difficult to understand in fact because, I mean its all being blamed on the security force

PENROSE: Security services, Yes.

KING: And I only had to the best of my memory of 15 years, I only had one man, and I knew exactly how he was tasked and he was a very sensible and a very good man, and he wasn't tasked on anything like that.

PENROSE: Or the other matter of McGrath and TARA and that hasty burial of Kincora, you don't recall anything of that?

(MORE)

KIN - 124566

11 of 27

PAGE: 11

KING: I remember seeing it in the Belfast Telegraph as a scandal in Northern Ireland.

PENROSE: That would have been 1980?

KING: Was it.....yes.

PENROSE: Because a chap, again he was far too junior, but an army information officer, Michael Taylor, he, amongst his duties was to look after various files including Clockwork Orange and Kincora and he recalls that General Leng had put a memo as had other people, around about 73, 74, saying must bring in the RUC and the social services into Kincora because is a scandal and this must stop. I mean, this was about homosexual abuses and people running away.....

KING: Was that the place where young men had been locked up?

PENROSE: No this was a young boys home and the suggestion has been, the point being that General Leng and others had said in memos on the Kincora file at Lisbon that there must be action here, and urgent and so on, but of course, nothing happened until 1980

KING: Why does this concern the army?

PENROSE: Well because the internal memos that intelligence people had used knowledge of homosexual abuses between people like McGraph who was the paramilitary leader of TARA, that MI5 had actually had information about McGraph and homosexual abuses and this would prove very useful because McGraph had obviously given information about TARA and loyalist paramilitary groups - so you see the point - they were saying there will [illegible] meanwhile the army were saying you have got to act, but this isn't something that you recall at all?

KING: No I don't quite honestly. One always realised that in the jungle of Ireland on both sides a lot of murky things happened, but quite honestly, I was far too busy in a sense at the higher level to know about those things.

PENROSE: Well, one thing that two or three people have said, and I remember their names quite well, having spoken to them for quite some time about this when your name just cropped up in passing.. Oh yes, I know, one of them was Peter Broderick.. Do you remember Peter Broderick?

[MORE]

KIN - 124567

(12) of 27

CATCH: TRANSC PAGE: 12

KING: He was my information policy officer

ROSROSE: That's right. How he said that he was brought over and the first thing you said to him when he arrived. this is a quote from Peter Broderick...None of this nonsense about black propaganda or dirty tricks or something to that effect.. is that anything that you...

KING: I don't remember but I can understand it. You see one of the problems that the army had, it had a very bad reputation with the press to begin with and the reason was that we were always reactive. One thing I remember very well where a unit went in to search a house and their side of the story was that they carried out army orders which were that they would always have a carpenter there so that if they had to take up floor boards or take a lintel out of a window he would repair the damage. But suddenly on BBC television I think the whole place was totally wrecked, and imagine the pressure when you get the secretary of state ringing up saying why have the army done this and the GOC ringing up the commanding officer and saying why have we done that, but we didn't. So we had a rule then that whenever they searched a house, they got a certificate signed by the householder that they left the house in good condition. But again, the IRA would put pressure on householders and they refused to sign, and the same sort of thing would happen again. And you get another case, lets take a soldier on patrol where he sees two men with a rifle and he shoots one, and the other chap picks up the armour and runs away and then all the neighbours come out hearing the shots and swear with tears streaming down their faces that this man was taking a quiet walk a night and was suddenly shot by a soldier and he wasn't armed and so on. So you get both sides taking sides. The IRA are very good at this because quite often one thing all commanding officers learn in Northern Ireland is that is there are television cameras in the street, don't send your soldiers up that street, because something is going to happen. They were very good at promoting these incidents, and by the same token, the only thing the army could do was to train its public relations people as well as it could, and we did run a school in Beconsfield to train people on television courses and so on, and have a nominated officer in each unit as a PR officer, and to use people like Broderick who were experts and professional at headquarters But we were always on the defensive because the IRA could always provoke incidents and have their press things ready, and the army quite often had to make an investigation, get in touch with the unit find out what happened and sometimes rather foolishly, issue a statement early and then find it was wrong and have to correct it later. So it was always a great problem.

ROSROSE: Yes, I can see that. Tell me, on the we have read about it and heard about it in Parliament recently in the last few days in fact, on the question of so called dirty tricks and black propaganda is that

(MORE)

KIN - 124568

(13) of 27

CATCH: TRANSC PAGE: 13

something.. after all SINOPSIS is an MOD leaflet or pamphlet, so again, there is nothing secret about that, is that something that would have crossed your desk at any time?

KING: Well I think basically that this is an invention of the press. I'm sorry to be rude about this but it's probably because we were always on the defensive and we quite often appeared to be telling lies, but one thing I'm quite sure all the PR people realise is that you can't feed off black propaganda unless it's based on truth because you lose your reputation with the press. But I think that this is how the thing blew up. Quite honestly there is only one thing I can remember while I was the OC - one of the elections there the IRA or Sinn Fein brought out a great poster for an election where they had a hooded monster with a rifle over his shoulder with the words underneath saying ''Victory by 1974''. Well we did the same sort of thing. We got hold of this poster and we did a bit of black propaganda but it was very harmless and rather humourous and we over printed the words ''By Ballot, Not By Bullet'' and we posted these up all over Belfast and took down the IRA ones and eventually, they reckoned that our posters were there posters. And quite honestly, that's the only thing I can remember.

PENROSE: Because the thing is that people like Wallace, and he is by no means alone, Broderick, and others as well, Michael Taylor, in that department, they seem to be saying, and I think I've got this absolutely right now, that the army are saying, at your level and obviously below your level, were saying look, black propaganda in a way against the IRA yes but not to go too far, but there were MI5 people who wanted to use it for a totally different purpose and that they widened it, and that's why we have had these allegations about smears against politicians, you know, the forgery, I mean the fact is at Lisbon....

KING: You may find this very difficult to believe, but to the best of my knowledge, I only had one chap, when I say to the best of my knowledge, I mean the best of my memory, I only had one chap working in my headquarters. He was a very nice reliable man. I knew exactly what his job was and he did it extraordinarily well. Now by the same token, there was another chap working under the secretary of state, or anyhow, under his control, what he did I never knew.

PENROSE: I think that was Clifford Brand.

KING: Well they were. There were about four chaps.

PENROSE: Are you talking about IRD people from the foreign office or the five people.

(MORE)

KIN - 124569

(14) 9 87

MATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 14

KING: I think they were MI5 people. Rowley who had got a wooden leg, people like that. They in a way were the senior, that was the senior headquarters, and my press people went every week with the police press people to be briefed by Stormont's press officer, who laid down policy, which I presume was secretary of state policy, then so did the MI5 chaps.

PENROSE: Yes, this is where the rub seems to be, that a whatever level in MI5, it seems to be that they were attempting to move away from propaganda about the IRA, which is understandable, into the political area where for example, they expressed disagreements with Rees and Labour government policy, I suppose that is basically what.....

KING: I find this very difficult to believe. They basically wouldn't have time and really what is the point of it?

PENROSE: Well it does seem a little strange to me. I notice by the way, and you'll notice it when I send you the book by Foot on Wallace, that he quotes Reece's memoirs where he mentions.. shall I just read it.. its just a paragraph where you are mentioned. It says here - He wrote in his book, Northern Ireland, a Personal Perspective, this is Rees - I felt it important for my journey not to be publicised and asked Frank King, commander in chief of Northern Ireland forces to accompany me in my helicopter as far as Aldergrove, so it would look as if I was going back with him to Lisbon. However, when I arrived at Colerose, Cornwall, after a nostalgic flight over the valleys of south Wales where I was nurtured, it was to find that my trip had already been announced on BBC news. Was the leak from prying eyes at the castle or from Aldergrove or was it from other sources. - and it's really just Rees going on about what he claimed to be leaks from, I suppose he is talking about the security services not the army, but I mean we'll never know perhaps.

KING: I can never remember being in a helicopter with Merlin Rees in my life.

PENROSE: This is from his memoirs.

KING: Where was I flying in this helicopter.

PENROSE: You were flying .. Ah he doesn't say - it says - to accompany me in my helicopter as far as Aldergrove so it would look as if I was going back to Lisbon. So in other words you had set off from Lisbon it would seem, went to Aldergrove and then you were going back to Lisbon yourself. But anyway, that's just the two references. Well I'm very

(MORE)

KIN - 124570

(15) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 15

grateful for that and I'll get these books off in the post by the weekend.

KING: One thing that amused me in the press was Colin Wallace...I think Chris Ryder wrote an article... well anyhow...Colin Wallace claimed to have done three hundred parachute jumps. Well I have been a parachute soldier all my life and I can tell you the average number of jumps a parachute soldier does in a year is about six, so if he had been a parachute soldier, it would have taken him fifty years to do it. And then, in the same article, he said that he had been a member of a free-fall club, and the secretary there said he was a Roofer - he used to turn up in all the kit and nobody ever saw him go up.

PENROSE: Well in fact that has now been reversed. Records have been found where people have signed for.. I think... This is just a personal observation but one which people are making from both sides of the political divide and that is this - that many of the things that Wallace has said are now being confirmed by the government. For example, it was said that his 400 page document, file, had not been sent to number ten in 1985. Now Archie Hamilton said to the house last night that indeed that had been sent and it had been lost. So in other words, a lot of things that Wallace has been saying, now seem to be confirmed not just by his colleagues, but by the government saying that they are now delving deeper. But this is clearly something that was not in your orbit - it was in the intelligence orbit so it would seem, because it would seem that Wallace did have two hats as it were, two specific jobs.

KING: Well yes, one made use of all the intelligence one could get and he was a local man and to my knowledge, actively employed on intelligence. He was certainly a very Walter Mitty sort of chap. When I say that, I've already told you I never met him, I mean judging from what other people have said about him.

It [illegible] life interesting.

PENROSE: Well thank you very much.

End

Side of side (sounds like radio broadcast or play)
STARTING CHECKING AGAIN HERE

SIDE 2 (6) Heeley/Long - Food

(MORE)

KIN - 124571

(16) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 16

SECOND CONVERSATION WITH PETER LENG

000

PENROSE: Is Sir Peter there please, my name is Penrose, I spoke to him the other night

17

PENROSE: I wonder if I could just clarify one thing so that I get it absolutely spot on. When something like Clockwork Orange (its such a silly name but anyway something like Clockwork Orange) comes on your desk and you say right go ahead and you must not go any further than this and this is what you must do, in this particular case gathering intelligence on para-military terrorists and so on. That would have come across presumably from HIO and from HIO go to your desk?

LENG: No, not necessarily. What it tended to do was to either go from intelligence to intelligence or from the northern sic office to Frank Kings office because, I put it crudely, he was a political general, and then I would get my marching orders from Frank King and really my role was just to carry out land operations, that is the day to day running of the army rather than get myself embroiled in that kind of work. Also it would be from intelligence quite often to special branch. Special branch and intelligence liaise together - the head of special branch of the RUC and the head of our intelligence and then I would have a morning meeting or maybe two or three daily meetings in which the head of intelligence would come up to me and say this is the sort of thing that is going on, and we would then discuss it.

PENROSE: The actual operation, I mean Clockwork Orange when it was first mooted was it Fort Dennis Paine - several people have mentioned that - who was at HIO

LENG: That's right, there was of course that branch as well. HIO would come in and pass forthings if they wanted to keep something from the RUC don't quote me again.

PENROSE: No, no no.

LENG: They would then - HIO would get straight in touch with our intelligence chiefs.

(MORE)

KIN - 124572

(17) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 17

PENROSE: Yes, so something like Clockwork Orange, or perhaps you remember - do you remember if it came from Paine's desk?

LENG: No I don't remember if it came from Paine's desk but certainly if it had gone anywhere it would have gone from intelligence to intelligence, from Nigels office across to our intelligence office...

PENROSE: I see - from - which office?

LENG: From Nigel's Office in the NIO it would have gone across - if he wanted to involve us at all he would have got on to our intelligence officer - that was the passage of information, and then .... I'm sure that was the way, and then if our intelligence officer wanted to bring in our publicity people, information policy as I call it, which let me say, I have to be absolutely clear, information policy is either white propaganda or black propaganda, and we have no part in black propaganda in our information policy at all.

PENROSE: Right.

LENG: So it was white propaganda.

PENROSE: How you said Nigel... is that Nigel....

LENG: Nigel Paine - do I mean that?

PENROSE: No Dennis Paine.

LENG: Dennis Paine at NIO.

PENROSE: Yes.

LENG: And it would cross there, and quite often I suspect they had conversations which I wasn't party to at all and I wouldn't object to that.

(MORE)

KIN - 124573

(18) of 27

ATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 18

PENROSE: No, of course. It's just to see how, if you could forgive me, how the bureaucracy works, so Clockwork Orange in this case comes from Dennis Paine's office, so it's intelligence to intelligence, and then you're shown it...

LENG: I'm not always shown it. Only if they need to involve someone at a higher level.

PENROSE: Right.

LENG: Now if it was policy, then Frank King would come into it, because he went to Northern Ireland Office weekly for a weekly conference with the police and all the rest of it, but he was quite often summoned across to speak to the Secretary of State or whoever, across there, and he it was who really did all the liaison policy work with the Northern Ireland office.

PENROSE: I see.

LENG: And then if there was anything - I mean, he often knew things that I didn' know, and then all he would do is say to me, this is the policy I want, and it was normally if I may say, tactical policy, and I would then follow it.

PENROSE: Clockwork orange was policy this sounds like a statement rather than a question, but a statement asking for confirmation...

LENG: And Clockwork Orange was policy.

PENROSE: Yes. And so - I see, so Dennis Paine sends the file over and this is policy from NIO...

LENG: I wouldn't have thought he would even send a file over if I may say so, because the less that was committed to paper the better...

(MORE)

KIN - 124574

(19) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 19

PENROSE: Oh, of course, I'm sorry, of course.

LENG: And I think there would be discussions because certainly intelligence and intelligence are meeting continually.

PENROSE: Yes, so ... fine, so it comes from there. Your job is of course, you have to OK Peter Goss, the senior intelligence officer, and Tony Holman and others, to release information to the unit, to the Information Policy Unit.

LENG: Yes, to the information policy unit or down to the units of the army...

PENROSE: Yes.

LENG: ... as the case may be.

PENROSE: Right. So you knew obviously that there was a five sic involvement in Clockwork Orange but you obviously wouldn't have known ...

LENG: ... the detail.

Penrose: the detail

LENG: Correct.

PENROSE: Right, and the other thingis that - which is obviously very important, is that as you didn't see the file that was kept at Lisburn, you wouldn't have known obviously its contents because there would have been no need for you to know.

LENG: Right.

(MORE)

KIN - 124575

(20) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 20

PENROSE: So you, as it were, authorise your people, Peter Goss and others to release information to the unit, to the information unit, so it's on your authority, or is it Frank Kings authority?

LENG: Oh we usually discussed that together, we usually had a - nothing worked so fast that it had to be dealt with, so we usually had a weekly conference and in fact often Peter Gough would go in to see Frank King about sensitive items direct and then he would see me

PENROSE: Ah - I see how it works.

LENG: ...about sensitive items.

PENROSE: So your...

LENG: My role with Peter Gough, if I may say so, was mainly running the straightforward tactical intelligence under his direction.

PENROSE: Yes.

LENG: I would, you know, we would discuss it and I would say right, that is what we want to tell the army and that is what the army ought to do.

PENROSE: Yes. I know you said your memory is sketchy sometimes on these things but the 73-74 date that you mention is absolutely spot on, and in fact the first fruits as it were of Clockwork Orange were in January of 74. Do you recall when you first heard the title Clockwork Orange?

LENG: To tell you the honest truth it doesn't ring an awful lot of bells in my mind, I have to say that now after 17 years.

PENROSE: No, sure.

LENG: I think it would ring more in Frank Kings ears.

PENROSE: Yes. I mean, so you, it is correct in saying that it would be you and Frank King or Frank King and you rather, that would authorise...

(MORE)

KIN - 124576

(21) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE 21

LENG: If it was something on policy Frank King would authorise it. I mean all I actually, if must be quite honest, all I really recall is all to do with the young offenders' home and what went on there.

PENROSE: Yes. The Kincora...

LENG: That is what I was brought into - not necessarily the homosexuality, but the fact that the boys were escaping all the time.

PENROSE: Yes, I remember your saying.

LENG: That was my main involvement with that side.

PENROSE: And recommending the police be brought...

LENG: The rest hardly rings a bell in my mind at all.

PENROSE: No, except that you were saying intelligence gathering takes a long time and in fact it went on for about a year, and you said it could be six months to a year.

LENG: Yes, however long it takes - but intelligence takes a hell of a long time to get, as I discovered.

PENROSE: Yes. I mean the thing, the reason why Clockwork Orange - So you authorised Clockwork Orange as a policy so that...

LENG: I didn't authorise Clockwork Orange as a policy. If it were authorised, it would have been authorised by the Northern Ireland Office and being that sensitive it would go to Frank King or the Intelligence office and not to me.

PENROSE: Although in this case you were saying that you did know about it because of course you had to authorise Peter Gough's, and the others to hand sensitive information about terrorists to the...

LENG: That was the normal practice, that goes on today.

(MORE)

PENROSE: Yes

LENG: I mean that was part of the routine of our life.

PENROSE: Yes I understand..

LENG: ... intelligence about terrorists.

PENROSE: Yes, indeed. But Clockwork Orange was going to be an operation that was new in the sense of obviously focussing on certain things about the paramilitary - I mean the terrorists.

LENG: Well yes, but if I may say so, that goes on all the time. Collecting information about both sides of the divide.

PENROSE: Yes. So what was it about Clockwork Orange that was different, it anything at all?

LENG: I can hardly remember it to tell you the honest truth.

PENROSE: Yes.

LENG: I'm not much help there.

PENROSE: No, no, I understand. But you knew it simply as being information about terrorists.

LENG: That's right. Absolutely.

PENROSE: So when as you said, and others have said the same thing about you and indeed about Frank King, that you said you know straight wicket here, this has got to be kept clean, and so on. Now the other side of the coin, and for this you have obviously, and I understand this and I ... you know, this is important, that you had no knowledge about the fact that others were devilling. I mean there seems to be little doubt because in fact there have emerged in fact while you have been away, and I have also been told by people involved, that what they were doing was often marrying information for example, about terrorists with information that came from Dennis Paine's organisation, MI5, which was - about politicians. Let me give you if I may just a quick illustration of that, that has been described to me, and that was this. For example, in Clockwork Orange there was one little operation that was tried on the Daily Telegraph - in actual fact it was aborted by the people doing it because it would have become public of how they were trying to do it. This is what they did. They got in touch with, by forging a letter, apparently from an IRA man to the Telegraph, and they said look, the letter said something like, I am an IRA man, I am disenchanted, I am quite senior in the movement, I want to sell my story and tell you all about how I am disenchanted. So the letter arrived, and it said in the letter, if you are interested, put a personal ad in the Telegraph and that is how we'll communicate. Well the Telegraph did that and a man called Bartlett, the reporter who got the letter, was coming across to Northern Ireland to meet the disenchanted terrorist. In the letter it also said that - there was quite a bit about Harold Wilson saying what a good trip it had been for Wilson because Wilson had apparantly said how good the IRA was - it was knitted well together, the security was good and so on. Now this was obviously complete nonsense because, a) it had nothing to do with Wilson and it was quite simply.....Peter Broderick took a call from the Telegraph man who said - marvellous story, I'm coming over because of this disenchanted IRA man and I am going to interview him if its all correct. And Broderick then turned to the information policy unit and said - look this chap from the Telegraph has rung, do we know anything at all about it? And they said - Good Heavens above, why has he called you - this is one of our operations that he doesn't know about and they immediately wrote to the Telegraph with another forged letter to say sorry, can't deal with you. You are obviously not trustworthy because you have been in touch with the security forces. Now the whole thing disappeared, it was aborted. So there was an example where people not in - I mean where there was a tug of war so to speak, between your clean policy and the policy of MI5 or some of them there, who wanted to, you can see the point, use it for dirty tricks.

KIN - 124578

(23) of 27

CATCH: TRANS3 PAGE: 22

(ENG: Who started that one up?

PEHROSE: Well it seems very clear that these were either middle grade MI5 officers.

I cannot believe that Sir Michael Hanley for example would authorise that.

(ENG: I'm sure not.

PEHROSE: I mean it doesn't make any sense.
(MORE)

KIN - 124579

(24) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 24

LENG: Yes.

PENROSE: It would have all blown up in his face. *It seems to be the kind of slightly right of Genghis Khan figures like Peter Wright and so on.

LENG: Yes.

PENROSE: You know - so that is apparently what happened, and also there are so many examples that were in the Clockwork Orange file, which of course you did not see, where this is what appears to have happened and that's where it got out of control.

LENG: Yes - um - I think that's right, but it certainly didn't come high up and I don't know where that would emanate from frankly, because certainly - I mean I can't see any of us being clever enough to do that.

PENROSE: No, no, quite. No, no, absolutely. I mean...

LENG: Indecipherable few words

PENROSE: But the point is, you see, you can see how, this is quite clearly what happened. I mean for example I have seen one particular document that was in Clockwork Orange, it was 134 pages, absolutely full of very right wing stuff about Labour, Liberal and also about Ted Heath and other people, obviously with the idea of sorting that in with material about paramilitaries, and that seems to be what was happening over there.

LENG: That I can assure you, I mean there was absolutely nothing that I ever recall that tried to denigrate politicians.

PENROSE: No.

LENG: I mean it wouldn't, it's not what we are there for. The army supports whatever government is in power whether we like them or not, but we certainly wouldn't go into what I call black propaganda like that, that would be dreadful. And indeed, all our life was directed into trying to deal with the IRA and UDF terrorists and politicians wouldn't come into it. No way would it benefit the land army to run politicians down in any way at all. It would do us a lot of harm.

(MORE)

KIN - 124580

(25) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 25

PENROSE: A lot of harm in fact - because - I mean - there would have been Parliamentary enquiry - I mean there would have been a royal commission and so on. So infact, I mean, so that although when Dennis Paine sends over, well not sends over but discusses' would you be in on that discussion?

LENG: No not necessarily, intelligence to intelligence was always kept absolutely at that one line.

PENROSE: So that's five to army intelligence

LENG: That's right.

TO HER

PENROSE: And it only, as it were, comes on your desk, because you have to presumably initial something to say OK for Peter Goss and others to hand....

LENG: Its all verbally and minutes would be kept of that and then destroyed after a certain time.

PENROSE: Indeed. So you did that and said "that's fine, you can..."

LENG: I hardly ever saw a minute I must admit, from intelligence or from any other people because we discussed it across the table and then said we'll do this and do that. That's the way we operate.

PENROSE: And in 74 of course it would have been ... GOC was Frank King then, so he would have had to have nodded it, and you down the line.

LENG: Absolutely.

PENROSE: Yes, that's how it worked. I mean it is pretty incredible now that this is emerging as the pattern of people who clearly were out of control and also could have brought the army into disrepute if this had emerged then. I mean it will emerge of course there is a parliamentary enquiry. But it is an extraordinary story, I mean it...

(MORE)

KIN - 124581

(26) of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 26

LENG: I tend to read the book of that because in a curious way, as a Major General, one is fairly naive about things and one just gets on with the operation.

PENROSE: Yes.

LENG: And I sort of travelled every afternoon going to units, discussed early in the morning what had happened the night before and how you were to handle the tactical situation, and that frankly seemed to be a fairly straightforward ... I would't say normal, but kind of normal job and I was very ... I mean I didn't get myself involved in intelligence work. I mean, you know, occasionally someone would come up with a strange idea and then one would knock it on the head.

PENROSE: Yes. You mention, I mean, about the diary, something of that kind you just knocked it on the head....

LENG: Indeed. I think I seem to remember someone said - we haven't enough evidence to prosecute terrorists, why don't we stick a poster up on a wall saying they are IRA terrorists and leave it to the protestants. Well these are the sort of wild ideas that came up and you can imagine the answer.

PENROSE: Frank King gave a marvellous example where he said that your chaps got hold of an IRA poster and superimposed on it the The Ballot or the Bullet, or something like that. Eventually the IRA thought they were marvellous so they put these up as well. He gave one example like that.

LENG: But I think that was very rare ...

PENROSE: Yes.

PENROSE: Because they are not very good at it.

PENROSE: No, no sure. But I mean clearly the other people, I mean at five and the policy unit people who were working with them ... because you'll see in fact in Foot's book, it's not as detailed as it might be in some places but what Wallace and others found was that their loyalties were being tugged from both sides. Here for example, he was meeting Dennis Paine and somebody else whose name I forget from five, who hands in all these files, saying "Now sort these things into reports to the press

(MORE)

KIN - 124582

27 of 27

CATCH: TRANS2 PAGE: 27

that you are supposed to be giving to the Press from time to time.

LENG: Yes.

PENROSE: ... and on the other side of course, he dare not mention that to Peter Broderick because Broderick would go mad. So that's why it led up to of course the bang that led to his being you know forced to resign and the rest obviously you know. Well, anyway, that should arrive in the morning, that book. And um...

LENG: Very kind, thank you.

PENROSE: Not at all. Goodbye.

LENG: Goodbye.
220

UNIDENTIFIED INTERVIEWEE to 352

UNIDENTIFIED INTERVIEWEE ''Hartlebury'' TO 709

Continuation of above (probably).
(END)

Contents

Chapter 29:

Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Home (Part 2)

Summary of Conclusions

1 In the preceding chapters we examined in detail:

- the experiences of the residents in Kincora;
- the way in which the Belfast Welfare Authority and the Eastern Health and Social Services Board responded to complaints and concerns made known to them about the actions of Mains and McGrath in Kincora;
- the way in which the RUC responded to the complaints and concerns relating to Mains and McGrath made known to it;
- what the intelligence agencies knew of abuse of residents in Kincora during the 1970s; and
- the response of the Government in later years to those allegations.

2 In this chapter we draw together in summary form our conclusions on the various matters relating to Kincora that we examined in the preceding chapters. These conclusions are intended to be read in conjunction with our detailed examination of the evidence, and subject to the fuller reasons for our conclusions that we expressed in those chapters.

3 Despite the convictions of Mains, Semple and McGrath in 1981 allegations have persisted that state agencies were either complicit in, or turned a blind eye to, the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora. As we have explained, during the 1980s there were four major RUC investigations into various allegations about Kincora. The first of these investigations (Caskey Phase One) resulted in the convictions of Mains, Semple and McGrath. Because the three defendants pleaded guilty this meant that only a relatively brief explanation of the facts relating to their offences was outlined in court.

4 Because the Caskey Phase Two, Three and Four investigations did not result in prosecutions, the details of those extremely comprehensive investigations have not been publicly disclosed until this Inquiry. Although Sir George Terry, D/Supt Harrison and D/Supt Flenley from the Sussex Constabulary reviewed the way in which the Caskey Phase One investigation had been carried out, and oversaw the Caskey Phase

Two and Phase Three investigations, the detailed work done by D/ Supts Harrison and Flenley has never been publicly examined until now because Sir George Terry only published his conclusions.

5 In 1984 and 1985 the Hughes Inquiry thoroughly examined some of the allegations relating to Kincora as part of its wider examination of the sexual abuse of children in a number of local authority homes and hostels. However, its restricted Terms of Reference confined its examination to the actions of Social Services. The actions of the RUC were only touched upon in that Inquiry in the context of what the EHSSB officials were told in 1976 in connection with the Cullen/Meharg investigation. The Hughes Report was published in 1985, but copies are scarce and it is not readily available. In addition, the transcripts of the evidence given largely in public in over 60 days of hearings, much of which related to Kincora, were not publicly available.

6 A great deal of relevant information about Kincora has therefore never been disclosed before, nor has it been examined, over the 36 years since the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora came to public attention. During those 36 years many allegations have been made by journalists, writers, public representatives and others about what they say did happen, or believe may have happened, in relation to the involvement in, or knowledge of, sexual abuse of residents at Kincora by people other than Mains, Semple and McGrath.

7 As a result the subject of Kincora, and what did or did not happen to the residents there, and what was or was not known about that abuse before it was exposed in 1980, came to resemble a deserted building so completely overgrown that it was extremely difficult to identify any parts of the original building apart from the outline of the structure and some of its principal features. This Inquiry carried out the first public examination of a mass of evidence that has hitherto not been publicly revealed, some of which came from sources which have not hitherto been examined by any person outside government and the intelligence agencies.

8 As a result of our examination of all of this material we believe that we have stripped away the overgrowth of decades of ill-informed comment, half truths and deliberate misrepresentations which have all too often masqueraded as established facts because they have been constantly repeated without critical analysis by, or real knowledge on the part of, those who have offered public comments about the nature and extent of the sexual abuse of residents in Kincora, and what state agencies did or did not know about that abuse during the 1970s. We have established that the sources of many of the allegations were untruthful, inaccurate or mistaken in what they said had happened.

9 Kincora was established as a working boys' hostel in 1958. Although the concept of a working boys' hostel was an excellent one, and there were positive aspects to the way it operated, such as the efforts made by Mains to find employment for the boys, there were several systemic failings in the way it operated. It was never adequately staffed, and this meant that for significant periods only one member of the care staff was on duty in the building. Although some residents were under school leaving age, most had left school and so were usually in work. If a boy was unemployed, or absent from work due to illness or for some other reason, this often meant that he would be on his own in the hostel during the day.

10 Because most of the residents were boys of working age they were able to come and go with much greater freedom than would have been the case if they were younger residents in a children's home. Many residents went out socially at night or weekends, whether to go to pubs or to go home to their families in some cases. For all of these reasons it was not uncommon for a resident to be on his own in the house at some point during the day or at night before everyone retired to bed.

11 Kincora was a hostel for boys who had reached school leaving age, but too many children were admitted to Kincora when they were under school leaving age. These children were too young to be placed in such an environment, and too many of them spent too long in that environment when they were admitted. In addition, there were insufficient staff with appropriate training or experience to deal with such young children.

12 Understaffing also meant that staff had to work very long hours, particularly in the case of Mains during the early years, when he was the only member of the care staff for a very long period of time. This meant that he was effectively expected to be on duty all the time. This was very poor practice, and the long hours and low pay put significant pressure on staff, and meant that recruitment of suitable staff was very difficult. This was demonstrated when Semple resigned in 1966 and the Belfast Welfare Authority were unable to find a long-term permanent replacement for him. This meant that when Semple applied for the vacancy created by his own resignation he was reappointed because a suitable person could not be found, despite Mains's knowledge of Semple's sexual abuse of residents. The insufficient levels of staff provided Mains, Semple and McGrath with opportunities which they exploited to target their victims when no one else was about to see what was happening, or to suspect what was happening.

13 Whilst Mains and Semple knew each other before Semple was appointed as deputy warden, and Mains definitely knew of Semple's sexual abuse of residents before Semple was reappointed, there is no evidence either knew McGrath before he was appointed.

14 The evidence suggests that by the time McGrath was appointed Mains had stopped sexually abusing residents, and was engaged in a long-term homosexual relationship with an ex-resident. Semple did not engage in sexual abuse of residents after he was reappointed, and found outlets for his sexual urges elsewhere. This meant that McGrath was the only member of staff who abused residents between his appointment in the summer of 1971 until the home was closed in 1980.

15 The way the adolescent boys in Kincora were looked after meant that far too much was done for them by the domestic staff. We consider this created an attitude of dependence by the boys on the staff, and this dependency was exacerbated by inadequate preparation of the residents for independent living when they left Kincora.

16 The Ministry of Home Affairs, and then the DHSS, failed to maintain an adequate inspection regime of the hostel.

17 Kincora opened in 1958 and closed in 1980. During that time 309 boys resided in the hostel. In their investigation in 1980 the RUC took 1963 as the starting point for their investigation. Of the 245 boys who resided in Kincora between 1963 and 1980, 104, (42% of the total), were traced and interviewed by the police. We now know that 38 boys were abused at some point during Kincora's existence. Although not all the surviving former residents could be traced, or have since come forward, it can be seen from these figures that the great majority of those who were traced were not sexually abused during their time in Kincora.

18 Indeed the great majority of residents of Kincora who were interviewed by the police were unaware at the time of what was happening in the hostel, and were very surprised to learn of the allegations that emerged afterwards. For example, of 92 former residents of Kincora between 1966 and 1980, 76 (that is 88.33%) told the police they were surprised by the allegations of the extent of sexual abuse that took place during their time in Kincora, even though some of them described how they themselves were abused, or had engaged in homosexual activity with others, whether with McGrath or other residents.

19 It may seem strange that so many of those who were in and out of Kincora in various capacities, not just the residents but the domestic staff and visitors, were unaware of what was happening, but there was a consistent pattern of concealment of their behaviour by Mains, Semple and McGrath.

20 They approached boys who were vulnerable, or who they thought might be easily intimidated. If their initial approaches were firmly rebuffed they generally did not approach that person again. If they did, they went to considerable lengths to approach the boy when others were not around.

21 During McGrath's time at Kincora he appears to have often worked in the evenings and in the mornings, when Mains or Semple was not about, because the duties involving the supervision of the residents were distributed between all three. Mains had other administrative duties as well, and our impression was that more of the direct supervision of the residents in the 1970s was carried out by Semple or McGrath, and because of the way their duties were arranged McGrath was often on duty on his own.

22 When complaints were made by residents, first of all to the Belfast Welfare Authority, and later to the EHSSB, these were not properly dealt with. In 1967, when the first complaints were received, Mr Mason decided that Mains's conduct did not amount to a prima facie indication of wrongdoing. We consider that he was wrong to do so. The Town Clerk's Department was wrong not to implement Mr Mason's recommendations that clear procedures be put in place to ensure that any further complaints about Kincora were properly reported to the City Welfare Officer. Written and clear instructions should have been given to relevant managers for the closer supervision of Kincora in the future.

23 Again in 1971 the Town Clerk and Town Solicitor did not report the allegations to the police as they should have done. Following the decision not to report the allegations to the police the following steps ought to have been taken.

1 It should have been re-emphasised to Mains that he should avoid doing anything that could lead to allegations of impropriety.

2 Instructions should have been given that a very close eye was to be kept on both Mains and Kincora.

3 Procedures should have been put in place to ensure further allegations about Kincora were properly collated and then referred to the City Welfare Officer, or to his deputy, for immediate attention.

24 After 1971 and throughout the remainder of the 1970s, anonymous phone calls and rumours that appear to have circulated about Kincora amongst staff and other social workers were not made known to senior staff in the EHSSB as they ought to have been.

25 When the RUC told the EHSSB in 1976 of the allegations against McGrath, the EHSSB did not give clear written instructions to ensure that there would be increased supervision of Kincora, of Mains and of McGrath, and staff did not pass to the EHSSB management important information about allegations against McGrath. EHSSB management did not take sufficient steps to press the RUC to find out what was happening with the RUC investigation.

26 In 1974 when the RUC became aware of the allegations made by Roy Garland against McGrath, about which he reminded them in 1976, the Cullen/Meharg investigation was inept, inadequate and far from thorough. The response in 1974 by D/Supt Graham to what he was told by Valerie Shaw about McGrath was wholly inadequate.

27 It was not simply the case that over these years there were a small number of missed opportunities by the Belfast Welfare Authority, by the EHSSB and by the RUC. There were so many failings by all of these agencies that they amount to a catalogue of failures by each. Had the 1971 allegations been reported to the RUC, as they should have been, or if an effective investigation had been carried out by the RUC in later years, it is reasonable to infer that a thorough and competent investigation by trained detectives may have been successful in exposing the abuse in 1976, and possibly even in 1974. This would have meant that those who were sexually abused after 1976, and possibly after 1974, would have been spared their experiences.

28 Over the years, much attention has been devoted to what the RUC, MI5, the Secret Intelligence Service and Army Intelligence knew about the sexual abuse in Kincora, when they knew and what they did with that knowledge. We are satisfied that the interest of the RUC Special Branch, of MI5, of SIS and of Army Intelligence in William McGrath was solely because he was the commanding officer of Tara. Their interest in Tara came about because there were indications that this clandestine organisation, although it claimed to be a peaceful organisation designed to function only if there was a complete breakdown of law and order, might turn into another armed Loyalist terrorist organisation. There were reports that members of Tara were trying to obtain, or had obtained, quantities of arms, and that many of its members were members of the Ulster Volunteer Force, a Loyalist terrorist organisation.

29 We are satisfied that the RUC Special Branch first learned of William McGrath in July 1966 when he was reported as present as one of the platform party at a rally led by the Reverend Ian Paisley in the Ulster Hall in Belfast. McGrath was otherwise an unknown figure. In 1971 MI5 learned that a man named McGrath was reported to be the OC of Tara. However, despite efforts to establish who this person was, and gathering much information about him that was inaccurate, it was not until April 1973, 20 months later, that RUC Special Branch identified the Commanding Officer of Tara as the William McGrath seen on the platform in 1966. It seems that it was not until November 1973 that MI5 learned that the OC of Tara and McGrath were one and the same person, probably as the result of a letter sent to MI5 in November 1973 by RUC Special Branch.

30 The intelligence agencies soon concluded that Tara was not a significant force, and they only paid intermittent attention to it and to McGrath in succeeding years.

31 By May 1973 both RUC Special Branch and other RUC officers knew that McGrath was reputed to be homosexual, but they had no proof of this. It was not until Roy Garland spoke to Detective Constable Cullen on 1 March 1974 that the RUC received an allegation that McGrath had engaged in homosexual conduct of a grooming nature in the past with Roy Garland when Roy Garland was a teenager. For understandable reasons Roy Garland was not prepared to come forward to give evidence at that time, and the result was that the RUC had a witness who would not appear in court and who was describing events involving homosexual acts that had occurred a considerable number of years before.

32 Although in 1973 the RUC Special Branch were aware of the allegation that McGrath was homosexual from another source they did not pass the information relating to the other source to their RUC colleagues as they should have done. Had Special Branch passed on that information then their RUC colleagues, whether in CID or in uniform departments, could have added it to the information that they had already received from the anonymous Robophone message.

33 Despite Roy Garland's commendable efforts to alert Social Services and the RUC to the risk he accurately identified that McGrath might be taking advantage of his position in Kincora to sexually assault residents there, just as he had sexually assaulted Roy Garland when a teenager, Roy Garland's efforts to do so were unsuccessful through no fault of his own.

34 Although the RUC (SB), MI5, SIS and Army Intelligence were all aware of allegations that McGrath was homosexual, such allegations were common at the time against various political and other figures. In the absence of positive evidence of homosexual acts there was little that could be done by these agencies.

35 We are satisfied that it was not until 1980 that the RUC Special Branch, MI5, the SIS and Army Intelligence became aware that McGrath had been sexually abusing residents at Kincora, and they learnt of that when it became the subject of public allegations and a police investigation was launched. All four agencies, whilst aware that McGrath was alleged to be homosexual, had no proof of that. They were aware that he worked in a boys' hostel where he was in a position of authority.

36 However, by November 1973, MI5, unlike the other three agencies, were also aware that the person who had by then been identified as William McGrath had been accused of "assaulting small boys" in April 1972. By virtue of Section 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 MI5 officers were subject to the same legal obligation as everyone else in Northern Ireland to report the commission of an "arrestable offence" (that is an offence punishable by five years imprisonment) to the police where they knew or believed that such an offence, or some other arrestable offence, had been committed. An alleged assault on small boys could, depending on the nature of the alleged assault, have been an arrestable offence which ought to have been reported to the police.

37 With the benefit of hindsight, and in the light of what is now known about McGrath's abuse of residents in Kincora, it might be argued it was the duty of MI5 to bring to the attention of RUC Special Branch that MI5 had received a report that McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys, and that by not doing so the MI5 officers who had this information were in breach of that duty. However, we consider that to take that view would be unjustified for several reasons. First of all, although the information was known to MI5 because it had been received eighteen months before, eighteen months separated the receipt of that information and the information confirming the identity of William McGrath as the leader of TARA. Secondly, the information came to MI5 in a letter from James Miller who was simply reporting what an unidentified source said at a time when unsubstantiated allegations of discreditable behaviour by TARA members about each other were commonplace, and the report was therefore assessed as being of dubious reliability. Thirdly, the MI5 officers were concentrating on establishing what sort of organisation TARA was, and whether it could be a possible Loyalist terrorist group in the context of the extremely volatile political and security circumstances of that time. In all of those circumstances we do not criticise them for failing to appreciate the significance of this information.

38 We consider that had this information been passed to the RUC Special Branch, and by it to their CID and uniformed colleagues, that information may still not have made a significant difference to the approach of the RUC. The RUC had received, and was to receive, much more detailed allegations from the Robophone message, from Valerie Shaw's conversation with D/Supt Graham, and from Roy Garland's conversation with DC Cullen that brought about the Cullen/Meharg investigation. An anonymous allegation of assault on small boys in an unspecified context and at an unknown point in time that had been passed by MI5 might not have added much, if anything, to that information. On the other hand, we consider that if it came from MI5 it might have prompted the RUC to look at the existing information it held about McGrath and to investigate it more robustly.

39 Based on our extensive examination of a very large number of files held by RUC Special Branch, by MI5, by SIS and by the Ministry of Defence, we are satisfied that McGrath was never an agent of the State, although he may have enjoyed creating an air of mystery about his activities, part of which may well have involved him hinting at, or implying in an oblique fashion, that he was an agent of the State.

40 Not only have we found no evidence to indicate that McGrath was an agent of any of the four agencies, we have found many documents and references which very strongly indicate that he was not an agent. For example, the discussion in early 1977 between MI5 and the SIS that it might be worthwhile penetrating Tara. Why would this be necessary if the Commanding Officer of Tara was already an agent? Another indication that McGrath was not an agent was the way he was named in a number of Daily Intelligence Summaries, some of which at least were intended to be read by a large number of individuals. To broadcast an agent's name in that way would be contrary to all intelligence practice, and that McGrath's name was circulated in this fashion strongly suggests he was not an agent or even a source.

41 No doubt there will be some who argue that such considerations can be explained away as Machiavellian cunning to conceal his status as an agent by placing him in full sight. However, the reality was that William McGrath was a sexual pervert who had political and religious views of an extreme and bizarre type who managed to trick gullible young men who were interested in political matters into regarding him as an important political figure. In reality we consider that William McGrath was never more than a minor player on the wider political stage who managed to create a spurious air of self-importance through Tara at a time of great political instability, communal violence and terrorist activity. Tara was never more than an organisation of occasional interest to the intelligence agencies.

42 There have been frequent allegations that various individuals, including Sir Maurice Oldfield, a former head of the Secret Intelligence Service who was later the Security Coordinator in Northern Ireland, and a number of named and unnamed Northern Ireland Office Civil Servants, and unnamed business men and other prominent figures, resorted to Kincora for sexual purposes. We are satisfied there is no credible evidence to support any of these allegations. Kincora was a small hostel and for most of its existence had only nine or fewer residents at any one time. As we have already pointed out, the great majority of all of those residents who were interviewed by the Sussex Police were very surprised at such allegations and did not believe them to be of any substance.

43 There were a small number of former residents of Kincora who returned to Kincora as visitors and who engaged in consensual homosexual activity with Mains, or on a small number of occasions, with some of the residents. A number of residents engaged in consensual homosexual activity with each other, or did so with others away from Kincora in circumstances which were completely unconnected with Kincora. We are satisfied that Kincora was not a homosexual brothel, nor used by any of the intelligence agencies as a "honey pot" to entrap, blackmail or otherwise exploit homosexuals.

44 Both the Belfast Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor died before the Hughes Inquiry investigated the sexual abuse at Kincora. The reasons why the Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor decided not to accept the recommendation made by Mr Mason in 1971 that the complaints against Mains should be reported to the RUC were never recorded. There are a number of possible reasons why they took this step. One was that they did not agree that the information contained in Mr Mason's report was sufficient to justify the matter being reported to the police. If that was their reason then that was a wrong decision. Another reason may have been to protect the Belfast Welfare Authority from the embarrassment that would flow from a police investigation into a boys' hostel under its control. Another explanation may have been that either or both were determined to protect Mains from exposure as a homosexual. That would only be a possible consideration were there evidence to show that either the Town Clerk or the Town Solicitor knew that Mains was a practising homosexual. In the absence of any evidence, each of these possible reasons is no more than speculation.

45 Apart from that unexplained decision, we are satisfied that there were no attempts by the Belfast Welfare Authority or the EHSSB to engage in a "cover-up", that is concealing from relevant individuals or authorities their knowledge of, or information about, wrongdoing by Mains, Semple or McGrath.

46 We are satisfied that Mr Wallace was moved from his post in the Army Information Service at HQNI, and subsequently dismissed, solely because there was very strong circumstantial evidence that he had been engaged in, and was still engaged in, the unauthorised disclosure of classified documents and information to journalists. We are satisfied that whatever he claims to have known about Kincora had nothing whatever to do with his posting to Preston or his subsequent dismissal.

47 We are satisfied that Mr Wallace was treated unjustly in two respects connected with the subsequent appeal he brought against his dismissal to the Civil Service Appeal Board. First of all the MoD did not reveal to the CSAB the full job description which had been prepared showing the true nature of his work. Secondly, the MoD briefed the Chairman, and then the Deputy Chairman, of the CSAB with information that was not made known to Mr Wallace, to his representative, or to the other members of the Board who sat on his appeal. That they did so, and that the gentleman concerned received the information, was thoroughly reprehensible and should never have happened.

48 These injustices were accepted by David Calcutt QC in his report to the MoD in which he recommended that Mr Wallace be paid £30,000 compensation. We understand that Mr Wallace eventually accepted this amount.

49 For the reasons we have given in the previous chapter we do not regard Mr Wallace as truthful in his accounts of what he knew about sexual abuse in Kincora, or of what he did with that knowledge, between 1972 and 1974. In particular, for the reasons we have given, we do not accept that the critical document of 8 November, 1974 was authored at that time.

50 During the Caskey Phase Three investigations MI5 consistently obstructed a proper line of enquiry by their refusal to allow the RUC to interview a retired MI5 officer, and by their refusal to authorise that retired officer to provide a written statement to the RUC answering 30 questions the RUC wished to ask him. We consider these questions were proper and relevant questions to the enquiry being conducted by D/Supt Caskey at that time.

51 While the Sussex Police carried out a thorough re-examination of the way the RUC carried out the initial Caskey Phase One investigation into the offences committed by Mains, Semple and McGrath, Sir George Terry was not justified in stating that military sources had been "very frank with me and perfectly open".

52 The reliance by the NIO on the decision by the DPP that there should be no prosecution, and on Sir George Terry's Report, as adequate reasons for not setting up an Inquiry with Terms of Reference that would have enabled an investigation of the issues relating to the security agencies was not justified at the time. The decision failed to properly take account of the public disquiet at the time about issues which were deliberately excluded from the Terms of Reference of the Hughes Inquiry. This disquiet has persisted in certain quarters, but this Inquiry has now been able to investigate these matters.

53 The realisation by the MoD in 1989 that incorrect answers may have been given by Ministers to the House of Commons and to others led the MoD to carry out a wide ranging and detailed investigation to establish the correct position. When the correct position was known, the Ministry took the necessary action to place the correct facts before the House of Commons and to correct the errors that had occurred in the past. It appointed Mr Calcutt QC to consider the injustices suffered by Mr Wallace to which we have already referred. We are satisfied that once the MoD appreciated that incorrect information had been given, and that Mr Wallace had not been treated properly before the CSAB, it acted promptly and properly to establish the correct position, and to ensure that the injustices Mr Wallace suffered in the appeal process where remedied. The injustices were remedied by the payment of £30,000 to him as compensation.

54 Those residents of Kincora who were sexually abused by Mains, Semple and McGrath were let down by those three individuals who abused their positions of authority and committed numerous acts of sexual abuse of the gravest kind against teenage children in their care while they were living in this hostel. When their conduct was exposed, they were prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to appropriate periods of imprisonment.

55 In our investigations this Inquiry has examined hundreds of files held by Government and by the Police, MI5, the Secret Intelligence Service, the Ministry of Defence and other departments and agencies. We have also examined the police files relating to the earlier investigations that were carried out by the RUC and then by the Sussex Constabulary into what did or did not happen at Kincora. As we explained, those investigations by the RUC and the Sussex Police were extremely thorough and comprehensive. D/Supt Caskey and his officers went to great lengths to identify every possible person who may have been in possession of information that could lead to the identification and possible prosecution of anyone else who had committed a criminal offence of whatever kind relating to Kincora, whether that was sexual abuse or the suppression of evidence.

56 Those investigations did not find, and our Inquiry has not found, any credible evidence to show that there is any basis for the allegations that have been made over the years about the involvement of others in sexual abuse of residents in Kincora, or anything to show that the security agencies were complicit in any form of exploitation of sexual abuse in Kincora for any purpose.

57 The reality of the situation was that it was because of the multitude of failings by officials of the Belfast Welfare Authority, of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, and by the RUC, that the sexual abuse of residents at Kincora was not stopped earlier, and that those responsible for perpetrating these grave crimes were not brought to justice sooner.

HIA Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry

HIA Inquiry, PO Box 2080, Belfast, BT1 9QA, Northern Ireland.
T: 028 9072 0600 E: general@hiainquiry.org W: www.hiainquiry.org

31st March 2015

This is the report of the Acknowledgement Forum. The content is agreed by the four members of the Forum, Beverley Clarke, Norah Gibbons, Dave Marshall, and Tom Shaw.

Beverley Clarke

Norah Gibbons

Dave Marshall

Tom Shaw

Contents

Chapter 1:

Chapter 1: The Acknowledgement Forum

Introduction

1 The appointment of the Chairman of the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry (hereafter the Inquiry) and the four members of the Acknowledgement Forum (hereafter the Forum) was announced by the First Minister and deputy First Minister on 31 May 2012.

The Purpose of the Forum

2 The principal purpose of the Forum was to allow applicants to talk informally and in whatever detail they chose about their experiences when placed in designated residential childcare establishments in Northern Ireland and, in doing so, to feel confident that what they experienced was being acknowledged and listened to in good faith. The process did not involve investigative questioning but the Forum offered to assist applicants in describing their experiences by putting some questions to them. The Forum meeting provided applicants with the time and the opportunity to be heard without challenge or disbelief – an element of their experience as children in designated establishments that may have been denied to them.

Arrangements for Applicants Meeting with the Forum

3 To ensure everyone had an appropriate context in which to recount their personal experiences in what, for many, could be a difficult and painful process, a number of carefully considered steps and arrangements were put in place.

- Following receipt of the applications by the Inquiry, each person was contacted by one of the Inquiry's Witness Support Officers (WSOs) who arranged an appointment in a way that was suitable for that person. The WSOs ensured that practical arrangements regarding travel to the Inquiry's premises – and overnight accommodation where required – were in place prior to the meeting with the Forum. The WSOs were also able to answer any queries an applicant may have had about the Inquiry, including the Forum process.
- A letter was sent to each applicant setting out clearly the exact arrangements for the meeting with the Forum. The applicants were told that they could bring with them any papers, correspondence or photographs relating to their placement(s) in designated establishments in Northern Ireland and all such documents, if they agreed, would be scanned into the Inquiry's records.

- Each applicant who wished to do so could bring a companion with him or her. The companion could be present for the meeting with the Forum or could stay in an adjacent waiting room. Some of those who accompanied applicants chose to leave the premises and come back when contacted by the WSOs or the applicant when the meeting with the Forum had concluded. The choice was in the hands of the applicant. The role of the companion was intended to be a supportive one. By the end of the Forum's work, 86 of the 261 male applicants and 58 of the 166 female applicants had chosen to have a companion present but many attended for their meeting alone. In the event that the companion was also an applicant to the Forum or to the Statutory Inquiry, that person was not allowed to accompany the applicant during the meeting.

The table that follows contains a summary of this information

	Male	Female
Accompanied but not during the meeting	38	42
Accompanied during the meeting	86	58
Unaccompanied	137*	66
Total	261	166

*One applicant's account of his experiences was presented in written form. He is not included in this total.

4 Applicants' companions consisted of partners, family members, friends, people giving them specialist support and solicitors.

Accompanied but not during the meeting with the Forum

Accompanied but not during the meeting	Male	Female
Partners	10	9
Family members	16	15
Friends	11	17
Support personnel	-	1
Solicitors	1	-
Total	38	42

Accompanied during the meeting with the Forum

Accompanied during the meeting	Male	Female
Partners	36	16
Family members	13	19
Friends	8	11
Support personnel	22	10
Solicitors	3	2
Interpreters only	4	-
Total	86	58

Reception of Applicants for Meetings with the Forum

5 The WSOs met the applicants – and any companions – when they arrived for their appointment. They were offered a quiet room to relax in and a welcoming cup of tea or coffee. They were told the names of the Forum members who would meet them. The WSOs made every effort to assist the applicants in settling themselves for the meeting with the Forum members.

The Arrangements for Forum Meetings

6 When ready, the applicant was shown into the room where he or she would meet the panel members who would listen to the account of his or her experiences. Generally panel members worked in pairs – a male and a female. In a small number of cases, applicants requested a meeting with one Forum member or with two female or two male panel members; those requests were agreed.

7 Meetings with the Forum did not follow a strict format. As already explained, each meeting was designed to allow the participants to describe their experiences in the way that they chose. At the beginning of each meeting, Forum members welcomed the applicant, outlined the purpose of the meeting, and asked permission to take notes and make a recording of the meeting. Each applicant was assured that he or she could take a break at any time, and was given the opportunity to ask questions of the Forum members. Each participant was also informed of the legal requirement on all citizens in Northern Ireland to report a crime of which they become aware to the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI). All applicants accepted this and some welcomed the information as reassuring.

Recording Forum Meetings

8 In accordance with the Inquiry's Terms of Reference and the assurance given to applicants at the beginning of their meetings with the Forum, all notes taken during the meetings were destroyed once the details were recorded in the Forum's secure database. It was explained to applicants that the information recorded by the Forum members in its database would be used solely for the purpose of informing the report that the Forum would be required to prepare when the meetings with applicants had concluded. They were also told that the information in the database would be deleted once the Forum's work was complete.

9 The design of the database was informed by the model developed by the Ryan Commission for its Confidential Committee. The Forum acknowledges with gratitude the benefits of having access to the expertise and experience of the Confidential Committee.

10 Some applicants brought personal papers, files and photographs to support them in their accounts and provide an assurance of the veracity of what they intended to tell the Forum. The originals of those papers and photographs were returned to the applicants either at the end of the meeting or were posted to them afterwards. For those intending to proceed to the Statutory Inquiry the papers and photographs were scanned into a secure database before being returned to applicants.

11 Following this, and when the applicants felt ready to proceed, they were invited to talk about their own experiences. In some instances it proved necessary for one of the Forum members to leave the meeting for a time at the applicant's request, for example when the applicant wanted to recount events that caused deep embarrassment or difficulty in the presence of, in some cases, a female and, in others, a male.

The Duration of Forum Meetings

12 All applicants were free to decide how they would proceed with recounting their experiences. Some preferred to answer questions to help them get started while others had prepared exactly what they wished to say and were content to start themselves. People often wanted to know how long their meeting would last. The answer always given was that the meeting would last as long as they needed it to last. The time allocated to them was for them to use as they wished. A review of all the meetings reveals that an hour and a half was the average time taken for a meeting with the Forum. Some meetings lasted for a shorter period and some for much longer. All meetings proceeded constructively and according to the wishes of the applicant. Occasionally panel members suggested to an applicant that he or she should take a break, for example when he or she became distressed in recounting experiences or was becoming tired. Some availed of that opportunity, others declined saying that they wanted to recount their information as quickly as possible; "to get it over as soon as I can" was the comment of one applicant. Others asked for a break to have a cigarette or requested a comfort break.

13 The Forum meetings were focused on the individual and his or her experiences and on no-one else. This required the Forum members to be understanding and acknowledge any distress or upset that arose on the day as painful life experiences were recounted. Forum members reassured applicants that any distress was respected and not unexpected. The Forum members' concern for the well-being of the applicant was at the heart of the process.

The Conclusion of Forum Meetings

14 When the applicants were satisfied they had recounted their experiences as fully as they would like, the meeting ended. In some cases the applicant indicated at that point that he or she still had other experiences in care to recount; when that occurred, an offer was made of a further meeting with the Forum members. Applicants were also told that, as an alternative, they could send additional recollections in writing, in confidence, to the Forum members with whom they had met. When a meeting was clearly at an end, the Forum members thanked the applicant and the applicant's WSO would come to the room and sit with them and ensure that they had time to relax before leaving to go home. The WSOs ensured that the applicants were aware of the support services that could be accessed – in addition to any they had availed of already. Any questions relating to travel or other expenses incurred in attending the meetings were answered at that time.

15 In the week following the applicant's meetings with the Forum, their WSO, with their prior permission, phoned to ask how they were and to follow up on any queries they may have had or that had arisen since their meetings with the Forum.

Acknowledgement of the Age and Health of Applicants

16 The Inquiry related to designated establishments that functioned at some stage during the period from 1922 to 1995. Given that time span, Forum members were alert to both age and health issues that might arise for some applicants. Consequently, priority was given to those whose needs required an early appointment. Inevitably this meant, in practice, that it was not possible to say exactly how long an applicant would have to wait for an appointment. However, Forum members were very conscious of the commitment applicants made when they completed application forms and they worked to see each person as soon as possible. Applicants, for the most part, understood and accepted this.

Chapter 2:

Chapter 2: The People Who Applied

Informing Former Residents about the Inquiry

1 Information about the Inquiry was available from a number of sources including the NI Assembly, the Inquiry itself – through its strategy to ensure that as many former residents as possible were made aware of its work and the ways in which individuals should apply to participate – and widespread coverage in news media, both locally and further afield.

The Applicants' Eligibility to Participate in the Inquiry

2 Applications to be included in the Inquiry were received from 533 people. When the applications were reviewed against the Inquiry's Terms of Reference it was found that 32 had been placed in or had attended establishments that were outside the Terms of Reference and so were ineligible for participation. Another seven applications were duplicates of applications already received and 37 applicants later withdrew their applications or their applications were designated as withdrawn by the Inquiry. In the latter case those applicants had:

- failed to attend on at least three occasions for meetings with the Forum; or
- failed to respond to numerous attempts by the WSOs to contact them to arrange a meeting with the Forum or Statutory Inquiry or provide requested information.

3 The Forum began to meet applicants in October 2012. By November 2014, the Forum members had listened to the experiences of 427 people who had been cared for in designated establishments in Northern Ireland between 1922 and 1995. One applicant's written account was also accepted, bringing the total number to engage with the Forum to 428.

The Applicants Who Attended the Forum

4 The great majority of applicants who met the Forum were born in Northern Ireland. Others were born in the Republic of Ireland, England, Scotland, South Africa and the USA. The figures for each country are given in the following table.

Country of birth	Male	Female
Northern Ireland	224	134
Republic of Ireland	15	17
England and Wales	11	10
Scotland	2	2
South Africa	2	-
USA	1	-
Undisclosed	7	3
Total	262	166

There was a wide age range amongst applicants. The numbers born in each decade varied with the largest numbers coming forward from the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s. This information is set out in the table below.

Decade of birth	Male	Female	Age in 2012
1920 - 1929	3	1	83+
1930 - 1939	20	13	73+
1940 - 1949	51	37	63+
1950 - 1959	79	56	53+
1960 - 1969	78	39	43+
1970 - 1979	27	17	33+
1980 onwards	4	3	32 or under
Total	262	166

Reasons for Coming Forward

5 The 427 applicants who engaged directly with the Forum gave one or more reasons for doing so. Two reasons were mentioned more than any others: "to tell my story" and "to record abuse." Those who said they wanted to tell their story indicated that they wanted to be listened to, to be heard without interruption, challenge or disbelief. "Please listen to all I have to say", "I've waited so long to do this", "I thought the day would never come" and "I'm so grateful for the opportunity to be heard" were typical of the comments made by applicants. Others said that they wanted to have it on the record that they had been abused, even where they did not want to take the matter any further.

6 Other reasons given by both men and women included the wish to help others and help to prevent abuse. Some said they hoped that by coming forward they would both encourage others who had had similar experiences to do so and, where those others were still not able to report their abuse, to give them a sense that what they had experienced was being represented to authority. Almost a fifth of the applicants regarded participation in the Forum as a therapeutic experience and part of the healing process they were engaged in as they strove to deal with their past abusive experiences in residential childcare.

7 A small number, around 7%, said that they had been persuaded by others to come forward. Their reluctance to do so of their own volition, they said, reflected a number of factors including their lack of self-confidence, their sense of awkwardness and mistrust in dealing with authority, and their perception that they would not be believed.

8 The selection of quotations that follows exemplifies these concerns and other feelings that applicants expressed in coming to the Forum.

Males

"I wanted to meet you and share the burden I've carried for so long."

"This is a dark secret I kept hidden until three years ago. After I had a breakdown I started to talk about it…It's important that I tell all of my story…I want to be believed."

"I found it difficult to come to the Forum and made a number of dummy runs…I see the Forum as part of the healing process along with the counselling I've been having for four years."

"I find it very difficult to talk about the sexual abuse I endured, but I need to be heard and believed after a life of denial and rejection."

"I want to put this nightmare in its place. I just want to get this fucking anger out of me."

"I feel my abusers have not been dealt with properly and have largely escaped any accountability."

"I'm really grateful for this opportunity to unburden myself."

"I believe I have to inform future generations of what happened to child migrants."

"I want and need to be believed. I have not spoken about my abuse since I left Northern Ireland when I was fourteen."

"I have waited for a long time for this opportunity to be heard and believed…I want my experiences on the record…I have had serious mental health problems over the years and I believe they're the result of being abused when I was a child."

"I saw the HIAI posters and felt I had a duty to back up the testimony of anyone else who'd come forward."

"I'm not interested in compensation – my interest is to help the children in care today."

Females

"My prime concern is to ensure that what happened to me couldn't happen to any other child."

"I want my story to be told to help future generations."

"It's nice to get it off my chest; that's the most I have ever said to anybody."

"I want to tell my story but now I want to keep it dead, at the back of my mind, and just get on with my life."

"At last I've got someone to listen to me."

"I just want to be believed. In the past, people tried to tell but they weren't listened to."

"I reported my abuse on a number of occasions but my complaints were ignored."

"I feel guilty that I did not come forward earlier with information which might have made a difference to someone else."

"My doctor advised me to talk to the Inquiry as part of his way of getting me to confront the past and deal with it."

"I was contacted initially some time ago by an ex-resident and I decided to join the action being taken by the group."

"I've been struggling for a long time with whether or not to come to the Inquiry but I finally agreed…I want to speak on my behalf and on behalf of the others that I saw being abused…I want to tell all I can without being challenged."

"I feel very wronged that my culture and heritage were stolen from me when I was sent to Australia."

"I feel very strongly that the most disadvantaged children were not cared for appropriately."

9 The reasons for coming forward are summarised in the table below.

Reasons	Male	Female	Total
To tell my story	150	104	254
To record abuse	146	83	229
To help others/prevent abuse	57	30	87
Therapy (part of the healing process)	56	27	83
Sense of obligation	33	12	45
Persuaded by others	20	11	31
Other reasons	27	13	40
Total			769

Note: Many applicants gave more than one reason for coming forward, hence the figures above when totalled exceed the number of applicants.

Location of Meetings with Applicants

10 Applicants came from all over the United Kingdom and beyond to attend the Forum: 64 per cent from NI, 16 per cent from England and Wales, 1 per cent from Scotland, 5 per cent from the Republic of Ireland, 1 per cent from other parts of Europe, 12 per cent from Australia, and 1 per cent from the rest of the world. Some, for reasons of health or factors such as distance from the Inquiry's premises, were heard in or close to their home.

Location of Forum meetings	Applicants
HIAI premises	278
Derry/Londonderry	61
Other places in NI (1 care facility, 1 hospice and 1 health facility)	3
Applicant's or relative's home (including 8 in England and 1 in Wales)	14
Perth, Australia	29
Melbourne, Australia	4
Brisbane, Australia	2
Republic of Ireland	4
England	16
Scotland	1
Prison, including 4 in England	11
Secure NHS hospital in England	1

Location of Forum meetings	Applicants
Phone calls to Canada, USA and Australia	3
Total	427

 Note: As mentioned earlier, one applicant's written account of his experiences in childcare in NI was also accepted by the Inquiry bringing the total number of applicants who met or had contact with the Forum to 428. That total is used throughout the remainder of this report.

Social and Demographic Profile of the Applicants

11 This section of the report provides an overview of the personal details of 262 male and 166 female applicants who gave information to the Forum. The demographic information compiled in the following section was provided by the applicants in regard to their pre-admission social and familial circumstances. Some applicants had no knowledge of their parents or chose not to speak of them at their meeting with the Forum. Information on fathers was most likely to be missing.

12 The table that follows shows that the majority of applicants understood that their parents were married at the time of their birth. The next largest group were born to single mothers, who often were unable to rear their children alone, whether because of the stigma attached to single parents or because of a lack of resources.

A total of 65 applicants had no knowledge concerning their parent's/ parents' marital status or chose not to speak about that.

Marital status of parents	Male	Female	Total
Married	137	79	216
Divorced	7	2	9
Single	52	37	89
Separated	8	3	11
Extra-marital	11	9	20
Co-habiting	6	10	16
Widowed	1	-	1
Not known	40	26	66
Total	262	166	428

Main Issues in Parental Relationships Affecting Applicants' Admission to Care

13 Outlined below are the main issues that male and female applicants identified as occurring in their parents' relationship and which affected decisions about their upbringing. The issues include death of one or both parents, abandonment by one or both parents, domestic violence and emotional abuse in the family, imprisonment of one or both parents, mental health difficulties and substance misuse, including, alcohol abuse.

Death of Parents

- 114 female applicants said their mother was deceased. Twelve of those deaths occurred when the applicant was very young.
- 87 females said their fathers were deceased. One of those deaths occurred when the applicant was very young.
- 158 male applicants said their mother was deceased.
- 28 of those deaths occurred when the applicant was very young.
- 115 males said their fathers were deceased. Four of those deaths occurred when the applicants were very young.

Abandoned by Parents

- 74 female applicants said their mother abandoned them.
- 55 females said their father abandoned them.
- 84 male applicants said their mother abandoned them.
- 78 males said their father abandoned them.

Domestic Violence in the Family

- 37 females said there was domestic violence in their family.
- 53 males said there was domestic violence in their family.

Emotional Abuse in the Family

- 40 females said there was emotional abuse in their family.
- 59 males said there was emotional abuse in the family.

Imprisonment of One or Both Parents

- Six females said their mother had been in prison on one occasion or more.
- Twelve females said their father had been in prison on one occasion or more.

- One male said his mother had been in prison on one occasion or more.
- Ten males said their father had been in prison on one occasion or more.

Mental Health Difficulties

- 30 females said their mothers had experienced mental health difficulties.
- 35 females said their fathers had experienced mental health difficulties.
- 30 males said their mothers had experienced mental health difficulties.
- Ten males said their fathers had experienced mental health difficulties.

Substance Abuse including Alcohol Abuse

- 49 females said their mothers had been involved in substance misuse and/or alcohol abuse over a number of years.
- 36 females said their fathers had been involved in substance misuse and/or alcohol abuse over a number of years.
- 42 males said their mothers had been involved in substance abuse and/or alcohol abuse over a number of years.
- 68 males said their fathers had been involved in substance misuse and/or alcohol abuse over a number of years.

14 The following selection of quotations and comments from applicants has been chosen to illustrate some of the issues commented on.

> "My mother died of tuberculosis. There were six children all very young. My father left us alone to go to work, so we were put into care."
>
> "My parents were in a mixed marriage in which my father's views prevailed. My mother had been married before and had two daughters from that marriage. Mother died, when I was two, from cancer. My mother's sisters offered to bring us up but my father wanted us brought up in his religion so refused this offer. Father didn't want us adopted so he paid for us to stay in an institution."
>
> "My father was alcoholic and we were a big family. I loved my mother; I was the apple of her eye. I was chastised by my father for getting into trouble but at least he was beating me for doing something…they beat me for nothing."

"I was born in hospital and when my mother returned with me, her mother refused to allow her into the family home. I was placed with my uncle…who cared for me until I was five months old and I was then placed in care."

"Both my parents had chronic alcohol problems over many years. My father was very violent, and my mother was very frightened of him."

"My father was just seventeen and my mother 23 when they married. They eloped to London, and later both developed alcohol problems."

"My mother and father were prosecuted for neglect and served three-month sentences for this."

"My mother suffered from chronic depression, and my father, who was violent, from poor health. We had a nomadic existence, and rented houses always of a very low standard."

"My parents were in a mixed marriage and both families disapproved. They went to England where I was born. My parents moved back but my mother died of lung cancer. My father tried to cope but eventually couldn't cope."

"My parents both drank a lot and there were a lot of alcohol-fuelled fights between them."

"My parents were in a mixed marriage…The extended families on both sides, including grandparents, disowned me, my parents and my siblings so I had no contact with my extended family."

"I came from a big family, thirteen in total; some of the children were born as a result of extramarital affairs. My father was a violent alcoholic."

"I think my parents' marriage was strong and successful. I was the black sheep of the family."

- An applicant described a home marked by domestic violence and the children in the family were sexually abused by the father.
- An applicant had virtually no information about his parents and said the staff in his establishment did not disclose any details of his background – even though he thinks they had information. He found out by chance that his mother had passed away.
- An applicant from the Travelling Community told the Forum that his parents were described as living in absolute poverty with no money to provide for their children.

Parents of Applicants - Occupational Status

15 The table below shows the occupational status or job description of the applicants' parents at the time of their admission into the care system. In two-parent households, the father's occupation is recorded and in other circumstances the occupational status of the sole parent is included. More than 50 per cent of applicants did not know the skill level of their parents at the time of their birth and a further 22 per cent reported that their parents were unskilled.

Occupational status	Male	Female	Total
Professional worker	4	2	6
Managerial and technical	1	1	2
Non-manual	1	1	2
Skilled manual	30	15	45
Semi-skilled	10	6	16
Unskilled	62	33	95
Unknown	154	108	262
Total	262	166	428

Siblings of Applicants

16 Of the 428 applicants, 336 reported that they had brothers and sisters, some or all of whom may also have been in the care system. The following table indicates approximate family size as reported by applicants.

Number of siblings	Number of Applicants
0	51
1 – 4	176
5 – 9	125
10 or more	35
Unknown	41
Total	428

17 One hundred and sixty applicants had five or more brothers and/or sisters. For the purpose of this report, half-brothers and sisters are included as siblings as they were described by applicants as family members. The average family size reported by the 336 applicants was five children.

Eighty-five applicants were deemed to be single children without siblings, having either stated that they knew they had no siblings or that they have never been able to establish the facts in relation to the details of their family of origin.

18 In allowing for families represented by more than one applicant to the Forum, the 428 applicants represent 306 families. Applicants who came to the Forum were mainly first-born children or the youngest member of the family.

Siblings of Applicants in the Care System

19 A total of 253 applicants reported having siblings in the care system. It is of note that many applicants to the Forum reported that, when they were received into care, older brothers and younger family members were likely to have remained within the extended family. A small number of applicants noted that older siblings who had been placed in designated establishments in Northern Ireland had been sent to Australia under the child migrant scheme.

20 Some applicants were raised with their siblings prior to their placement in care, while others were one of the younger members of the family and did not know their older brothers and/or sisters. Many applicants spoke to the Forum of their confusion, when discharged back to their family home, to find they had new brothers and sisters of whom they were unaware. Other applicants spoke of their deep distress at losing contact with siblings who lived in the same establishment as them but were separated because of policies on age and gender so that gradually the bonds of kinship were broken.

21 The following quotations and comments concerning siblings illustrate the information provided to the Forum.

> "If you haven't got family, you are a nobody. You know when someone in a family dies, you grieve for them; we were grieving all the time - but we didn't know what we were grieving for…I have nobody."
>
> "The care system split us up. We had no bond; now we are argumentative rather than close."
>
> "I was close to my two brothers. I always defended them. I have more scars for my brothers than for myself."
>
> "I felt guilty because I was taken out of the home and my two younger sisters were left behind…When mum collected me I wasn't allowed to say goodbye to my sisters…I was taken out, I felt guilty just leaving them there…I felt terrible for my younger sisters all these years."

- An applicant told the Forum that her older sister and two brothers returned to their mother in England but she was left with a sister in a designated establishment. At twelve, she was flown to England with her sister to be returned to her mother's care and her mother was a complete stranger to both of them. Their mother had had two other children whilst they had been in care.
- An applicant told the Forum that she and her sisters were separated when they were received into the children's home. The older two sisters were denied contact with her. She recalled holding her sisters hands through railings separating the different parts of the establishment. She became emotional asking: "why wasn't I allowed to mingle with them; embrace and hold them?"

Chapter 3: The Applicants' Experiences How they are Presented in Chapters 4 and 5

1 Chapters 4 and 5 of this report are based entirely on what applicants told the Forum about their experiences in designated establishments. As noted earlier, the term designated establishment is used to signify an establishment that met the terms of reference of the Inquiry. Throughout the report the terms "children's home" and "home" are also used as synonymous with designated establishment because those were the terms most often used by applicants in their meetings with the Forum.

2 The information in these chapters is not tested evidence, nor is it the outcome of a series of structured interviews. Some participants were ready to recount their experiences without any prompts from the panel members; others, who were unsure about how to tell of their experiences, accepted the panel members' offer to help them get started by asking some introductory questions, usually focusing on what they knew of the reasons for their initial admission to care.

3 This part of the report is not an exhaustive series of quotations but rather comments based on what people said, supported and enlivened by a selection of quotations that reflect the voices of those who took part.

The information in Chapters 4 and 5 is arranged by period, establishment type and gender of applicant. The years spanned by the Inquiry – 1922 to 1995 – have been grouped into three periods:

- Period 1 – 1922 to 1955
- Period 2 – 1956 to 1975
- Period 3 – 1976 to 1995

These periods have been chosen to reflect significant changes in legislation and public policy in the care of looked after children in Northern Ireland.

4 The designated establishments in which applicants were resident as children have been grouped into three broad types:

- Voluntary
- State
- Juvenile Justice

5 Voluntary establishments were those provided and managed by voluntary institutions such as the main churches and charitable bodies. State establishments were those provided by local welfare committees and other state agencies. Juvenile justice establishments were those in which the majority of the children and young people were placed further to coming through the juvenile justice system.

6 As explained above, the information given by applicants to the Forum in respect of each establishment type is organised by gender so, for example, in looking for information about the care experiences of females in juvenile justice establishments in the 1960s the reader should turn to Chapter 4, Period 2 and Females: juvenile justice.

7 Some applicants' placements in designated establishments began in the later stages of one period and continued into the early stages of the next. In those cases their experiences are included in the period in which they spent the greater part of their placement. Other applicants who had more than one placement, with one in one period and another in the next, will have their experiences in each placement included in the period in which it occurred. These details are significant in that it is therefore not possible to simply add the numbers in certain tables in each period in the report and arrive at a number equivalent to the total number of applicants who met the Forum; such totals could be greater than the actual number of applicants, as some applicants had multiple placements.

8 Inevitably, in view of the variations in the extent and detail of the information given to the Forum and the panel members' commitment to reflect fairly the information given, there are differences in the focus and scope of some of the paragraphs and tables in each period in Chapters 4 and 5 of the report. For example, in Period 3, 1976 – 1995, a smaller proportion of applicants complained about fewer aspects of daily living experiences than those in Period 1, 1922 – 1955 and Period 2, 1956 – 1975; a reflection, perhaps, of changing standards and resources in residential childcare, over time, in Northern Ireland.

Chapter 4:

Period 3:

Chapter 4: Applicants' Experiences of Care

Period 1: 1922 – 1955

Introduction

1 Seventy-two applicants – 47 men and 25 women – who had been in residential care at some stage in their childhood in the period from 1922 to 1955 spoke to the Forum about their experiences. The oldest male applicant from this period was born in 1926 and the youngest in 1953. The oldest female applicant from this period was born in 1927 and the youngest was born in 1949.

2 Thirty-two of the applicants – 21 men and eleven women – had been sent from six voluntary establishments in Northern Ireland to Australia under the child migrant scheme. Only their experiences in designated children's residential establishments in Northern Ireland are included in this report. Thirty-eight of the applicants, 24 men and fourteen women, entered the care system between 1939 and 1945, the years of the Second World War.

Placements in the Care System

3 The number of establishments by type in which applicants had lived is summarised in the following table; the numbers of applicants who had been placed in each type of provision are also included.

Applicants in Each Category of Provision
Establishment type	Gender	Number of Establishments	Number of Placements
Voluntary	Male	7	43
	Female	8	24
State	Male	6	6
	Female	1	1
Juvenile Justice	Male	1	2
	Female	-	-

4 Almost twice as many men as women who had been in a designated establishment in Period 1 came to the Forum. At the time they applied to the Inquiry they ranged in age from 83 years to 69 years.

The table below sets out the age range of those who applied.

Applicants/age range	60 to 69 years of age	70 to 79 years of age	80 to 89 years of age	All Applicants
Males	11	29	7	47
Females	10	10	5	25
All applicants	21	39	12	72

5 Most of the men and women in Period 1 had been placed initially in establishments that were part of the voluntary sector, the majority of them under Roman Catholic management. These establishments were large, accommodating up to 150 children. Those who had been in state care had lived in smaller establishments with provision for as few as ten children. One applicant had been in a specialist residential home for children with hearing, speech and sight disabilities and two others had had a placement in a juvenile justice establishment – a training school. Another had been in a workhouse with his mother and brother and he was cared for in that setting for some years.

Circumstances of Admission into the Care System

6 Some applicants described in detail the circumstances that led to their being placed in children's residential care. Others spoke, as far as they could, about their childhood circumstances but some, despite persistent research, still had little information about their parents and wider family circle. They spoke of a longing – a gap to be filled – to know more about their families, and some were still deeply affected by the lack of information about their family backgrounds.

Order of Admission to Care

7 For the great majority of applicants in Period 1, their first placement was to be their only placement in designated establishments. A few applicants had previously been in foster care and so their admissions to designated establishments are included in the following table as second admissions.

Order of Admission to Care
Establishment Type	Gender	First	Second	Not known	Total
Voluntary	Male	33	5	1	39
	Female	21	3	-	24
State	Male	5	1	-	6
	Female	1	-	-	1
Juvenile Justice	Male	-	2	-	2
	Female	-	-	-	-
Total		60	11	1	72

Age at Entry to the Care System

8 The ages of the applicants when first admitted to a designated establishment ranged widely. Of note is the fact that half of both the men and the women had been admitted as very young children, ie two years of age or younger.

Age at Entry
Establish-ment	Gender	<1	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	10+	Total
Voluntary	Male	12	4	7	2	4	4	2	3	1	-	-	2	41
	Female	7	2	2	1	2	5	2	1	2	-	-	-	24
State	Male	1	-	1	-	1	-	-	1	-	-	1	1	6
	Female	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	1
Juvenile Justice*	Male	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
	Female	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total		20	6	10	3	7	10	4	5	3		1	3	72

Note: There are no entries in the juvenile justice section because for the two applicants who had placements in a juvenile justice establishment those placements were not their first admission to care.

Duration of Placements in the Care System

9 A review of the duration of placement in the various types of establishment indicates that two thirds of the applicants spent five or more years of their childhood in at least one establishment and almost a fifth of them had been in establishments for ten or more years in Northern Ireland. The table below presents this information by establishment type and gender.

Duration in Years
Establishment	Gender	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16
Voluntary	Male	1	4	4	5	2	4	4	4	7	4	3	-	-	-	-	1
	Female	2	-	1	1	4	4	5		1	3	1	1	-	1	-	-
State	Male	4	1	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
	Female	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Juvenile Justice	Male	1	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
	Female	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-		-	-	-	-	-	-
Total		8	6	5	6	7	8	10	4	8	7	4	1		1		1

Note: The figures indicate placements, not applicants.

Age at Discharge from the Care System

10 Some applicants were sent from their residential establishments back into their family homes. Others were fostered and some, at the age of fourteen and older, were placed in work, in a few cases in the establishment in which they had been living. An analysis of their ages at discharge from the care system and the establishment type from which they were discharged is given in the table below.

Age at Discharge
Establish-ment	Gender	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	Total
Voluntary	Male	-	1	1	2	4	2		10	6	2	2	2	2	2	4	1	41
	Female	1	-	1	1	5	1	1	1	2	1	-	2	4	2	2	-	24
State	Male	1	-	1	-	-	1	1	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	5
	Female	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1
Juvenile Justice	Male	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	1
	Female	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total		2	1	3	3	9	5	2	11	9	3	2	4	6	4	7	1	72

Applicants in each Type of Provision

11 The great majority of applicants in this period, 69, had one placement in a designated establishment but three had more than one. Two applicants, both men, each had two placements and one man had been in three establishments. The table below summarises this information.

Establishment	Male	Female	Total
Voluntary	43	24	67
State	6	1	7
Juvenile Justice	2	-	2
All	51	25	76

Note: The figures indicate placements, not applicants.

Referral Sources/Agencies

12 The circumstances that led to their placement in designated establishments were remembered by almost a third of the applicants. Nine of the men who had been placed in voluntary establishments spoke about family members seeking the assistance of the Church in having them placed in care. In a few cases, this was an outcome of a family's wish to conceal the birth of a child born out of wedlock; in others it reflected an unmarried mother's struggle to maintain her child in the absence of family and other support. Some placements were arranged by Church authorities because of concern for the welfare and mental health of the mother or both parents. Five of the male applicants knew that there had been an intervention by two or more authorities that led to their being placed in designated establishments. For example, one man said that the local clergyman had taken him and his foster brother to an establishment where they were visited every three months by a welfare officer. Another man spoke of the police and welfare services intervening and, with the assistance of the Church, arranging for him to be placed in an establishment. One applicant was in a state establishment with his mother and remained there for some years before being fostered.

13 The circumstances relating to the referral of the female applicants in this period mirrored those of the males, although a higher proportion of them were referred by family members with the involvement of the Church. Two of them were placed in care by the order of a court. A summary of the referral sources, where known, is given below.

Referral Source/Agency	Male	Female
Welfare Authorities	4	1
Clergy/Religious Orders	6	3
Courts	-	1
Police and Welfare	3	-
Family	3	2
Family and Church	-	2
Probation/Education Board	-	1
Not known	31	15

14 Earlier it was noted that three of the men had been in two or more establishments. One applicant as he grew older transferred from a voluntary establishment that catered for children up to eleven years of age to another that accommodated older children. Another applicant transferred from a voluntary establishment to a juvenile justice establishment and the third applicant moved from a state establishment to a juvenile justice establishment into a voluntary establishment. In the latter case the initial placement had been a temporary measure whilst decisions were taken about longer term placement options.

Reasons for Admission to Care

Males: Voluntary Sector

15 Many of the male applicants had been born to unmarried mothers who found it very difficult to raise their children because, as applicants told the Forum, of lack of financial and family support and negative societal attitudes. Most of these applicants had very little information about their birth mother or maternal family, despite some saying they had searched exhaustively for it.

16 Several of the five male applicants whose parents had died when they were children said there was no one within the family network who was able or willing to care for them. One applicant, who was part of a large sibling group, said that his mother had died in childbirth, his father was away in the Army and he and his siblings went to live with their grandmother. Their grandmother was unable to cope and the children were placed in several designated establishments. One applicant said his parents died within six months of each other and there was no one able to care for him. Two male applicants were placed in designated establishments as their foster mothers had died. The reasons given for admission are summarised in the following table.

Reasons for Admission
Parents Unable to Cope	24
Abandonment	8
Court Order	-
Parents Deceased	5
Unknown	4
Total	41

Males: State Sector

17 Male applicants in state establishments were placed there for reasons similar to those of their contemporaries in the voluntary establishments. Two male applicants referred to their parents being unable to cope, with one commenting that his mother was experiencing mental health difficulties. Two other applicants said that their parents were deceased. One of these applicants was in his placement in a designated establishment for a very short period of time as it was planned that he would move to a long-term foster placement. Two male applicants chose not to comment on or did not know the reasons for their admittance into residential care.

Reasons for Admission
Parents Unable to Cope	2
Abandonment	-
Court Order	-
Parents Deceased	2
Unknown	2
Total	6

Males: Juvenile Justice Provision

18 One of two applicants had been cared for initially in a state establishment and was moved from there to a juvenile justice establishment. Subsequently he was transferred to a voluntary establishment from which, eventually, he was discharged from care. The other had been placed initially in a voluntary establishment and, as a result of absconding, was transferred to a juvenile justice establishment from which he was discharged from care.

Females: Voluntary Sector

19 Female applicants who were in voluntary establishments during Period 1 gave reasons similar to those of the male applicants for having been placed in those establishments. Most of them said their parents were unable to cope and this resulted in their reception into care. The table that follows lists the reasons given for admission.

Reasons for Admission
Parents Unable to Cope	13
Abandonment	8
Court Order	2
Unknown	1
Total	24

20 Eight female applicants, who told the Forum that they had been abandoned, referred to being born to unmarried mothers. Some of the female applicants commented that they had very little information about their birth mothers or maternal families with some speaking of their sadness and frustration that having tried as adults to get information, they had not been successful.

21 Three female applicants said their mothers had died and there were no others in their family networks willing or able to care for them. Three female applicants said that their mothers had been unwell, including one whose mother had a physical disability and another whose mother suffered from mental and emotional ill-health.

22 One applicant said she was removed from her family because of homelessness; her parents could not afford to pay the rent and the family "were literally thrown out into the street." One applicant said that she thought she was taken into care as her parents had an alcohol addiction and the children in the family were being neglected. Two female applicants said they were taken into care under a court order. One of these applicants had special needs and had not been attending school. The other recalled her mother bathing her, along with her siblings, in preparation for their removal by welfare officers from the family home. This female applicant said, with sadness, that her mother wrote her a letter years later in which she said she felt as though she had "locked her children out" and she had an enormous sense of guilt for handing them over to officials.

Females: State Sector

23 The only female applicant placed in a state establishment was admitted into care with her sibling as her mother had died and her father was unable to care for his children.

Memories of Admission: Male and Female Applicants

24 Few of the men and women in Period 1 have memories of the day of their admission to a children's home as many of them were babies or very young children when that occurred. What they now have learned about the circumstances of their admission is the outcome of access to their personal records, other records held by the designated establishments and contacts later in life with family members and family friends and neighbours. However, as noted earlier, some had been unable to gather such information and remain uninformed about their childhood circumstances.

Aspects of Care in the Residential Establishments

25 The experiences of the 47 male applicants and of the 25 female applicants, who were in designated establishments during Period 1, are set out in this section of the report under voluntary sector provision, state sector provision and juvenile justice provision categories. Applicants' accounts are described by gender within the three types of provision. Applicants' accounts of the five general care conditions of food, clothing, heat, bedding and personal care are included in this section. Where any of these experiences are described as abusive or neglectful, this information is included in the abuse/neglect section of this report.

26 The first part of this section covers the reports made by 41 male applicants who had a total of 43 placements in seven individual voluntary establishments. The second part of this section covers the experiences of 24 female applicants who had a total of 24 placements in eight voluntary establishments.

Males: Voluntary Provision

27 Approximately half of the 41 male applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments recalled their experiences of day-to-day living in children's homes. Their opinions of their care conditions are set out in the following paragraphs.

Diet

28 Twenty of the applicants commented on the food they had been given. The consensus was that the food was adequate or poor and some of them remember being hungry all the time. Types of food mentioned included porridge:

> "in a bowl with salt poured into a hole in the middle of the serving, bread and dripping for breakfast," and "very fat meat for lunch."

One applicant said that he "was not fed well, just scraps; I thought jam was a luxury. We got an apple and orange at Christmas." On the other hand, two applicants spoke appreciatively of the food served. Another said

> "Times were hard during the war and the staff did their best for the children" and the other said he "was grateful for the care after the neglect at home."

Diet	Voluntary
Male
Good	-
Adequate	12
Poor	8
Very Poor	-
Not Disclosed/No Memory	21
Total	41

Clothing

29 Twenty-one male applicants made reference to the clothing they were given in voluntary establishments. For the most part they were not critical of the clothes provided. One applicant spoke about being given ill-fitting clothes and said that "the underpants were often too small; when I got a pair that fitted it was bliss." Another reflecting back on the clothes provided said that as soon as he was discharged he got a new suit made. He felt he was shaking off the old and putting on the new.

Clothing	Voluntary
Male
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	10
Poor	9
Very Poor	2
Not Disclosed/No Memory	20
Total	41

Personal care

30 Male applicants gave little detail about their personal care. The general view was that the personal care provided was adequate or poor. Some described shared baths and shared bathwater with Jeyes Fluid in the water causing discomfort to their skin. They objected to the fact that by the time they got to the bath, the water was dirty. Others commented on the lack of privacy at bath time and having to stand, undressed, in a line waiting for a bath. One of the men recalled having his hair cut when he was four; he told how he was held down in a chair and because he did not know what was going to happen, he struggled against those holding him down and received a cut from the scissors as a consequence. The male applicants' opinions of their personal care is summarised in the following table.

Personal Care	Voluntary
Male
Good	-
Adequate	11
Poor	10
Very Poor	2
Not Disclosed/No Memory	18
Total	41

Bedding

31 None of the male applicants made detailed comments about the beds or bedding in their children's homes. Generally, those who made any reference to bedding were at least satisfied with the comfort and warmth of their beds and spoke more about the dormitory, bathroom and toilet arrangements and supervision during the night. Some referred to older boys being in charge and supervising the dormitories; others spoke of a nun having sleeping accommodation in an adjoining room or "cell" with a curtained window through which she could monitor the children when they were in bed.

Bedding	Voluntary
Male
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	13
Poor	4
Very Poor	-
Not Disclosed/No Memory	24
Total	41

Heating

32 In summary, and apart from two references to good heating, most of the sixteen men who commented on this aspect of their care thought the heating was adequate or poor; "of its time" was a view shared by a few. Their opinions of this aspect of their care are set out in the following table.

Heating	Voluntary
Male
Very Good	-
Good	2
Adequate	9
Poor	3
Very Poor	2
Not Disclosed/No Memory	25
Total	41

Work in the Voluntary Establishments

33 The men's memories of work in their voluntary establishments were consistent with those of the women who came forward. They had a range of daily duties including bed-making and helping clear tables after meals. Twenty-four of them (more than half) referred to tasks that they regarded as work that had to be done on a regular, usually weekly, basis. For most of them, these tasks included scrubbing and applying polish to, and buffing, floors. One man said that he and his friends had to polish wooden doors, wainscoting in the corridors and wooden staircases. He said they also had to clean and polish floors in the chapel, the dining rooms, the study halls, the kitchen and the lavatories. Some said much of the floor work had to be done on their hands and knees and others referred to buffing the floors with cloths tied to their feet. It was reported that, in one establishment, groups of boys linked arms and shuffled down long corridors, polishing as they progressed. Several referred to a chant they said when polishing floors

"River and back, river and back; I'll put the broom across your back"

a chant that related to the nearby river and the punishment that could be meted out if the pace of work slackened. It was reported that this cleaning work was carried out on Saturdays for the most part, all year round. A few referred to additional cleaning having to be done, usually linked to expected special visitors and events.

34 Some of the men said that, in season, they had been given work to do on neighbouring farms. For example, some had potato-picking duties; others had been asked to help cut field grass for hay-making using scythes. They said they had to work "from morning to night" and received "nothing in return."

Religious Practice

35 Religious practice was an integral part of the daily routine for those applicants in Period 1 who had been cared for in voluntary, church-run, establishments. From what 30 of the male applicants related, it was evident that the day and the average week were punctuated and infused with religious observance and teaching that included:

- prayers each morning before breakfast and in the evening
- prayers before and after lessons in school
- religious education at school

- mass at regular intervals, for some on a daily basis
- confession.

36 A few of the men spoke with fondness of having been selected to serve as altar boys and of the affirmation they took from this. Others spoke about the enjoyment they experienced from singing in the church. Several men said they were able to recite the Benediction in Latin as the boys learnt this in parrot fashion – even though, as one man said, they did not always know what it meant. This man was also in the choir and spoke with real warmth about the nun who trained and conducted the choir; other male applicants spoke equally appreciatively of the same member of staff.

37 Generally, those men who recalled aspects of religious practice did not complain about it. Eleven of the applicants in Period 1 said that they had no memories of religious practice in their establishments. That group included a number of those who had been sent to Australia as young children.

Play and Recreation

38 When talking about their childhoods in care, two thirds of the applicants had no memory of any play-time or recreation. Some had no recollection because they were so young when they left their children's homes, for example to return to family or foster care, or, in other cases to travel to Australia. Others said emphatically there was no playtime or recreation.

39 The average day, as reported by a number of the applicants, was filled with religious practice, domestic duties and schooling. Many of them talked about the absence of toys and the lack of books. One said that in his establishment there were some books but the children were not allowed to read them. Several applicants referred to the extent to which they had to remain quiet and still when children of their age would have been playing indoors and out.

40 Five of the men remembered playing outside in big fields. They said they played football and other games and often had no proper footwear; if boots were too big they "had to stuff them with straw to make them stay on." Some of these men also enjoyed climbing trees in the grounds of the establishment and two spoke of an outside playground where they could run and play. Others who were in designated establishments in the latter part of Period 1 mentioned watching TV from 5.00pm to 6.00pm each night of the week. One man said that he had acted in a play and that was a good memory; he also sang in the choir and the choir took part in the Belfast Feis. Another said that he was taught Irish dancing and was a member of the band where he learned to play the double bass. There was mention of a wind-up gramophone, and someone who had been in one of the voluntary establishments in the later part of this period talked about films being shown on Thursdays. Two of the men recalled days out to Millisle and eating ice cream at the beach.

Medical Care

41 Less than half of the male applicants recalled having received medical care during their placement in designated establishments. A summary of the nature of the medical care cited is shown in the following table.

Medical Attention	Voluntary Male
Infirmary	1
Medical Inspection	1
Immunisation	2
GP	1
Designated Medical Person	2
Dentist	5
Hospital	2
Nurse	5

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System

42 Twenty-one of the men who had been in voluntary establishments in Period 1 were sent to Australia. Their memories of leaving care in Northern Ireland focused on what they remember of being told about going to Australia and of some aspects of the process and preparation, including being taken out to get new clothes for the journey and the new country.

43 The twenty male applicants who, as children, had been discharged from care in Northern Ireland summarised their experiences as follows:

- Three were transferred to foster care.
- Five were placed with farming families. Most of them had been put to work on the farm, generally for very long hours every day of the week including Sunday. One said "I worked from 6.00am to 10.00pm daily in return for basic board and lodging. I had no opportunity to make friends and develop socially." Another described a similar routine; he had been sent to a farmer when he was fourteen. He said the work was heavy but "at least the farmer's son was working alongside me." The farmer's son left and the applicant was left to do the work of two people. After some time, the farmer took him back to the establishment and told the staff he was not working hard enough.

- Three returned to their families.
- Two were accommodated locally, in one case in a hostel and in the other in digs, and given jobs in Belfast, one as a van boy, the other in a furniture factory.
- Two were given work in establishments run by the same religious order as that in charge of their former establishments.
- The other five applicants did not provide information about their experiences of discharge from care.

Post-Care Support

44 Six of the male applicants who had been in voluntary establishments and who left care in Northern Ireland, told the Forum that jobs and lodgings had been arranged for them. Two of those men recalled that they were also given new clothes on discharge. One of the men was given a job in maintenance in another children's establishment provided by the same religious order in the Republic of Ireland.

Females: Voluntary Provision

45 Just over half of the 24 female applicants who had been in voluntary establishments in this period had little or no detailed memory of the accommodation and aspects of the care they had experienced; as one said

"I remember experiences and incidents more than the everyday things."

Some of those who had no recollection of food, clothing, sleeping accommodation and so forth, had been sent as child migrants to Australia from six of the voluntary establishments when they were as young as five. Their recollections, as with those of their male counterparts, relate more to the experience of being chosen to go to Australia and the journey and their care in that country.

Diet

46 Fourteen of the female applicants commented on the food they had been given. The consensus was that the food was adequate or poor and some of them remember being hungry and, in season, stealing apples from a neighbouring orchard to fend off their hunger.

The following table summarises their views.

Diet	Voluntary Female
Good	-
Adequate	9
Poor	5
Very Poor	-
Not Disclosed/No Memory	10
Total	24

Clothing

47 Thirteen of the female applicants made specific reference to their clothing when in establishments suggesting that it was basic; some garments were second or third hand and some, such as pinafores and underwear, were made on the premises. School uniform was mentioned by one woman who said that it was uncomfortable because the cloth used – serge – was very stiff. Their views are summarised below.

Clothing	Voluntary Female
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	8
Poor	4
Very Poor	1
Not Disclosed/No Memory	11
Total	24

Personal Care

48 Only a few female applicants spoke of the personal care in their establishment. Some applicants described baths with Jeyes fluid causing discomfort to their skin, some commented on the lack of toothpaste and others on the absence of toiletries unless their families brought some in for them. As one woman pointed out, that arrangement meant that some children never had basic toiletries while others did, thus adding another form of differentiation between the children. Their opinions about their personal care are summarised in the following table.

Personal Care	Voluntary Female
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	6
Poor	4
Very Poor	4
Not Disclosed/No Memory	10
Total	24

Bedding

49 Just over half of the female applicants made comments about the bedding. Generally they were at least satisfied with the comfort and warmth of their beds. The following table represents the range of their views.

Bedding	Voluntary Female
Very Good	-
Good	1
Adequate	8
Poor	2
Very Poor	2
Not Disclosed/No Memory	11
Total	24

Heating

50 Ten of the female applicants commented on the heating in their establishment. Their opinions were favourable, in the main, with just two recalling being very cold. Their opinions are summarised in the following table.

Heating	Voluntary Female
Very Good	-
Good	1
Adequate	7
Poor	-
Very Poor	2
Not Disclosed/No Memory	14
Total	24

In summary, and apart from one reference to good heating and one reference to good bedding, most of the 24 female applicants who had been living in voluntary establishments, and who commented on this aspect of their care, thought their clothing, food, personal care and bedding were adequate.

Work in the Voluntary Establishments

51 The female applicants' memories of work in their establishments were similar to those of the men. In describing their daily routine in care, eleven of the 24 women spoke, often with strong feeling, about the work they were given on a regular basis – that is, in addition to the duties of bed-making, tidying their dormitories, clearing tables after meals and other tasks that were part of the daily routine of their time in residential establishments. The commonest form of work the applicants described was cleaning and polishing floors. Some referred to this as work that had to be done on Saturdays and described activities such as scrubbing floors, applying polish to wooden floors and buffing the floors to bring up a shine, as one said "until you could see your face in it." They said they were first given this work when they were seven or eight years old and they were required to do it for the duration of their placements. The work included responsibility for cleaning floors in long corridors, floors in accommodation used by staff and, for some, floors in the adjacent church.

52 Two female applicants said that when they were older they were given duties in the laundry. One of them added that she didn't mind this as "you were given bread and jam as you went along." Another female applicant said that, as a child in care, she had to prepare the bodies of the dead for burial. This involved helping to wash and dress the deceased, and putting pennies on their eye-lids. She had to do this in the "dead house" – a separate building nearby. The dead were those who had lived and had been cared for in a neighbouring residential care centre for older people.

Religious Practice

53 Religious practice was an integral part of the daily routine for both male and female applicants in Period 1 who had been cared for in voluntary, roman catholic, establishments. A third of the female applicants referred to daily and weekly religious observance and teaching that, as for the men, included:

- prayers each morning before breakfast and in the evening
- prayers before and after lessons in school
- religious education at school
- mass at regular intervals (for some, on a daily basis)
- confession.

Generally, those female applicants who referred to aspects of religious practice did not complain about it although one woman spoke with feeling about the discomfort in her knees after long periods of prayer, especially in Church on Sundays.

Play and Recreation

54 When talking about their experiences in establishments, two-thirds of the female applicants had no memory of any play-time or recreation. Some had no recall because they were so young when they left their establishments. Others said emphatically there was no playtime or recreation; one woman spoke of:

> "dark rooms and dark people with no encouragement for children to be themselves."

55 The average day, as reported by a number of the female applicants, was filled with religious practice, domestic duties and schooling. Many of them said they had no toys to play with; others commented on the absence of books. Several referred to the extent to which they had to remain quiet and still when children of their age would have been playing.

56 A female applicant spoke about having piano lessons and going to Irish dancing; another referred to one hour of play a day and a third said that girls of different ages played in different places in the establishment. Five applicants, as was the case with three of the male applicants, reminisced about holidays in Glenariff, Co Antrim, walks on the beach and swimming in the sea. Another of the female applicants said that, in the establishment in which she was placed, there were four swings for hundreds of girls and she never got to sit on any of them.

Medical Care

57 Seventeen of the 24 female applicants told the Forum that they had received medical care on one or more occasions during their placement in designated establishments. Four referred to attendance of their doctor; others said they were cared for in their establishment's infirmary and several spoke of "medical inspections". Three of them referred to having received dental treatment. The following table summarises the information they gave to the Forum.

Medical Care	Voluntary Female
Infirmary	3
Medical Inspection	3
Immunisation	1
GP	4
Designated Medical Person	1
Dentist	3
Hospital	-
Nurse	2

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System

58 Female applicants spoke readily about their experiences of being discharged from care. Their memories of leaving and "moving on" were often sharply defined and recounted with considerable emotion. Eleven of the female applicants in this period left voluntary establishments to go to Australia under the child migrant scheme. They talked about the selection process, the mixed feelings of excitement and uncertainty about what they would see in the new country and the sense of sadness at leaving friends and, in some cases, siblings.

59 Four of the other female applicants said they were returned to their mothers when discharged from their establishments. In one case, the applicant and her siblings had been collected from a voluntary establishment by their mother. When she got home, she was sent out to work to earn her keep. In the family home, she had to sleep in a bed with six children, the children of the man with whom her mother was living. Another female applicant talked about her father coming to collect her and taking her, with an older sibling, to England where they were expected to work in a fruit and vegetable shop. She said she was very unhappy there as she did not know her father as a "Dad" and had no relationship with him.

60 Two other female applicants had been taken to work, in one case in a hospital and in the other in a private nursing home for older people, both establishments under the management of the same religious order that was responsible for the establishment in which they had been resident. Two female applicants had been discharged into foster care; in one case the applicant left a voluntary establishment and was placed with three of her siblings in the same foster home.

Post-Care Support

61 Most of the female applicants who had been discharged from care when they became fourteen years old, or during the year following their fourteenth birthday, made no reference to post-care support and assistance being provided. One of them told the Forum:

> "I got my own job, left the next day and no-one ever enquired if I was alright."

That said, from what some described in their accounts of where they went and what they did after leaving, it was apparent that some of the voluntary establishments made arrangements to place "leavers" in work and in hostels or "digs".

62 A female applicant commented on leaving care as follows:

> "I was taken without any preparation to work in a private home for the elderly that was also managed by the religious order that had been responsible for my care."

Five other female applicants spoke of being returned to family members on discharge.

Males: State Provision

63 The six male applicants who had been placed in state establishments in this period said little about the nature and adequacy of their care. Their primary concern was to talk about abusive experiences and those are included in Chapter 4 of this report. Those of them who commented on their care had generally favourable memories of their care with one applicant saying that his establishment "was a great place for children."

Diet, Clothing, Personal Care, Bedding and Heating

64 Four of the six male applicants commented on the food they had been given in their establishments, with two considering the food to be adequate in quantity and quality and two expressing dissatisfaction. The others made no comment. Three of the applicants recalled that their clothing and personal care were adequate. Three did not talk about those aspects of their care. Two of the applicants referred to their bedding as adequate - "comfortable" as one described it. None of the other four made any reference to bedding. Three of the six applicants told the Forum that the heating in their children's homes was adequate. The other three did not comment on heating.

Other aspects of Care: Work, Religious Practices, Play and Recreation, and Medical Attention

65 None of the male applicants who had been cared for in a state establishment commented on work as part of their daily routine, nor did they refer to religious practices or play and recreation. Two of the applicants recalled having medical attention, one in the form of a medical inspection and the other a hospital admission. They made no further comment about either experience.

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System and Aftercare

66 None of the six male applicants who had been in a state establishment made reference to experiences of discharge or aftercare.

Females: State Provision

67 The one female applicant who had been in state care as a child indicated that, in general, she was well-cared for. She did not talk about specific aspects of her care.

Males: Juvenile Justice Provision

68 Neither of the two male applicants who had a placement in a juvenile justice establishment commented on the standard of their care.

Aftercare

69 One of the two male applicants who had been in a juvenile justice placement spoke appreciatively of the arrangements made by the establishment when he was discharged. Lodgings were organised and he received assistance with the weekly payments. In addition, a job was arranged for him. He said that:

> "(the establishment) had been helpful to him and got him started in employment."

All Establishments: Inspection, Positive Experiences and Education

70 The following section, arranged by establishment type, includes the recollections of applicants in Period 1 regarding inspections, the response of the establishments to inspection, applicants' positive experiences and education. As will be seen in subsequent paragraphs, there were some of these aspects of care experiences that only a few of the applicants could recall or chose to speak about.

Memory of Inspection and Visits from Outside Organisations and Agencies

Males: Voluntary Provision

71 Only six of the 41 male applicants remembered anything that might have been part of an inspection process. Some applicants referred to visitors arriving occasionally but said that the children were not informed in advance about their arrival or given details about their role, adding that sometimes they found out later who the visitors had been. More often than not, they said, they had been clergymen or important lay people.

Action in Voluntary Establishments in Response to Inspection

72 Only three of the 41 male applicants were able to recall action taken by the care staff in anticipation of, and during, inspections. One of them said that the children were warned in advance of the inspectors' visits and were told how to respond to any questions. The others remembered that the premises were cleaned specially for the occasion. They pointed out that staff members were always present during the inspectors' visits and none of them had any memory of being spoken to by any of the visitors. One remembered that some children were hidden in another part of the premises during the inspection.

Females: Voluntary Provision

73 Five female applicants said they remembered people and circumstances that might have been part of an inspection, such as the premises being cleaned very thoroughly and the children being told to keep quiet and only to speak if spoken to by a visitor. They said no one told them anything about the visitors who appeared from time to time, adding that, occasionally, they found out afterwards who the visitors had been.

Action in Voluntary Establishments in Response to Inspection

74 Two female applicants were able to recall action taken by the care staff in anticipation of, and during, inspections. Both said that they were given better clothes to wear and also reported that the premises were cleaned specially for the visitors coming.

75 Generally the information given about their care by most of the applicants suggested that they were not aware of any formal or even informal monitoring and assessment of the provision or their general progress. A few remembered being prepared to read, recite and sing for visitors but they did not know why the visitors had come to their establishments.

Males and Females: State and Juvenile Justice Establishments

76 None of the six male applicants in state establishments could recall any activity in their children's homes that might have been part of a monitoring or inspection visit. Consequently they were unable to recall any action taken by care staff or others that might have been a response to inspection findings. The sole female applicant who was resident in a state establishment made no reference to monitoring or inspection. Neither of the men who had placements in juvenile justice establishments referred to any memories of inspection or monitoring.

Positive Experiences

Males: Voluntary Establishments

77 Nineteen of the 41 male applicants who had been in voluntary establishments told the Forum about memories of positive experiences and these fall into three broad categories:

- people who were kind to them or bonded well with them;
- special events and trips away; and
- making good friends.

The other 22 applicants made no mention of positive experiences. As noted elsewhere in this report, some of them had left their establishments to go to Australia and said they were too young to remember their care in Northern Ireland.

78 The positive memories recounted included the quotations below.

> "I had a real bond with one of the care staff; she taught me to play the violin and encouraged me to sing, telling me that I had a wonderful voice."
>
> "I was very attached to…(a member of the care staff). She was very good to me and on my Confirmation I was given her name. She died and I attended her funeral as an 11 year old. This still remains very painful for me."
>
> "I was very attached to…(a member of the care staff) who was a kind, motherly figure and showed me real love and affection."
>
> "(a member of the staff) was very kind and caring. She taught me Irish, and became my mentor helping me to get a scholarship to attend grammar school."
>
> "(a member of the staff) was a 'shining light' for me. I was very fond of her and she cared for me very well. I sang in her choir and she gave me violin lessons."

79 Several applicants spoke very fondly of the families who took them out from time to time. One male applicant spoke of the kindness of a family from North Belfast. He described a big family of very modest means who did not hesitate to take him out, along with his sister, as often as allowed, possibly three or four times a year. Another spoke of his sponsors for Holy Communion as being "great people" and their house being "like heaven." They took him to the pictures and gave him sweets before he "had to go back to hell."

80 The table that follows presents a summary of the types of positive experiences mentioned by nineteen applicants. Some mentioned more than one type, hence the total exceeds the number of applicants.

Positive Experiences	State Male
Helpful staff	6
Other helpful people, including friends	5
Fondly remembered events and outings	14
None	2
None mentioned	14
Total	41

Females: Voluntary Establishments

81 Ten of the 24 female applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments made no mention of positive experiences and, of that number, five who had been sent to Australia as young children said that they had no memory of that period of their care. Two of the others asserted that they had no positive experiences at any stage. For the remaining twelve women, the most commonly mentioned good memories were of people, usually care staff, who had been kind to them and also of events, especially holidays and Christmas parties. Comments made included the quotations below:

> "...the local priest was kind and related well to us; he stood up for us and we felt safe around him; the care staff did not like him."
>
> "....(a member of the care staff) was nice."
>
> "...two other nuns were kind, brilliant. I would not class them (ie the staff) all the same."
>
> "I enjoyed trips to Donegal and being able to sleep in a hay barn."
>
> "I remember being taken to the pantomime and being given a bag of sweets as I went in."
>
> "Local people were kind and brought gifts to the home. I really liked the decorations at Christmas."

"Two lay staff were good to us; one would leave turnip skins for us to eat and the person taking out the slop food from the convent would let us raid the bucket."

"I enjoyed getting sweets from the Orangemen when they paraded past the home."

"I appreciated the care after neglect at home when my father was in hospital and circumstances in the family were poor."

"I made such good friends there."

82 The table that follows presents a summary of the positive experiences mentioned by female applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments. Some mentioned more than one source of positive experience hence the total exceeds the number of applicants.

Positive Experiences	Voluntary Female
Helpful staff	3
Other helpful people, including friends	4
Fondly remembered events	7
None	3
None mentioned	10
Total	27

Males and Females: State Establishments

83 Four of the six male applicants who had been in state establishments did not refer to positive experiences. Of the other two, one said he was in a great place for children. The other talked about having a good ally in the workhouse. This was a man with a club foot; a rat-catcher who had a blackthorn stick and who protected him. He was also a scholarly man, who told him when it was safe to go out, in other words, when there were no predatory men in sight.

The one female applicant who had been in state care in this period commented that:

"the children's home was a good place; I had no concerns about the staff or the care provided."

Males: Juvenile Justice Establishments

84 The two male applicants who had been placed in juvenile justice establishments spoke briefly but positively about aspects of their care, one saying that the person in charge was kindly and looked out for him. The other reflected that it was better than the voluntary children's home he had been in previously and he enjoyed the trips to the seaside.

Education

85 The majority of the applicants from this period, from all types of establishment, had attended schools, some on the same site as their establishments and some in the neighbouring community. These schools catered for children in the five to fourteen age range, the normal age range in schools at that time. Re-organisation of education in the later 1940s changed provision to primary schools catering for five to eleven year olds and secondary schools catering for eleven to fifteen year olds. Some applicants who were in designated establishments in the latter years of Period 1 attended secondary school, having transferred from primary school at eleven years of age.

Males: Voluntary Provision

86 Most of the 41 male applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments in Period 1 had received their schooling on-site, in accommodation set aside for teaching. Others from the voluntary sector had attended an adjacent school provided by the local parish or by the same religious orders that managed their establishments. In both cases, there were members of staff whom they knew both as teachers and as staff/adults in their establishments. That, for some applicants, was an unhappy arrangement as they saw "no hiding place" from some staff who were particularly threatening or harsh to them. Generally the applicants did not comment on the standards or quality of their education.

Females: Voluntary Provision

87 Fourteen of the 24 female applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments made no comments on their experience in school. It bears repeating that many of them had left care in Northern Ireland before they were six years old and so had limited, if any, experience of formal education.

88 The ten who remembered something of their education had little to say that was positive. Generally their remarks were negative and included comments such as:

> "The teacher was very strict, she beat us regularly and I was always in trouble. Two lay people came in and they were very nice to us but we had very little education. One of the lay teachers asked me to help with her babies' class which I liked but I left school with no skills."

89 One female applicant criticised the standard of education saying that she had been doing well at school before admission to the establishment but once she was placed in the on-site school she made very little further progress. Another said that she did not attend school but was made to do cleaning instead and to this day is unable to read and write. A third woman said that she was sent to work in the on-site laundry and so, effectively, her education ended when she was thirteen. She said that, as a result, she was deprived of access to books and reading material. An applicant told the Forum that she was assigned to a "slow learners" class where she was neither taught nor learned anything. Another spoke of her experiences attending an off-site school where she said children from the children's home were teased and looked down on by others.

90 Fifteen of the female applicants said that they left school without formal qualifications. One woman completed her education at school in England. When she left Northern Ireland she could not tell the time or count and was barely able to write. She said that in her new school in England she excelled in religion.

Males: State Provision

91 The six male applicants who had been in state establishments attended schools in the local community. They made no comments on the adequacy of the education they received.

Females: State Provision

92 The one female applicant who was placed in a state establishment believes that she lost out as her education was inadequate. She said she was "good with her hands" but that was never recognised and built upon.

Males: Juvenile Justice Provision

93 Both male applicants received education on site during their placements in a juvenile justice establishment. They made no comments on the standards or quality of their education.

Conclusion

94 From the above, it is evident that for many of the applicants the time they spent in care was the most significant part of their childhood years. They knew no other home and, over time, the establishment in which they had been placed became their home. The experiences they were to have in care are now the substance of their childhood memories and, as a number of them explained, they can see both good and bad in what they recall. For them, as they expressed it so clearly, the challenge is living with what they should not have experienced, in what was meant to be a caring and protective environment.

Period 2: 1956 - 1975

Introduction

95 The Forum heard from 125 males and from 80 females who were in designated establishments in the period 1956 to 1975. The oldest male applicant who met with the Forum was born in 1941 and the youngest was born in 1968. The oldest female applicant who met with the Forum was born in 1944 and the youngest was born in 1972. Twenty-four of the applicants who were in designated establishments in this period were sent to Australia through the child migrant scheme. Only their experiences in care in Northern Ireland are included in this report.

Placements for Male Applicants in the Care System

96 The 125 males, who spoke to the Forum, were placed in 35 establishments in Northern Ireland. Of those 35 establishments, twelve were in the voluntary sector, sixteen were in the state sector and seven were categorised as juvenile justice provision. In total these applicants had 236 placements.

97 Some applicants were placed in more than one establishment and/or in more than one type of establishment during their time in care, for example they were initially in the voluntary sector and later in state or juvenile justice provision or they moved to another establishment within the same sector, for example, from one state establishment to another. The number of placements per applicant are set out below.

Number of male applicants	60	46	8	6	4	1
Number of placements	1	2	3	4	5	6

Fifteen of these applicants had had previous placements in the Republic of Ireland. The family of the applicant who had had six placements had led a nomadic lifestyle and he had been placed in children's residential establishments in England, Scotland, the Republic of Ireland and, finally, Northern Ireland.

Placements for Female Applicants in the Care System

98 Eighty females who spoke to the Forum were placed in 33 separate establishments in Northern Ireland during this period. Of those 33 establishments, 22 were in the voluntary sector, nine were in the state sector and two were categorised as juvenile justice provision. The female applicants had a total of 125 placements during their time in the care system.

99 Some applicants were placed in more than one establishment and/or in more than one category of establishment during their time in care, for example, they were initially in the voluntary care sector and later in state or juvenile justice provision or they moved between establishments within the same sector, for example, from one state establishment to another. The number and types of placements per applicant are set out below.

Number of female applicants	47	24	6	3
Number of placements	1	2	3	4

Five applicants had previous placements in the Republic of Ireland.

Applicants in Each Type of Provision

100 The following table shows the number of male and female applicants placed in each type of provision. Please note that some male and some female applicants transferred between the various sectors of care provision.

Gender	Voluntary	State	Juvenile Justice
Male	82	20	27
Female	74	10	7
Total	156	30	34

Circumstances of Admission into the Care System

101 Most applicants who met the Forum had little or no written information about the circumstances of their admission to care. Some applicants, because of their age when received or removed into care, were fully aware of the circumstances that led to their admission. Other applicants were reliant on information gleaned from parents, siblings or other relatives or, in a small number of cases, from staff at the establishment they had attended. The information presented below comes directly from the applicants and not from official records for, in the majority of cases, most applicants had not received copies of their records at the time they were seen by the Forum. The following paragraphs cover the age range and length of time applicants spent in the care system in Northern Ireland. It does not cover periods spent in care in the Republic of Ireland, England or Scotland or in Australia.

Age at Entry to the Care System

102 As shown by the table below, the majority of male applicants were taken into care aged between six and fourteen years old while the majority of female applicants were admitted to care when aged between two and ten years old.

Age at first placement	Male	Female	Total
1 year or under	22	12	34
2-5 years old	29	25	54
6-10 years old	36	22	58
11-14 years old	32	11	43
15-17 years old	6	10	16
Total	125	80	205

Duration of Placement in the Care System

103 The following table shows that the largest proportion, 41 per cent, of the 205 applicants who came to the Forum, spent between two and five years in the care system in Northern Ireland.

Years in care	Male	Female	Total
< 1 year	23	14	37
2-5 years	55	29	84
6-10 years	22	15	37
11-14 years	15	17	32
15-17 years	10	5	15
Total	125	80	205

Age at Discharge from the Care System

104 The majority of male applicants were discharged from the care system when they were in the fourteen to sixteen age range, while the age on discharge for females was more even widely distributed.

Age discharged	Male	Female	Total
<10	17	20	37
10-13	24	17	41
14-16	69	19	88
17+	15	24	39
Total	125	80	205

Reasons for Admission

105 From the information provided by applicants it was apparent that the main reasons for the admission of the male and female applicants to the care system were as follows:

Reason for Admission	Male	Female	Total
Parents unable to cope	30	28	58
Abandonment	27	15	42
Court Orders	30	12	42
Parents deceased	3	6	9
Other reasons	7	8	15
No information	26	10	36
Health	2	1	3
Total	125	80	205

The types of court orders mentioned by applicants or referred to in papers they brought with them to their meeting with the Forum included place of safety orders, committal orders – fit persons, orders for detention and training school orders.

106 The main reason given for admission to care for both males and females was that their parents were unable to cope. Within that group, the reasons that led to the admission of children to the care system were often a combination of circumstances. These included poverty, single parent households (mostly single mothers), overcrowding in very poor quality and inadequate accommodation, unemployment, domestic violence, alcohol abuse, mental and physical disabilities, desertion by one parent, imprisonment of one parent, death of one or both parents and homelessness either through inability to pay the rent or having to vacate the family home because of sectarianism. Children who were abandoned to the care system were, in the main, born outside marriage and remained in establishments for most of their childhood with few opportunities for fostering or adoption. In some instances it appears permission to place the children in another family was forbidden by their mothers. Many applicants had no knowledge of the circumstances of their fathers.

107 A small number of children who were abandoned were the children of mixed faith relationships and when problems emerged there was little or no support from extended family or from either community. One applicant said "we belonged nowhere."

108 Other reasons for admission to care included sexual or physical abuse by parent(s), serious neglect, absconding from unsafe care, own homelessness in teenage years, non-attendance at school, disability following accidents and unplanned pregnancy in teenage years.

Memories of Admission

Male Applicants

109 Thirty-seven male applicants had no memory of their admission into the care system; many of those had been very young at the time. The remaining 88 male applicants had some recall. Within the group of male applicants in this period a significant number were placed in a large residential establishment which had a remit to accommodate children of primary school age. Most of them transferred to another large establishment, the remit of which was to accommodate boys aged approximately eleven years of age and upwards.

110 A large number of the applicants who had been placed in care for a significant period of time talked of how they had witnessed older residents moving at age eleven or thereabouts to their new placement. Some applicants commented that although they knew that they were going to move, there was no explanation about what the process entailed or where they were going. The boys moving to their next placement would often be part of a peer group and were transported by minibus by their new "carers" to their subsequent placement. One applicant remembered that he was terrified of leaving as he had been told by staff:

> "You thought it was bad here…wait until you get to…They are a lot worse. You had it easy here."

Some applicants said they had been looking forward to their next placement as they were hopeful that it would be an improvement on what they had experienced. Some recalled feeling excited as they would be able to have contact and reconnect with their sibling(s).

111 A concern noted by applicants was that their first placement, where many applicants had spent a large part of their childhood, was staffed predominantly by females and they had very limited contact with adult males. In their new placement, the staff group was very much male-dominated and this was described by some as unfamiliar and, initially, very unsettling.

Some comments from male applicants illustrate their recall about their care admission.

> "On admission we were given rosary beads and told if we lost them we would get a hiding. We were terrified of losing them."
>
> "I remember when I was four or five struggling in the arms of staff to get down to follow my mother who was leaving me."
>
> "I was taken from court, I was asked on admission if I was related to… (sibling) and told if I was anything like him I was in for a rough time."
>
> "I've no clear memory of the actual admission but I remember the first night and hearing my younger brother crying. We were all made to sleep with blankets over our heads."
>
> "At the age of eight I was told by…(named outside agency) that I was going on holiday to a big house and not to worry as I'd have a great time. As a result of this lie, every week I lived in expectation of being collected by my parents but it never happened and I was very disappointed. That's a life-long memory."
>
> "My mother deserted the family; she took my older sister with her. My father took the remaining children to…then father walked us up the long avenue to…My heart sank. I was received by (named staff). All smiles. It didn't last."

> "My father drank heavily. One day my brother came to our school and took me to my older sister's house. A woman who was there explained that because of my dad's drinking, my mother had left the family. Dad said 'you're all orphans now.' My older brother asked me if I wanted to stay with dad or go into a home. My older brother had opted for the home and so I followed him."

Female Applicants

112 Seventeen female applicants had no memory of their actual admission because of their age at that time. Sixty-three applicants had some memory, often one of feeling confused and uncertain. No applicant described any preparation for admission to care either by their family or by professionals involved. The following comments from applicants provide an insight into their experiences.

> "I was taken to court with my brothers and sisters…I was not aware that I could be sent away for not attending at school. I was very shocked. My parents were shocked…they were good parents but with a disability. We were well supported by the community in our original home. We had to move to an area where we had no local support system."

> "My mother came from the country…we were living in a town (named), some family members had a disability, we were isolated, the GP gave mum anti-depressants, she got hooked, the priest got the nuns to take us."

> "My parents were in a mixed marriage; large family, very overcrowded wee house. Mum went to the clergy for assistance, they sent a letter to the welfare, and took us to the home; the family stayed away."

113 An applicant, one of ten children, who was removed from her family when she was fourteen, told the Forum what happened to her:

> "My dad was a street angel and house devil; I was youngest of a large family. The priest advised my mother to send me away for training."

114 Another applicant who was absconding to avoid abuse in a care situation and who was subsequently placed in a training school said "nobody asked me why I was running."

115 An applicant placed in the care system at three years old told the Forum her experience of not being told her story while in care:

> "I was told my mother died in childbirth, I accepted that…I was not told I had a brother in the same place as me…we did not know of each other. Years later I met a cousin who told me my mother was still alive (single mother). Why was I not told the truth?"

116 Some of the applicants had a clear memory of their actual admission to the establishments and one applicant described it as follows:

> "I was taken there by car. I remember big gates, a big driveway up to it. They cut my hair off; they used a razor on my neck. I was put into a bath with Jeyes Fluid in the bath water. I was given toast, tea and put to bed. I had no explanation of what was happening."

117 Some applicants spoke of the preparation on the day of their admission although they did not know what they were being prepared for. One applicant, both of whose parents were deceased, remembered the day she was taken into the establishment:

> "They (family members) took me from school, took me to the hairdressers, and then to (named home)…my nightmare began as we went up the long drive and I realised this was different."

Another applicant, again who had lost both parents, told the Forum:

> "We all got new clothes and went up to my granny's street; all the neighbours were out… they were crying…everyone was crying. I was confused. We went up the road, then my little sister was taken at once to the nursery…I was crying and told to stop."

An applicant sent when she was fifteen to a mother and baby facility told her story:

> "I was fifteen, he was seventeen. We were from very different communities…I was pregnant…neither side was happy. My mother reported him for unlawful carnal knowledge…he got sent down. I was sent away for safety from both families."

An applicant who was three when she went into care explained what happened:

> "My mum had a bad stroke when my youngest brother was born…the family took all of my brothers and sisters but for me and my sister… when mum improved the others went home…she tried to get us back… staff kept saying we were doing well and it was best to leave us."

118 Another applicant who was separated from her two brothers in the car that drove them from the courtroom explained "I lost everything that day." An applicant who was removed from a very neglectful home was pleased when she got to the establishment where she was to live for the next twelve years: "It was lovely and clean, my bed was clean and I was fed."

Referral Source/Agencies

119 Sixty of the 125 males and 31 of the 80 female applicants did not know whether or not they had been referred to the establishment where they were placed. The following table sets out what applicants understood in relation to referral agencies.

Referral Source/Agency	Male	Female
Not known	60	31
Welfare authorities	18	17
Local clergy	18	12
Courts	22	12
Police	3	3
NSPCC	4	3
Vincent de Paul Society	-	2
Total	125	80

Aspects of Care in the Residential Establishments

120 The experiences of the 125 males and of the 80 females are set out in this section of the report under voluntary sector provision, state sector provision and juvenile justice provision categories. Applicants' accounts are described by gender within the three individual sectors. Applicants' accounts of the five general care conditions of food, clothing, heat, bedding and personal care are included. Where any of these experiences are described as abusive or neglectful, this information is included in the Abuse/Neglect section of chapter 4 of this report.

Voluntary Provision

121 The first part of this section covers the reports from 82 male applicants who had a total of 120 placements in twelve individual voluntary establishments.

The second part of this section covers the experiences of 74 females who had a total of 90 placements in 20 voluntary establishments.

Males: Voluntary Provision

122 Eighty-two male applicants spoke to the Forum regarding their experiences of day-to-day living within the establishments in which they were placed. Their opinions of their care conditions are set out in the table below.

Aspects of Care	Good	Adequate	Poor	Very bad	No memory/ not disclosed	Total placements
Diet	3	37	37	7	36	120
Clothing	3	41	18	2	56	120
Heat	5	36	8	3	68	120
Bedding	5	39	7	1	68	120
Personal care	4	32	31	8	45	120

Diet

123 Some of the male applicants who described their diet as very bad referred to the quantity rather than the quality of the food. Applicants who remembered the food as very bad, spoke of the food being inedible and of feeling hungry on a regular basis. In other circumstances, applicants explained that the food, at best, was not to their liking and described being given lumpy porridge, stews and over-cooked vegetables.

124 Applicants made the following comments with regard to their diet:

"The food was basic….we had no choice."

"I had to eat porridge and fatty bully beef."

"The food was basic: cabbage, macaroni, hard baps with margarine and yesterday's doughnuts."

"I was starving all the while."

"I was hungry and ate raw potatoes out of the ground and used to try to steal food from the pantry."

"Eggs went to the staff and not us boys."

Several applicants recounted that a significant issue with food was that the older boys were able to take more than their fair share, leaving the younger boys with less to eat.

Personal Care

125 Many applicants who described personal care and hygiene practices as very poor were placed in two large establishments in the 1950s and early 1960s when showers were not available and where shared baths with liberal use of Jeyes Fluid were customary. Applicants described a lack of privacy, sharing towels or sheets that were often very wet by the time they could be used, as they were the last children in the queue. One applicant described rough handling by a local barber who attended at one establishment; he said "we were lined up like sheep."

Other Care Provision

126 Applicants did not enter into great detail about their clothing, heating or the supply of bedding in their placements. Some applicants stated that the boys wore the clothes they were given. They described hand-me-down clothing and said there were no options for them to choose from. One applicant reported that the shoes he was given were ill-fitting and had left his feet deformed as a result. Many aspects of the care experiences of the males who spoke to the Forum appear to have changed for the better from the mid-1960s onwards.

Work

127 Forty-three of the 82 male applicants did not comment or were too young to remember any experiences of having to work when in their placements in the voluntary establishments. The remaining 39 applicants commented as follows: ten applicants described being responsible for chores such as helping to prepare food, laying the table for meals and keeping their bedroom tidy; two applicants commented that they enjoyed helping out, with one receiving extra pocket money for successfully completing his chores. None of these ten applicants viewed their chores as onerous.

128 Twenty-nine applicants felt the work they were required to do was excessive and a few applicants viewed it as punitive. One applicant said that he was made to work on the farm every day after school, every weekend and holiday period. Several applicants recounted that their weekly duties consisted of having to wash, wax and polish long wooden corridors every weekend. Some of these applicants recalled having to wear rags on their feet to make the floor shine. One of these applicants commented that there was an electric buffer in the store room but it was not allowed to be used. Another applicant commented:

> "We were made to polish shoes and if not done properly, we got thumped by the older boys."

129 Several applicants spoke of having to work on the adjacent farm with one applicant commenting that he was kept from school in order to complete his chores. The duties applicants spoke about involved tending to the animals, picking potatoes and stacking hay. Several applicants gave accounts of being hired out to neighbouring farmers to dig potatoes and receiving no payment for their work: "It was slave labour, you got nothing for it." Some of these applicants said they were sent to farms across the country and it was dark when they left their establishment and dark when they returned.

Religious Practice

130 Some applicants did not refer to this aspect of life in their establishments. Other applicants said they had always had their religious beliefs and that this has remained very important for them. One applicant recounted that "the staff were gentle people who often prayed."

131 A number of applicants referred to having to attend their place of worship daily, taking Communion and attending Confession. This was not always described negatively or to their detriment. Some applicants said they had lost their faith, but in later life, had returned to it.

132 Some of the applicants who described religious practices in their placements as excessive and taking precedence over other care factors such as their education and social development recounted the following:

> "…religion - morning, noon and night."
>
> "It was constant – you were up every morning at 6.30 – 7.00 to serve Mass" (and he particularly remembered Easter as he was serving at High Mass and Low Mass, as well as saying the Rosary and Benediction).
>
> "Where was God when this was happening to us?"
>
> "Religion was thumped into you…it turned me off religion."
>
> "I didn't like it; I hate it; detest it. I don't care about religion; I resent religion. You were either working or praying."
>
> "I remember kneeling by the bed and being freezing cold and having to pray."

"It was perpetual – non-stop. Praying, Mass, Angelus, choir."

"Staff were obsessed with religious practices and routines for children."

"The home was more concerned with religion than education."

133 One applicant said that he was stopped from going to stay with his grandmother with whom he had a strong attachment, as she was not taking him to church. The staff believed his grandmother was bringing him to another church. This still resonates with the applicant as he was very tearful when relating this to the Forum. Another applicant recounted being made to kneel for long periods of time in church because of what he described as "minor infringements of the rules."

Play and Recreation

134 Fifty-one male applicants made no mention of, or complaint about, recreational facilities and activities. The remaining 31 referred to a range of activities that were available to them. These included watching television and sporting facilities such as a swimming pool, table tennis room, hurling pitches and basketball courts. Applicants referred to a playroom and outdoor swings in the grounds of one of the establishments. A few applicants recalled fond memories of being taken to Christmas parties provided by local businesses and being given presents.

135 Two applicants described going to the nearby town disco at the weekend, if they were not on home leave. Equally, a number of applicants were regularly taken to seaside resorts for a few weeks over the summer period and spoke of spending most of their time on the beach. An applicant remembered visitors being allowed to come at Christmas, once or twice over the years. They brought gifts for the boys, such as roller skates, which they were allowed to keep. One applicant when speaking of the recreational facilities referred to having nothing but a few old swings adding:

"one day was the same as the next....I was doing things at eleven that I did when I was five."

Medical Care

136 A large number of males did not comment on medical interventions, including dental examinations and treatments.

137 Fifteen male applicants commented on the lack of treatment from medical professionals. This included applicants who spoke of being beaten by a staff member, two of whom were hospitalised for these alleged attacks.

One recounted that, as a result of his attack, he had a head injury but was not brought for a medical examination or treatment. One applicant gave an account of an assault when he was stabbed by another resident but he was not taken to hospital.

138 Another applicant recalled a doctor visiting the establishment and the children getting their inoculations. This applicant also referred to being taken regularly to the dentist for treatment. Two applicants described having serious ailments as children, requiring them to be hospitalised. Three applicants recounted being on bed-rest in their establishment and being cared for by staff members. An applicant was hospitalised as a result of a severe beating by a member of staff who hit him on the head with a wooden towel rail (similar to a large rolling pin). This applicant was an in-patient in hospital for a significant time as he alleges his skull was fractured.

139 The following quotations and comments are typical of the information provided to the Forum:

> "I was sick for three weeks and I've no recollection of being seen by a medic but only of being left in my bed in the dormitory."
>
> "I was taken to the local hospital following a fall from benches."
>
> "A doctor would come up and treat or examine the boys."
>
> "When I was three or four years old, I injured my leg when playing in the yard. I received stitches. Another incident occurred when I was around twelve or thirteen years old and making rugs. My eye was knocked out of its socket and I went to hospital for two weeks. I didn't want to return to the home as I was pampered in the hospital."
>
> "The GP would visit but rarely. I had blisters (an allergic reaction to tomatoes) and was kept off school for two weeks and treated well by kitchen staff who gave me soup."
>
> "Older boys took the younger children to the dentist."

An applicant recounted being very under weight as a child and always fainting but has no memory of being taken to see a doctor.

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System

140 Twenty-eight of the 82 male applicants did not discuss their discharge arrangements or their experiences of leaving their residential placements. The remaining applicants did not always talk in detail but the following information was recounted to the Forum.

"I went home to a father who abused us."

"I was sent back home to my father who was an alcoholic and violent… Nothing had changed."

"I was sent home to a very violent household and nobody checked up on us."

141 Some applicants who were discharged from care at fifteen or sixteen years of age spoke of the frightening and dangerous experiences they were exposed to once they had left residential care.

"When I left school I got work in a laundry but I still lived at the home. One day when I returned, I was met at the side door and told by a member of staff 'you are leaving today'. I didn't get a chance to say goodbye to anyone and I was placed in a boarding house. On my first night there, I was raped anally by a drunken man."

"I was put with my older brother in a boarding house and a man tried to sexually assault me."

"I went to work in…looking after horses and slept in a barn. I ran away to live with an uncle in the city…approved by the welfare, but that didn't work out."

"I left school as a fifteen year old on the Friday and a few days later, I was taken to … to work with old people."

"I was put in digs with other ex-residents. I received no support."

142 Some applicants gave accounts of the loneliness and isolation they felt as they realised they were alone for the first time in their lives and they had no support systems in place. They felt abandoned for a second time. One applicant described what he referred to as his release:

"It was the loneliest day of my life. I had a bag, the same as the Chancellor's, with two sets of underwear, socks and a suit in it. I had no parents, no family."

143 Some applicants said they felt different from their peers who had grown up in family care. They explained this as not just dealing with the stigma and shame of growing up in the care system but more a feeling of being different. As said by one applicant,

"I felt as though I was on the outside" and described other teenagers as seeing him as "simple."

Another applicant reflected, "I didn't know a single pop star or a film star" and said "I was unable to relate to others who hadn't been in care."

144 Some of the applicants were discharged to, or managed to find, lodgings. There was a general consensus that the quality of the accommodation provided was poor, overcrowded and two of the witnesses described further serious sexual abuse by older men in their accommodation. Between 1970 and 1976, those discharged described their terror at being placed in areas where tensions in the community were very high. Some of the applicants, who had been in long-stay care and placed in a rural setting, felt they were not fully prepared to deal with the Troubles and felt very vulnerable when they left care. An applicant, who had been in residential care and discharged in the 1970s, commented:

"I knew nothing of the Troubles....I was thrown into the midst of chaos."

145 A few applicants said they became involved in paramilitary organisations as a way of getting some protection or even a sense of belonging. Following his discharge, one applicant was very seriously assaulted when he wandered into an area where he was stopped by a group of males and questioned about his religion. His pockets were searched and his rosary beads were found. This applicant had to be hospitalised for some time as the result of the severe beating he received. Other applicants made the following comments in regard to their discharge:

"There was rioting at the end of the road. I didn't know what to expect."

"There were bombs going off. I was frightened."

146 One applicant, discharged at fifteen years of age and who remained under the care of Social Services until he was eighteen years of age, said his social worker found lodgings and work for him. He reflected that leaving his care establishment was a very sad time for him as he was entering into a world he didn't really know nor understand. He also missed the residents who were like family to him.

Post-Care Support

147 In total, six male applicants said they were offered appropriate post-care support, and described this as getting assistance with welfare benefits and housing. Applicants who spoke of their discharge from care felt there was little help to assist them to reintegrate back into family life or develop the life skills they needed to manage in the community. Applicants told the Forum the following about the conclusion of their time in care.

"I was put in digs with other ex residents and received no support."

"I had no preparation for leaving – I was just told I was going when I arrived back from school. I was sent to a hostel in Dublin."

"I had no idea where I was going, no aftercare, and no preparation for leaving – only digs, where subsequently I was sexually abused."

"I had no preparation for discharge apart from being given work boots and, on the day of leaving, being given a girl's coat, playing cards and religious icons."

"I had no social worker and at sixteen I was on the streets. I didn't know about sex or women…I feel angry still."

"I was never given a childhood."

"I was given a suitcase and a religious picture with 'Wishing you all the best' on the reverse."

"At fifteen years of age, I was told it was time to leave. I was called into head staff member's office and told 'You are going out into the big bad world'. I left with what I had on me and a small suitcase with a pair of short trousers, a tank top, a vest and underpants."

"I was placed with a family and given a job on a building site pulling nails out of timber. I had no other assistance."

Females: Voluntary Provision

148 Seventy-four female applicants spoke to the Forum about how they experienced day-to-day living in the establishment in which they were placed. Their opinions about aspects of care are set out in the table below.

Aspects of Care	Good	Adequate	Poor	Very bad	No memory/ not disclosed	Total Placements
Diet	-	14	30	13	33	90
Clothing	4	29	22	2	33	90
Heat	2	35	12	2	39	90
Bedding	3	34	13	4	36	90
Personal care	11	9	28	17	25	90

The table shows that, across the five aspects of care, two were more often the subject of negative comments than others. These were diet and personal care and hygiene.

Diet

149 The quantity and/or quality of the food provided in the voluntary sector was described as adequate or good in relation to 31 placements. In 33 placements, the food was described as being poor or very bad. The reports relating to poor food were not time specific but were distributed across the entire time period (1956-1975). The reports of the food being described as good came largely from applicants who had been placed in smaller establishments where choice and preferences were more easily provided for.

150 The following comments typify the female applicants' reported experiences:

> "Poor quality food, not enough to eat, I was always hungry. I was forced to eat semolina and bread pudding even though it made me sick."
>
> "...I ate food that was down for the dog as I was so hungry...I still feel so guilty about this."
>
> "The food was very bad, bread and dripping, grisly fat stew, it was inedible, I was always hungry."
>
> "The food included cold lumpy porridge and greasy fries. I was always hungry."
>
> "There was donated food but this was not given to the children."
>
> "I picked chewing gum off the ground as I was in constant hunger."
>
> "If you refused to eat the food (inedible fat, gristle) they would take it away but then bring it back until you ate it. I wasn't starved but I was hungry and would steal food if the opportunity arose."

Clothing

151 The provision of suitable clothing was described as adequate or good by applicants who had been in 33 of the 90 placements, while in 24 placements it was reported that the clothing provision was inadequate. The complaints concerning clothing focused on the sharing and the uniformity of the clothing provided. These applicants spoke of what they regarded as unreasonable demands that clothing had to be kept pristine for long periods of time, and that they had to have their sleeves rolled up.

152 A number of applicants attended school near the establishment and most of them said that they "stood out" as their uniform was of a sub-standard quality when compared to that worn by the other girls in school. In some placements the shoes provided were second-hand and ill-fitting. Several applicants recalled that getting a pair of shoes of the right size was a lottery. Towards the latter part of this period there were more positive descriptions of applicants being taken shopping for new clothes, being allowed to have choices in the selection of their clothes and the introduction of individual clothing allowances.

Personal Care

153 The second aspect of care about which applicants expressed negativity was personal care including: bathing arrangements, practices regarding menstruation and general personal grooming. In 45 of the 90 placements this aspect was described as poor or very bad, while just 20 of the 90 described this as satisfactory.

154 The following comments illustrate the experiences recounted by the applicants:

> "There were shared baths and shared drying towels. The only item for self care was a wash cloth and very small towel."
>
> "There was no privacy at all. Jeyes Fluid was mixed into the bath water and so much was used it left brown marks on your skin. We had to strip to the waist to wash regardless of age."
>
> (Menstruation) "We had to go and ask for sanitary towels. the staff might say 'I gave you one this morning'; no extra baths were allowed, legs became chaffed, it was embarrassing."
>
> "At bath time we were like animals in a shed lined up ready, one child in the bath, one sitting on the edge of the bath washing her feet, others lined up awaiting their turn in the same water."
>
> "There was no sex education or training in personal hygiene…I left ignorant of the developments I would experience in puberty…I was not taught about menstruation."
>
> "I wet the bed and was not allowed to wash myself before school."
>
> "I was made to sleep in a wet bed with my younger sister – it was a cold wet bed. I had to bath after all other younger girls were washed – the water was dirty and slimy."

Other Care Provision

155 The other areas of care provision commented on by a minority of applicants were heating and bedding. Where comments were made, they were generally positive.

Work

156 Thirty-five of the 74 female applicants who were placed in voluntary establishments in Period 2 advised the Forum that they did not have to perform any onerous work tasks while in their placements. Of that number, some applicants were too young to remember as they were in nurseries and some were happy that the chores they had were not taxing. Other applicants had no recall of undertaking work duties or did not refer to any during their meetings with the Forum.

157 Thirty-nine applicants in placements in the voluntary establishments spoke of being allocated work on a constant basis from age five upwards. Work included a range of tasks from bed making, scrubbing, waxing and polishing floors, being responsible for younger children including babies who required feeding during the night, spring-cleaning classrooms, scrubbing toilets and bathrooms and caring for elderly residents in adjacent accommodation. Working in industrial-style laundries was reported as a constant feature by some applicants and most of them had been given this work from twelve years upwards. Some applicants recalled working at big tubs from age eight and having to stand on steps in order to reach the large sinks.

158 The majority of the establishments were described as places where the children did the everyday work to keep the accommodation clean. The work was described as onerous, often beyond the age capability of the child. It was noted by applicants that a very high standard of work was expected. The staff or older residents supervised their work and if they were unhappy with the outcome, then it had to be redone. Some applicants spoke of being kept off school if they had not finished their chores in the morning; some remembered being kept away from recreational facilities and some had to undertake extra work late into the evening as punishment. The following comments and descriptions from applicants are indicative of the experiences shared with the Forum:

> "Every day I had to get up at 6.00am and had twenty-four babies' nappies to change (my younger sisters helped). We dressed the babies, changed sheets if needed, washed nappies and put them to soak in Napisan. We had Mass, breakfast and school. If there was no school we brushed the floor, washed the tables and chairs, dusted and looked after babies… I was always working."
>
> "We were made to lay out the dead. One time when I was about nine years old, I had to go with my friend (another resident) and lay out an old lady with whom I had had a good relationship. This lady was an amputee and both of us had to bath and lay her out."

"Regularly I had to bring a trolley down to the 'dead house' and tend to the corpse – hair, powder puff etc."

"I had to paint my bed every summer – it had a cream metal frame – and I had work in the laundry and in the old people's home."

"I had to clean six toilets and floors each morning before school…my work was inspected and if I failed then I had to do it again…school was not the main thing."

"I was made to polish floors and work in the morning before and after school – on cold tile floors on bare knees polishing with no respite."

"…life was filled with house-work…cleaning and scrubbing in the children's home and in the classrooms and…replacing light bulbs. There was little time to be a child."

"I was made to work in the laundry and the washroom but, when I couldn't manage the ironing (I burned the clothes!), I was then sent to the stitching rooms."

Religious Practice

159 Thirty-five of the 74 female applicants made no reference to religious practices in their placements. Eighteen of the 39 applicants who did comment on religious practices spoke of attending Mass on a daily basis, of regular morning and evening prayers and of attending other services. Religious observance was described as part of everyday life. Comments about religion were more common in the accounts of those who had placements during the 1950s and 1960s and were less prevalent in the 1970s, although attendance at Sunday services and morning and evening prayers continued to be mentioned. For some applicants their religious observance was accepted as good or positive, while for others it was regarded as something that was overemphasised and not welcomed.

160 Some comments from applicants illustrate what the Forum was told about religious practices.

"We had to say the Rosary nightly and got sent to Benediction every other night…in Confession I had to say that I had done something wrong and confess."

"I had to go to the early Mass some weeks…part of some rota. Then off to retreats for three days each year…no talking was allowed. We always were made to kneel to say the Rosary each and every night."

> "It was pray, pray, pray…before breakfast, Rosary after school…pray for every Tom, Dick and Harry all the time …when President Kennedy died…they hauled us all out of bed to pray for him…If a nun died…she was laid out in an open coffin… we had to go in and pray for them."
>
> "We were always praying…the staff would get children up in the morning by clapping and immediately all would jump out of bed and on their knees to pray. Prayers last thing at night and first thing in the morning. The nun would still be very alert even when she was in her cell…we all said our prayers."
>
> "Services on Sunday morning, Sunday school and services in the evening …I was smacked across the face in God's name…"God would not want you to do that' I was told."

An applicant who had been in a home in the 1970s, said she "enjoyed the smell of incense and loved the Benediction."

Play and Recreation

161 Forty-five of the 74 applicants did not discuss or refer to any recreational facilities. From the comments of 29 female applicants it became evident that many establishments had outside play areas and some equipment. This equipment was described by some as being rusty and inadequate, particularly in the larger establishments given the numbers of children accommodated there. The following are typical of comments made about outdoor play facilities:

> "The play ground/yard outside had a climbing frame – a rusty climbing bar."
>
> "Other equipment – such as a slide – was presented by a donor but this was removed by staff."
>
> "There was some play equipment but girls were not allowed to climb."
>
> "The noise level was awful…no peace…I tried to find a quiet place to read."

Many experienced the play yard as a place of fear because of the noise or the danger of being knocked over as girls charged around. For others, it provided an opportunity to be outside and a place of enjoyment, even if only for a short period.

162 Recreation also included access to some television shows, watching films on Sunday evenings, and having record players. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, in some establishments, the older girls had a separate sitting room which made life more comfortable for them. In one establishment, bikes were provided and the older girls were allowed to cycle into the local town on Sundays.

Comments made by applicants included:

"TV was switched on for the News. At Christmas time we were allowed to watch."

"We had occasional access to television - any kissing on TV meant the telly was always turned over."

"… me and another girl were watching 'Top of the Pops' and mimicking Pans People dancing – I was told I was immoral. I was made to stand outside the staff room for hours."

"Each group had a sitting room. We could watch limited TV, there was more freedom once I turned fifteen. There was a big room with music but we were only allowed in there occasionally…any noise and you would be sent out."

163 Many applicants spoke fondly of going out to parties organised for them by local businesses and the joy of getting a present and eating food not normally available to them. They spoke of the excitement in the build-up to such outings and the disappointment and hurt if permission to attend was withdrawn for some misdemeanour. Most, but not all, applicants recalled that the presents they were given were removed on return to the establishment.

164 Some applicants referred to going on walks on a Sunday and this was welcomed as providing an opportunity to get out and for some it provided the only opportunity to see their sisters. For others it was a painful experience in that they felt humiliated at having to walk in a crocodile line.

165 Other recreational activities commented on included dancing classes, playing in bands and attending the Feis or other competitions. In establishments where music and singing were encouraged, those who were not musically talented were allocated extra chores instead.

166 A number of applicants described being taken on holidays for a week to a local seaside area. These holidays were generally spoken of as a time when the girls had more freedom and time to enjoy themselves. However, for some of the older girls the routines of cleaning, washing up and caring for younger children filled their days when they were on holiday.

167 Seven applicants spoke of experiencing little or no recreational activities. Instead, they were engaged in work chores, kept indoors or away from play. An applicant who was placed with a younger sibling spoke of the emphasis on completing chores after school to the detriment of playtime:

> "my chores took all my time after school…I constantly looked out for my sister…little room left for any recreation…I was frightened all my time there."

Medical Care

168 Fifty-seven applicants did not remember, or did not refer to, any medical care in the establishment in which they were placed. Some of the seventeen applicants who described medical care referred to a variety of interventions including immunisations, general practitioner visits and/or clinic attendance, hospital attendance or admission, being placed in a sick bay on site and dental treatment. Others did not remember any medical interventions when they believed their illness or injury would have warranted attention. The following comments illustrate what applicants told the Forum:

> "I was diagnosed as coeliac and given the wrong types of food. As a result, I was frequently sick. I was taken to…Hospital following a particularly severe beating from the woman in charge of the home."

> "The doctor called, he saw the new children, he checked them. I think it was fortnightly. I saw him once, I had bad flu. If you were ill, other children were responsible for bringing up food or medicine to you. A girl with jaundice was isolated and it was my job to bring her all her food and medicine. A kind member of staff brought me gruel with sugar when I had flu."

> "I recall being asked by the dentist about teeth hygiene and I told him that there was no toothpaste in the home. He contacted the home and I was made to stand on a chair for hours and was hit with the side of a ruler on my knuckles by a member of staff."

> "I never saw a doctor or nurse – I had scabs on my head which another child was made to brush out; it was very painful, I passed out. There was no medical help."

> "My knee split open and would have required stitches, but I was not seen by a medic."

> "Injuries caused by staff were hidden. If you were bruised you had to wear tights and were given a note for school so no PE. At hospital you were not allowed to speak, staff did all the talking."

"I suffered from severe acne when I was a teenager and got no medical attention for it."

"They looked after cuts and grazes, and used iodine and Jeyes Fluid. I had ringworm and was taken out to a clinic."

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System

169 The 74 female applicants who were in 90 placements in the voluntary sector spoke to the Forum about their discharge from those placements as follows.

- Thirty-four applicants were discharged home at various ages.
- Twenty applicants left the establishment to commence working.
- Seven applicants were placed in adoptive or in long-term foster care families.
- Four applicants were sent to juvenile justice establishments because they were absconding.
- Four applicants were transferred to establishments in the state sector.
- Three applicants were sent to laundries run by religious orders where they remained for some years. As reported to the Forum, applicants did not have a choice in this matter.
- Two applicants went to other placements: one to further education, where she lived-in and one joined the armed services.

Post-Care Support

170 Only seven applicants told the Forum that they had been offered good support after leaving the care system. Most applicants described little or no preparation for leaving their placements and many applicants who were sent home reported that they were by then estranged from their families and communities and went back to strangers. Applicants reported being told they were leaving only on the day of their departure or at best the day before. Some comments from applicants illustrate how this aspect of care was experienced.

"I was placed on an aeroplane unaccompanied to…where I was met by mother who was like a stranger… there was no support from anybody…I was just told I was going home tomorrow." (The applicant was twelve at the time.)

"I ran away, was brought back, couldn't settle, next thing I was put in a van and landed in…most of the people there were very old…I never got out…it closed when I was about 25…lucky me."

"I was given a job in the convent... cleaning, serving food to visitors... answering the door etc. I got £4 per month, and food and board. Eventually one of the other girls got me a job in a factory. I left and started living."

"...I was sent back to them (parents) why? I had been taken away because he (father) was abusing us...he just continued." (This applicant returned to care at a later point.)

171 A small number of applicants who persistently ran away from the establishment in which they were placed were sent to juvenile justice establishments. One applicant who ran away at thirteen was convicted of an offence. She told the Forum that the staff from her first placement did not prepare her for this possibility and she did not understand what had happened in court: "No one explained to me."

172 Very few applicants talked about being trained in basic life skills such as cooking, budgeting and shopping. For many of the 20 applicants discharged into work, often living in hostels initially, life was for some years very difficult as they struggled to master the basic necessary skills for survival. This was particularly true for those applicants who had been raised largely in institutional settings in the care system.

173 Many, but not all, applicants described that an initial job had been found for them. They had no work or life skills so the jobs were at a very basic level, for some no work was secured. Many left Northern Ireland shortly after their discharge from care to seek work in England. Many of those had no family contacts to fall back on but some were fortunate to be living with, or in contact with, people they knew from their placements who were helpful and supportive.

Return Home

174 Thirty-four applicants were discharged to the family home. For some this was a good and positive experience and they rebuilt their lives as a family unit. Comments included:

"Soon as they got a house...we were home. I never told them what had happened...how could I?"

"...after a few months...the court sent us home. Welfare would still visit; we saw them for years...eventually the visits stopped."

175 For many applicants going home meant returning to families from whom they had become estranged; their parents had new partners who were strangers to them. They had new siblings or half-siblings and they were expected to settle down and attend new schools or go to work in new communities and, in a few cases, in entirely new countries. For some, the underlying family difficulties of alcohol misuse, physical or sexual abuse or domestic violence had not changed and many of the applicants in these situations left home as quickly as possible. Some applicants said that they felt their families had only taken them out to make them 'unpaid skivvies again' while others spoke of parents sending them out to work as soon as possible and taking all their wages.

Adoptive or Long-Term Foster Care

176 Seven applicants were discharged to long-term families; three were adopted while four remained in long-term foster care. Two of them went to foster or holiday families who had befriended them while they were in the establishment and this was described as a very happy outcome. One applicant, whose mother was a single parent, described being adopted at age five. Her mother signed the legal papers. When the applicant traced her mother in later life she discovered that her mother had not been fully informed about the meaning of adoption and that all parental rights had been removed from her. The adoptive placement was a very positive one and the applicant became tearful when speaking about her adoptive parents as they are now both deceased. These types of placements out of long-term residential establishments were made mostly in the late 1960s and in the 1970s.

Reporting Abuse

177 Most applicants left the care system and did not speak further about their childhood or any abuse that occurred until some ten years or more had passed. The 42 applicants who described some or all of the aspects of their experiences in the establishments spoke to their partners or counsellors. More recently, applicants have spoken to the police. A few applicants have told their own children as they grew up or asked questions about their background and family of origin. Most applicants spoke of wanting to avoid the stigma of being raised in care, or placing the burden of their experiences on the shoulders of their children. The fear for everyone was that no one would believe them and some expressed their relief at finally having the opportunity of speaking freely of their past.

State Sector Provision

178 Twenty male applicants had a total of 30 placements in 16 individual state sector establishments. Ten female applicants had a total of eleven placements in nine individual state sector establishments. These placements included residential child-care establishments, hostels, residential medical settings for children and young people and an assessment and reception centre. The establishments in the state sector were smaller residential units admitting both male and female children of a similar age range, for example primary or secondary school aged children. Most applicants spent a maximum of one year in each placement and for some applicants their placements lasted for a few months only.

179 This section of the report is divided into two parts. The first part covers the experiences of male applicants in state sector placements while the second covers the experiences of female applicants.

Males: State Provision

180 The twenty male applicants who spoke with the Forum had a total of 30 placements in sixteen individual state sector establishments.

- Fourteen of the establishments were smaller, community, residential units admitting both male and female children of a similar age range.
- One establishment admitted males only.
- One establishment was a medical setting undertaking assessment and treatment of children and young people.

181 The following indicates the number of placements of applicants in the state sector.

- Thirteen male applicants had one state sector placement only.
- Four male applicants had two state sector placements.
- Two male applicants had three state sector placements.
- One male applicant had four state sector placements.

Other Care Placements

182 Following their placements in state establishments, three applicants were transferred to three different voluntary establishments. Additionally, two male applicants were admitted to two different juvenile justice establishments.

Care Conditions

183 Several male applicants either had no memory of, or chose not to comment on, the general conditions in their placement, such as food, clothing, heating, bedding and personal care provided. The remaining applicants described the care amenities in their placement(s) as either adequate or good. None of the male applicants expressed any complaints about the general care conditions in their state establishments.

184 One applicant who had had two placements in the state sector, differentiated between both establishments, describing the care in one as "not too bad" and the other as "pure torture."

185 One applicant recounted positive memories of his placement in a state establishment. He described his placement as:

> "a supportive family environment. I have no complaints; I have the height of praise for the ethos and practice."

186 One establishment in the state sector had education on site. Children resident in the remaining state establishments, if of school age, attended school within the community.

187 The following comments give a sense of applicants' views of their state care provision:

> "Staff were not all bad; there were some nice people but also bad apples."
>
> "I was very unsettled and resented the strict regime. I was missing contact with my family, hiding and running away frequently."
>
> "I absolutely hated it from day one. I was scared there all the time."
>
> An applicant described a gang of about five older Belfast boys who were in the establishment:
>
> "There were three other boys in the home as well as me who were not street-wise. The older boys were engaged in street disturbances and I saw staff give them money regularly. My social worker Miss…was a young woman and she never entered the home…after day one. She saw me in her car round the corner from the home."

188 An applicant described his placement as "positive" and referred to three members of staff as "lovely to me." Another commented that his placement "worked very well". He was very enthusiastic about and appreciative of his care. Other positive views expressed included:

> "The housemother was warm and all staff very approachable. I was taken out each Saturday by…to her parent's home for tea."
>
> "I had lots of food, clothes were clean and a clean bed. I was never hit, I could talk to people."
>
> "I was happy in every way in…"
>
> "I loved it – I felt settled and secure in my placement."

"It was a happy place, it gave you a warm feeling."

"Overall it was very positive and I could see my sisters."

189 Those applicants who commented on the recreational facilities available to them described toys and games, involvement in extra-curricular activities and, in certain establishments, grounds in which they could play. One applicant reported the following:

"There was a common room for games, and residents could also play outside…it was an open establishment…you were not locked in."

One applicant who was approximately nine years of age when in a state establishment, described his daily routine as follows:

"I was up at 7.00am, had to wash, dress, get breakfast and then go to school. I returned from school at half past three and changed out of school uniform. We had games and would sometimes play outside. I did homework and had tea. We went off to bed at around 8.00pm after supper which was tea and biscuits."

Religious Practice

190 Seventeen of the twenty male applicants who had been in state establishments did not mention religious practice when describing their experiences. Of the three who did, two spoke positively about this aspect of their care while one believed this to be excessive and said the following:

"The officer in charge was very religious, services twice on every Sunday, Sunday school, evening catechism".

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from the Care System

191 Seven of the twenty male applicants did not give any detail about their discharge arrangements from state establishments. Six of the twenty male applicants were returned to family care. Three of the twenty male applicants went on to find employment and accommodation. Two of the twenty male applicants were transferred to another establishment in the voluntary sector. Two of the twenty male applicants were transferred to juvenile justice establishments.

Females: State Provision

192 Ten female applicants who spoke to the Forum were placed in nine different establishments in the state sector. One of those applicants had two placements in different establishments in the state sector. One placement was made in 1959 while the other ten placements were in the 1960s and 1970s. All ten applicants were in their placements for one year or less.

Care Conditions

193 The female applicants made no complaints about food, clothing, heating, bedding and personal care. In some of their establishments provision was described as good, while some applicants did not comment at all on these aspects of their care.

194 In general, recreational facilities were described as adequate with appropriate toys or games available. Recreation, where mentioned, fitted the normal pattern for children and young people. Eight of the nine applicants in state establishments made no reference to having to complete tasks or chores. One applicant had to work in a laundry attached to her placement in the 1970s when she was in her mid-teens. She got paid a small amount for the work, which was described as arduous, and she had to pay for all her personal toiletries out of that sum.

195 Religion was not commented on by any of the nine applicants to the Forum and there was no comment in relation to medical care except for one applicant who remembered a general practitioner attending.

196 Comments from applicants included:

> "...was a lovely children's home."
>
> "It was great...we mixed together...boys and girls...we got on well... when my father came to bring us home...I wanted to stay."

Applicants in state establishments went to local schools and there were no complaints about the education they received.

Discharge from State Care

197 Four of the ten female applicants were discharged home from their placements in this sector. Three of them were transferred to placements in the voluntary sector, two left to go to hostels and working life and one was admitted to a psychiatric facility.

Juvenile Justice Provision

198 This section of the report is in two parts, the first dealing with the experiences of the male applicants and the second dealing with the experiences of female applicants who were in juvenile justice establishments.

Males: Juvenile Justice

199 Twenty-seven male applicants who spoke to the Forum had experienced 39 placements in seven individual establishments within the juvenile justice sector.

Placement Duration

200 Twelve of the male applicants had spent one year or less in a juvenile justice setting whereas seven applicants had spent two years, two applicants had spent three years and two had spent four years in a juvenile justice setting. Four applicants had spent five years in a juvenile justice setting.

Other Care Placements

201 Twenty male applicants each had one placement in a juvenile justice establishment during this period and of those:

- three had been in one or more voluntary sector establishments before their admission to a juvenile justice establishment
- one had been discharged from a juvenile justice setting and then placed in a voluntary establishment
- three male applicants had re-admissions into juvenile justice establishments.

Four male applicants had two placements each in different juvenile justice establishments. One male applicant had three placements in different juvenile justice establishments. Two male applicants had four placements each in four different juvenile justice establishments.

Reasons for Admission

202 As indicated earlier, some of the male applicants were not aware of the reasons for their placements in juvenile justice establishments. Equally, some chose not to speak of the reasons why they were sent to such establishments. Twelve male applicants said they were the subjects of court orders granted through the youth courts. The Forum heard that applicants were sent to juvenile justice establishments for the following reasons:

- truanting from school
- antisocial behaviours such as petty theft
- absconding from a children's home or running away from the family home

- out of control and challenging behaviours and assault
- breach of a supervision order.

203 Applicants gave the following information to the Forum about the reasons for their admission.

- Two applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments previously, said they were sent to juvenile justice establishments due to persistent absconding.
- An applicant commented that the arrangements to place him in secure accommodation were facilitated by staff in the voluntary and the juvenile justice sectors, without the involvement of any external agencies or authorities.
- One applicant who was admitted as a twelve or thirteen-year-old under a court order for truanting and discharged five years later, told the Forum that he thought, at the outset, he would be detained "for a few months, not for five years." He concluded that the absence of his father resulted in him being overly punished for what was described as a relatively minor matter. He could not understand why he was sent away from his mother for such a significant length of time.
- One applicant was admitted as a fourteen-year-old under a court order "for loitering with intent" in a shop. He was discharged from placement two years later.
- One applicant was sentenced to a "period of training" after many court appearances.
- One applicant was sent by the youth courts for many minor offences such as stealing groceries after his father had deserted the family.
- One applicant was placed as an eleven-year-old by the magistrates court in response to an incident when he assaulted another child in a park.
- One applicant was sentenced to four weeks detention when he was eleven or twelve years of age.
- One applicant was sent to a juvenile justice establishment as a holding placement before he was detained in another establishment, as he was persistently absconding (this applicant had a history of three placements).
- One applicant was a member of a paramilitary organisation and charged with possession of a firearm at fifteen years of age. He was remanded for six months and then sentenced to three years detention.

Care Conditions

204 Fifteen male applicants had no memory of or did not disclose any details of the food, clothing, bedding or heating they were provided with in their placements. Seven male applicants described the food and clothing as good or adequate and one applicant described the food as very good. Four applicants who were in placement in the late 1950s and early 1960s described the food and the clothing provided to them as poor.

"We all wore short trousers."

"Absconders wore white shorts, even out on walks to mark them out."

"Rubbish clothes, short trousers or later baggy long trousers."

"Christmas dinner was a jam sandwich (no butter) and glass of milk."

Work

205 Some applicants spoke about being made to work in their establishments. The following comments are representative of what they told the Forum.

"I cleaned the bedroom and corridors; I was sent out in school holidays to pick potatoes for farmers; I was promised half-crown a day. I never saw it. I was fed by farmers when out and this was better than the food in."

"At weekends the Belfast boys went out whilst we had to clean and polish the three dormitories using blankets on our feet."

"We cleaned and polished the dormitory every Saturday."

"If we misbehaved, we were made to clean the place – we were kept out of school to do this."

"I worked in the laundry and in the kitchen; I had cleaning duties including mixing the floor wax and waxing the floors; I acted as messenger for teachers taking notes from class to class constantly; I became the personal servant of the … I worked in the vestry and the shoe-maker's shop; I worked in the gardens in the holiday home."

"I had to do the floors by walking up and down with cloths on my shoes to polish them for hours."

"I had to clean the showers."

"I had to work in a staff member's house, a mansion, where I dusted, cleaned and polished."

"I spent six months in the kitchen washing pots and pans; I had dermatitis from my hands being in water and soap all the time. The skin was falling off me."

"I worked in the shed on scrap metal; pulling spikes out of metal all day."

"I was made to scrub large stone floors with a scrubbing brush. If you didn't do as required, you got a slap on head and face."

"I had to clean toilets with a toothbrush and was hit if not satisfactory."

One applicant commented that in his opinion:

"the allocation of duties to the boys depended on whether or not staff liked you."

Religious Practice

206 Of the 27 applicants who had been in juvenile justice establishments seventeen did not mention religious practice. Ten applicants, all resident in one establishment, spoke of religious practice but this was not described as excessive. One applicant told the Forum he was an altar boy, which he enjoyed. Two applicants referred to the usual Mass on Sundays.

Recreation

207 Some applicants referred to a number of recreational opportunities including:

- two-week summer holidays
- band
- boxing and football
- swimming
- television
- football, table tennis and snooker
- hurling, Gaelic football
- half hour "association" time daily.

Medical Care

208 Most of the male applicants did not discuss medical interventions or treatment. However some applicants made a passing reference to a designated medical person, whom they understood to be a nurse, based on site and part of the staff complement. Three applicants who had been in juvenile justice establishments commented on medical attention as follows:

"I was badly injured on two separate occasions by staff. One time, I was taken to a local hospital and on the second occasion, to another hospital. Medical staff did not ask about the injuries."

"I was put in the infirmary when head-butted by another resident and I had to have my nose reset."

"I was taken to hospital for x-rays when my ribs were broken during an assault by a member of staff who beat me with a hurling bat."

Discharge from Juvenile Justice Placements

209 Eleven of the twenty male applicants were discharged home to family care. Two male applicants went to live in digs and both secured apprenticeships. One applicant commented, as an aside, that the boys who had been in his establishment were known as "bad boys" and his peers were told not to associate with him.

210 One applicant returned to his juvenile justice establishment as a day pupil to complete his education. Another spoke of the assistance he received when, at sixteen years of age, he was discharged from his placement and staff had arranged for him to commence an apprenticeship. Otherwise, applicants did not make reference to post-care support. One applicant was discharged to a voluntary establishment. Six applicants were transferred to other juvenile justice establishments and their experiences are included in Period 3 of this report.

Females: Juveniles Justice Provision

211 Seven female applicants had seven placements in two individual establishments in the juvenile justice sector. Five female applicants each had one placement in one individual juvenile justice establishment as follows:

- Two applicants were placed in establishment in the late 1950s and early 1960s. One of them was placed there for four years and her sister was placed for nine years. These two siblings entered into this placement as a result of non-school attendance.
- Two applicants were placed in the early 1960s – one applicant had a placement of three years duration and the other had a placement of two years duration.
- One applicant was placed for one year in the early 1970s.

Two other applicants were placed in another juvenile justice establishment as follows:

- One applicant had a placement of three years duration in the late 1960s.
- One applicant had a placement of one year in the 1970s.

Reasons for Admission

212 Some female applicants did not know why they were placed in some establishments. The information they gave to the Forum indicated the following in relation to placements in the juvenile justice sector:

- Five applicants appear to have been subject to a training school order. Two of those were siblings who were not attending school. One of the siblings was very young and there was no other child of similar age in that placement.
- One applicant, who had a short-term placement, appears to have been subject to a place of safety order and placed in this environment because a suitable, more appropriate placement to meet her needs was not available.
- One applicant did not know the reason for her placement.

Care Conditions

213 Five of the seven female applicants did not speak about the basic care provision facilities in the juvenile justice establishments. Two applicants, who had criticisms of the basic standards, described the food as poor. One applicant also felt that personal care was poor. Their description of the overall situation as experienced was as follows.

> "I was the youngest child there for six years. I had no friends of my own age. There was a great deal of violence and hard physical work. I was always the youngest. The food was poor at times but emotionally the place was very cold. Although I was a small child, I was not allowed by staff to get any comfort from others."

> "They had rewards points and a grade system – 90 points were required for a home visit. I was referred to by a number…We had two sets of uniform and had to change on Monday. The pants were not new when I got them. I got only three sanitary towels a day but I was not allowed to wash my pants."

Work in the Establishments

214 Six of the seven female applicants described having a heavy workload during their placements in juvenile justice establishments.

- One applicant spoke of having to clean stairs and banisters, do the laundry, and wash tiled walls using a toothbrush to clean grouting. She described being made do it all over again if the staff thought her work not good enough.

- Another described cleaning and polishing the chapel and dormitory: "Lots of kitchen work, laundry work, weeding, making up hot water bottles for staff. The girls kept the place pristine."

Others told the Forum that:

> "Work was a constant…scrubbing, washing, polishing chapel, dormitories and staff quarters. Kitchen and laundry work included washing soiled sanitary pads belonging to staff."
>
> "We had to scrub floors (there was a buffer to polish floors) we had to do knitting, embroidery and sewing and the items we made were for sale. I had to hand wash 34 pairs of knickers and socks."

Religious Practice

215 All but one female applicant spoke of religion as part of their daily life, including daily Mass, Rosaries and Confession. One applicant described her experience:

> "…I had to go to church each Sunday but we were made to sit in a segregated area… there was no mixing."

Another applicant described her experience as follows:

> "Religion 24 hours a day; seven days a week praying, chapel, retreats in silence, in classroom a lot of religion, and we were tested on catechism."

Recreation

216 Five of the seven female applicants described some form of recreational activity in the two juvenile justice establishments. This included netball teams, daily walks, dancing classes, and some time to watch television in the evenings. There was an annual holiday to a residential facility that was used by many organisations during the summer. This was described as often requiring heavy cleaning before it could be used: "we spent the first week cleaning it out." One applicant whose placement at age fifteen was for three years duration in the late 1960s spoke of locked doors and no outside play except for a hike on Saturdays.

Medical Care

217 The Forum heard from four of the seven female applicants concerning the availability of medical services in their establishments. It appears both establishments had a dedicated staff member available to deal with medical issues. This position changed over time. Two applicants attended hospital while in their placements; one was for a routine admission while the second admission was in respect of ongoing bedwetting.

218 One applicant described how an infection was dealt with:

> "she (named staff member) was meant to look after ill girls. She put my infected finger in boiling water; that burnt two of my fingers."

Another applicant described how she cut her leg on a rusty iron post whilst on a walk and was given no medical attention and still has a deep scar from the injury. The same applicant described that she was taken to the beach and made to stay out in the sun and sustained sun burn. She had cancer in later life in the same area where skin was blistered and she noted her concern that she had been exposed to extreme heat with no protection.

219 Two applicants from the same establishment described the trauma of undergoing medical examinations on admission. These were described as extremely invasive with no explanation for what occurred before, during or after the procedure. Neither applicant was prepared for this. One had a full inspection on admission including an internal examination. The other was taken to the doctor and her legs were placed in stirrups; she was subject to a medical examination and no explanation was given. "They just did it."

Applicants' Experiences of Discharge from Care

220 Four of the seven female applicants were discharged home to parents or to relatives from their placements in the juvenile justice sector. Two applicants went out to work and lived in hostels initially, while one applicant was placed in a children's residential establishment. Three applicants reported receiving some help after leaving the system. Some of their reported experiences were as follows.

> "…they got me onto a course; I was not told about it in advance. The routine was that a case appeared; the girls would wonder who was leaving. I was called out; I had very little to leave with. I was taken to Belfast to a convent and made to go back to (her establishment) every weekend. I just walked out one day and went home; no one checked."

> "I was under supervision until I was 21 years old but the supervisor insisted on coming to work interviews and explaining my background. The supervisor was annoyed if she was not told of any change in my job or boyfriend…She interviewed boyfriends for suitability. I got married before I was 21 without permission from the supervisor."

221 Three applicants did not recall any assistance following discharge from care and their observations included:

> "There was no preparation…I was farmed out…a home girl good to scrub, clean and bleach…cleanliness was next to godliness."

> "I was playing a netball game when this person (named) came. I wasn't sure who she was but she removed me to a great aunt. I didn't know her…My family didn't want me…I had no chance to say goodbye to my friends…I never saw anyone else again."

All Establishments

222 The following sections of this report include all applicants who were placed in establishments whether designated as voluntary, state or juvenile justice provision. Included are applicants' memories of their experiences of inspections or other visits, the positive comments they made about their care and their contact with other residents or personnel.

Memories of Inspections and Visitors from Outside Organisations and Agencies

223 The majority of applicants, both male and female, had no memory of any visits by Inspectors or other personnel from either the statutory or voluntary sector charged with monitoring the provision of care afforded to them. Some applicants recalled visitors from outside organisations. However they did not always know the role or function of the visitors. Applicants believed that among the visitors some were from organisational headquarters and some were designated official inspectors from the Health Ministry, Home Office, Education Ministry or from welfare committees.

224 A common feature of inspections and official visits, as applicants told the Forum, was that the children and young people did not have opportunities to speak to visitors on their own.

> "The staff were always present, always supervising."

Male Applicants

225 Of the 125 male applicants in care, 98 gave no account of remembering any official visits. Twenty-seven applicants had some recollection of visits but most could not be certain exactly what the status of the official visitors was.

226 Eleven male applicants had some memory of an inspection and of other officials visiting the establishment in which they were placed. The following is taken from comments they made to the Forum:

> "The welfare visited regularly; they spoke to me. I never told what was going on as older boys had warned us that it would get back to staff and we would be punished."
>
> "I remember a woman visiting; I think she was from the welfare. I was always placed at the front of the line."

227 An applicant spoke about three people coming who were possibly from a Government Ministry. Untypically, he and other children were allowed to enter the sitting room where they saw toys. The children were given an extra blanket and a nice quilt. A member of staff was smiling and helping a child with a jigsaw puzzle. He said this was not the usual course of events. Once the officials left the home, the toys were immediately removed and this room became off limits to the residents again. Some of the comments made by the applicants set out below:

> "They were only with you for a few minutes before they went upstairs for the best grub. I couldn't tell them, they wouldn't have listened. They put you there in the first place; they would not admit their mistakes."
>
> "I don't remember inspections as such, but if there were any visits from people outside everywhere was cleaned including staff rooms. The dining room was set and we were not to talk. We were hidden away. When they had left, everything reverted back to normal."
>
> "If visitors came, no one from outside would ask how you were, I never saw a welfare office; if visitors did come, you were told to keep your mouth shut."
>
> "A special service took place when church dignitaries visited."
>
> "We were told 'You be on your best behaviour, we are having visitors today' but we never would know who they were."
>
> "Social workers and others visited, but the staff were always alerted. They would see children in the parlour at the front of house on the ground floor."
>
> "I remember one visit by a social worker."

228 One applicant referred to a Secretary of State visiting and enquiring about his welfare. He felt unable to talk about his care as the wardens were present. Another applicant described a visit by a Secretary of State following a great deal of publicity and said he was taken to his cell as it was well kept. All residents were warned in advance that they would "be killed" if anyone complained.

Female Applicants

229 Sixty-nine female applicants had no memory of any inspections during their placements. Eleven female applicants had some recall of visits and recounted their experiences to the Forum as follows:

- "…they called the Inspectors 'the Ministry' but we didn't know where they were from, who they were or how to approach them." This applicant said that a concert had been arranged with Irish dancing; she recalled the children being told to say how happy they were, how good the staff were and being told to smile.
- The provision of special clothing was commented on by some applicants who said the children were given nice clothes and made to perform songs or dances for a visitor, but the nice clothes were removed once the outsider left.
- One applicant mentioned being told inspectors were due. She never knew where they were from but recalled that the night before they would be told people were coming and they were to be on their best behaviour. New things including toys, dolls and books which the children had not seen before would be brought out. However they were taken away after the people left. She wondered why the inspectors didn't pick up on children's reaction to the toys or how new they were.
- Another applicant said that it was known when inspectors were coming to the establishment: "We cleaned everywhere, the beds all dressed, new clothes…all removed when left. We were well warned to be careful how we answered questions."

230 The Forum was told about one classroom inspection:

> "The teacher….had a blackthorn stick she would use to beat us on our legs and…an inspector came into classroom…we gave the right answers to his questions. He saw the stick and asked the teacher what it was for. She lied and said it was her pointing stick; then to illustrate the point she used it as such."

231 Other visitors referred to by the applicants included a bishop, committee members and a number of groups known to the girls as "the benefactors". One applicant described one such visit as follows:

"I was coached and dressed up for benefactors calling…a couple with maybe two children. I had to stand up…I remember hating it…having to stand for children and say hello."

232 Another memory that was recounted was the visit of a film crew and an applicant recalled new toys and garden equipment put out for the occasion. The girls were warned not to ask where they came from. The applicant said everything looked brand new and was taken away as soon as the television crew left.

Applicants' Comments on Positive Experiences

233 This section covers the positive comments made by both male and female applicants who spoke to the Forum and who were placed in the care system between 1956 and 1975. Most but not all applicants to the Forum had some positive memories of their childhood in the care system.

234 Many applicants had positive memories of family visits, even if these were few. These visits were described as being closely watched by staff and they were never left alone with family members without supervision. Some applicants were allowed out to spend weekends and holiday periods with family members including extended family members and they really enjoyed this, but dreaded having to return to the establishment. Many applicants did not know their siblings and some spoke of their joy at getting to see brothers and sisters on the rare occasions when meetings were permitted.

235 Many applicants had very fond memories of families who had befriended them and who took them out for breaks as often as they were allowed. The families were not always allowed to take the same children each time but some managed to do so, while at other times it appeared to be a lottery and different children were chosen to go out. A small number of applicants spoke of their foster families' wishes to adopt them but stated that this request was refused. They said they were never told why, but one applicant recalled that her foster family was refused permission to adopt and did not return to the establishment again "…my life might have been so different."

236 Most importantly, applicants spoke of the friends they made during their childhood in the establishments; they saw them as family and spoke about the support they provided in adult life.

Male Applicants

237 Most male applicants spoke about their positive memories and experiences in the care system. Their comments included:

"(staff named) was dead on, lovely. On St Patrick's Day, he would ask you your name and if it was Patrick he gave you half a crown. One year a lot of boy's names were Patrick! He was a good member of staff who had time for you."

"The staff did their best."

"A member of staff who was working a short period of time was my saviour."

"He (a member of staff) took all in hand, made you feel important, enlightened you about your future."

"A particular member of staff was very good to me. Any money I received he would keep it for me and write it in a book and keep a record when he gave me any – he always knew how much I had because of his record book. He was an older member of staff, very genuine – it was nice to have a friend."

"Mr and Mrs...my house parents were very good to me; they cooked me breakfast...I saw them as grandparents."

"I liked this home, particularly once I was placed in the smaller units."

"One of the staff recognised me as a loner and befriended me teaching me how to play with a set of playing cards."

"I was sent to buy stamps from the post office – I really enjoyed the freedom."

"My accommodation was warm and comfortable and clean...I had my own allotment and grew vegetables."

"I enjoyed going out to stay with a family in Newtownards."

"I liked playing football in the fields in the grounds and I was taken fishing to the Skerries."

"My primary school was a fantastic place – really, really good."

"At Christmas, Easter and summertime, I was taken out by a very wealthy family...both school teachers. They bought me and another lad from the home new clothes."

"I enjoyed being taken out by a family for three weeks, three years running but then I was extremely upset when it was time to return and I always pleaded to stay. Leaving was like going from heaven to hell, crossing a line of sunshine over to pure darkness."

Female Applicants

238 The female applicants who spoke about positive memories referred to going out to foster families as being of great importance to them. Most were very appreciative of the kindness they received and spoke of being accepted and enjoying being able to be a child. A few applicants had more negative experiences and one applicant told the Forum of her mixed experience with foster families:

> "Some families were good to you but others treated you as a skivvy... like a maid not a holiday."

Another applicant talked about the anxiety of the selection process for such outings:

> "Going out was great but if I was not chosen I hated staying in...missing friends and having to do chores including cleaning the classrooms. I felt they were my family."

239 Other positive memories included:

- preparing for and taking part in the choir and annual competitions
- putting on a Christmas show for staff, Bishops and other dignitaries
- being taken on outings and holidays
- Christmas parties arranged by outside firms, "We got nice food, toys and forgot where we lived."

240 Twenty-five applicants spoke very warmly about one or more members of staff. Most often the staff members were kitchen staff or other staff who were not in positions of power in the establishments. The following comments are representative of what they said:

> "...lay care staff, a gem. They let us stay up to watch 'On the Buses' behind their back."
>
> "Very good kind staff in the kitchen."
>
> "...very kind, I only saw her in the kitchen."
>
> "...a very good, kind and gentle person but she was in the nursery."

A member of staff was referred to as a "ray of sunshine". She painted flowers on walls, found out the birth dates of the girls and had a cake for their birthdays.

241 Other applicants' comments on staff members included:

> "…she had very kind eyes. I think she understood what…was up to but she had no power."
>
> "She was a lovely considerate caring person."
>
> "She was very nice and would sneak food to us, if we were made stay in; she would let us out when she knew it was safe to do so."
>
> "They actually were interested in us."
>
> "He was the best."
>
> "The music teacher was very straight, a lovely man…he never hit anyone."
>
> "…he was very good and his classroom was a haven."

242 One applicant who was discharged in the early 1970s described the food provided as "very good" and the washing facilities as "excellent."

243 Christmas Day within some establishments was experienced as a very enjoyable time with better food and some small presents.

> "Christmas was good, the girls put on show for all the staff, no outsiders came, the staff liked you if you were doing things for them. The show had to be perfect. On Christmas Day you got an apple, an orange and sometimes a pair of slippers."

244 The Forum heard of many positive experiences from applicants placed in the smaller, community based establishments.

- One described her establishment as "one big family." She liked the co-ed set-up and all the children got on well together.
- Another said her establishment was run by a family of a different religious faith: "they were lovely people, kind to us; they never raised their voice to us. There were lots of toys there."

245 Other positive comments included:

> "I felt safe – the staff were lovely people. People were treated as human beings."

An applicant referred to the food being good, including having sausages and toast, boiled eggs and a cooked dinner on Sunday with meat, vegetables and jelly and ice cream. All the girls had to work but this was not seen to be excessive or inappropriate.

"I don't remember anything bad. Years before it may have been horrendous but although hard, I was not abused. I am a survivor not a victim."

Contact with Other Residents and Personnel Post-Care:

All Establishments

246 This section describes what male and female residents told the Forum about contact they had had with other residents or personnel after they had left the care system.

Males: Contact with Other Residents

247 Eighty-two male applicants did not discuss having any contact with other ex-residents. The remaining 43 male applicants mentioned some contact either in the past or more recently with their co-residents from the care system. For four applicants this contact was with their brothers and sisters who had also been in care. Some applicants referred to meeting ex-residents on the street or in social circumstances. A small number of applicants said they met their co-residents while serving custodial sentences. The following comments were made by applicants in regard to contact with other residents with whom they had been in care.

"I had a sequence of custodial sentences and came across some of the lads from ... in other penal establishments. I also saw some of them later when released from custody."

"I have seen a number of my contemporaries over the years, including some when I was in jail."

"I met former residents in prison in England most commonly in... Prison."

"I meet them from time to time in bars and clubs."

"I see former 'home boys' in and around Derry regularly."

"I continue to receive support from an ex-resident."

"I still remain friends with former residents."

An applicant referred to a friend whom he was very close to – they had been in care together. This friend was "like a brother" but he was shot dead soon after being discharged from care.

Contact with Personnel

248 Ninety-nine male applicants said they had no contact with any members of staff from any establishment in which they were placed. Some of those applicants commented very strongly that they had no wish ever to have any form of contact with staff. Twenty-six male applicants said they had recent, distant or ongoing contact with staff from an establishment in which they were placed. Some applicants had actively searched for staff whom they remembered in a positive light as they wished to reconnect and thank them for the kindness they had shown. Applicants made the following comments in regard to contact with staff:

> "I had contact with some members of staff whom I remember fondly."
>
> "I maintained contact with some staff who had been kind to me and I visited them when in Northern Ireland."
>
> "I have subsequently met a staff member from the home and also a former schoolmaster who helped my son at the same school as I had attended."
>
> "I visited the teacher who used to take me to his home during holidays."
>
> "When I was in my thirties I made contact with a staff member to try to get information about my family."
>
> "I visited my housemother some years after having left ... and she apologised to me for her behaviour towards me."

249 Other male applicants made reference to not wishing to have any form of contact with either their co-residents or staff. Some of these applicants chose to move away from Northern Ireland or distance themselves from their counterparts who had also been in care. A few applicants said they wanted to start life afresh and to form relationships without people knowing about their background, for example:

> "I moved to London in my late teens and have remained there ever since."
>
> "I tried to shut out all memories and wanted no contact with others."
>
> "I was gradually distanced from my siblings, a separation that was to last for many years."

Females: Contact with Other Residents

250 Fifty-six female applicants advised the Forum that they had had no contact with other residents after they left their care placements. Seventeen had some contact with other residents on an ongoing basis while seven applicants had established contact more recently. The contact with other residents includes contact with siblings that had not been allowed or encouraged during their placements. Some comments from applicants illustrate the points they wished to make.

> "I've kept in contact with some of the other ex-residents. They were my family."
>
> "No contact was allowed in the home. If you pass another person you know had been there, you would not acknowledge each other. I am still being controlled."
>
> "I regularly attend reunions, I've welcomed other residents into my home and helped them with support…doing what some older residents had done for me."
>
> "With two siblings I attended a reunion of former residents."

Contact with Personnel

251 Sixty-three female applicants told the Forum they had no contact with personnel after they left the establishment in which they were placed. Eight applicants had some ongoing contact, while four applicants had contact in the past but not more recently. Finally, five applicants had made contact with personnel more recently. The following comments and quotations from applicants are typical of the information provided to the Forum.

> "At a reunion 27 years ago I met a teacher who used to beat me with a wooden spoon. I challenged her at the reunion and was told 'I made you a harder and stronger woman'."
>
> "I have continued to have contact with (named officer in charge) over the years."
>
> "I have been in contact with the establishment to try to get information about my siblings and family circumstances."
>
> "I have received an apology from the…for the abuse I experienced in the home they had responsibility for."
>
> "I was fond of one staff member in particular and put flowers on her grave despite all the cruel things I saw her do."
>
> "The staff and other 'laundry girls' made my wedding dress and I was married in the chapel."

One applicant summed up what many said to the Forum:

"I tried to deny ever being there…I was completely ashamed of my placement there. I felt in some way it was my fault."

Education

252 The great majority of applicants, both male and female, who attended the Forum and who were resident in establishments from 1956 to 1975 referred in some way to their education. The information they gave is summarised below.

Males

253 One hundred and nineteen of the 125 males who spoke to the Forum made some comments on their education. The great majority of them remembered their primary education whether in schools nearby or, more commonly, on-site at the establishments in which they were placed. One hundred and five male applicants were of secondary school age when still in establishments. It is notable that some males recalled that the establishment in which they were placed, and that catered for older boys aged eleven upwards, in on-site educational provision, did not provide a secondary school curriculum until the late 1960s. In those circumstances, although those applicants were of secondary school age, they were still receiving education based on the primary level curriculum. Most male applicants reported they finished their compulsory education aged, on average, fourteen or fifteen years.

254 Twenty-five male applicants told the Forum they had participated in some further education. This included attending youth training schemes or courses in colleges of further education. Some applicants went on to join the armed services where they were able to benefit from further education. A small number of applicants, who were in the care system in the 1970s, achieved good GCSE results and went on to university in later life.

255 Many male applicants expressed disappointment at their lack of educational skills and lack of qualifications arising from their educational experiences in care. They described being referred to as "dunces" and to being belittled in the school environment. Many expressed the view that teachers, on the whole, did not treat them as equal to other children in the school setting. Many of the male applicants reflected that their potential went unrecognised or was ignored within the education system.

Females

256 Seventy-eight of the 80 females who spoke to the Forum made some comments concerning their education. The majority of the female applicants had clear recollections of attending primary education, whether on-site at the establishment in which they were placed or in their communities. Slightly fewer female applicants went on to attend secondary school and the vast majority of those attended school in the community, either near their homes or adjacent to the establishment in which they were placed. The majority of applicants finished their formal education aged fourteen or fifteen.

257 Twenty-one female applicants were involved in some form of further education. Many of those had pursued educational opportunities as adults, while a small number undertook vocational training such as secretarial courses, pre-nursing courses or catering courses prior to leaving the establishments in which they were placed.

258 For a majority of female applicants, experiences at school were described as difficult. Applicants spoke of feeling and being treated differently from other pupils and many said they left school unable to read and write. Some said they devised ways of covering up their lack of education and described feelings of inadequacy because of their lack of basic skills. Many applicants expressed a view that their life chances were minimised as a result of poor education and that this left them ill-equipped for life in the outside world.

Period 3: 1976 - 1995

Introduction

259 The Forum heard from 69 males and from 34 females who were in residential establishments covered by the terms of reference of the Inquiry in the period from 1976 to 1995. One male was born in 1959, 39 males and sixteen females were born in the 1960s, 25 males and fifteen females were born in the 1970s, and four males and three females were born in the 1980s.

260 Some applicants had placements in more than one establishment and in more than one type of establishment during their time in care. Initially applicants could have been in voluntary establishments and later in state or juvenile justice establishments or they could have moved to another establishment within the same sector, for example from one state establishment to another.

Placements for Applicants in the Care System

261 One hundred and three applicants were admitted into 47 different establishments during this period. As can be seen from the following table, of the 47 individual establishments, fourteen were in the voluntary sector, 21 in the state sector and twelve were in the juvenile justice sector. Eighteen of these establishments accepted both male and female children, seventeen establishments accepted male children only and twelve establishments accepted female children only.

Category of Establishment	Number of different establishments	Male and Female	Male only	Female only
Voluntary	14	6	4	4
State	21	11	6	4
Juvenile Justice	12	1	7	4
Total	47	18	17	12

Number and Types of Placements

262 Forty-five applicants had one placement in care, 37 applicants had two placements, eleven applicants had three placements, eight applicants had four placements and two male applicants had five placements.

Total number of placements in establishments.

Number of Placements	Male (69)	Female (34)	Total (103)
1	31	14	45
2	25	12	37
3	6	5	11
4	5	3	8
5	2	0	2

- Seventeen applicants moved from a voluntary establishment and, of that number, eight applicants transferred to another voluntary establishment, five applicants transferred to a state establishment and four applicants transferred to a juvenile justice establishment.

- Twenty-six applicants moved from a state establishment and, of that number, seven applicants transferred to a voluntary establishment, six applicants transferred to another state establishment and thirteen applicants transferred to a juvenile justice establishment.
- Fifteen applicants moved from a juvenile justice establishment and, of that number, five applicants transferred to a voluntary establishment and ten applicants transferred to another juvenile justice establishment.

The placement moves of applicants both within and between different categories of care placements were varied and complex, with fewer applicants experiencing a long term placement in one establishment than was evident in Periods 1 and 2.

Circumstances of Admission into the Care System

263 This section describes the circumstances that led to the admission into care of the 69 males and 34 females between 1976 and 1995. As noted previously, most applicants who met the Forum had little or no written information about the circumstances of their admission to care. The information available to the Forum came directly from the applicants and not from official records, as most applicants had no documentation when they met with the Forum. The following paragraphs cover the age range and length of time applicants spent in the care system in Northern Ireland.

Age at Entry to the Care System

264 The age on first admission into the care system of male applicants across the three establishment types ranged from less than one year up to seventeen years of age, with the majority of applicants aged between six years and seventeen years of age on admission. In general, on admission the older males were placed in juvenile justice establishments. Likewise, the age of female applicants on admission into the care system ranged from less than one to seventeen years of age, with the majority of applicants aged between six years and seventeen years of age. The female applicants who were admitted to juvenile justice establishments were aged between thirteen and fifteen on admission.

Duration of Placements in Care System

265 The following table shows that the largest proportion, over fifty per cent, of the 103 applicants who met with the Forum spent between two and five years in the care system in Northern Ireland during this period.

Years in care	Male	Female	Total
< 1 year	21	7	28
2 – 5 years	32	22	54
6 – 10 years	9	4	13
11 – 14 years	7	1	8
15 – 17 years	-	-	-
Total	69	34	103

Age at Discharge from the Care System

266 The majority of both male and female applicants were over fourteen years of age when discharged from the care system in this period as shown in the table below.

Age discharged	Male	Female	Total
<10 years	4	2	6
10 – 13 years	9	3	12
14 – 16 years	31	12	43
17+ years	25	17	42
Total	69	34	103

Reasons for Admission

267 From the information provided by applicants, it was apparent that the main reasons for the admission of the male and female applicants into the care system were as follows:

Reason for Admission	Male	Female	Total
Parents unable to cope	8	7	15
Abandonment	1	4	5
Court orders	50	12	62
Parents deceased	0	1	1

Reason for Admission	Male	Female	Total
Other reasons	2	1	3
No information	8	7	15
Health	-	2	2
Total	69	34	103

268 Most applicants did not have the exact detail of the type of court order under which they were admitted into care. The types of court orders referred to by applicants or documented in papers they brought with them to their meeting with the Forum included, place of safety orders, committal orders – fit person orders, orders for detention and training school orders.

269 The main reason given for admission into care for both males and females was that they were subject to a court order. A large number of the male applicants who were placed in juvenile justice establishments said they were sent to a secure setting because they were truanting from school or for anti-social behaviour such as assault and motor theft. Several applicants were placed in a juvenile justice unit for absconding from their establishments.

270 The second most common reason given by applicants for admission into voluntary and state establishments was that their parents were unable to cope. Some applicants said their parent(s) had a disability or illness, misused alcohol or that there was domestic violence within the family home.

271 Other reasons for admission into care included being abandoned by one or both parents, death of one or both parents, special educational needs, breakdown of fostering or adoptive placements, disability following accidents and unplanned pregnancy in teenage years.

Referral Source/Agencies

272 Two-thirds of the applicants in this period said they were referred to a residential establishment by an organisation or agency of some kind.

In summary:

- The largest number, 43 applicants, said they had been referred by social services or welfare agencies and four applicants said they had been referred by an education authority.

- The second highest number of referrals originated from the courts/ youth justice and the police. Thirteen applicants said they had been referred by the court/youth justice services. Five male applicants and one female applicant said they had been referred by the police.
- One female and two male applicants said to their knowledge, there had been no referral by an organisation.
- Thirty-three applicants did not discuss the referral source.

The information that applicants gave to the Forum about the referral sources is summarised below:

Referral Source/Agency	Male	Female
Not known/not referred	26	10
Welfare authorities	22	21
Local clergy	-	-
Courts	12	1
Police	5	1
NSPCC	1	-
Education	3	1
Total	69	34

Memories of Admission and Changes of Placements

273 This section contains some direct quotations and comments from both male and female applicants on their recollections of their admission into the care system across all three types of designated establishments.

> "I was taken there by a social worker. I believe I was seduced into accepting to go there. From my records I think staff (from first placement) wanted me to go and although the welfare department initially resisted, they then agreed."

> "My parents were alcoholics. We didn't exist to mum and dad, all they wanted was drink. A woman came in a car with no warning. The four of us sat in the car, my parents waved goodbye. We had no idea where we were going. She told us we were going to see horses on a farm, so I was excited. We went up a long driveway and staff took us in. They grabbed my arm roughly. I had never seen a nun before. There was a smell of incense. It was a very dark place. The social worker left and never returned."

"I transferred from…following my sister reporting allegations of abuse. Then I was immediately removed, made a ward of court and placed in another children's home. I was absconding frequently from there and being troublesome generally. Eventually I was sent to a more secure placement."

"We were a big family. There was constant domestic violence, my mother couldn't cope, my father was always drunk and violent."

"I was taken to court and from there to a children's home. I didn't understand the nature of a court order."

"I was admitted because of truanting and antisocial behaviour. My initial placement was for one month but that was repeatedly extended, month by month, to almost a year."

"I was transferred to…as the robbery charges were dropped but replaced with criminal damage charges because of an incident in the previous establishment."

"I was placed in…in the care unit because I had become uncontrollable at home. Although it was a 'care' placement, there was no care."

"I was given a sentence for non-school attendance. My mother was unable to get me to go to school, and following two admissions to…I was then sent to be detained in…for one to three years."

"I was admitted to…but I continued to run away and got caught when I, with others, stole a car. I was glue sniffing at this time too."

"I had three periods of admission: one for breaking a window in my school, another for underage drinking, and the last for assaulting the police when they caught me. My sentences varied from one to three months."

"I was pregnant because I was naive about sexual matters. I told a member of the family who told my mother. Mother was ill with cancer at the time, so a social worker came and took me to…I didn't know where she was taking me."

"My mother had poor health and abandoned me when I was a baby. I had mental health needs as a child and was assessed by a psychologist when in the children's home."

"When my foster placement didn't work out I ran away to (children's home) as I knew my brother lived there and that it was a good place. I was allowed to stay. My mother was still unable to look after us children."

"I was born to a single mum but reared by grand aunts until they died. Then I went to cousins who neglected me. The welfare were always involved with my family."

"My parents were alcoholics and there was domestic violence from my father. My mother left the family home and my father was unable/ unwilling to care for us."

"I was being sexually abused from eight years of age by a close relative. Social Services decided it was not safe for me to remain at home as my mother couldn't protect me."

"I remember trying to climb over the wall at...(first placement) and the social worker getting me into her car (a mini) and driving me to...I remember kicking, screaming and swearing in the back seat. I don't remember being told why I was being sent there."

"I had run away from home and was living rough. After some weeks I was caught by the police and taken to a police station first and then to the home."

Aspects of Care in the Residential Establishments

274 Overall, less than half of the applicants referred to aspects of the standard and extent of care that they received when in their placements in the various establishments. Those applicants who did, spoke about the provision of clothing and food, the standard of personal care they received and, in some cases, about the bedding and heating in their residential establishments. In relation to clothing, bedding and heating, the majority of applicants commented that they had no memory of these aspects of care or made no comments about them. Some applicants, who had more than one care placement, offered some comparisons about the provision of care between the residential establishments in which they had been placed. The views of those who did comment on aspects of care are set out in this section of the report by gender under voluntary provision, state provision and juvenile justice provision.

Males: Voluntary Provision

275 Male applicants spoke to the Forum regarding their experiences of day-to-day living within the establishments in which they were placed. Their opinions of aspects of their care conditions are set out in the tables below. In the tables the numbers refer to placements, not individuals.

Diet

276 Generally, male applicants were satisfied with the quantity and quality of the food provided in their establishments. However, applicants in seven placements were dissatisfied with the food provided, saying that it was monotonous, and applicants who had been in two other placements described food as very poor.

Diet	Voluntary Male Placements
Good	3
Adequate	13
Poor	5
Very Poor	2
Not disclosed/no memory	12
Total	35

Clothing

277 Most applicants who spoke to the Forum about the provision of clothing were very satisfied with what they had received. In Period 3, a clothing allowance was available for each child and greater choice of clothing was possible. The applicants' opinions of the clothing available to them are summarised in the following table.

Clothing	Voluntary Male Placements
Very Good	-
Good	2
Adequate	14
Poor	1
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	18
Total	35

Personal Care

278 Applicants' comments on personal care were mixed. Approximately one third of them described personal care as being poor or very poor. Complaints related to a lack of privacy in shower areas, the lack of availability of adequate hot water and a fear of the shower area where, in some placements, abuse was a constant threat. The following table is a summary of their views.

Personal Care	Voluntary Male Placements
Good	2
Adequate	10
Poor	8
Very Poor	2
Not disclosed/no memory	13
Total	35

Bedding

279 An applicant described the standard of bedding in his placement as very poor, with insufficient blankets and infrequent changes of sheets and pillow covers. Generally, the applicants who made any reference to bedding were at least satisfied with the comfort and warmth of their beds. This aspect of care was not mentioned at all in relation to seventeen of the 35 placements.

Bedding	Voluntary Male Placements
Very Good	-
Good	2
Adequate	14
Poor	1
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	17
Total	35

Heating

280 There were two references to the provision of good heating in the placements and twelve applicants said that the standard of heating was adequate. As can be seen in the table below, this aspect of care was not mentioned by the majority of applicants.

Heating	Voluntary Male Placements
Very Good	-
Good	2
Adequate	12
Poor	-
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	21
Total	35

Work in the Establishments

281 Most of the male applicants who had been in voluntary establishments made no comment on or complaint about having to work or complete chores. Several applicants referred to having routine duties including setting and clearing tables, washing and drying dishes and keeping their bedrooms tidy, but these were not said to be onerous or excessive. A few male applicants referred to a reward system whereby they received pocket money for successfully completing their chores.

282 One applicant, who was fifteen years of age when in his placement, was made to work in the garden instead of attending school and, he believes, his education suffered as a result. Another applicant talked about changing circumstances in relation to work.

> "Work differed over time. Initially there was a big farm and older boys were kept from school to work on the farm. The farm was sold off and we got work and money for picking stones in neighbouring farms and gathering potatoes. I acted as a general handyman in the holidays when most other boys had gone home. I got paid and bought cigarettes and drink."

Religious Practice

283 No reference was made to religious practice by the majority of male applicants who were placed in care during this period. Ten applicants spoke about religious practice in their placements. Seven spoke of religion being a constant feature of their daily living. One of these placements was described by two applicants as placing a huge emphasis on religion to the exclusion of everything else. They said they were constantly told of their sin and the need to clean it away. They went to chapel before breakfast and had other forms of religious observance during the day and each week. Another applicant said the school curriculum was displaced by religious education. Two applicants mentioned attending Mass on Friday and Sunday in another establishment. In contrast, two other applicants described the religious ethos and practice as "not excessive."

Play and Recreation

284 Some applicants commented that there were limited or no play opportunities in their establishments. They referred to a lack of toys and having to play outside with little or no play facilities. Other applicants referred to a TV room, movies, excellent sporting facilities, a swimming pool, an all weather pitch, gymnasium, table tennis room, being taken out on trips and attending a disco. The following comments represent the range of information given to the Forum.

> "It was clear that play was not part of the life in this establishment."
>
> "I spent most of my free time in fields with friends; we were taken to discos near the end of our time there."
>
> "We were taken on camping trips."
>
> "The home had a dog and we enjoyed playing with it."
>
> "I really enjoyed the gymnastics there."
>
> "There were excellent sporting facilities."

Medical Care

285 Only a few of the male applicants who had been in voluntary establishments made comments about, or expressed any concerns in relation to, the medical care provided. The following are some of the comments they made.

> "I have no memory of any medical intervention. I hurt my ankle badly when I jumped from a window; it was left to heal itself. Once, I was taken to the GP but I'm not sure when or what for. I think a social worker took me, not a staff member."

"I had psoriasis; and was told by the hospital not to have baths. But I was given baths despite medical advice to the contrary."

"I was frequently ill and left on my own in my room for four or five days. No one cared when I was there. I was taken to the City Hospital regularly by a staff member who told me I was dying. My condition was never explained by anyone."

Females: Voluntary Provision

286 Thirteen female applicants spoke to the Forum regarding their experiences of day-to-day living in nineteen placements in the voluntary sector. Their opinions of their care conditions are set out in the tables below.

Diet

287 The majority of female applicants did not make any reference to the quantity and quality of the food provided. In five placements, food was described as good or very good while in four placements the provision of food was described as poor or very poor.

Diet	Voluntary Female Placements
Good	2
Adequate	3
Poor	3
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	10
Total	19

Clothing

288 Most female applicants who met the Forum did not refer to the provision of clothing in this period. In four placements clothing was described as adequate and in three it was described as poor. The lack of comment by female applicants on this aspect of their care mirrors the pattern of comment made by male applicants and possibly reflects the availability of clothing allowances and the greater choice afforded in selecting personal clothing.

Clothing	Voluntary Female Placements
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	4
Poor	3
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	12
Total	19

Personal Care

289 Of the ten comments made by female applicants on personal care, five were positive and five were negative. One applicant described herself as "sore from scrubbing." Another applicant spoke of being made to bath in cold water when she wet the bed, but generally the lack of comment suggests that this aspect of their care was not an issue for many applicants. The table below contains a summary of the opinions expressed to the Forum.

Personal Care	Voluntary Female Placements
Good	1
Adequate	4
Poor	4
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	9
Total	19

Bedding

290 Most female applicants did not refer to this aspect of the care they received. The bedding in three placements was described as poor. These placements were in establishments in the early part of Period 3 when dormitory provision was still in use. The sleeping accommodation in that part of this Period was described as cold and lacking in adequate bedding.

The table below highlights the lack of comment on bedding expressed to the Forum.

Bedding	Voluntary Female Placements
Very Good	-
Good	1
Adequate	1
Poor	3
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	14
Total	19

Heating

291 Most of the female applicants who had been cared for in voluntary establishments did not refer to the heating in their accommodation. The table below indicates the pattern of comments made. There were two references to the provision of heating as being below standard and this again refers to older establishments where long corridors and dormitory style sleeping arrangements may have made the provision of adequate heating difficult. One female applicant who had experienced multiple placements in different voluntary establishments referred to one of the establishments as a "cold, unfriendly and unhappy place" and said that she felt "hungry, cold and sore from scrubbing." She described a subsequent placement in positive terms saying, "I would go back now if I could."

Heating	Voluntary Female Placements
Very Good	-
Good	-
Adequate	3
Poor	1
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	14
Total	19

Work in the Voluntary Establishments

292 Several female applicants said that their responsibilities included having to clean the premises. One applicant commented that from the beginning of her placement, she had to scrub the floor and work in the laundry. Another female applicant commented that she had to brush and scrub the floor of the home, even when she was a very young child. One applicant described a range of duties including helping the younger children to get dressed, doing the laundry for her group, especially the bed-wetters and cleaning the floors and toilets.

293 A female applicant recounted that she, along with her two sisters, had to look after the babies and toddlers. A daily routine involved having to dress, toilet and feed the younger children. During term time, the sisters had to complete their chores before having their own breakfast and then get themselves ready for school.

294 Several female applicants placed in voluntary establishments during this time told the Forum that they were responsible for significant household chores within the care establishment. Another female applicant described the duration of her placement in a voluntary establishment as "wretched years."

Religious Practice

295 Eight female applicants made no reference to religious provision during their time in voluntary establishments. Five female applicants talked of Mass, Confession and also prayers. One applicant went on a retreat and two talked of attending church on Sunday. One applicant said she felt humiliated as the children were made to walk to church in "crocodile fashion" along the street.

Play and Recreation

296 Some applicants commented that there were limited or no play opportunities and said that there were few toys and nowhere to play indoors. One applicants said they were not allowed to play: "homework after school and then early to bed." Another applicant spoke of spending her time knitting and sewing clothes for babies. Some applicants described being taken out to the local swimming pool and others referred to a TV room and occasionally watching movies.

Medical Care

297 Six of the female applicants commented on the medical care provided. Three said there was a general practitioner linked to the establishment. Two others told the Forum that they were given medication and one of these said she was misdiagnosed with epilepsy when she actually had a heart condition.

General Comments

298 Both male and female applicants who had moved from one establishment to another in the voluntary sector said the care they received varied from establishment to establishment. Some described the care system within establishments as good, while others said that the care they received was deficient. The quotations and comments that follow are typical of what those who described poor experiences told the Forum.

> "My world was gone. I have keen memories of a cold wind whistling in long corridors, darkness and no opportunity to be a child. If you acted like a child you were punished."
>
> "It was like hell in the middle of nowhere."
>
> "It was like a concentration camp. I hated the place. You were treated like an animal."
>
> "It was horrible, I was very unhappy there. I was denigrated; I was punished unreasonably and on occasions locked out in a type of solitary confinement. I can't recall any positive experiences."

An applicant said that he cried himself to sleep and he did not know why he was there. Another applicant referred to feeling very isolated as he had no one to turn to.

299 Some of the applicants were placed in a large establishment with chalet style accommodation and a house-parent staff model. They referred to the house parents taking responsibility for general household tasks and one said "the home was good" and "I really liked this home."

300 One applicant who had been placed in two establishments made comparisons between both placements commenting:

> "In the second you were treated with kindness, showered with attention and food, unlike the first."

Some applicants commented on the differences in staff behaviour within the same establishment noting that some staff were good but others were not. One applicant said several times that he was very happy in the establishment but qualified this by saying "except for the abuse."

301 One applicant reflected that he felt well cared for and respected. Another applicant said he really enjoyed the place and the freedom. He said that the residents were allowed to go out and they were taken for trips in the minibus. One applicant said:

> "It was such a relief – like a holiday camp" and another stated that it was a "real escape from the abuse suffered at home with my parents."

Males: State Provision

302 The male applicants who in total had experienced 32 placements in state establishments in this period said little about the nature and adequacy of their care. The information they provided on aspects of their care is set out in the following paragraphs.

Diet

303 Seven applicants considered the food provided in their placements to be adequate or good. There was no reference to this aspect of care in respect of 25 placements.

Diet	State
Male Placements
Good	2
Adequate	5
Poor	-
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	25
Total	32

Clothing

304 Comments about the provision of clothing in 24 of the 32 placements in state provision were few. In one placement the clothing provided was described as poor and in seven others it was described as adequate or better.

Clothing	State
Male Placements
Good	2
Adequate	5
Poor	1
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	24
Total	32

Personal Care

305 Few comments were made by male applicants about the standards of personal care in respect of 24 of the 32 placements in state sector establishments. Six of the establishments were described as providing adequate or good care while provision in two establishments was described as poor.

Personal Care	State
Male Placements
Good	2
Adequate	4
Poor	2
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	24
Total	32

Bedding

306 No comments were made to the Forum about the provision of bedding in 25 of the 32 placements in state provision. Four placements were described as good or adequate and bedding was described as comfortable. In three of the placements, the provision of bedding was described as very poor.

Bedding	State
Male Placements
Good	1
Adequate	3
Poor	-
Very Poor	3
Not disclosed/no memory	25
Total	32

Heating

307 Four placements were described as having adequate or good heating. There was no comment made about heating in the other 28 placements in the state sector.

Heating	State
Male Placements
Good	1
Adequate	3
Poor	-
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	28
Total	32

Work in the Establishments

308 The male applicants who had been in state establishments made no mention of having to work. Three applicants referred to having to complete routine tasks such as cleaning shoes and laying the table, but these were not described as excessive or onerous.

Religious Practice

309 None of the applicants in state sector care made any comment or complaint about religious practices.

Play and Recreation

310 Male applicants who commented on play and recreation spoke of having access to a pool table, a playground, a trip to an amusement park and being taken swimming.

Medical Care

311 No comments or complaints were made about medical care. Five male applicants said they had placements in a medical facility. One male applicant referred to dental care.

Females: State Provision

312 The female applicants who spoke to the Forum had been in 26 placements in the state sector provision. The following paragraphs outline the information they provided to the Forum on aspects of their care.

Diet

313 The majority of female applicants who were in placements in the state sector did not comment on the food provided. The food in seven placements was described as adequate or good whilst in four placements the food was described as poor or very poor.

Diet	State
Female Placements
Good	4
Adequate	3
Poor	2
Very Poor	2
Not disclosed/no memory	15
Total	26

Clothing

314 The large majority of female applicants did not comment on the clothing provided in their placements. The seven who did described the standard of clothing as adequate or good.

Clothing	State
Female Placements
Good	4
Adequate	3
Poor	-
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	19
Total	26

Personal Care

315 The majority of female applicants who were in placements in the state sector did not comment about their personal care. The standard of provision in nine placements was described as adequate or good whilst in three placements personal care was described as poor or very poor.

Personal Care	State
Female Placements
Good	6
Adequate	3
Poor	2
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	14
Total	26

Bedding

316 Most female applicants who were in placements in the state sector did not comment on the standard of their bedding. The quality of provision in five placements was described as adequate or good whilst the provision in one placement was described as very poor.

Bedding	State
Female Placements
Good	3
Adequate	2
Poor	-
Very Poor	1
Not disclosed/no memory	20
Total	26

Heating

317 The majority of female applicants who were in placements in the state sector did not comment on the provision of heating. The standard of heating in five placements was described as adequate or good whilst in respect of one placement it was described as poor.

Heating	State
Female Placements
Good	4
Adequate	1
Poor	1
Very Poor	-
Not disclosed/no memory	20
Total	26

General Comments

318 Comments made by female applicants about their placements in state provision varied widely with some describing the placements as very cold and lacking in human kindness while other applicants said that they had no concerns regarding their care in a placement, describing it as "superb" and saying that they had "no complaints."

Work in the Establishments

319 Three applicants referred to having to complete routine chores such as making beds, assisting with cooking and preparation of the dining room for meals. None of these applicants described the allocated tasks as excessive and no one referred to being made to work for their establishment.

Religious Practice

320 None of the female applicants in state sector care made any comment or complaint about religious practices.

Play and Recreation

321 The female applicants spoke of visiting the cinema and other age-appropriate activities. Some applicants who had previously experienced placements in larger establishments spoke of the pleasure of having more freedom in smaller state establishments to which they had been transferred.

Medical Care

322 There were no comments or complaints made about medical care. Two female applicants said they had had placements in a medical facility. One female applicant said she was taken to see a child psychiatrist. She was unclear as to why that consultation had occurred.

Aspects of care in Juvenile Justice Provision

323 The first part of this section summarises the comments about aspects of their care that male applicants, who had been in 62 placements in the juvenile justice sector, made to the Forum. The second part of this section summarises the comments about aspects of their care made to the Forum by female applicants who had been in 20 placements in the juvenile justice sector.

324 Juvenile justice provision accommodated young people who were less than eighteen years of age. Most of the applicants who met with the Forum were sent to these establishments under a court order for a specified period of time. Applicants described the juvenile justice establishments in which they were placed as being largely single gender units, but there were some applicants who were placed in mixed gender units.

Males: Juvenile Justice Provision

325 One third or less of male applicants spoke to the Forum about their experiences of day-to-day living within the establishments in which they had been placed as children. Their opinions of their care conditions in the 62 placements are set out in the table below.

Aspects of care	Good	Adequate	Poor	Very bad	No memory/ not disclosed	Total placements
Food	7	12	4	-	39	62
Clothing	1	9	3	-	49	62
Heat	1	5	-	2	54	62
Bedding	4	10	2	1	45	62
Personal care	1	9	6	5	41	62

As is evident from the table, the majority of applicants did not discuss any aspects of their care in juvenile justice establishments. Many of their placements were of short duration and where negative comments were made about aspects of care, for example, personal care, these related to a perception that the shower area was unsafe because it was an area where males were susceptible to being attacked either physically or sexually. Applicants who described poor clothing referred to having to wear uniform-style clothing belonging to the establishment that could identify the applicants. Those who spoke about inadequate bedding referred to single cell units, used as isolation accommodation, where mattresses were on the floor and bedding was limited.

326 In summary, two thirds of the applicants in juvenile justice placements made no comment in relation to clothing, food and personal care. A number of applicants described the care provision in their placements as good or adequate. Other applicants described their experiences of being in care very differently. One applicant said that "the law of the jungle reigned" and another applicant said that it was "very disciplined, like a concentration camp, a cruel place." Another applicant expressed similar views: "It was a sectarian aggressive regime ruled by violence, a cold harsh regime, very harsh and unsympathetic, and violence by staff and other residents was the norm."

Work in the Juvenile Justice Establishments

327 Most male applicants in juvenile justice placements did not refer to being made to work for their establishments. The male applicants who did refer to work said they had to clean their cells to a high standard and talked of having to repeat the task if the result was deemed to fall below the required standard. A few alleged that fault was deliberately found by staff and, perversely and provocatively, some staff criticised the cleaning and insisted on it being re-done even when it was satisfactory. Other applicants recounted that they were made to do the following chores:

- scrub metal buckets
- clean pots
- prepare vegetables in the kitchen
- look after livestock
- work as an orderly.

328 Some of the work that applicants spoke about may have been part of a vocational training programme, for example, bricklaying, car mechanics, carpentry and gardening.

Religious Practice

329 One male applicant spoke of having to attend chapel every morning where the sermons were always on the perils of breaking the law and being a bad person. Two other applicants spoke of attending Mass and one of them said that there was only a Bible to read in the solitary confinement accommodation.

Recreation

330 The male applicants who commented on recreational facilities and activities mentioned cycling, football, swimming, snooker and pool, a camping trip and a recreation room with a radio in it. One applicant described the facilities in his placement as being very limited saying "I walked about like a dog in a cage." Two others spoke of physical education being used as a punishment and having to do a military-type drill.

Medical Care

331 Three male applicants spoke about being admitted to hospital as the result of drug overdoses. Two applicants who had self-harmed stated that the staff had been instructed not to call for an ambulance. Three male applicants complained that they were not taken to hospital or did not receive medical treatment when they felt it was required, for example, following an assault by another resident or when stitches were required for a wound near an applicant's eye following an assault by a member of staff.

332 Several applicants commented that there was an on-site nurse/matron. One applicant said that he was escorted to the doctor by four members of staff. One applicant said that the residents were given a medical examination on admission and were made to strip. One applicant said he saw a psychologist during his time in his placement.

Females: Juvenile Justice Provision

333 Female applicants spoke to the Forum about their experiences of day-to-day living in the establishments in which they had been placed. Their opinions of their care conditions in the twenty placements are set out in the table below.

Aspects of care	Good	Adequate	Poor	Very bad	No memory/ not disclosed	Total placements
Food	-	5	4	2	9	20
Clothing	-	6	1	-	13	20
Heat	-	3	-	-	17	20
Bedding	-	3	4	2	11	20
Personal care	-	5	3	3	9	20

As is evident from the table above, the majority of applicants did not discuss any aspects of their care in juvenile justice establishments and those who choose to speak about care conditions said they were adequate. In two placements, the food was described as "disgraceful" and poor bedding was spoken of in the context of isolation rooms. The regime was described as harsh and cold with very strict conditions and limited liberty within the establishment, which most young females found very challenging. One applicant spoke of her humiliation when on admission she was made to undress and provided only with paper undergarments and a gown. She advised the Forum that she was offered no explanation as to why this was necessary.

Work in the Establishment

334 Female applicants in the juvenile justice sector recounted being made to clean and polish the floors on their knees. Some of them said they had to work in the kitchen. One said that > "the staff didn't have to do any work as the girls were doing all the cooking and cleaning."

Other applicants spoke of undertaking chores, including one who commented that there was a cleaning rota and the chores had to be completed before attending school. Another applicant said she had to prepare her own meals as part of her "leaving care plan." One applicant said she had to work in the stitching room.

Religious Practice

335 One female applicant said there were prayers in the chapel before school and Mass every Sunday. One applicant said she was not in favour of having to attend Mass but did so in order to receive her daily allowance of five cigarettes.

Recreation

336 Three female applicants said there was no games room. Other female applicants said there was a television for residents and they were taken to a swimming pool and to the cinema.

Medical Care

337 Five female applicants spoke of being admitted to hospital, in two cases as a result of taking an overdose of drugs. Two applicants who had self harmed stated that the staff had been instructed not to call for an ambulance. The establishments were described as having a designated person on the premises who dealt with most medical requirements.

All Establishments: Inspection, Positive Experiences, Experiences of Discharge from Care, Contact with Others, Education

338 This section covers the experiences described by applicants in establishments in all three types of provision: voluntary, state and juvenile justice in Period 3, 1976 to 1995. It covers the following areas: inspections and other visits and positive comments made by applicants in respect of establishments in which they were placed.

Memories of Inspection and Visits from Outside Organisations and Agencies

339 Most applicants had no recollection or did not speak of their memories or recollections of visits from people who came from outside the establishment.

340 Three applicants, two males who had been in juvenile justice establishments and one female who had been in a voluntary establishment, referred to Inspections. One of the male applicants referred to inspectors coming and to the usual routines being changed. For example, the residents would normally get their breakfast from a hatch and when finished would put their leftovers in the "slop bucket" but, when the inspectors came, the staff removed the plates from the residents' tables. This applicant said that members of staff were always present when the inspectors were on site and the inspectors did not speak with the residents. The other male applicant referred to the board of visitors coming to the establishment and asking residents if everything was satisfactory. He alleged that members of staff had warned the boys in advance of the inspectors' visit, that they would be "beaten to death" if they spoke to inspectors about what was going on in the establishment.

341 A female applicant explained that she was around twelve years old when she saw social workers for the first time and they visited her every three months. However, she said she felt that no one cared and she was not allowed to talk about life in the establishment. She spoke of visitors/inspectors and having to read for them and sensing that she was chosen as she was an attractive child who could be put forward to bring credit to the establishment. This applicant said that the establishment was always cleaned before any outsiders arrived. She recounted that none of the visitors spoke to her and she was not allowed to speak to them and the staff were always present.

Positive Experiences

342 There were many positive comments made by applicants who met with the Forum in respect of the establishments in which they were placed. These are set out below by establishment type.

Males and Females: Voluntary Establishments

343 Most applicants did not recall or refer to any positive experiences in their placements. The others who did spoke of staff working in the establishments, visits by family members, activities such as sport, trips and outings and weekend contacts with family members. Some applicants regarded their placement in an establishment as, overall, a very positive experience. The following is a selection of the applicants' comments with some quotations.

- An applicant described a member of staff as "brilliant" and said that she got on well with her.
- Another described a member of staff as "an angel, a great woman, a brilliant woman – care was good when you were in her group."
- One named a volunteer who was excellent and always kind, as was her teacher at school.
- One applicant recalled that the staff and residents were kind to her. She remembered being spoilt as the older people in an adjoining care facility would insist that she have some of their food and told her "you need this more than me."
- An applicant identified a member of staff as a positive, caring woman who would give the boys a cuddle. He thinks she was aware of the abuse he was experiencing as she said to him "They will be caught and pay for this one day." He excused her for not telling because she was an older woman and, he concluded, her job would have been at risk.
- One spoke of a senior member of staff who was great but unfortunately left.
- Another described a number of people as "good" including an older boy whom he said "looked out for you" as did a gardener and a maintenance man.

- Another stated that many of the staff were very good, but said that it was those who were in a religious order who caused most concern.
- Another applicant said that "there were some fantastic members of staff in there who would do anything for you."
- One applicant looked forward to his parents' visits although he said that they were very rare.
- An applicant spoke of having good friends among the other boys.

344 Other applicants referred to the enjoyment they experienced in the production of a Christmas play and being part of the production team, playing with the dog and playing on a boat in the garden of the establishment. Some appreciated being taken on fishing trips by a member of staff who was "like a dad", and one remembered liking football, having a good maths teacher and getting two 'O' levels; another applicant spoke of having the opportunity to go on a six week trip to the USA.

345 Some said that they were allowed to attend the disco in a neighbouring village and another applicant, in addition to the disco, mentioned holidays in a seaside town and a visit from a celebrated footballer. An applicant described one establishment as:

> "a fantastic place, fantastic team, amazing. I loved this home – I loved it so much that I didn't leave until I was eighteen and a half years old when I should really have left when I was eighteen years old. I would go back now if I could."

Males and Female: State Provision

346 Most applicants who had been placed in state establishments made no reference to positive experiences in their placements. The minority who did spoke warmly about certain members of staff, contact with family, friendship with co-residents, organised activities and weekend leave. A female applicant said that the senior member of staff in her establishment was very good and explained that the children received an allowance for clothing, were allowed to have a friend around from school and could go into town to shop. Another applicant spoke warmly about the teaching staff and a carer she described as firm but kind. One applicant became so fond of the senior staff in the establishment who showed him warmth and affection that he visited them some years later. Some applicants spoke favourably in relation to most of the staff in their establishments. One female explained that a couple of staff were her favourites and said "they did not abuse you." One applicant commented that:

> "the care staff were nice people…all local; they were elderly but did not appear to really understand the needs of those placed there."

She described them as being like "nice grandparents."

347 An applicant was thankful that all the children in his family were placed together in an establishment. His brothers were in the same room and his sisters in a separate room but nearby. He described the placement as "a saviour for us all." He said that they were given a clothing allowance, permitted to help themselves from the fridge and given pocket money. Another applicant liked receiving pocket money and having weekly outings.

348 One applicant said that they looked forward to going home on weekends but hated returning to the establishment. Another applicant spoke of being very settled in her placement and had no complaints, whilst another said that the children in his establishment appeared to be allowed to have a more "normal" teenage life: "I liked it." One applicant referred to being moved from one establishment to another and said that the second establishment was "a gift" in comparison to the other.

Male and Female: Juvenile Justice Establishments

349 Most applicants did not mention any positive experiences in their placements. The following comments and quotations are illustrative of the information provided by those who did. An applicant complimented two of his teachers saying they were "gentlemen and good teachers." Other applicants described the staff as follows:

> "…firm but kind; most of the staff were very good and caring, supportive."
>
> "…some of the staff were 100 per cent, dead on, brilliant, very good to me, kind and helpful, got me through."
>
> "…great, dead on. One member of staff was good, gentle as a lamb and another was a lovely man."

350 A male applicant commented that his mother would come and visit him and that the teachers were good. One applicant referred to feeling positive when he had his own bedroom – proper food, a quilt that he described as "fresh", he ate at proper times and liked the "smell of cleanliness". He was excited at having a structure to his day. One applicant described positive experiences as follows:

> "I was able to settle. There were good staff, I made friends, I had sporting opportunities, I got home at weekends, I loved the food in there and went back for seconds. Seven cigarettes a day were issued plus some extra cigarettes given personally by staff."

An applicant spoke of "some decent staff" but felt that when she found staff she could trust, they seemed to be moved away. One applicant said that she:

"loved it, the best place ever. The staff were so good to you, the nuns were brilliant, completely different – I cried when I left. I am still in contact with them."

Another applicant felt that the nuns liked her because, she believes, she was so "brutally honest." One described the staff in one establishment as being "good people"; it was "a respite" from a previous placement as there was no abuse.

351 A female applicant said that her mum would visit every two weeks and because she was one of the youngest and smallest residents, the older girls "treated me as the wee sister they never had." Two members of staff she described as "good" would also take her out. Other applicants also mentioned visits as positive memories. For example, one said his mother, brother and his girlfriend would visit him "I liked that place." Another referred to her dad visiting every Saturday when she would be taken shopping for clothes. One applicant said that visits home during some holiday periods such as Christmas and Easter were especially positive memories. Some applicants enjoyed being allowed to go home on occasional weekends. One explained "you were allowed to go home providing you had not misbehaved." An applicant who had experienced abuse acknowledged that "there were some good times in the place."

Experiences of Discharge from Care and Post-Care Support from all Establishments

352 In this period several applicants had more than one placement so their discharge from one establishment was often into another placement. Final discharge for most applicants was to their own family.

Male Applicants

353 Only five of the 69 male applicants spoke about the post-care support provided for them. The remaining 64 applicants said none was available or did not mention it. Two of the male applicants spoke of ongoing support and contact with their social workers for some time after they were discharged from care. One was provided with a flat in the community and the other had a job arranged for him by his probation officer. The following comments illustrate different experiences in the post-care period.

> "I was collected by a male social worker. I'd never seen him before and prior to that I didn't know I was going home. I've no memory of any preparation for going home. When I got there, I discovered a new brother and sister."

> "When I reached school leaving age I moved into foster care for about six weeks. From there I went back to my grandfather and stayed for a few months and then moved into digs in the nearest town. I got a place on a youth training scheme and on the way to a job interview I heard my father had died. I went into depression, became homeless and ended up in a refuge for alcoholics."

Female Applicants

354 Many of the female applicants returned home or went to foster families on their discharge from voluntary care provision. The following points illustrate what they told the Forum:

> "I returned to the family without any further assistance."

> "I was unprepared for independent living."

> "I received no support having left the establishment; I was just gone."

355 Two female applicants referred to ongoing support and contact with their social worker and from staff in their establishment, which continues to the present day. Three females talked of being provided with a flat; one of these also received a £1,000 leaving care community grant. The other two applicants were found places in community accommodation. Two had also been given some basic items, for example, a towel and some food which they considered very limited, and they commented that they received no money. They were unable to cook or manage money and found the accommodation frightening because of the behaviour of some of the other residents.

Contacts with Other Residents: All Establishments

356 For the majority of applicants from this period it is unknown what, if any, contact they have had with other residents after leaving an establishment. Very few details were provided but just over twenty applicants said they had contact both recently and in the past with former residents. Some of the applicants mentioned contact solely in the past: ten said they had only had contact recently; twenty said they had had no contact at all. Others made no mention of contacts. Most often, the contact that applicants had with other former residents was contact with their siblings with whom they had been placed into care.

Contact with Other Staff and Personnel: All Establishments

357 Very few applicants mentioned having contact with staff or personnel from the establishments in which they had been placed. In some cases, where they had had contact, this had been a chance meeting, for example where the person lived in their local area or the meeting had been in relation to a court case. One applicant mentioned a former member of staff who used to visit him when he was in prison and with whom he would meet occasionally for lunch after his release.

Chapter 5:

Chapter 5: Applicants' Experiences of Abuse

Introduction

1 The definitions of abuse, including neglect, as set by the Inquiry are as follows:

> "Abuse was behaviour which either (a) involved improper sexual or physical behaviour by an adult or another child towards a child; or (b) in the case of emotional abuse, was improper behaviour by an adult or another child which undermined a child's self-esteem and emotional well-being, such as bullying, belittling or humiliating a child; or (c) resulted in neglect of the child; or (d) took the form of adopting or accepting policies and practices, such as numbering children or ignoring or undermining sibling relationships; which ignored the interests of the children."

2 It is important, when reflecting on the applicants' accounts of the residential care they had received as children in designated establishments, to be aware of the different contexts and ways in which they experienced the abuse they allege. Emotional abuse, although for some applicants a matter of a one-off incident, was, according to many others, the outcome of recurring denigration or intimidation by care staff and/or other residents. Physical abuse was reported similarly, in other words as something that more often was ongoing than one-off and perpetrated by staff and other residents, although individual extreme incidents were alleged. Sexual abuse, for some participants, was an individual incident and for others ongoing; the alleged perpetrators included care and ancillary staff, teaching staff and other residents. Neglect was cumulative in its effects and not often referred to as the outcome of an individual occurrence. References to neglect touched on aspects of continuing care within the establishments and the nature and appropriateness of the education they had received.

3 Chapter 5 sets out the abuse that the 428 applicants who met with the Forum allege occurred when they were placed in the care of designated establishments in Northern Ireland from 1922 to 1995. There are three main parts to this chapter namely: abuse that occurred in establishments that were provided by the voluntary sector, abuse in establishments provided by the state sector and finally abuse in establishments that were within the juvenile justice sector. The abuse is described in three broad periods:

- Period 1 – 1922 to 1955
- Period 2 – 1956 to 1975
- Period 3 – 1976 to 1995

Period 1: 1922-1955

Introduction

4 This section of the chapter sets out the experiences of 47 male and 25 female applicants when they were placed in the care of 23 establishments in Northern Ireland from 1922 to 1955. The section is divided into three: abuse alleged in voluntary establishments, abuse alleged in state establishments and abuse alleged to have occurred in juvenile justice establishments. Each part of this section describes the experiences of the male and female applicants separately.

Abuse in Voluntary Establishments

5 Thirty-six male applicants spoke of abuse in six voluntary establishments. They did not necessarily use the terms adopted in this report to distinguish between the different types of abuse, but rather spoke of what they experienced as part of the narrative they gave in describing their childhood in designated establishments.

6 Twenty-four female applicants spoke of abuse in six voluntary establishments. As with their male counterparts, most of them described experiences that included one or more types of abuse. Only three female applicants reported sexual abuse, whereas fifteen of the male applicants alleged they were sexually abused.

7 A small minority – including some of those who left Northern Ireland as young children to travel to Australia through the child migrant scheme – had no memory of their care in voluntary establishments in Northern Ireland and no recollections of the kinds of abuse that many of the others described. For those who were sent to Australia as young children, and indeed for those who were older when they left Northern Ireland, their concerns related to the selection process for Australia and how separation impacted on their parental, sibling and extended family relationships and on the friendships they had developed in their establishments in Northern Ireland. Some applicants also commented that in addition to the separation from loved ones, the loss of cultural identity compounded their feelings of anxiety.

Types of Abuse:

Males: Voluntary Provision

8 The thirty-six male applicants who had been cared for in voluntary establishments referred to one or more types of abuse when speaking to the Forum. The combinations of types of abuse and the number of applicants who reported these are summarised in the table that follows.

Combinations of Abuse Types	Males	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	7	4
Physical, emotional and neglect	9	3
Physical, sexual and emotional	5	2
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	2	2
Physical and emotional	3	2
Physical and sexual	3	2
Emotional and neglect	-	-
Emotional and sexual	-	-
Emotional, sexual and neglect	-	-
Emotional	4	1
Sexual	-	-
Physical	2	1
Neglect	1	1
Total	36	6 different establishments

9 The same establishment was named by eighteen of those alleging abuse. Physical abuse was alleged by each of those applicants, in addition to other forms of abuse or neglect. Another institution was named by thirteen of those alleging abuse in respect of one or more types of abuse or neglect. Physical abuse was alleged by nine of those applicants, in addition to other forms of abuse or neglect.

10 It is important to emphasise that the table above at paragraph 8 does not indicate the number or frequency of individual incidents of abuse or neglect but, rather, the total number of times particular types of abuse or neglect were mentioned by the male applicants in their meetings with the Forum.

Physical Abuse

11 Thirty-one of the men who had been cared for in voluntary establishments in Period 1 reported that particular members of staff were persistent, vicious and wilful in hitting them. There were:

- Twenty reports of physical abuse in one establishment
- Six reports of physical abuse in another establishment
- Two reports of physical abuse in a third establishment
- Three reports of physical abuse, one in each of three establishments

Descriptions of Physical Abuse

12 Various means of inflicting pain were mentioned by applicants, including the flat of a hand, a fist, a bunch of keys, a cane, a stick, the leg of a chair, a broom handle, hurling sticks, feet, a leather strap and a belt. Added to these were allegations that some staff pulled boys by their sideburns; four members of staff were said to have lifted boys that way and also by their ears. Throughout their accounts of the physical abuse they reported, the applicants referred to it being intended as a punishment for a misdemeanour on some occasions and on others as gratuitous violence by people – care staff and older boys – who were out of control.

13 One man said that the beatings he received from a member of the religious care staff began when he moved into the "juniors section" from the nursery. He said he was beaten constantly by this person – "she took a dislike to me" – and beaten occasionally by other religious care staff. He added that the instruments used to beat him included the leg of a chair. Another man, referring to the same member of staff, said that he was beaten with a stick "a bit like a billiard cue", and that she used her belt to beat him and other children on the head. The same member of staff was reported by another applicant as using a bunch of keys to strike the children and, from time to time, this resulted in cuts and bruises. He added that when the local parish priest called and noticed the injuries, he told the religious care staff that this practice had to stop.

14 Several men spoke of being beaten on the bare buttocks with a stick by religious care staff, sometimes for bed-wetting and on other occasions, as far as they were concerned, for no reason at all. One reason given for a beating was that the applicant as a young boy had been found in bed without his hands crossed on his chest, the required position for sleep as far as care staff were concerned. He said that the older boys would check for this kind of forgetfulness and punish the younger boys accordingly.

Physical Abuse by more than one Person

15 Twenty-nine of the men who reported physical abuse indicated the following:

- Twenty-one reported abuse by one person.
- Four reported abuse by two people, either separately or concurrently.
- Two reported abuse by three people, either separately or concurrently.
- Two did not identify how many people were involved in their abuse.

The Roles of Alleged Abusers

16 Applicants who recounted physical abuse were able to recall the roles or status of those who had abused them. The majority of those referred to were members of the care staff and, in most instances, were members of a religious order. It is noteworthy that of the total of 31 alleged abusers, 22 were members of a religious order or clergy. The details recalled by applicants are set out in the following table.

Roles of Alleged Abusers	Male	Female	Members of Religious Order/ Clergy
Officer in charge/authority figure	-	7	7
Care staff	2	14	15
Teacher/instructor	1	-	-
Former resident	-	-	-
Other resident	7	-	-
Visitor	-	-	-
Ancillary worker	-	-	-
Totals	10	21	22

Physical Abuse by Older Boys

17 Seven of the male applicants also described the rough treatment they received from older boys who, they said, had been given responsibility by the religious care staff to look after them at certain times of day. The applicants alleged that the older boys slapped, punched and kicked them, all in the guise of ensuring that they were behaving properly and punishing them when they considered it necessary. None of the applicants could remember any of the religious care staff intervening when older boys punished – or attacked – younger boys physically and in excess.

Sexual Abuse

18 Fifteen of the men who had been in voluntary establishments reported being subjected to sexual abuse. There were ten reports of sexual abuse in one establishment.

19 The abuse they alleged was perpetrated by officers in charge/authority figures, care staff, ancillary staff and by other, usually older, residents. Some experienced sexual abuse as young children, others when they were in their teenage years and almost all of them witnessed sexual abuse of other children or knew of this happening in their establishments. Some of the older boys (fifteen to twenty-year-olds) who were alleged abusers, were said to be former residents who had been kept on by some establishments to work in laundering, baking, farming and general maintenance. One applicant described one of these boys as not being the full shilling. A few of the applicants also spoke of former residents being able to come back to what had been their establishment and having free access to the premises and children, including after bed-time when they also had opportunities to abuse the children.

The Types and Extent of Sexual Abuse

20 The fifteen male applicants who recounted sexual abuse reported this abuse in combination with other types of abuse. None reported sexual abuse on its own.

21 The types of sexual abuse referred to ranged from witnessing abuse to anal rape. The full range of types and number of reports of sexual abuse by establishment are set out in the following table.

Types of sexual abuse	Number of Reports*	Number of establishments
Anal rape	5	3
Coercive peer abuse	4	2
Grooming	1	1
Inappropriate fondling	4	2
Masturbation of alleged abuser by child	2	2

Types of sexual abuse	Number of Reports*	Number of establishments
Masturbation of child by alleged abuser	1	1
Oral genital contact	2	2
Witnessing abuse	4	3
Other	2	2

Note: "Reports" relates to the number of references to abuse made by applicants during their meetings with the Forum rather than to the number of individual instances of each type of sexual abuse which, for some applicants, allegedly occurred weekly for several years.

22 The sexual abuse described by applicants occurred in a number of places including dormitories, toilets, sheds, boiler houses, changing and shower areas. The types of sexual abuse reported included genital fondling, masturbation, oral sex and anal rape. For some applicants, the sexual abuse incidents were few but for most the abuse was ongoing.

23 One applicant, who found it very difficult to discuss the details of his abuse and became very emotional as he tried to describe what happened, said that he was abused by "a bloke who worked in the sewing room" who made him masturbate him. The man also took him to the showers, made him strip and beat him severely with a sally rod. Another applicant described being stretched on a laundry rack and being anally raped by older residents and by a priest attached to a local parish. Others referred to genital fondling, masturbation and anal rape by care staff and older residents and indicated that these practices occurred frequently and were well-known to other children. One man said that he was sexually abused "by various people" and that the assaults took place "in the home many times." The applicants conveyed an impression of some establishments where sexual abuse – as well as emotional and physical abuse – was endemic, part of everyday life for some children.

Sexual Abuse: Roles of Alleged Abusers

24 Those referred to as abusers included other residents, with care staff and ancillary workers and a visiting priest also being mentioned. Five of the seven adults mentioned as abusers were members of a religious order.

Roles of Alleged Abusers	Males
Officer in charge/authority figure	2
Care staff including ancillary	4
Teacher/instructor	-
Former resident	-
Other resident	9
Visitor	1
Total	16

Emotional Abuse

25 This section of the report refers to emotional abuse that was alleged to have been experienced in voluntary establishments in the period from 1922 to 1955. Emotional abuse covers a range of actions and inactions that deprived the applicants of family and sibling contact, knowledge of their own identity, affection, approval and protection from harm. In their descriptions of emotional abuse, applicants most often referred to practices and routines, such as the separation of siblings, the removal of personal belongings and not being treated as individuals, all of which affected them deeply.

Nature and Extent of Emotional Abuse

26 Twenty-six of the male applicants made 28 reports of emotional abuse. There were:

- Fifteen reports of emotional abuse in one establishment
- Eleven reports of emotional abuse in another establishment
- Two reports of emotional abuse – one in each of two other establishments.

27 The applicants described a number of factors that may have contributed to the emotional abuse they said they experienced. One of the main factors was the fear engendered by the threat of physical punishment and abuse from staff and older boys. In the latter case they spoke of bullying and of "a free rein" being given to the older boys who were placed in charge of the younger boys. They said that life for younger boys was characterised by a sense of threat, with physical abuse meted out by older boys under the guise of "punishment" for some minor misdemeanour or even under a false pretext. One applicant spoke of older boys blaming the younger children for their own misdemeanours and in this way justifying their abusive behaviour. Several described the fear they felt from seeing other children being beaten by staff and older boys, with one saying that witnessing other boys being beaten was "the very distressing norm". Witnessing sexual abuse was another cause of the fear and anxiety that many applicants recalled.

Personal Emotional Abuse

28 Some applicants referred to the use of verbal abuse as a dispiriting and hurtful experience and means of control. They spoke of name-calling, of being referred to solely by a number, of being told lies about their families – for example, one man had been told that his mother was dead and only found out years later that she was alive when he was in an establishment. They also spoke of family denigration and of being mocked and belittled publicly for bed-wetting.

29 One applicant recalled being told by a member of the care staff that:

> "when you are dying on your death bed, you will want a glass of water and there will be no one there to give it to you."

This statement has remained with him and still pains him when he recalls it. Another applicant, reflecting what others implied, said that he had been subject to verbal abuse by nuns, who were care staff, and by older boys to such an extent that he thought it was normal. He added that the nuns always made him – and the other children – look down when they were being spoken to and he blamed this for his life-long difficulty in looking at others "in the eye" and standing up for himself. He was convinced this has disadvantaged him in work and life more generally. As he saw it, he thinks he has always been regarded as "shifty" because of his reluctance to make eye contact. Comments made by others included:

> "I was not referred to by name, only a number, the number used to identify clothing."
>
> "I was referred to as a piss bag as I wet the bed."

30 Witnessing the humiliation of other children was another factor in the emotional abuse recounted by some of the men. Humiliation was mentioned a number of times in association with bed-wetting; applicants spoke of this from direct experience of humiliation and also from the perspective of witnessing others being denigrated for having wet or soiled their beds. One man said that he is still upset by witnessing the actions of one of his teachers, a nun, when dealing with a little girl who had soiled her underwear. The girl was made to take off her soiled underwear in class and show it to the other children. A male applicant described the practice he said he experienced because of being a "bed-wetter". The practice involved both emotional and physical abuse, as was often the case in other accounts of abusive experiences. He told the Forum that bed-wetters were put in a cold bath and held down by two boys at the instruction of the nun in charge.

> "A third boy poured bucket after bucket of cold water down on top of you."

Exposure to Fearful Situations

31 An applicant said that he had seen a member of the care staff kicking a boy across the floor. He then witnessed the same member of staff beating up the boy's brother who went to assist him. The applicant remained terrified of this member of staff for the duration of his stay in the establishment. He believed the member of staff would have killed him if he knew he had witnessed some of his abuse of other residents. The men said that some staff – both religious and lay – used the threat of physical abuse as a main means of control and of keeping them subdued. An applicant reflected the views of others in saying:

> "It was always in your mind 'I'm going to get hit by a nun or class boys'. When a nun put boys into cold baths, after they were brought back from running away, I, along with the others, had to listen to screams from bathrooms. The nun was red in face from beating the boys and their cries were like sounds from a slaughter house."

Deprivation of Affection

32 Commonly, applicants referred to the lack of warmth and affection shown to them by most care staff. They contended that they had had to fight for survival and fend for themselves in circumstances where they might have received comfort and encouragement from the staff. Emotional abuse was said to be widespread and systemic in nature. With the exception of a reference to another older male resident as a source of emotional abuse, all the others mentioned in applicants' accounts of the emotional abuse they experienced were adults – care staff, female and members of a religious order.

Neglect

33 Nineteen applicants made 23 allegations of neglect in the care they had received in respect of diet, clothing, excessive work and education. They made:

- Fourteen reports of neglect relating to one establishment
- Seven reports of neglect relating to another establishment
- Two reports of neglect, one in each of two establishments.

Diet

34 Fifteen of the male applicants talked about their diet, all of them saying that the quantity of the food was inadequate and the quality of food was poor. Two of that group blamed the inadequate quantity of food, in part, on the lack of supervision of the children at mealtimes. This allowed the bullies to take more of the food and select the better food. An applicant spoke about his diet in some detail saying that:

> "I was often hungry. I ate from rubbish bins – apple peels etc. This was in wartime; we had very basic food, porridge and tea for breakfast, stew at lunch time but little meat, bread and dripping for supper, dripping called 'chuck'. Older boys might take the dripping from you."
>
> "Hunger was a passenger always. Porridge and toast for breakfast, bread and lard with cocoa drink for supper. Things improved when we began to get bruised fruit* from the market. Each child got an apple or an orange and dived in to get share of anything left over. There was a tuck shop in later years as rationing eased."

Note: The reference to bruised fruit, above, is related to an arrangement spoken about by a number of residents from the same establishment, in which bruised and damaged fruit was brought to the establishment from a local market.

Clothing

35 Inadequate clothing, including footwear, was mentioned by four applicants as another form of neglect and criticism was levelled at both the quality and fitting of the clothes and shoes. Applicants said that they were frequently uncomfortable because clothes and shoes were too small. Two of them added that they felt inadequately dressed for cold weather and for playing outdoors. One complained about the lack of pyjamas saying that "we had to sleep in our underpants" and another said that he only got socks to wear when he was being taken out of the establishment.

Other Forms of Neglect

36 Other forms of neglect mentioned by more than two applicants included inadequate bedding, medical attention and education. Comments about these included:

> "The counterpanes and pillows were kept at the end of the big dorm. We slept with one sheet and one blanket. We were cold."

> "I was wounded badly on the knee having been hit with a stair spindle by a nun. My knee was patched up in the home; it was fractured and never set properly. It was tightly bandaged, but I was made to kneel on it in church even when very painful."

> "The home neglected my need for spectacles; this caused me difficulty in reading and in making progress in school."

> "Very little was taught in school. Catechism was the main topic."

Excessive Work Demands

37 Nineteen of the male applicants said they were given work that was both heavy and excessive for children. Of the nineteen, the majority – sixteen – described work that involved scrubbing, polishing and buffing floors in long corridors and other floors. Others were sent to work on farms and some mentioned having to care for toddlers, preparing food in the kitchen and cleaning bathrooms and toilets. The following quotations are typical of the accounts given to the Forum:

> "We had to scrub floors and polish them – up in the morning, supervised by class boys with pads right to left; washroom then to chapel and then breakfast."

> "We had a regime of polishing floors and, when older, helping in the kitchen. I also had daily duties on a different floor where elderly men were cared for. I had to empty the spittoons and the chamber pots. I also had to wash and shave the body of an old man who had died. I found this very distressing."

> "My chores included floor cleaning in the chapel, dining rooms, study halls, kitchen and lavatories. The buckets of hot soapy water were very heavy and I always had sore knees. After washing I had to polish the floors; I also had to clean the toilets and if any excrement was found by the nun inspecting our work, the whole team had to start all over again."

> "Work was constant from admission: washing, polishing floors – corridor a hundred yards long – dormitories and refectory. I had to look after babies and toddlers, prepare food and cook in the kitchen, do gardening, clean the school room, bathroom and toilets."

Knowledge of Abuse

38 Male applicants said that other residents and staff – care, ancillary and teaching staff – witnessed much of the abuse that was a common feature of their experience in their establishments. They also said that staff saw them crying and distressed and would have been able to see bruises on their arms and legs but rarely were they asked what was upsetting them or about what had caused their bruises. Those who absconded and were bought back to their establishments by the police often questioned why they were never asked about what was making them abscond.

Disclosing Abuse at the Time

39 Two of the male applicants who had been resident in voluntary establishments said that they had reported their abuse to adults. Others who had not reported commented that other children in the homes witnessed the abuse but were powerless to do anything about it. A number of them added that reporting abuse most often provoked one of three responses: disbelief, punishment or dismissal. The applicants insisted that there was little incentive to report their abuse; as one said "you soon learned there was no point in telling" and others reflected that they thought what they were experiencing was normal, "just part of life".

40 In one instance there was a positive outcome from reporting to an adult who was not a member of staff, in that the applicant who reported the abuse was moved to foster care. In another case the applicant told the Forum:

> "I tried to tell my mother on her yearly visits but I did not want to tell her full details and knew she could do nothing as she had to earn a living."

In describing his disclosure of his abuse to his family in later life, one man said:

> "I saw no point in telling anyone in the home as I thought I would not be believed and could suffer further physical punishment."

Methods of Coping with Abuse

41 The Forum asked the male applicants about how they had coped with or responded to the experiences they had described. Five responses to the alleged abuse were mentioned more often than any other and they were:

- not knowing what to do
- accepting the abuse as normal
- living in fear
- enuresis
- withdrawing into themselves.

The table below indicates the number of times these and other responses were mentioned by applicants in meetings with the Forum.

Responses to Abuse	Voluntary
Male
Didn't know what to do	12
Self harm	-
Accept as normal	14
Fear	8
Enuresis	5
Withdrawal	5
Attack abuser	2
Run away	1
Retaliation	-
Alcohol abuse	-
Prescribed medication	-
Other	1

Note: Some applicants mentioned one or more responses; others mentioned none.

42 The selection of quotations that follows gives an insight into the thoughts and actions of some of the applicants in coping with their abuse.

> "My mother visited me and gave me new clothes which I put on my bed but someone cut them up with a razor blade. I didn't report this as I had been threatened that if I did complain I would be sent to a training school for bad boys with the terrible threat of the…(the religious order in charge)".

"I considered the class boys as victims themselves as they would be punished if they didn't do as they were told. So I simply accepted abuse as normal. When I left the home I was very aggressive and this was a disadvantage as I was always getting into fights. In the army I often lost the opportunity to advance in rank as a result."

"Emotional, physical and peer sexual abuse were so commonplace that I did not appreciate that it was wrong in every way."

"I lost respect for authority and became fiercely independent in spirit."

"Later in life I just put it out of my mind and joked my way through life; if I dwell on it now it puts me back."

Strategies of Alleged Abusers

43 Three quarters of the applicants commented on factors that affected their response to their abuse and referred to the strategies used by alleged abusers. Most of their comments can be grouped into five broad categories, namely:

- the experience of being dominated by the authority of an older person, usually a manager or care worker
- violence on the part of the alleged abuser
- general fear – not knowing what might happen if they resisted or spoke out
- being told 'not to tell'
- bullying.

44 The quotations that follow give an insight into the circumstances and factors that inhibited the applicants' resisting and reporting their abusers.

"There was nowhere else to go – I didn't know any other world; everything we did we had to either ask or were told to do. There was no free will – we just obeyed."

"I was not known by my first name or surname but instead by my number which was…I remember seeing boys being beaten and I too was beaten so I always had to be hyper vigilant."

"I didn't know for a long time that my brothers were in the home (the same establishment) and my sisters were in another home close by. Relationships with my brothers and sisters were denied to me."

"Older boys often were in charge without supervision and we couldn't disobey them."

"An older boy made me perform oral sex on him to avoid being given a cold bath and a beating for bed-wetting. This boy had the job to get the bed-wetters up at night to prevent wet beds."

"When I was thirteen or fourteen, I was told my mother had come to see me. I had never heard of my mother. The nun told me to say 'It's nice here, I love it here, it's a great place to be' and to give her a big hug. I didn't report my abuse as I was threatened that if I did I would be sent to...a place for bad boys. I cried every night for two years because I was so unhappy in..."

"I was constantly threatened with 'if you don't behave, you will be sent to live with your mother.' I never got an explanation of why this deterrent was used but I knew that it was frightening. I was labelled a 'retard' and denigrated and physically reprimanded as I was a bed wetter."

"There was a culture of punishment in...and I lived in the shadow of that. The punishment was administered by older boys and by nuns."

"I was not referred to by name; I didn't know about or celebrate birthdays; the use of each others' names was forbidden. Before we went on a walk we were warned not to smile, nod, wave or talk. I never saw a toy. I always had to look down and never to speak before being asked a question. There was no mammy's knee. My childhood was gone – I never had a childhood."

Females: Voluntary Provision

45 Twenty of the female applicants, who were resident in voluntary establishments from 1922 to 1955, referred to having experienced abuse. Some referred to more than one form of abuse and by more than one perpetrator. The combination of abuse types in different placements mentioned by applicants is shown below. It is important to emphasise that the table does not indicate the number or frequency of individual incidents of abuse but, rather, the total number of times particular types of abuse were mentioned by the twenty female applicants in their meetings with the Forum.

Abuse types	Applicants	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	2	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	12	5
Physical, sexual, and emotional	-	-
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	-	-
Physical and emotional	1	1
Physical and sexual	-	-
Emotional and neglect	1	1
Emotional and sexual	-	-
Emotional, sexual and neglect	1	1
Emotional	1	1
Sexual	-	-
Physical	1	1
Neglect	1	1
Total	20	*

Note: 6 different establishments in total

Physical Abuse

46 Sixteen of the female applicants who had been cared for in voluntary establishments made 21 reports of physical abuse. They spoke of treatment that they considered to be physically abusive in six different establishments. There were:

- Twelve reports of physical abuse in one establishment
- Six reports of physical abuse in another establishment
- Three reports of physical abuse, one in each of three establishments.

Descriptions of Physical Abuse

47 Most commonly the applicants referred to being beaten with a strap and a cane, usually on the hands and legs and, in some of the more severe beatings they described, all over their bodies and especially where bruises would not be seen. They said that these punishments were given for even minor misbehaviours, and mentioned "talking back" to a member of the religious care staff, doing something the wrong way or simply being mischievous as some of the triggers for physical punishments. One told the Forum that she experienced beatings "over and over again because nothing I ever did was good enough." Another applicant was very emotional and found it hard to talk about the beatings she had received. She said she has felt ashamed all her life of being beaten as a child, so much so that she continues to have great difficulty in referring openly to this part of her childhood experience. Yet another woman described being placed in a room with her younger sister and then being wakened during the night by a nun who was a member of the care staff. She and her sister were told to get out of their beds by the nun who then poured cold water onto their sheets and told them to get back into bed. She reported that the nun returned later and beat them for wetting the bed. Another woman told the Forum:

> "You would be hit if you talked back or didn't do something right. You got hit all over the body where you couldn't see it."

Physical Abuse by more than one Person

48 A number of the applicants alleged physical abuse by more than one person. In summary, the Forum heard:

- Five reports of abuse by one person
- Five reports of abuse by two persons, either separately or concurrently
- Two reports of abuse by three persons, either separately or concurrently.

The alleged abusers, with two exceptions, were female; their roles are set out in the following table.

Roles of Alleged Abusers	Male	Female
Officer in charge/authority figure	1	5
Care staff	-	7
Teacher/instructor	-	3
Former resident	-	-
Other resident	-	1
Visitor	1	-
Ancillary worker	-	1
Total	2	17

Of the nineteen alleged abusers, fifteen were members of a religious order and one was a parish priest.

Sexual Abuse

49 Three of the female applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments reported sexual abuse. These applicants had been in two separate establishments. One of them told the Forum about a female member of staff digitally penetrating her after she was given a cold bath (being bathed in cold water was described as routine). She made no other allegations of sexual abuse.

50 Another applicant spoke about being fondled inappropriately by a male teacher in her establishment and also reported witnessing similar abuse of another child in the same establishment. She alleged that a teacher "felt up the girls' legs in class." She pushed him away when he tried to do this to her. She said she saw another male member of staff fondling the breasts of a girl as she played the piano.

Emotional Abuse

51 Eighteen female applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments reported emotionally abusive experiences. There were:

- Eleven reports of emotional abuse in respect of one establishment
- Two reports of emotional abuse in respect of two establishments
- Three reports of emotional abuse, one each in respect of four establishments.

These female applicants referred to emotional abuse types that were similar in range and intensity to those of the men.

Personal Emotional Abuse

52 The applicants recalled living in fear of physical abuse and of experiencing verbal abuse including constant personal denigration; one spoke of being called by a number rather than her name. One talked emotionally about being told she was a demon, of being "worthless and evil" and of being publically humiliated. Another applicant said:

> "I was repeatedly told that I would not amount to anything and that I would end up in the gutter". Comments from others included:
>
> "I was blamed for things I didn't do such as stealing, and a notice saying 'Thief' was pinned to my back. On another occasion my pony tail was cut off as a punishment. These and other events humiliated and affected me negatively."

"I was made to sit at a table away from the other children as I was Protestant – I was made to feel inferior and different."

"I experienced public humiliation: I was made to stand in the corner in school and wear a hat with 'dunce' or 'thief' on it. I stole apples at every opportunity to try and feed my sisters and friends. I was shown no affection by anyone there."

"I suffered from chronic enuresis. At school (on-site) I was not allowed to go to the toilet except at designated times. On one occasion I wet the floor and had to go through a number of classrooms to get a mop and bucket. Everyone knew what I had done."

"The children who wet the bed were not allowed to get into their beds until after the non bed-wetters. I recall one time when I was made to stand in a cold, dark corridor for so long that I fell asleep upright."

"As children we were not allowed to leave the table until we had finished everything on our plates. On one occasion, I had nothing but a large piece of fat left and couldn't eat it. I was made to sit until it was dark trying to eat the food when a woman from the kitchen that I remember as being kind, told me to get to bed."

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

53 A number of the women expressed regret that they had been separated from their siblings, including some who had sisters in the same establishment and some who had brothers in an adjacent establishment. They said that there was no encouragement of sibling relationships and several said they were deliberately kept apart from their siblings even though they kept asking about them and making it clear that they wanted to see them. One woman, for example, said that she and two younger sisters were placed in the same establishment. When admitted, she was seven years old and her sisters were five and three years old respectively. She said that they were split up and not allowed to see each other at any time.

Other applicants reported:

"I never knew my sister who was in the same institution – we went in together but I was only two years old and so lost my memory of her. When we met to receive a visit from our father we were left sitting in the parlour together but not introduced. I had no concept of what 'sister' meant."

"I discovered in later life that my only brother was working near the establishment and I was not even told he existed."

"I was not permitted to have a relationship with my sisters who were also resident in the home."

"I regret that I was not given the opportunity to get to know my sister. We were kept apart."

Exposure to Fearful Situations

54 An applicant described graphically an occasion when a child died in her establishment. She said that the girls were made to walk round the dead child's bed and, when they asked what had happened to her, a member of staff told them that "she was possessed by the devil."

55 Repeatedly applicants spoke of the distress they experienced when witnessing other children being admonished and beaten by care staff. They indicated that they lived in fear of the same treatment. One applicant reported witnessing peers being subjected to physical abuse. She recounted that three girls ran away and when they returned all the children were summoned to the refectory and were made to watch as three nuns cut their hair short. She was very upset when she recalled the girls crying as they watched this humiliating event.

Deprivation of Affection

56 A recurring theme in the accounts given to the Forum was the lack of affection and warmth in the care received. The comments of one woman reflect the sentiments of many: "I have no positive memories of being nurtured". Other comments included:

"No one showed me any affection. The best time I had was in hospital with sepsis from a splinter in my foot. The staff there were lovely."

"No kindness was shown to me; I believe I was singled out for particularly harsh treatment as I was born outside marriage."

Neglect

57 Seventeen female applicants complained of neglect:

- Sixteen applicants reported one instance of neglect
- One applicant reported two instances of neglect.

58 The number of complaints in respect of the six voluntary establishments was as follows:

- One establishment was the subject of twelve complaints of neglect
- Five establishments were each the subject of one report of neglect.

Diet

59 Fourteen of the women who had been placed in voluntary children's homes made reference to aspects of their care that they considered to be neglectful. Ten applicants said that their food was not only poor in quality but was also inadequate in quantity. Typical comments made to the Forum included:

> "I was hungry all the time."
>
> "I would pinch food all the time, including slops from the bins."
>
> "Bread and dripping with one cup of tea for breakfast, fatty meat for dinner and we were made to eat any food we vomited."
>
> "I used to climb out at night to rob apples as I was so hungry."
>
> "I was always hungry. There was never enough food and what was provided lacked nutrition and was horrid – lumpy, salty, cold porridge."
>
> "We were given one sausage on Christmas Day and an egg at Easter."
>
> "I ate from the slop bucket. I ate turnip skins and I stole apples as often as I could."
>
> "I was hungry all the time when I was younger. Meals were served in a refectory at long tables. The food was placed in the middle of a table and there was a free-for-all. As I was sitting at the end of the table and I was smaller, I never got enough to eat and I would go later to the bins and scavenge for leftovers and peelings."

Excessive Work Demands

60 Six of the women referred to inappropriate and excessive work demands as factors in their neglect. One said that "We worked from 7.00am to 8.00am every morning, polishing floors etc"; she added that the worst job was manually unblocking toilets with bare hands. Another told the Forum that > "We were like slaves doing their work for them, scrubbing and polishing floors until you could see your face in the shine."

A third applicant reported that work was constant from admission:

> "every Friday night five pairs of girls were on their knees scrubbing corridors and the chapel. I never saw a nun do physical work."

This applicant had special duties looking after an older girl who appears to have had learning difficulties; she said she was completely responsible for her. She added that she was also in charge of the top bathroom which had about eight sinks, as well as toilets and baths. She had to ensure it was clean every day from getting-up time. She was about eight or nine years old at the time. When she was older, she also worked in the kitchen, the laundry and the adjacent residential home for older people.

Inadequate Medical Care

61 Some of the women spoke about the inadequacy of their medical care. One commented on her care when she became seriously ill and received medical attention for some time. Her aunt came to visit her and a row ensued with the care staff because she was so shocked by the condition of her niece who was emaciated and barely able to walk. Another recounted having an outbreak of boils on her neck, underarms and knees. These were not treated and she recalled that when she was unable to bend both knees to pray, a nun pushed her down and said "we pray to God on both knees." She added:

> "I was in great pain and my sister who had witnessed this ran over to help me."

Lack of Opportunities for Play

62 Several of the women complained about the lack of play opportunities, toys and books. One applicant's account was as follows:

> "No toys were provided and those in the garden were not adequate for the numbers of residents. Toys were produced for inspections and for a TV company filming in the garden but they were then removed immediately afterwards – I was astounded that the visitors didn't notice the children's reaction to seeing the toys or that they were new."

Knowledge of Abuse

63 The applicants' accounts of their physical and emotional abuse and neglect make it clear that there must have been many witnesses to what they experienced. Not only were other residents present in most instances but so too were other members of the care staff and ancillary staff. However, few of the applicants made reference to this. One applicant asked "Why did no one do anything to stop what was going on?"

Disclosing at the Time

64 One of the 24 female applicants who had been in designated voluntary establishments said that she had reported her abuse just after it had occurred and that, at least initially, her action had results. She said:

> "I showed the priest, who was supportive of the children, the welts on my legs caused by a nun. He told the nun to get him the cane. She did and he admonished her and said he never wanted to see marks like that on legs again. After he left, the nun used her knuckles on my head and then, after a while, reverted to using the cane."

None of the others had reported their abuse and told the Forum that the threat of physical punishment silenced most children, coupled with the ongoing verbal admonishment from angry adults.

Methods of Coping with Abuse

65 The Forum asked the female applicants how they had coped with the experiences they had described. Five responses to the alleged abuse were mentioned more often than any others and they were:

- not knowing what to do
- accepting the abuse as normal
- fear
- enuresis
- withdrawing into themselves.

The table below indicates the number of times these and other responses were mentioned in meetings with the Forum.

Responses to Abuse	Voluntary
Females
Didn't know what to do	5
Self harm	-
Accept as normal	7
Fear	3
Enuresis	2
Withdrawal	6
Attack abuser	2
Run away	2
Retaliation	1
Alcohol abuse	-
Prescribed medication	-
Other	-

Note: Some applicants mentioned one or more methods of coping; others mentioned none.

66 The selection of quotations that follows gives an insight into the thoughts and actions of some of the applicants in regard to coping with the abuse.

"I didn't accept the abuse; I constantly rebelled against it – I would not go to Confession. I continued to assert myself and tried to help others."

"I answered back, something nuns didn't like."

"I ran away twice but I was found by police and brought back. They (the staff) put me in a dark cupboard for a few hours with no food. When the police came to see me the next day I told them I was hungry but they didn't take any notice and I was punished again."

"At times I felt that this was my lot. I had no choice but to accept the treatment."

"I put it to the back of my mind; I could have committed suicide, instead I dealt with it by forgetting it."

"I had no family and been brought up in an institution. I had no resources to rely on."

"I wouldn't dare complain to the doctor as the nun who was present would later on give you a hiding for telling the doctor something and not telling the staff first."

"I was continuously frightened. If you looked the wrong way you were told 'sit down, behave, I don't want to hear from you, you should know your place.'"

"I lived in an environment that evoked fear; it was dark and suffocating."

"The police took us back every time; they never asked us why we were running away."

"When I was wrongly accused of stealing, I resolved not to help the nuns again."

Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

67 Almost all of the female applicants who had been placed as children in voluntary establishments prior to 1956 commented on factors that inhibited them in speaking out about their and others' abuse. Most of their comments can be grouped into five broad categories, namely:

- the influence of the authority of an older person, usually a manager or care worker
- violence on the part of the alleged abuser

- general fear – not knowing what might happen if they resisted or spoke out
- being told "not to tell"
- bullying.

68 The comments that follow give an insight into the distress felt by the applicants when they were children and help to explain why they were so reluctant to report abuse.

> "We were beaten regularly. One incident I remember as follows: someone scraped a hole in the wall in the WC, we were all made to line up as a nun walked up and down the line. She stopped at whoever she decided was the guilty party. The girl was lifted off her feet by her hair, beaten badly by stick and thrown into an under-stairs cubbyhole with a small window. When this happened to anyone, the nun made noises outside to scare you, and hours after the other children were in bed you were dragged upstairs to the dormitory."

> "Decisions were taken about me and nothing was explained – care staff gave no sense of appreciating the use of explanation to alleviate fears or to be inclusive."

> "I was threatened with being sent to…by one of the nuns. I knew of it as a place for mad people and another girl had gone there. The threat made me very frightened."

> "I was not chosen for outings or activities like choir. My hair was washed in public, in the back yard, overlooked by boys who taunted us. I suffered from nightly enuresis, and we were called 'wet the beds'. Once you wet the bed at night you had to remain in your wet sheets, and next morning you had to wash the sheets in cold water. Later buzzers were introduced, but other children were wakened by the buzzer going off and I, with others, was verbally abused by the other children."

> "I was made to line up with my underwear inside out; I was hit on the face if my underwear was marked. I was told publicly I was backward."

Abuse in State Provision

69 This section refers to the abuse reported to the Forum by those applicants who were resident in state provision between 1922 and 1955. Six male applicants and one female applicant were in that category.

Males: State Provision

70 Of the six males in state establishments in this Period three did not have any abuse to report. In one applicant's case the abuse he suffered took place in an establishment during Period 2. Another was in a state establishment only briefly where, he said, he was cared for appropriately before being placed in a voluntary establishment where he alleges he was abused. A third, although in a state establishment in Period 1, spoke of abuse he experienced in a foster family setting to which he was sent from the state establishment. That abuse is outside the terms of reference of the Inquiry.

71 The combinations of abuse experienced by the other three men in three separate establishments were as follows:

- One man reported experiencing physical, sexual and emotional abuse and neglect
- One man reported physical abuse
- One man reported sexual abuse.

Physical Abuse

72 None of the six men who had been in state establishments reported any physical abuse by care staff. The two who alleged physical abuse said that this came from other residents. One recalled an incident in which he had been hit on the head with a bottle when he refused the older resident's request to go to his 'den'. The applicant said that he knew he would be abused if he complied. He was taken to a doctor for attention to his injury.

Sexual Abuse

73 Two of the six male applicants who had been placed in state establishments spoke about sexual abuse. One of the two, who had lived in a state workhouse with his mother and brother, reported that he was anally raped by an older resident and that he was the focus of genital exposure by a group of older residents who tried to involve him in sexual activities.

74 The other applicant recalled that he was sexually abused, "interfered with and raped" by several men who worked in his establishment. He said that this happened frequently: "it was going on all the time". One of the men would sexually interfere with him in the boiler room. He would threaten that if he would not comply he would put him in the boiler.

Emotional Abuse

75 Two of the six men who had been cared for in state establishments made references to emotional abuse but did not detail the nature of the experiences that affected them in that way.

Neglect

76 None of the six male applicants who had been in state children's homes alleged neglect.

Alleged Abusers

77 The alleged abusers referred to by male applicants were either other residents or staff who worked in management and care. The following table summarises this information:

Roles of Alleged Abusers	Males
Authority figure/officer in charge	2
Care staff	2
Ancillary	-
Teacher	-
Visiting adult	-
Other resident	2

Disclosing abuse at the Time

78 The two applicants who alleged sexual abuse in state establishments told the Forum that they had reported the abuse but to no effect. One said that:

> "I feel my action was dismissed; the staff member I told said 'away you go'. It seems that sexual abuse was part of the culture of the institution."

The other told the Forum that:

> "(after a sexual assault) I was cleaned up by another resident whose assigned duties included supervising toilets. This man reported it to the officer in charge who gave me to understand I needed to be careful about going into toilets if the supervisor was not there. I felt he was saying I was to blame."

How compliance was achieved: Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

79 The abusers in one establishment were in positions of authority and threatened one applicant with dire consequences if he told anyone what they were doing to him. In the other case, the applicant was intimidated by older residents, in effect adults around twenty years of age.

Methods of Coping

80 The Forum asked the applicants about how they had coped with or responded to the experiences they had recounted. Three ways of responding to the alleged abuse were mentioned and they were:

- not knowing what to do and so doing nothing
- accepting the abuse as normal
- being frightened.

Females: State Provision

81 One female applicant came to the Forum to recount her childhood experiences in state care. She had one complaint and that focused on physical abuse and bullying by other residents.

Male: Juvenile Justice Provision

82 This section refers to the abuse reported to the Forum by the two applicants, both males, who had been in juvenile justice establishments between 1922 and 1955. The applicants had been in the same establishment but at different times. They spoke of the following types of abuse.

Physical Abuse

83 One of the applicants complained of physical abuse that was extreme and ongoing, saying that he was beaten with a leather strap by religious staff and bullied and beaten by other, older, residents. The other applicant complained of being strapped and beaten by staff who were also members of a religious order.

Other Abuse

84 Neither of the applicants reported sexual abuse; one referred to emotional abuse without giving examples.

Knowledge of the Abuse at the Time

85 Neither of the applicants referred to having reported their abuse but they told the Forum that the abuse happened in the presence of other staff and residents.

Closing Comment

86 The applicants who had been in children's residential establishments between 1922 and 1955 said that their anger about the abuse they had experienced had not diminished over the years. Their sense of injustice at not being believed and their frustration from being ignored and dismissed when they reported abuse has increased over time. They acknowledged that some staff had been good to them but others had treated them cruelly and exploited them and they wanted this to be "on the record".

Period 2: 1956-1975

Introduction

87 This section of the chapter sets out the abuse that 125 male and 85 female applicants allege occurred when they were placed in the care of 35 establishments in Northern Ireland from 1956 to 1975. The section is divided into three: abuse alleged in voluntary establishments, abuse alleged in state establishments and abuse alleged to have occurred in juvenile justice establishments. Each part of this section describes the experiences of the male and female applicants separately.

Voluntary Establishments

88 The first part of this section covers the experiences of 75 male applicants who spoke of abuse in nine voluntary establishments. Two applicants did not report any abuse in their placements in voluntary establishments. The second part of this section covers the experiences of 74 females who spoke of abuse in twenty establishments in the voluntary sector.

89 Some applicants alleged experiencing one type of abuse from more than one alleged perpetrator. For example, they may have alleged physical abuse by two or three perpetrators and may also have reported emotional abuse by one of those staff members or by another staff member.

Males: Voluntary Provision

90 The 75 male applicants spoke of abuse in nine establishments. Most of the abuse that was reported to the Forum was alleged to have occurred in three establishments, two of which were the focus of complaints of abuse from 28 applicants. The third establishment, was the focus of complaints from 23 applicants. The table that follows sets out the combinations of types of abuse alleged by the 75 male applicants.

Abuse types	Males	Establishments
Physical, emotional, neglect and sexual	28	4
Physical, emotional and neglect	16	6
Physical, emotional and sexual	12	4
Physical, sexual and neglect	1	2
Physical and neglect	1	1
Physical and emotional	4	3
Physical and sexual	4	3
Emotional and sexual	2	1
Emotional, neglect and sexual	2	2
Emotional only	-	-
Sexual only	3	1
Physical only	2	2
Neglect only	-	-
Total	75	29

* Note: Nine establishments were reported by different applicants for different types of abuse.

Twenty-eight applicants reported experiencing all four types of abuse. Sixteen applicants reported experiencing physical abuse, emotional abuse and neglect.

Physical Abuse

91 Sixty-eight applicants made, in total, 149 complaints of physical abuse in respect of nine individual voluntary establishments. These 68 applicants had a total of 88 placements. The following table sets out the extent of reports of physical abuse per establishment.

Individual Placements	Establishments	Reports
28	1	67
28	1	38
23	1	29
3	1	3
2	1	3
1	1	3
1	1	2
1	1	3
1	1	1
Total - 88	9	149

Descriptions of Physical Abuse

92 Male applicants who had had placements in voluntary establishments alleged being physically reprimanded by some members of staff who, as a standard control mechanism, would punch, slap and kick them. Some applicants described the physical abuse they were subjected to as persistent and routine. Applicants alleged that staff used the following items to physically reprimand them: leather straps, a blackthorn stick, canes, keys, brooms, bats, a kettle flex, a wooden towel rail, tennis rackets, a chair leg, a golf club and a hurling stick.

93 There were accounts that physical abuse could be given for a minor misdemeanour or, at times, applicants commented: "We just happened to be in the way of the member of staff." Some of the applicants said that, from time to time, some of the staff appeared to lose control and the punishment was disproportionate to the misdemeanour. One applicant alleged getting beaten by a member of staff and receiving "man-sized punches." Some applicants said certain members of staff instructed them to sleep with blankets over their heads or lie with their arms folded across their chests. If they failed to comply, they would be beaten by either older boys or some of the staff. One applicant referred to one particular member of staff who lifted the boys off the ground by the cheeks or the ears and, on occasion, threw them against a wall.

94 Some applicants who spoke about constant physical abuse in their placements described experiences that included being beaten, waiting for a beating or watching another resident being beaten. One applicant recounted that "fear was put into you from day one." Another applicant stated, "I have lost count of how many times I was hit." Another applicant described a particular incident when he was repeatedly beaten by a member of staff who "showed no mercy."

95 Some applicants recounted that some of the nuns had favourites amongst the children, who then were known as the "pets or dainties." One of the applicants said that, through having this status, he received extra portions of food and was selected to go on outings. A few applicants commented that these children received preferential treatment because their mothers were paying for their keep in the establishments.

96 Some of the applicants felt they were singled out for harsher treatment than their peers and this was puzzling and particularly upsetting for them at the time. In hindsight, they correlate this with their personal circumstances, such as the mother being a single parent, having parents who were unmarried, their families not contributing financially to the cost of care in the home or, coming from a different religious background. There were also accounts in which specific staff were said to pick on certain children. One applicant recounted that he desperately wanted to pass the 11-plus only to learn that he had failed. A staff member announced this in front of everyone in his group in the establishment:

"We have a stupid person among us who thought he was clever."

This applicant said that the memory of this still remains painful for him and he fails to understand how someone could behave in such an inappropriate way towards children.

97 Applicants who had a history of enuresis alleged being publicly humiliated and physically harmed because of their condition. One applicant recounted that as a bed wetter, he was awakened during the night to go to the bathroom by staff hitting him. One applicant alleged a member of staff repeatedly hit him but he refused to cry. He said the physical abuse became more persistent and extreme and when he did eventually cry, the beatings ceased. This applicant commented, "I was beaten until I broke." One applicant recounted being beaten with a rod of wire "like a TV aerial" which was used to "prod the boys…like hitting cattle."

98 Applicants made the following comments when recounting their experiences of abuse in voluntary establishments:

"If you fought back you never won."

"A staff member was determined to break me."

"I was being beaten left, right and centre."

"I have lost count how many times I got hit."

"You got so used to it, it didn't affect you anymore."

Physical Abuse by more than one Person

99 Many applicants reported to the Forum that they were physically abused by more than one person. The following is a summary of the information they provided:

- One applicant alleged physical abuse by seven people.
- Three applicants alleged physical abuse by six people.
- Three applicants alleged physical abuse by five people.
- Five applicants alleged physical abuse by four people.
- Ten applicants alleged physical abuse by three people.
- Twenty-five applicants alleged physical abuse by two people.
- The remaining 21 applicants alleged physical abuse by one person.

Note: The allegations of abuse may have involved two or more people concurrently.

Role of Alleged Abusers

100 The table that follows shows the position within the institution of the alleged abusers as understood by the applicants. Some applicants could not provide any information on the name or position of their alleged abuser. Other residents were sometimes noted as bullies by applicants, but not usually identified by name and therefore are not included in the table below. It was not possible to ascertain how many residents were alleged to be physically abusive.

Role of alleged abuser	Males	Females	Member of Religious Order/Clergy
Officer in charge/ authority figure	51	29	60
Teacher/instructor	18	4	11
Care staff	45	23	47
Ancillary staff	8	3	2
Other (role not clear)	3	-	-
Total	125	59	120

Physical Abuse by Older Boys

101 Eight of the applicants recounted being subjected to physical abuse by older residents who had been given charge of them. The applicants described staff authorising the older boys to keep control and order. The result was that the younger children were left unsupervised and the older residents displayed aggressive behaviour towards them. Applicants recounted the fear they felt as the older boys would beat, slap and kick them and they were afraid to tell of the abuse for fear of being beaten. Some applicants said that they reported the abuse to staff but they were not believed, or that their reports were dismissed and they were not offered any support.

Sexual Abuse

102 Fifty-two male applicants made, in total, 104 reports of sexual abuse in five individual establishments in the voluntary sector. Twenty-eight of them referred to sexual abuse only once but it was clear that for some of them the abuse had been ongoing. The other 24 referred to two or more instances of sexual abuse, with one applicant reporting ten instances in what had been a prolonged experience of sexual abuse.

103 Forty-nine applicants reported sexual abuse in combination with other types of abuse, while three applicants reported sexual abuse only.

- One establishment was the subject of sexual abuse reports by 31 applicants.
- One establishment was the subject of sexual abuse reports by sixteen applicants.
- One establishment was the subject of a sexual abuse reports by nine applicants.
- One establishment was the subject of sexual abuse reports by four applicants.
- One establishment was the subject of sexual abuse report by one applicant.

Some of the 52 applicants had more than one placement and reported sexual abuse in respect of more than one establishment.

The Nature and Extent of Sexual Abuse

104 The complaints reported by applicants refer to allegations of sexual abuse perpetrated by residential and non-residential staff, older residents, former residents and visitors. The alleged sexual abuse was said to have taken place in various locations including inside the establishments, in the grounds of the establishments, and in various holiday homes during the summer holiday period. The full range of types and numbers of reports of sexual abuse are set out in the following table.

Types of sexual abuse	Number of reports
Inappropriate fondling	18
Anal rape	14
Oral/genital contact	11
Masturbation of child	9
Masturbation of alleged abuser	14
Indecent exposure	6
Coercive peer abuse	16
Witnessing sexual abuse	7
Use of violence	4
Grooming	5
Total	104

105 Some of the applicants referred to a culture of ongoing sexual abuse within their establishments and many found it particularly difficult to talk about the sexual abuse. Some of the applicants commented that in later life they had felt unable to talk of their experiences of abuse as they were concerned they would be stigmatised or judged negatively. Some of the applicants said they felt ashamed and this had kept them silent over many years.

106 An applicant who described himself as a "pet" of a particular member of staff said he received privileges from this staff member who continued to sexually abuse him. Another applicant alleged the boys would be given "the odd pound and fags" by the older residents so that they could abuse them. An applicant said that the showers were allocated on a rotational basis and boys were called to the shower but the residents who were "liked" by certain staff members would be chosen more regularly and they were watched very closely. An applicant in a large establishment said that he and other residents were "like meat in a butcher's shop." This applicant spoke of a member of staff masturbating him whilst he lay in his sick bed.

Sexual Abuse by more than one Person

107 Many applicants reported to the Forum that they were sexually abused by more than one person as follows:

- One applicant reported that he was abused by ten different alleged perpetrators
- Two applicants reported they were each abused by six different alleged perpetrators
- Three applicants reported they were each abused by four different alleged perpetrators
- Three applicants reported they were each abused by three different alleged perpetrators
- Fourteen applicants reported they were each abused by two different alleged perpetrators.

The other 29 applicants reported that they had been abused by one alleged perpetrator.

Alleged Abusers

108 Four of the alleged perpetrators were reported to be female and the rest of the alleged perpetrators were male.

Role of the Alleged Abuser	Female	Male	Member of Religious Order/Clergy
Officer-in-charge/ authority figure	-	21	12
Care staff	2	29	26
Teachers/instructors	-	2	-
Ex residents	-	6	-
Other residents	2	31	-
Visitors	-	4	2
Ancillary workers	-	8	-
Totals	4	101	40

Emotional Abuse

109 This section of the report describes emotional abuse in voluntary establishments from 1956 to 1975. Emotional abuse covers a range of actions and inactions that deprived the applicants of family and sibling contact, knowledge of their own identity, affection, approval and protection from harm appropriate to their age and developmental needs.

In their descriptions of emotional abuse, applicants most often referred to practices and routines, for example, the separation of siblings and the removal of all personal belongings or the absence of individual, personal treatment. Emotional abuse as such was not often ascribed to individual staff but was generic and described as systemic in nature.

The Nature and Extent of Emotional Abuse

110 Sixty-four male applicants reported emotional abuse in combination with other types of abuse. None of them reported emotional abuse as the only form of abuse they experienced.

- One establishment was the subject of emotional abuse reports by 24 applicants
- One establishment was the subject of emotional abuse reports by 22 applicants
- One establishment was the subject of emotional abuse reports by 21 applicants
- One establishment was the subject of emotional abuse reports by two applicants
- Four establishments were each the subject of emotional abuse reports by one individual applicant.

Some of the male applicants had been placed in more than one establishment. Nine applicants made allegations of experiencing emotional abuse in more than one establishment.

111 The range of emotional abuse described in the eight establishments is set out in the table below.

Type of emotional abuse	Number of reports
Shown no affection	9
Public humiliation	14
Personal denigration	13
Removal of personal belongings	14
Family denigration	20
Family contact discouraged	18
Sibling links discouraged	12
Inappropriate exposure to fearful situations	30
Other	7
Total	137

Personal Emotional Abuse

112 Applicants who recounted emotional abuse spoke of living in fear, being ridiculed and belittled by staff and older residents and having to remain vigilant at certain times or at all times. Some applicants described a childhood characterised by fear and loneliness with the absence of emotional warmth and encouragement. One applicant said "no one cared for you…you were totally alone." Applicants spoke of feeling depersonalised with little or no recognition that they, as children, were individuals with feelings. There were descriptions of applicants being given a number and referred to by such, and not addressed by their given name.

113 Applicants provided accounts of being publicly humiliated, citing examples of those who were bed-wetters being ridiculed in the presence of their fellow residents. Some applicants recounted that they were so frightened of wetting the bed that they were afraid to fall asleep in case this would happen and they would have to face the consequences of being ridiculed and beaten in the morning.

Applicants alleged that staff in certain establishments inspected their underwear. One applicant recalled that when he was around twelve years of age, the boys had to stand in line and had to hold out their underpants for inspection. If the underwear was stained, they were publically berated and at times beaten by staff. One applicant alleged that if one boy's underwear was stained, all the boys were punished by having their pocket money docked, adding "the shame of having to do this was worse than the beatings." One applicant recalled an instance when a boy soiled himself and a member of staff rubbed the soiled underwear in his face; the applicant commented that this was "barbaric."

114 There were accounts of staff making inappropriate comments to children and derogatory name calling, such as "scar face", "stupid", "space boy" and "rabbit teeth." One applicant recounted some members of staff mocking him due to his speech impediment. Another applicant was referred to as a "mongrel" as his parents were from a mixed religious background. One applicant recounted that he was commonly addressed by staff as a "rotten egg…from the backstreets of Belfast." Several applicants alleged that they were called a "dirty bastard" and others were told they were in care because "no one wanted you." One applicant recounted watching a staff member approach another resident and coldly tell him his mother had died and then just walk away from the boy.

115 Three applicants who had been in the same large establishment reported that the boys who wet the bed were made to sleep in the 'wet house'. This was in the grounds, separate from the main house, and the boys had to run up to the main house in the morning holding their wet sheets while some of the older boys jeered at them.

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

116 Some applicants said that contact with their birth families was not promoted or supported and that this caused them great regret and sadness. One applicant who was discharged in the 1960s recounted that: "my parents were treated like dirt" when they came to visit and were received very differently to the "upper class visitors who would come to take children out". The visitors would be taken into "nice rooms with toys in them" but his mother was made to wait in a cold corridor.

117 One applicant told the Forum that his grandparents, to whom he was very attached, regularly made the long journey to see him in the establishment. He described staff ridiculing and sneering at them, calling them inappropriate names and refusing to allow them to enter the premises. Immediately after his grandparents left, staff would throw the food they had brought him into the bin.

118 Several applicants said that they were not informed that they had siblings in the same establishment. Applicants who did know their sibling(s), recounted that their important bond should have been promoted instead of being frustrated or obstructed. One applicant recounted that his little brother was in another part of the establishment and the only time they saw one another was when he got into trouble and was brought to the part of the building where the applicant was based. He reflected that he believed his little brother "deliberately got into trouble, just so he could see him."

119 One applicant spoke of an older sister travelling to see him. He referred to the lack of public transport at that time, and described her lengthy travel as a "camel's journey." On some occasions, she was refused entry by staff. If she was permitted to see him, it was for no more than ten to fifteen minutes. He felt that these actions were intended to punish him. One applicant alleged that he received a letter from his sister eight years after she had written it. Another applicant alleged that the letters he had written to his sisters were not posted to them.

120 Another applicant described the impact of his separation from his siblings when he was admitted into care. He recounted that he was initially placed with his brother, who was vulnerable and was suddenly moved to another placement without explanation as to why. They were given no opportunity to say goodbye to each other.

The following quotations are further examples of what applicants said about sibling contact:

> "I didn't know my brothers were resident in…at the same time."
>
> "My sisters were placed in another institution and although they attended the same Church every Sunday, I was not told they were my sisters."
>
> "I saw my younger sister in church and climbed over the pews to her and was later physically punished by a member of staff."
>
> "Some of my family were denied contact with me as they were of a different religious persuasion."

121 Some applicants also felt that they were prevented by staff from enquiring about or mentioning family members. One applicant, who had spent all of his childhood in care, plucked up the courage as a teenager to ask staff "can you tell me who my mother is?" and was promptly told "You don't need to know…we have done our best for you." This applicant commented

> "It is very hard not to know who your parents are – other boys found out and it helped them."

122 Some applicants told the Forum that the threat of ending contact with family members was often used by staff. One applicant, who had formed a strong attachment to his foster carer and referred to her as his "holiday mum", alleged that he was told constantly that he would not be allowed to go and stay with her if he was guilty of the slightest misdemeanour. He added that being with her was "the only happy time of my childhood".

123 An applicant who had regular contact with his mother recalled how he always waved goodbye to her from the first floor window of the establishment. He remembered one occasion when he was going to the window to wave to her as usual, a member of staff stopped him, asked him where he was going and said, "Stop your nonsense." He was especially upset as he knew his mother would be waiting for him to wave as usual.

Bullying by Older Residents

124 Applicants recounted bullying by older residents as a cause of emotional abuse. There were descriptions of older boys being placed in charge of the younger children without appropriate adult supervision in place. One applicant referred to the older boys as devils, and said that the younger children went "through hell" adding, "you could hear their terror".

Exposure to Fearful Situations

125 Some applicants alleged that some of the staff deliberately tried to scare the residents; for example, several applicants referred to residents being thrown into an outdoor swimming pool despite staff knowing they were unable to swim. One applicant alleged that he was thrown into the deep end of this pool and older boys had to rescue him. There was reference to a boy who could not swim begging the staff member not to throw him into the pool, "Please, I'll give you a shilling from my pocket money to stop." This applicant commented that the member of staff could sense the fear in some of the boys and appeared to take pleasure from seeing their terror.

126 Several applicants referred to a staff member in one establishment who wore a white sheet over his head and looked through the windows when they were in bed. One applicant remarked that this may have been seen by him as a harmless prank but the outcome resulted in young children being frightened. One applicant spoke of a staff member regularly driving a tractor towards him and pushing him towards an electric fence, laughing as he did so.

General Emotional Abuse

127 Some applicants said that staff threatened them with being sent to more restrictive establishments such as a psychiatric or penal establishment. Applicants recounted Christmas parties or receiving gifts from different charitable organisations but alleged that the toys were immediately removed, not to be seen again. An applicant recalled an older brother visiting from abroad bringing toys and clothes. Once his brother left, these items were removed.

128 Another applicant made the distinction between those who had been in care for long periods of time or all of their childhood and those who had some experience of family life. He commented that those who had been subject to long-stay care were "already programmed", adding, "I may have come from a crappy home but I always had that frame." This applicant further suggested that those who had spent long periods of their formative years in care establishments were perhaps inclined to be more compliant and accepting of the harsh treatment as they had known nothing different.

129 Applicants summed their experiences up as follows:

> "I never heard so many boys crying. It was all about control – no affection, no community, and no balance."
>
> "You could smell the fear in that place."
>
> "It was a big stigma of being a home boy…we were in isolation and that formed you to be different from society."
>
> "They didn't treat you nice…it was like how an animal would be treated."
>
> "There was no love, life was just a ritual."
>
> "It was pure torture."
>
> "If one person broke the rules, everyone had to do the punishment."
>
> "Expressing feelings was discouraged and encouragement a rarity."
>
> "Fear was put into you from day one…What was done in the home stayed in the home."

Neglect: The Nature and Extent of Neglect

130 Forty-eight male applicants made 50 reports concerning the neglect of their care and welfare in seven establishments in voluntary provision. The largest number of complaints (fourteen) concerned inadequate staff/supervision, excessive work demands (nine) and inadequate diet (eight). Complaints were also made about inadequate medical attention, inadequate education, inadequate clothing and footwear, poor hygiene practices and inadequate heating and bedding.

Diet

131 The reports of poor food came from applicants who were placed in establishments in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Some of the applicants said they were in receipt of a school meal and this was a main staple in their diet. One applicant recounted that "I experienced hunger many a time", and recalled an incident when a resident who received special treatment threw his orange peel away and the boys fought to get it.

132 An applicant recounted that the staff ate well but the residents' food was poor and they were often hungry. Applicants, whose establishments had adjoining farms with livestock, said they saw little meat other than that which was cooked for the staff. An applicant commented that the staff had a finely laid table with a big bowl of fruit in the centre: "that was very different from what the children received." One applicant reflected that although the food was plain and lacked variety, it was acceptable while others referred to the food being poor in quality and quantity. One applicant commented that there was no difference in the food no matter what the occasion: "no allowances for Christmas".

Clothing

133 Some of the applicants described the clothing they had to wear as "hand-me-down" and "ill-fitting". One applicant, who recounted being made to wear boots that were too small, said that the first person to the locker room, where the boots were kept, got the "pickings" leaving younger children disadvantaged. This applicant said that he had to walk to the farm in boots that were too small and felt great relief when he took off his boots and his bare feet touched the earth. The lack of protective clothing for working outside was a common concern reported by applicants.

Heating and Bedding

134 Most of the applicants did not mention the heating and bedding in their establishments. A few applicants remembered being cold and said the dormitories were freezing with some commenting that in winter there was frost on the inside of the windows. One applicant recalled the boys writing their names on the inside of the frosty dormitory windows.

Education

135 Those applicants who complained about their education felt that care staff did not value their education. A major concern mentioned by applicants concerned the low level of expectation regarding their potential to achieve. Several applicants said they had no memory of sitting the 11-plus and those who did, said they were not encouraged to study and there appeared to be an acceptance that they would not do well. One applicant said that he remembered being asked on occasion if he had finished his homework, but no one ever checked to see how well it was done and he was afraid to ask the staff to help. One applicant said he overheard a conversation when a teacher asked a care worker if the children would be doing the 11-plus and she replied that they would not be as, "they are all stupid".

136 Several applicants said that they worked instead of attending school. Another applicant alleged he worked in the laundry and on the farm and was not sent to school. One applicant said he enjoyed working and he always volunteered as "it was better than attending school." One applicant said that prior to his admission into a large establishment, he had been achieving well in school but once he entered care, the standard of his work declined.

137 In general, applicants described their education as deficient and some said they were unable to learn because of the climate of fear in which they were living. Other applicants commented that some of the teaching staff were not interested in their educational development and gave them no encouragement to learn. Many applicants said they left school without qualifications and some said they could hardly read or write. Applicants said that the lack of literacy skills was an embarrassment to them in adulthood and many found ways of hiding this from others.

Excessive Work Demands

138 Some of those applicants who complained of having to work when in care said they were given cleaning duties; others said they were made to work on the farm. Applicants from two large establishments said the work on the adjoining farms involved picking potatoes and baling hay. Some applicants alleged they were hired out to neighbouring farmers and described this work as difficult as it was heavy and they were cold as they were not supplied with appropriate clothing. One applicant commented:

> "It was dark when you went there and dark when you returned."

Several applicants recounted they received small amounts of money for their labour:

> "There were 86 boys in four groups who went potato picking…I think we got two shillings and sixpence every day and we spent it in the tuck shop."

Another applicant remembered picking potatoes for two weeks and asking the farmer for a hen, which he gave to him. He was allowed to keep it and built a hut for it and in due course had an additional two dozen hens which he and another boy looked after. Although they collected many eggs the boys never got any rewards – they all went to the staff. One applicant alleged that he had to work on the farm before he went to school, regardless of the weather.

139 Applicants made the following comments about cleaning and farm work:

> "I was a 'cleaner upper', having to lay the table, work in the laundry, tend to the garden and set the fire."
>
> "I was not appropriately dressed for working outside and peed on my hands to try to warm them up."
>
> "I had to pick potatoes in all weathers, gather hay, polish floors and help with the laundry."
>
> "I was working from around nine years of age, doing the laundry, washing and ironing."
>
> "I had to polish the shoes, wash the dishes, make the beds and, in later years, tend to the animals on the farm and dig potatoes."
>
> "We had to polish and clean floors every Saturday. One day I was set inside a boiler and made to clean it with a wire brush; I was not wearing protective clothing."
>
> "We were kept in on Saturdays to polish the dormitory with rags on our feet. I remember being supervised and always being told to hurry up."
>
> "On weekends we had to work including polishing the floors with blankets tied to our feet – it was fun but hard."

140 Several applicants made no reference to having to work when in their establishments. Some others who did regarded their chores as neither excessive nor onerous. One applicant recounted having to pick potatoes and cut the grass by hand, but he had no complaints as he said he "liked to be kept busy".

Knowledge of Abuse

141 Applicants reported that the staff and residents were aware of much of the abuse as it occurred publicly and was very much a part of everyday life in the establishments. Applicants said that among those who witnessed abuse were other residents, ancillary workers, care staff, teachers, instructors and those in charge. Applicants understood that their peers were too frightened to intervene and some remarked that anyone who did intervene would face severe consequences. Some applicants spoke of their guilt, both at the time and now, prompted by their failure to intervene particularly when the child being punished was a younger sibling.

Disclosing Abuse at the Time

142 In most cases applicants felt unable to disclose their abuse at that time and generally did not talk about what they were experiencing. One applicant posed the question "Who could I tell?".

143 A number of applicants said they did try to talk about what was happening to them but felt they were not believed. In total sixteen of the 75 male applicants disclosed some information about their abuse when it happened or shortly afterwards. The following indicates the role of the persons they told and whether or not they felt believed:

- Seven applicants told their parents/guardians and felt they were believed in five cases
- Three applicants told a person in authority and felt they were not believed
- Four applicants told the police when they were returned after absconding and all felt they were not believed
- Two applicants told other residents and felt believed.

Methods of Coping with Abuse and Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

144 The table that follows sets out the ways that applicants coped with their abuse while in designated establishments. Many described more than one way of coping, so the total recorded is greater than the actual number of applicants. The table also shows the strategies used by alleged abusers to achieve compliance as described by the applicants. There is no correlation between the separate parts of this table. Many applicants said that more than one method was used by some alleged abusers to ensure compliance.

Method of coping	Applicants	Strategies used by alleged abusers	Applicants
Accepted abuse as normal	53	Actual violence to child	63
Fear (personal and general)	87	Atmosphere of general fear	82
Did not know what to do	76	Authority of older person	59
Ran away/tried to run away	21	Told not to tell	10
Withdrew into self	22	Bullying	17
Enuresis	15	Bribery	9
Self harm	8	Grooming	5

145 Male applicants reported that fear of being beaten was a constant feature of their lives in their establishments. They described being in a state of hypervigilance, constantly aware of where they were and who was around them. Applicants described their inability to be spontaneous in their dealings and relationships with other residents and staff. The following comments illustrate commonly expressed views:

"I was always watching…looking over my shoulder. I still do it."

"I have a big regret that I stood there, frightened…I did nothing."

"I can't trust anyone who has authority over me…not the police, not social workers. I rely on myself."

"I was only a child…I knew nothing…I didn't know what was happening was wrong."

Females: Voluntary Provision

146 In total, 70 female applicants who were resident in establishments in the voluntary sector from 1956 to 1975 and who recounted their experiences to the Forum complained of experiencing abuse during their placements. Some applicants alleged experiencing one category of abuse by more than one alleged perpetrator; for example, one may have alleged physical abuse by two or three alleged abusers and may also have reported emotional abuse by one of them or by someone else. The 70 applicants spoke of abuse in fifteen establishments. The following table sets out the combinations of types of abuse they alleged.

Abuse types	Applicants	Establishments
Physical, emotional, neglect and sexual	10	4
Physical, emotional and neglect	25	6
Physical, emotional and sexual	2	2
Physical and neglect	2	1
Physical and emotional	6	4
Physical and sexual	1	1
Emotional and neglect	7	6
Emotional and sexual	1	1
Emotional, neglect and sexual	1	1

Abuse types	Applicants	Establishments
Emotional only	8	7
Sexual only	1	1
Physical only	3	3
Neglect only	3	3
Total	70	40 (15 different establishments)

Physical Abuse

147 Forty-nine female applicants described being physically abused in nine separate establishments. They reported 91 instances of physical abuse. The following table sets out the extent of reports of physical abuse per establishment.

Applicants	Establishments	Reports/instances
30	1	65
8	1	16
3	2	4
2	1	3
4	2	2
2	2	1
Total - 49	9	91

148 Physical abuse was most usually reported in combination with other types of abuse with an exception of three applicants who reported physical abuse only. These three applicants were in three separate establishments.

Descriptions of Physical Abuse

149 Applicants described being physically abused in a variety of ways, including being beaten, slapped across the face, and punched across the head or shoulders, being pinched repeatedly and being kicked. The Forum was told of instances where applicants had their heads knocked against walls and school desks. Being pulled by the hair across the classroom was reported by some and was said to be very painful. A few applicants also mentioned being swung by their hair.

150 There were frequent references to having to kneel for long periods as a punishment. Applicants said that this happened more often at night and the darkness added to the distress felt. Some described being locked in confined spaces, usually after a beating, and this included being confined in cupboards, under the stairs and in outside sheds. There were also reports of being struck with implements including leather straps, rulers across the knuckles, metal spoons, wooden spoons, wooden hairbrushes, sticks, slippers, a piece of wood, bamboo canes and bunches of keys. Many applicants reported being beaten every day while others spoke about specific incidents where the punishment was particularly severe. They reported being physically abused by religious and lay staff as well as by other adults employed in the establishments. There were also reports of physical abuse by older residents who were put in charge of younger children. The following descriptions and direct quotations from applicants are indicative of the information given to the Forum.

151 An applicant said that a staff member beat her in school with a bamboo stick across the legs. She was hit frequently, almost daily. She was hit with a cane on her knuckles or the palms of her hands. She said she was struck on her face and her hair was pulled. She also described being hit on the head with a hair brush. She recalled a very harsh beating that she received when she stayed on at school, against staff wishes, to take part in a school entertainment. She said she was beaten badly. She was also beaten for wetting the bed. This attracted particularly severe punishment. Her older sister often changed sheets with her to try to pre-empt her being beaten.

152 Another applicant described beatings as a daily occurrence

> "...I just took it as the norm – if I had mentioned it at the time who would have believed religious people would do that?"

Hearing other children being beaten was reported frequently and was described as particularly distressing; one applicant recalled an incident when she heard a staff member beating a child in the cubicles in the toilets:

> "she was screaming...it was just awful...you were pleased it was not you but it was horrible..."

153 An applicant, placed in an establishment in the 1970s when she was in her teenage years, described being beaten with a bamboo cane across the palms of her hand. She spoke of the cane snapping and the staff member commenting "there's plenty more where that came from". Another cane was produced there and then. This applicant also described a regime of being beaten and seeing other children being beaten and referring to the situation as one of control, guilt and fear.

154 Bed-wetting attracted very frequent punishments:

> "I was hit around the head and…all over my body…I had to stand up for a long time, for ever…in front of everyone. Staff beat you…I don't know the names, I can't remember."

155 One applicant spoke of the daily experience of being hit for no reason:

> "It was a good day when you were not hit…I kept quiet, said nothing; I was hit whether right or wrong…the member of staff who did it was a very angry person. She got red in face when angry. The children knew her moods."

156 Another applicant, who spent eleven years in one establishment, spoke of being beaten repeatedly throughout that time for bed-wetting, and for any and every misbehaviour, no matter how small, and for none. She described how her face was pushed into her wet sheets. She finally left the establishment in 1975 when she was sixteen. One applicant summed up the feelings expressed by many saying:

> "There was a total lack of love or affection; it was a very intimidating environment where you were consistently treated in a demeaning way and told that you were worthless. If you tried to have any fun the staff would come down on you straight away and suppress any fun."

157 The most commonly reported circumstances that led to physical punishment were: bed-wetting, talking during the many periods of the day when silence was demanded, failure to complete tasks either in the classroom or the allocated work in the establishment, left-handedness, having fun or refusing to eat the food at meal times. Coughing and talking in church were particularly frowned on. As girls got into their teenage years any efforts they made to improve their appearance were interpreted as trying to engage boys' attention and they were punished severely. Other commonly reported reasons for being hit included the misbehaviour of younger siblings or any younger child of whom an applicant had charge and being sick (looking for notice was how staff characterised this). Running away from the establishment resulted in very harsh treatment. Soiling pants when menstruating was also dealt with severely, yet the practice in some establishments of restricting the availability of sanitary protection made it impossible to maintain cleanliness. There were times in each establishment when infestations of scabies and/or head lice were common and the treatment of having heads shaved and of having emulsion applied in a rough manner was a focus of some complaints of physical abuse.

Physical Abuse by more than one Person

158 There were multiple allegations of abuse, as follows:

- One applicant alleged physical abuse by six people
- two applicants alleged physical abuse by five people
- three applicants alleged abuse by four people
- six applicants alleged abuse by three people while sixteen applicants alleged abuse by two people.

The remaining 21 applicants alleged abuse by one person. In most instances reported the alleged abusers acted independently.

Roles of Alleged Abusers

159 The table that follows shows the position within the institution of the alleged abusers. Please note that other residents were sometimes noted as bullies by applicants but not identified on the whole by name and are not included in the table below. It was not possible to ascertain how many residents were also physically abusive.

Role of alleged abuser	Male	Female	Member of Religious Order/ Clergy
Officer in charge/ authority figure	-	38	33
Teacher/instructor	-	14	9
Care staff	2	48	42
Ancillary staff	1	1	-
Other (role not clear)	1	-	-
Total	4	101	84

It is noteworthy that of the 105 alleged abusers, 84 were members of a religious order or a parish priest.

Sexual Abuse

160 This section describes sexual abuse reported by sixteen female applicants to the Forum. The sexual assaults reported were both contact and non-contact in nature and happened both in the establishments and away from the establishments, particularly while the applicants were on holiday or with weekend families. The majority of the applicants found this aspect of abuse very difficult to speak about; some described having tried to block out what happened for many years and feeling that they were in some way responsible for what had occurred. The secretive and isolated nature of sexual abuse coupled with the applicants' lack of knowledge regarding sexual development left many of them very bewildered and without the language to describe what had happened.

Nature and Extent of Sexual Abuse

161 The sixteen applicants recounted 31 instances of sexual abuse in respect of eight separate establishments in the voluntary sector. Fifteen applicants described sexual abuse in combination with other types of abuse while one applicant complained solely of sexual abuse.

Description of Sexual Abuse

162 The full range of types and numbers of reports of sexual abuse are set out in the following table.

Type of sexual abuse	Number of reports
Inappropriate fondling	9
Vaginal rape	3
Attempted rape	1
Anal rape	1
Oral/genital contact	3
Digital penetration	4
Masturbation of alleged abuser	3
Indecent exposure	5
Kissing	1
Witnessing sexual abuse	1
Total	31

163 Some descriptions and direct quotations from applicants are set out in the following paragraphs and are representative of the information given to the Forum. Ten applicants spoke to the Forum of sexual abuse suffered within the precincts of the establishments. Two applicants described sexual abuse by visiting clergy; one of the priests was said to have been there every weekend and an applicant described being made to wait until last to attend confession and being brought to a room in the church where she was fondled, made to masturbate the abuser and finally was subjected to anal rape. The abuser was said to have groomed her initially by providing sweets but then turned to violence, telling her she would not be believed if she reported what he was doing. Another applicant spoke of being taken out in a red sports car by a priest:

> "three of us always went, he had sweets, and he kissed and hugged us."

164 Two instances were recounted in which applicants were working in or visiting the elderly male residents' section of the establishment. Both applicants described being fondled while being held on a resident's knees and one believed it was obvious to others what was happening. Neither spoke of staff being in the vicinity when this occurred.

165 Abuse by older residents was described by four applicants. This abuse occurred mainly in the dormitories at night when older girls would take younger girls into their bed and force them into sexual behaviour ranging from fondling to oral sexual contact and masturbation of the alleged abuser. Actual violence or threatened violence was common in these situations. One applicant, placed in a hostel for a short period of time, described being taken to an office by three male residents and having photographs taken of one of the men fondling her. This happened on more than one occasion. She was very young and appears not to have had any proper supervision while living in a mixed hostel.

166 One applicant, who had had placements in two establishments, described serious abuse by the officer in charge of one establishment who fondled and groped her, inserted objects into her vagina and forced her to engage in masturbation. The applicant was prepubescent at this time and suffered regular violence from the same staff member. There was a description of sexual abuse in an establishment involving former residents, by that stage adults, who were working there:

> "They were grabbing at you all the time…they had easy access to the dormitory…always, grabbing and fondling. It was a free for all…I learnt to run."

167 Five instances of sexual abuse reported to the Forum occurred when the applicants were staying with 'holiday families' away from their establishments. Two applicants alleged they were abused by members of their holiday families and another by a member of the extended family she was taken to visit. The alleged abuser was a member of a religious order. One applicant alleged she was raped by both the father and an uncle of her holiday family. One applicant alleged that at age seven she was raped by the son of the holiday family who was much older than she was. On return to the family home she was put in the bath and then sent back to the establishment. She described her shock at what happened and knows she never went back to that family but does not remember if anyone else was aware of what had occurred. A fourth applicant spoke of her experience of being fondled and being made to touch the genitals of a relative of the holiday family when she was taken to see him. The fifth applicant spoke of being touched and fondled by an older son in the family and also spoke of the father in the family exposing himself to her. Three of the four applicants who were sexually abused in holiday families described their emotional conflict resulting from having formed an attachment to the mothers in the families and to other younger children while not wanting the unwelcome attentions of the males.

Sexual Abuse by More than One Person

168 One applicant reported that she was abused by four different alleged abusers; two applicants reported they were each abused by three abusers, while thirteen applicants each alleged abuse by one abuser. The table that follows sets out the roles of alleged abusers as recalled by applicants.

Role of the Alleged Abuser	Females	Males	Member of Religious Order/ Clergy
Officer-in-charge/ authority figure	2	-	1
Care staff	1	-	-
Other adults	-	3	-
Other Residents	5	2	-
Visitors	-	5	3
Members of host families	-	6	1
Totals	8	16	5

Emotional Abuse

169 This section of the report describes emotional abuse in establishments in voluntary sector provision. Emotional abuse covers a range of actions and inactions that deprived the applicants of family and sibling contacts, knowledge of their own identity, affection and approval and protection from harm appropriate to their age and developmental needs. In their descriptions of emotional abuse to the Forum the applicants most often referred to practices and routines, for example, the separation of siblings and the removal of all personal belongings or signs of individualisation from the children, both on admission and throughout their stay in establishments. Emotional abuse as such was not often ascribed to individual staff but was generic and systemic in nature.

Nature and Extent of Emotional Abuse

170 Emotional abuse was the form of abuse mentioned most frequently by the 52 female applicants in this Period. Those applicants spoke of emotional abuse in twelve separate establishments in the voluntary sector. Forty-four applicants reported emotional abuse in combination with other types of abuse while eight applicants reported emotional abuse only. The range of emotional abuse described in the twelve establishments was as follows.

Type of emotional abuse	Number of reports
Shown no affection	18
Public humiliation	15
Personal denigration	19
Removal of personal belongings	15
Family denigration	15
Family contact discouraged	19
Sibling links discouraged	15
Inappropriate exposure to fearful situations	22
Other	9
Total	147

171 The recorded instances of emotional abuse are those of which the applicants were most keenly aware. They described the impact of that abuse on them both at the time it occurred and in their lives afterwards. The emotional abuse described to the Forum fell into three main categories: personal abuse both in private and in public; separation from and denigration of family and siblings; and inappropriate exposure to fearful situations. A small number of reported experiences were outside those broad categories and are dealt with separately.

Personal Emotional Abuse

172 This was the focus of 67 experiences of emotional abuse described to the Forum. Applicants spoke of:

- having their personal belongings removed, including small tokens that were all they had to help them remember family or home, and
- experiencing public humiliation in front of their classmates, their group in the establishment, the church congregation or wherever they happened to be.

One applicant spoke of her experience during a two-year placement:

> "I was constantly told by staff that I was unworthy...nobody wanted me...she (staff) constantly reminded me...'your mother is no better than a tramp'...We were all called by our surnames – never by our individual names."

This applicant spoke also of the removal of clothes and money given to her by foster families on her return from short stays with them and said she never saw the gifts again. She described her placement overall as a very cold place, where no affection was shown.

173 Another applicant spoke of the difficulty she experienced with a senior staff member whom she believed had a grudge against her from early in her placement:

> "She always made remarks: 'Aren't you the clever girl' but I never knew if she was being sarcastic or genuine."

She further described her inability to do something right for this staff member:

> "...if you looked her in the eye when being spoken to you were called defiant but if you failed to look her in the eye you would be reprimanded for being insolent."

This applicant ran away after a severe beating and was returned to the establishment. She recalled that the same staff member then called her "Lady (family name). Oh we're not allowed to hit you now."

174 Another applicant talked about the daily denigration she experienced in relation to bed-wetting and the public humiliation involved:

> "...I was told on a daily basis by staff 'you are smelly...nobody could love you...why do you think anyone would want to sit beside you'...that was the constant refrain."

She described the morning ritual for those who wet the bed; all had to stand in line and then had to walk from the bedroom to deposit the wet sheets in a basket; she described it as being "like a ceremony…everyone saw it." Another applicant described the weekly routine in which underwear was inspected:

> "They (two members of staff) had each girl hold up the gusset of their knickers for inspection…I never understood the purpose of this."

175 The removal of personal possessions was keenly felt by many applicants and the following accounts are typical of the accounts given:

> "Everything you got was taken off you at the door…I got money for Communion, it was two shillings and sixpence. I got sweets to bring back to sisters…all were taken…there was no explanation."

Another applicant was deeply distressed by the removal of a doll her mother had given to her. She explained that her family was poor and despite that her mother had managed to get this doll for her. It was very special to her and she felt its loss doubled the loss she experienced when coming into the care system: "I can still see it and almost feel it."

176 One applicant spoke of being constantly told her mother did not want her and that she and her brother should be grateful they were in the care of the establishment.

Although she could go home at the weekend for a day, one applicant explained why she chose not to go on some occasions: a senior staff member always told her to ask her parents for money. When she returned with no money she would be publicly berated:

> "We can't afford to keep you…Do you think we are a charity?"

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

177 A second area of emotional abuse keenly felt by applicants covered the separation from siblings even within the same establishment, the poor treatment of families who visited the establishments to see their children, the lack of privacy during those visits and the active discouragement and the discourtesy shown to parents who were seen as "undesirable". In particular, applicants whose parents were members of the Traveller community reported that this was a common occurrence and that they were neither welcomed nor wanted by the establishments.

178 Applicants said that strict control was exercised over all family visits. Visits were never actually encouraged but when family members visited they were supervised, even where it appeared there was no threat to the child or young person. As one applicant recalled "Aunt D visited…staff always sat in…we couldn`t be ourselves." If there were concerns over the appropriateness of some visits by parents to see their children, this was never explained and applicants were told simply they could not see them. Some applicants saw their parents treated differently to other visitors:

> "They made our mother wait out in the cold…she had travelled hours to see us…barely time to say hello…then out the gate."

Another applicant spoke of her mother's occasional visits,

> "She got no welcome…she had to come to the back door where we fed the poor…we were made to be ashamed of her."

179 One applicant from a large family spoke of her joy when her father called in but she learned later that the staff

> "were angry with my father for dropping off small bags of oranges for us…when we went out for weekend we were told to ask for money."

There appeared to be no understanding of the sense of loss and upset children felt during visits and a number of applicants spoke of visits being stopped because they displayed upset when parents left.

> "Father came up…my younger sisters cried…they stopped him coming as the girls were upset when he left."

180 Another applicant said that she was not told why she was being taken from her family and placed in the establishment. She had very strong links with her grandmother who would visit her but when her grandmother died the staff did not tell her and she only found out sometime later. She was very upset for a period of time but got no emotional support. When her crying was judged to be out of control

> "…they instead placed me in an isolation room…we were meant not to feel…to be like them."

181 The major cause of upset for many applicants was the separation from their siblings. Sibling groups were often placed in establishments, rather than being brought up separately within extended families, because parents wanted them to remain together. The structuring of most establishments into gender and age groupings ensured that did not happen and many of the applicants spoke of the distress this caused, and continues to cause, as they lost knowledge of and closeness to their sisters and brothers. One applicant who was older than her siblings and whose mother believed they would be kept together, spoke of what happened:

> "In the event we…(she and one sister, the boys were gone)…were taken to a lobby in (named establishment)…I was distraught with worry about the others."

She described being frightened by the austere surroundings and alarmed that no one would listen to her when she approached them to ask about her siblings. That fear and anxiety was to stay with her, she told the Forum, throughout her two years in the home. One applicant said:

> "I did nothing but cry all of my childhood…I didn't see much of my sister as we were separated, I just remember her screaming a lot."

182 Another applicant, who was part of a large sibling group, found the absence of her older sisters very disturbing. The older girls were placed in another part of the building and she wanted to go to them for reassurance and comfort. This was not allowed by the staff. One applicant described how she saw her siblings:

> "…I was only able to see the older ones through railings separating playgrounds. Sometimes I saw them when we went to church…I would shout for them to join me but they were never allowed."

Other applicants spoke of seeing very little of their brothers and sisters who were in the same or adjacent establishments. They might see them on Saturdays if allowed to go downtown, or at school but no effort was made to get them together and gradually all contact was lost. Younger children were often described as forgetting they even had older sisters or brothers.

183 One applicant summed up what many said to Forum:

> "…family, brothers, sisters….relationships were not encouraged at all…I ended up not knowing them…they ended up not knowing me…I was not allowed to say goodbye when I was discharged…I knew I was not welcome to return to see those left behind."

Exposure to Fearful Situations

184 Applicants described being locked into small spaces with no light, often with restricted ability to move and being terrified they would be left there to die or just be forgotten about. One applicant spoke of being put into a hot press/drying cupboard for sheets; she described:

> "it as very dark, no place to move as there were bars across for putting sheets on."

She said she was put in twice as part of the same punishment and described herself as "being scared to death."

185 Another applicant told the Forum about the staff member who was always talking about the devil.

> "She (staff member) had a thing about the devil…She had a stick for the window with a hook on it…she would open the window to let the devil out, she once told me she saw the devil dancing on my locker…it terrified me for ages."

This applicant also described the practice whereby children had to sleep at night with their arms crossed, hands on shoulders so that, if they died during the night, they would go to heaven. They were told that if their arms were not crossed they would "burn in hell." Many applicants placed in institutions during the 1950s and early 1960s were told to sleep in that position and were given the same explanation.

186 Another experience recalled by some applicants was the practice of preparing the dead for burial, referred to as "laying out the dead." This was described in a small number of institutions where retired staff members were resident and also where there was residential provision for older people in another part of the establishment or in adjacent accommodation. One applicant remembered:

> "When old people died in the annex I had to go and see them and pray for them…I was often left in the room with another child or on my own…I wondered if they might wake up…I didn't know what death was."

Another applicant said:

> "…I was made to go and dress the dead and say a prayer…I had to lay the men out in brown shrouds and the woman in blue shrouds…I was always terrified."

187 Another applicant described her punishment for some misdemeanour as follows:

> "Staff locked me in the dining room with a bird that was there, it was flying widely about…there was no furniture in the room as it was being done up…I wet myself and was terrified."

188 Some applicants told the Forum of the fear of being sent away to more restrictive establishments. They explained that both implicit and explicit threats were made that they would be sent to a psychiatric hospital or to a laundry. They understood they would be kept in these establishments indefinitely. The threats described were most often made in reaction to episodes of absconding. Two applicants recounted their experiences:

> "I ran away, I was brought back, I ran again…one time after the usual treatment (physical punishment) she (staff member) pushed me up against the wall…'just wait…leave again and you will be sent to (named establishment)…you won't leave there so fast'…I knew she was not just threatening me…others had gone."

Deprivation of Affection

189 Lack of affection was generally described by applicants as the absence of a kind word, never being praised or encouraged, never having any distress acknowledged and being unable to talk to anyone when hurt, ill or unhappy. When children tried to get attention for any of those reasons they were said by staff to be "looking for notice." Comments made by applicants in their meetings with the Forum included the following:

> "No one took the time or effort to make you feel comfortable and at ease."
>
> "There was no love, no kindness at all, no love no nothing – just like a prisoner not even thought about, I don't think they even ever called you by name…It was very unpleasant I wouldn't put my worst enemy in it."
>
> "Lots of bullying and neglect, abusive shouting all the time, I was isolated from my siblings who were in the same institution. I was always crying, I was cold and hungry all the time…I listened to others crying all around me, no comfort was given."
>
> "I was never shown affection…I felt ignored all my childhood."

General Emotional Abuse

190 Many applicants spoke of an atmosphere that was cold and forbidding. One applicant who described herself as "a pet of the officer in charge" said she recognised that everyday life in her placement was ruled by the regime that was in place and that there was no understanding from anyone. Another applicant spoke of having had to keep her eyes downcast when staff passed or spoke to her. An applicant who was placed in a laundry as a thirteen year old, described being put to work and deprived of a normal education. She said:

"...I lived in a suffocating environment where normal teenage life was not available and where everyday life was deliberately excluded by them."

191 Finally, an applicant spoke of the consequences of being prevented from having normal social interaction with other girls. She said that, if that had been allowed, she could have expressed feelings such as those prompted by the loss of her granny and her separation from her two younger brothers to whom she had been like a mother. She commented:

"Each girl learned to keep to herself...no friendships were allowed."

Neglect

192 Thirty-five applicants made 57 reports concerning the neglect of their care and welfare in twelve establishments designated as voluntary sector provision. The 35 applicants complained of neglect as follows:

Type of neglect	Number of Reports
Inadequate diet	7
Inadequate clothing/footwear	7
Poor hygiene practices	7
Inadequate medical attention	5
Inadequate heating/bedding	5
Inadequate education	8
Inadequate staffing	2
Excessive work demands	9
Lack of supervision in institution	4
Lack of play opportunities	3
Total	57

Diet

193 There were seven reports of poor diet made to the Forum. Some applicants spoke of poor quality food while others spoke of regularly going hungry. Some examples are given below:

"There was donated food but this was not given...to us. I ate from the gutters and picked chewing gum off the ground...I was always hungry."

"The food was poor quality, there was not enough, I was always hungry, I was forced to eat semolina and bread pudding even though this was nauseous. Salty, lumpy porridge and bread with dripping was the main diet with scraggy meat now and then."

"If you refused to eat food like inedible fat, gristle and burned food, they would take it away but then bring it back until you ate it. I wasn't starved but I was hungry and would steal food if the opportunity arose."

"The food was bad – porridge, bread…the children could smell the lovely food such as roast beef being cooked for the staff."

The majority of the reports concerning poor diet were made by applicants who were placed in voluntary establishments from 1956 to 1969. There were few complaints about diet in relation to provision in the period 1970 to 1975.

Clothing/Footwear

194 Seven reports of inadequate clothing and footwear were made to the Forum. The clothing provided for some applicants was described as consisting of a dress with the sleeves always rolled up and with an apron worn over it. There were some references to having smarter clothes for going out of the establishment. Clothing, including footwear, was said to have been shared and was often ill-fitting or already well worn when applicants received it. Applicants told the Forum that although school uniform was provided "it was different from the others". The following quotations are taken from applicants' accounts of their experiences.

"The shoes were too big, they often had holes, nails were often protruding. It was a free-for-all grabbing shoe; you were lucky if you got a reasonable pair."

"We were given pinafores, all second hand; you were made to wear size seven wellingtons in wet weather regardless of the size of your feet…we didn't matter."

"Although I had been provided with clothes by an aunt and uncle, these were taken from me and I was given old fashioned clothes to wear and…used footwear."

"…not having any socks at all…it was very cold."

Education

195 Primary education for most of the female applicants in voluntary establishments was provided on the premises. They received their secondary education in local schools. The eight applicants who expressed concerns about their education described the standard as poor. The complaints ranged from being placed at the back of the class and being ignored to being called out to complete chores and so missing opportunities to learn. The following are some examples of what applicants told the Forum:

> "I went to school; I was told I was stupid. I got no assistance with my work. I was very frightened at school, and I was unable to concentrate."
>
> "At school I was always placed at the back, I was discouraged from asking questions, I was hardly able to read or write when I left school."
>
> "I was called out of class to do cleaning and when I left school I was so far behind in my work I was unable to read or write to any extent. I was very rarely in class: I would get messages from (named staff member) to do jobs instead of school work – scrub floors, clean shoes…education was not for the likes of us!"
>
> "The only thing I learned in the home…was what fear and pain were like. In school I was placed in what was known as the 'dunces' class."
>
> "Teaching in the primary school was poor and I became inattentive. When I made good progress in the pupil referral unit, my reports were disregarded and I got no encouragement."

196 Finally an applicant who was discharged to the care of her mother in England, just before she was due to take her public exams, felt cheated out of her chance to better herself:

> "I would have done well in exams and I really regret not being given this opportunity…It had a long term adverse affect on job opportunities… what difference would a month have made to them?"

Excessive Work Demands

197 Nine applicants spoke of excessive work demands being made on them from early childhood until they left the care system. This was coupled with poor staffing ratios in the larger establishments, a very high standard of cleanliness being demanded and responsibility for maintaining this being placed on the residents. Applicants' comments included:

> "From the age of eleven years we were made to work…cleaning, scrubbing, polishing…in the chapel, dormitories, long corridor, bathrooms, laundry (including for staff and old people), looking after the elderly people, pumping the church organ, putting coal in the furnace – we were treated as an unpaid skivvy."
>
> "Every Friday night five pairs of girls on their knees scrubbed corridors and the chapel. I never saw staff do physical work. I had special duties to look after an older girl who had learning difficulties and I became completely responsible for her."

"(a member of staff) told me…we are delighted when you get punished, we get great work out of you."

Poor Hygiene Practices

198 Seven applicants highlighted the poor hygiene practices they experienced in establishments in the voluntary sector. There were two common complaints highlighted by all seven:

- The lack of privacy for bathing and the overuse of Jeyes Fluid in the baths.
- The lack of preparation for and practical assistance with the onset and management of menstruation.

An applicant, describing bath time and the lack of privacy, said:

"we were like animals in a shed lined up, one child was in the bath, one sat on the edge of the bath washing her feet, others lined up waiting their turn in the same water; the only attempt at modesty was for two girls to hold up a sheet for the girl getting out of the bath."

Another applicant described being bathed in Jeyes Fluid resulting in irritation in her eyes and skin and said that so much Jeyes Fluid was used it left brown marks on her skin.

199 Applicants commented on the lack of preparation they received for the onset of menstruation and the inadequate provision made for them during their menstrual period. Applicants told the Forum that they had to ask for sanitary towels. Staff might not respond promptly to a girl's requests but reply that she had been given a sanitary towel in the morning. No extra baths were provided for and this lack of hygiene and basic care left many embarrassed and suffering with chaffed legs. No pain relief was allowed. One applicant reported that:

"I started menstruation at eleven…it was very heavy from the start…it was not believed, they said I was too young…(a staff member) made me stay in one room supervised by…and then I was made show my pants to prove it. I fainted and was given water. I got no medical help although I suffered very badly."

Other Issues Raised

200 A small number of applicants expressed concern over other aspects of their care including heating and bedding. Five applicants, whose care placements were in the early 1960s, spoke of being cold or having inadequate bedding:

> "...my bed sagged in the middle and I couldn't lie in it in the position the staff dictated...I was always cold, always freezing, only one sheet on the bed."
>
> "I wet the bed, I was beaten, I had to wash my sheets in cold water...I often lay in cold...damp sheets."

201 Some applicants also recalled that they felt that they did not receive adequate medical attention when they were ill or injured:

> "I suffered from depression in my later years in care and despite my initial attempts at self harm, no-one tried to investigate what might be happening, no one sent me for any help."
>
> "I had a bad fall. I fell outside the sewing room; my knee split open; I was never taken to hospital. I was in pain for a month. It healed itself and I'm left with a bad scar."

202 Three applicants spoke to the Forum concerning the lack of opportunities for play and recreation. They told the Forum that few toys were provided and that the play equipment in the garden was insufficient for the number of children. The Forum heard from one applicant who said that toys were produced for inspections and when other visitors were present.

203 Four applicants spoke of the lack of staff supervision, particularly at night time and they felt that this added to their vulnerability in that it allowed older girls to remove the younger ones from their beds and sexually abuse them. Where the work chores were supervised by older girls, the situation was described as "worse than when the staff were in charge."

Knowledge of Abuse

204 Applicants were clear that physical abuse, emotional abuse and neglect were public within the establishment. They said that the staff and co-residents could not have been unaware of what was going on. Applicants acknowledged that other residents were too frightened to intervene and those who did do so were severely punished. This was most likely to happen, they said, if a younger family member was being punished in the presence of an older sister.

Disclosing Abuse at the Time

205 Generally, applicants said they did not disclose anything about their care experiences at the time. Some applicants said they did not know the abuse was wrong, some were very frightened of the consequences because they had seen what had happened to others who had spoken out, and some applicants felt they would not be believed. In total, twenty of the 70 applicants told the Forum that they had disclosed some information about their abuse when it happened or shortly thereafter.

206 The following is a list of the roles of the people the applicants reported to and whether or not they felt believed:

- Six applicants told their parents/guardians and felt they were believed in four cases.
- Five applicants told a person in authority and felt they were not believed.
- Four applicants told the police when they were picked up after absconding; they felt they were not believed.
- Three applicants told their welfare/social worker and felt they were not believed.
- Two applicants told other residents and felt believed.

Some quotations illustrate the points made by the applicants:

> "I finally told (a staff member) she (an older girl) was doing things to me…she (the staff member) was very angry and beat me."
>
> "When I told about sexual things…(to the family she had stayed with) I got the beating of my life."
>
> "I got hit less often after I ran away…I think they got worried."

Methods of Coping with Abuse and Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

207 The table below sets out the ways that applicants coped with their abuse while in the care system. Many described a number of responses, so the totals recorded are greater than the actual number of applicants. The table also shows the strategies the applicants said were used by alleged abusers to achieve compliance. There is no correlation between the separate parts of this table. Again many applicants described that more than one method was used by some alleged abusers.

Method of coping	Applicants	Strategies used by alleged abusers	Applicants
Accepted abuse as normal	26	Actual violence to child	42
Fear (personal and general)	21	Atmosphere of general fear	35
Did not know what to do	19	Authority of older person	31
Ran away/tried to run away	19	Told not to tell	5
Withdrew into self	14	Bullying	5
Enuresis	10	Bribery	4

208 For many applicants "beatings were everyday, a normal thing" and they accepted that reality. Applicants spoke also of an all-pervasive fear in many establishments that meant children kept quiet, watched out for staff reactions and tried to stay away from those they experienced as harsh. Some applicants described particular responses as follows:

> "I became an every night 'bed-wetter' which, in turn, got me...more abuse."
>
> "I would push people away, I don't trust people...I don't trust the establishment, police or teachers."
>
> "I was very isolated...not being able to talk of the abuse I lived in fear... Even in secondary school, I had no friends until my fourth year."

209 One applicant described what happened when she ran away from one establishment with her sister and stopped at a house to ask for a glass of water. The people of the house called the police, who returned them to the establishment. The policeman, as reported, remarked:

> "I suppose you are going to get a hot drink and cakes when you return to the orphanage?"

The applicant commented that the remark stayed with her as it was the complete opposite – she knew she was going to get a beating, which she did.

210 Four applicants spoke of receiving gifts from their abusers, none of whom were staff members in their establishment.

Abuse in State Provision

211 This section covers the abuse reported to the Forum in state establishments between the years 1956 and 1975. In total, twenty male applicants and ten female applicants spoke about their experiences in sixteen individual establishments in the state sector. The establishments included in this section were largely small units based in community settings. These establishments included a children's home for both male and female children and young people, an assessment centre, a residential medical setting and two hostels. Some applicants did not disclose abuse in regard to some of the state establishments in which they were placed.

212 This section of the report is presented in two parts, with the first part covering the four aspects of abuse reported by male applicants and the second part covering the four aspects of abuse reported by female applicants. The table below shows the combinations of abuse types that were reported to the Forum by both male and female applicants in relation to state establishments.

Abuse types: Males and Females	Applicants	Establishments
Physical, emotional and sexual	2	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	1	1
Physical and emotional	4	4
Emotional and sexual	2	2
Emotional, neglect and sexual	2	2
Sexual only	4	2
Emotional only	1	1
Physical only	4	2
Total	20 (*17 individual applicants)	16 (11 individual establishments)

Note: Three applicants alleged abuse in two establishments each.

Males: State Provision

213 Twenty male applicants had been placed in eight individual establishments in the state sector. Three of those applicants had two placements in different establishments in state sector care provision. Three male applicants had been placed in state establishments in the 1950s. Six male applicants were placed in establishments in the state sector in the 1960s. Five of those applicants had had placements ranging from one to six years in duration. One applicant spent less than one year in care. Eight male applicants had been placed in state establishments in the 1970s. It is notable that during this period, six of these applicants were in placements for a short period of time – one year or less. The other two applicants spent six years and three years respectively in state provision.

Physical Abuse

214 Eight male applicants gave ten accounts of physical abuse with regard to seven separate establishments. One applicant recounted that after he had wet the bed, a male member of staff rubbed his face in the soiled sheet, stripped him naked and forced him into a cold bath. This staff member allegedly grabbed and squeezed the applicant's shoulder, repeatedly telling him he was a "dirty boy". On another occasion, this applicant alleged that the same staff member spat in his face. One applicant recounted that he was physically abused and threatened by a staff member. This applicant referred to being "grabbed by the scruff of the neck and beaten." Following this incident, the applicant said that he ran away.

215 One applicant described a staff member using a dowel rod that was over half an inch thick to beat him. This applicant recounted that he was badly marked as a result of this chastisement. He also alleged that he was slapped around the head, shoved into the dining room and "savagely beaten" across his back and legs. He reflected that "beatings were regular events every few months." This same applicant recounted another incident when he and another boy had been truanting from school and on return to the establishment, a staff member hit him and left marks on his arms, said to be "like sergeant's stripes." This applicant said that the attack only stopped because the staff member had become tired. He alleged that he could not bend his fingers the following day and his ribs ached, commenting, "Who could I tell?"

216 Another applicant recounted that one member of staff would lift him by the ears or sideburns and pinch him on the arm and the back of the neck.

He said he was instructed not to tell the welfare when they came to see him. This applicant commented that he feels he was treated more harshly than his peers as he did not witness other residents being punished in the same way. This applicant also expressed concerns about his treatment in another establishment where a member of staff hit him on the bottom with a stick and washed his mouth out with soap.

217 An applicant recounted that he was frequently beaten with a cane. He also alleged that a female member of staff pushed his head, face-first, into a basin full of water. He said he felt very frightened as he thought this female member of staff was going to drown him. He described her as "completely losing control."

Sexual Abuse

218 Nine male applicants made eleven complaints of sexual abuse by male staff and one further complaint of sexual abuse by a female co-resident. The allegations of sexual abuse relate to four separate state establishments. The male applicants spoke of sexual abuse involving inappropriate fondling, masturbation, anal rape and oral/genital contact.

219 One applicant made allegations of sexual abuse against two individual members of staff who worked as a house father and officer in charge in the establishment. This applicant suggested that both of these staff members operated as lone abusers, independent of one another. This applicant gave a detailed account of the sexual abuse taking place when he was approximately ten years old. During the time of the alleged sexual abuse incidents, which included masturbation and rape, one of his abusers made comments such as, "you're nothing but a dirty wee boy, you can't tell nobody as nobody will believe you" and "I own you." The other member of staff who was alleged to have also sexually abused this applicant took him to his home, made him have oral/genital contact and would make comments such as "you're a good boy, I'm your daddy."

220 One applicant in another establishment, referred to the sexual abuse starting almost immediately upon his admission to this placement. He recounted being taken to a staff member's home and waking up with this male worker on top of him after the alleged sexual assault. Another applicant, also admitted to this establishment, commented that within the first week of his placement as a thirteen-year-old, the same staff member watched him whilst he was having a bath and made comments to him such as, "you're a big boy for your age." The applicant alleged that shortly afterwards he was raped by this male care worker and this continued several times a week. At times, he was made to stay the night with him in the staff bedroom and would be "sneaked out" in the morning before the housekeeper arrived.

221 Another applicant, who was placed in the same establishment, made allegations of anal rape by another staff member. This applicant recalled being raped on a daily basis in his bedroom. The alleged abuse took place in the morning once his co-resident and room-mate had left the premises to go to work. Another applicant in the same establishment alleged he was raped on the same day he attended his father's funeral. The alleged abuser is then alleged to have commented to the applicant, "Did you enjoy that…you will next time" and "Who was a good boy?" Another applicant who made allegations of sexual abuse commented that he felt that the staff in this particular establishment viewed him as a "specimen," as if they were "looking at a meal."

222 One applicant who was placed in a medical setting made sexual abuse allegations about a male health professional. This applicant recounted being pinned against a wall by this staff member "not aggressively but tenderly" and he put his hands down his clothing and masturbated him. In the same establishment, another applicant alleged he was approximately seven years of age when he was sexually abused by an older female resident. This applicant said that on his first night on the ward, a girl aged around twelve or thirteen years old, climbed into his bed and made him digitally penetrate her.

Emotional Abuse

223 Ten male applicants reported thirteen incidents of emotional abuse during their placements in eleven individual state establishments. In general, the emotional abuse allegations referred to:

- Being fearful as they witnessed co-residents being beaten
- A lack of affection shown by staff
- Being belittled by staff, including being referred to in sectarian language
- An absence of support for familial contact.

224 One applicant said that he was told that no one would believe him if he disclosed the abuse. This applicant was sent to a psychiatric hospital and then to another large establishment as he was refusing to comply with the abuse and absconding. Two applicants said they were made to feel uncomfortable as staff had watched them while they were having a bath. One applicant remembered being constantly told "You are a waste of space." One applicant recounted that both he and his siblings were mocked by some of the care staff and told "you might as well have no father or mother."

225 Another applicant said that he was not allowed to see his mother on a one-to-one basis. On occasion, he saw her in the distance from the establishment but was not allowed to communicate with her and this was very painful for him. An applicant described his placement as "pure torture" and recalled having to stand in a corner for a minor misdemeanour "until I dropped." One applicant said that when he misbehaved, he was made to strip and stand naked with other residents watching him.

226 Another applicant remembered being humiliated at dinnertime when a senior staff member tied knots in a bib he was made to wear as he was a "poor eater". This applicant alleged that members of staff were instructed to force feed him and this took place in the presence of his co-residents.

227 One applicant was generally positive about the staff in his placement but added that due to the high turnover of workers, he felt unsettled as "they moved on too quickly." This applicant commented:

> "once I got close to anyone and could have confided in them they were gone…There was no one to talk to, you were on your own."

Neglect

228 Two male applicants gave two accounts of neglect with regard to two separate establishments. One of the two applicants complained that there was only one bathroom, which was used by both residents and staff. This bathroom had no lock and staff frequently entered while residents were bathing.

The other male applicant complained that his educational needs were not met and, as a result, he failed to reach his full learning potential.

Roles of Alleged Abusers

229 The allegations of sexual abuse in state establishments related to abuse by male staff, with the exception of one alleged female abuser who was an older co-resident. The male staff were employed as care staff, house fathers/wardens and a male nurse and were based in a hostel for boys and a medical setting for both boys and girls. The allegations of physical and emotional abuse and neglect made by male applicants related to abuse by male staff, with only one exception. The alleged abusers included care staff and house fathers/wardens.

Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

230 Compliance was said to be achieved by the authority of staff members. Several male applicants gave the following reasons for not reporting the abuse at the time it was happening:

- actual physical violence and the threat of violence
- being told they would not be believed if they reported the abuse
- being ashamed of reporting allegations of sexual abuse
- being frightened they would be returned to a secure setting such as a psychiatric hospital or a penal institution.

Females: State Provision

231 Ten female applicants who spoke to the Forum were placed in nine different state establishments. One of those applicants had two placements in different establishments in the state sector. All ten applicants spent a maximum of one year in each placement and for some applicants their placements lasted for a few months only. One placement was made in 1959, while the other ten placements were in the 1960s and 1970s. No abuse was reported in respect of six of the nine establishments in the state sector. Abuse was reported in respect of the other three establishments as follows:

- There was one report of sexual abuse
- There was one report of physical abuse
- There was one report of sexual and emotional abuse and of neglect.

Physical Abuse

232 One applicant complained of physical abuse in one establishment. This related to a series of incidents in a medical setting. She believed the physician in charge of her treatment was harsh, saying that he stitched a wound without anaesthetic after her suicide attempt. She further reported that she felt that the administration of electroconvulsive therapy was abusive. This applicant felt stigmatised by her stay in a psychiatric facility and reflected that the fear of this being discovered impacted on her adult life.

Sexual Abuse

233 Sexual abuse was reported in respect of two establishments by two female applicants. The first applicant was aged thirteen when she was placed in a state establishment. She was generally happy there, but described the sexual abuse that developed from the unprofessional conduct of a female staff member. The following paraphrases her account. A member of staff gave her vodka and sweets and took her out in her car. On one occasion this staff member had sex in the back of her car with a man from a nearby building site. The applicant then began absconding and once went to a nearby caravan park where she met a man and his son. This man gave her money for cigarettes and asked her to meet him later; he gave her a lift to her home area and abused her. She stayed in that area and during that time the abuse continued. The abuse was described as including fondling, masturbation of the alleged abuser and vaginal intercourse. This applicant was clear that she was happy in her placement until the incidents with the member of staff. She then started absconding and she believes this led to her abuse by an older male outside the establishment. This applicant did not tell anyone about what had occurred at that time.

234 Another applicant spoke of her abuse by a number of older residents in a mixed gender establishment. She was thirteen years old. She had been subjected to sexual abuse by members of her extended family and was a very vulnerable young person. This applicant told the Forum that, following an assault in the establishment, she locked herself in the bathroom. The officer in charge believed what had happened but remarked "it takes two". This applicant made a serious suicide attempt some time later and was admitted to a psychiatric hospital where she received appropriate help.

Emotional Abuse

235 An applicant spoke of emotional abuse in the establishment in which she was repeatedly sexually abused. She said that she received no understanding or emotional support from the officer in charge despite it being on record that abuse by members of her extended family had led to her admission to care.

Neglect

236 An applicant complained that the lack of staff supervision in the state establishment in which she was placed meant that she was not protected from multiple sexual assaults by older residents. This applicant suffered from a severe skin condition and reported that the officer in charge did not always obtain the prescribed medication for her or assist her in applying it.

Roles of Alleged Abusers

237 The female applicants who alleged abuse, referred to abuse by an officer in charge, one care staff member and a number of older residents in mixed gender establishments. Compliance was said to be achieved by the authority of staff members and by threats of violence from older residents.

Juvenile Justice Provision

238 Juvenile justice provision accommodated young people who were less than eighteen years of age. Most of the applicants seen by the Forum were sent to these establishments under a court order for a specified period of time. Applicants described the juvenile justice establishments in which they were placed as:

- Single gender units (six centres)
- A mixed gender centre
- Two prisons that accommodated minors.

239 Thirty-four applicants, 27 males and seven females were placed in juvenile justice establishments. Of those, 27 male applicants made allegations of abuse or neglect with regard to seven individual establishments. Three of the male applicants had placements in more than one individual juvenile justice establishments. One male applicant was placed in three individual juvenile justice establishments and two male applicants were placed in two individual establishments. Six of the seven female applicants made allegations of abuse in two individual establishments.

240 The following table shows the extent of abuse reported to the Forum in respect of nine establishments by the 34 male and female applicants.

Abuse types	Applicants	Establishments
Physical, emotional, neglect and sexual	7	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	3	2
Physical, emotional and sexual	4	2
Physical and neglect	1	1
Physical and emotional	5	3
Physical and sexual	5	2
Emotional and neglect	2	2

Abuse types	Applicants	Establishments
Sexual only	4	4
Physical only	5	5
Totals	36 (*34 individual applicants)	23 (9 individual establishments)

Note: Some applicants complained of abuse in more than one establishment.

Males: Physical Abuse

241 Twenty-six male applicants made 56 complaints of physical abuse with regard to six separate juvenile justice establishments. Applicants' concerns were focused on certain members of staff allegedly punching, slapping and kicking them. There were allegations that some staff used sticks, leather straps, keys and hurling sticks to physically reprimand residents. One applicant commented that some of the staff would use "anything to hand" and they "kicked us like a football."

242 One male applicant alleged that some of the staff punched and kicked him and recounted one incident when he fell to the floor as a result of the assault. The kicking continued as he lay on the ground. This applicant said that as a result of the alleged assaults by staff he was taken to hospital and, on one occasion, he was treated for broken ribs. One applicant alleged that he was hit in the eye by a resident teacher and sustained a badly bruised eye, noting, that "I never had another black eye like it in my life."

243 One applicant alleged that corporal punishment was approved by the governor in his establishment. He told the Forum that residents were held down and had the clothing on their lower body removed after which two members of staff stretched them over the gym equipment. The staff administering the punishment were alleged to have run from the back of the hall to strike each resident six times. He alleged that this punishment often resulted in cuts to his lower body and his being unable to sit down because of the pain. Another regular occurrence alleged in this same establishment was for the staff to flick the residents with wet towels when they were in the shower room.

244 Eighteen male applicants were placed in one large juvenile justice establishment. One applicant alleged that physical abuse was a regular feature in this environment and claimed that he was battered by a number of staff including male staff, a female member of the staff group, a resident teacher and older residents. Another applicant also resident in the same establishment said he was tortured and slapped for no reason. He alleged that he was handed a live electric wire by a care worker and hit with a strap with tacks attached to it, as well as experiencing ongoing bullying by the older boys. Another applicant who referred to physical abuse as a regular feature in the same establishment said, "I had one beating after another." One applicant recalled being made to take a cold shower and a member of staff beating him with a leather strap when he was wet and naked, alleging the strap struck his face and body.

245 Several applicants, who were resident in this establishment, reported an arrangement in which staff used older boys to discipline the younger residents. An applicant said that the staff had their own "gang of boys" who were put in charge. This applicant described an incident that occurred when he was still small in stature. He was standing in a line with the other boys when:

> "two older boys slapped me on the face, told me to cry and then cry louder and then smacked again."

These boys walked up and down the line doing this to the younger boys again and again. Another applicant told the Forum that bullying by the older boys was widespread and said that this helped the staff maintain order. He commented that he was "used as a punch bag" by older boys who were good boxers and this behaviour was encouraged by one particular member of staff.

246 An applicant said that he absconded with other boys and when they returned they were made to get up on the stage while the other residents watched. They were then instructed to remove their trousers and wearing only boxer shorts, were spread-eagled over a wooden chair and a member of staff beat them with a leather belt on the legs and buttocks. This applicant was sent to a cell for three days and recalled that, apart from porridge at the start of the day, he received only bread and water.

247 One applicant recalled that he was very frightened from the commencement of his placement in one establishment through to his discharge. On his first night, staff had asked two boys to show him around the establishment. He described them as being very aggressive, asking "Where are you from… Can you fight?"

248 Another applicant said that all the boys were terrified of a particular member of staff who would patrol the premises and for no apparent reason would slap, punch, kick and beat the boys with a leather belt. The applicant said this staff member would hit "the way you would hit a man." He recounted a severe beating he was subjected to because he had dropped crumbs from a sausage roll. He said that certain members of staff, as they walked by the boys, "swung their arm to hit you around the head." An applicant referred to a staff member hitting him on countless occasions on the ear and said that he now suffers from a hearing loss which he attributes to these blows.

249 Several applicants, placed in this establishment in the 1970s, described feuding between different gangs of residents. One of these applicants alleged that he was on the receiving end of physical beatings from other residents, staff and an assault by members of a paramilitary gang. Two applicants in another establishment spoke of a military-style culture with one stating that "everything was at the double." The applicants referred to an organised activity by the staff group called "murder ball." This 'game' had no rules and staff allegedly organised the teams in accordance with the religion of the residents and encouraged the use of extreme physical violence and sectarian language.

250 The following comments were made by applicants about their time in juvenile justice establishments:

"The staff made you feel like a dog."

"I was cuffed around the ear repeatedly."

"It was a regular occurrence to be beaten on the bare legs."

"I was made to run in circles in the yard and each time I passed a member of staff, I was hit with a hurling stick."

"My hair was shaved off and I was put in solitary confinement."

Sexual Abuse

251 Eighteen applicants made 30 complaints about sexual abuse when they were in their juvenile justice placements. These applicants described being sexually abused by staff and older residents. Some found it difficult to speak in detail of their abusive experiences. Applicants said either they had not talked about their sexual abuse at all or given limited information to their partners or family members.

252 One applicant, who was unable to enter into the specifics of his alleged abuse, told the Forum that he was kept in a solitary confinement and at night time the door would open and two or three male staff members would enter, hold him down on the mattress and sexually abuse him.

253 An applicant recounted sexual abuse by two staff members and also by several older boys in a large establishment. One of the staff members in charge of the clothes store room was said to be well known for "always touching you up and pulling you towards him." Another applicant spoke about collecting clean clothes for his monthly visits home. This same staff member never allowed more than one boy into the store room at any time and when measuring the boys for clothes, would touch their genitals. This applicant also said that another member of staff took him into his room located off the boys' dormitory and attempted to rape him and made him have oral genital contact. Older residents, described as the "favourites" of staff, taunted the younger residents and made them engage in sexual activity. Fear was associated with any resistance or refusal.

254 An applicant described being groomed and sexually abused by a member of staff whose modus operandi was to provide him and other residents with sweets and cigarettes. The sexual abuse allegedly started with fondling in the television room and progressed, finally, to anal rape. The sexual abuse also took place in the "pigeon holes" where the clothes were kept and in a holiday home used during the summer months.

255 Another applicant alleged that a member of staff selected boys to sit at the back row of chairs in the television room and placed their hands under his clothing and made them masturbate him. He alleged that this was done to many boys over the years and said he had personal experience of this on a number of occasions. One applicant alleged he saw the "handsome boys sitting on (the staff member's)...leg watching television" and said his hand was inside their shorts. Another applicant said of this establishment "It was a choice between a beating and sexual abuse."

Emotional Abuse

256 Seventeen male applicants made 30 complaints of emotional abuse in regard to four separate juvenile justice establishments. Several applicants said that the stigma of being in a juvenile justice establishment was difficult to cope with, and, as noted by one applicant, his establishment was known as the "orphan home for bad boys." Another applicant described the public humiliation he felt when the residents were "marched down the street" and people referred to them as "borstal boys."

257 An applicant who had been placed in a secure setting as a thirteen year old told the Forum that he was subjected to constant bullying by staff and older residents. Another, placed in the same establishment, reported that when he wet his bed he was made to take his mattress to the hall and stand there for all to see. Yet another applicant said that he was made to kneel in front of a religious statue in the middle of the dormitory and was publicly denounced by staff for bed-wetting. An applicant recounted that following his return after absconding, the sleeve was removed from his shirt, the legs of his trousers were cut off and his belt and shoe laces were removed. He was taken to the local cinema with other residents and spoke of the shame he felt as he had to hold his trousers up as he shuffled along and tried to avoid his shoes falling off.

258 Several applicants who had been in a large juvenile justice establishment described being threatened by staff who told them that they would be sent to a prison with older boys who would beat them. Applicants said that witnessing other residents being physically and sexually abused was very upsetting. They reported that the belittling and ridiculing of the boys was common "day in and day out."

259 One applicant alleged that he lived in a constant state of fear: "I was always looking over my shoulder or listening for the sound." This applicant alleged that this inappropriate treatment of residents was, on occasions, the result of some of the staff having "hangovers or being in a bad mood." An applicant referred to having "no association" (denied contact with others) and described the establishment as having a "rough regime" commenting "I was only fifteen, it was a hard machine." One applicant said that as a result of the emotional abuse, "they made you feel worthless."

Neglect

260 Most applicants did not comment on the general care conditions in juvenile justice establishments. However, ten applicants complained of neglect with regard to two individual establishments. Eight others each made one complaint of neglect and two individual applicants made two complaints each of neglect.

261 Applicants' concerns focused on the food being inedible or the portions provided being too small, at times leaving them hungry. An applicant said that he was deprived of food for minor misdemeanours, citing the following example:

"We were often pulled out of line in the canteen for talking or if pushed by someone, and then we got no food."

One applicant described the food as "terrible…the only time you could eat it was when the inspectors visited and we got sausages. For breakfast, we got a bap with a small knob of butter…I don't remember lunch but the evening meal was a dollop of mashed potato with beans or peas or egg."

262 Three applicants said that the education they received was substandard. One commented that, when placed in an establishment, he was more advanced than his peers, particularly in maths, but was sent to the woodwork and pottery classes instead of being provided with appropriate academic education. One applicant said "I was out of the classroom more often than I was in" and missed much of his education as he was made to act as a "lackey" for one particular member of staff. One applicant suggested that the staff "had no interest in teaching us." One applicant said he was unable to concentrate in the classroom as he was so terrified of a particular member of staff.

Roles of Alleged Abusers

263 The male applicants identified 22 male care staff, one female member of the care staff, prison and police officers, a teacher, a visiting clergyman, a night watchman and older residents as those who had abused them. In the main, the male applicants described an environment characterised by fear with the use of extreme physical force by staff and older boys. Most of the applicants said they either accepted the abuse as normal or they simply did not know what to do to stop it from happening. Seven of the male applicants said they had tried to run away but were returned and punished for absconding. One applicant said:

"I would hook it over the fence but didn't get very far."

Four of the male applicants said they had self-harmed during their placements in juvenile justice establishments.

Females: Juvenile Justice Provision

264 Seven female applicants spoke to the Forum about their placements in two different juvenile justice establishments. All seven applicants had one placement each in one or other of these establishments. Three of the applicants had had previous care placements in the voluntary sector. Two of the placements began in the 1950s and the two applicants were in their establishment for nine and six years respectively. Three placements commenced in the 1960s and two placements were made in the 1970s.

265 One applicant did not report any abuse in relation to her juvenile justice placement. The other six applicants reported abuse in respect of two establishments as set out below.

There were

- five reports of physical abuse
- five reports of emotional abuse
- four reports of neglect and
- one report of sexual abuse.

Physical Abuse

266 Five female applicants complained of eighteen instances of physical abuse in two juvenile justice establishments. The abuse complained of included:

- being kept in solitary confinement for long periods
- being beaten by staff members and by older residents
- having hair shaved by a staff member (named) despite a scheduled participation in following days at a Feis.

Comments made by applicants included:

> "I was punched, I had bruises (from an assault by an older resident). The staff turned a blind eye. I had reward marks docked so I didn't go home. I suspect that was to stop my parents seeing the bruises."
>
> "I was made to carry my younger sister down the fire escape in all weathers to access the laundry where she had to sit in a cold bath for bed-wetting. The laundry could be accessed indoors. If I refused I was hit around the face and head."
>
> "The staff caned us on our hands for bed-wetting. We had chilblains… we were in agony."
>
> "A member of staff used her knuckles to beat me from my fingers, up along my hands, up over my head and face and down my back…all for bed-wetting…the more they beat me the more I wet the bed."
>
> "The staff beat us with wooden spoons every day after breakfast for bed wetting."
>
> "I was made to eat beetroot which I couldn't. I was sick on the floor and then hit for soiling the floor."

Sexual Abuse

267 Sexual abuse was reported by one female applicant. The applicant was aged fifteen when she was placed in the establishment. She described how she and others were groomed by a visiting entertainer; he would take selected girls into a classroom and give them cigarettes for "sexual favours." The girls were not allowed to smoke and if smoking was detected they would lose reward points. The applicant did not describe the sexual abuse in any further detail.

Emotional Abuse

268 Five female applicants described emotional abuse:

- three applicants spoke of emotional abuse in respect of one establishment
- two applicants recounted emotional abuse in respect of the second establishment.

269 Seventeen instances of emotional abuse were reported to the Forum including: being shown no appropriate affection, personal denigration, the removal of personal effects, experiencing public humiliation and being exposed to fearful situations. The following descriptions were given by applicants:

"You're nothing, I went in feeling a nobody and came out feeling worse."

"There was no positive affirmation. They were always shouting and screeching at you."

"My brothers were in care in a home nearby; I was not taken to see them. My older sister who was a lone parent came to see me and was not let in."

"I was terrified as I watched absconders being thrashed. Fear was a constant companion."

"I was not told of my granny's funeral and not allowed to attend. I was heartbroken as she had cared for me for years…why would you do that?"

"No members of staff showed any interest in helping or supporting me. I spent all my time crying."

"Staff would talk about you in the presence of other residents who would then use this as ammunition to bully you."

Neglect

270 Four applicants made ten complaints concerning neglect in two establishments. The neglect complained of was as follows:

- three complaints of inadequate medical attention
- two complaints concerning poor diet resulting in often going hungry
- two complaints of poor hygiene practices
- two complaints of inadequate bedding
- one complaint of inadequate staff supervision.

The following comments are indicative of the complaints of neglect made to the Forum:

> "I was placed in a cell with a bedstead and mattress…this had to be removed during the day. When I arrived I was made to strip and wash in a bath…I was supervised with no privacy."
>
> "I was placed in an empty dormitory on my own and had to sleep on a mattress without sheets on the floor."
>
> "The food was very poor. I couldn't eat the meat as I had seen maggots on it…I was just hungry."
>
> "Older girls were allowed to bully and abuse other residents…the staff did nothing, they turned a blind eye."

Roles of Alleged Abusers

271 The female applicants identified three persons in authority, two care staff members, older residents and a visiting entertainer as those whom they alleged abused them. The applicants described a culture of general fear and an acceptance of casual violence within the establishments as contributing to the abuse they described. Two applicants ran away while one applicant described severe enuresis that continued into early adulthood. Applicants recounted that they did not talk about their experiences in any detail until at least fifteen years after their discharge. They felt that they would not be believed and most wanted to forget those episodes in their lives.

Period 3: 1976 - 1995

Introduction

272 This section of the chapter covers the experiences of 103 applicants (69 males, 34 females) who were placed in 47 designated establishments during Period 3 (1976-1995). Five female applicants and eight male applicants did not disclose neglect or abuse in relation to their placement during this period. However, four of these five female applicants made allegations of abuse within an establishment covered in the previous Period 2 (1956-1975) as did all of the eight male applicants. One female applicant did not make any complaint of neglect or abuse about her time in residential care. The remaining 90 applicants (61 males, 29 females) disclosed at least one type of abuse within at least one of the establishments in which they were resident.

273 Most of the abuse that was reported to the Forum was alleged to have occurred in five establishments as follows:

- one establishment was the focus of complaints of abuse from fourteen applicants
- one establishment was the focus of complaints from thirteen applicants
- one establishment was the focus of complaints from nine applicants.
- two establishments were each the focus of complaints from eight applicants.

274 There were more than four times as many male applicants as female applicants who had been in juvenile justice establishments. Both male and female applicants made a substantial number of disclosures of emotional, physical and sexual abuse.

275 It should be noted that, when compared with Periods 1 and 2, a significantly higher proportion of applicants in Period 3 had multiple placements in care. Some applicants recalled in detail the number and sequence of their placements, others were less sure. On the basis of the information provided to the Forum, it is evident that of the 90 applicants in this period who spoke about their abuse, at least 37 had already been in care in the previous period. Furthermore, at least 32 of the applicants had been in two or more placements in Period 3, some in two establishments of the same type and some in establishments of different types.

Voluntary Establishments

276 This section of the report focuses on the allegations made by applicants regarding each of the four types of abuse. Comments made by the applicants and quotations drawn from their accounts of their experiences are included.

Males: Voluntary Provision

277 Twenty-five male applicants who had been placed in nine voluntary establishments made 28 reports of abuse in these establishments. In most cases, each report related to more than one episode or instance of the abuse that was alleged. The combinations of types of abuse reported by the applicants are summarised in the following table.

Abuse types	Male	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	3	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	2	2
Physical, emotional and sexual	4	2
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	-	-
Physical and emotional	3	2
Physical and sexual	6	1
Emotional and sexual	2	2
Emotional and neglect	1	1
Emotional, neglect and sexual	1	1
Emotional	1	1
Sexual	3	2
Physical	1	1
Neglect	1	1
Total	28 reports	9 different establishments

Note: One establishment was the focus of thirteen complaints. Another establishment was the focus of six complaints.

There were nineteen complaints of physical abuse, sixteen complaints of emotional abuse, nineteen complaints of sexual abuse and eight complaints of neglect.

Physical Abuse

278 Nineteen applicants made allegations of physical abuse inflicted on them by staff and residents in the establishments in which they were placed. They described assaults involving the use of canes, sticks, a tree branch, a fishing rod tip, rope, leather straps, a walking stick, chisels and a mallet. Applicants also alleged they were forced to stand or kneel for long periods of time, forced to eat, placed in solitary confinement such as being locked in a cupboard, deprived of food or sleep and made to take showers with the water described as too hot or too cold. The allegations of physical assaults by applicants included being punched, kicked, slapped, lifted by the locks of their hair, nipped, knuckled and grabbed by the throat.

279 The following are examples of the physically abusive incidents they complained about.

- On the day of admission, an applicant was beaten by a staff member who punched him and nipped his upper arm because he was crying. He explained to the Forum that he was upset at the time because of being separated from his siblings.
- A woodwork teacher working in a large establishment would punish the boys by placing them in a semicircle and if anyone was caught talking, he would twist the little finger of the boy, twist his arm back and proceed to kick him with excessive force on the back of his legs or on the buttocks. This teacher was also alleged to have thrown blackboard dusters and mallets at the boys, sometimes at random, and was said to be able to hit a "target" with remarkable accuracy.

280 Applicants said that assaults were frequent and injuries resulted, including bruising. Some applicants said that the staff who assaulted them became more violent when intoxicated. Others had concluded that the physical abuse was part of a control mechanism to make them more compliant for sexual abuse. One applicant described an incident in which he had jumped out of a window at night to escape and he was caught and pulled back in by a member of staff who kept hitting him on the back of his legs all the way up stairs. He told the Forum "It felt like my insides were coming out when he hit me." Another applicant said that he was punched so hard by a member of staff that the force lifted him off his feet.

281 Some applicants spoke of being beaten with a leather strap, with one commenting that he was made to strip from the waist down and the belt would hit him on the buttocks and thighs. Another applicant alleged that he was subjected to relentless beatings from one particular member of staff each time he returned late to his room. He was often late because he was being sexually abused on a recurring basis by a member of staff in another part of the establishment. This applicant told the Forum that he was unable to tell anyone about the abuse and he considered that the beatings he received were more harmful than the sexual abuse.

282 One of the applicants said that the residents in a large establishment were force-fed and if they resisted or refused to eat the food, they were beaten. Applicants spoke of care staff lifting them off the ground by their hair. One member of staff was said to have worn large rings and an applicant reported that, during bath time, she would leave marks on the boys as she forced the ring into their shoulders when holding them down in the water. Applicants described being knuckled by a member of staff. This was explained as the hand formed into a fist with the knuckle of the middle finger protruding more than the other knuckles and a flicking type action used against the child's head.

Physical Abuse by Older Boys

283 Several applicants made reference to physical abuse by other residents with one commenting that frequently older boys would come into the younger boys' room, rough them up, beat them and place blankets over their heads as if to smother them. These applicants said that staff would deliberately turn a blind eye to the bullying by the older boys and some felt there was no point in telling staff as they already knew what was going on and did nothing to prevent this or protect the younger boys.

Sexual Abuse

284 Nineteen applicants recounted sexual abuse, which involved grooming, indecent assaults consisting of inappropriate fondling, masturbation by the abuser, masturbation of the abuser by the child, oral genital contact, and anal rape. Allegations were also made of coercive peer abuse and witnessing the sexual abuse of other residents. A summary of the types of sexual abuse reported is given in the table below.

Types of Sexual Abuse	Reports*	Establishments
Inappropriate fondling	9	3
Anal rape	10	4
Oral/genital contact	6	1
Masturbation of the child by the alleged abuser	3	1
Masturbation of the alleged abuser by the child	2	1
Indecent exposure	1	1
Coercive peer abuse	2	1
Witnessing abuse	2	2
Use of violence	3	3
Grooming	2	2
Other eg being photographed inappropriately	8	3

Note: 'Reports' relates to the number of references to types of sexual abuse made by applicants during their meetings with the Forum rather than to the number of individual instances of each type of abuse which, for some applicants, allegedly occurred over several years.

285 One of the applicants recalled that on the day of his admission to an establishment, he was told by a member of staff that he had to have a medical examination. The member of staff took him to the games room and instructed him to remove his clothing. He then checked him for rashes and fondled his genitals. Following this incident, the staff member continued to behave in an inappropriate manner and would make contact with him as if to play but, the applicant concluded, this was simply a means to allow him to touch him inappropriately. This same staff member was said to watch him and the other boys when they were getting showered and "look them up and down." Another applicant made allegations of being fondled inappropriately by a staff member on the pretext that he was applying a medical treatment. A similar situation was disclosed by an applicant who said that he had been called to the office of a senior member of staff who told him that he had to check if he had been abused and then proceeded to fondle him.

286 Many applicants who had been sexually abused recounted that the sexual abuse progressed over a period of time from inappropriate fondling to masturbation, oral genital contact and then, for some, to anal rape. Applicants alleged that, at times, sexual abuse was accompanied by force; for example, one applicant said the alleged perpetrator placed his hand over his mouth whilst he was indecently assaulting him.

287 An applicant who described being forced to masturbate a member of staff said that he and his twin brother went on to suffer extreme sexual abuse including anal rape by a number of staff throughout their placement in a voluntary establishment. He told the Forum that:

> "With the rapes, you get to a point where you turn off, lie down and just let them get on with it. Any brother who wanted to abuse us did. The others turned a blind eye and didn't say anything."

288 Several other applicants made allegations of anal rape. One applicant described being put in a single bedroom when other residents were on home leave. He said that a brother came in to pray with him but hit him on the knee, pulled all his clothes off and raped him. The brother then took the clothes away and the applicant had to go down to breakfast the next morning wrapped in a blanket. The applicant said that he thought the brother had washed his clothes, dried them and returned them to his locker. The sexual abuse disclosed by a number of male applicants who had been placed in the same establishment was described as constant and occurred without any form of grooming. One applicant commented that inappropriate behaviour was seen as a right to which the abusers were entitled.

289 An applicant alleged that a professional photographer, who had been brought to the establishment to take photographs, gained access to the showers when a staff member was seeing to the needs of other boys. The photographer invited those who were in the shower area to take their clothes off and pose together. The male resident became upset and told the member of staff who ordered the photographer off the premises.

Sexual Abuse by Older Residents

290 Some applicants spoke of being raped anally by older residents. One said that when he was around five years old he shared a bedroom with his older brother and that both of them were timid and subjected to constant bullying. This applicant said he woke up to see his brother being held down and raped.

291 An applicant told the Forum that he was sexually abused when he was seven or eight years of age. He said that he was physically held face down by a group of older male residents and seriously sexually abused. Although he was asked at the time if he had been abused, he did not disclose the details of the incident until he was around thirteen years of age. He attributes his anger and rebellion in his teens to the abuse he suffered as a young child.

Emotional Abuse

292 Sixteen male applicants described a number of forms of emotional abuse. These included personal emotional abuse, family denigration and links discouraged, being shown no affection, bullying by older residents and exposure to fearful situations. They said this abuse undermined their self esteem and emotional wellbeing. These forms of emotional abuse are the subject of the following paragraphs.

Personal Emotional Abuse

293 Some applicants commented that they had no privacy when using the bathroom and staff watched them. They said that staff referred to them by derogatory names such as "scum from Belfast." Several applicants recounted that on admission to the establishment, they were immediately stripped, bathed, and their hair was shaved.

294 An applicant described himself as an already traumatised child when he was placed in care because of the violence in his family home. He said that when he was in the establishment, he wet the bed and, as a punishment, was beaten by staff. Following this, his bed-wetting worsened and he spoke of washing the wet sheets in the bath and drying them on the radiator as he was terrified of the consequences of staff knowing that he was still wetting the bed. Some male applicants described insensitive treatment, for example, several said they were at times made to wear girls' clothing, were bathed with girls, and had to endure other children urinating when they were sharing the bath.

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

295 Some applicants recounted the sadness they experienced due to the limited, or lack of, contact with family members, particularly parents and siblings, when in establishments. They expressed concern that contact with their family was deliberately frustrated by some of the staff. One applicant recalled that his father was made to feel unwelcome when he visited him in the establishment and another said that his mother wrote letters to him but he never received them.

296 Applicants described the difficulties they experienced when they were separated from their siblings, even when they were placed within the same establishment. One applicant recounted that he was not allowed to keep in touch with two of his siblings with whom he was very close and referred to the pain this caused him. Another applicant explained that he was initially in the same bedroom as his brothers but they were all separated with no explanation and the impact on him was significant, leaving him feeling bereft every night. An applicant spoke of the pain of being separated from his brother and running away from the establishment specifically to see him. Some applicants who had been placed in voluntary establishments described being belittled by staff and the feeling of shame that followed.

297 Applicants who were placed in a church-run establishment said the following:

> "We were told we were all sinners, not told anything. If we asked questions we were told to shut up."
>
> "We were bathed in very hot baths and scrubbed with a scrubbing brush…A member of staff told us 'I am scrubbing away your sins'."

298 An applicant spoke about a teaching assistant mocking him for scrunching up his face and squinting at the blackboard because he couldn't see the blackboard very well. Other applicants who had great difficulty eating certain types of food spoke of the humiliation of being made to eat regurgitated food.

Deprivation of Affection

299 Several male applicants spoke of living in establishments that were devoid of emotional warmth and affection. They described the settings as uncaring and, as one applicant said:

"there was never a kind word, you were either ignored or beaten."

Other applicants spoke of witnessing their peers being admonished and several commented that seeing the humiliation of others was sometimes as traumatic as being on the receiving end of the abuse.

300 The removal of personal belongings, such as toys, was referred to by several applicants. One applicant said that on admission personal possessions were removed by staff and he remembered being told: "no toys here." An applicant, in reflecting on his time in residential care, said "No one cared for you," and "I had no mentor."

Exposure to Fearful Situations

301 One applicant recounted the fear he felt as he heard the belt being used on other residents and hearing them whimpering with the pain. One applicant described being constantly worried that he would be beaten again and referred to being "terrified" and "hating" the establishment because of the cruelty of two of the staff members. This applicant also said that another member of staff had a very sharp tongue and was dismissive and cruel to him. Incidents recounted by applicants included witnessing the drowning of kittens that they and other residents had befriended. An applicant told of being taken to an area of Belfast by his social worker where he felt intimidated by the locals.

Neglect

302 Neglect was mentioned by eight applicants, a smaller proportion of applicants than had been the case in the two earlier Periods, with few commenting on aspects of care. A male applicant described his establishment as a "cold draughty place, with wind whistling through the corridors, and poor lighting". He said that the blankets on the beds were army style and very rough, causing him itching. Another applicant said that the staff in his establishment expected the children to be very quiet: "we were not allowed to be spontaneous and play outside was very rarely allowed." A few applicants recounted being made to eat porridge. If they refused, they were forced to swallow it, even if this resulted in the food being regurgitated. In another establishment, an applicant said that he had been a slow eater and, on occasions, food was removed from the table before he had finished. Several applicants commented that their childhood experiences in relation to certain food types have affected their taste for those foods in adulthood.

303 Some applicants expressed concerns about a lack of medical care. One commented that he was not provided with medical attention when he injured his ankle jumping from a window. Another applicant who had an ongoing serious medical issue with his kidneys said he was neglected when he was unwell and recounted one occasion when he was taken to hospital by a member of staff who told him that he was dying and then left.

304 Some applicants referred to the lack of supervision in their establishments. One alleged that there was no staff supervision at night, which allowed older boys to come into the rooms of younger boys where, the applicants alleged, they bullied and sexually abused them at will. An applicant spoke about frequent fights between the boys, commenting:

> "you were either being beaten by other boys or you were beating someone else."

He and others questioned the adequacy and effectiveness of the staff's supervision and protection of the children.

Knowledge of Abuse and Disclosing Abuse at the Time

305 Applicants told the Forum that other residents and staff witnessed much of the abuse in the establishments. In addition to their fellow residents, who witnessed and experienced similar abuse, they said that care staff, ancillary workers and teachers were also present when different instances of abuse occurred. Applicants explained that many residents were intimidated by the threat of violence and would not report what they had seen. Some said that most residents knew from personal experience the severity of the treatment given to those who complained. Several applicants reflected that there was no one to tell without fear of compromise. A number of applicants, who said they tried to report what was happening to them, felt they were not believed. The comment "What was the point of telling anybody?" expressed fully the view they shared.

Methods of Coping with Abuse and Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

306 The male applicants described a number of ways in which they responded to their alleged abuse. They spoke of running away, sometimes repeatedly to the point where they were placed in more secure accommodation. Others, who said they were constantly frightened, accepted the abuse as inevitable. They tried to block it out and some withdrew into themselves. The means by which compliance was achieved are evident in earlier descriptions of abuse in this chapter and included the exercise of authority by the adults who were meant to be caring for them, the use of violence against them and the general atmosphere of fear that pervaded their establishments.

Females: Voluntary Provision

307 Thirteen female applicants who had been cared for in eight voluntary establishments in Period 3 made allegations of abuse. There were eight complaints of emotional abuse, eight complaints of physical abuse, four complaints of neglect and four complaints of sexual abuse. The combinations of abuse types said to have been experienced by these applicants are summarised below.

Abuse types	Females	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	1	1
Physical, emotional and neglect	-	-
Physical, emotional and sexual	1	1
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	1	1
Physical and emotional	2	1
Physical and sexual	1	1
Emotional and sexual	-	-
Emotional, neglect and sexual	-	-
Emotional and neglect	2	2
Emotional	2	2
Sexual	1	1
Physical	2	2
Neglect	-	-
Total	13 reports	8 different establishments

Note: One establishment was the focus of six complaints. Another establishment was the focus of two complaints.

Physical Abuse

308 Eight female applicants disclosed physical abuse, including smacking, being dragged by the hair, having finger nails dug into them and being kicked. Few mentioned the use of belts or canes. Bullying was mentioned frequently.

Descriptions of Physical Abuse

309 An applicant said that a member of staff who was "very strict but generally ok smacked me on the face and head". Another applicant referred to being "hammered (by a particular member of staff) for anything and everything – even for moving your seat in the living room", but commented that "these beatings stopped after a change in the law," in the early/mid 1980s. One applicant said that a senior member of staff was very physical in manner and picked on her. This applicant said:

> "I was dragged by my hair, slapped, pushed against a wall; she would dig her nails into me, kick me; she trailed me across two beds by my hair. I was pinned down on the floor by three adults sitting on top of me on her say so and locked in a room on my own for days in the dark."

310 Applicants spoke of being bullied by other residents and of how difficult this was for them. One applicant who expressed her concerns about this also questioned the lack of action by staff to stop it. She recalled an incident when she had the courage to report the bullying and asked staff "Why do people keep picking on me?" But nothing changed and the bullying continued. This applicant also told of being slapped around the face and grabbed by two members of staff who told her "Don't dare tell your mum".

311 Several applicants spoke of solitary confinement as a punishment. One said that she was often locked in a room as a punishment. Another described being placed in a room on her own in an area of the establishment that was used once a week. These applicants explained that a resident could be left there for "days on end" and described being terrified when the lights were turned off.

Sexual Abuse

312 Female applicants made few allegations of sexual abuse. The four who did, spoke of inappropriate fondling and coercive peer abuse. One applicant described being brought by a member of staff to a room and left alone with a visiting priest who would put her on his knee and put his hand up her skirt. This applicant said she has very clear memories of these incidents but does not know how many times this happened. Another applicant said that on one occasion, when she was aged approximately ten years old, a male resident took her to a secluded area beyond the orchard and tried to involve her in oral sex.

Emotional Abuse

313 Eight applicants made reference to emotional abuse they said they experienced in voluntary establishments. The following aspects of emotional abuse were evident in their accounts.

Personal Emotional Abuse

314 Some female applicants spoke of the public humiliation and personal denigration they experienced. Some of the emotional abuse described by the female applicants was rooted in sectarian attitudes. One applicant spoke about staff pouring de-lousing liquid over her hair and being accused of bringing lice into the home. She said the liquid treatment had to remain in her hair for most of the day and she was subject to other children mocking her and a member of staff commenting, "I've seen the state of your home" and "Protestants are not bothered by lice."

315 In referring to their admission to an establishment, some female applicants said their personal belongings had been removed, including their clothes, and they were given "hand-me-downs" to wear. These applicants questioned where their personal possessions went, as many were not seen again.

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

316 Several female applicants said that some staff would make offensive comments about their families and this denigration was very painful. One applicant said that she was referred to as a "bastard" by staff as her mother was unmarried. Another female applicant said that her father was criticised by the nuns as he was Protestant. Her mother was also criticised because she was not married and in a relationship with a Protestant. This applicant said that at her Confirmation, the nun in charge was critical of her father for his choice of her Confirmation name, commenting "What would he know? Your Confirmation is a mockery."

317 Referring to the lack of contact with siblings, one female applicant said that she saw her brother, who was in foster care, on one occasion only. She said "this should not have been allowed to happen."

Deprivation of Affection

318 Other applicants emphasised the lack of affection they were shown whilst in their residential placements. One said that, during her time in the establishment, she was not shown any warmth or encouragement and believes that her education and social development suffered as a consequence. Another applicant said that no one took an interest in the residents and the culture of the establishment failed to nurture the children. An applicant said that during her time in an establishment:

> "the staff never asked if I was okay and this lack of action and lack of knowledge was a form of neglect."

Bullying

319 Some female applicants made reference to bullying by staff and other residents. There were further allegations that some staff colluded with the perpetrators as they did not challenge these inappropriate behaviours. One applicant explained that she made a complaint to staff about bullying by older residents but they failed to act and did nothing to prevent this from re-occurring. Another applicant described an incident in which a boy pulled her hair and she told staff but, she said, the staff encouraged other boys to behave in this inappropriate way also.

Neglect

320 Four female applicants made allegations of neglect in respect of several aspects of their care. One said that when she was a child she was a bed-wetter and was often left to lie on wet sheets. Another said that there was an absence of toys and games for the children and they were under-stimulated in their developmental years. One applicant said that no time was allowed for play. Another applicant told the Forum she was made to do inappropriate and continuous work. This applicant listed the work she had to do before and after school, included feeding and dressing the younger children, changing and washing wet sheets and cleaning the floors and the toilets.

Inadequate Medical Care

321 An applicant recalled having a severe toothache when taken with other residents for a fortnight's holiday to a seaside resort. When she informed the staff of her toothache, she was accused of telling lies. Another staff member eventually gave her a painkiller and instructed her to go to bed. The staff then went out for the day with the residents while she was left in her room with no adult support or supervision.

Lack of Staff Supervision

322 A number of female applicants identified lack of staff supervision as a deficiency in their care in voluntary establishments. One of them, who had sustained burns to her neck and torso as an infant when in the care of a voluntary establishment, told the Forum that a staff member had left her unattended on a counter top and she had picked up a kettle and scalded herself with boiling water. Another applicant remembered the children being out of control in her establishment and described the scene as a "riot" with young children smashing the window with their bare feet and staff failing to intervene. A third applicant said that she was a persistent absconder when in care and was constantly truanting from school but staff did not appear to be interested in finding the cause of her behaviour or question where she had been.

Methods of Coping and Strategies used by Alleged Abusers

323 Female applicants, in describing their responses to alleged abuse, spoke of feelings and behaviour similar to those of the male applicants who had been in voluntary establishments. Their comments were expressed with anger, resignation and frustration. They spoke of crying, fighting back, trying to run away, blocking the abuse out and keeping their feelings to themselves. They too had been controlled by members of staff using their authority inappropriately, by physical violence and by threats that left them intimidated and insecure. They had no confidence in reporting what they were experiencing.

Males: State Provision

324 Fourteen male applicants who had been placed in eight state establishments in Period 3 made fifteen reports of one or more types of alleged abuse. There were ten reports of emotional abuse, eleven reports of physical abuse, four reports of sexual abuse and three reports of neglect. The combinations of abuse types they alleged are set out in the table below.

Abuse types	Males	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	-	-
Physical, emotional and neglect	2	2
Physical, emotional and sexual	2	2
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	-	-
Physical and emotional	5	2
Physical and sexual	-	-
Emotional and sexual	-	-
Emotional, neglect and sexual	-	-
Emotional and neglect	-	-
Emotional	1	1
Sexual	2	2
Physical	2	2
Neglect	1	1
Total	15 reports	8 different establishments

Note: One establishment was the focus of eight complaints.

Physical Abuse

325 Inappropriate physical behaviour resulting in physical harm was mentioned by eleven applicants who spoke of being bullied and beaten by other residents and physically assaulted by members of staff. Some applicants said they were punched, kicked, had their hair pulled and were slapped. The following instances of abuse were mentioned by applicants:

> "I lost a tooth as the result of a punch by a member of staff, and the dentist I was taken to see colluded with the member of staff in not reporting the assault."
>
> "I lost count of how many times I was beaten. Your man got tore into me."
>
> "I was pulled from a chair by my ears, slapped and kicked, and a member of staff stamped on my hand fracturing my fingers. I remember being spun off a carousel so fast that I landed on the ground and fractured my wrist."

326 One applicant who had run away from his establishment, was taken on his return to a room, stripped naked and beaten from head to toe by a staff member using the palm of his hand. The beating resulted in red marks all over his body. Another applicant who had run away was strapped to a bed when he returned and was given an injection. Being placed in a form of solitary confinement was mentioned by male applicants, as was being forced to eat. An applicant said the residents in his establishment were forced to eat food they did not like and that members of staff would hold his head firmly whilst he made him do this.

Sexual Abuse

327 Four male applicants disclosed sexual abuse by staff and other residents on a spectrum from grooming, through inappropriate fondling to anal rape. One applicant who was indecently assaulted and made to masturbate his abuser as well commented "You are at your most vulnerable when you feel unwanted." One of the applicants who disclosed that he had been seriously sexually assaulted on a number of occasions by male and female staff explained that "There were no locks on bathrooms; staff could come in on young people." Another applicant talked of being taken out in a car with a male care worker and being bought a Chinese meal. This man who, he said, smelt of stale drink and smoke, started to sexually abuse him during this trip. The applicant was too upset to elaborate any further.

Emotional Abuse

328 Ten applicants provided a number of examples of emotional abuse which they said undermined their self esteem and emotional well-being. One applicant referred to a specific event when he was made to go to an Orange parade despite objecting and being terrified of going. Another applicant felt humiliated by a member of staff who kept making inappropriate comments in relation to his eye calling him "lazy eye". Another applicant was not allowed to use the bathroom and as a consequence wet the bed. Staff referred to him as a "dirty little bastard." Another applicant spoke of a female member of staff continuously trying to "push the Bible down my throat."

329 One applicant said that he was told on numerous occasions by staff members that his mother did not want him. Other applicants considered that the environment in which they were resident was not conducive to a child's emotional wellbeing as it was one of fear, and devoid of warmth and affection.

Neglect

330 Male applicants in state sector establishments made few allegations of neglect. Of the three who did report neglect, all spoke of establishments having a lack of play opportunities and alleged inadequate medical attention and inadequate education. One applicant said that in his establishment one of the punishments used was to keep children away from school for a period of time. He said he was punished in this way repeatedly and, as a result, he was unable to read or write when he left care.

331 Another applicant, who complained of constant bullying in his establishment, said that he felt vulnerable all the time as there was no one who really cared or who tried to stop the bullying. He saw this lack of engaged supervision as neglectful.

Females: State Provision

332 Ten female applicants made twelve reports of alleged abuse in ten different state establishments. There were seven complaints of sexual abuse, ten complaints of emotional abuse, six complaints of physical abuse and two complaints of neglect. The combinations of abuse types they alleged are set out in the table below.

Abuse types	Females	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	-	-
Physical, emotional and neglect	1	1
Physical, emotional and sexual	3	4
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	-	-
Physical and emotional	2	2
Physical and sexual	-	-
Emotional and sexual	2	2
Emotional, neglect and sexual	-	-
Emotional and neglect	-	-
Emotional	2	2
Sexual	1	1
Sexual and neglect	1	1
Physical	-	-
Neglect	-	-
Total	12 reports	10 different establishments

Note: Three establishments were the focus of two complaints each.

Physical Abuse

333 Six female applicants spoke of being hit, including with a slipper, and being bullied and beaten by other residents. One who said she was bullied by older residents remarked that "staff did not want to know." Another applicant described staff as very physical:

> "They would grab you by the arms, or by the scruff of your neck; they were really rough, and would throw you down, or you might be dragged and then thrown into a room. I was in the same room as my brother who had behavioural problems and who was very violent – sometimes he had to be restrained in a jacket – I did not feel protected from him."

Whilst in that placement, this applicant said she was subjected to a physical restraint for the first time and found this to be a painful experience, emotionally and physically. She said that the restraints became more excessive in frequency and degree and alleged that a particular staff member would dig her nails into her. This applicant recounted being restrained on a staircase and her trousers being pulled down and her top pulled up, exposing the private areas of her body, which she found very upsetting. To this day she does not like to be touched.

Sexual Abuse

334 Ten female applicants who had been placed in state establishments made allegations of rape and indecent assault perpetrated by male residents and staff. One applicant referred to an older male resident roaming through the bedrooms at night and indecently assaulting the female residents. Another applicant spoke of being taken in her night dress by a member of staff to see someone introduced to her as a "doctor" who indecently assaulted her. An applicant said she was abused by a female care worker who indecently assaulted her by fondling her breasts, kissing her, and involving her in other sexual activity.

Witnessing Abuse

335 An applicant who recounted witnessing abuse said she saw a vulnerable resident being sexually abused by two male residents on the floor of a bedroom. On another occasion, this resident was said to be with an older man who had apparently groomed her with the offer of cigarettes. The applicant commented that the "staff did not seem to care."

Emotional Abuse

336 Seven female applicants spoke of experiencing emotional abuse in their establishments.

Personal Emotional Abuse

337 A number of applicants spoke of public humiliation and personal denigration. An applicant said that the children were described by staff as "a bunch of wee bastards." Another, who regularly wet her bed, explained that the staff became fed up changing it and refused to change the sheets or give her clean underwear. She said she was washed in a cold bath with disinfectant, was scrubbed until her skin was "red raw" and often ended up sleeping on the floor. One applicant spoke of the humiliation experienced when made to have a bath while staff, including male staff, observed. One applicant asked staff if it would be possible for her to have a new pair of trainers. In front of everyone, staff told her she didn't have any when she came into the establishment and that she wouldn't be getting any whilst she was there.

Family Denigration and/or Links Discouraged

338 Emotional abuse related to their families was mentioned by a number of female applicants. This included family denigration, family being forbidden or discouraged to visit, and family or sibling links being discouraged or forbidden. One applicant explained that her mother was said, by staff, to be "only looking for food" when she came to visit, but when her mother said she wouldn't come back, the staff blamed the applicant. Another applicant's mother was said to have been discouraged from visiting because of the negative comments made by the staff.

339 Applicants said that not seeing their families or being separated from siblings was used as a threat. One applicant said she never got to see one of her siblings and another saw her siblings only once. Another explained that two of her siblings had been brought from foster care to be with her but that she was threatened by staff that they would be taken away if she didn't behave herself. An applicant was only rarely permitted to see a sibling despite her being a resident in the same establishment.

Exposure to Fearful Situations

340 This aspect of emotional abuse was highlighted by some applicants; one said: "All you could hear was kids screaming all the time" and went on to explain that whilst in the establishment she was not protected from her brother who was very violent and as a consequence often had to be restrained.

341 An applicant had asked to be taken into care and to be with her brothers and sisters in a particular establishment. However, she was taken aback by the strict regime and her first experience of restraint. She was subsequently separated from her siblings when they were sent to different homes and she was placed into foster care.

Deprivation of Affection

342 Being shown no affection was also commented on by applicants. One applicant described her establishment as:

> "A building with no feeling, a cold unfriendly and unhappy place. We were not cared for, not looked after, we were hungry, cold and sore. There was no care or kindness shown; all you could hear was kids screaming all the time."

Staff apparently denigrated one applicant and referred to her as an "odd girl" because she didn't smoke and had kept her religious faith. Another explained that when her social worker visited she often cried, but that the social worker's response was not to ask what was wrong but to just tell her she should be stronger.

343 One applicant explained that she was often placed in isolation and that a particular staff member would bully other residents and play them off against each other. This member of staff also reportedly told lies in saying that the applicant had phoned his home and "talked dirty" to him, something she strongly denied.

Neglect:

Lack of Supervision

344 Two female applicants spoke of a lack of supervision in their establishments in the state sector. One explained that in her establishment at night there appeared to be no night staff available or willing to stop a male resident attempting to molest them whilst they slept. Another described how the manager was often intoxicated whilst in charge of the children.

Aspects of Care

345 Poor hygiene, inadequate bedding, food and heating were also mentioned in relation to neglect. An applicant explained that she regularly wet her bed and that staff would refuse to change the sheets, which resulted in her having to sleep on the floor and wear unclean, wet underwear. When she eventually got a bath it would be in cold water with disinfectant. It was also disclosed that if they refused the food they were given they went without. Another applicant said that neglect resulted in the children being cold, hungry and sore.

Males: Juvenile Justice Provision

346 Thirty-three male applicants made thirty-nine reports of alleged abuse in six different establishments. There were 25 complaints of physical abuse, twenty complaints of emotional abuse, twenty complaints of sexual abuse and eight complaints of neglect. The combinations of types of alleged abuse are set out in the following paragraph.

Abuse types	Males	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	2	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	1	1
Physical, emotional and sexual	6	3
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	1	1
Physical and emotional	6	5
Physical and sexual	3	2
Emotional and Sexual	1	1
Emotional, neglect and sexual	1	1
Emotional and neglect	1	1
Emotional	2	2
Sexual	7	4
Physical	6	3
Neglect	2	2
Total	39 reports	6 different establishments

Note: One establishment was the focus of fourteen complaints. Two establishments were the focus of eight complaints each.

Physical Abuse:

Inappropriate physical behaviour resulting in physical harm

347 Inappropriate physical behaviour by staff resulting in physical harm to residents featured frequently in the recollections of the applicants who had placements in juvenile justice establishments. Some of the physical abuse reported was said to have involved the use of a range of objects and implements, for example, leather straps, canes, sticks and bunches of keys were mentioned by several applicants. The most common form of physical abuse referred to by applicants included punching, kicking and slapping.

348 An applicant who had run away with two residents from an establishment told the Forum that eventually he had returned with the other boys at 3.00am. It was very cold, yet the boys were stripped and whipped by two members of the staff. One applicant described being regularly bullied, verbally abused (called a 'half breed' as he was from a mixed marriage) and regularly hit, including with a stick, by a member of staff. One day he retaliated and hit this member of staff on the side of his head with a stick. The supervisor in charge investigated the matter and pointed out to the member of staff that he had been "torturing the chap from day one" so he would report the matter and give details of all aspects of the incident to the officer in charge.

349 Being struck with wet towels and being locked in at 8.00pm, with no visits by staff members until the following morning, was mentioned by one applicant. He referred to a violent culture in the establishment, and described an initiation regime operated by other prisoners, in which they would make the newcomers "run the gauntlet" at night time, hitting them with wet towels with knots tied in them and also getting them up from bed and putting them in a blanket and throwing them up until they hit the ceiling.

350 Another applicant complained about being restrained by a member of staff who pushed his arms up his back causing excruciating pain and of being beaten with a gym slipper, which really stung. He also alleged that members of staff would come on duty intoxicated and beat the boys around the head with a telephone book. He recalled that a night watchman, of whom the boys were making fun, used a rubber torch to beat them around the room.

351 Examples of physical assaults including punching were spoken of by 25 applicants. One applicant alleged that another staff member called in the head of the unit within the establishment (who lived nearby), to deal with him in relation to a behavioural matter. The head of unit "laid into him" with fists, boots, and gripping actions and also pulled his hair. He said this happened repeatedly and that sometimes he curled up and took it, but sometimes he retaliated.

352 An applicant said that he was subject, as he alleges were other boys, to a regime of being slapped by staff and in one instance being assaulted by a PE instructor. This regime of ongoing, often severe, physical abuse affected him deeply; as he put it "the slaps were too much for young lads." The PE instructor beat him up when he was caught smoking and kicked him in the mouth, leaving his lip bleeding.

353 One applicant described his establishment as being like a concentration camp with a very strict regime where you were "tortured" for infringing any of the rules regarding behaviour in the cell, for example, sitting on the bed during the day or leaving marks on cleaned surfaces. Assaults included slaps, punches to the head and body, being kicked and being hit in the face with a bucket. Most assaults were by staff using their hands. He told the Forum that when approached by a member of staff:

> "you had to immediately stand up and give your prison number, name, Sir, twelve calendar months; if you were too slow you would be assaulted."

354 Another applicant spoke of constant daily beatings, being bruised frequently and described a very punitive coercive regime with no merit in it; he said that hearing and seeing other young people beaten was for him even worse than his own mistreatment. He appears to have been put into solitary confinement with a bed and Bible but it was unclear how long he was kept there. On another occasion he described being held down, stripped, beaten and kicked in the stomach by a female member of staff.

355 As part of the initiation process described by one applicant, a member of staff who was known by a nickname would say "I'm animal (name), don't fuck with me" and he proceeded to punch the boys in the head. Following this, he left the boys alone. It was common to have the other boys beat new entrants and see other boys being abused. He was also made to play a game without rules called "murder ball" in which the boys would punch and beat one another. He felt it was like a blood sport for the prison officers to watch.

356 Boys were expected to keep their cells spotless. An applicant explained that as he was locked up for so many hours per day, his cell remained spotless. One member of staff inspected the cell thoroughly but another member of staff accompanying him lifted the plastic chair and placed his finger inside the tubular legs and found a speck of dust. He punched him in the face and called him a "dirty bastard." The member of staff who accompanied this man looked embarrassed and returned later to give the applicant a half ounce of tobacco. On another occasion, the nurse gave him green liquid to drink which he thought to be a sedative. He was then taken by six members of staff to another part of the prison and beaten badly: his skin was gouged, he had marks everywhere and his teeth went through his lip.

357 An applicant told the Forum that after a disagreement with another resident, he was asked by staff to go to a room. He refused and when he was held by his arms he struggled; another member of staff was called who then punched him very hard in the small of his back (he said that it felt like being hit with a baseball bat), knocked him to the floor and knelt on him.

358 It was reported that a member of staff in another establishment punched an applicant in the stomach when he tried to tell him about the sexual and physical abuse he was experiencing. Some applicants spoke of forms of solitary confinement. For example, an applicant said that on at least one occasion he was locked in his dormitory. Another applicant described a cell block with three cells and a yard where boys could be kept for lengthy periods.

359 A punishment for running away was described by an applicant who talked of being made to have a cold shower and being beaten with a blackthorn stick by the watchman. He said that he was made to stand in cold showers and also in wet clothing as a punishment for absconding. Another applicant described a similar punishment of being put outside in the cold or given cold showers if the residents misbehaved.

Bullying

360 Some applicants described occasions where they had been bullied or beaten by other residents and one of them explained that sometimes staff would get other residents to beat him.

> "Staff treated you like dirt; if they didn't hit you they would get other men or boys to do it."

Some applicants said that in their establishments this type of behaviour was permitted as part of the system.

361 A regular occurrence described by one applicant was for the residents, the applicant included, to be put into a makeshift boxing ring with other boys and made to fight for one minute. He described this as very frightening.

362 One applicant, who referred to some of the members of staff being very violent, was also very keen to say that some other members of staff were kind.

Sexual Abuse

363 Twenty male applicants disclosed incidents of sexual abuse, ranging from indecent assaults to anal rape, whilst resident in juvenile justice establishments.

Indecent Assaults including Inappropriate Fondling

364 Indecent assaults including inappropriate fondling were mentioned by several applicants. One applicant explained that a member of staff came into his room and put comics on his bed and then proceeded to put his hand under the comics and "touch him up" whilst making rasping noises and saying "you're a good boy" before leaving the room. As a result of this, the applicant explained that he used to put his wardrobe up against the door to prevent the member of staff coming in. On one occasion all the boys in his dormitory were told to put on their dressing gowns and come downstairs to watch TV; the member of staff tried to entice him out of the room but he resisted. Another applicant said that members of staff touched him on his "privates" each time he showered.

365 An applicant explained that a number of boys were resident in single bedrooms off a long corridor. He said that a member of staff would wake him in the morning by shaking him with his hand on his body whilst he was lying in bed. The member of staff would touch him in the area of his genitals, starting on top of the bed clothes but then progressing to moving his hand under the bedclothes and touching his penis. Several different members of staff would wake him in this way and started visiting him in the night when they would masturbate him and make him masturbate them. This, he disclosed, progressed to anal rape.

366 An applicant who was in bed in the dormitory, was approached by the night watchman who touched him inappropriately. Another applicant said that he had to take washing once a week to the laundry. In the laundry a member of staff would put his hands around him and he said that he could feel that he had an erection. The member of staff would also put him over the machines in the laundry and simulate sex.

367 On his reception into one establishment, an applicant said that he was instructed by two members of staff to strip and shower. He was very frightened and referred to himself as being small in stature and terrified of these two members of staff. He went on to explain that he was then touched inappropriately and sexually abused by one of the members of staff.

368 Some applicants described being made to masturbate members of staff. On occasions this was accompanied by veiled threats, for example, a member of staff told one applicant that although he had been sentenced to spend between one to three years in the establishment "we could make this three or six months" which he understood to mean that if he cooperated with the sexual abuse, then leniency would be shown. This particular applicant felt unable to go into detail but did say that speaking to the Forum was the first time he had felt able to talk of the sexual abuse he had experienced. He said this included being sexually abused by a number of staff, including one occasion when he was brought to a store room and the abuse began with rubbing and progressed to his being made to masturbate the member of staff.

369 Another applicant described being asleep in the dormitory and being wakened around 2.00am by someone (who he subsequently discovered was another resident) lying under his sheets giving him oral sex. When the applicant realised what was happening, he ran into toilets where he came across a member of staff who asked him why he was there. Instead of helping him, the member of staff pushed up against him, fondling him. He was shocked, and could not believe what had happened so he got up early and reported it to a senior member of staff who told him:

> "Don't be awkward – if you make false allegations then things will get bad for you."

Coercive Peer Abuse

370 Coercive peer abuse was mentioned by an applicant who talked of being moved from a single room to an eight person dormitory, which he was told by another resident was referred to as "the cock suckers dormitory." Whilst in this dormitory, he explained that an older resident who was a bully would make another boy go and "suck the cock" of anyone he nominated. The second night he was in the dormitory he was nominated so he threw a table through the window and ran away.

Anal Rape

371 Some applicants disclosed incidents of anal rape. One of these explained that when he arrived at the establishment from a police station, accompanied by members of staff, he was taken in by the side door of a particular section, separated from his co-detainee and taken into a bungalow next door. Once inside, he said that he was held down by two members of staff and raped by a third.

372 One applicant said that he was groomed by a member of staff who had told him that he was not wanted by his mother or father. He said that he felt very vulnerable when he entered the establishment but responded positively to the new environment. The member of staff was kind to him initially but started to groom him and proceeded to touch him inappropriately and moved on from that to anal rape.

Other Forms of Sexual Abuse

373 Other forms of sexual abuse were also mentioned by applicants. One explained that none of the boys would use the showers as the members of staff would watch them in the shower. He used the shower on his first day as no one had told him about this but when they did, he no longer used them. Another spoke of members of staff masturbating in front of the boys.

Emotional Abuse

374 Twenty applicants spoke of a number of forms of emotional abuse that they considered undermined their self esteem and emotional wellbeing.

Personal Emotional Abuse

375 The following are some examples of the abuse applicants alleged.

- One applicant said that he remembered being humiliated when his father came to visit him. Unlike all the other boys who wore their normal clothes, he was made to wear his pyjamas. He asked why this was the case and was told by a staff member "Because you have to earn it" (ie the privilege of wearing ordinary clothes).
- Another applicant spoke of an occasion when he was stripped and made to stand naked in the staff common room for two hours – this was apparently intended to stop him running away. He didn't believe there was any sexual element to this punishment but explained that other staff members were present during this period. He described his overall treatment as "being treated like dirt."
- One applicant felt humiliated on one occasion when in the dining area with a large number of boys present, he was told by a member of staff that he was "going to be a borstal failure."

- An applicant commented that it was the norm to be referred to as "scum" and as "a borstal failure." Another said that he was repeatedly told by a certain member of staff that his mother put him into that particular establishment and she didn't want him. He was told by staff from his admission up to discharge that "You have no mother or father - we are your mother and father - you are number xxx". He felt dehumanised by this behaviour.

376 Some applicants believed that there was a sectarian bias in the emotional abuse they experienced. One applicant described feeling intimidated by staff and older boys as he was a Catholic in an establishment staffed by members of another denomination. Another recalled being called sectarian names such as "Fenian bastard" by staff members – for example, when one of the boys cheered after it was reported that a bomb had killed a number of soldiers. Yet another applicant disclosed that he had been told that he was worthless and would spend his life in prison. This was accompanied by constant sectarian taunts from the staff members.

377 One applicant, whose brother had been a member of the INLA and had been shot dead, had 'INLA' tattooed on his fingers in memory of his brother. He explained that he didn't fully appreciate the full significance of it or the ideology behind it because of his age. He felt that the staff picked on him and singled him out because of this and many of them would make comments in relation to or linked with the tattoo. For example, a member of staff said he would like to cut his fingers off.

378 Another applicant spoke of a sexual basis to the emotional abuse, explaining that a member of staff would often make derogatory remarks to him such as "I would like to make you up like a lady boy; you're eye candy." This he considered was very degrading, but he felt powerless to know how to manage the constant innuendoes and sexual references made about him in the presence of others.

Deprivation of Affection

379 Being shown no affection whilst a resident in an establishment was referred to by some applicants. For example, one considered that he had been placed by the state in an environment that left him exposed to violence, bullying, recruitment into paramilitarism and general criminality. He referred to the establishment being "a war zone" in which he had to become hyper vigilant to survive. Another simply expressed the view that no warmth was shown or encouragement given to him by the staff in the establishment.

Exposure to Fearful Situations

380 Several applicants said that they had been exposed to fearful situations. As noted earlier, some said that the staff would "pitch" the residents against one another and would condone bullying. They referred to the staff actually encouraging the bullying. Another described a regime that included verbal and physical abuse which left him fearful and deeply unhappy. Fear of being abused and unable to tell anyone what was taking place was a common concern.

381 An applicant described his fellow prisoners being taken out of their hut and taken to an 'H' Block. He said he witnessed others being beaten and heard them being brought out of their cells, screaming and pleading with the members of staff to stop. He saw another prisoner being dragged out of a cell by his feet and being beaten on the soles of his feet with a baton. The applicant had initially been placed in a cell with two political prisoners and felt very threatened as they were openly talking about bombings and shootings. He was seventeen years of age and this was his first time in a penal establishment.

382 Death threats were apparently common, according to one applicant. Another described living in abject fear of violence from members of staff, referring to the "emotional terror and living every day in absolute fear". He was told by a member of staff prior to a visit when he had a black eye that, if he mentioned anything about what happened on the wing, he would be denied visits.

Bullying

383 Another applicant highlighted a culture of bullying by other residents and a fear that he would be raped. He said the threat of anal rape was always present. One applicant said that although the establishment "was not a bad place" he was bullied a lot by older residents, both in the pool and in the showers. One response was to run away, which he did frequently, sometimes just across the fields, sometimes to his home and sometimes to the bonfire near his home.

Letters being Censored

384 An applicant spoke of letters being censored "like being in prison" and of being threatened with being sent to other establishments if he did not do as he was told. He also talked of witnessing other boys getting punched "hundreds or thousands of times" but was terrified and too frightened to report any of the abuse.

Removal of Personal Belongings

385 The removal of personal belongings was mentioned by an applicant who stated that his personal belongings, including his much valued stereo (bought as a present for his thirteenth birthday by his mother), were taken by staff.

Other Examples of Emotional Abuse

386 An applicant described being sent to the sick room as he had hurt his back, but as a result had no contact with anyone for long periods of time. He felt that he was in solitary confinement with no contact, no books to read other than a Bible and nothing else to do.

387 Another considered his placement in the establishment as "a wakeup call, a terrible place". He said that he became very depressed and the establishment was run like an army barracks. He apparently became as white as a ghost, with black rings around his eyes and would not talk to others. He concluded by saying that "the screws took out their frustrations on us."

Neglect

388 Eight applicants complained of neglect, focusing mainly on education. They alleged that their education was neglected, their learning potential ignored and their need to develop basic skills unmet.

Education

389 One applicant felt that his education was inadequate and referred to being unable to read and write when he left the establishment. Another applicant pointed out that he was sent to the establishment because of his record of absconding from school but that, ironically, in the establishment he did not attend school. Similarly, one applicant who had been sent to an establishment for truanting pointed out that the establishment did not encourage residents to attend classes.

390 Another applicant felt that there was no proper education, no mental stimulation for the residents in the establishment and that the teachers were uninterested in his educational development. An applicant commented that:

"we received a very, very, very poor education – it was like going back to primary school – I really feel my education suffered by going to (this establishment) where the emphasis was on woodwork, metal work and gardening – not on GCSEs."

391 One applicant said that the teachers didn't want to teach him and that he was allowed to play 'Chucky Egg', a computer game, all day. He said there was no teaching and no learning. He also alleged that older boys gave him 'magic mushrooms' and he would be sitting in class "totally spaced out". No one ever seemed to notice and no one asked him what was wrong with him. He said he had "no art, no metalwork, no history, and no geography."

Inadequate Medical Attention

392 Inadequate medical attention was highlighted by one applicant who had attempted to commit suicide on numerous occasions, including eating parts of a smoke detector and drinking bleach. He said that he did not receive appropriate medical treatment at the time. Another applicant explained that he had hurt his back and the pain was so intense that he was unable to stand with both feet on the ground during parade. He said that he was not given pain relief despite being in a great deal of discomfort.

393 One applicant described an incident when boys playing a ball game in the yard broke a window above where he was standing. The shattered glass fell on top of him and badly cut the back of his head and upper neck. He was taken to hospital where he received stitches for the injuries but still has a large scar as a result. He was told by staff that he could not make a claim because the incident happened in a designated ball-playing area. He believes that responses to accidents and injuries were lax and the attitude of staff was unsympathetic. He said that on one occasion he put his hand through a window and cut himself badly, but believes the incident was not dealt with appropriately.

Lack of Supervision

394 The lack of supervision in some of the establishments was also commented on by applicants. One applicant referred to being bullied and felt there was no appropriate supervision to prevent this happening. Another explained that the country and town boys were separated and he received threats from the Belfast boys that he was going to be beaten up at night. He said that he always felt frightened; staff took no account of this and he felt unable to report the matter as he feared that he would lose his special privileges.

Aftercare

395 One applicant who served thirteen months of a one to three year sentence said he received no preparation for life and work in the community and was simply told one day that he "was going."

Females: Juvenile Justice Provision

396 Thirteen female applicants who had been in three different juvenile justice establishments made fourteen reports of alleged abuse. There were eleven complaints of physical abuse, nine complaints of emotional abuse, seven complaints of sexual abuse and six complaints of neglect.

397 The combinations of types of abuse they alleged are set out in the following table.

Abuse types	Females	Establishments
Physical, sexual, emotional and neglect	2	2
Physical, emotional and neglect	3	3
Physical, emotional and sexual	2	1
Physical, sexual and neglect	-	-
Physical and neglect	-	-
Physical and emotional	1	1
Physical and sexual	2	1
Emotional and sexual	-	-
Emotional, neglect and sexual	-	-
Emotional and neglect	-	-
Emotional	1	1
Sexual	1	1
Physical	1	1
Neglect	1	1
Total	14 reports	3 different establishments

Note: One establishment was the focus of eight complaints. Two other establishments were the focus of three complaints each.

Physical Abuse

398 Physical assaults involved punching, hitting, kicking, having hair pulled, being spat on and assaulted with objects such as a bunch of keys. Some applicants said they were physically restrained in ways they considered abusive.

399 An applicant described a physical assault that she endured after running away from her establishment and being found glue sniffing. She said that when she was brought back to the establishment and taken to the office with two other female residents, a male member of staff grabbed her as she tried to escape through the window and pinned her against the wall, knocking her unconscious, and she came round with blood coming from her head. She was taken to hospital for treatment. The senior member of staff present was described as being furious because she had tried to escape yet again.

400 Another applicant said she saw the priest who was conducting Mass one day slap one of the girls across the face because she came up to the altar wearing lipstick. Another applicant explained that a member of staff would put on white gloves and inspect their rooms for dust. If there was any dust on the white glove, she would thump and beat the girls and wreck the room.

401 One applicant told the Forum about a member of staff in her establishment. She was a big woman who was verbally and physically abusive, pushing, slapping, dragging, flinging people about and beating them. She said that she still has nightmares about this woman.

402 Being placed in some form of solitary confinement was mentioned by a number of applicants. One of these was being sent to the Day Room which was a room with "nothing in it other than a potty" – there were no other sanitary provisions. She felt that this was a punishment that was used regardless of what she had actually done and commented that "I must have spent one and a half years in that Day Room."

403 One applicant talked of being restrained, as were other residents, by members of staff who held them face down on the floor and also held them by their arms and legs when they were moving them from one room to another. She said "they had no consideration for the residents' modesty"; she explained that often she wore jogging bottoms which would come down when she was being restrained. Sometimes she would be placed in a particular room for periods of up to 72 hours on her own. In addition, she also mentioned being kicked and spat upon by members of staff. Other applicants said that they were regularly placed in the "lock-up unit" for between 24 and 48 hours, often for running away.

404 One applicant stated that she was regularly bullied by other residents and that staff laughed at her if she reported it. Another explained how other girls would sit on her bed and urinate on it in order to get her into trouble. In the bathroom they would squeeze toothpaste on her head. Staff responded to this by telling her she had to learn to stand up for herself.

Sexual abuse

405 The incidence of sexual abuse disclosed by the female applicants within the juvenile justice category was similar to that of their male counterparts. Seven applicants recalled sexual abuse.

Grooming

406 One applicant explained that soon after her admission to the establishment she was "set aside" by a male member of staff: "He paid me more attention." She trusted him and told him about the abuse she had experienced at home, including sexual abuse. He hugged her when she cried and always came to her aid when she asked for him. As he was a senior member of staff she said that he had a great deal of power. This grooming behaviour escalated, progressing from kissing her to full sexual intercourse on a regular basis, from the age of sixteen through to eighteen and beyond, including after she had left the establishment.

407 Other applicants spoke of grooming behaviour leading to indecent assaults. For example, one male member of staff apparently used every opportunity to grope the residents, including putting his hands under their tops and down their tracksuit bottoms. He would send them birthday cards and give them little treats even though the applicant stated he must have been aware that they did not like being touched.

Indecent Assaults including Inappropriate Fondling

408 An applicant said that staff would wait outside the bathroom but look in through the glass panel above the door. She said one member of staff would pretend to tickle her but would be groping her and fondling her breasts. She said "it was horrible – there was no one to protect you."

409 One applicant, after being locked in her dormitory at night, would be allowed out by a male member of staff so that she could smoke a cigarette. She said that "he was always trying to touch me up." When she complained to him he said:

> "a silly wee girl like you and a trouble maker, who is going to believe you?"

Other Inappropriate Sexual Behaviour

410 Another form of inappropriate sexual behaviour was alleged by an applicant who described circumstances in which she was examined by the woman in charge of the establishment and was required to take her pants down; a man, whose role to her was unknown, was present throughout. She also spoke about a situation in which she needed sanitary pads and the woman in charge checked her pants, again in the presence of the man whose role was unknown to her.

Emotional Abuse

411 The emotional abuse disclosed by nine female applicants in the juvenile justice category focused on the related areas of public humiliation, personal denigration, family denigration and the discouragement of sibling and family links. Being shown no affection and an inappropriate exposure to fearful situations were also commented on by some applicants.

Personal Emotional Abuse

412 An applicant described a points reward system in her establishment. Each week in front of everyone else, each girl's reasons for having points deducted was explained in detail; she said they found this humiliating. She also mentioned a "loud" female member of staff, whom she described as a bully, who was responsible for verbal and physical abuse and of whom everyone was terrified. The member of staff frequently made derogatory remarks to the girls; for example, she would refer to the applicant and three other girls from Derry/Londonderry as the "Derry Hogs".

413 Another applicant was made to strip naked and stand in line with the other girls to shower. She felt humiliated and despite asking staff if she could get in the shower in underwear or be the last in, she was sneered at and told to strip.

414 An applicant mentioned that when restrained or being physically moved by staff, there was no regard for the modesty of the resident if the displacement of clothing revealed personal areas.

Personal Denigration

415 Personal denigration was reported by a number of applicants. One asked for a bra like the other girls but the member of staff she had asked commented "you need a chest before you get a bra." Another applicant was made to feel inferior by the constant taunting by older girls and staff as she was very small and because they referred to her as not having breasts. She said that this behaviour was never challenged by any member of staff. Another applicant was constantly told "you're dirty, no one wants you, you're bad," and another was mocked for her slight build. One applicant was told her family didn't want her.

416 An applicant stated that she was repeatedly placed in solitary confinement, where she was frightened, hungry and lonely. She was subjected to name-calling, family denigration, disbelief, and threatening behaviour from staff. She was bullied by other residents. She was blamed for others' misbehaviour. As she saw it, she was made a scapegoat in the establishment, just as she had been at home and in school.

417 Another applicant explained how they were given an allocation of five cigarettes a day, but that staff used to "wind them up" until someone swore and the staff would then cut up their allocated cigarettes in front of them.

Sibling and Family Links Discouraged

418 Applicants described how sibling and family links were discouraged or forbidden and, in one case, how even personal friendships within the establishment were discouraged.

419 An applicant and her identical twin sister who were in the same establishment were not allowed to visit each other and only saw each other at school, where they were in different groups. When her sister became ill from a self-harming incident and was in hospital in intensive care, the applicant was not informed, and was not allowed to visit her in hospital or see her on her return. The applicant considered that this was a most destructive act for her to contend with as they were so close. This situation was aggravated by the fact that she was not permitted to have appropriate contact with her parents when they visited, although her twin sister was allowed to meet them.

420 An applicant told the Forum that she and another girl in the same establishment, who had developed a close friendship, were forbidden by staff from seeing each other and her friend self-harmed by slashing her wrists with a razor blade in response to this ban.

Deprivation of Affection

421 Being shown no affection was commented on by some applicants. They explained:

> "There was no affection or emotional support; it was a very harsh regime, the staff had no time for you. If you got upset there was no one to speak to. They treated us like dogs; it was like being in prison – we were in care, not young offenders. Other kids bullied you, staff would ignore it and just laugh at you if you reported it; it was a horrible place with horrible people."
>
> "I was constantly being told that no one wanted me and that I was a bad girl – bad not mad."

Exposure to fearful situations was also mentioned by applicants who said that the totality of the abuse culminated in a fearful environment.

Neglect

422 Six of the female applicants who had been placed in juvenile justice establishments alleged neglect.

Education

423 One applicant said that no education was offered to her and she had concluded that it was not even considered as an option for her to attend school. This applicant felt let down and blamed staff in the establishment and the social workers allocated to oversee her care. Education, as she experienced it, consisted of making baskets and she alleged that no formal arrangements for general education were made for the residents. One applicant when aged eleven was placed in a classroom with sixteen and seventeen-year-old girls, and felt terrified and unable to complete the school work. She felt unable to ask for help from the teachers even though most of the other residents were much more advanced in their work.

424 Another applicant commented that her education in the establishment was deficient despite the fact that she had been placed there for missing school. She said that "often we were just given a PlayStation." One applicant complained about her schooling in an establishment saying:

> "School? They didn't educate you. I was taken from a grammar school to this. They did not teach you anything – no education; no exams."

Bedding

425 An applicant spoke of the sleeping arrangements in the establishment and the lack of adequate bedding. She said that she was in the reception unit for six months. She talked of being:

> "locked in, having no space, there were lots of kids in a small room. Staff and other kids would bully you; if one of us messed about, all were punished. The staff were very harsh – they had no time for you – they would just push you away. I felt like a prisoner; there was little fresh air, I slept in a dormitory on an old blue gym mattress with a sheet on the floor."

Inadequate or Inappropriate Diet

426 Some applicants spoke of having an inadequate or inappropriate diet, sometimes with no food at all. One said that the food was terrible and undercooked; for example chicken with blood still in it, but that they were still forced to eat it. One applicant described being deeply upset by the harsh, inflexible regime and the lack of provision for her basic needs. She was vegetarian and yet in the establishment she was served meat and told there were no alternatives.

427 One applicant said that when she was in solitary confinement she was often overlooked at lunch time. She said that as she didn't like some of the regular food she was often hungry and that no-one monitored her weight, even though she was very lightly built. Another applicant, when thirteen-years-old, took an overdose of medication that resulted in her being hospitalised for a week. When she returned to the establishment she was immediately sent to a room and not given any food. She said that she was "not given one piece of bread in three days".

Inadequate Medical Attention

428 Inadequate medical care was commented on by an applicant who often self harmed by cutting herself, but when she did she was not taken to hospital but was just bandaged up. Poor hygiene was mentioned by one applicant who complained that she was not given sanitary pads when she needed them.

Inadequate Aftercare

429 One applicant told the Forum that when she left the establishment she was transferred to a hostel, but found it a terrifying place with adults who were drug abusers and were involved in other anti-social behaviour. She was so scared that she would stay in her room. She told the Forum that:

> "there was no after care. I was given a cheap box of food and sent on my way. I didn't know how to boil an egg; no one took an interest in your needs."

Reporting of Abuse: All Establishments

430 Of the 103 applicants within Period 3, 34 reported their abuse to someone on at least one occasion. Some had reported abuse on more than one occasion, to more than one person or whilst in more than one establishment. The following table shows the number of applicants who reported abuse, to whom they reported the abuse and if they were believed about the abuse.

Reporting of Abuse at the time and to whom
Reported To	Total	Voluntary		State		Juvenile Justice
		Believed		Believed		Believed
		Yes	No	Yes	No	Yes	No
Parent	7	2	1	2	1	1	-
Sibling	2	2	-	-	-	-	-
Social Worker	11	3	3	1	3	1	-
Officer in Charge	3	1	-	-	-	2	-
Care Staff	9	2	1	-	3	2	1
Ancillary Staff	1	1	-	-	-	-	-
Authority Figure	5	1	1	-	1	-	2
Other Adult	1	-	1	-	-	-	-
Other Resident	3	1	-	-	-	2	-
Other Child	1	-	-	1	-	-	-
Police	3	-	1	-	-	2	-
Total	46	13	8	4	8	10	3

In summary, in relation to the 46 occasions when they had reported abuse, applicants felt that they had been believed on 27 of those occasions and not believed on nineteen. Some comments from those applicants who considered that they had not been believed are set out by establishment type below.

Males and Females: Voluntary Establishments

431 One applicant said:

> "Despite having told my parents and the fact it was clear that I was distressed and didn't want to return to (the establishment), having been home for the weekend, my parents apparently did not believe me."

Another applicant explained that when she complained to the staff about her abuse, no action was taken and she was told "not to tell jokes". An applicant, who told his probation officer that he and his brother were being abused, was told they "were both disgusting – how can you say that?" A female applicant said that no one ever believed anything she reported and as a result she trusts no one to this day. Another applicant disclosed the abuse to her mother but she did not want to know and could not accept that such a thing would happen in a church-run establishment. An older member of staff said to an applicant who had told her about his abuse: "We'll get these beasts. God is powerful," but she took no action. He believes she did not report the abuse because she was frightened she would lose her job.

State Establishments

432 An applicant said that he had told both his key worker and social worker but neither of them believed him.

Juvenile Justice Establishments

433 A male applicant reported the abuse to a senior member of staff and was told that it did not happen and that he had nightmares. However, when he insisted that it had, he was told:

> "Don't be awkward – if you make false allegations then things will get bad for you!"

434 Another applicant said his mother told him to "shut your mouth – you'll get us into trouble." Other applicants felt that they had been believed but that little action if any was taken by the people to whom they reported the abuse. One applicant who spoke to a member of staff felt that he had been believed but the response was "Sorry, I can't help you." An applicant who disclosed his abuse to his parents was told by them that if he went to the police he would be a "tout" (informer).

435 Some applicants said that it was not that their complaints were disbelieved but that the people they complained to did not want to know. A male applicant who had reported his abuse to staff said their response was just to laugh at him and not do anything about it. Another applicant who reported the abuse she had experienced was told she had to learn to stand up for herself.

Chapter 6:

Chapter 6: Life After Care

Applicants' Current Circumstances

1 During their meetings with the Forum, many applicants talked about their current circumstances including relationships, children, employment and health. Over half of the applicants had at one stage been married, although at the time they met the Forum some were widowed, divorced, separated and re-married. The applicants' experiences of marriage were mixed, with some marriages ending in a short time but with others enduring for many years. For example, one applicant had been married for 48 years and another for 58 years. One-hundred-and-sixty-nine of the 262 male applicants told the Forum they were or had been married and of that number 76 had been married for ten or more years. One-hundred-and-two of the 167 female applicants told the Forum that they were or had been married, and of that number 47 had been married for ten or more years.

2 Applicants who were still in long-term relationships, including marriage, often described their relationship as being strong, caring, stable or very supportive. For many of the applicants whose partners accompanied them to the meeting with the Forum, the support they spoke of was evident. A male applicant said that his wife had saved him and that he would have been dead if it had not been for her support. Likewise, a female applicant explained that she and her husband were about to celebrate their fiftieth anniversary. In the past she had "put him through hell but he is the reason I am still here". Some applicants described their partners during the meeting with the Forum using phrases such as "an amazing woman", "a fantastic person." Others said "my wife has been my strength," and "I married a good man."

3 Applicants with long marriages explained that it had not always been easy but that their strong relationships had helped them deal with the problems and, for some, having a family had a strong, positive effect in their lives. One applicant said that whilst his wife and he had a good marriage now, he had been violent in the past but they had worked through their difficulties.

4 Another applicant said that his marriage had survived a difficult initial period that resulted from the absence of loving, caring relationships when he was a child in care. He said that this, coupled with his deep-seated anger at his treatment as a child, made him severe in his attitude and behaviour towards his own children. Some applicants who spoke of having a strong relationship now said they had experienced problems in the early years of their relationships. They referred to difficulties that included problems in expressing their feelings or relating to their partners, finding it hard to trust them, being over protective of their children and abusing alcohol.

5 It was noted that some applicants had only recently disclosed their childhood abuse to their partners and others still did not feel able to tell them. One applicant said that he was very happily married but that his wife did not know about the abuse he had experienced, commenting "How would telling her help?" Those who were widowed echoed many of the previous observations made by married applicants, for example, "The only thing that has been good in my life was getting married." Applicants who had sustained long-term co-habiting relationships spoke in a similar way regarding supportive partners who provided stability in their lives.

6 Applicants in other forms of relationship appeared to have encountered similar problems, which they believed had contributed to their current relationship status.

These included:

- an inability to trust partners, feeling unable to trust anybody, difficulty in being close to people, and problems with intimacy: "personally I found it difficult to express my affection to others; I was unable to embrace my partner or tell her that I loved her."
- a lack of confidence
- flashbacks to sexual abuse
- concern that he or she would not be able to love anyone because of abusive experiences as a child
- deciding not to have children because of the worry that they might also end up in care

7 Applicants also spoke of relationships affected by

- verbal abuse
- sexual abuse
- physical abuse/anger management problems
- controlling behaviours
- alcohol related problems

One applicant expressed his thoughts as to why his relationships had not worked out saying he felt that he and his siblings who had been in care had been institutionalised and, from his perspective, he saw "everyone else as an alien", and felt so different from others.

8 Over 75 per cent of the applicants who provided information about their current circumstances told the Forum that they had children. For them, having children was a very positive part of their lives. Applicants spoke with evident pride regarding their children's achievements in education, employment and family life. A number of applicants felt their childhood experiences resulted in them being over-protective of their children; others found it hard to show affection towards their children and had encountered problems in establishing stable relationships with them.

9 One applicant expressed regret that she had felt unable to love her son as much as she feels she should have. Another said that she wanted to be the best mother she could be and had tried too hard at times. A male applicant said that he had no yardstick as to what a father should do but had learned by observing his father-in-law; he added that his children and wife all tell him they think he is a good dad. An applicant who spoke of being over protective of his children said:

> "I created a bubble for them. I wanted to do everything I could to shield them from possible harm. I realise that I went too far."

Some applicants had chosen not to disclose information regarding their abuse in institutions to their children. Comments included:

> "I have not really talked to them about abuse as I don't want to burden them with it. I have told them I will sit down with them one day to tell them about it."

> "My children do not know about my abuse as I am frightened of hurting them."

Employment

10 Information about their current employment was provided by some applicants and is summarised in the table below.

Employment	Total	Male	Female
Employed	75	48	27
Self employed	25	21	4
Retired	98	59	39
Volunteer	9	2	7
Working at home	10	3	7
Unemployed	93	67	26
Disability – unable to work	49	29	20
Unknown	63	29	34

11 The many applicants who were employed (whether currently or previously) worked in a wide range of occupations including the following:

- Trades – building, construction, retail
- Emergency services – police, ambulance, fire brigade
- Security
- Armed services
- Managerial, civil service, secretarial
- Catering, including hotel trade
- Nursing, medical profession, hospital and care facilities staff
- Social work, probation, counselling

A large number of applicants had worked in the home rearing their children and some looked after their grandchildren. Some applicants said they had been unable to work because of a disability, either physical or psychological or both.

12 Many of those applicants who were currently unemployed had been employed at some stage but had been unable subsequently to obtain employment. Many of them had been in short-term employment but explained that they felt hampered by their lack of qualifications and by being 'unskilled'. An applicant said "I have been unemployed for many years but I would love to get a job." One applicant attributed his inability to hold down a job to his intolerance of anyone in authority telling him what to do. He attributed this problem to his abuse in an establishment.

13 Some applicants worked in voluntary positions, notably helping vulnerable people, for example in a food bank, drop-in centre, shelter and as foster-carers. Others worked at home caring for relatives with health problems or special needs and some looked after grandchildren. Caring for and helping others was significant in many applicants' priorities.

Health

14 Many applicants mentioned matters relating to their mental health including psychiatric admissions, suicidal ideation, suicide attempts, self-harm, and dependence on prescribed medication. Many of the applicants considered these to be outcomes linked to the abuse they had experienced as children in residential establishments. They said that their childhood experiences continued to have a negative impact on their adult lives.

15 Some applicants did not disclose any information relating to their health but those who did spoke of experiencing depression and other mental health difficulties that sometimes required admission to a psychiatric hospital unit or supported and supervised care in the community. Some applicants related their feelings of suicidal ideation and attempts at suicide or self-harming to their childhood trauma.

16 In relation to contemplating suicide one applicant said:

> "I think about it – the place never goes away – it is my children who keep me here."

Another said "I didn't want to die, but I didn't know how to live". Several applicants spoke of the pain they felt about friends who had been in institutions with them and who had committed suicide.

17 Many applicants also highlighted the incidence of substance abuse in their lives, including alcohol, drug and solvent abuse, both within their personal experience and also in the lives of others they knew as survivors of childhood abuse. Many spoke of the successful battles they had fought to overcome their reliance on alcohol and explained that they were now 'dry' with the help of organisations such as 'Alcoholics Anonymous' but also with the additional support of their partners and families.

18 Some applicants explained that they had benefitted from counselling, some for several years, whilst others said that they were not interested in counselling. Others found it of limited use to them personally and two applicants made the following comments:

"I didn't really get anything from it – it doesn't take it away but I have learnt to live with it."

"I did not get anything out of it. How can you understand from the outside looking in?"

Many applicants said they were taking prescribed medication for depression or anxiety.

19 Some applicants, in the course of their meetings with the Forum, went into great detail regarding their health and brought with them medical reports to support their accounts of the effects of the abuse experienced in residential childcare establishments.

Effects of Experiences in Care in Later Life

20 Applicants were asked to comment on what effect, if any, their experiences in care had had in later life. A number of them re-iterated the matters they had spoken of when talking about their health in adult life and many mentioned other negative outcomes. An analysis of what they told the Forum indicates that more than 40 different effects were mentioned in some way by at least one applicant.

21 Fifteen negative effects were reported by larger numbers of applicants than others and these are set out in the following table.

Stated effects of experiences in care	Total	Male	Female
Counselling needed	186	115	71
Dependence on medication	153	92	61
Inability to trust others	151	94	57
Suicidal ideation	138	89	49
Experiences in care not easily forgotten	135	91	44
Substance abuse	128	95	33
Feeling anxious or fearful	115	67	48
Lacking self-worth	114	60	54
Suicide attempted/self-harming	114	72	42
Having feelings related to being a victim	103	58	45
Experiencing flashbacks	98`	70	28

Stated effects of experiences in care	Total	Male	Female
Feeling angry	97	68	29
Feeling different from peers	81	45	36
Feeling isolated	78	53	25
Becoming a loner	75	49	26

22 Commonly applicants mentioned more than one negative effect as is indicated in the following table.

Number of negative effects reported per person
	1	2	3	4	5	6+
Male	40	37	19	28	27	106
Female	15	29	24	22	11	52
Total	55	66	43	50	38	158

Chapter 7:

Chapter 7: Applicants' Responses to the Acknowledgement Forum

Participation in the Forum

1 Applicants were asked after their meetings with the Forum if they would accept a call from their WSOs about a week later. The purpose of the contacts was to ask how the applicants were feeling following their meetings and, where necessary, to encourage them again to get in touch with the dedicated support service or their own doctors, counsellors or other health personnel. Almost everyone agreed to this arrangement and WSOs succeeded in contacting the majority of applicants by phone. Where that was not possible they wrote to them.

2 Thirty-eight per cent of male applicants and 30 per cent of female applicants told the WSOs that they felt good or better than previously as a result of having met the Forum. They were comfortable with the process and the arrangements and were very appreciative of having had the opportunity to take part.

3 Twenty-three per cent of male applicants, and 37 per cent of female applicants, said that they found the experience of recounting their abuse to be difficult and painful, but they had no regrets about taking part in the Forum. "It had lifted a burden" was how one male applicant described the process, a sentiment repeated by many others. The applicants in this group expressed their appreciation for having had the opportunity to speak to a listening audience and for giving their voices an opportunity to be heard.

4 A small number of applicants, nine men (three per cent) and six women (four per cent), told their WSOs that participation in the Forum process had proved extremely difficult and had left them drained and feeling 'down'. Most of these applicants, by their own description, were people who felt insecure much of the time and led lonely or even solitary lives; a number of them had mental health needs. Even in the context of these outcomes, they said they had needed to take part in the Forum process.

5 Thirty-four per cent of male applicants and 30 cent of female applicants made no direct comment on their experience of the Forum, but generally they reflected satisfaction with the process.

6 A small number of applicants, seventeen (seven per cent) of the males and eleven (seven per cent) of the females, did not respond to the WSOs' attempts to contact them by phone or letter and so no information is available about their responses to the Forum process.

7 The following comments, noted by the WSOs, are a representative sample of what applicants said about participating in the Forum:

"She was glad she had taken part as it didn't take as much out of her as she thought."

"He felt all went well, like a weight had been lifted off his shoulders."

"She had mixed feelings after meeting the Forum - it brought back lots more memories."

"He was very glad that he had spoken to the Forum and felt they were very nice and understood him well."

"He found the whole process worthwhile and was very grateful to the inquiry for coming over to Australia."

"It was good to have spoken to the Forum and to have them listen to him. He said it was a little bit of closure for him."

"She is feeling a great sense of relief and that it all went a lot better than she had expected."

"He wanted to say that he had felt very much at ease from the moment he arrived in Belfast and he had been treated really well before, during and after his meeting. He wanted to thank the Forum for that."

"She had gone to pieces after she had left the meeting with the Forum but had found the experience less stressful than she had anticipated. She felt no pressure and was able to talk at her own pace."

"Meeting with the Forum was the best thing she has ever done – she said she has now left all her baggage with the Forum members - who she described as very warm and very professional people. At no time did she feel people were just doing their job, she felt everyone really cared."

"The Acknowledgement Forum paved the way forward for survivors to tell their stories; this was a vital and necessary component."

8 Other feedback reported by the WSOs included the examples below.

- An applicant asked the WSO to pass on his heartfelt thanks to the Forum members for their sensitivity and for really listening to him. He said this would go a long way towards his healing.
- An applicant told the WSO that on the bus after meeting the Forum he was really happy. Since then he has just been on his own and the past couple of days he can't stop thinking about it. He said it takes over and he just sits and thinks about it for hours at a time. Even so, he is really happy he met with the Forum.
- An applicant said that she was doing well, and speaking to the Forum members was a massive relief and release. She has been a little upset and had some sleepless nights since, but she was coping well as it was her first time telling anyone. She felt that while she was a victim, she was more a survivor.
- Another applicant told the WSO that it was such a relief to have spoken to the Forum and she felt that a huge weight has now been lifted. She thanked everyone very much for making it so easy.

Conclusion

9 Many applicants, at the end of their meetings with the Forum, expressed satisfaction with the process and procedures of the Forum. Some of their recorded comments were as follows:

"This is the first time I've spoken about this to anyone."

"You are the first people who have ever heard my whole story."

"This is the first time I've actually been listened to."

"I never thought I would be able to go through with this."

"I have more I need to say, but not yet."

"I'm glad I came."

"Thank you for letting me come. How did I do?"