The Inquiry Team

Chairman of the Inquiry

Sir Anthony Hart

Sir Anthony was called to the Northern Ireland Bar in September 1969, and to the Bar of England and Wales in 1975. He became a Queen's Counsel in 1983, and was appointed a county court judge in 1985. In 1997 he became the senior county court judge in Northern Ireland when he was appointed Recorder of Belfast, and in 2002 was the first person to be appointed as presiding judge of the County Courts in Northern Ireland. In January 2005 he was appointed a high court judge, and until his retirement in January 2012 was responsible to the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland for the pre-trial hearings in, and listing of, all criminal cases heard by high court judges, and presided over many criminal trials.

Statutory Inquiry Panel Members

Geraldine Doherty

Geraldine qualified as a social worker in Belfast in 1979 and her first job was in residential child care in London. She has wide experience of social work, social care practice, education and training, working in England and Scotland. In 1996 she was appointed as the Head of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work in Scotland and in 2000 was seconded from that post to the Scottish Executive to advise on the establishment of national arrangements for the inspection and regulation of care services and the registration and regulation of social workers and social care workers. Geraldine was appointed in 2002 as the first Registrar of the Scottish Social Services Council (SSSC); all residential child care workers in Scotland must register with the SSSC, achieve relevant qualifications and abide by the SSSC Code of Practice.

David Lane CBE

David commenced his career with eight years in residential child care, working mainly in the assessment of young offenders, and he ended his career with eight years as Director of Social Services in the city of Wakefield. Since then he has been an independent consultant, and has prepared expert witness reports for over eighty cases in which former children in care have sought damages for negligence. He has played a major role in a number of professional organisations, and for over twelve years he has edited Children Webmag, a professional magazine for child care workers.

Acknowledgement Forum Panel Members

The Inquiry included a confidential Acknowledgement Forum in which victims and survivors could recount their childhood experiences of living in institutions to members of the Inquiry Panel. The Acknowledgement Forum Panel Members were:

Beverley Clarke

Beverley has wide experience of social work and child care, working in England and Canada. She is an independent expert witness and has worked for the Ministry of Justice and the Home Office.

Norah Gibbons

Norah was a Director of Advocacy in Barnardo's Ireland. She was also a Commissioner of the Ryan Inquiry into historical institutional abuse in Ireland.

Dave Marshall QPM

Dave is a consultant in the field of child safeguarding, investigation and management. For nine years he was Detective Chief Inspector and Head of the Metropolitan Police Child Abuse Investigation Command's Major Investigation Team.

Tom Shaw CBE

Tom was invited by Scottish Ministers to review the regulatory framework in Scotland designed to ensure the welfare needs and rights of Children in residential institutions from 1945-95. Subsequently he chaired 'Time to be Heard' – a pilot acknowledgement forum, for those who had experienced abuse in residential children's institutions in Scotland.

Secretary to the Inquiry

Andrew Browne

Andrew has been a member of the Northern Ireland Civil Service since 1980 and has served in a wide range of posts across four departments. He was Secretary to the Human Organs Inquiry and has assisted in setting up a number of public inquiries established by DHSSPS.

Solicitor to the Inquiry

Patrick Butler

Patrick was called to the Bar of Northern Ireland in 1998. He has previously worked for the Equality Commission and for the Departmental Solicitor's Office. Patrick has extensive experience of a number of legal areas including employment law, company law, judicial review and Parole Commissioners work.

Counsel to the Inquiry

Christine Smith - Senior Counsel

Christine Smith QC was appointed as Senior Counsel to the Inquiry. She was called to the Bar of Northern Ireland in 1985 and to the Bar of Ireland in 1996. She was appointed Queen's Counsel in 2011. Ms Smith has practiced in many areas of Law in Northern Ireland. Her most extensive experience is as Prosecuting Counsel, in which role she has had considerable experience in dealing with victims of sexual and physical abuse.

Joseph Aiken - Junior Counsel

Joseph Aiken was called to the Bar of Northern Ireland in 1999. Prior to taking up his role as Junior Counsel to the Inquiry he specialised in civil and commercial litigation, acting both for and against the Government. He has a particular interest in public inquiries, and has contributed to the leading textbook in the area, "Beer on Public Inquiries" published by Oxford University Press in 2011.

The Staff Team

Between April 2012 and January 2017 over 60 individuals worked in the Inquiry, and at its peak in January 2015 the team comprised 40 people, including the chairman, panel members, lawyers, the secretariat, witness support and the research team.

Chapter 1:

Introduction

Part Four

Part One

1 On 29 September 2011 the Northern Ireland Executive announced that it intended to set up an Inquiry into abuse in residential homes in Northern Ireland, and on 31 May 2012 the First Minister and deputy First Minister announced the agreed Terms of Reference for the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry (the HIA Inquiry) and advised the Northern Ireland Assembly of the appointment of the Chairman of the Inquiry and the panel members for the Acknowledgement Forum.

2 The Terms of Reference originally provided that the HIA Inquiry would examine the period between 1945 and 1995. Representations were made to the First Minster and deputy First Minister that the start date of 1945 would result in the exclusion from the Inquiry of a number of those who were resident in residential institutions within the Inquiry's Terms of Reference before 1945, and so the remit of the Inquiry should be extended. After consultation with the Chairman of the Inquiry, the First Minister and deputy First Minister announced that the Terms of Reference would be amended to extend the ambit of the Inquiry to start in 1922 and to finish in 1995.

3 During the early stages of the HIA Inquiry's public hearings in 2014 it became apparent that it would not be possible for the Inquiry to hear oral evidence from every applicant unless the Terms of Reference were extended to give the Inquiry an extra year to complete its work. The Inquiry therefore applied to the First Minister and deputy First Minister to grant an extension of an extra year to the Inquiry. The First and deputy First Minister agreed to the application, and the Terms of Reference of the Inquiry were formally amended by The Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse (Amendment of Terms of Reference) Order (Northern Ireland) 2015, which came into operation on 11 February 2015.

4 The effect of this amendment was that the three year period given to the Inquiry to carry out its investigations and deliver its Report was extended to four years from 19 January 2013, three and a half years of which was to allow the Inquiry to conduct its public hearings and investigations, and a further six months to deliver its report.

The Acknowledgement Forum

5 The Terms of Reference provided for a separate Acknowledgement Forum to > "... provide a place where victims and survivors can recount their experiences within institutions. A 4 person panel will be appointed by the First Minister and deputy First Minister to lead this forum. This Forum will provide an opportunity for victims and survivors to recount their experience on a confidential basis. A report will be brought forward by the panel outlining the experiences of the victims and survivors. All records will be destroyed after the Inquiry is concluded. The records will not be used for any other purpose than that for which they were intended. If necessary the Forum will have the authority to hear accounts from individuals whose experiences fell outside the period 1922 – 1995. The Acknowledgement Forum will operate as a separate body within the Inquiry and Investigation accountable to and under the chairmanship of the Inquiry and Investigation Panel Chair."

6 As the Terms of Reference made clear, the Acknowledgement Forum provided an opportunity for applicants to the Inquiry to recount their experiences of their time as children in residential homes within the Inquiry's Terms of Reference on a confidential basis. The panel members almost always sat in teams of two, and their role was to enable applicants to the Acknowledgement Forum to describe their experiences in a completely confidential setting. The function of the Acknowledgment Forum was not to interrogate or question the applicants about their experiences, although where necessary panel members asked questions in order to help the applicant to describe his or her experiences. Because the Inquiry and the Acknowledgement Forum recognised that this could be a very difficult experience for applicants, an applicant could, if he or she wished, be accompanied by a companion of their choice whilst they recounted their experiences.

7 As the Acknowledgment Forum did not require statutory authority to carry out its work, the Inquiry devoted its initial efforts to putting in place the necessary administrative staff and processes to enable the Acknowledgement Forum to start its work as soon as possible. By a public notice of 1 October 2012 applications were invited from those who wished to speak to the Acknowledgement Forum, and the first interviews were conducted by the Acknowledgment Forum on 22 October 2012.

8 Altogether the Acknowledgment Forum heard from 428 applicants between 22 October 2012 and the completion of their hearings in November 2014. Most of the applicants spoke to the Acknowledgment Forum at various locations in Northern Ireland. Whilst interviews were conducted by the Acknowledgment Forum in the Inquiry Headquarters in Belfast, many interviews took place in Derry/Londonderry (names that we use interchangeably throughout this Report) and other locations throughout Northern Ireland, in the Republic of Ireland, in Great Britain and in Australia. Apart from those applicants who gave evidence by live link from Canada and the United States, all the meetings were conducted on a face-to-face basis. Although the great majority of meetings which took place outside the Inquiry's Headquarters in Belfast took place in hotel rooms rented by the Inquiry for that purpose, there were a number of occasions when Acknowledgement Forum panel members spoke to applicants in prison or in the applicant's home.

9 Although the Inquiry made it quite clear that the Acknowledgement Forum was a confidential process that was never intended to be used as a vehicle for gathering evidence for civil proceedings, there were applications to the Inquiry by solicitors representing applicants who sought access to the transcripts of the meetings in order to gather evidence for civil proceedings. The Inquiry declined to produce such transcripts and its position was upheld by the High Court, and on appeal by the Court of Appeal in LP's Application [2014] NICA 67. As Lord Justice Gillen explained when giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal at [35]

> "The AF is a unique provision. It is intended to operate as a confidential and private service where victims and survivors can recount their experience of their time in institutional care with total confidence in the integrity and confidentiality of that stage of the process... It is vital to the integrity of the Inquiry to ensure that there is a public perception that this will remain the case. The grim truth is that if it were to become common place for such recordings to be provided, with all the attendant risks of such material innocently or otherwise getting into the public domain, we can readily see the deleterious effect this might have on the process as a whole."

> "The record of the AF process is not to be used for any purpose other than those for which it was intended. For example it was never intended that it was to be used as a vehicle for gathering evidence for civil proceedings."

10 In order to allow as many as possible to apply to the Acknowledgement Forum it was not until 6 March 2014 that the Inquiry announced that the closing date for such applications would be Wednesday 30 April 2014.

The Statutory Inquiry

11 The Inquiry Terms of Reference also provided for "An Inquiry and Investigation Panel" with the task of producing "a final report taking into consideration the report from the Acknowledgement Forum, the Report of the Research and Investigative team and any other evidence it considers necessary."

12 For convenience we describe the Inquiry and Investigation Panel as the "Statutory Inquiry" or "The Inquiry", and when we refer to the Statutory Inquiry or to The Inquiry in this Report this is a reference to the Investigation and Inquiry Panel.

13 Unlike the Acknowledgment Forum, the Statutory Inquiry was created by, and operated under, the provisions of, an Act of the Northern Ireland Assembly. On 12 June 2012 the Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse Bill was laid before the Assembly. The Bill passed through a number of stages and was passed by the Assembly on 11 December 2012, and following Royal Assent the Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse Act (Northern Ireland) 2013 (the 2013 Act) became law on 19 January 2013. Statutory Rules made under Section 21 of the 2013 Act were laid before the Assembly on 24 June 2013 and took effect from 25 July 2013.

14 In order to provide for various procedures relating to the operation of the Statutory Inquiry the Chairman published three protocols.

1 A Procedural Protocol

2 A Cost Protocol

3 A Redaction, Anonymity and Restriction Orders Protocol

Under the Redaction, Anonymity and Restriction Orders Protocol the Chairman subsequently made seven Restriction Orders. The Protocols, and the Restriction Orders, can be found on the Inquiry's website.

15 The Inquiry also published guidelines and other relevant procedural documents. These included the definition of abuse used by the Inquiry, undertakings given by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland and the Attorney General for England and Wales in respect of witnesses providing evidence to the Inquiry, application forms for grants of legal representation by the Inquiry at public expense, and a template to be used by legal representatives submitting an invoice for payment of costs awarded by the Inquiry.

16 The Inquiry was not provided with a definition of "abuse" by the Terms of Reference and we therefore adopted the following definition, which recognised that abuse could take the form of sexual abuse, physical abuse, emotional abuse, neglect or unacceptable practices which were against the interest of the children. We set out the full definition of abuse and systemic failings in Appendix 1 to this chapter, and it is sufficient for present purposes to set out paragraph four of the definition.

> ""Abuse" was behaviour which either (a) involved improper sexual or physical behaviour by an adult with another child towards a child; or (b) in the case of emotional abuse, was improper behaviour by an adult or another child to undermine a child's self-esteem and emotional well-being, such as bullying, belittling or humiliating a child; or (c) resulted in neglect of the child; or (d) took the form of adopting or accepting policies and practices, such as numbering children or ignoring or undermining sibling relationships, which ignored the interest of the children."

The research and investigative team

17 In our work the Inquiry was greatly assisted by the work of the researchers in our Research and Investigative Team. Before and during the public hearings they were embedded in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI) where they worked in close conjunction with the Inquiry legal team and PRONI staff. Their excellent working relationship with PRONI meant they were able to trace and examine huge numbers of departmental files, as well as files deposited by former public bodies such as welfare authorities. In several instances it was due to their researches that the Inquiry decided to investigate a particular institution or topic. In the future other inquiries of a similar type might well find that embedding their research staff in PRONI in this way would be valuable.

Applications

18 From the beginning of our work the Inquiry realised that it was necessary to publicise our work as widely as possible so that as many of those who might be able to assist our work would be aware of our existence and would come forward to describe their experiences so that we would gather as large a volume of evidence of experiences as possible. We organised a poster campaign at sites throughout Northern Ireland in February 2013. Rather than engage in conventional and costly newspaper advertising we decided to utilise other means to reach those who we felt would be able to assist us. The Chairman, Secretary and members of the Acknowledgement Forum made themselves available for press, radio and television interviews, including interviews given to radio stations in Australia and New Zealand.

19 The Inquiry also contacted a very large number of organisations throughout the rest of the United Kingdom, in North America and in Australia, which provide various means of contact for people who emigrated from Northern Ireland. These organisations were extremely helpful in publicising our existence and making material available through their websites, newsletters and other means of communication, and we are very grateful to them.

20 The Chairman also wrote to the leaders of the four main Christian denominations in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland asking them to publicise the Inquiry's material through their respective church structures and publications. We are grateful to them, to the media and to the many organisations that helped publicised our existence.

Number of applicants

21 Altogether 526 individuals applied to the Inquiry and the Acknowledgement Forum. The total of 526 includes two late applications that were admitted by the Inquiry, but excludes seven duplicates received in cases where an application had already been made.

22 Not all those who applied were within the Inquiry's Terms of Reference. Also a number of those who applied to the Inquiry subsequently withdrew their applications. Others did not maintain contact with the Inquiry. Despite a number of reminders by the Inquiry, fourteen did not continue to engage with us. In each of the fourteen cases the Inquiry closed the file, but was prepared to reopen it if the applicant subsequently wished to re-engage with us. Consequently, when duplicates and those outside our Terms of Reference are excluded, 493 individuals engaged with the Inquiry as applicants.

23 As the table below indicates, of the applicants who were within our Terms of Reference, 62.5% of applicants lived in Northern Ireland, of whom 22.1% lived in Belfast and 40.4% in other parts of Northern Ireland (approximately 12% of these lived in the North West of the province).

Location of Applicants*

Location	No.	%
Belfast	109	22.1
NI outside Belfast	199	40.4
ROI	22	4.5
Scotland	7	1.4
Wales	2	0.4
England	82	16.6
Europe	5	1.0
USA Canada	4	0.8
Australia	63	12.8
Total	493	100

* These figures do not include applications which were duplicates or were outside the Inquiry Terms of Reference.

As can be seen from the table below, 31% of applicants were age between 55 and 64, 24% were age between 65 and 74 and 10% were over 75.

Age Profile of Applicants*

Age band	No.	%
Up to 34	3	1
35-44	49	10
45-54	120	24
55-64	155	31

Total	493	100

* These figures do not include applications which were duplicates or were outside the Inquiry Terms of Reference.

Assistance to applicants

24 From the beginning, the Inquiry was acutely aware of the need to make the process of engaging with the Inquiry as straightforward as possible for those who wished to tell us of their experiences as children in residential homes or other institutions within our Terms of Reference. We made considerable efforts to reduce the amount of distress or strain experienced by those who wished to tell us about their experiences. We appointed a number of Witness Support Officers (WSOs) whose task it was to act as the point of contact for an individual applicant with the Inquiry. The intention was that each applicant would, wherever possible, deal with the same WSO when arrangements had to be made to speak to the Inquiry, whether that involved coming to speak to the Acknowledgement Forum, speaking to the Inquiry legal team or to give evidence during the hearings which were held at Banbridge.

25 Because we recognised how upsetting it could be for many of those who wished to describe their experiences to us we informed every applicant that, if they wished, they could be accompanied by a companion of his or her choosing when they spoke to the Inquiry, whether that was to the Acknowledgement Forum, during meetings with the legal team, and before giving evidence or while they were giving evidence in the Inquiry chamber. We also paid their travel, accommodation and other costs where necessary. The Inquiry paid approximately £145,000 for the travel, accommodation and subsistence of 320 individuals who travelled from all over the United Kingdom, from the Republic of Ireland, and from elsewhere in Europe in some instances. This included the cost of travel, accommodation and subsistence for those who travelled to various centres in Australia to meet the members of the Acknowledgment Forum, our Legal Team and Witness Support Officers who went to Australia in September and October 2013, and again in June and early July 2014, to talk to applicants living in Western Australia and other parts of Australia.

26 When it came to the time when individuals who wished to speak to the Statutory Inquiry during our hearings in Banbridge came to give evidence, in addition to providing them with the services of our Witness Support Officers, the Inquiry arranged to have a representative from Contact NI present in the Inquiry chamber in order to provide immediate comfort and reassurance to anyone who found the experience so upsetting that they felt the need for immediate assistance.

27 Throughout the life of the Inquiry we provided information to all applicants to help them contact the appropriate agency if they found the experience of recounting their experience to, or engaging with, the Inquiry to be stressful or distressing.

The form of the hearings

28 It was central to our work that the Inquiry hearings were conducted in an inquisitorial fashion by Inquiry Counsel taking each witness through their evidence, whether that person was an applicant to the Inquiry or a witness called by the Inquiry, including witnesses from the institution under examination at the time or giving evidence on behalf of, or in respect of, issues that the Inquiry was investigating. The inquisitorial approach meant that each witness was able to give his or her evidence, and for that evidence to be thoroughly probed in an appropriate fashion, without the witness being subjected to inappropriate or unnecessary cross examination.

29 This did not mean that their evidence was taken at face value without being thoroughly probed and investigated. On the contrary, Inquiry Counsel and the Inquiry legal team went to great lengths to ensure that all relevant material was drawn to the attention of the Inquiry Panel and put to each witness. That was the case whether the material was supportive of, or undermined to some degree, the account given by the witness, whether the witness was describing his or her experiences, or speaking on behalf of an institution or organisation. As part of this process the legal representatives of the core participants and individuals, and their representatives where a core participant chose not to be legally represented, asked Inquiry Counsel to put additional points to each witness. Inquiry Counsel then raised the point with the witness in an appropriate fashion.

30 A public inquiry is obliged to ensure that the matters which it is considering are examined by it in an independent and thorough fashion. This means that the accounts given to it by organisations and individuals must be thoroughly probed and objectively assessed, whether the evidence comes from an applicant to the Inquiry or comes from the person against whom allegations of abuse, or some other failing, are levelled. Some applicants found it very difficult to accept that this process necessarily involved the views of institutions or individuals being put to them and their then being asked to comment upon whatever contrary view was being put forward. The Inquiry went to considerable lengths to ensure that all who appeared before it received a calm and sympathetic, but objective, assessment and appraisal of their evidence. This process was greatly assisted by the skilful way in which Inquiry Counsel took all witnesses through their evidence in a sympathetic fashion, whilst still putting to them politely and firmly relevant matters that might be seen by the witness concerned to imply that their recollection was inaccurate in some respect.

Gathering documents and evidence

31 Using its powers under section 9 of the 2013 Act the Inquiry issued notices to each core participant, and to individuals as necessary, requiring them to provide documents and witness statements, and to give evidence where appropriate. As a result of notices issued to institutions which were designated by the Inquiry as core participants, and to the PSNI, the Inquiry gathered a very large number of documents from various sources, including documents deposited with the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI). Altogether 355,891 pages were included in the evidence bundles for the fifteen Modules into which the inquiry divided its public hearings. This was only a proportion of the total number of documents submitted to the Inquiry, and represented the documents which the Inquiry believed it should make available as necessary to witnesses and core participants to enable them to assist the Inquiry. The volume of material meant it was a laborious and time-consuming task for the Inquiry legal team to collate and analyse the documents in order to decide what needed to be examined in the public hearings.

32 We were well aware that many applicants would find it extremely distressing if their experiences, whether described in public to the Inquiry, or in confidence to the Acknowledgement Forum, were attributed to them by name. Many had never disclosed their experiences to anyone, or only to some, but not all, of their families. We believed that if such individuals were to be publicly identified by name this would act as a considerable deterrent to witnesses coming forward to assist the Inquiry. Some of those who came forward as applicants were themselves the subject of allegations by other applicants that they had also abused applicants whilst resident in institutions within our Terms of Reference. Some of those against whom allegations were made were either dead or in poor physical or mental condition and therefore unable to give evidence on their own behalf in response to the allegations.

33 We wish to acknowledge the willingness to answer our requests shown by all the core participants and other institutions or bodies who were asked to produce documents, and to trace witnesses, by the Inquiry, whether these were non-devolved departments and agencies; religious bodies such as Roman Catholic dioceses and religious orders, or the Police Service of Northern Ireland to name only some of those who helped us. We were well aware that our requests to trace documents, and identify whether possible witnesses were still alive and able to help us, imposed considerable burdens on institutions and other bodies, and their legal representatives. Their co-operation meant that we were able to obtain many important documents whose very existence and significance was hitherto unknown.

34 As our Terms of Reference covered 73 years many relevant bodies ceased to exist, or their names and functions were changed, sometimes radically. As a result it is not always easy to trace the successor body, if there was one. Particularly after the Macrory reforms of the 1970s there were significant changes to the structure of both local and central government, and to the names of bodies concerned with matters within our Terms of Reference. Thus the county welfare authorities were replaced by the health and social services boards, which then were replaced by a single board and fewer health and social care trusts. During the Inquiry itself, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) became the Department of Health (DoH).

35 We decided that the majority of those who were describing their experiences, and those against whom allegations were made, should therefore be given designations to protect their anonymity. Core participants and relevant witnesses were made aware of the identity of the person to whom the designation was given so that the institution or individual could respond to what that person was saying as necessary. It was always open to an individual to waive that anonymity if they wished to do so, and whilst a minority waived their anonymity the great majority wished to retain their anonymity. Those witnesses and others who did not waive their anonymity were, and will continue to be, protected by the anonymity conferred upon them by the Inquiry.

36 The Inquiry held 223 days of hearings at Banbridge Courthouse, almost all of which were held in public. Eighteen hearings in 2014 and 2015 took the form of closed hearings solely to avoid prejudice to criminal trials that were imminent at that time. Transcripts of the proceedings during the remaining days have been placed on the Inquiry website, although they have been redacted as necessary to comply with the Inquiry's anonymity and redaction procedures. In the same way, the documents brought up during the Inquiry hearings and publicly displayed in the Inquiry Chamber have been, or in due course will be, placed on the Inquiry website, although those documents will also be redacted as necessary to comply with the Inquiry's anonymity and redaction processes. The redaction process of those documents has proved to be more complex and time consuming than anticipated, and so not all documents will have been placed on the Inquiry website by the time this Report is published. The remainder will be placed on the website in due course.

Assessment of evidence

37 As will be apparent from the Terms of Reference which required the Inquiry to examine residential institutions for children over a period of 73 years between 1922 and 1995, many of those who gave evidence to us, whether as applicants or other witnesses, were being asked to describe events that occurred many decades in the past, most were being asked to recall events between 30 and 60 years ago, and some events more than 70 years ago. The passage of time naturally created considerable difficulties for many of those who were asked to recall events that occurred so long ago. Some of those against whom allegations were made were dead, others were too physically frail to give evidence in person, or their mental health or memory had failed to such a degree that they were not able to give reliable evidence. Where medical evidence was produced on behalf of a witness the Inquiry considered that evidence. If we were satisfied the witness was unfit to provide a statement, or to attend to give evidence in person, their statement was admitted without them giving evidence in person, or they were excused from providing evidence to the Inquiry. For example, in the case of HIA 128 where the Inquiry was satisfied that he was extremely vulnerable, very suggestible and would have difficulty in answering questions, the Inquiry felt it was inappropriate to put him through the ordeal of giving evidence and his statement was read and noted by the Inquiry.

38 The Inquiry was well aware that the passage of time may render recollections inaccurate, or those recollections may be coloured to a greater or lesser degree by discussions with others, or by accounts that the individual has been made aware of in later years. Another factor was that adults describing events which occurred when they were children may not always have appreciated at the time all of the relevant circumstances surrounding the actions of the adults, such as the post-war shortages of food and other items that may have affected the way in which they were looked after as children. Equally, events that may seem routine at the time, and hence not memorable, may be forgotten in adult life, such as routine trips to see a doctor or a dentist. In contrast, despite the passage of very long periods of time, some events may have been of such significance at the time that they can be vividly and accurately recalled many years later, for example where a child was repeatedly beaten in front of others or humiliated in front of others for some reason, such as being made to carry wet bed sheets past others to a laundry when they had wet the bed.

39 Where contemporary documents and records survived, and many records had either not been compiled in the first place, or had long since been disposed of by institutions and government departments and agencies as the result of normal document disposal procedures, the documents often threw light on the recollections of those who were being asked to recall events of many years before. The collection of documents, and analysis of their content, was therefore central to our work. All those institutions and organisations who were asked to produce documents went to great lengths to comply with our requests. We recognise that this meant the expenditure of a great deal of time and effort, and consequent expense, on the part of those who received such requests and we are very grateful for their co-operation.

Role of the Inquiry

40 The Inquiry was not a court and was expressly precluded by Section 1 (5) of the 2013 Act from (a) ruling upon, or (b) determining, any person's civil or criminal liability. This meant the Inquiry could not make a finding that rendered an individual or an institution guilty of a criminal offence, or subject to civil liability. That is the responsibility of the civil and criminal courts. However, this does not mean that the Inquiry could not identify acts or omissions which, if the same evidence were given in civil or criminal proceedings, might result in the award of damages or some other remedy, or a conviction. If the Inquiry could not make such findings it would be severely hampered in performing the task imposed upon it by its Terms of Reference within the statutory framework created by the legislature.

41 The Terms of Reference of our Inquiry required us to identify whether there were systemic failings on the part of an institution, which meant any body, society or organisation with responsibility for the care, health or welfare of children in Northern Ireland which provided residential accommodation and took decisions about and made provision for the day-to-day care of children under 18 between 1922 and 1995. Conclusions as to whether or not systemic failings existed can only be made once the Inquiry has identified acts or omissions that could be considered to amount to a systemic failing on the part of the institution, body or individual concerned. For example, if A says he or she was physically or sexually assaulted by B, it is necessary to decide whether or not that happened. Only if the Inquiry is satisfied that there was a relevant act or omission on the part of an individual or an organisation can the Inquiry then proceed to consider whether, in those circumstances, and in the light of that finding, there was a systemic failing on the part of the body or institution concerned.

42 In general the Inquiry sought to avoid reaching conclusions of fact in relation to specific acts or identifiable individuals where it was possible to arrive at conclusions as to systemic failings without identifying an individual or a specific incident. For example, if ten individuals alleged that one person assaulted them in some way, and if the Inquiry was satisfied that some of those allegations were credible then it was unnecessary for us to specify which of the accounts were reliable and which were not. However, there were a small number of situations where the Inquiry had to identify whether a specific individual did or did not do something in order to determine whether or not there was a systemic failing. If, for example, an individual was alleged to have repeatedly committed sexual offences against children in his or her care, the Inquiry had to reach a view as to whether or not those events occurred in order to determine whether or not there was a systemic failing by an individual or an institution.

Standard of proof

43 The 2013 Act is silent as to the standard of proof to be applied by the Inquiry when reaching our findings. The 2013 Act mirrors the provisions of the Inquiries Act 2005, and the standard of proof to be adopted by inquiries under the 2005 Act and other types of inquiry has been considered on several occasions in recent years. We do not consider it necessary to engage in a review of these authorities because we adopt the approach identified by Sir William Gage in the Baha Mousa Inquiry where he explained that he was not obliged to adopt the criminal standard of proof, that is proof beyond reasonable doubt. He concluded:

> "In order properly to report who is responsible, in my judgment, I must reserve to myself the right to state, were I find the evidence sufficient, that I find a fact proved on a balance of probabilities. To do otherwise would necessarily be to limit my findings of responsibility to the high criminal standards."

We have applied the same test to the evidence before us and in our assessment of the evidence.

The standards against which historic practices should be compared 44 Our Inquiry was obliged to consider matters stretching over many decades. Over that period of time there have been changes in what is regarded as acceptable or unacceptable behaviour towards children, and in what are regarded as proper standards of accommodation and childcare for children in residential care. If we were to judge what happened many years ago by the standards of today that would mean imposing today's standards on the past with the advantage of hindsight. We did not consider that that was the correct approach to take. Throughout, we approached the evidence we heard on the basis of what we believed to be the appropriate standards of care that should have been applied by the residential institution at the time we were considering. That required us to take into account the economic and social circumstances at the time, the level of professional training and competence to be expected at the time, and other relevant factors that related to the period under consideration.

Part Two

45 When deciding which institutions to examine we took into account a number of factors. The first was the number of applicants who complained about an institution. The second was the nature of the complaints, and the third was the type of institution. As will be apparent from the various chapters, the largest numbers of applicants wished to speak about their experiences when in four homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth, the next largest number being those who wished to describe their experiences in Rubane House or in St Patrick's Training School, both of which were run by the De La Salle Order. We decided to investigate the following homes.

Local Authority Homes

Lissue Hospital, Lisburn
Kincora Boys' Home, Belfast
Bawnmore Children's Home, Newtownabbey
Fort James, Londonderry
Harberton House, Londonderry

Juvenile Justice Institutions

St Patrick's Training School, Belfast
Lisnevin Training School, Newtownards, County Down
Rathgael Training School, Bangor
Hydebank Young Offenders' Centre
Millisle Borstal

Secular Voluntary Homes

Barnardo's Sharonmore Project, Newtownabbey
Barnardo's Macedon, Newtownabbey

Roman Catholic Voluntary Homes

St Joseph's Home, Termonbacca, Londonderry
Nazareth House Children's Home, Londonderry
Nazareth House Children's Home, Belfast
Nazareth Lodge Children's Home, Belfast
De La Salle Boys' Home, Rubane House, Kircubbin
St Joseph's Training School for Girls, Middletown, Co Armagh
Three institutions run by the Good Shepherd Sisters in Derry/Londonderry, Belfast and Newry

Church of Ireland

Manor House, a children's home near Lisburn.

46 We carefully reviewed every one of the remaining homes and institutions in respect of which an individual made a complaint to see whether or not a full public investigation of the type we conducted in respect of the above homes and institutions was absolutely necessary to add further information to the picture of the nature and extent of systemic failings on the part of the homes and institutions, and on the part of the state, that emerged based on the evidence we received from our investigations into the other homes and institutions. We decided that an examination of the homes and institutions listed above was sufficient to provide the Inquiry with a broad and complete understanding of the nature and extent of systemic failings, not just in those homes and institutions, but within all the types of homes and institutions that were within our remit. This was because we believed that our understanding of the nature and extent of the abuse, and of the systemic failings that allowed abuse to happen, would not be improved by conducting full scale investigations into other homes and institutions. There was no home omitted from our investigations in respect of which there was a substantial number of complainants.

47 We conducted a small number of targeted paper investigations into six homes or institutions in respect of which there were complaints by individual applicants which we felt required further examination. When considering which homes should be the subject of investigation requiring full documentation and oral hearings, it became apparent that there were some homes where there were specific causes of concern such as serious incidents, possible systemic failings or the actions of a member of staff which warranted targeted paper-based investigations without taking into account the whole of the homes' histories and functioning. Targeted investigations were undertaken concerning individual allegations relating to five homes and one hospital. We have made no finding of systemic abuse or failure in relation to any of the six establishments.

48 Altogether applicants made allegations of some form of abuse in respect of 65 institutions or homes. We investigated twenty two in our public hearings, and a further six were the subject of targeted paper investigations, making twenty eight institutions or homes we investigated in all. The remaining thirty seven institutions or homes were each the subject of allegations by two applicants at most, and in some case by only one applicant. In each of the thirty seven remaining cases the panel considered the statements and/or accounts given by each applicant. Having done so we decided that our understanding of the nature and extent of the abuse, and of the systemic failings that allowed abuse to happen, within all the types of homes and institutions within our remit would not be improved by conducting full scale investigations into any of those thirty seven homes and institutions. As the Chairman emphasised in his remarks of 4 November 2015, this did not mean that we had decided that abuse did not occur in those homes or institutions, nor did it have any effect on our recommendations for compensation and other forms of redress that we make in Chapter 4.

49 There were also further homes which we considered where applicants had lived but about which they had made no, or minimal, complaints, and which did not merit any investigation by us.

Reports to the police

50 Almost all of the allegations made by applicants to the Inquiry were capable of amounting to criminal offences if they were substantiated. We referred each such complaint to the relevant police force for investigation, and in almost all cases this was the PSNI. In a few cases where the complaint was made by or about a person living elsewhere in the United Kingdom the matter was referred to the appropriate force.

Other investigations

51 We also conducted investigations into two issues that became apparent at an early stage of our evidence gathering. The first was that a large number of children were sent to Australia as part of what was called the Child Migrants Programme or Child Migrants Scheme. Many of the applicants who were sent to Australia as children complained that this was itself abusive. The second was into the allegations that Fr Brendan Smyth sexually abused children who were in residential children's homes in Northern Ireland that were within our Terms of Reference.

Kincora and the non-devolved Departments and Agencies

52 As we explain in Volume 8 Chapter 25 the Inquiry agreed to the request by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to include in our investigations the allegations relating to Kincora and the non-devolved departments and agencies which are the constitutional and legal responsibility of Her Majesty's Government and not the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Executive and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

The economic and social background

53 Whilst it is not for this Inquiry to engage in an extensive historical review of social and economical conditions in Northern Ireland during the 73 years covered by our Terms of Reference, those conditions cannot be ignored when considering the resources available to residential institutions, public authorities and government in the field of residential childcare. The statistics to which we refer are merely some indicators of what was generally a very challenging economic and social background against which the activities of the residential institutions, public authorities and the Government have to be viewed.

54 For many years the financial circumstances and living conditions of a substantial section of the population of Northern Ireland were extremely poor. For example, between 1923 and 1926 the unemployment rate remained between 20% and 23%.[1] Despite a number of public work schemes that were provided in an attempt to reduce unemployment, in the early 1930s unemployment in Belfast reached almost 30%.[2] Whilst unemployment rates were lower after the Second World War, in 1946 the average percentage of male unemployed was 10.7%, although this declined to 7.6% in 1948.[3] In the 1950s and 1960s unemployment remained stubbornly high, particularly male unemployment. Thus as late as 1958, the average yearly percentage of male unemployment was 10.1%, whilst that for females was 7.8%, giving an average yearly percentage of 9.3%.[4]

55 The decline of employment in traditional industries such as linen and ship building was to some degree offset by an influx of large employers in the synthetic fibre industries during the 1950s and 1960s. In the post-war period the Northern Ireland Government made considerable efforts to attract new industries to Northern Ireland in an effort to reduce unemployment and improve overall prosperity. The Industries Development Act (Northern Ireland) 1945 enabled an estimated additional 31,000 jobs to be created by the provision of two million square feet of government-owned factory space. This enabled 200 firms to be assisted. One commentator has suggested that:

> "The promotion of government-funded advanced factories rather than social housing was to get preferential treatment in the post-war reconstruction of the 1940s and 1950s. ...On the negative side, the [1945 Act] hindered raising the quality of the Province's housing stock because resources used in building these factories could have been invested in housing".[5]

56 Although the Northern Ireland Government's drive for new industries created almost 72,000 new manufacturing jobs after 1945 – over 44% of total employment in manufacturing industry[6] – the rising oil prices and excess capacity in synthetic fibre production in Europe, and increased competition from low-wage developing countries, had a very severe effect on Northern Ireland industry by the 1980s.

57 Housing conditions for many remained extremely poor, particularly in Belfast. The German bombing raids of Belfast in April and May 1941 resulted in the destruction of 3,200 houses, and a further 53,000 were damaged. A sample of rural life in five areas of Northern Ireland involving 1018 houses carried out in 1944 revealed that just 8% of the houses had mains water supply, and only 6% had mains sewerage or satisfactory private water-borne disposal. Some areas, particularly in the west of the province, were found to be very much worse than average. It was estimated in 1947 that "96% of all houses in County Fermanagh have no running water."[7]

58 Whilst the 1960s and early 1970s were marked by major slum clearance and redevelopment schemes, particularly in Belfast, the 1974 House Condition Survey showed that less than half of Belfast's 123,000 homes were sound, around 30,000 were unfit, and a further 32,000 were in need of improvement or major repair. Over 40,000 of the total housing stock lacked one or more of the five basic amenities of a water closet, fixed bath or shower, wash-hand basin, kitchen sink, hot and cold water.[8]

Part Three

59 In this Part we set out observations on residential childcare practice in relation to our findings, largely grouped under the headings of the main types of alleged abuse.

Changes in residential childcare

60 It is important to first acknowledge that there were very significant changes in residential childcare during the seven decades covered by the Inquiry's Terms of Reference, which stretched from 1922 to 1995. The oldest witness who gave evidence to the Inquiry was in a children's home in the late 1920s, almost ninety years ago. Compared with care provided at that time, the conditions in which children were accommodated had improved greatly by the 1990s. For example, physical standards of care were much better, staffing levels were increased and staff training was improved. Children were cared for in smaller groups and there was an emphasis on siblings being cared for together. Children received greater individual attention with the introduction of key workers, and field social workers visited children in homes more regularly. Formal reviews were introduced and increasingly children and their families were involved in care planning.

61 The reasons for children being in care also changed over the decades. In the early decades of our remit many children were placed in care on a private basis because they were illegitimate or their parents were unable to provide for them. These children tended to stay all of their childhood and early youth in residential care. By the 1970s and 1980s more preventive measures and greater practical support to help maintain children within families and less stigma about illegitimacy meant that fewer younger children were admitted to care. Where it was considered necessary to accommodate young children outside their families, fostering was seen as the most appropriate form of care. Older children continued to be admitted to residential care although in smaller numbers and mainly because they were deemed to be beyond the care and control of their parents and in some cases were getting involved in petty crime and/or anti-social behaviour associated with the Troubles. These young people tended to stay in care for shorter periods and the focus was on returning them to their families.

62 We are also aware that further improvements have been introduced in the twenty-one years since 1995, and in particular, social workers and residential childcare workers are now registered and regulated by the Northern Ireland Social Care Council and they and their employers are required to adhere to Codes of Practice.

Sexual abuse

63 The sexual abuse of children and young people by staff was one of the two main areas of complaint we received. There were some instances in which female staff were alleged to have sexually abused either boys or girls. However, by far the majority of the alleged abuse was by male staff, and because of the historical patterns of staffing, the predominant type of abuse alleged was of male staff abusing boys. The alleged abuse ranged from inappropriate touching and fondling of boys who were fully dressed to anal rape. While there was some evidence about grooming behaviour, in many cases intimidation and physical abuse occurred in tandem with the sexual abuse.

64 In some of the homes we investigated there were multiple sexual abusers. We are aware that this phenomenon has also occurred in children's homes and boarding schools in other countries. In one case there were two abusers who knew each other prior to taking up post; in another case all the care and teaching staff were of the same gender as the children; in another instance the head of the home was an open abuser, which will have reduced any chance for the children to report abuse and may have encouraged other staff who were inclined to also abuse. But none of these factors was apparent in every instance or sufficient to explain the numbers of abusers in these homes. We consider that this is an area that would benefit from further research.

65 We found that from the mid-1980s there were significant improvements in the awareness of managers and staff of the risk of sexual abuse in residential care, complaints processes for children and investigation of complaints and use of disciplinary procedures. However, we still found examples of a lack of rigour in selection procedures, a lack of regular supervision of staff, poor use of disciplinary processes including examples of staff who were suspected of sexual or physical abuse of children being moved to a different establishment or allowed to leave their post without the completion of proper disciplinary processes. Therefore, we would emphasise that rigorous recruitment practice and regular supervision of staff are essential elements in keeping children safe in residential care.

66 We heard many allegations of sexual abuse by peers. These related mainly to boys, though there were some instances concerning girls. Strictly speaking, it may be inaccurate to term the abusers 'peers', as they were mostly a few years older than their victims. Many of the witnesses who faced allegations of the sexual abuse of their juniors told us they had been abused by older boys when they were younger. It was also the case that some of this learnt behaviour manifested itself as part of wider bullying by older boys. Some appeared to have genuinely forgotten they initiated any such behaviour but it was clear it was still a source of painful memories to the victims. The complaints about peer sexual abuse mainly dated back to times when children were being accommodated in large dormitories in over-crowded and poorly staffed children's homes.

67 Where sexual activity occurred between those of approximately the same age it generally did not lead to complaints, as it was seen by the participants as normal and not a source of concern, and it could sometimes be attributed to adolescent exploration.

Physical abuse

68 Physical abuse by staff was the other main sources of complaint. In the early decades of our remit the use of corporal punishment was generally accepted within families and schools and the statutory regulations governing the provision of residential childcare included directions about how corporal punishment should be administered and recorded. However, there were periods in certain homes when a culture of informal physical punishments was pervasive. Witnesses clearly distinguished between the administration of formal and informal physical punishment as a direct consequence of their misbehaviour and the random application of excessive physical abuse which they experienced as staff exercising power and control over them. We heard evidence of some staff who clearly lost their temper and applied uncontrolled physical punishment. In some institutions staff were said to have used a variety of implements to beat children, including canes, belts, sticks, slippers and other items which came to hand such as curtain rods.

69 The actions of these staff were not only counter to the statutory regulations about administration of corporal punishment but also counter to their organisations' policies about the discipline of children. The impact of the culture of informal punishments, especially when underlined by more serious violence on the part of staff, was significant. Many witnesses told us they were terrified, not knowing when they might be the subject of punishment. It was clear that for many witnesses the experience of seeing excessive physical force used against other children coupled with the fear of being subject to random violence was almost as, and in some cases more, damaging than the actual physical chastisement they received.

70 This was an area of abuse where individual staff members were influential; a small number were identified as being seriously abusive, but there were others who, while they were more benign, took no action to report or limit the behaviour of their colleagues. While physical chastisement of children is no longer acceptable and has no place in residential care the exercise of authority by staff still needs to be carefully supervised and monitored, and workers need support and training to deal safely and effectively with the volatile and at times aggressive situations that can be a feature of residential childcare. In addition, workers need to take individual responsibility for managing their behaviour and addressing and/or reporting any inappropriate behaviour by colleagues. While senior staff have a particular responsibility for being alert to abuse, it is also the responsibility of the whole staff team and other professionals who relate to homes such as field social workers. It may well be a junior member of care staff or an ancillary worker whom a child feels comfortable approaching and telling about abuse. Each person who may be approached in this way therefore has the responsibility for listening and reporting onwards as appropriate and persisting until satisfied that the message has been heard and acted upon.

71 The values and attitudes of every member of staff are important, but those of the head of the home are particularly significant in setting the tone and expectations for both staff and children. From the evidence we heard there were excellent heads of home who introduced new and enlightened practices and witnesses talked of how their influence greatly improved the quality of their lives. Sadly, there were those who abused children and whose conduct left the children with no one in authority to whom they could complain.

72 As with sexual abuse by peers, the majority of the allegations concerning physical abuse by peers were about young boys being bullied and physically abused by older boys who had been left in charge of them. Some witnesses talked about the maintenance of status in “pecking orders” and expressed the view that some degree of bullying was to be expected. However, others described being physically intimidated and beaten by other boys on a continual basis and indicated that at times this abuse occurred with the knowledge and implied approval of staff. It was significant that when the homes in question were remodelled and modernised, with smaller bedrooms and better staffing, the complaints we received about peer physical abuse and bullying reduced dramatically.

73 Some institutions faced major problems of absconding, and secure rooms or suites were used to ensure that unsettled children did not absent themselves and were also used to provide time-out for children who were misbehaving. Such a solution should only be temporary; however, from the evidence we heard it was clear that in some institutions there was overuse of this provision. It was also the case that in some homes without secure rooms children were shut in confined spaces such as brush cupboards or drying rooms. This was strictly against the Regulations.

74 A major source of complaints in two homes during the later years of our remit concerned restraint. We recognised that there were times when children and young people had to be restrained, because of the risk of them harming themselves or others, or doing serious damage. However it was clear that not all staff received appropriate training in the use of alternative techniques such as diversion or talking through situations which meant that in some homes restraint was used too often. Also, where staff were not properly trained in safe methods of restraint some witnesses were left feeling frightened and physically abused rather than safely contained.

75 In one institution we found evidence that drugs had sometimes been administered primarily to control children. While it is not for us to comment on medical matters, the use of drugs in this way for social care purposes is clearly unacceptable.

Emotional abuse

76 It was clear from the evidence that there was a strong link between emotional abuse and sexual and physical abuse. Indeed, often it appears to have been the anguish caused by the sexual and physical abuse which made the sexual and physical abuse memorable. We found, though, that there were also other practices which were emotionally abusive.

77 Some staff appear to have used various ways of humiliating children, such as:

- name-calling, perhaps picking on the unattractive features of a child;
- denigrating the parents or family of a child;
- suggesting a child had inherited the negative qualities of a parent and would never be of value; or
- showing a child up in front of the group, in relation to a personal matter, which the child would have wanted to be treated confidentially such as bedwetting, deafness or menstruation.

78 This type of abuse was mainly a feature of large children's homes run by Roman Catholic congregations and appeared at some level to be prompted by a wish to ensure that children did not repeat what was seen as the "sins" of their parents and also a concern that children should not "get above themselves". Clearly such behaviour was unacceptable and had a profound impact on witnesses. Many told us of how the subsequent low self-confidence and poor self-esteem have adversely affected their ability to establish and maintain successful adult relationships and parent their children. Again, we found that complaints about these forms of cruelty diminished when staffing levels increased and staff training was improved.

Neglect

79 The most serious complaints about food, clothing, bathing conditions and other aspects of physical neglect appear largely to date back to the 1940s and 1950s, at a time when there were also poor conditions in some family homes and widespread poverty in the community at large. Standards were undoubtedly well below the acceptable in some homes. Witnesses described poor food, inadequate toilet facilities and lack of heating in the large homes which were not designed to accommodate large numbers of children. In the later decades, physical standards in homes improved greatly with the assistance of government funding and there were instances where the resources and facilities available to children were beyond those they would have enjoyed in their family homes and local schools.

Unacceptable practices

80 Some of the unacceptable practices reported to us by witnesses included the confiscation of personal possessions, force-feeding, excessive chores, queuing for bathing, the use of Jeyes fluid, and the systems used for the management of enuresis. These practices were particularly prevalent in the 1950s and 1960s in homes where very few staff were managing large numbers of children. None of these practices would now be considered acceptable.

Underlying Issues

Governance and Finance

81 We came across a range of issues which were not systemically abusive of children or young people but were systemic failures, sometimes with consequences for the resident group. As we explain in detail in Chapter 2 we found significant weaknesses in governance arrangements including a lack of clarity about the role of management committees and a failure of some committees to monitor the quality of the conditions children were living in and the direct care they were receiving. There were also examples of management committees not being informed about complaints concerning serious sexual and physical abuse of children by staff.

82 As with other aspects of residential childcare, governance arrangements improved over the decades and by the 1980s monitoring arrangements were in place, were regularly adhered to and properly recorded and reported. However, we found in some instances that although a significant amount of resources were invested in monitoring and resulted in senior managers and Committee members achieving a good understanding of the challenges facing particular homes they proved less effective in addressing the resource and strategic management issues that were contributing to the challenges.

83 In relation to lack of resources we found this affected not only the quality of physical care which homes could offer but more importantly the level of staffing. Low staffing levels were a feature of large voluntary homes, which often were dependent on members of religious communities working very long hours looking after large numbers of children. This led to older children resident in the home and previous residents returning to visit the home being put in charge of younger children and this provided conditions which enabled the physical and sexual abuse of younger children.

Sizes of homes

84 Approximately four out of every five applicants to the Inquiry were in one of the large children's homes, mainly in the 1950s to 1970s. We have referred above to how unacceptable practices, particularly in relation to bathing and excessive chores, were a feature of such homes. It was also clear that many of the children and young people in these home did not get the individual attention they needed, which led to some misbehaving to gain attention and others feeling uncared for and lacking in self confidence.

85 We were interested to note that as early as 1950 the Home Office issued guidance on good quality residential childcare which advocated smaller homes and included an appendix on ways in which larger homes could be broken down internally into smaller family-sized groups. However, it was the case that mainly because of lack of resources, though also because of lack of agreement about what form revised accommodation should take, it took until the late 1960s/early 1970s before such changes were introduced in the larger voluntary children's homes in Northern Ireland.

Sound standard residential childcare

86 We received evidence from many witnesses which indicated that, in the earlier decades in particular, the professional standards of care were poor. Some homes kept virtually no records of children's progress. In the case of children privately placed in homes there was little assessment of children's needs and no move to see whether reintegration into their families was possible. In the earlier decades, even when welfare authorities were involved in placing a child in a home, there was often very limited follow-up contact maintained with the children. Consequently, there were no individual care plans, no monitoring of the progress of the children or consideration of their future needs. A number of witnesses described being discharged from children's homes at short notice and being unprepared for life after care and receiving minimal ongoing support. While people who had left homes were often welcomed back for a meal or visit there was no systematic follow-up. This was particularly marked in the case of children who had been sent to Australia who for all intents and purposes appeared to have been forgotten.

87 Over time, standards improved and sound professional practices were introduced. There was evidence from the 1970s onwards of: assessment of children's needs; the planning of care programmes; the maintenance of family contact where possible; the availability of systems of advocacy and for making complaints; and, aftercare on returning home or living independently. Many witnesses told us they felt they had no-one to turn to about the abuse they were suffering and some told us they did report the abuse but were not listened to or believed. The evidence we received suggested that this improved so that by the 1980s and 1990s children's allegations and complaints received proper attention. There is no doubt that greater awareness of the risk of physical and sexual abuse in residential children's homes, particularly in the aftermath of the identification of abuse in Kincora and Rubane, meant that greater emphasis was placed on external monitoring of children's homes and having proper procedures for children and their families to raise concerns and make complaints.

88 In this section we have summarised the types of abuse we have heard about and indicated how standards and conditions improved over time. Although we found evidence of systemic failings in every decade of our remit it was the case that in some homes improved staffing levels, better qualified staff, smaller group living and more external governance of homes led to enormous improvements in the care children received. It is also important to acknowledge that throughout the decades some staff provided good care and warmth to children and were genuinely concerned to help them grow and develop and often worked unstintingly with little support to do so. We are of the view some staff abused children both physically and sexually, and even took pleasure in doing so. However, we recognise that there were other staff who responded inappropriately under the extreme pressure of caring for too many children with little training and support and in poorly designed and inadequate conditions.

Part Four

The format of the Inquiry and the Report

89 The Inquiry divided the institutions and issues investigated into fifteen modules, and, as appropriate, one or more issue or institution was examined in each module. Institutions, organisations and individuals being investigated in a particular module were provided with the documentary evidence gathered by the Inquiry which we felt was relevant to the issue(s) to which the person or organisation could be expected to speak and assist the Inquiry. Individuals, bodies and institutions were asked to deal with relevant issues identified by the Inquiry in their witness statements, and at the end of each module were given the opportunity to make written and oral submissions in respect of matters raised by the Inquiry, or alleged by individuals or other organisations. Most individuals, institutions and other bodies made submissions at this stage, and some took the opportunity to admit systemic failings and express regret for those failings.

90 The panel then prepared a draft chapter or chapters dealing with the institution or issues considered in each module. After the public hearings each institution or individual who was subject to a criticism in the draft Report was sent a Warning Letter and invited to respond by a certain date, the time allowed for responses being calculated to allow for the nature of the criticism and the length of the part of the Report provided to them. In those cases where an individual was criticised but had not been asked to give evidence to the Inquiry, or in some cases had been offered the opportunity to give evidence but had declined to engage with the Inquiry, the individual was offered legal representation at the expense of the Inquiry (if their means required this) and the opportunity to make submissions.

91 The responses were then considered by the Inquiry panel and the draft amended if necessary as we considered appropriate having taken the submissions into account.

92 The Report consists of twenty-nine chapters comprising nine volumes. The tenth volume consists of the Report of the Acknowledgement Forum.

The cost of the Inquiry

93 There will be expenditure by the Inquiry after the delivery of the Inquiry Report, and its publication, associated with winding up the Inquiry and placing the Inquiry Record with the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland. Including these costs the estimated cost of the Inquiry is £13,250,000, of which an estimated £575,000 will be borne by the Northern Ireland Office because it represents the additional cost to the Inquiry of investigating the non-devolved departments and agencies in the context of Kincora. This means that the net cost of the Inquiry to the Northern Ireland Executive is estimated to be in the region of £12,675,000. This represents the costs incurred by the Inquiry, and does not include the costs of Northern Ireland Executive departments or other agencies, which were not the responsibility of the Inquiry.

Definitions of abuse and systemic failings

The Terms of Reference of the Inquiry required it to consider whether "there were systemic failings by institutions or the state in their duties towards those children in their care", children in this context being children in residential institutions (other than schools). This required the Inquiry to address three questions. (a) What were the duties of the institutions and the state towards the children? (b) What constituted "abuse"? (c) What amounted to "systemic failings"?

The Inquiry applied the following broad definitions when considering the evidence it gathered. These were intended to be broad, general definitions because the Inquiry did not seek to exhaustively define in advance everything that might amount to "abuse" or "systemic failings", and therefore when the Inquiry came to consider specific circumstances it was sometimes necessary to amplify these definitions in the context of those circumstances.

1. The duty of an institution was to provide an environment in which the children in their care would (a) receive proper physical care in the form of food, clothing, accommodation and medical attention; (b) be free from emotional, physical, or sexual abuse, or from neglect; and (c) develop through the provision of childcare in accordance with standards acceptable at the time

2. The state had the same duty towards children as a voluntary or religious institution where the state directly provided residential institutional care, either by central government in the form of places of detention, hospitals or residential schools for children with special needs or by local government, and later by public bodies such as health and social service boards or health and social care trusts.

3. The state also had a separate duty to ensure that all institutions maintained proper standards of care of the children in the institutions because (a) it was obliged by law to regulate and inspect the institutions, or (b) it funded either all or part of the capital and/or running costs of the institutions.

4. "Abuse" was behaviour which either (a) involved improper sexual or physical behaviour by an adult or another child towards a child; or (b) in the case of emotional abuse, was improper behaviour by an adult or another child which undermined a child's self-esteem and emotional well-being, such as bullying, belittling or humiliating a child; or (c) resulted in neglect of the child; or (d) took the form of adopting or accepting policies and practices, such as numbering children or ignoring or undermining sibling relationships, which ignored the interests of the children.

5. A "systemic failing" by an institution consisted of either (a) a failure to ensure that the institution provided proper care; or (b) a failure to ensure that the children would be free from abuse; or (c) a failure to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse, or (d) take appropriate steps to ensure the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving abuse.

6. A "systemic failing" by the state consisted of a failure to ensure either (a) that the institution provided proper care; or (b) that the children in that institution would be free from abuse; or (c) a failure to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse in that institution, or (d) take appropriate steps to investigate and prosecute criminal offences involving abuse.

7. "Systemic failings" could also have taken place in one or more of the following ways:

   (a) where some or all of those who had contact with children in residential establishments, including volunteers and visitors, adopted abusive childcare practices in common;

   (b) where staff in managerial positions within residential establishments initiated, encouraged or condoned abusive childcare practices;

   (c) where people in positions of responsibility for the institutions running residential services initiated, encouraged or condoned abusive childcare practices;

   (d) where those responsible for the inspection, oversight, policy-making or funding of the institutions providing residential services initiated, encouraged or condoned abusive practices, or failed to take appropriate steps to identify, prevent or remedy abuse."

Governance and Finance

Part One: Governance

Part Two: Finance

Part One: Governance

Introduction

1 During the period 1922 to 1995, two levels of governance operated for voluntary and statutory children's homes and criminal justice institutions for young people: inspection by Government departments and internal monitoring by providers of the residential care. Powers, duties and requirements in relation to inspection and monitoring of children's homes were set down in legislation, statutory regulations, Government circulars and related policies and procedures of care providers. Also, in addition to these formal arrangements, welfare authorities had to assure themselves of the care provided to children they placed in voluntary homes as they still remained responsible for them in law.

2 In this chapter we will outline how requirements in relation to inspection and monitoring of children's homes and institutions developed during the period 1922 to 1995 and will consider at a general level to what extent they were implemented and proved effective. In each of the chapters dealing with individual homes and institutions, we have considered how effective inspection and monitoring activity was in identifying and addressing issues about the adequacy of the physical conditions and facilities in homes and the quality of the care provided to children and young people living in them.

3 In 1922 the residential care of children was governed by the Children Act 1908 and by the Poor Relief Acts, which empowered Boards of Guardians to care for children in workhouses or to have them boarded out. The limited provision for governance of residential care of children was contained in the Children Act 1908, which provided for certified reformatories and industrial schools to be inspected at least once a year and gave the Secretary of State the power, but not the duty, to inspect children's homes. Section 25 of that Act stated:

> "the Secretary of State may cause any institution for the reception of poor children or young persons, supported wholly or partly by voluntary contributions and not liable to be inspected by or under the authority of any other government department, to be visited and inspected from time to time be persons appointed by him for the purpose."[1]

The Secretary of State had no power under this legislation to require voluntary homes to be registered nor could any government department intervene in the arrangement for the training, education or after-care of children accommodated within them.[2]

4 The Ministries of Northern Ireland Act (1921) established the Northern Ireland Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) and made it responsible for the inspection powers and duties set down in the 1908 Children Act. In compliance with legislation and guidance the majority of departmental files and records relevant to the time period covered by this Inquiry have been reviewed and either destroyed in accordance with records management procedures or passed to the Public Records Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI). Only a few records of inspection activity still exist, therefore the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) was unable to confirm to what extent inspection of children's homes was carried out between 1922 and 1995. MoHA inspection reports were confidential to the Ministry and not shared with children's homes so copies of them were not available in the records maintained by homes. However, the homes' records did contain some related material such as letters from the MoHA following up matters identified during inspections and later inspection reports by the Social Work Advisory Group which were shared with homes, all of which assisted our considerations.

5 The limited number of inspection reports that were available to us for this period showed that inspections were generally undertaken on an annual basis by a MoHA children's inspector and a medical officer. The reports of the inspections tended to focus on the physical environment and facilities available in homes and contained only brief comments about the appearance and general health of the children. We saw evidence in records maintained by providers of care, for example the Sisters of St Louis, that the MoHA wrote to homes to follow up issues identified during inspections and that this extended to seeking information about the medical care being provided to particular children.

6 The MoHA was also responsible for inspecting reformatory and industrial schools, and reported annually on these institutions within a report to the Governor of Northern Ireland about services and functions in regard to law and order. The information provided in these reports included the number of children each establishment was certified to hold, the grounds for committal, statistics in relation to admissions and discharges, and funding arrangements. For example, it was reported that in 1927 forty-five boys and eighteen girls were admitted to industrial schools, and the grounds for committal were non-compliance with School Attendance Orders in twenty-six cases, begging in eleven cases, wandering in nine cases, minor offences in nine cases, and destitution/being orphans in eight cases.[3]

7 Information was also provided about the health of the children and the medical attention they received, the education and training provided to them and, in the majority of cases, the employment they entered on discharge. In the report for 1927 it was recorded:

> "At the annual inspections of the various Schools during the year the children in general looked healthy and cheerful and bore every appearance of being well cared for; the dietary on the whole was adequate; and the general condition of the Institutions was excellent."[4]

The 1934 report moved from a confirmation that all institutions had been inspected and a summary of general comments to the provision of brief quotes from the inspection reports of each school. For example, it was reported that all the boys in St Patrick's reformatory and industrial school looked well cared for and the school was "bright and cheerful as the result of internal re-decoration carried out in a very creditable manner by the inmates."[5]

8 The next piece of relevant legislation was the 1946 Public Health and Local Government (Administrative Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland), which established welfare authorities to carry out the functions of the Boards of Guardians. Eight welfare authorities were established across county and county borough council areas in Northern Ireland. Each welfare authority was required to appoint a Welfare Officer who would assume the responsibilities that had previously been invested in the Boards of Guardians. The welfare authorities were also required to act through statutory welfare committees. This structure divested the Boards of Guardians of their responsibility for children.

9 In 1946 the Government also published a White Paper The Protection and Welfare of the Young and the Treatment of the Young Offender and the recommendations contained within it were given legislative force through the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 (referred to below as the CYP Act 1950). The CYP Act 1950 centralised the Government's responsibility for the care of children under MoHA and gave the MoHA more powers and duties in relation to the inspection of children's homes.

The period 1950 to 1972

10 At the time of the passage of the CYP Act 1950 the majority of children in residential care were accommodated in voluntary homes run by Roman Catholic religious orders and had been placed in the homes mainly on a private basis. In an attempt to improve the regulation of these homes the CYP Act 1950 provided that:

a. voluntary children's homes had to be registered by the MoHA.[6]

b. a voluntary children's home's registration could be removed if it appeared to the MOHA that it was being conducted in a manner that was not in accordance with regulations made or direction given under the Act.[7]

c. any person appointed by the MoHA to inspect a voluntary home had the power to enter such homes and to make "examinations into the state and management thereof and the conditions and treatment of children therein as he thinks requisite."[8]

11 The MoHA's initial focus in implementing the CYP Act 1950 was the registration of existing voluntary children's homes. From 1950, the report to the Governor of Northern Ireland was extended to cover child welfare services and included information on the progress the MoHA was making in meeting its new responsibilities for registering and inspecting voluntary children's homes. The report of 31 December 1950 recorded that seventeen voluntary homes had been registered,[9] and by the time of the report issued on 31 Dec 1954 this number had increased to twenty-three registered homes.[10]

12 Documentation relating to the initial registration of Manor House, a voluntary children's home in Lisburn run by the Irish Church Missions, gave us an insight into the registration process. A MoHA children's inspector, Ms

Forrest, visited the home on 8 June 1950 and met with a member of the Management Committee of the home and the matron and inspected the facilities. Miss Forrest provided a brief report on her general impressions of the home for her senior colleagues. On 22 June 1950, the Management Committee submitted an application for the home to be registered, which included information about how many children could be accommodated in the home, the current number of children accommodated and the number of staff caring for them. Seven days later, in a letter dated 29 June 1950, the MoHA wrote to confirm Manor House had been granted registration and that the Ministry would consider applications for funding to assist the improvement of premises or equipment and the securing of qualified staff.

13 This letter also explained that the MoHA intended to issue regulations for the conduct of children's homes, but that its powers to inspect children's homes would be put in force straight away and that inspectors would carry out their first inspections within the next few weeks.[11] However, despite this indication that an inspection was imminent no inspection took place and almost three years passed before a MoHA official visited the home.

14 The short period of time the MoHA took to consider the application suggested that the decision to register the home was based on Miss Forrest's initial assessment of it, with the expectation that a closer look at its operation would be achieved through inspection. In relation to the lack of inspection of Manor House in this post-registration period the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) as the successor body to the MoHA, pointed out that the MoHA would have been under pressure at that time coping with the requirements of the new legislation, including the registration of all voluntary homes.[12]

15 We accepted this and recognised that at this time there were only two children's inspectors to cover the whole of the province. We also noted from MoHA files and records maintained by providers of care that in addition to dealing with registration of voluntary homes the inspectors provided feedback on funding applications and advised on the development of services. However, as we set out in our findings in Chapter 20 which deals with Manor House, the lack of inspection at this time was significant because conditions for the children in that home deteriorated considerably in the period between registration being granted and the first inspection.

We found that lack of resources for inspection of children's homes by Government departments was a recurring issue, which we will return to later in this chapter.

16 The MoHA issued Statutory Regulations to support the implementation of the CYP Act 1950 - the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) in 1952.[13] These Statutory Regulations specified arrangements that providers of residential care for children were required to put in place for the monitoring of their homes. A copy of these Regulations can be found at Appendix 1 to this chapter.

17 In the 1950s inspection reports continued to be confidential to the MoHA and again the Government's records management and disposal policy meant that only a few inspection reports from that period were available to us. The reports we saw continued to be brief and focussed mainly on the numbers of children being accommodated, the number of staff available to care for them, the physical condition of the home and the status of any funding application for improvements to the home. They did include confirmation that inspectors had examined records that homes were required to keep, such as those about the administration of corporal punishment. In the main, the comments relating to the direct care of the children were limited and somewhat superficial even in reports that contained critical comments about poor physical conditions in homes, including overcrowded bedrooms and inadequate toilet and bathroom facilities, poorly clothed children and low staffing levels.

18 Miss Forrest, recorded her concerns about the conditions in some voluntary children's homes in a memorandum she sent to senior colleagues in April 1953, in which she provided her brief impressions of all the voluntary children's homes. A copy of Miss Forrest's memorandum can be found at Appendix 2 to this chapter. In relation to the two children's homes in Londonderry and the two homes in Belfast run by the Sisters of Nazareth she reported poor conditions and inadequate staffing and, for example, described Nazareth Lodge in Belfast as "very institutional for older children, and babies in desperate plight."[14] She summarised her views about these four homes:

> "I find these Homes utterly depressing and it appals me to think that these hundreds of children are being reared in bleak lovelessness."[15]

19 Despite Miss Forrest's recommendation that the MoHA should press for a complete overhaul of these homes and assist in every way possible, the poor conditions in these and other voluntary homes, such as Rubane which was run by the De La Salle order in Kircubbin, were allowed to persist and in some cases worsen for a considerable number of years. When Miss Forrest visited the home Nazareth Lodge on 9 January 1954 she found little improvement in the conditions and recorded that while she found the babies "well-cared, well-clothed and fed"...

> "The whole premises - except the parts immediately above the laundry and boiler-house - were dreadfully cold. ...The babies' hands were blue with cold and felt icy to touch. ...The school-children are now the worst off and Rev. Mother agrees that they are not getting any sort of chance in life and cannot make proper development, especially those who have known nothing but this institutional care from babyhood. ...What is needed here is really fundamental re-organisation so that these little creatures can have some individual loving care instead of being dragooned. Rev. Mother recognises this and even went so far as to say that children playing in the gutters of the slums were better off, if they had a father and mother to care for them, however poorly".[16]

20 In the inspection reports we had access to, inspectors repeatedly recorded that they had made clear to providers that improvements were needed to the physical conditions in homes, but there was little evidence of the MoHA using its statutory powers, including the ultimate power of removing registration from a voluntary children's home, to require improvements. We are aware of only two occasions when the MoHA actively considered removing registration from a children's home. The first occasion was in 1953 when inspectors found dire physical conditions in Manor House. The Irish Church Mission (ICM) which ran the home agreed to remove the children and close the home. However, due to the intervention of the then Minister of Home Affairs, who advised a sympathetic approach, the ICM was allowed to retain registration of the home while first deliberating on its future and then planning for it to reopen. The second occasion was when the Good Shepherd's home in Newry was failing to comply with fire regulations. Following letters from the Secretary of the MoHA to the Mother Superior and to the solicitors acting for the home the necessary work was completed and the fire certificate issued. Both these examples showed that an assertive approach by the MoHA achieved results.

21 The MoHA was not just dependent on inspection activity to ascertain the standards in children's homes. The Child Welfare Council (CWC) was established under Section 128 of the CYP Act 1950 and was charged with the duty of providing advice to the MoHA about how it was performing in relation to its functions under the 1950 Act, and to make representations to the MoHA with respect to any matter affecting the welfare of children and young persons. As part of meeting this remit, the CWC visited children's homes and reported its findings. In 1955 a Study Group established by the CWC visited eighteen of the, by then, twenty-four voluntary children's homes registered by the MoHA, and almost all of the fourteen children's homes provided by welfare authorities. The CWC reported the findings of the Study Group in its 1956 report Children in Care, which included the observation that a number of children's homes visited, both statutory and voluntary

> "seemed to be seriously understaffed especially for the care of babies and we feel that this problem affects most children's homes from time to time because of the periodic fluctuations in the number and type of children who have to be cared for."[17]

22 The CWC recognised that it was difficult to set down an exact ratio of staff to children given the range of homes and the range of ages of children cared for in them. However, it proposed that excluding cooks and domestic help, the ratio of full-time staff for children under five should not be less than one to three, and where the children were older, this ratio might be reduced as far as one in six. We noted that in the MoHA's 1956 report to the Governor of Northern Ireland, which was by then entitled Report on the Administration of Home Office Services, reference is made to the publication of the CWC's report Children in Care. It received wide publicity, but no indication was given of the MoHA's view of the findings in the report or of any action it proposed to take to address the concerns expressed within it about conditions in children's homes in the province.[18]

23 Miss Forrest accompanied members of the CWC Study Group on their visits to childrens' homes, and we saw evidence in inspection reports and internal MoHA memoranda that she referred to the proposed staffing ratios and promoted them in discussions with voluntary homes. However, there was no formal action taken by the MoHA to implement these ratios, and chronic understaffing, particularly in voluntary homes run by religious orders, was allowed to continue. In its 1966 report Role of Voluntary Homes in the Child Care Service, which Miss Forrest helped to draft, the CWC concluded:

> "...in many voluntary homes there are at present insufficient staff to ensure that the demands made on them are reasonable and that the children receive sufficient individual attention."[19]

24 The Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS), as the immediate successor department to the MoHA, told the Hughes Inquiry that the MoHA had issued the 1969 Residential Task in Child Care: the Castle Priory Report, which proposed staffing levels to welfare authorities and it was regarded by them as a guide. It also confirmed that it had issued a circular in 1974, Planning – Manpower Guidelines which set out staff ratio guidelines for residential establishments. The DHSSPS accepted in its evidence to this Inquiry that the recommended staffing levels for children's homes in the DHSS circular were lower than the Castle Priory guidelines but pointed out that the Eastern Health and Social Services Board had told the Hughes Inquiry that the Castle Priory standards were those it aspired to achieve.

25 The DHSSPS also referred to the DHSS's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry that administering authorities of voluntary children's homes were free to set their staffing levels and that any deficiencies in the levels set were addressed through inspections of the homes.[20] It defended the approach of its predecessor departments and stated that it remained of the view that staffing levels in childrens' homes should have been determined by the particular needs of the resident group and should have been sufficiently adequate to ensure that appropriate standards of care could be effectively promoted and maintained.[21] However, it conceded in relation to the staffing levels in the 1950s and 1960s in children's homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry:

> "In an era and social climate when the causes supported by charitable work and philanthropic efforts were not the responsibility of the State staff costs may have been driven down to the extent that an acceptable standard of care for children was difficult or impossible to achieve."[22]

We consider that this concession did not go far enough, because while charitable work may not have been the responsibility of the State it was ultimately responsible for the welfare of children in voluntary homes and recognised that responsibility through the regulatory responsibilities and powers it vested in the MoHA for the registration and inspection of these homes.

26 There appeared to be a range of reasons why the MoHA did not take more assertive action to address unsatisfactory conditions in voluntary children's homes. Some related to the availability of funding for improvements, the reluctance of some congregations to provide required information about their finances to support funding applications, and the views of politicians at that time about who should bear the cost of voluntary residential care for Roman Catholic children. We will consider these matters further in the section of this chapter dealing with the funding of residential childcare.

27 Part of the reluctance to take action, we concluded, was that the financial and logistical implications of closing a voluntary children's home would have been considerable. Large numbers of children were being cared for in these homes, which were mainly funded through public donations and depended on members of religious orders working long unsociable hours, often for little or no wages. The cost of removing these children into the care of the State would have been significant, and even if it could be afforded there would not have been sufficient places in the available statutory children's homes to accommodate them.

28 There was also evidence suggesting that the MoHA was careful to respect the rights of the Catholic Church to manage its own affairs and not to get into conflict with it about its wish to ensure that children born into its faith were raised within it. There was evidence of this in the placatory tone of correspondence from MoHA officials to Cardinal Conway in November 1965 about their concerns over the management of St Joseph's school in Middletown, and their assurance to him in subsequent correspondence that the views of the Catholic Church would be of "paramount importance" in determining the provision of training school accommodation for Catholic girls in Northern Ireland. It was also apparent in later years, when in 1993 the police informed the Northern Ireland Office (NIO), which was then responsible for training schools, that it was investigating allegations of abuse by the then principal of St Patrick's training school. Officials from the NIO and the Social Services Inspectorate (SSI) met with Bishop Farquhar in whose diocese the school was and with Father McCann, the Chair and Secretary of the Board of Management of the school, who decided that it was not necessary to suspend the Principal while the police investigation was underway. Officials were clearly uneasy about this decision, but although they were representing the Government department responsible for the funding and regulation of the school they did not feel able to apply pressure and insist on the Principal being suspended but instead adopted a watching brief.[23]

29 It may also be the case that the MoHA's approach of not intervening directly to require improvements or not using its power to remove registration from unsatisfactory homes was due to the views of senior officials about the approach that should be taken to inspection. We noted that in internal correspondence between senior civil servants dated 31 December 1954, an "A.R." wrote to a "Mr Freer" about inspection of voluntary organisations[24] in which he commented that staff in the MoHA "have gone much too far, and made too heavy weather out of the whole business." A.R. recommended an informal approach to visiting to avoid any suggestion that the Ministry was responsible for the standards within an organisation and advised that officials should not get more deeply involved than they presently were.

30 It is probable that a combination of these factors were in play but the result, as will be seen in the chapters dealing with individual institutions, was that for many years children in some voluntary homes in Northern Ireland lived in conditions that MoHA inspectors knew were very unsatisfactory.

31 With regard to the promotion of good childcare practices within children's homes, the DHSSPS told us that the MoHA sent the 1952 Memorandum on the Conduct of Children's Homes to the secretary of every voluntary home in Northern Ireland[25] and that it promoted a model of good practice which aimed to prevent neglect and the physical and emotional ill-treatment of children in residential care. A copy of the 1952 Home Office Memorandum can be found as Appendix 3 to this chapter. The DHSSPS made the point that:

> "...the principles and good practice guidance contained in the 1952 memorandum had the potential, if implemented, to significantly diminish the potential for physical, sexual or emotional abuse and neglect of children in institutional care."[26]

23 Day 149, p.60.
24 HIA 1586/7.
26 SND 15992.

32 We accepted this point and agreed that the Memorandum provided relevant guidance and promoted the welfare, including the emotional well-being of children in care. However, no matter how enlightened this Memorandum was, its impact was severely limited because it was not fully implemented. We heard evidence that in many homes in the province, the principles and good-practice guidelines set out in the Memorandum, for example those concerning the treatment of enuresis and the type of punishment suitable for different ages of children, were not adhered to. This lack of adherence was the responsibility of those providing the care but it was also the case that it was not picked up or addressed through inspection.

Adherence to the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952

33 Given the limited resources available to the MoHA for inspections one would have expected it to focus on ensuring that voluntary organisations were meeting statutory regulations about the monitoring of their homes, so that it could place some reliance on internal governance identifying and addressing problems and promoting good childcare practice. However, we found that was not the case.

34 The statutory regulations placed specific duties and requirements on the "Administering Authority" of homes, which was defined in Regulation 3(1) as the "the person or persons carrying on the voluntary home." We found that there was a lack of clarity in some homes about who was the Administering Authority. For example, in Rubane the Bishop of Down and Connor and senior priests appointed by him formed the Board of Governors, but the De La Salle order was responsible for the day-to-day management of the home. The MoHA did not seek confirmation of who was the Administering Authority, and although inspectors had regular contact with the home that contact was mainly with the brother in charge and only on a few occasions did MoHA officials engage with the Board of Governors.

35 The DHSSPS accepted in relation to Rubane in particular, but also more generally, that a fundamental purpose of inspection should be to ensure that statutory requirements were being met. It accepted that the MoHA had not clarified who was the Administering Authority for Rubane and that generally there was insufficient engagement with the Board of Governors. This lack of engagement was particularly significant, because it meant that when inspectors engaged with the De La Salle Order about alleged abuse in the home they depended on what it told them about the outcome of investigations into such allegations without reference to the Board of Governors.

36 Regulation 4(2), of the statutory regulations was one of the most important in relation to monitoring the care and welfare of children in voluntary homes. It required that:

> "The administering authority shall make arrangements for the home to be visited at least once in every month by a person who shall satisfy himself whether the home is conducted in the interests of the well-being of the children, and shall report to the administering authority upon his visit and shall enter in the record book referred to in the Schedule hereto his name and the date of his visit."[27]

37 This regulation, which was aimed at ensuring the well-being of the children being cared for in homes, was not consistently met by voluntary agencies or enforced by the MoHA, or subsequently the DHSS. This lack of enforcement was significant as we found that internal monitoring of voluntary children's homes by management committees was mainly poor. The exceptions to this were Manor House, which when it reopened had a proactive management committee that concerned itself with the quality of care being provided to children, and Barnardo's homes, which as part of a UK organisation had detailed structures and procedures for internal monitoring of its homes.

38 We found that the management committees of homes run by Roman Catholic orders, particularly in the 1950s and 1960s, generally concerned themselves with practical and financial matters and did not specifically monitor the quality of the care the children were receiving, despite the statutory regulation requiring them to do so. This may have been partly because the efforts to secure and manage available funding had to be such a priority. However, it also appeared that respect for nuns and brothers, and an expectation that their Christian beliefs would ensure they provided good and loving care, meant that their practice was not closely monitored and their assurances about how well children were doing in their care were readily accepted.

39 There was also an expectation and acceptance that the work and conduct of nuns and brothers would be overseen by their religious orders. Senior members of relevant religious orders did make regular visitations to homes.

However, we found that visitations focused on the religious and spiritual life of the community and did not sufficiently monitor the quality of the care being provided to children. The references to the children tended to be about their activities, accomplishments and plans, although there were some references to plans to improve the physical facilities for them. The acceptance and reliance on the internal governance of orders also led to situations where allegations of physical and/or sexual abuse of children were dealt with privately as an internal matter by orders, without reference to the relevant Management Committee/Board of Governors, or to welfare authorities responsible for the children making the allegations, or to the police.

40 We concluded that if the MoHA had confirmed the Authorising Authority for homes, made clear the regulations they were required to meet and enforced monthly visiting there would have been a greater likelihood that the legislative focus on the care and well-being of the children would have been realised. The DHSSPS conceded that it was a systemic failure of its predecessor bodies not to have ensured that the requirements of the 1952 Regulations were being met.

41 It also acknowledged with regard to Rubane that:

> "...rigour of inspection, proper monitoring by responsible authorities and clearly defined management responsibility and accountability are essential to the well being of children in care."[28]

42 We agreed with this analysis and, as will be clear from the following chapters, we were critical of where inspection and monitoring did not happen or was lacking in rigour, focus and impact. However, all the evidence we considered pointed to Miss Forrest being a conscientious and astute inspector who was concerned about children and the conditions they were living in and who worked hard to support staff in homes to make necessary improvements, and we commend her personal efforts.

Regulation of statutory homes

43 Section 89 of the CYP Act 1950 imposed a general duty on welfare authorities to exercise their powers with respect to children in care as to further their best interests and to offer them opportunities for the proper development of their character and abilities. Section 92 placed a specific duty on welfare authorities to provide accommodation for children in their care "where it is not practicable or desirable for the time being to make arrangements for boarding out"[29] and set down requirements in relation to the provision of that care.[30]

44 These requirements included the provision of specific types of homes for children with different needs, the promotion of the religious upbringing of children and, in support of a policy bias towards fostering, the setting of time limits on how long children should be placed in residential care. Welfare authorities were also required to seek the approval of the MoHA for the appointment, qualification and training of staff in children's homes. Section 92 (5) of the Act provided that the MoHA could close a home if it was "unsuitable for the purposes or if the conduct of the home failed to comply with regulation."[31]

45 Following the passage of the CYP Act 1950 there was a rapid increase in the number of children received into statutory care. In 1947, 1,000 children had been placed in care by private arrangement; by 1959 this number had reduced by 249 to 751. In the same period, the number of children in statutory care more than doubled, with an increase from 501 children in 1947 to 1,148 children in 1959.[32] The policy bias for fostering was implemented in relation to these 1,148 children, with 728 of them boarded-out, 226 in statutory children's homes and 158 of them placed in voluntary children's homes by welfare authorities.

46 Section 136 of the CYP Act 1950 provided for the MoHA's powers in relation to inspection of voluntary children's homes to extend in like manner to any place other than a voluntary home in which a child was maintained under the Act, thereby giving the MoHA the power to inspect statutory children's homes and hostels.[33] The Children and Young Person (Welfare Authorities' Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952, which were issued on foot of the legislation, set down requirements for how welfare authorities should monitor the care provided in their children's homes. Regulation 5 imposed a requirement that the Children's Officer, which each welfare authority was required to appoint, should visit each children's home at least once a month and submit a report on these visits to the Welfare Committee. A similar requirement extended to the Welfare Committee. Regulation 5(1) required that each children's home should be visited at least monthly by a member of the Welfare Committee who had the responsibility to satisfy himself that the home was conducted in the interest and for the well-being of the children and to report back on the visit to the Welfare Committee. Welfare authorities were also required to submit a return to the MoHA each quarter about the children accommodated in residential care.

47 Kincora and Bawnmore Boys' Home were the only statutory homes we considered which operated in this period. Taking Kincora as the example of the approach adopted it was clear from available evidence that the Belfast Welfare Authority established the necessary visiting and reporting processes to meet these monitoring requirements but did not fully implement them. In the period from 1960 to 1962, only about 50% of the required reports from the Children's Officer were minuted. However, this situation improved, and from 1968 until 1973 almost all of the required visits were completed, except for very occasional gaps during the summer holiday periods. In contrast, the Hughes Inquiry found that while the requirement for visits by members of the Welfare Committee was largely met in the years 1960 to 1965, the frequency of statutory visits declined thereafter, and that such protection as this monitoring offered residents in Kincora was largely absent in the period January 1972 to September 1973. The Hughes Inquiry accepted that not all visits may have been minuted and recognised the limitations of such visits, e.g. how willing teenage boys would be to disclose abuse to visiting committee members. However, it concluded that the Belfast Welfare Authority's record of compliance with its statutory duty to undertake visits to Kincora from 1966 to 1973 could not escape criticism and we agree with that conclusion.[34]

48 The regulations did not extend to requiring regular visits to individual children in residential care or regular reviews of their progress. The Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) accepted from the evidence provided to this Inquiry that too often, during this period, there were no records or recollections of visits made by social workers to children placed in care and that some children were only visited once or twice a year. It conceded that generally in the period before 1968 the policy and practice of field social workers making regular visits to children placed in residential care was underdeveloped in Northern Ireland by comparison with other regions of the United Kingdom and accepted that was a failure on the part of its predecessor organisations.[35]

49 Robert Moore, the Children's Officer in the Belfast Welfare Authority, attempted to address this situation in 1967 by introducing a policy of a minimum monthly visit to each child placed in a home. However, the HSCB accepted from evidence provided about witnesses to the Inquiry, that this policy was not consistently applied. Also, as late as March 1985, Mr Bamford of the Southern Health and Social Services Board (SHSSB) told the Hughes Inquiry that monthly visits were not possible within the Board's existing staff resources and had to be on the basis of visiting children "as often as is necessary to provide him with meaningful support, to maintain interests in his needs as an individual and to maintain his relationship with relatives and friends and those significant to him."[36]

50 While accepting that lack of regular contact with children placed in residential care was a failure of its predecessor organisations, the HSCB suggested that part of the reason for this failure was that there was no statutory requirement for such visits and that the Government had placed different statutory safeguards on children who were boarded out as opposed to those in residential care.[37] The HSCB also pointed out that the MoHA did not provide any guidance about the maintenance of contact with children in care, although it "had overarching responsibility for policy and services to children and ultimate responsibility for children placed in residential care."[38]

51 The DHSSPS responded to this criticism and pointed out that where duties are conferred directly on a body, such as the general duty placed on welfare authorities in primary legislation to further the best interest of children or the specific duties contained within the statutory regulations, it is the responsibility of those on whom the duty is conferred to determine how best these might be discharged.[39]

52 We agreed with the HSCB that a statutory requirement would have been helpful and would have given the maintenance of contact with children placed in care the priority it deserved amongst competing demands. However, we considered that even in the absence of such a requirement, welfare authorities who had taken the significant step of placing children in residential care should have recognised and met their responsibility for maintaining contact with those children.

53 There were also no statutory requirements for the review of the care and progress of children in care. Mr Moore also introduced a policy in the Belfast Welfare Authority in 1967 for such reviews to take place every three months. We saw evidence of reviews taking place in other authority areas, and of welfare committees receiving reports about the circumstances of individual children and plans for their future. However, as the HSCB accepted, an overview of the case files available to this Inquiry showed that there were inconsistencies in the convening of reviews.[40]

54 We were of the view that these inconsistencies in the level of contact maintained with children placed in care and in the review of their progress were particularly significant in relation to children placed in voluntary homes by welfare authorities, since the welfare authorities were not directly in control of the policies and practice in those homes. Regular visiting by social workers would have enabled a professional eye to be cast on the general conditions and practices in these homes.

Welfare Authorities' monitoring of standards in voluntary homes

55 The welfare authorities remained responsible in law for children they placed in voluntary homes and therefore had a responsibility to assure themselves of the care provided to those children. The HSCB accepted in this regard that the voluntary children's homes used by welfare authorities in this period were too large, and due to their size and institutional nature were not conducive to providing a homely environment for children.[41] It also made a specific concession that the routine moving of boys on from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane when they reached secondary school age, largely dependent on their performance in the transfer examination, was not in keeping with the legislative requirement imposed on welfare authorities under section 89 of the CYP Act 1950. This section required welfare authorities to exercise their powers with respect to children in their care so as to further their best interests and to afford them opportunity for the proper development of their character and abilities.[42]

56 However, the HSCB pointed out that while social worker witnesses to the Inquiry spoke about the institutional nature of the care provided in large voluntary homes they also said that they considered the homes provided a satisfactory standard of physical care and that the children were safe. They also referred to the renovations that were made over time to voluntary homes to improve living conditions for children, such as the creation of smaller living units.

57 The HSCB argued that given the range and scope of the statutory duties and powers placed on the MoHA in relation to the regulation of voluntary children's homes, including powers to limit the numbers of children in a home and remove registration if mandatory regulations were not being complied with, it was reasonable for the HSCB's predecessor bodies to take a voluntary home's registration as assurance that it met basic standards of care.[43]

58 We accepted this point and agreed that regulation properly applied by the MoHA should have enabled welfare authorities to rely on a voluntary home's registration. Nevertheless, it is the case that welfare authorities placed children in homes such as Rubane, Nazareth Lodge and Termonbacca at times when they were clearly overcrowded, had inadequate facilities and low staffing levels, and we consider those circumstances should have led them to question whether it was appropriate to place more children in those homes. We recognised that in some circumstances there may not have been any viable alternatives, but that should have spurred the welfare authorities to consider how to require and support improvements in the homes they used in order to protect and promote the well-being of the children they placed in them. These conclusions are set out in the chapters dealing with these homes.

59 As part of the Warning Letter process the HSCB stated that the placing of children in these homes was the responsibility of individual social workers and that they would not have been privy to information as to the number of children, staffing levels and overall facilities in the homes. We did not accept this response. When children were received into care by a welfare authority, whether on a voluntary basis or as a result of a court order, they were placed in the care of the corporate body not the individual social workers who made the practical arrangements for their reception into care. It was therefore the corporate body that was responsible for their ongoing care. While social workers acted on behalf of welfare authorities they did so within management structures and would have had to seek approval for the placement of children in voluntary homes not least because of the financial implications of such placements. Also, while their concern was the well being of individual children there were examples, which we have referred to, where social workers reported general concerns about practices or conditions in voluntary homes and allegations of physical abuse to their senior managers. We recognised that welfare authorities did not have a regulatory role in relation to voluntary homes but this did not mean that they had no responsibility to consider the adequacy and suitability of the placements they were using and the facilities they were paying for.

60 There were examples of welfare authorities taking appropriate action in response to concerns raised about voluntary homes. For example, in 1964 when County Down Welfare Authority received allegations from a boy they had placed in Rubane that he was being sexually abused in the home they promptly referred the matter to the police and the MoHA. The Belfast Welfare Authority, which also had boys placed in the home, was informed about the allegations, and a senior member of staff from that authority visited the home to assure himself that appropriate action had been taken and that the home remained suitable for the placement of boys.

61 Bob Bunting succeeded Mr Moore as Children's Officer in Belfast Welfare Authority in November 1971. He told us that in that role he received a copy of three monthly review reports of all the children in the authority's care who were accommodated in residential care. He explained this meant he was informed about standards of care in the voluntary children's homes used by the Belfast Welfare Authority. He told us that he raised any concerns about the care being provided in a voluntary home with the officer in charge of the home and raised any significant concerns with the MoHA.[44]

62 We saw evidence of this when it came to Mr Bunting's attention that Nazareth Lodge had allowed couples to visit children and take them out of the home without prior assessment of their suitability. He informed that home and other voluntary homes that couples and families had to be approved by the Belfast Welfare Authority before they could take out children who were the responsibility of that authority.[45]

63 The early 1970s saw significant changes being introduced to the structures for the delivery of statutory social services and the arrangements for the regulation of residential care services. In December 1969, Brian Faulkner, the then Minister for Development for Northern Ireland, initiated a review of the organisation of local government in Northern Ireland. The report of the review, known as the Macrory Report, was published in June 1970. It recommended a major reorganisation of local government in Northern Ireland, including the reduction of the number of local authorities from 72 to 26 and the integration of health and social services. To achieve this integration it recommended that hospitals, community health and social services should be organised as a single system through the creation of four Health and Social Services Boards (Northern, Southern, Eastern and Western Boards).

64 This recommendation was accepted and then developed by consultants Booz-Allen and Hamilton and published in a report dated February 1972 called An Integrated Service: The reorganization of health and personal social services in Northern Ireland. In this report the respective role and responsibilities in the new integrated health and social services were described as:

> "The Ministry of Health and Social Services should be responsible for overall objectives, policies and resource allocation...the Area Boards for planning and monitoring of services and District Units for managing and delivering services."[46]

65 The Health and Personal Social Services (NI) Order 1972 (the 1972 Order) established the Health and Social Services Boards (the Boards), which replaced welfare authorities. From 1 October 1973 the Boards operated through a structure of Districts that delivered the services at a local level.

66 The Departmental responsibility for regulation of residential childcare services also changed at this time. The provisions of the CYP Act 1950 in relation to the powers of inspection by the MoHA had been re-enacted through Sections 130 and 168 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1968 (CYP Act 1968). In 1971, the MoHA's two children's inspectors, while retaining their functions in respect of the MoHA, became part of the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) within the then Ministry of Health and Social Services under the direction of a Chief Social Work Advisor.[47] The Departments (Transfer of Functions) Order (NI) 1973 transferred the remaining functions of the MOHA under the 1968 Act to the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS) including responsibility for the registration of voluntary children's homes.

67 The CYP Act 1968 had removed the requirement for welfare authorities to have the post of Children's Officer and the HSCB suggested that this created a lacuna in the allocation of responsibility for statutory visiting of children's homes until the DHSS issued the Conduct of Children's Home Direction (Northern Ireland) 1975. Bob Bunting told us that he had to make provision for these responsibilities to be covered within the EHSSB until they were again regulated for in 1975.

68 The DHSSPS disagreed that this lacuna was created and stated that statutory regulations for monthly visiting of statutory children's homes continued to be in force between 1968 and 1975. The DHSSPS also pointed out that the evidence provided by the EHSSB to the Hughes Inquiry showed that in the period 1963 to 1973 the statutory duty for visiting children's homes was delegated from the Children's Officer to other members of the Residential and Day Care management team and that this delegation continued after re-organisation.

69 The Conduct of Children's Home Direction (Northern Ireland) 1975, referred to above, set down revised requirements for the monitoring of statutory children's homes and hostels to reflect the new organisational arrangements and reporting structures in Boards. Section 3(3) required a Visiting Social Worker to visit a home at least once in every month and to submit a report in writing through the District Officer to the Director of Social Services. The Director of Social Services had the responsibility to bring any matters of concern or interest arising from these reports to the attention of the Personal Social Services Committee. In addition, under Section 3(2) of the Direction, a member of the Personal Social Services Committee was required to visit each children's home at least once in every quarter to satisfy her/himself that the home was conducted in the interests and well-being of the children and to report back to the Committee. These monitoring activities were expected to focus on the overall standards of care and practice in the homes rather than the individual well-being and progress of individual children.

70 The HSCB accepted that each Board devised its own approach to meeting the monitoring requirements and that for around ten years after re-organisation no Board had developed written guidance for those undertaking the monitoring. The HSCB also accepted that generally there had been a failure to consistently meet the statutory requirements placed on Boards to monitor their children's homes.

71 However, in accepting this failure it pointed to its reading of the Hughes Inquiry in this respect that visits by Personal Social Services Committee members and line managers were unlikely to detect homosexual abuse in the absence of a complaint or seeing a physical representation of the child. The HSCB went on to submit "The Board considers this would equally extend to other forms of abuse."[48] We did not accept this conclusion. We agreed that because of its nature signs of sexual abuse would have been hard to detect. However, we considered that it would have been possible for appropriately trained visitors who visited a home regularly and maintained consistent contact with the children to detect signs of neglect and possibly to pick up signs of intimidation, fear and physical abuse.

72 We also questioned the effectiveness of the monitoring that did take place. We are in no doubt that the WHSSB took a conscientious approach to monitoring of its children's homes by senior managers and members of its Personal Social Services Committee and that their findings were recorded and reported. A significant amount of time and effort was put into these monitoring activities and pertinent issues were identified. For example, the impact that emergency placements and lack of appropriate placements for children to move on to had on Harberton House's ability to meet its remit were clearly identified, and the adverse effects on the children resident in the home were clearly understood. However, these circumstances were not effectively addressed. Also, despite monitoring of Kincora, from May 1958 when the hostel opened until September 1964, the warden was the only member of care staff and was expected to work for long periods by himself with very limited time off. We consider that the effort expended in monitoring and the costs entailed are only justified if the monitoring actually has a positive impact on the operation of the home and the quality of care provided to the children residing in it. Otherwise the activity could become an end in itself and give a false sense of assurance that the context, facilities and practices in a home were being adequately attended to.

Sheridan Report

73 A significant review of the regulation of children's homes was undertaken in 1982 as a result of the uncovering of sexual abuse of boys in the Kincora hostel run by the EHSSB. The then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Mr Prior, told the House of Commons, on 18 February 1982, that while police investigations and trials into the abuse of boys in Kincora were not yet complete he was seeking immediate advice and assistance from the relevant department in England to ensure that all appropriate steps were taken to improve the supervision and management of homes and hostels for children and young persons. Subsequently, a three-person team led by Miss Sheridan, Deputy Director of the Social Work Service, was appointed. The team focussed on:

(a) the overall position and role of the Department in relation to children's homes;

(b) in particular the extent and nature of the Department's responsibilities for inspection and supervision;

(c) what additional steps the Department has been able to take since 1980 to improve or cause to be improved aspects in (ii);

(d) what would be possible and necessary for the future, and in particular whether any clarification of roles was necessary or any additional help required.[49]

74 In the opening comments of her report Miss Sheridan set out her understanding that when SWAG was set up in 1971 it was not able for some years to recruit staff with up-to-date knowledge, experience and qualifications in childcare. She commented that this situation reflected the challenges faced by the Boards when they were set up in 1973, in that they only had a limited number of trained childcare officers, and in common with the rest of the UK had only a tiny proportion of trained residential childcare staff. Miss Sheridan observed that the staffing position in SWAG had recently been strengthened with the appointment of advisers, qualified and experienced in all aspects of childcare.

75 Miss Sheridan's report was provided to the DHSS in Northern Ireland in June 1982, and Miss Brown provided a follow-up report to the DHSS in July 1983 analysing what action had been taken in response to the Sheridan Report. She reported that as of 9 July 1983 (some three and a half years after matters came to light in Kincora) 42 of the 60 residential childcare facilities in the province had been inspected, and the remaining eighteen homes were still to be inspected. Reports of nineteen of the completed inspections had been submitted to the DHSS and the remaining twenty-three were in the course of preparation. Five follow-up visits had been completed.

76 Following consideration of Miss Brown's report the Permanent Secretary of the DHSS, Mr Dugdale, wrote to his Assistant Secretary, Mr Wilson:

> "...there is clearly a lot going on within the Department on these matters and there are also some indications of a positive response by the agencies in the field. This is all to the good. But I am concerned at the length of time which the whole operation is taking. Especially if – which is by no means beyond the bounds of possibility – the spotlight on Kincora and the other homes where criminal offences were committed swings away from the investigations conducted by the RUC and back to the failings of the child-care system, the Department could be exposed to very damaging criticism for failing to tackle the issues with the urgency that their gravity demands."[50]

77 Mr Dugdale's fears were justified when during the Hughes Committee of Inquiry into Children's Homes and Hostels, the Chief Social Work Adviser, Mr Armstrong, was held to account for the lack of inspection by the SWAG in the 1970s and early 1980s, and the delays post-Kincora in SWAG completing a full round of inspections and follow-up visits to all children's homes in the province.

78 Mr Armstrong had been appointed as Deputy Chief Social Work Adviser in May 1974, before being promoted to the post of Chief Social Work Adviser in August 1983, and he was therefore able to speak from personal experience of the challenges SWAG faced in resourcing inspection activity.

79 He explained that in 1974 the newly created DHSS took over responsibility for the inspection of all residential childcare services with the exception of training schools. It was recognised that the two children's inspectors who had transferred from the MoHA, now called Social Work Advisers, could not cover all the required inspections and an additional Social Work Adviser was appointed in August 1975. It was also decided that inspection reports should contain more detail and a revised format was agreed in February 1976 with a view to having annual reports prepared on all children's homes in the province. However, this plan did not materialise because of lack of resources. Just as the additional third Social Work Adviser completed his six month induction period, Miss Forrest retired and it took a year to replace her. As it was not possible for two Social Work Advisers to report on all voluntary and statutory homes it was decided that they should concentrate on voluntary homes.

80 Mr Armstrong explained that SWAG decided on this approach because, in the main, voluntary homes did not have the well defined structures for administration and management of homes that statutory authorities had and it was therefore considered that they needed "more professional attention."[51] In response to this explanation the Hughes Inquiry noted that the only SWAG report extant for Nazareth Lodge for the period 1973 to 1983 related to an inspection carried out in October 1983, which was after the abuse in Kincora came to light, although it accepted that Social Work Advisers had visited the home on four other occasions from 1973. The Hughes Inquiry found this level of inspection to be unsatisfactory, especially in light of Mr Armstrong's evidence that SWAG tended to devote more attention to voluntary rather than statutory homes during the 1970s.[52]

81 Mr Armstrong explained that when events in Kincora were uncovered the approach to inspection was reviewed and it was decided that more detailed inspections of homes were required and a new format of two inspectors spending three to four days in a home was introduced.[53] He confirmed that in the period between October 1980 and March 1984 all the children's homes in the province were inspected.

82 Mr Dugdale's recorded concerns in 1983 about the slow progress in completing the post-Kincora programme of inspections were put to Mr Armstrong, who accepted that even with the inspection team being augmented by two additional inspectors it took considerable time to complete inspections. He also conceded that because the priority was to complete initial inspections, follow-up inspections which were supposed to take place a year after initial inspections to monitor the progress homes had made in meeting recommendations, had been delayed. He explained that this delay in monitoring progress meant that the effectiveness of inspections could not be judged.[54]

52 HIA 915.
54 KIN 70406-70408.

83 Mr Armstrong was shown to a memo of 12 May 1980 written by his predecessor, Mr Wilde, in which he indicated that the role of SWAG was seen not so much as regulatory and inspectorial but as promotional and educational in terms agreed in advance with Boards and voluntary organisations. Mr Wilde had commented that this approach had created general misunderstanding and confusion, both in the statutory and voluntary sectors, about the Department's relative powers and the policy of SWAG in exercising them.[55] Mr Armstrong suggested Mr Wilde was referring to voluntary organisations being confused because although the powers of registration and inspection were vested in the DHSS and exercised through SWAG, Boards as the main users of voluntary residential childcare also had to monitor the quality of the care provided. He also indicated that there was similar confusion in the statutory sector about the inspectorial role of SWAG vis-a-vis the monitoring role of the Boards.

84 Mr Armstrong accepted that the term 'inspection' had fallen into disuse and there had been more emphasis on discussion and provision of advice. However, he emphasised that the power of inspection remained with the DHSS and confirmed that from 1980, under his leadership, it was made very clear that SWAG was undertaking inspections.[56] By the time the Hughes report was published in December 1985 all voluntary and statutory children's homes in the province had been inspected and follow-up visits had also been completed.[57]

85 In response to criticisms about the lack of inspection activity by SWAG from 1973 to 1980 the DHSSPS told us that during that period the work of SWAG was characterised by wider childcare consultation and advisory responsibilities and periodic visits to, but fewer inspections of, children's homes.[58] It asserted that the retraction of inspection activity was not a gradual lapse into complacency nor a dereliction of duty on the part of the DHSS but a change of focus driven by the Seebohm Report, which recommended that the role of the inspectorate should be "not so much regulatory as promotional, educative and consultative."[59]

86 The DHSSPS stated that SWAG's consequent change of focus to establishing supportive and advisory relationships with both voluntary and statutory providers of residential childcare services and assisting the DHSS in the social work aspects of its functions was implementing a Departmental policy approach that was part of a UK-wide Government policy on creating new relationships with local providers.[60] [61]

87 During the Inquiry, Dr Harrison, on behalf of the DHSSPS, communicated with Sir William Utting, a former Social Services Inspectorate Chief Inspector for England and Wales, about this shift in focus. Sir William was the Director of Social Services from 1970 to 1976 for the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea and he recalled that at that time statutory children's homes were not inspected but that the Social Work Service (SWS), the English equivalent of SWAG, visited voluntary children's homes.

88 Dr Harrison also contacted David Gilroy CBE, former Deputy Chief Inspector of the SWS. Mr Gilroy confirmed that although the SWS did not systematically visit or inspect statutory children's homes between 1976 and 1985 it did visit voluntary children's homes under the powers of inspection vested in the Secretary of State. He explained that these visits were conducted in an advisory, supportive and developmental style, but that following each visit, a report on the home was forwarded to the Child Care Branch within the English DHSS. These reports were not shared with the administering authorities of the homes or local authorities, but a follow-up letter providing feedback on the visit was sent to the home's administering authority. Mr Gilroy explained that if issues of concern or matters requiring further attention were identified, SWS, with the agreement of the Child Care Branch, would undertake a further visit to the home or take such other action as deemed necessary.[62]

89 The DHSSPS accepted that the DHSS's explanations to the Hughes Inquiry for lack of inspection of children's homes focussed on resourcing issues and commented:

> "It would appear, however that the implications of the Seebohm report for the intended role of SWAG were either not known or not communicated by personnel who provided evidence to the Inquiry."

90 We were not persuaded by the DHSSPS's explanation for the lack of inspection. No documentary evidence was provided to support it except that Mr Wilde used similar language about inspection in his memorandum referred to above as that used in the Seebohm report. The DHSSPS indicated:

60 GOV 003.
61 SNB 9570.
62 GOV 1300.

> "...Whilst Mr Wilde was plainly familiar with the Seebohm terminology he was seemingly unfamiliar with the policy context."

We found it inconceivable that Mr Wilde, as the Chief Inspector, would be unfamiliar with the policy context for inspection. We also noted that there was no reference in the Sheridan Report to a deliberate change of policy in relation to inspection. Moreover, Mr Armstrong, who held senior positions in SWAG from 1974, told the Hughes Inquiry that the lack of inspection activity, and in particular the failure to implement the policy of annual inspections agreed in 1976, was due to a lack of resources. We consider that given Mr Armstrong's role and his length of service with SWAG he would have been knowledgeable about the policy background to inspection and competent to explain it. Also, as referred to above, in an internal SWAG report of May 1980, about a new approach to inspection, it was recognised that advisers had not been able to devote sufficient time to each home to allow them to engage in thorough inspections.

91 The DHSSPS did go on to concede in its submission to this Inquiry about finance and governance matters that:

> "Had the agreed appropriate action been taken in 1976 to strengthen DHSS scrutiny, this might have helped minimise further opportunity for abuse to occur within children's homes."[63]

We accepted and agreed with that concession. As part of the Warning Letter process the Department of Health (DoH), the successor department to the DHSSPS, reiterated the explanation that the policy developed in the early 1970s of 'visiting' children's homes as opposing to conducting regular annual 'formal inspections' of homes was adopted as a result of the proposals contained in the Seebohm report. The DoH accepted that the DHSS's decision in 1976 to amend this approach and adopt a policy of visiting and making a full report on all children's homes annually was not implemented between the years 1976 and 1981 and that this was a systemic failing. However, it stated that whilst visits by SWAG were aimed at providing professional advice to homes they also included a degree of scrutiny including consideration of poor practice and encouragement towards best practice and that therefore it would not be right to suggest that the concept of 'inspection' was abandoned.

92 However, our view that the move away from annual inspection visits was a resource issue and not the result of a change of policy in response to the Seebohm report was strengthened through consideration of an internal DHSS paper dated 28 May 1980, which was contained in a DHSS file we received from PRONI. The purpose of the paper was to consider a new programme of inspections of children's homes and training schools and to clarify the inspection process, including the methods to be used and the format for reports. The existing approach to regulation of children's homes was outlined in the introduction to the paper:

> "Social Work Advisers (Child Care) visit and write reports on voluntary and statutory homes as part of their normal duties. The reports are in the main concerned with material provisions, management, regimes and support services. They may give some impression of standards of care but our advisers have not been able to devote sufficient time to each home to allow them to engage in a thorough inspection. This paper attempts to formulate a plan for regular inspections of all homes by the Department's advisers."[64]

We consider that it is clear from this contemporaneous DHSS paper that lack of resources rather than policy direction was the reason for reduced inspection activity.

93 We do not underestimate the demands on the limited number of staff in SWAG in the 1970s and early 1980s and recognise that they were contributing to policy developments and consultations at that time as well as maintaining some limited contact with children's homes. We accept that the visits SWAG made to children's homes meant that the children in those homes had the benefit of some external scrutiny of the conditions they were living in and the care they were receiving. However, as will be clear from our findings in relation to individual children's homes we found the lack of inspection by SWAG in this period amounted to a systemic failing by the DHSS to ensure these homes provided proper care.

Implementation of other recommendations in the Sheridan Report

Respective roles and responsibilities in inspection and monitoring

94 The Sheridan Report confirmed the view of Mr Wilde that the respective roles and responsibilities of the DHSS and the Boards in supervising and inspecting statutory homes required clarification. It also identified that clarification was required in relation to the monitoring of voluntary homes, including the role of Boards in exercising satisfactory supervision of the care of children they placed in voluntary homes. The report suggested that achieving this clarity and developing more effective monitoring by Boards and voluntary organisations would enable the DHSS in the long term to assume a greater element of "monitoring the monitors."[65]

95 In response to these recommendations, the DHSS issued a circular entitled Monitoring of Residential Child Care Services on 21 October 1983, in which it clarified that the Boards, as agents of the DHSS, were responsible for the provision of statutory residential childcare services and for monitoring the delivery of those services. It further clarified that the Boards were accountable to the DHSS for the way in which they discharged these responsibilities in terms of the quality, range and availability of services and that the DHSS had to be satisfied that each Board had adequate monitoring arrangements.[66]

96 In order for the DHSS to be satisfied, the Boards were required to submit detailed statements of their monitoring arrangements by the end of 1983 and thereafter to produce and submit annual monitoring statements outlining "the elements monitored, the methods used, the trends observed, the areas of concern identified and the action taken to remedy deficiencies". A list of the "main elements to be monitored" was also provided by the DHSS.

97 We found that these structural arrangements were less straightforward in practice when SSI inspectors were concerned about the WHSSB's plans to close Fort James children's home, and in particular the impact it could have on the other children's home in the immediate area. We noted that in contemporaneous internal SSI documentation about the matter an inspector identified the serious implications the closure would have for

Harberton House and the structure of residential services within the Foyle Unit of Management more generally.

98 The SSI wrote in relatively strong terms to advise against the planned closure, but this advice was not accepted and the closure went ahead. When it was informed that the WHSSB intended to increase the number of beds in Harberton House to compensate for the closure of Fort James the SSI wrote in even stronger terms to strongly advise against that course of action.[67] The WHSSB responded to explain that the increase in beds in Harberton was an interim measure pending a reduction in the need for residential care stemming from a greater emphasis on preventive work. An inspector described that aspiration as "somewhat heroic, particularly given that the number of foster parents in the Western Board area is declining.[68]

99 The SSI communicated its concerns to the WHSSB's Director of Social Services but when this did not have the desired effect as far as we are aware there was no attempt by the SSI or the DHSS to escalate these concerns to Board level. Also, although, according to the circular, the WHSSB was accountable to the DHSS for the "quality, range and availability" of its residential childcare services we saw no evidence of the DHSS holding the WHSSB to account on the basis of the SSI's concerns. This suggested to us that despite the stated position in the circular there continued to be a lack of clarity in practice about the respective roles of the DHSS and the Boards and the authority relationship between them. We concluded in Chapter 23 dealing with Fort James and Harberton House that in order to avoid intervening too directly in the provision of services neither the DHSS nor the SSI, acting on its behalf, responded as assertively to the WHSSB as they should have, given inspectors' assessment of the adverse implications of the closure of Fort James and the increase in beds in Harberton House.

Continuing disagreement about the respective roles of the boards and department

100 It was also the case that despite the work in response to the Sheridan Report to clarify the roles and responsibilities of the DHSS and the Boards, continued disagreement about them was a significant and consistent feature of the evidence we received from the DHSSPS and the HSCB

throughout this Inquiry. For example, the respective responsibilities of the DHSS and the Boards for the overall quality of residential childcare were a continuing point of contention. The HSCB, in its submission in relation to governance, stated that the DHSS held "ultimate responsibility for residential childcare and the children placed therein" and referred to the evidence Dr Maurice Hayes, the Permanent Secretary, gave to the Hughes Inquiry, in which he accepted during questioning that the Department held the ultimate responsibility.[69]

101 The DHSSPS responded to this assertion by describing it as simplistic and referred us to a DHSS circular issued in 2006, Responsibilities, Accountability and Authority of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Health and Social Services Boards and Health and Social Services Trusts in the Discharge of Relevant Personal Social Services Functions to Safeguard and Promote the Welfare of Children, which set out the legal position between the Department, the Board and Trusts in relation to children. The legal position was that while the State was ultimately responsible as parent of all children, in accordance with the common law principle of "parens patriae", it generally exercised its powers to safeguard and promote the welfare of children by providing the legal authority for responsible authorities to discharge statutory functions on its behalf.

102 The DHSSPS pointed out that the 1950 and 1968 Children and Young Persons Acts placed a duty on Welfare Authorities and then Boards in this regard:

> "Where a child is in the care of a welfare authority, it shall be the duty of that authority to exercise their powers with respect to him so as to further his best interests, and to afford him opportunity for the proper development of his character and abilities."[70]

103 The DHSSPS further pointed out that under the provisions of the 1952 Regulations every Welfare Authority was directly responsible for ensuring that each children's home in its charge was conducted in such a manner and on such principles as would further the well-being of the children in the home, and that this responsibility was subsequently transferred to Boards. On the basis of this delegation of authority the DHSSPS argued that, rather than assuming direct responsibility for residential childcare, the role of relevant Government departments was to ensure the availability of residential childcare services that were adequate and sufficient to promote the social welfare of children who needed them.

70 Section 89 (1) of the 1950 Act (HIA 226) and Section 113(1) of the 1968 Act (HIA 372).

104 We accepted the DHSSPS's analysis of the respective roles and responsibilities of Government departments and Welfare Authorities, and then Boards, for the provision of residential childcare. We consider Welfare Authorities and Boards were responsible for protecting and promoting the interests of children in their care, ensuring that the care provided was appropriate to meet the individual needs of children placed by them and for quality and safety of their children's homes. We also consider that the Administering Authorities of voluntary children's homes and in particular the congregations that ran some homes, were responsible for the quality of care provided and for protecting the interests and promoting the welfare of the children resident in them. As will be clear from a number of chapters dealing with individual voluntary and statutory institutions we were critical and found systemic failings in how these responsibilities were carried out at times.

105 However, we also consider that Government departments had an over-arching and ultimate responsibility to ensure that the authorities to whom it delegated functions undertook them in a responsible and effective manner. Registration and capital funding of voluntary children's home, inspection of all children's homes and consideration of strategic plans for childcare including the development and changing remits of children's homes, were important elements in meeting that over-arching responsibility. Also, in addition to the department's overall responsibility for preparing legislation, regulations and policies, it was important that they kept abreast of developments in professional practice and ensured that new thinking was promulgated to the services.

106 The Monitoring of Residential Child Care Services circular also clarified that while Boards retained responsibility in law for the children they placed in voluntary homes, and should have satisfied themselves about the standard of care being provided to each child they were not responsible for monitoring the overall standards, either professional or material, of voluntary homes. However, it recognised that Boards needed to receive information about the professional standards of care and the quality of facilities in voluntary homes in order to help them assess the suitability of a home as a placement for a child in their care. Therefore, it stated the intention that the DHSS would hold discussions with voluntary organisations about how best this information could be shared. These discussions took place and by the time the Hughes Inquiry reported to the DHSS in December 1985, SWAG reports on voluntary children's homes were being shared with Boards.

107 The circular provided that voluntary children's homes were also required to review their monitoring arrangements and to submit a statement on them. They were specifically required to confirm their arrangements for monthly visiting of the home.

Co-operation between voluntary homes and boards

108 The Sheridan Report also recommended that the DHSS should seek to build up effective co-operation between voluntary homes and between them and Boards in providing residential childcare services.[71] In response to this recommendation the DHSS issued a discussion paper on 23 December 1983 to Boards and voluntary organisations providing residential childcare on The Statutory/Voluntary Relationship in the Provision of Residential Child Care. In light of comments received on the initial discussion paper the DHSS issued a formal consultation paper on the same subject on 18 January 1985.[72] The consultation paper and the covering letter set an agenda for discussions between Boards and the Management Committees of voluntary homes and asked for a joint report to be submitted by the end of July 1985 endorsed by the Board and the relevant Management Committee(s) outlining the issues discussed and the solutions proposed.[73]

109 Joint reports were submitted within the set timescale by the Southern, Northern and Western Boards, but the EHSSB was only able to submit an interim progress report because it had not been able to reach agreement with voluntary bodies about significant matters including the level of per capita payments the Board should pay in respect of children it placed in voluntary children's homes. The EHSSB's final report was not received until December 1988, but showed that considerable progress had been achieved in resolving the issues that were causing concern including the per capita fees issue, a matter we will consider further in the Finance section of this chapter.[74]

Roles and responsibilities in handling complaints from children in care and their parents

110 A continued lack of clarity about respective roles and responsibilities for monitoring and inspecting children's homes was apparent in relation to the development and implementation of a complaints procedure for children in care and their parents.

111 The Sheridan Report recommended that the DHSS should introduce adequate arrangements for consideration of complaints by children in care and their parents about treatment in children's homes. In response, the DHSS completed two rounds of consultation with the Boards, voluntary agencies and organisations representing the interests of staff and issued guidance in May 1985 on a procedure for investigating complaints. This guidance was issued despite the staff side withdrawing from the consultation process because of concerns that the proposed procedure would not provide staff with adequate protection from unfounded allegations of mistreatment. Ms Doreen Brown, the civil servant responsible for developing the guidance, told us that the DHSS had to decide whether to defer publication of the guidance until staff co-operation had been achieved or issue the guidance in the absence of that co-operation. She explained that the DHSS chose the latter option so as not to countenance a potentially open-ended delay.[75]

112 This decision meant that it was then up to the Boards to reach agreement with the staff side about the development and implementation of a complaints procedure. The Boards worked together to reach agreement with the staff side but it took until January 1990 for the complaints procedure to be agreed.[76] If the DHSS had managed through the consultation process to reach agreement with the staff side before it issued the guidance, that would have greatly assisted the Boards to develop the detail of their own operational arrangements and implement them in a timelier manner. However, we considered the DHSS was right to issue the complaints procedure when it did in order to maintain momentum in the implementation of an important safeguard for children in residential care.

113 In its response to the Warning Letter process the DoH emphasised that the DHSS did not stand back from seeking to assist the resolution of the dispute between Boards' management and staff side. It explained that such was the DHSS's concern that in January 1986, the Permanent Secretary, Dr Hayes, issued to the Boards a set of principles for safeguarding the rights of staff against whom complaints were made. In the covering letter Dr Hayes requested the Boards to incorporate the principles into their internal procedures for handling complaints.[77] Dr Hayes also noted his appreciation that the Boards might face some practical problems incorporating these principles into a detailed procedure for investigating complaints. He therefore asked the Boards to review the operation of their procedures for investigation of complaints one year after implementation and advise the DHSS whether operation in accordance with the Hayes principles had caused difficulties in particular cases. This suggests that Dr Hayes may have been hopeful for an earlier resolution of the dispute. The DoH confirmed that the Hayes principles were incorporated into the complaints procedure issued in January 1990 which had been agreed with the Social Work Staffs Joint Council which represented the staff side.

114 From the evidence we considered there were clear examples of social workers responding to complaints of children in voluntary homes through addressing issues directly with managers of the home or referring more serious matters to their senior managers. Complications arose when a Board concluded that complaints raised general issues about care practices in a home that had the potential to affect all the children in the home. This was the case in 1981, when the EHSSB referred complaints about care practices in Rubane to SWAG because it considered they raised general issues about the care standards in the home which only SWAG had the over-arching responsibility and authority to investigate. SWAG persisted in the view that it was for the EHSSB to investigate and address the complaints of children it had placed in the home.

115 The guidance on complaints procedures issued in 1985 did not resolve these types of tension and the EHSSB and the SWAG engaged in similar debates in 1985-86 about allegations from three former residents of Nazareth Lodge that they had been abused by staff in that home. These allegations were made after the DHSS issued the guidance about the complaints procedure but before the Boards gained the agreement of the staff side to implement it. These complaints and how they were dealt with are considered in detail in Chapter 9 which deals with Nazareth Lodge.

116 The relevant point in relation to governance was the fundamental difference in view between managers in the EHSSB and SWAG about who should take responsibility for investigating these complaints. The EHSSB carried out preliminary investigations but concluded that it fell to the SWAG, on behalf of the DHSS, to investigate further since the children making the allegations were no longer resident in the home and the nun who was the main subject of their complaints was no longer working in the home. Also, the EHSSB managers considered that the allegations raised general matters about the care provided in the home that required a wider-ranging investigation than they had the authority to undertake. The SWAG resisted this approach and advised the EHSSB to investigate the complaints in line with the guidance the DHSS had issued about complaints procedures.

117 The EHSSB and the SWAG corresponded on this matter for a considerable length of time but could not agree a way forward. As will be clear from Chapter 9 dealing with Nazareth Lodge we are critical about the use of correspondence as the medium for resolving this complex matter. Given the historical nature of the alleged abuse and the status of the complaints procedure, it was not an effective approach and ultimately resulted in allegations of a serious nature not being fully investigated by a body independent of the Sisters of Nazareth.

118 The circumstances surrounding the investigation of these allegations were raised again in hearings for the governance and finance module, and differences of opinion about respective responsibilities continued to be voiced. In defending the position of its predecessor body, the DHSSPS stated that if concerns about the behaviour of staff in a voluntary children's home, which indicated a need for staff training, supervision or disciplinary action, were brought to the attention of the DHSS it could only encourage an appropriate response on the part of the voluntary organisation since it was not the employing body. It also pointed out that a Board was ultimately responsible for the care and well-being of children it placed in a voluntary home. However, it accepted that if a Board investigated and found the staff problems in a home "to be serious and endemic, the ultimate sanction that the Department would have had at its disposal at the time would have been to de-register the home."[78]

119 The DHSSPS further clarified its position, saying that since at the time the complaints emerged there were no current complaints about the care provided in Nazareth Lodge and no grounds to suggest that the alleged abuse had been perpetuated or condoned by staff currently in the home, or that children in the home were affected, the DHSS did not have a locus to investigate. The DHSSPS also emphasised that the DHSS's powers related to inspection and that they had used those powers in Nazareth Lodge in January 1986 and had identified no evidence of any abusive practice historically or currently in the home.

120 Bob Bunting, who was involved at the time the allegations were made, told us it was wrong of the DHSS to expect the EHSSB to investigate concerns about children no longer resident in the home using a complaints procedure which had not been agreed. The HSCB reiterated this point and stated that the EHSSB was being directed to implement a complaints circular that was not fit for purpose at the insistence of the DHSS, and that no system failure should attach to the Board.[79]

121 It was clear from the wealth of documentation we received, including statements provided after the close of public hearings, that strongly opposing views are still held about the apparent rights and wrongs of the positions adopted by the EHSSB and the DHSS in relation to who was responsible for investigating these allegations. The DHSSPS did acknowledge that if SWAG had convened a meeting between the key players at the time, including representatives of the EHSSB and the Administering Authority for Nazareth Lodge that could have helped to achieve an agreed way forward.[80] We agreed with this as we considered SWAG had the ultimate responsibility to ensure these matters were properly investigated.

Review of registration

122 As the Registering Authorities, the MoHA and then the DHSS had powers to review and if necessary remove registration of voluntary children's home. As indicated above, we were only aware of two occasions when active consideration was given to removal of registration. Up until the mid-1980s there was no formal process for registration to be reviewed. Inspection of children's homes was the only vehicle for consideration of continuing suitability for registration, therefore lack of inspection also meant lack of review of registration.

123 However, as part of strengthening monitoring arrangements in response to the Sheridan Report the DHSS introduced an annual review of registration. Mr Buchanan of the DHSS wrote to the Management Committee of each voluntary home on 10 May 1985 asking for the provision of factual information about the home and indicating that SWAG would be in touch to arrange for an inspection of the home. Mr Buchanan explained that consideration of the factual information and the outcome of inspections would enable the DHSS

> "…to consider on an annual basis the quality of provision and services existing in each home, and, in its capacity as registering authority, to satisfy itself that there was no impediment to the continued registration of the home concerned."[81]

124 Subsequent to 1985, DHSS officials and representatives from the SSI held annual meetings with each voluntary organisation and Board to discuss the annual monitoring information that they had submitted. The DHSSPS pointed out that the meetings with voluntary organisations were termed "Review of Registration" thereby signalling that suitability for registration was being kept under continuing review.[82] We considered the introduction of review meetings to be a welcome and necessary means of providing more focus to the governance of voluntary children's homes for the providers of the care and the regulators of that care.

Inspection of residential childcare

125 On 22 March 1985 the Department wrote to the Boards to announce annual focussed inspections of children's homes and hostels and full-scale inspections every five years. The agendas for both types of inspections were detailed and included annual consideration of compliance with regulations/directions, examination of statutory records, and monitoring arrangements.

126 The Department also announced that the annual inspections would be preceded by discussions with each Board about its policy and procedures in relation to residential childcare, which would then be the subject of a separate report. Similar inspection arrangements were put in place for voluntary homes.

127 The DHSS issued the Hughes report for consultation on 30 April 1986. It contained fifty-six recommendations to improve, inter alia, the operation of homes, the recruitment, pay, terms and conditions and training of staff and the internal monitoring and external scrutiny of the quality of care being provided to children in homes. The report was critical of the lack of inspection of children's homes by the SWAG but recognised that post Kincora the DHSS had strengthened the focus on inspection and the SWAG had inspected all children's homes.

128 The DHSS confirmed in its detailed response to the recommendations in the Hughes report that it had formally designated the Administering Authority of each voluntary children's home and in turn these Authorities had formally designated the person who was visiting the home on their behalf. It further confirmed that voluntary agencies had been asked to implement the recommendation that written guidance should be provided for those undertaking statutory monitoring visits.[83] With regard to inspection of voluntary homes it confirmed that the written reports of designated visitors would be required to be open to inspectors.[84]

129 The DHSS also confirmed that it accepted and had asked the Boards to implement recommendations for strengthening their internal monitoring of children's homes, such as ensuring that statutory visits by PSSC members involved informal contact with children, and that the outcomes of these visits were included in the annual monitoring statements submitted to the DHSS.

130 The DHSS accepted recommendations about inspections by SWAG, such as that all inspections should involve a sample scrutiny of children's personal files to ensure that social work visits and reviews were regular. In response to the recommendation that the SWAG inspection programme should include unannounced visits and significant matters arising should be recorded and pursued, the DHSS stated that it did not consider that unannounced visits need to become a feature of the inspection programme but pointed out that the authority to carry out such visits existed and could be exercised if circumstances arose which demanded it.[85]

131 In 1986, the SWAG, in collaboration with the Board's Assistant Directors of Social Services agreed a comprehensive set of standards for residential childcare. This was the first time that an explicit statement of practice and professional criteria was issued.[86] Also in 1986, the SWAG was renamed the Social Services Inspectorate, thereby confirming its inspectoral remit and focus.

132 From 1987 the frequency of inspection of statutory children's homes was reduced to every three years. The DHSSPS told us this decision was based on the DHSS having required Boards to strengthen their monitoring of their residential childcare services; submit annual monitoring reports on these services to the DHSS and inform the DHSS about any untoward incidents in their children's homes.

133 While we accepted this rationale, we also considered that this change in approach was probably prompted to some extent by resource considerations and the capacity of the SSI to annually inspect all children's homes.

134 In 1994 the SSI further developed standards for inspection and monitoring of children's homes: Quality Living Standards for Services: Children who live away from Home. On 26 May 1995 the Department issued a circular Monitoring of Residential Child Care Services which modified and consolidated the arrangements for the monitoring of residential childcare services and introduced new standards for the inspection of such services.[87] It was the framework within which a programme of annual inspections of voluntary children's homes (including two unannounced visits) and three-yearly inspection of statutory children's homes was conducted by the SSI.[88] The DHSSPS told us that this programme included a strong emphasis on the need for inspectors to speak directly to children and seek confidential feedback from children and their parents regarding aspects of the care in the home.[89]

135 In 1996 the inspection of children's homes was transferred from the DHSS to the Boards' Regulation and Inspection Units, which had been established in 1994 and were subsequently transferred to the Regulation, Quality and Improvement Authority under the provisions of the Health and Personal Social Services (Quality, Improvement and Regulation) (NI) Order 2003.

Regulation of training schools and criminal justice institutions

136 The responsibility for inspection of training schools transferred from MoHA to the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) in 1974, and the NIO vested its powers of inspection to the SWAG as the DHSS had done in relation to other types of residential childcare. The lack of inspection by SWAG affected the training schools as it did the children's homes, but we found it was compensated for to some extent by the consistent attention of the Training School Branch of the NIO, whose officials maintained a high level of contact and oversight of the training schools. Although the establishment of the Ministry (later the Department) of Health and Social Services and its responsibility to provide and secure the provision of personal social services in Northern Ireland was legislated for through Article 4 of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 the formal transfer of duties from the MoHA to the DHSS did not take effect until 1 January 1974. The responsibility for provisions relating to young offenders was also assumed by the NIO at that time.[90]

137 NIO officials held regular meetings with senior managers and representatives of the Boards of each of the training schools. The minutes of these meetings that we saw showed that although there was a focus on financial and administrative issues, there was also discussion of policy developments, legislative change and particularly serious concerns that the schools had about managing the behaviour of particular children and on occasion the conduct of members of staff.

138 From the evidence we heard it appeared that training schools and criminal justice institutions were generally better resourced than children's homes, and the NIO appeared more open and quicker to respond to requests for additional funding. This more favourable position was evident in the level and qualification profile of staff. SWAG inspectors found that staffing levels across the four training schools were generally satisfactory, and although shortfalls did result in some overtime working, temporary staff were also employed to assist at such times. Inspectors also found there had been an extensive programme of secondments to full-time qualifying training in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Several senior staff had completed a post-qualifying course and most of the schools had a policy of recruiting professionally qualified staff to fill vacancies as they arose. The DHSSPS indicated to us that overall the staffing ratios in the training schools in 1989 compared favourably with, and may well have represented an improvement on, the ratios that existed in a number of children's homes at that time.[91]

139 The more rigorous approach to inspection post Kincora and Hughes was also extended to training schools. In 1991 a more formal arrangement for inspections, including formal arrangements for the funding of inspection activity, was agreed between the NIO and the DHSS and a draft paper was considered setting out expectations for SSI inspections.[92] This included that the SSI should advise the NIO, inter alia, on control and aftercare issues in training schools. The SSI agreed with the NIO that each training school would receive two unannounced visits each year. Inspections were to be undertaken every four years, interspersed by more frequent less intensive reviews referred to as "regulatory inspections",[93] and an annual monitoring report was to be submitted by the Director of each training school to the Management Board, the NIO and SSI based on the format introduced for children's homes.[94]

140 In addition to holding responsibility for training schools the NIO was responsible for Hydebank, which was a Young Offenders Centre opened in 1979 and operated under the provisions of the Treatment of Offenders Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 (the Act). The Governor of Hydebank reported to the Director of Prison Operations in the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) and we were told by a former Governor, Mr Murray, that the Director in his time, Mr Kendrick, would make frequent visits to Hydebank, and carried out rounds of the establishment to satisfy himself that everything was in order.[95] We were also told that officials from the NIO Treatment of Offenders Branch were frequent visitors to Hydebank and attended a number of routine meetings and that, for example, an official from the NIO chaired the meetings that determined whether a boy should be trusted with orderly status.[96] In addition, as part of the arrangement whereby the HM Chief Inspector of Prisons for England and Wales (HMCIP) inspected one prison in Northern Ireland each year, Hydebank was inspected by HMCIP in June 1982 and again in October/November 1994.

141 We found that the level of direct contact between NIO officials and criminal justice establishments was helpful in relation to funding and policy issues and in enabling the NIO to appreciate the challenges the services were facing. We concluded that more direct engagement by DHSS officials with residential childcare homes could have brought similar advantages.

The impact of organisational change

142 In the evidence it provided for the Governance and Finance module, the HSCB made the point that "from 1973 until 1995, the management arrangements for health and social services were changed repeatedly at the initiative of the Department"[97] and these organisational changes "inevitably impacted upon the stability and development of operational structures as lines of accountability and decision-making had to adjust to fit the new structure."[98]

143 The DHSSPS response to this analysis was that these changes were not introduced on a whim but were the implementation of key UK Government policies aimed at strengthening and improving health and personal social services. It pointed out that such changes normally followed consultation by its predecessor bodies, which included consideration of the practical implications of proposed changes, and that it was the responsibility of Boards to ensure that lines of accountability were clear and to provide training and guidance to their staff to ensure that they could fulfil their roles in a responsible and effective manner.[99]

144 We accepted that new structures were introduced with the intention of improving the delivery of services, but considered that the HSCB made a valid point about the disruption and distraction caused by reorganisations. It was clear from the evidence we heard that the transfer of responsibilities from welfare authorities to Boards took some time to settle down. This situation was made more complex when it involved a multi-professional staff group working in one small unit, as was the case in Lissue Hospital.

145 We considered Lissue Hospital in relation to the residential care it provided to children. We found that following re-organisation it ended up in 1973 with a situation whereby nursing staff were accountable to a Chief Administrative Nursing Officer, based in Lisburn, consultant psychiatrists were accountable to the EHSSB, social workers were accountable to the North and West Belfast Trust and psychologists were accountable to the Royal Group of Hospitals Trust. Witnesses who worked in Lissue told us that this complicated set of governance arrangements resulted in a multiplicity of accountability and communication lines and a lack of overall strategic management of Lissue.

98 GOV 797.
99 GOV 797.

146 Although this is a very particular and somewhat extreme example it does point to the importance of ensuring that the effects of high-level organisational and structural change on the delivery of services, particularly niche services, are fully identified and addressed.

Conclusions about Governance

147 Although the importance of regular monitoring and inspection of residential childcare services was given legislative force, it was not sufficiently or consistently implemented to provide the intended safeguards. We found that a lack of clarity about who was the Administering Authority for some voluntary children's homes meant that required monitoring did not take place and it was not enforced by the inspectorates. Although the structures and arrangements for internal line management and monitoring were generally better for statutory homes, we also found inconsistencies in how monitoring policies were implemented and at times an apparent inability of managers and Committee members to move beyond identifying problems to addressing them.

148 We found that the lack of inspection by SWAG was due to a lack of resources for inspection activities rather than a policy decision. We also noted that while inspectors accurately identified issues and recommended appropriate remedial action, their follow-up to ensure action had been taken was less consistent, even when the same issues were identified through subsequent inspection activity. For example, in relation to Nazareth House, Derry, recommendations about staffing levels, staff structures and deployment of staff were made in 1983, 1986, 1989, 1991, 1992 and 1993, and recommendations about the need for more adequate staff supervision/professional support arrangements were made in 1983, 1986, 1989, 1991, 1992, 1994 and 1995.

149 We also noted a lack of assertiveness in enforcing statutory requirements. We understood the concern to maintain an appropriate distance from service delivery and avoid any undermining of the responsibilities of service providers. However we considered that at times MoHA and SWAG were not as effective as intended, because as well as not being adequately resourced to carry out their duties in a timely manner, they did not use the authority vested in them to enforce requirements and were not persistent in requiring action.

150 We considered that closer involvement by DHSS officials in the oversight of the scrutiny of children's homes could have led to a quicker realisation that internal monitoring of children's homes needed to be strengthened and that the resources of SWAG needed to be increased in order for external scrutiny to be delivered to an adequate level.

151 However, we recognised that the DHSS responded constructively to the recommendations of the Sheridan Report and the Hughes Report and worked collaboratively with the Boards and voluntary organisations to improve the monitoring and inspection of children's homes. We also recognised that SWAG staff contributed to this work alongside a demanding inspection schedule, and that from that time on there was a significant improvement in the standards of care and practice in children's homes.

152 The DHSS also took a proactive role in increasing the qualification profile of residential childcare staff, including contributing to the costs of staff in voluntary children's homes achieving professional qualifications. This initiative was successful to the extent that in time Northern Ireland had a better level of qualified residential childcare staff than any other country in the United Kingdom.

153 It is also important to acknowledge that statutory and voluntary agencies worked hard to co-operate with these initiatives and did so at a time when they were providing services within very challenging social and economic circumstances, which were exacerbated by the political unrest.

Part Two: Finance

Funding of voluntary children's homes

154 As previously explained, prior to the reorganisation of local government administration that commenced in 1946, the Poor Law system operated in Northern Ireland. Boards of Guardians were responsible for securing the care and welfare of children whose parents or guardians were unable or were deemed unfit to look after them. The majority of voluntary children's homes at that time were run by Roman Catholic religious orders. These homes were established in response to the considerable poverty and need in the Roman Catholic communities and by a desire of the Roman Catholic Church to ensure that children born into that faith were brought up in it. Roman Catholic bishops asked religious orders such as the Sisters of Nazareth and the Sisters of St Louis to run children's homes in the province and the funding of the homes came mainly from public donations and legacies.

155 For example, the Sisters of Nazareth in Belfast and Londonderry depended on the door to door collections made by nuns in the cities and surrounding countryside, which were supplemented by the produce from the farms situated in Nazareth Lodge and Termonbacca and the Government funding granted to these farms. In Belfast, the fund-raising expertise of Brother Stephen Kelly of the De La Salle order contributed greatly to meeting the costs of the care and after-care of boys in St Patrick's and Rubane. However, despite the significant generosity of the Roman Catholic communities towards these homes, the level of poverty particularly in the 1920s to the 1960s, coupled with the commitment of religious orders that those in need should not be turned away, meant that up until the late 1960s many of these voluntary children's homes were overpopulated and under-resourced.

156 It was not only homes for Roman Catholic children that depended on public support and donations. The Irish Church Mission which ran Manor House, a children's home in Lisburn, also depended on public donations and paid two collectors to seek contributions and collect them. When one of the collectors had to resign through ill health and there was a delay in the appointment of her successor the home experienced a significant loss of necessary revenue.

Welfare Authorities contributing to the funding of voluntary homes

157 Following the reorganisation of local government in 1946, County Councils and County Boroughs received revenue funding from various sources, including local rates and government grants and were required to establish welfare authorities. The CYPA 1950 placed duties and powers on these welfare authorities to establish children's homes and to contribute towards the welfare of children they placed in voluntary homes. The DHSSPS explained in its evidence to us that this latter provision marked the beginning of mandated state support to the voluntary residential children's sector.[100] Welfare authorities were also empowered to recover contributions from the parents of children in their care, but their circumstances were usually such that any contributions were negligible.

158 The MoHA maintained an oversight of the financial arrangements between welfare authorities and voluntary homes. While Section 118(2) of the CYPA 1950 enabled welfare authorities to contribute to the costs of care for children they placed in voluntary homes, Section 90(5) of the Act legislated that the MoHA had to approve the rates of payments to be made and that the rates could only be changed with its approval.

159 The CYPA 1950 also provided that the MoHA could provide financial support to voluntary children's homes to assist them to improve their premises and augment their qualified staff. Under Section 119(2) of CYPA 1950, the MoHA recouped 50% of the grants it paid to voluntary agencies for these purposes from the welfare authorities. The proportion of the cost each welfare authority was required to pay was determined on the basis of its population size. The welfare authorities were not happy about this arrangement because they were required to contribute to funding grants which they had no say in approving. They pointed out that this lack of consultation made it difficult for them to predict what element of their budget they needed to reserve each financial year for funding of voluntary children's homes. The welfare authorities were particularly resistant to having to contribute to the funding of homes that were not in their locality and which they were therefore unlikely to use.

160 As explained in the chapter dealing with the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Londonderry, the County Londonderry Welfare Committee was particularly resistant to these funding arrangements. An internal MoHA memorandum dated April 1953 referred to Londonderry Welfare Committee's description of the arrangements as "taxation without representation" and its request that welfare authorities should be consulted in advance about grant applications.[101] The MoHA decided that since the amounts involved were small the delays that would be caused by consulting with welfare authorities in advance and dealing with any disputes about whether funding should be granted would not be justified, and that therefore the funding decisions should remain in its hands. At a subsequent meeting with the Association of Welfare Committees on 26 February 1954, MoHA officials pointed out that giving grants to voluntary homes was:

> "... more economical than direct provision of new Homes by Welfare Authorities, as the Voluntary Homes do not charge full rate, as they have their own voluntary fund and labour. In fact there was the question as to whether there should not be a halt to the provision of Statutory Homes and the using of more Voluntary Homes."[102]

161 However, in response to the continuing concerns expressed by the welfare authorities, MoHA officials agreed to give them as much advance notice as possible about proposed expenditure in a current year and provisions for the following year, and we saw evidence in the minutes of later meetings between MoHA officials and the Association of Welfare Authorities that this notice was provided. Also, in 1955, the MoHA established the Children's Homes and Training Schools Committee under the chairmanship of Miss Bessie Maconachie, MP:

> "to advise the Minister whether or not the circumstances appear to be such as to call for special financial assistance from public funds under the Act."

The committee contained representatives of the churches, the Child Welfare Council and welfare authorities.

162 It was clear from a memorandum that a MoHA official sent to his Minister in July 1958 that officials were keen for welfare authorities to provide more financial assistance to voluntary children's homes. The official set out his view that Section 118 (2) of the 1950 Act could and should be used more widely:

> "...if the welfare authority feels that the managers of a children's home in their area are, in fact, helping and relieving them indirectly of looking after children, some of whom would otherwise fall to be taken into care and perhaps housed by the welfare authority, and if that Home is finding it impossible to make ends meet it is a legitimate and proper thing, and incidentally good business, to make a contribution to the Home's general funds by a grant under sub section (2)".[103]

163 Somewhat ironically this enabling interpretation of the legislation was provided in the context of the official advising the Minister that the Londonderry County Borough Welfare Council's proposed grant of £1,000 to Termonbacca Children's home to address its serious financial position should not be approved. The official offered this advice on the basis that the accounts provided by the Sisters of Nazareth to support the grant application showed that the home benefitted at times of financial need from loans from its mother house that it was not under pressure to repay. Therefore, he concluded the true financial situation of the home was not sufficiently bad to justify approval of the grant.[104]

164 While recommending that the grant should not be approved the official accepted:

> "...there is no doubt whatever that this Home by its activities has in the past and will in the future relieve the rate-payer and the tax-payer of very considerable sums on Child Welfare, compared with which the proposed grant of £1,000 is a trifle, but, of course, the same thing could be said of a dozen other voluntary organisations in Northern Ireland."[105]

MoHA grants to voluntary homes

165 This approach derived from a fundamental expectation of the Government that voluntary children's homes should be funded through voluntary effort. This was made clear in the guidance provided to voluntary organisations about applying to the MoHA for grants under section 118(1) of the CYPA 1950. That guidance stated:

> "The Ministry does not intend that these grants should weaken voluntary effort by taking the place of voluntary donations and endowments and it is thought the larger organisations will have adequate income from such sources to meet their requirements. Where for example, an application is made in respect of one of a number of homes run by a voluntary organisation, the resources of the organisation as a whole will be taken into consideration".[106]

166 This requirement that the resources of a whole organisation should be taken into consideration created significant difficulties for Termonbacca in 1959 when approval for funding to make improvements to its accommodation for children was delayed because the Mother House, which was located in Hammersmith in London was reluctant to provide required information about its overall funding situation. This reluctance to provide financial information also contributed to delays in Nazareth House Belfast applying for available grants at a time when the conditions in the home were in dire need of improvement. In Module 1, Sister Brenda McCall on behalf of the Sisters of Nazareth confirmed that in the 1950s and 1960s the Congregation's policy was to maintain complete secrecy in relation to its financial affairs. She explained that only the Superior General and her council would have known what funds the congregation had at its disposal[107] and accepted that the secrecy around finances created delays in homes receiving necessary state funding.[108]

167 Sister Brenda McCall also indicated that sisters may have been reluctant at that time to accept funding from social services for fear that "their voluntary status might be taken off them" or that it would lead to the children not being brought up in the Catholic faith.[109] Former senior managers of social services departments (Bob Bunting and Robert Moore) also suggested that religious orders may have been reluctant to accept grants from the State for fear that could lead to an undermining of their independence and their right to decide on admissions to homes and how they should operate.

168 It was also clear that there was some political reluctance in relation to the provision of grants. For example, when Nazareth House Derry made an application for a grant towards the provision of a new play hall the Unionist MP for the City of Derry, E.W. Jones QC MP, wrote to the then Minister of Home Affairs, G.B. Hanna QC MP:

107 Day 35, pp.170 and 171.
108 Day 35, pp.172 and 173.
109 Day 35, p.205.

> "On further reflection about this matter I am even more strongly convinced that this Grant should not be made at any time but particularly at the present time when public monies should be so carefully guarded."[110]

169 Contemporaneous internal MoHA documentation showed that there was a view that it was inappropriate to fund the development and extension of voluntary homes when statutory children's homes were becoming increasingly available. In a memo of 18 October 1957 a senior civil servant concluded in his report to the then Minister of Home Affairs, Walter Topping, about a meeting officials had with the De la Salle Order regarding plans to extend its home in Rubane:

> "I think the remedy lies with the Roman Church. If it is the determined policy of that Church to foster Voluntary Homes to the exclusion of the Welfare Authorities then they must be prepared to do so at their own expense".[111]

170 While there were difficulties and delays surrounding the provision of government grants to voluntary homes it is important to acknowledge that when they were provided they were used to good effect to significantly improve the design and fabric of homes and increase the facilities available to children. Therefore, it is important to acknowledge that the state increasingly recognised its responsibility to the children in voluntary homes and that led to funding for placements there.

Funding of placements in voluntary children's homes

171 The Child Welfare Committee (CWC) referred to above, published a report Children in Care in 1956 in which it was observed that although welfare authorities were empowered to pay maintenance grants for children they placed in voluntary homes this was of limited assistance to many voluntary organisations, as the greater proportion of children in their homes were placed there on a private basis. The CWC concluded that it could not recommend any form of grant-aid for a child placed in a home without reference to a welfare authority because such a practice "would raise problems of policy in relation to the further public control of the management of Voluntary Homes".[112] It recommended that it should be a duty of voluntary homes to seek the advice and help of welfare authorities before admitting a child to a home.[113] It further recommended in its 1960 report Operation of the Social Services in Relation to Child Welfare that a period of one month should be allowed following the admission of children on a private basis to a voluntary home, during which time welfare authorities would not regard these children as being 'technically in care' of the voluntary organisation until the question of financial responsibility had been fully discussed.[114]

112 HIA 1766.

CWC report Role of Voluntary Homes in Child Care

172 The CWC commented in its 1966 report Role of Voluntary Homes in Child Care that these recommendations were not accepted because the voluntary homes were concerned that they would interfere with their "essential liberty to admit children privately, confidentially and at their own discretion"[115] and the welfare authorities were concerned they would create difficulties when assessing respective responsibilities. The CWC also noted that welfare authorities were unwilling to co-operate with some voluntary homes because they saw them as too ready to accept children without adequate investigation of their circumstances, and/or they implemented a rigid segregation of age groups and sexes which they considered was inappropriate for many children requiring residential care.

173 The attitudes of parents were also identified as significant. The CWC recognised that parents of illegitimate children in particular might be reluctant to discuss their situation with a public authority. It also acknowledged that some parents were of the view that only a home which operated under the auspices of their own church could ensure their children's religious upbringing.

174 The CWC categorised admissions to voluntary homes under three headings:

- Non Statutory Cases – children accepted into voluntary homes by purely private arrangements with their parents or guardians;
- Quasi Statutory Cases – children admitted privately to voluntary homes who although not in local authority care, might have been placed in the voluntary homes if the question of their admission had been raised with the Welfare Authority; and,

115 HIA 556.

- Agency Cases – children who were in the care of a Welfare Authority and placed in voluntary homes by it.[116]

175 It provided statistics as of 31 March 1965 which showed that out of a total number of 822 children in voluntary children's homes only 238 had been placed there by welfare authorities; the remaining 584 children had been placed through private arrangements and therefore no state funding was available for their care. A similar picture emerged in relation to the 131 children in the care of voluntary organisations who had been boarded-out; only twenty-one of these children were funded by welfare authorities. This meant that in total only 259 out of 953 children in the care of voluntary organisations were "Agency" children. The remaining 694 children, 32% of all children in care in Northern Ireland at that time, were being cared for on a private basis. The CWC compared this situation to that in England and Wales, where 17% of children were in care on a private basis, and Scotland, where 15% of children were in care on a private basis.[117]

176 To assess the impact of this funding situation the CWC asked voluntary agencies to provide information about their finances, but only received responses from ten homes. Two of these homes said they had adequate resources while the other eight said they had not and were hampered by lack of finance in improving accommodation, providing basic amenities and employing staff.[118]

177 The CWC also noted that even where welfare authorities were paying fees for children they placed in voluntary homes the fees did not cover the full cost of maintaining children in the home and were considerably less than the level of funding required to maintain a child in a statutory home. The CWC advised voluntary agencies to charge the full cost, but observed that in order to do so they would need to get their accounts into order.[119]

178 The CWC concluded:

> "…the solution here lies very largely with the homes themselves: many could get considerably more assistance than they do at present from public funds by early and close liaison with welfare authorities where there is a possibility that a child may be eligible for reception into care". [120]

Welfare Authorities taking responsibility for children placed voluntarily in homes

179 These discussions about the respective responsibilities of voluntary homes and welfare authorities in relation to the reception of children into care continued until the mid-1970s. Increasingly by that time the majority of children were placed in voluntary homes by welfare authorities. However, there continued to be a number of children who had been placed in the homes in previous years on a private basis and whose care was still being paid for by the religious orders running the homes. This was the case in Rubane. In 1971 the financial burden of repaying debt incurred through renovating the home and the increased costs of maintaining the property led the brother in charge, BR 2, to ask relevant welfare authorities to take on the support of the remaining twenty boys who had been placed in the home on a voluntary basis.[121]

180 The Belfast Welfare Authority responded positively to this request, but on the basis of two important provisos: firstly, that the boys' files must be provided so that contact could be made with any families they might have and the possibility of reconnection explored; secondly, it was made clear to the De La Salle Order that in future placements would have to be agreed in advance and that it would not be acceptable for the Order to accept voluntary placements and then expect the welfare authorities to fund them. We considered that these were appropriate provisos which sought to prevent children remaining in care if that could be avoided, and to avoid children being admitted to care without other interventions being explored. The provisos were also in keeping with the philosophy of the 1968 CYPA, which for the first time established prevention as an underlying principle in childcare practice and introduced discretionary powers to provide families with material help as a means of preventing children being placed in care.[122] This was an important principle, as it was clear from the records of voluntary homes we considered that many children were placed on a private basis in homes because their parents were unable to provide for them and, in particular, fathers were unable to work and care for their children when their wives were absent due to ill health or death.

Impact of restructuring of local Government

181 When local government was restructured in 1973 the DHSS retained the legal responsibility for registering voluntary children's homes and for grant-aiding any improvements which involved capital expenditure. Grant-aid was based on Government granting up to 75% of full costs; the voluntary organisation had to fund the remaining 25% of the costs. Also, where grants were funded, requirements were placed on the voluntary organisation that they had to repay all or part of the money if it ceased to provide the relevant service within a certain number of years.

182 The DHSSPS told us that as part of the restructuring of local government the DHSS actively encouraged the newly established HSSBs to support their local voluntary sector. In a Circular published in December 1974 Support for Voluntary Organisations[123] the DHSS clarified that its role was to support voluntary bodies that operated at a regional level financially, and that the Boards would be locally responsible for supporting voluntary bodies within their geographic area. The Circular outlined the Boards' statutory powers to make contractual arrangements and make grants with voluntary organisations for the provision of social services and to make available premises, vehicles, equipment, etc to assist voluntary organisations for the provision of social services. The Department clarified that the Boards' annual allocation covered support for voluntary organisations and that it did not propose to earmark funds for these bodies.[124]

183 In the mid-1970s the funding of voluntary homes improved when the HSSBs agreed to move from paying maintenance costs for individual children they placed in voluntary homes to making "per capita" payments, which would include a contribution towards the running costs of the homes. Bob Bunting told us that he took the initiative to introduce this approach in the EHSSB area. He provided us with a copy of a report he presented to the EHSSB which explained the limitations of the previous maintenance fees. These included that they did not cover all costs, and additional grants had to be paid as the need arose, for example to pay the costs of holidays. More fundamentally, since voluntary organisations contributed towards the general running costs of the homes they were "indirectly subscribing to the upkeep of children who were in the care of

Welfare Authorities".[125] The EHSSB agreed to pay the per capita rate for children who had been placed in Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge on a voluntary basis, which significantly improved the funding of these homes.

184 The new per capita rate was based on the annual running costs of the home minus the voluntary/charitable income that the voluntary organisation was expected to raise divided by the number of places to be provided by the voluntary home. Bob Bunting explained that the expectation was that the voluntary organisations would contribute up to 5% of the total revenue expenditure.

185 In October 1978 the DHSS wrote to the Boards to inform them that it was giving them greater flexibility to provide financial assistance to voluntary agencies. This greater flexibility included increasing the Boards' authority to pay grants without Departmental approval up to a limit of £25,000 and 90% of expenditure, and giving Boards authority to pay capital grants of up to £5,000 to voluntary agencies without Departmental approval. The DHSS also recognised the need for prompt payment of grant and allowed that, where necessary, a proportion of a grant could be paid in advance on the basis of estimates of expenditure.[126]

186 The Boards reviewed per capita rates annually and, at times, additional allocations for specific needs continued to be made to voluntary homes. Bob Bunting explained that this arrangement worked up until 1980, when a decrease in occupancy levels in voluntary homes increased the per capita maintenance costs. He pointed out that despite a challenging financial climate for the EHSSB, weekly per capita maintenance rates to voluntary homes were increased, and one-off grants were made to cover deficits which had arisen because of low occupancy rates, but even these measures were not sufficient to cover the full operational costs of homes. We saw evidence of this approach; the EHSSB made a deficit payment of £45,000 to Nazareth Lodge for the year ended 31 March 1982 and in 1987 agreed to increase the weekly per capita payment for children placed in the home from £80 to £147 conditional on two additional staff being employed in each of the four groups of children in the home.[127]

The Statutory/Voluntary Relationship in the Provision of Residential Child Care

187 As indicated above, in January 1989 the DHSS issued a discussion paper entitled The Statutory/Voluntary Relationship in the Provision of Residential Child Care to Boards and voluntary bodies. As part of the discussions prompted by that paper, EHSSB officers proposed that in order to ensure the financial viability of the voluntary children's homes in its area a fee would be paid for an agreed number of places in each home regardless of occupancy levels but on the basis that the relevant voluntary organisations should contribute up to 5% of the costs of their homes.[128] The voluntary organisations argued that each home's capacity to make such a contribution should be reviewed on an annual basis. They pointed out that they had to bear 25% of the costs of improvements to their homes as a condition of receipt of capital funding grants from Government, and where that applied it would affect a voluntary organisation's capacity to pay a further 5% towards the running costs of the home.

188 When officials found it impossible to agree a way forward in relation to this matter it was referred to the Board, which eventually confirmed its intention to try and meet the total deficits arising from the shortfalls in funding the agreed operational expenditure for the voluntary homes at the end of each financial year, taking into account any contribution from the voluntary home towards the running costs.[129] This compromise maintained the principle of voluntary organisations contributing to the costs while accepting that their ability to do so would depend on the other demands on their available funding. This intention was confirmed at an annual meeting between representatives of the Board and voluntary children's homes held on 12 September 1988.[130]

189 The Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry experienced similar difficulties when falling numbers in the home increased the cost of overheads. Although the WHSSB increased the weekly per capita rate it paid per child from £88.34 at December 1985 to £173 in December 1987, the homes continued to struggle to meet its costs. The SSI intervened to request the Board to address the financial difficulties experienced by the home, and the Board accepted that the Sisters of Nazareth had a justified case in seeking an increase in the weekly per capita rate. To assist the situation, the DHSS gave the WHSSB £65,000 in 1987 to provide additional assistance for voluntary children's homes. The WHSSB used £47,642 of this funding to pay off the home's 1985/86 budget deficit, but further additional funding was required in succeeding years to pay off substantial deficits and the Sisters of Nazareth made the case that care in the home was compromised because of lack of funding. In an internal SSI memo written in July 1992 by an inspector, Marion Reynolds, about her visits to children's homes in the WHSSB she recorded that the sister in charge of Nazareth House, SR 2, had written to Dominic Burke to advise him that the quality of care available in the home was being adversely affected by the current staffing levels.[131]

190 In the early 1990s, responsibility for the purchase of children's residential care services was delegated to the newly established Health and Social Services' Trust. Trusts entered into detailed annual contractual arrangements with voluntary sector providers regarding matters such as: the aims and purpose of the home within the Board/Trust's children's services plans; the standards expected of the home; the number of children's places to be provided; and, the rate at which these would be purchased by Trusts. Such contractual arrangements were also based on an expectation that a proportion of the costs of providing the service would be met by charitable income.

Conclusions about voluntary children's homes

191 It was ironic that as the religious orders were able, through the funding they received for weekly per-capita fees and capital grants, to improve the physical conditions and amenities of their large homes, the demand for placements in these homes began to steadily decline. This decline raised the overhead costs of the homes and meant that the orders remained in financial difficulties. The lack of demand for placements was due to a range of factors including: more statutory homes being built; less stigma about single parenthood/illegitimacy, which reduced the number of young children coming into care and consequently reduced the length of time children stayed in homes; smaller families; more welfare assistance for families experiencing poverty; emphasis on preventive work to assist children to remain with their families; a preference for fostering where accommodation away from home was required and where residential care was required a policy of accommodating children as close to their own communities as possible. This trend was best illustrated by the case of Rubane, where for years inadequate bedroom and toilet/bathroom facilities existed while discussions about the financing of improvements and what form they should take were ongoing. Not long after the new houses were built some of them had to be shut because of under-occupancy. It was also the case that increasingly the homes were seen as less equipped to meet the challenges of working with the older children coming into care, many of whom displayed disruptive behaviour.

192 We accepted the submission of the Sisters of Nazareth that throughout the period from 1922 to 1995 the Order operated homes under extreme financial stress, which was known to the DHSS, the Boards and their predecessors and that the financial straits under which they were operating had an impact on the quality of care they were able to provide.[132] The same could be said of the De La Salle home in Rubane.

193 We concluded that from the 1920s to the 1960s many children of Northern Ireland were accommodated in large, overcrowded and understaffed homes, some of which had inadequate basic facilities. Staff shortages led to a lack of supervision and dependence on older children to supervise younger children, which created the circumstances in which children were physically and sexually abused.

194 We recognised that Government departments had a responsibility to ensure that public money was spent wisely and that religious orders should have been prepared to provide financial information to support funding applications. It was also the case that children were accepted into voluntary homes when at times there was not sufficient space or resources to care for them properly and where little or no consideration had been given to whether their birth families could have been supported to continue to care for them. However, as will be clear in the chapters dealing with individual homes, we were critical of the lack of financial assistance, and/or significant delays in the provision of it, to large Roman Catholic homes when it was clear from inspectors' reports that the physical conditions in the homes required urgent improvement, and that too few over-worked and untrained religious staff were caring for large numbers of children. Although many of the children in these homes had been admitted without any reference to or involvement of statutory authorities, they were still ultimately children of the state and their welfare was its responsibility. We are aware that particularly in the 1920s through to the 1960s many children were also living in poor physical conditions in their family homes, but the children in the voluntary homes did not have the advantage of parental and wider family care. Many of the witnesses we heard from told us they felt alone, scared and unloved.

Funding of training schools

195 One aspect of the voluntary care of children that attracted funding even in the 1920s was that provided in industrial schools and then training schools. The 1908 Children and Young Persons Act provided the Chief Secretary with powers to recommend that monies be paid from Treasury towards the expense of any child or youthful offender up to certain limits, and also legislated for local councils to provide for children's reception and maintenance in the schools. Industrial schools run by voluntary organisations could also receive children privately admitted to care. The funding of voluntary placements had to come from voluntary subscriptions and donations, to the body responsible for the school.

196 In January 1922 the Minister of Home Affairs established a Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Northern Ireland, which reported in June 1923. The Committee recognised that many schools were operating under extreme financial pressure because falling numbers meant overheads were high and that in some schools children were involved in trade activities rather than educational pursuits in order to raise funds. The Committee recommended that funding of homes should be by capitation grant of 2/6d per head, per week from the Government and an equal amount provided by local authorities.[133]

197 The MoHA reported to the Governor of Northern Ireland in 1927 that Government grants of 7/6d per week were being paid for each child in an industrial school and that county boroughs were required to make an average payment of 5/- per head, per week for children from their areas accommodated in the schools. The report also noted that while the amount of parental contributions for the year was just over £657 that contribution was:

> "...a valuable method of impressing upon certain types of parents their responsibility for the maintenance of their children and is enforced in every case where this can be done without undue hardship".[134]

198 The 1950 CYPA set out the circumstances in which a child could be committed to a training school. The subsequent 1952 Training School Rules[135] set out how training schools should be managed and run. The responsibilities of the Board of Management of schools were set down and these included appointing a finance committee and exercising effective control over all expenditure.[136]

199 Article 150 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968[137] brought in new funding arrangements, confirming that funding for training schools was to be provided and controlled by central government. Grants which were to cover the full costs of maintaining a child in a training school, were administered by the MoHA and then in due course the NIO.

200 The DHSSPS and the NIO provided information about the financial relationship between the NIO and training schools. Schools were accountable to the NIO for the management of their expenditure and had to furnish the NIO with reports and accounts on request and comply with any directions by the NIO in respect of such records and accounts. They also had to submit quarterly and annual estimates of expenditure and maintain financial records enabling the school to monitor spending and plan their future operation. Also, although Boards of Management had responsibility for acquiring and releasing staff, staff could only be appointed after approval was obtained from the MoHA and then the NIO.

201 As will be clear from the chapters dealing with juvenile justice establishments, we found that on the whole from 1950 training schools were better funded than children's homes and, in particular, voluntary children's homes. The NIO closely monitored the schools and met regularly with representatives of the Boards of Management and senior staff. A clear benefit to the schools of this monitoring was that officials were alert to the financial needs of schools, for example to appoint new staff, improve and extend facilities, remedy damage to the fabric of a school, and generally responded to them in a sympathetic and prompt manner. Although there were examples of where shortages of staff affected the operation of schools we found that access to funding was less contentious and more forthcoming. We concluded that was because training schools were meeting a statutory function that was intended in part to ensure community safety and provide public protection.

Funding of statutory residential childcare

202 When the Health and Social Services Boards were established on 1 October 1973, one of the responsibilities allocated to them was the administration of childcare services on behalf of the DHSS. While the DHSS retained responsibility for policy, strategic planning and resource allocation, the Boards were given responsibility for operational planning and provision of services.[138] A committees and advisory structure was developed for Area Boards, which included each Board having a Personal Social Services Committee which inter alia had responsibility for discharging the Board's statutory duties with regard to children and young persons.[139]

203 As we have outlined above, the level of funding available to each welfare authority, and then Board, and the amount it paid in placement fees to voluntary children's homes had a very significant impact on the level of funding available to those homes and, for example, the level of staffing they could afford. The same was obviously the case in relation to statutory children's homes, where the level of funding allocated to each home determined staffing levels and the training opportunities available to staff and the physical layout and maintenance of the home.

204 We heard evidence about three statutory children's homes, Kincora, a hostel for boys run by the EHSSB, and Fort James and Harberton House, children's homes run by the WHSSB. In relation to Kincora, we found that the staffing levels in the hostel were always below those recommended in the Castle Priory guidelines and that for the first six years it operated there was only one member of care staff. However, it was clear that once the post of assistant warden was created, subsequent occasions when the warden had to work alone were due to difficulties in recruiting an assistant warden rather than any lack of funding for that post. There was also evidence that resources were invested in improving the physical layout of the home, for example adding staff accommodation so that the warden who lived in could have more separate sleeping accommodation and no longer had to share a bathroom with the boys. We received no complaints about the facilities provided to the boys and positive reports about the efforts to secure them work experience and employment.

205 The evidence we received about Fort James and Harberton House raised significant issues about how the WHSSB's lack of funding for its childcare services adversely affected the operation and staffing of these children's homes. This evidence also raised the more fundamental question of whether the WHSSB's lack of funding for childcare services was as a result of historic underfunding of the North West of the province by the Government. The evidence we received in the Governance and Finance module highlighted the complexities and tensions surrounding the allocation of core funding to the Boards. We decided that consideration of these general funding issues was relevant because of the context they created for the WHSSB's attempts to secure additional funding for its childcare services after peer sexual abuse was detected in Harberton House.

Allocation of core funding to Boards

206 The funding of the Boards was determined by the distribution of the Northern Ireland block grant received from Westminster. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland had autonomy to determine the allocation across spending Departments, including the then DHSS. The bidding for resources by Departments and allocation of resources was managed by the Northern Ireland Department of Finance and Personnel.

207 The Boards were entirely dependent on the funding they received from the DHSS. Each Board's allocation in 1973 was made up of monies previously allocated to the bodies formerly responsible for the provision of health and social services within its area. Where an existing body or service's field of responsibility straddled the boundaries of Boards, an apportionment of funds was made on the basis of population and agreed with the Boards concerned.

208 When giving evidence in Module 5 of the Inquiry Dominic Burke, a former senior manager of the WHSSB, indicated that because the funding allocations to the Boards were based on the historical income of their predecessor County Council Welfare Committees, the WHSSB was at a funding disadvantage from the beginning. He explained:

> "The budgets in those days were -- the county councils received their money from the rates paid to them from businesses and domestic houses in the area. In areas like Belfast or County Down, County Antrim to some extent, the amount of rates raised was clearly greater there than it was in the west of the province and in and around County Londonderry, the city of Derry and Tyrone and Fermanagh. So there was an underlying discrepancy, as it were, or deficit with regard to the funding in the West, and while it moved forward, that underlying deficit wasn't addressed for a long time. From time to time it was, but not consistently."[140]

209 Tom Frawley held a number of senior positions in the WHSSB and was ultimately the General Manager of the Board. Mr Frawley provided a statement for Module 5 in which he set out the particular challenges faced by the WHSSB and the significant calls on the funding available to it. He explained that when the Boards were established in 1973, while the population of the Western area represented approximately 16% of the total population of Northern Ireland, 25% of the people who lived in the area were less than fourteen years of age and 10.5% were over 65 years of age. He pointed out that the population of the Western area was amongst the most disadvantaged in Northern Ireland:

> "....the area had the worst record in Northern Ireland for unfit dwellings and for overcrowding; had the most socially and economically deprived population in the Province; had one of the highest incidents of heart diseases in the world and one of the highest unemployment rates in the United Kingdom".[141]

210 He also pointed out that while at that time the average density for the Western area was 56 persons per square kilometre, it ranged from 29 persons per square kilometre in Fermanagh to 262 persons per square kilometre in Derry. He explained that this range meant the WHSSB had to respond to very different types of service need and faced a considerable challenge in ensuring that services were as accessible as possible.[142]

211 While we accepted Mr Frawley's analysis of the particular challenges facing the WHSSB, we recognised that other Boards were also having to handle the organisational and funding implications of reorganisation and integration of health and social services. For example, Bob Bunting, a senior manager in the EHSSB, pointed out that reorganisation had created an imbalance in the size of Boards which left the EHSSB responsible for serving over 40% of the Northern Ireland population. He explained that this meant it had to be organised into six districts to ensure the effective delivery of services and that resources such as children's homes had to be shared and were no longer managed centrally. He also pointed out that the EHSSB's catchment area included Belfast with some of the most socially deprived inner-city areas in Europe, which was recognised during the 1970s when the EHSSB area was included in European Union initiatives to address social disadvantage in what were categorised as "Areas of Special Social need".[143] It was also the case that the EHSSB argued that the core funding it received did not take sufficient account of the costs it bore in providing specialist medical services for the whole of the province and medical training.

212 When the Boards were first established, the Personal Social Services (PSS) element of the budget was safeguarded by being separately earmarked in the annual allocations made to the Boards by the DHSS. This was in order to ensure that PSS resources were not diverted to address health needs. Each Board had a range of Programmes of Care such as Acute Care, Mental Health, Physical Disability and Family and Child Care, and had to decide how to allocate its grant across these Programmes of Care so that it could meet its statutory responsibilities and the related policy aims and objectives set by the DHSS.

213 Dominic Burke told us that funding for existing services, such as residential childcare services, took the 'lion's share' of available funding and that there was always a debate about how funding available for allocation to new initiatives might be shared between the different Programmes of Care.[144]

Proposals for the Allocation of Revenue Resources for Health and Social Services (PARR)

214 Following reports on resource allocation in England, Wales and Scotland the DHSS set up a Working Group, which included representatives from the four Boards, to determine a more equitable means of allocating available funding to Boards. The Working Group was asked to provide advice on the fairest way of sharing out the limited financial resources available rather than commenting on the level of funds needed. The report of the Working Group Proposals for the Allocation of Revenue Resources for Health and Social Services (PARR) was published in November 1978.[145]

215 The Working Group acknowledged that although in the years from 1973 some efforts had been made to channel growth money to priority areas and client groups, the general effect of the allocation system had been to perpetuate the historical situation, rather than to reflect any objective measure of the need for services of the population served. To address this situation it recommended the use of a funding formula based on the methodology of the English RAWP (Resource Allocation Working party) formula, which was used to calculate allocation of funding to Regional Health Authorities and on the Revenue Support Grant calculation used in England to calculate social services expenditure requirements for local authorities.

216 The aim was that the formula would enable the distribution of available resources on the basis of the relative needs of the populations served by each Board and also the additional specific costs incurred, in particular by the EHSSB, in providing regional services to patients from outside a Board's area.

217 The resulting funding formula was known as PARR (Proposals for the Allocation of Revenue Resources). PARR operated as follows:

(a) account was taken of the population of each Board's area;

(b) each service areas population was then weighted using factors such as age, sex, and utilisation rates;

(c) adjustments were then made to take account of factors which included mortality rates; incidence levels and rurality;

(d) all the weightings were then brought together in the same proportion as the historic revenue expenditure on each category to arrive at each Board's initial allocation;

(e) general practitioner service costs were excluded from the distribution system and continued to be funded on an actual cost basis; and,

(f) further adjustments were then made on the movement of patients across administrative boundaries (patients resident in one Board area receiving treatment in a hospital administered by another Board) and the additional costs of teaching and other regional responsibilities to arrive at each Board's notional share of revenue resources.

218 Although much of this work was informed by developments in the rest of the UK, the significant difference was that in Northern Ireland the allocation to the Boards included funds for PSS, while in the rest of the UK these remained the responsibility of local authorities.

219 The DHSSPS told us that the Working Group recognised that the social needs of the population were subject to many influences, including employment, income, housing, health and education. It explained that Standardised Mortality Rates (SMRs) were used as a measure of relative need in the Health element and they were also considered relevant for PSS on account of the Department of Health England's conclusions that:

> "On the whole, the evidence suggests that high SMRs are associated, not only with morbidity but also with poor social conditions".[146]

220 The Working Group recommended that it was no longer appropriate to protect the PSS budget in the way described above as it would create 'practical difficulties' in applying the formula and that a single integrated allocation for health and social services should be provided to each Board[147].

An initial allocation was determined for each Board on the basis of:

(a) the sum required for the maintenance of existing levels of services, updated for pay and price increases;

(b) Revenue Consequences of Capital Expenditure (RCCE);

(c) earmarked allocations; and,

(d) a minimum growth allocation to offset the effects of changes in the population structure.[148]

221 The proposed methodology was tested and notional allocations allocated to each Board using the PARR formula were provided in the report. The DHSSPS pointed out that there was very little difference between the actual allocations the Boards received in 1978-79 and the notional PARR allocations and that, in particular, the WHSSB's actual allocation was 0.1% more than the notional allocation calculated by the PARR formula.

146 GOV 443.
147 GOV 472.
148 GOV 553.

222 The report concluded that the use of the PARR formula would produce an equitable allocation amongst the Boards, but that a cautious approach should be taken to its implementation to avoid the potential for disruption of services to patients and clients.

Cautious approach to the implementation of PARR

223 John Hunter held senior posts in the DHSS in the period 1979 to 1996, culminating in his appointment as Chief Executive of the Management Executive for the Health and Personal Social Services in 1990. He confirmed that the recommended cautious approach to the introduction of PARR was adopted. He explained that the agreed policy was to adjust the Boards' historical allocations over time through the differential allocation of growth funds to reflect their relative needs, but avoid any disruption to the health and social services currently being provided.[149] This meant that the existing actual allocations to the Boards continued and were not affected by the PARR calculations. Mr Hunter explained that the speed of adjustment of the Boards' historic allocations to the outcome of the formula was dependent on the size of any additional resources available to the DHSS, together with the capacity of Boards themselves to redeploy resources through efficiency savings.

224 Mr Hunter recalled that all Boards expressed dissatisfaction about the allocation they received and complained about underfunding for service provision. He described these responses as "a perennial problem affecting the Health and Personal Social Services in Northern Ireland and elsewhere".[150] Dr McCoy also told us that all the Boards argued for more funding on an annual basis, and in a response to a question from Senior Counsel indicated that the WHSSB was not necessarily shouting louder or more frequently than the other Boards for funding.[151]

225 Mr Hunter recalled that the EHSSB considered it was under-resourced in regard to its provision of most regional medical services, and also that the WHSSB raised its relative underfunding, arguing that the PARR formula did not adequately take account of the higher levels of social disadvantage in the Western area, which resulted in higher levels of morbidity and social need.

149 GOV 628.
151 Day 126 pp.121 to 122.

226 He told us that as far as he recalled the WHSSB Board never argued through its area and operational planning process that it was under-funded for a particular service. He explained that if the Board had done so he was confident:

> "the Department would have expected the Board to reallocate resources from within, given its responsibility for allocating its budget to best meet the needs of its local population. Had the Department intervened with additional money it would have undermined the Board's responsibility for service provision and management. This would have been contrary to the principle of subsidiarity on which the respective roles of the Department and Boards were based."[152]

227 The WHSSB clearly considered that its overall funding situation, as opposed to its funding for a particular service area, was deficient, and additional core funding from Government was necessary to address the problem. In its Strategic Plan for 1987 to 1992 it included the following as one of its ten major issues:

> "This Board's acknowledged underfunding position, which according to the PARR formulae amounts to almost £6.5 millions limits the scope for achieving cost improvement targets. To secure equity in the geographical distribution of resources continues to be a major issue for the Board."[153]

A Fair Share

228 In order to address this major issue, the WHSSB prepared and submitted a document entitled A Fair Share[154] to the DHSS in February 1987 and asked it to urgently review the method of resource allocation between the four Boards. It made the case that the WHSSB's underfunded revenue baseline resulted in very serious understaffing levels, across all of its Programmes of Care, in comparison with the other Boards. There were few references in the report to childcare, but it did highlight a shortfall of 25 field social workers as of 1 October 1986 compared with DHSS recommended guidelines of one social worker per 5000 of the population.[155] It contrasted its position in relation to numbers of social workers with the other Boards, and showed that while it was in deficit the EHSSB had 54 more social workers than the recommended levels. Although pressures on residential childcare were not specifically mentioned, it was stated that the shortage of qualified social workers meant that services such as fostering, alternative care for disturbed children and boarding-out arrangements were underprovided. It was clear during our consideration of Fort James and Harberton House children's homes that the lack of availability of these wider childcare services adversely affected the operation of these homes.

Review of PARR

229 We saw no evidence of a response from the DHSS to the Fair Share report, but in response to growing criticisms of the PARR methodology, in particular that it did not take account of relative need in the Board areas, the DHSS initiated a review of the methodology in 1987. The Review Group comprised officers from the DHSS and each of the four Boards. It was asked to consider the operation of the PARR formula in terms of how well it measured the relative need for health and social care and also to reflect on related developments in Great Britain. The final report of the review group was published in February 1989.[156]

230 The Review Group carried out a comparison of the actual allocations to the Boards against notional PARR allocations. As referred to above, the initial PARR calculations for 1978-79 had produced a notional distribution of revenue resources that was not markedly different to the actual allocations at that time. The Review Group found that in the intervening years the actual allocations to Boards, which had continued to be made largely on an incremental basis with Boards receiving shares of growth money broadly pro rata to their existing allocations, had increasingly deviated from the notional PARR allocations. It found that the WHSSB and the NHSSB in particular were receiving less than their PARR allocations.

231 The Review Group concluded that these deviations were mainly due to population changes not being reflected in the actual allocations. It identified that while the EHSSB's share of the Northern Ireland population had shrunk from 43.9% in 1978 to 1979 to less than 41% in 1987 to 1988, and its PARR notional share had therefore reduced from 54.4% to 51.3%, its share of actual allocated revenue resources had only declined from 54.4% to 53.9%. The report also showed the disparity between the WHSSB's PARR notional allocation of £96.5m and its actual allocation of

£87.5m. The Review Group commented that it was evident that even with some skewing of available growth in recent years towards the WHSSB, the gap between actual and notional allocations was unlikely to lessen.[157] While the report identified that the EHSSB had received more than its PARR allocation it also made clear that the EHSSB's view was that its regional responsibilities were not adequately reflected in the PARR formula.

232 It also recognised that a number of developments in the intervening period from 1978 had impacted on the PARR process, including that the resource climate had changed and the DHSS had more limited resources available to it. This meant that the original Working Group's expectations that equity of distribution of resources between the Boards could be achieved through differential allocation of growth funds and not redistribution of existing funds, (i.e. baseline cuts), could not be realised. Instead the DHSS was in the situation of trying both to ensure baseline services were adequately funded while keeping pace with demographic changes and medical advances.[158]

233 The Review Group was unable to reach agreement about how the discrepancies between the actual and PARR notional allocations should be addressed, or to resolve the more fundamental issue that the PARR formula served to reinforce existing spending patterns and was influenced by past spending decisions as well as need. To move things forward the DHSS proposed an approach of continued use of the PARR formula but on the basis that broad equalisation, as in moving each Board to its PARR notional funding level, would be pursued without reducing any individual Board's baseline in any year. In order to achieve equalisation on that basis the DHSS proposed that the allocation process should provide for:

(a) uprating of baselines by GDP [Gross Domestic Product] factors;

(b) the identification of earmarked sums for regional and national priorities; and

(c) the allocation of the balance between Boards deployed through operational plans.

234 However, the caveats attached to this approach, which were that the target for equalisation should be to get each Board receiving within plus or minus 2% of its PARR target, and that achieving that target without adjusting current allocations could take up to ten years, were not acceptable to the Boards. The Review Group acknowledged that the positions adopted by the Boards would be unlikely to be resolved through further discussion. Therefore, the members formally noted that they had been unable to reach a consensus on the role of the PARR formula in the future and that this issue would remain to be resolved by the DHSS alone.[159]

235 While agreeing that a Social Deprivation Factor should be included in the PARR formula the Review Group could not identify what it should be and recommended that further work and possibly research should be carried out to determine it.[160] This further work was completed, but was unsuccessful because of a lack of consensus about what social deprivation factor should be used, and how it should interact with the Standardised Mortality Rates and PSS social elements which were already included in the formula.[161]

236 Despite these difficulties, as the DHSPPS pointed out to us, the Review Group concluded that the PARR formula, with identified refinements and amendments, remained a sound and valuable model for identifying the relative needs of the population of each Board. However, we noted that the Review Group added a qualifier that the implications of a new comprehensive planning system would have to be considered. We took this to refer to the new planning system heralded by the DHSS in 1980 in its circular Planning and Monitoring of the Health and Personal Social Services. This circular announced the DHSS's decision to introduce a new and comprehensive planning system that would incorporate both the Boards' views on their areas of need and priorities and the Department's responsibilities for regional policies and priorities. Boards were required, in accordance with DHSS regional policies, guidelines and priorities, to prepare five-year Area Strategic Plans and annual operational planning statements. Each Board was responsible for reviewing services within its area, assessing its needs and determining its priorities in order of importance and developing plans to meet its priorities. The Boards' five-year Area Strategic Plans were to be reviewed by the Department and extended every third year of the planning cycle.

237 Accountability Reviews were introduced in 1980 as a mechanism for reviewing Boards' progress in achieving targets set by Government in its regional strategy and agreed through the Board's own area and operational plans. Mr Hunter could not recall whether the Child Care

Branch was specifically involved in reviewing progress on achieving the childcare objectives set by the DHSS.[162]

238 An Accountability Review of the WHSSB's 1989 Action Plan was held in June 1989 between Mr Elliott, Permanent Secretary of the DHSS, and Mr Frawley.[163] This was four months after the publication of the report of the review of PARR. The record of the review, which was produced by DHSS officials, included commendation for the Board's financial management and ability to meet cost improvement targets, but stressed that the measures to achieve this needed to be carefully monitored to ensure that "targets are achieved without any reduction overall in the level or quality of services available to patients and clients." There was no recorded mention of the Board's position that it was underfunded. While we appreciated that the purpose of the meeting was to review how the WHSSB was meeting its strategic and operational plans within available resources, the total lack of reference to the accepted underfunded position of the WHSSB in relation to its nominal PARR allowance suggested an unhelpful lack of connection between related processes. We considered that the Review Group's question of what the relationships should be between the comprehensive planning system, the PARR formula and resource allocation in general was a pertinent one, unfortunately it appears not to have been addressed.[164]

The position of child care services within integrated services

239 We also noted that apart from an agreement that the Board would review and report on the availability of a Physiotherapy Service for Handicapped Children[165] the only other specific comment recorded on childcare services in the Accountability Review was a reference that the Board would be able to benefit from access to funds reserved by the DHSS to improve child abuse training.[166] The recorded priorities, areas of pressure and of growth related to health services and adult social care. This suggested that, at this time at least, residential childcare was not the highest priority for the Board.

240 Two former officers in charge of Fort James shared their views that social services in general and childcare in particular struggled to get the priority they required within integrated services. Dominic Burke disagreed with these views when they were put to him and he told us that priority was always given to meeting statutory responsibilities. While we accepted that may have been the case within the social services department we considered that, given the range of responsibilities the Board carried, there may have been times when the weight of the health agenda left less focus on the social services agenda. We asked Dr McCoy about this when he gave evidence and he commented:

> "I think it would be a reasonable statement to make that childcare was a bit of a Cinderella within the integrated services that we had so that was in itself a risk. It was a risk for childcare services and the funding of childcare services, yes."[167]

We concluded from this that the risks for the funding of childcare services were even greater within the context of a Board which was underfunded in relation to the agreed funding formula being used at that time.

A Second Review of PARR

241 The WHSSB's dissatisfaction with its actual allocation against its notional PARR allocation continued to grow, and was evident in the minutes of the Board meeting held in May 1991 which recorded the opening remarks of the Chairman of as follows:

> "..He said despite the Board's progress and achievements to date he still had one major continuing disappointment and that was the Board's underfunded situation. In spite of well reasoned arguments put forward by the Board and which in fact had been accepted by the Department, the issue had not been addressed to his satisfaction. He emphasised that the resolution of this issue will be a major priority over the next 12-18 months."[168]

242 In the face of continuing criticism of the PARR methodology, and particularly its ability to identify relative need, and following on from a review of the RAWP methodology in England, a further attempt to identify factors which would allow weightings to be allocated to different needs variables was made in 1994.

243 A Capitation Review Group was established, which included representatives from the Boards. In the report of its work[169] it recognised that to provide a fair and equitable means of allocating resources in response to the need for health and social care, a good formula should take account of the additional needs of certain disadvantaged sections of the population, for example those on low incomes, single parents and those from lower socio-economic groups.

244 The Capitation Review Group recommended that a new formula should be devised based on Programmes of Care rather than service areas to take account of the integration of health and social services and to align better with the DHSS strategic planning process. It proposed a new formula that applied relevant populations to each Programme of Care and weighted them by age/cost relationships, and in some areas adjusted by needs variables.

245 However, although it considered and allowed for the higher prevalence of morbidity amongst certain groups in the acute, elderly, maternity and mental health Programmes of Care, it concluded that it:

> "had to accept that it has no quantifiable evidence of the relationship between population characteristics (other than age and/or sex) and variations in intensity of care need."[170]

246 In relation to the Family and Child Care Programme of Care in particular it concluded:

> "There is no empirically available evidence which could be used to substantiate any particular weighting for any specific needs variable within this programme. Consequently the Review Group cannot make any recommendation in this area at this point in time."[171]

Once again it was identified that the actual allocation to the WHSSB fell below its PARR notional allocation, but the variance had reduced from the 1.5% variance found by the Review Group in 1989 to a 0.2% variance.

247 The final report of the Capitation Review Group was issued in September 1995. It reached agreement to recommend a capitation formula which was an aggregation of the estimate requirements for each Programme of Care, taking account of relevant populations weighted by age/cost relationships and/or needs variables. However, it had to conclude in relation to Family and Child Care that further work was needed to examine how service utilisation by age band is distributed throughout Northern Ireland[172] and to assess what impact if any, potential needs variables have on resource consumption.[173] Mr Hunter recalled that the WHSSB was unhappy with the outcome of the review and that after further representations from it a small adjustment was made to the outcome in the Board's favour.[174]

DHSSPS's views on whether the WHSSB was underfunded

248 In its written evidence the DHSSPS acknowledged the limitations of the PARR formula and the lack of success in identifying and agreeing social deprivation factors that could be applied in the formula to enable account to be taken of relative levels of deprivation. It pointed out that England experienced similar difficulties with its funding formula and that the uniqueness of Northern Ireland in respect of its integrated health and social services meant there was no GB modelling which could be used directly in the Northern Ireland context. Therefore, it suggested that PARR was as robust as possible given the availability and sophistication of data available to the DHSS from 1978 to 1995.

249 The DHSSPS also made the point that whilst PARR was a useful measurement tool it was never 100% accurate, therefore it should not be seen as the sole basis for measuring actual allocations during this period to determine if each Board received its 'fair' share of resources. However, presumably in acknowledgement that PARR was the only measurement tool used and therefore the one that Boards measured their allocations against, the DHSSPS addressed the issue of the WHSSB receiving less than its nominal PARR allocation.

250 It concluded that since the WHSSB was receiving slightly more than its PARR allocation in 1978, that meant that up to that point the WHSSB was not underfunded.[175] In their joint statement for the Governance and Finance module Tom Frawley and Dominic Burke specifically addressed this conclusion. They pointed out that the use of the PARR formula in 1978-79 "was not a conclusion rather it was a starting point"[176] and

173 GOV 593.
174 GOV 630.
175 GOV 426.
176 GOV 721.

that the formula was reviewed, critiqued and refined with each iteration building on the preceding analysis. They pointed to the fact that the review of the formula in 1989 identified that a funding gap of £9 million had built up for the WHSSB as an illustration of this continuous refinement.[177]

251 We are also of the view that the limitations of the PARR formula were such that it would be wrong to make definitive conclusions on the basis of the initial use of the formula to make notional allocations. However, it is equally the case that given the continuing limitations with the formula the conclusions from the 1989 review also have to be treated with caution.

252 The DHSSPS accepted that over a period of time the WHSSB's actual allocations, like a number of other Boards, was less than the notional PARR allocation.[178] However, it told us that the DHSS constantly strove to ensure all Boards received their fair share of the limited funding available and that it was recognised in the report of the 1989 review of the PARR formula that "the Department pushed any available money towards the Western Board."[179] The DHSSPS pointed out that the DHSS's efforts to better align its allocations to the WHSSB resulted in the 1.5% deficit in the actual allocations to the WHSSB received in 1989, compared to its notional PARR allocation, being reduced to a 0.2% deficit by 1995.

253 The DHSSPS added that there was no indication from the WHSSB's Area Strategic Plans or Operational Plans that it was failing to discharge its statutory childcare duties as a consequence of the funding provided to it, or that it had to re-channel resources from non-statutory obligations to discharge its statutory childcare duties. While that may be the case, it is clear in response to the recommendations in the report of the review of co-ordinated peer sexual abuse in Harberton House that the WHSSB made specific requests to the DHSS for additional funding to strengthen its childcare services.

WHSSB seeking funding to improve its childcare services

254 At its meeting in February 1991 the WHSSB's Community Care Committee agreed that the Board's concerns about the need for additional funding for childcare should be communicated to the DHSS. Mr Frawley confirmed that he would:

> "...put forward the case again for the Board's uniquely underfunded situation and ask the Department to consider the matter in the knowledge of the analysis they have sight of and consider making some exceptional arrangement for the Board."[180]

255 Mr Frawley wrote to Mr Hunter setting out the Board's concerns and then met with civil servants to discuss the matter. A civil servant, Mr Green, produced a minute of the meeting in which he recorded that Mr Frawley made clear the Board's continued grievance about its funding deficit and that the DHSS was not doing enough to address it. He recorded that he explained to Mr Frawley that the funding allocations for 1991-92 had been discussed fully with the Boards and could not be unstitched, that there was no reserve held by the Department that could be used to increase the WHSSB's share and that in spite of the limited room to manoeuvre the DHSS had already skewed a further £300,000 to the WHSSB. He also assured Mr Frawley that the DHSS remained fully committed to moving towards a full capitation based funding position. Mr Frawley was not satisfied with these explanations and asked for a meeting with Mr Hunter.[181] This meeting duly took place on 6 March 1991, and Mr Hunter sent a memo to Mr Green about it in which he stated that he provided the same explanations to Mr Frawley as Mr Green had about why the WHSSB's funding allocation for 1991-92 could not be increased. He also explained to Mr Frawley that deliberations on 1992-93 funding allocations would take account of the WHSSB's target allocation and that the Board would be free to use any additional sum to develop childcare services in 1992-93. However, he stated that he made clear:

> "..it was the Board's responsibility to manage any problems which currently exist in respect of the delivery of these services."[182]

256 Mr Frawley subsequently wrote to Mr Hunter on 20 March 1991 to record the WHSSB's Resource Allocation Committee's displeasure at what it perceived as "positive discrimination by the Department against this Board in properly addressing the issue of equity in resource allocation". He went on to state that "Board members felt that their position and that of the Board in relation to both staff and children was becoming untenable".[183]

He concluded his letter:

> "I write this letter not in any way to challenge or threaten the authority of the Department. I merely feel it is essential at this point in a Financial year your Executive and also the Minister should be aware that the Board and its staff will not be able to contain the political dimensions of the failure to address an issue which has now been with us for nearly 20 years."[184]

257 Mr Frawley sent a second letter to Mr Hunter on the same day, in which he reported that the anger and frustration of the WHSSB's Resource Allocation Committee at the failure of the Department to address the PARR issue was particularly felt in relation to childcare "in light of our recent difficulties".[185] He went on to contrast the WHSSB's position with that of the EHSSB, pointing out the number of assessment units and residential childcare facilities available in Belfast. He concluded the letter by putting on record to the Executive the Committee's "deep dismay at the failure to recognise our deficiencies in child care staffing which we believe are directly related to the historically [sic] underfunding of the Board."[186]

258 Just prior to this correspondence Dominic Burke wrote to the Chief Social Work Inspector, Dr McCoy, to make what was to prove an unsuccessful bid for additional funding of £130,000 to develop an assessment and treatment unit at Harberton House. Mr Burke made clear in his letter that the WHSSB was still experiencing sustained pressure within its childcare services.[187]

259 Mr Hunter's view that it was up to the WHSSB to reprioritise the allocation of its funding if it was experiencing pressure in a particular area was reiterated by the DHSSPS in its written evidence to us. When Dr Harrison, representing the DHSSPS, was asked to comment on HSCB's position that the WHSSB was underfunded she responded that all Boards argued that they did not get sufficient money. She pointed out that the comparisons in the Bunting report between the staffing levels in North and West Belfast in comparison to the Foyle Unit of Management[188] were based on allocated funding rather than the overall level of funding provided to the respective Boards, i.e. it was for the WHSSB to decide how to prioritise its funding and how much money to spend on its children's services and social work services.

260 Whilst we accept that it was the responsibility of the WHSSB to manage its resources to best effect in order to meet its statutory responsibilities, we considered that it argued well in the Fair Share report that it was pressed across all of its Programmes of Care and had very limited ability to reprioritise and reallocate funding.

DHSS's attempts to adjust actual allocations

261 However, we also considered that the DHSS was in a similar position in that it had limited growth money to use to adjust actual allocations and it experienced considerable resistance when it attempted to redistribute funding from one Board to another. For example, when the DHSS informed the EHSSB in August 1988 that circa £240,000 of funding previously allocated to it was going to be redistributed to the other Boards, it resisted strongly and made the matter politically sensitive by stating that the reduction would mean it could not honour agreements it had reached with the providers of voluntary children's homes, or make planned improvements to its own residential child services.[189] The EHSSB informed the providers of voluntary children's homes about the planned reduction in funding and the implications for them and they in turn wrote to the DHSS to make clear the impact any reduction in funding would have on their services.[190]

262 The same difficulties arose when the DHSS tried to redistribute core funding from the EHSSB to the other Boards as part of implementing a move towards full capitation funding. There was a cross boundary adjustment made in the financial year 1992-93 where funds were taken from the EHSSB and reallocated to the other Boards. This adjustment meant that the WHSSB received recurring additional funding of £3million in its baseline budget. However, in a letter of September 1992 to Mr Frawley, Mr Hunter expressed the DHSS Management Executive's concern about the speed of the move towards full capitation funding.[191] The move towards this new funding regime had been part of the assurances that Mr Hunter and Mr Green had given to Mr Frawley when they met with him in spring of 1991 to explain why the WHSSB's request for additional funding to address childcare concerns could not be met.

263 Mr Hunter explained in his letter to Mr Frawley that the Minister had asked the Chairman of the EHSSB to undertake an assessment of the implications of moving towards full capitation funding over a three-year period, through the redistribution of resources. It was estimated that this would entail a baseline reduction of around £7 million each year for the EHSSB, which would then be redistributed to the other three Boards. Mr Hunter asked for an indication of how the WHSSB would deploy additional resources of £2 million to £3 million each year. He finished his letter by stressing the importance of this forecasting exercise to be completed with the strictest confidentiality until the DHSS was in the position to make a clear statement about the way forward.

264 It was clear from the resource allocation letters for the financial year 1993-94 that were sent to the Boards that this redistribution of funding did not occur, presumably because of successful representations by the EHSSB. The allocation letter sent to the EHSSB made no mention of a reduction in its core funding, but rather confirmed that its revenue allocation would be increased by £469,000. Although the WHSSB was also allocated increases of £342,000 in its revenue budget and £275,000 in its capital allowance, in total that was only £208,000 more of an increase than the EHSSB received and no way near the potential £2 million to £3 million increase indicated in Mr Hunter's letter to Mr Frawley. The DoH pointed out in its response to the Warning Letter process that in the financial year 1995-96 a further £4.5 million was taken from the EHSSB and redistributed to other Boards and this resulted in the WHSSB receiving an additional recurring £1.5 million in its baseline budget. The DoH accepted that it may be that representations by the EHSSB delayed and reduced the proposed reduction referred to in Mr Hunter's letter but pointed out that achieving the reallocation of funds in 1995-96 was a substantial result.

265 We noted that these tensions were not limited to core funding of Boards. They were also experienced in relation to the allocation of additional funding for work in relation to child abuse. In August 1993 the DHSS sent supplementary letters to the Boards about funding for 1993-94 in which it stated that it had found it impossible to agree a formula for distribution of funding of child abuse monies that would reflect relative need. The letter to the WHSSB stated that it would receive an additional £144,000 for this work but explained that in respect of recurring "funding for child abuse" it has not been possible to achieve a method for allocation which would be sufficiently robust and defensible and which would command respect by all the Boards, despite the involvement of the Assistant Directors from the Boards working with officials to achieve a more refined formula.[192] In the absence of a more refined formula that could reflect relative deprivation, the DHSS decided to base the allocations on distribution of the child population aged 0-17 years in each of the Board areas, which was the same approach that had been used for the 1992-93 allocation.[193]

266 Paul Cummings, Director of Finance for the HSCB, told us that it took until the financial year 1995-96 for resources from the EHSSB to be redistributed to the other Boards. He explained that at that time the main driver for resource allocation was population size, therefore the NHSSB as the second of the most populous of the four Board areas received the highest uplift.[194]

Competing interests of Boards

267 Mr Frawley and Mr Burke commented to us in relation to redistribution of funding between Boards:

> "It appears to us, however the Department was unwilling to make the difficult choices involved in achieving equity...We would contend that there was little discretion ever exercised by the Department to re-allocate funds."[195]

268 While we understand this view, and have some sympathy with it, there is no doubt that the DHSS was hampered by limited funds for growth, a funding bias towards the protection of existing services and its inability to reach agreement with the Boards about a more equitable means of distributing funding on the basis of relative need. The PARR formula clearly had its limitations, but even a more sophisticated formula, able to take account of relative need, would have had limited success if the starting point continued to be the maintenance of existing levels of service.

269 Given that starting point, we understood the difficulties the DHSS faced in trying to cut funding to the EHSSB. The EHSSB was providing a wide range of health and social services in a deprived inner city area to a community dealing with the serious social unrest caused by the Troubles. It was also strongly arguing that the PARR formula did not adequately take account of its regional medical services and medical training.

270 Balancing the competing interests of Boards, given the challenging circumstances they were all dealing with, would have made appearing to favour one Board at the expense of another complicated and unappealing, particularly given the political response at local level such shifts would have been sure to prompt. We noted that even now in retrospect, when commenting on the situation, the HSCB balanced the views of the WHSSB and the EHSSB. In its closing written submission to Module 5, the HSCB stated its position that while the WHSSB received a percentage of the available resources for growth from 1973 to 1975, that percentage was never sufficiently weighted in its favour to achieve a narrowing of the gap between its actual allocation and the sum that would have reflected its demographic profile, its levels of deprivation and the levels of health and social care need it was being required to respond to.[196] However, it also stated in its submission for Module 14, Governance and Finance, that the EHSSB had a valid argument at the time that it required recompense for factors such as regional medical services and cross-boundary flows for acute hospital treatment, and that this should be reflected in the allocation of resources by the Department.[197] Therefore, now as then, the competing interests of both Boards are acknowledged.

271 In the absence of the type of reallocation of funding that was required, it appeared that the PARR formula actually added to the frustration of the WHSSB; PARR provided recognition that it was underfunded but the status quo was largely maintained and the recognition did not translate into the additional funding at the level required.

272 While we recognised and accepted the difficulties the DHSS faced in reallocating core funding, we considered that it should have engaged more with the WHSSB about the practical and financial implications of implementing the recommendations of the Bunting Review into the circumstances surrounding the peer sexual abuse in Harberton House. As we have explained in greater detail in Chapter 23, Dr McCoy told us in a written statement that he thought the WHSSB's focus on resources when it was drawing up the Terms of Reference for what was to become the Bunting review was opportunistic.[198] When he gave evidence in person he confirmed that continued to be his view. We agreed with Dr McCoy that the focus in the Bunting review should have been on the circumstances and factors that enabled the peer sexual abuse to go on for so long undetected. However, lack of resources was a very relevant matter and the Bunting report assessed the WHSSB's childcare services in general, and its residential services in particular, to be under so much pressure that there continued to be risks for the children depending on them and the staff providing them.

198 FJH 40886.

Bidding for additional funds

273 Given that a radical redistribution of core funding was not found possible, the other means open to the DHSS to redress the balance was to bid for additional funds to address priority issues. Dr Hilary Harrison explained in her written evidence for Module 5 that the DHSS and its predecessors traditionally made bids for additional funding from the block grant in advance of the financial year, or as part of the in-year monitoring round, to address priority issues. She explained:

> "Funding so obtained was then allocated to Boards in a proportionate way or in a manner aimed at addressing specific or regional needs."[199]

274 It seemed reasonable to assume that in order to make decisions about allocating funds on a priority basis the DHSS would have to know how the Boards had allocated funding to Programmes of Care and in particular to meeting the Strategic Objectives it set for these Programmes. However, when he gave evidence in person Dr McCoy explained that that it was difficult for the Department to ascertain how the Boards actually spent their funding:

> "...we wouldn't have had good information about when they received their block grant, how it was allocated between Health Services and Personal Social Services, and even within that within the various programmes of care within Social Services, whether it be child care mental health or whatever."[200]

275 Dr Harrison explained in her oral evidence in this Module that although Boards were expected to provide financial returns known as FR22s to the DHSS it was not straightforward to compare and contrast expenditure, as the Boards accounted for their spend under different headings and it was difficult to disentangle, for example, the amounts each Board spent on fostering. Dr Harrison explained that around 1993-94 the Department improved the guidance about how the FR22 forms should be completed and held meetings with the Boards about their completion in order to obtain clearer, and therefore more comparable, information about expenditure to inform planning for the Children Order.[201]

276 This evidence suggested to us that monitoring arrangements that should have provided the Department with information to analyse and compare and contrast each Board's spend on family and childcare services and explore the relationship between expenditure and quality of services were not adequate up until at least 1993-94.

Reports about the impact of lack of resources on services

277 As indicated above, the evidence from former DHSS and SSI officials was that all Boards argued for more funding. Even within that context we would have expected that matters coming to the attention of inspectors about how resource difficulties were affecting a Board's ability to meet its statutory childcare duties would have triggered a significant response. Marian Reynolds, a SSI inspector, received such a report when she met with senior WHSSB childcare managers in April 1995.

278 Ms Reynolds subsequently wrote to C F Stewart of the DHSS, to report that these managers had informed her that the level of funding was such that at times decisions had to be made:

> "relating to discharge of statutory duties and/or compliance with procedural guidance".[202]

Ms Reynolds suggested to Mr Stewart that this might indicate the need for an assessment of the adequacy of funding to the WHSSB's Family and Child Care Programme of Care. Mr Stewart's response to the memo was to reassure Ms Reynolds that the allocation of funding was equitable, and that other Trusts and Boards were funded in a similar way, and that it was up to the Board to decide how to allocate money to childcare services.[203] Ms Reynolds told us that on the basis of this advice from Mr Stewart she considered there was no need to take further action. In response to questions about this matter, Ms Reynolds stressed that if a Board was saying it could not meet or was at risk of not meeting its statutory functions it was for the Board to reallocate funding to ensure that the statutory functions it was responsible for providing were delivered.

203 Day 128, p.49.

279 In its closing submission to Module 5, the HSCB questioned this approach and suggested that on the basis of Ms Reynolds's report of the concerns expressed by the WHSSB managers the DHSS should have undertaken an "accountability review at a high level". The HSCB observed that this lack of action by the DHSS was in the context of the findings of a review into the death of a child in the care of the WHSSB, the review of peer sexual abuse in Harberton House, and the "'mantra' down the years about being underfunded in the West", all of which were known by the Department.[204]

280 While an accountability review may not have been necessary we consider that further engagement with the WHSSB childcare managers about the pressures they were under and how they might be managed was necessary. We accept that it was for the Board to manage its resources. Nevertheless, senior managers telling a member of the inspectorate that they were struggling to meet statutory childcare responsibilities merited a more considered and proactive response and we are critical of the DHSS's complacent response to this serious matter.

281 The DoH responded to this criticism through the Warning Letter process. It told us that Ms Reynolds had confirmed to the best of her recollection, that after her exchange with Mr Stewart, she met with senior WHSSB managers specifically to discuss the discharge of statutory functions, to provide advice and to seek assurance that the Board was continuing to discharge these functions in accordance with the requirements. It also stated that Dr McCoy had confirmed that such an approach would have been his standard practice in the light of such concerns and he had no reason to doubt the accuracy of Miss Reynolds' recollection. In addition, the DoH stated that Dr McCoy confirmed that he met with Mr Burke on at least a monthly basis and that, far from being one of inactivity or complacence, the SSI's relationship with the WHSSB was much closer than that which existed with any of the three other Boards and contact was on a more frequent basis. It is not possible for us to reach a conclusion on this additional evidence at this stage since we do not have the opportunity to question it and the HSCB has not had the opportunity to comment on it. However, we decided that since it provided such a different perspective about an important matter that it was appropriate to note it.

Conclusions about the funding of the WHSSB

282 Mr Frawley and Mr Burke noted Mr Hunter's statement that it was for a Board to reallocate funding if a particular service was under pressure and if the DHSS had intervened in such circumstances it would have been contrary to the principle of subsidiarity on which the respective roles of the DHSS and the Boards were based.[205] They commented:

> "An alternative view might be that 280k people living in the WHSSB were not being provided with a level of service equivalent to that available to people living in the rest of Northern Ireland, this situation having persisted over an extended period of time. This was a circumstance that surely warranted an intervention by the Department as the principal Authority within the Northern Ireland Health and Social Care system."

283 We concluded that the WHSSB was historically underfunded, that this was known by the DHSS, and that the adverse implications this funding shortage had on the provision of the WHSSB's childcare services was also known to the DHSS. However, we accepted why the commitment to protecting funding for existing services, the lack of growth funding and the understandable unwillingness of the Boards to accept any reduction in their funding, meant that the DHSS did not implement the PARR formula. Given the social unrest at the time, the pressures on all Boards, and the EHSSB's argument that it was being insufficiently funded for providing province-wide specialist medical care, we understood why the DHSS decided to maintain historical funding allocations for so long. We also recognised that eventually the DHSS did make cross-boundary adjustments in the allocation of funding to the Boards which resulted in the WHSSB receiving additional recurrent base line funding.

284 However, we were critical of the DHSS's failure to fully engage with the WHSSB about the specific resource difficulties which the Bunting report detailed it was facing in meeting its statutory childcare responsibilities. The DHSS accepted at that time that the WHSSB was receiving less funding than its PARR notional allocation and Mr Frawley made very clear to Mr Hunter the Board's view that historic underfunding was adversely affecting its provision of childcare services. We understood why the immediate allocation of additional funding was not possible; however, we considered the DHSS, or the SSI on its behalf, should have engaged more formally with the WHSSB to ensure it was taking whatever action was necessary to secure its childcare services. We were also critical that the DHSS did not respond appropriately to a report from an SSI inspector that senior WHSSB managers had informed her that they were struggling to meet statutory childcare responsibilities. We noted that through the Warning Letter process the DoH informed us that Ms Reynolds recalled that she did follow up these matters with WHSSB managers. We recognised the appropriateness of the DHSS preserving the boundaries between its roles and responsibilities and those of the Boards. However, it was the case according to the DHSS circular Monitoring of Residential Child Care Services issued in October 1983 that the Boards were accountable to the DHSS for the way in which they discharged their responsibilities in terms of the quality, range and availability of childcare services.[206] We therefore considered a more proactive response by the DHSS and/or the SSI on its behalf would have been appropriate to ensure that the WHSSB was effectively addressing the serious difficulties it was experiencing in the provision of its childcare services.

(2) a local education authority shall not grant a licence for a period in excess of six months.

5. The holder of a licence shall, at least seven days before the child takes part in any entertainment, notify the local education authority within whose area the entertainment is to take place of the forthcoming employment of the child and where the licence was not granted by that local education authority shall present the licence to that local education authority for inspection.

REGULATIONS, DATED 25TH JULY, 1952, MADE BY THE MINISTRY OF HOME AFFAIRS UNDER SUB-SECTION (1) OF SECTION 101 OF THE CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS ACT (NORTHERN IRELAND), 1950.

The Ministry of Home Affairs, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon it by sub-section (1) of Section 101 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland), 1950, and of all other powers enabling it in that behalf, hereby makes the following Regulations :—

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland), 1952.

2. These Regulations shall come into force on 1st October, 1952.

3.—(1) In these Regulations the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say :—

"the Act" means the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland), 1950 ;

"administering authority" means the person or persons carrying on the voluntary home ;

"child" means a person under the age of eighteen ;

"Fire Service" means in the area of the County Borough of Belfast the Belfast Fire Brigade and elsewhere in Northern Ireland the Northern Ireland Fire Authority ;

"home" means a voluntary home as defined by Section 98 of the Act ;

"primary school" has the same meaning as in the Education Act (Northern Ireland), 1947 ;

"the Ministry" means the Ministry of Home Affairs for Northern Ireland ;

"training school" has the same meaning as in the Act.

(2) The Interpretation Act, 1889, shall apply to the interpretation of these Regulations as it applies to the interpretation of an Act of the Parliament of Northern Ireland.

4.—(1) The administering authority shall ensure that each home in its charge is conducted in such a manner and on such principles as will further the well-being of the children in the home.

(2) The administering authority shall make arrangements for the home to be visited at least once in every month by a person who shall satisfy himself whether the home is conducted in the interests of the well-being of the children, and shall report to the administering authority upon his visit and shall enter in the record book referred to in the Schedule hereto his name and the date of his visit.

5.—(1) The administering authority shall appoint a person to be in charge of the home :—

Provided that any person in charge of the home immediately before these Regulations come into force shall be deemed to have been appointed to be in charge of the home under this paragraph.

(2) The person in charge of the home shall compile the records referred to in the Schedule to these Regulations and shall keep them at all times available for inspection by any inspector appointed by the Ministry.

(3) The person in charge of the home shall be responsible for the custody of the medical records of each child and shall keep them at all times available to the medical officer or to any inspector appointed by the Ministry.

6. The administering authority shall secure that so far as is practicable each child in the home attends such religious services and receives such religious instruction as are appropriate to the religious persuasion to which he belongs.

7.—(1) The administering authority shall appoint a medical officer for each home in its charge.

(2) The duties of the medical officer shall include —

(i) the general supervision of the health of the children (excluding their dental health) ;

(ii) the general supervision of the hygienic condition of the premises ;

(iii) attendance at the home at regular intervals with sufficient frequency to ensure that he is closely acquainted with the health of the children ;

(iv) the examination of the children at regular intervals ;

(v) the provision of such medical attention as may be necessary, other than dental treatment ;

(vi) the giving of advice to the person in charge of the home on matters affecting the health of any of the children or the hygienic condition of the premises ;

(vii) the supervision of the compilation of a medical record for each child in the home containing particulars of the medical history of the child before admission, so far as it is known, of his physical and mental condition on admission, of his medical history while accommodated in the home and of his condition on discharge from the home.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in the preceding provisions of this Regulation, the administering authority may appoint more than one medical officer and may divide the preceding duties among them as it sees fit.

8. The administering authority shall make suitable arrangements for the dental care of the children in the home.

9.—(1) The administering authority shall notify the Ministry forthwith —

(i) of the death of any child in the home and of the relevant circumstances ;

(ii) of any accident in the home resulting in serious injury to a child or a member of the staff ;

(iii) if known to the administering authority, of the death of any child who dies within two months of ceasing to be in the home and of the relevant circumstances so far as they can by reasonable enquiry be ascertained ;

(iv) of any outbreak among the children in the home under five years of age of infective gastro-enteritis, and of any outbreak of infectious disease among any of the children which the medical officer regards as sufficiently serious to be so notified.

(2) Where a child dies in the home or contracts an illness or sustains an accident which the medical officer considers to be serious, the administering authority shall notify the circumstances forthwith to the parent or guardian of the child, and, if the child were placed in the home by a welfare authority, to that welfare authority.

10.—(1) The administering authority shall obtain the advice of the Fire Service before opening a new home or making any structural alterations to an existing home, and shall arrange for the periodic inspection of each home in its charge by the Fire Service.

(2) The administering authority shall ensure that periodic fire drills and practice are carried out in each home in its charge, so that the staff, and so far as possible the children, are well versed in the procedure for saving life in case of fire.

(3) The administering authority shall report to the Ministry forthwith any outbreaks of fire in any home in its charge.

11.—(1) The person in charge of a home shall ensure that generally order is maintained by his personal influence and understanding and that of his staff, and resort to corporal punishment shall be avoided as far as possible.

(2) Where correction is needed for minor acts of misbehaviour, the punishment shall take the form of forfeiture of rewards or privileges (including pocket money) or temporary loss of recreation; provided that a light tap of the hand may occasionally be applied to the hand of a child with the object of indicating urgent disapproval rather than that of inflicting pain.

(3) Other forms of corporal punishment shall be subject to the following conditions:—

(a) It shall be inflicted only on the hands or posterior with a light cane and shall not exceed six strokes in the case of a child over 10 years of age, and 2 strokes in the case of a child over 8 and under 10 years of age. No child under 8 years of age shall be so punished.

(b) It shall not be administered by any person other than the person in charge of the home or in his absence his duly authorised deputy.

(c) A second member of staff shall invariably be present to witness the proceedings.

(d) No caning shall be administered in the presence of another child.

(e) Any child known to have a physical or mental disability shall not be subjected to corporal punishment without the sanction of the medical officer.

(4) Particulars of the administration of corporal punishment under paragraph (3) of this Regulation (giving the name and age of the child concerned, the offence and the number of strokes of the cane awarded him) shall be entered in the record book referred to in the Schedule to these Regulations.

(5) At the commencement of each quarter the administering authority shall furnish to the Ministry a return giving particulars of corporal punishment imposed during the preceding three months.

12.—(1) The Ministry may give directions limiting the number of children who may at any one time be accommodated in the home.

(2) The Ministry may give directions limiting the period during which any child may be accommodated in a home.

(3) The Ministry may direct any child to be removed from a home and to be placed in another home or in a welfare authority home or to be boarded out, or to be otherwise dealt with.

(4) The Ministry may require the administering authority to furnish returns of the children in a home or boarded out from the home in such form as the Ministry may from time to time direct.

13. The Ministry may give directions to the administering authority prohibiting the provision for the children in any home in its charge of clothing specified in the directions.

14. The administering authority shall furnish to the Ministry on demand such information as the Ministry may from time to time require as to the facilities provided for the parents or guardians or relatives of children in the home to visit and communicate with the children, and shall comply with any directions given by the Ministry as to the provision of such facilities.

15. The administering authority shall forthwith give notice to the Ministry when a person in charge of a home ceases to be in charge of that home, and of any new appointment to the position.

16. Where a primary school or a training school is established or maintained within a home, these Regulations shall not apply to any child during that part of the day in which he is attending the primary school or to any child who has been committed to the training school.

17. Where in the opinion of the administering authority it is desirable in the special circumstances of any situation that the provisions of one or more of the foregoing Regulations should not apply, a special arrangement may be made with the prior consent of the Ministry.

A.S.C.

Here are some brief summary impressions of the different Voluntary Children's Homes.

1.) Dr. Barnardo's National organisation — Macedon:- For school-age children. Well-staffed, well-equipped, excellent care and training. Children attend outside schools.

2.) Manor House:- The same. For babies and toddlers.

3. Glendhu:- Local Voluntary Committee — Very high ratio of staff to children, very good quality staff. Many voluntary helpers in addition. Excellent care for all ages of children, boys up to about 9 years, girls up to school-leaving age. Equipment and activities excellent. Whole atmosphere warm and homely.

4. Johnston Memorial:- School Presbyterian Voluntary Committee — Very good care by good quality staff. Children go to ordinary day schools and Technical schools. Natural, happy atmosphere. House a bit shabby, but homely.

5. Moyallon:- Charitable trust. Really a private charity of Richardson family, Quakers. — Will probably wind up as soon as present few teen-age girls are on their own feet. Very good care as in an ordinary family. Girls go to Grammar or Technical schools.

6. Manor House, Lisburn:- Voluntary Committee — Has been poverty-stricken both in money and ideas for some time past. Insufficient staff of poor quality in recent times. Equipment and maintenance very poor. Some improvement in recent weeks, but needs a large amount of money spent on, e.g., floor-coverings, heating, beds, tables, chairs and play equipment. Attend outside schools.

7. Childhaven:- Methodist Voluntary Committee — Lively energetic young Matron is just in process of introducing a homelier atmosphere to this somewhat bare and spartan Home. Is not helped by the other 3 members of staff, who are little more than domestics. Would need more, better-quality staff and more equipment. Committee would be willing, I think, if helped. Have football field, swings and large playhall. Attend outside schools.

8. Victoria Homes:- Voluntary Committee. Combines a voluntary Home and Shamrock Lodge Training School. — Insufficient staff, and not of highest quality. Equipment and maintenance good, but one room full of lovely toys never seem to be entered or used by children. Happy enough atmosphere, however, and children lively. Attend outside schools.

9. Thorndale:- Salvation Army mother-and-baby Home. Takes some unaccompanied children and teen-age girls — Well run by adequate trained staff. Could do with more play equipment for toddlers. Otherwise standards of care and training excellent. Get grants from W.A.s. for mother-and-baby work and payment for them and other children and girls, who are, as a rule, placed there by W.A.s.

10. Hopedene:-
11. Kennedy House:- — Mother-and-baby Homes. Only registered in case they should ever have to keep an unaccompanied child temporarily.

12. Good Shepherd Convent:- Derry. — Only a few teen-age girls, the rest are older women.

13. Good Sheperd Convent:- Newry. — Material conditions and equipment very good. Girls and women work in laundry, have all amusements laid on inside Home. Quite happy atmospheré in both places.

14. Sacred Heart Home:- Good Shepherd Convent, Belfast. — Good material conditions. Could perhaps do with more play equipment, but would, I think, buy anything suggested to them. Have singing, elocution, dancing classes and girls go out to ordinary schools and to do shopping for Home. Not short of money, I think.

15. Rubane House:- — Good care and training by trained staff of Brothers - plus one woman cook. Is still in process of development, but on well organized lines.

16. Our Mother of Mercy Convent:- Newry. — Children go to outside school. This is also a Home for old ladies. The children look quite well-cared, and the babies very well-cared, but I feel there are insufficient staff, and the bigger children's activities could be improved.

17. Convent of Mercy:- Bessbrook. — Mainly a cheap boarding-school, on spartan lines, but affectionate care is given. Take a few voluntary children only. Said to have none when Dr. Simpson visited recently. Adequate care and training. Short of play equipment.

18. Nazareth Lodge:- Belfast. — Poverty-stricken. Short of staff and play equipment. Very institutional for older children, and babies in desperate plight. Rev. Mother very anxious to improve and hopes to have Nursery School started. Getting equipment already. ~~Trying to~~ make holiday arrangements.

19. Nazareth House:- Belfast. — Very institutional, but material conditions better than Nazareth Lodge. Short of play equipment. Short of staff.

Reference ____________________

20. St. Joseph's Home:- Termonbacca, Derry. (Nazareth Home)	Very institutional, but boys do get out to school, younger ones to Nazareth House, older ones to Christian Brothers. Short of staff; short of play equipment.
21. Nazareth House:- Derry.	Best play equipment of any of the 4 Nazareth Homes, at any rate for toddlers. Still very institutional.
22 Portadown Babies Home

The children in these 4 Homes especially have nothing like a normal upbringing. They must feel unloved as it is just not possible for the number of staff to show affection to such large numbers of children. They can know little or nothing of the world outside, (as with one exception school is on the premises), and must be completely unprepared for it, either in character or knowledge. I find these Homes utterly depressing and it appals me to think that these hundreds of children are being reared in bleak lovelessness. This is not meant entirely as criticism of the staff, but their task is impossible. Some of them have, however, little idea of what a child's life should be. They have got used to their own institutional set-up. For example, when asked about the children going out, one replied "Oh yes, they go to the Circus at Christmas". If this is their sole contact with the world they must have a distorted idea of it! Even their "god-parent" scheme is unreal, as instead of getting ordinary folk somewhere near the children's own level to be "uncles and aunts" they have looked for business men who will give the boys jobs on leaving - regardless of whether the business is likely to suit the boy!

In short, I think we must press for complete overhaul of the whole set-up of these Homes, and assist them in every way possible

Circular No. TC.25/1952

Sir/Madam,

With reference to the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland), 1952, (S.R. & O. 1952, No. 131), of which a copy was sent to you on 1st September, I am directed by the Minister of Home Affairs to forward, for your information, a copy of a Memorandum issued by the Home Office in September, 1951, on the Conduct of Children's Homes.

Although this Memorandum has been prepared mainly with reference to Children's Homes in England, it contains various suggestions and advice which should prove of considerable assistance to members of staff of Children's Homes in Northern Ireland, and also to those who have responsibilities for the general management and maintenance of such Homes. The Ministry would, therefore, be glad if you would arrange to supply a copy of the Memorandum to everyone concerned.

Copies of the Home Office Memorandum (S.O. Code No. 34 - 349), may be obtained from Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 80 Chichester Street, Belfast, price 6d.

I am, Sir/Madam,
Your obedient Servant,

for SECRETARY.

Memorandum by the Home Office on the Conduct of Children's Homes

INTRODUCTION

1. This memorandum on the conduct of children's homes has been prepared for the guidance of local authorities and voluntary organisations, and is intended to be read with the Administration of Children's Homes Regulations, 1951. The contents are based on experience gained by Home Office inspectors in visiting children's homes and on advice tendered to the Secretary of State by the Advisory Council on Child Care. It deals with the needs of children who, for one reason or another, cannot be boarded out and are brought up in children's homes; and it is written in the main with direct reference to children living as members of small groups of mixed ages and both sexes who are in care for an indefinite period and who look to the local authority or voluntary organisation for their upbringing. But most of what is said is applicable to all children's homes; and recommendations relating specifically to large homes are contained in Appendix I.

2. In paragraph 427 of their Report the Curtis Committee stated the main requirements for the substitute home in the following words:—"If the substitute home is to give the child what he gets from a good normal home it must supply:—

(i) Affection and personal interest; understanding of his defects; care for his future; respect for his personality and regard for his self-esteem.

(ii) Stability; the feeling that he can expect to remain with those who will continue to care for him till he goes out into the world on his own feet.

(iii) Opportunity of making the best of his ability and aptitudes, whatever they may be, as such opportunity is made available to the child in the normal home.

(iv) A share in the common life of a small group of people in a homely environment."

TYPE AND SIZE OF CHILDREN'S HOMES

3. The aim when providing new homes for children in long-term care is to enable each child to live as a member of a small group. The number of children in a home of this kind (referred to in this memorandum as a family group home) may vary from eight to twelve. If the home is a house in a street (perhaps a villa type house or two semi-detached houses, suitably adapted) the children gain by living as members of the local community and by taking a full part in its social activities as do children living with their own parents. Many local authorities are setting up small homes of this kind. Rather larger homes, taking up to about twenty children, are also being established. It is important that homes should be so situated that the children will be able, out of school hours, to mix with their school friends. While every children's home should have a garden, the children should be encouraged to join with others in outside play.

4. In the family group home, the age range should be wide, say from three to fifteen years, with boys and girls growing up together. It will be desirable sometimes to include children under the age of three in the group (for example, where they have older brothers or sisters in the home), or on occasion to keep children beyond the age of fifteen. The conditions of normal family life can most nearly be reproduced in this way, and the children will not require to be moved at a specified age to some other children's home and so lose contact with those whom they are fond of and trust. In homes accommodating children of a wide age range and both sexes, the special problems arising in adolescence call for sympathetic guidance and wise, unobtrusive supervision. It will not generally be right to place in a mixed family group home older children coming into care, but this may not apply where several children from the same family are received into care and should be kept together.

STAFF

5. The standard of care provided in a home will be determined by the success with which the staff are able to take the place of parents and to meet the children's individual need for interest and affection. It is essential that the conditions offered to staff should be such as to attract and keep men and women of the high quality needed for this work.

6. It is on the understanding and devotion of the staff, more than on anything else, that the happiness of the children depends. The housemother and members of staff, besides being familiar with the stages of development throughout childhood, should be temperamentally fitted for the difficult task of maintaining the balance between giving the children the affection that they need and being too possessive in their attitude towards them. The housemother in charge of a family group home should be given the fullest possible responsibility, and should not be subordinate to the person in charge of some other children's home.

7. The staffing should be sufficient to allow the housemothers time to join in the children's activities and to talk with them, and thus to provide the children with the adult companionship which is necessary to their normal development. It is undesirable for one housemother to live alone with the children ; she needs adult companionship, and a housemother living alone may sometimes be subject to undue strain. In family group homes taking from eight to ten children, a resident housemother and assistant, or two housemothers, should be sufficient, with adequate domestic help. In homes taking eleven or twelve children, it will be an advantage to have in addition one full-time domestic assistant, preferably resident ; and in these the employment of a married woman as housemother, with the husband going to outside work, is a good way of securing a man's influence and interest in the household.

8. It is considered that the staff required for a home taking about twenty children of a wide age range and both sexes might be a married couple (the husband usually going to outside work), one resident housemother, one resident housemother/cook, daily domestic assistance, and part-time help with the garden where required.

9. If a home is to be well run it is essential that the conditions should be such as to enable the staff to retain pleasure and freshness in their work. Adequate time off and holidays, giving opportunity for outside interests, and provision for seeing their own friends in the home (see also paragraph 34), contribute to the well-being of the staff and consequently of the children ; at the same time, there should be sufficient flexibility in the arrangements to ensure continuity of care. Where relief staff are employed, it should be arranged, whenever possible, for the same people to go to the same homes.

10. It is hoped that local authorities and voluntary organisations will release suitable members of their staffs to take a full course in child care provided through the Central Training Council in Child Care, and will encourage others to attend refresher courses. A valuable feature of the refresher courses is the opportunity they afford to the staff of different homes to meet and discuss their work.

FURNISHING AND EQUIPMENT

11. The aim should be to create an environment, not luxurious but of a reasonable standard of comfort, in which both staff and children will feel at home and which will help the children to develop a proper pride in their surroundings.

Decoration and furnishing which are good in design and bright and attractive in colour will encourage the children to take an interest in their home, and to enjoy taking care of it. This applies equally to chair- and bed-covers, curtains and rugs, which should be in attractive colours but easily cleaned. There should be a room for play and a quiet room for reading and other such occupations; one of these rooms may serve also as the dining room. It will do much to produce the atmosphere of a normal home if staff and children share most of the rooms in the house, though the need of the staff for some privacy should not be overlooked. If there is not room in the house for a workshop for hobbies and crafts, the possibility of converting an outhouse or garage into a workshop should be considered.

12. The bedrooms should be furnished as far as possible as they would be in an ordinary household without uniformity, and there should be opportunity for the exercise of individual taste in the arrangement of furniture, the choice of colour schemes and the display of personal possessions. Sufficient chests of drawers and wardrobes should be provided to give each child space to keep his own clothes, and there should be bedroom rugs and a chair for each child. The need for bedroom mirrors for older boys and girls should not be overlooked. At least one of the rooms used by children should be furnished as a comfortable sitting room with easy chairs. Every child should have an individual place in which to keep his personal possessions; he should be entitled to regard this as a private place which should not be disturbed by the staff without his knowledge.

RECEPTION OF CHILDREN

13. As reception centres are established (see the memorandum which accompanied Home Office Circular No. 128/1949 of 4th July, 1949), the need for initial assessment in long-stay homes will diminish. It will be necessary however, for some time to place direct in long-stay homes children whose needs have not been assessed. Children may arrive at the home still subject to the strain and bewilderment of leaving familiar people and surroundings, and some may be suffering from the effects of ill-treatment or under-nourishment. Many of the recommendations contained in the memorandum on reception centres are applicable to the reception of children direct into long-stay homes. Children who have been in a reception centre will come to the long-stay home with a known history, and will have had time to get over the first effect of separation from their homes.

14. Where a child is to be admitted to a home, whether on coming into care or subsequently, it is of the greatest importance that he should be treated considerately; the need to put the child at ease and to gain his confidence should be reflected in the arrangements for the journey, and the escort should, if possible, be known to him. The housemother should have full information about the child before he comes, so that he can be greeted by name and made to feel that he is not a stranger. This kind of friendly welcome will be all the easier if it has been possible for him to visit the home once or twice beforehand. On arrival, he should be shown round the home and, if he has a brother or sister or friend there, he should see him at once. Children should be allowed to bring with them any personal possessions to which they are attached and these should be treated with respect. Children leaving a reception centre to go to a children's home should take with them clothes that they have become used to. Staff should not be discouraged if a newly admitted child does not respond to kindly approaches for a time, as this may be due to his distress at leaving home or to previous unhappiness or neglect.

RELIGIOUS UPBRINGING (REGULATION 4)

15. A child who has to grow up away from his own parents needs even more than any other the comfort and help of a religious faith and the inspiration to right thinking and right doing which it gives. A religious upbringing must be founded on the example of the people with whom a child lives: if they are sincere in their convictions, even though of a different denomination, the teaching and guidance that he receives will have added significance. Their influence will be seen in the development of his personal faith and of his sense of service to others.

16. A child's understanding of religion is quickened by the attitude and example of those about him; he will learn from them to say prayers suited to his age, and become familiar with Bible stories and with the lives of people whose faith has inspired them to serve their fellows. Unless it is impracticable, every child should attend the services and the Sunday school of his own denomination so that he may take his part in its observances and activities, and be prepared to become a full member of a corporate religious body. The house-mother should be ready to discuss with any child religious or other questions which he may raise, and where desirable to arrange for him to talk with a minister of religion or other adviser of his own persuasion with whom it is hoped that she will maintain friendly contact. The teaching which a child receives at his church, his Sunday school and at his day school will be strengthened in daily life by the sympathy and understanding of those around him in the home.

DAILY LIFE IN THE HOME

17. It is the practice in some homes, particularly large homes, for the staff to be known by names suggestive of institutional life, such as master or superintendent. Names like these are alien to the idea of family life, and their use by the children is to be discouraged. If a home is run in the right spirit, this will be reflected in the easy manners and the bearing of the children.

18. The aim of any routine should be to create for the children the feeling of security and well-being which is found in a happy family. Regular times for meals and for bed help to create a pattern of security in the child's mind. Within this framework there should be variety and sometimes the unexpected event or excursion. It may be unavoidable in the larger homes to announce some events of the day, such as meal times, by a gong or bell, but the children should be accustomed to telling the time by the clock and should be expected to practise punctuality as a way of showing consideration for others.

19. Much of the children's happiness as they grow up will depend on the ease and confidence with which they mix with other young people. Mealtimes in the home provide a valuable opportunity for social training as well as an occasion on which the group comes together as a family. The staff should have meals with the children, and should expect them to talk freely. Tables should be attractively laid, with flowers on the table whenever possible. The children should become accustomed at an early age to the use of knives, forks, spoons, tumblers and cups and saucers, and should be expected to pass dishes to each other and to help themselves. If meals are regarded as social occasions, it follows that ample time should be allowed for them. The older children should be encouraged to help the younger at meals, keeping in mind the need to teach the younger ones to look after themselves. It is unreasonable to expect the other children always to wait until the slowest has finished.

20. Each child should feel at bedtime that he is specially wanted and cared for. In many homes a bedtime story is told to the group; whether or not this is done, it is important that the housemother should find time to talk with each child as she says goodnight to him. In this way she will often hear the worries of the older children and will be able to give to each child the individual interest which he needs.

21. It is important that each child should have the hours of rest he requires; he should not go to bed unduly early or too late. As a general guide, the following hours of sleep are considered to be desirable:—

Age in years	Hours of sleep
1—2 ...	... 14—16 hours
2—4 ...	... 13—14 ,,
5—7 ...	... 12—13 ,,
8—10 ...	... 11—12 ,,
11—13 ...	... 10—11 ,,
14+ ...	... 9—10 ,,

22. Care should be taken to see that children are warm in bed at all seasons of the year; underblankets should always be provided. A feeling of warmth and comfort will play a part in preventing such happenings as night terrors and bed wetting.

23. Bed wetting cannot be attributed to any one cause; if effective help is to be given, the child must be studied as an individual. The trouble may be due to an organic cause, to delay in learning bladder control, or to emotional disturbance due to loneliness, a sense of being left in strange surroundings, or of not being wanted. A feeling of hopelessness about the habit may cause it to persist. A child who persistently wets the bed should be seen by the medical officer so that he can advise on treatment or, if necessary, refer the case to a hospital or child guidance clinic.

24. Understanding and consideration on the part of the staff are of the first importance. Bed wetters should not be separated from other children, and members of the staff dealing with the child or with the wet bed should proceed in a matter of fact way, and should never exhibit impatience, disgust or anxiety. Mackintosh sheets should be used only when necessary; when they have to be used, a thin blanket should be placed between the mackintosh and the bed sheet. Sheets should always be changed after being wet. Bed wetters should not be required to wash their sheets. There is nothing to be gained by restricting drinks unreasonably, but it is undesirable that any child should drink large quantities late in the evening. There should be easy and lighted access at night to a lavatory, and where necessary the children should have their own chamber pots.

25. Play is as necessary to children as food and sleep; through it they develop in mind, body and personality. Play should not be thought of only in terms of organised activities. The children should be given ample opportunity to play and amuse themselves in their own way, and should be encouraged in initiative, resource and self-reliance. They should be taught to use the facilities of the neighbourhood, for instance, the public library, and allowed a reasonable choice of their own books.

26. Indoors, the children should have a varied supply of play material, including materials for dressing up; hobbies should be encouraged, and opportunity given to look at picture books, to read newspapers and periodicals suited to their age, and to listen to the gramophone and wireless. Children should be encouraged to choose their programmes, and not have the wireless on continuously. There should be small tables at which the children may play games or pursue hobbies, and arrangements should be made, if possible, for a child to have some place where a half-finished model or other cherished piece of work can be left with safety.

27. Fresh air, sunshine and activity are essential to the health and the full physical and mental development of children. Much of their time should be spent out-of-doors. Where the garden is large enough, part of it should be set aside for the free use of the children. Sand-pits in suitable conditions and if properly looked after, provide happy occupation for small children. The keeping of pets gives children the experience of caring for living things and develops a sense of responsibility. Bicycles, besides being popular, provide training for the older children in independence and road sense. The children should be taught to look after the bicycles as well as to enjoy their use. Outings and treats should be arranged. As opportunity offers, the children should be helped in the observation of growing and living things and in the life of the countryside.

PERSONAL HYGIENE

28. Children need training in how to use and look after their toilet articles, which they should regard as their own property and be able to identify easily. Individual towels, face cloths, tooth brushes (with individual tooth paste or powder) and brushes and combs should be provided and clearly marked by name or initials, or, in the case of children too young to read, by symbols which they can recognise. Towels should be hung so that they dry and are not in contact Supervision may be necessary in the use and care of these articles, but the aim should be to train the children as quickly as possible in habits of personal cleanliness and independence. Baths, with clean water for each child, should be taken at least twice a week, just before bed, and the children should be trained to bath themselves. Bedtimes naturally vary with the ages of the children, and it should be possible to plan some bathing each night without interfering with evening activities. The children's hair should be washed regularly, and attention given to the cleanliness of their heads. Children should be trained in regular habits and encouraged to report constipation ; an aperient should never be given as a matter of routine, but only where it is required in the individual case. The needs of the adolescent girl should be provided for.

DRESS AND FOOTWEAR

29. Uniformity of dress is to be avoided. The disadvantages of central purchasing should be weighed against its advantages. There should be variety, and opportunity for individual choice. Children attending school or a youth organisation should wear the kind of clothes that are required. From an early age, children should accompany the housemother when she is buying their clothes. Older children should be taught something of the prices and suitability of clothes and materials, and the girls should be encouraged to make attractive clothes for themselves. Uniformity should be avoided also in such matters as the dressing and cutting of hair.

30. Great care should be taken to provide children with correctly fitting boots and shoes. They must be of adequate length with flexible soles to allow proper use of the foot muscles, and the heels should fit comfortably. The passing of part-worn footwear from one child to another carries with it the risk of injury and possibly infection to the feet: where it is done, only well-fitting boots or shoes which are in good condition and not in any way misshapen should be passed on. It is important also to see that the feet of socks or stockings are of sufficient length after laundering as well as when new.

MONEY AND PERSONAL POSSESSIONS

31. Learning to handle money is an essential part of a child's training in everyday matters. Children should have a reasonable and known amount of pocket money. While pocket money will usually be given weekly, it may be helpful on occasion to give a larger sum for a longer period so that the experience of weighing the usual limited expenditure against the making of some special purchase may be possible. Older children should be allowed whenever possible to undertake shopping for the home, and to buy things for their own use. Younger children should be allowed to accompany the older children or housemother on shopping expeditions, and themselves be trusted to make simple purchases such as small birthday presents. Those nearing school-leaving age might be given an allowance to cover the purchase of clothes and personal necessities and so learn to take a greater pride in their own things. Unless some arrangement of this kind is made, a child may start work without knowing how to lay out money on personal needs.

HELP IN THE HOME

32. Boys and girls should be expected to take a moderate share in the daily running of the home, but not at the expense of sleep, meals, education or reasonable recreation. Young children should not be discouraged from trying to help in the house. Older children, in assisting members of staff, should progress from light routine tasks, such as dusting, bed-making and washing up, to skilled work, such as cooking, bottling, ironing and making things for the home. It is sometimes forgotten that a share in the running of the house means a share in the interesting as well as in the dull occupations. Older children could be given some responsibility for planning meals, purchasing household goods and checking the laundry, and should have opportunity of attending demonstrations or exhibitions of domestic interest in the neighbourhood.

CONTACT WITH RELATIVES AND FRIENDS

33. The child's link with his own family and relatives should be preserved wherever possible, and the staff of the home can help to strengthen the link by getting to know visiting parents. Visits by relatives and friends should be encouraged, and there should be no undue restriction as to times. Normally, the letters sent and received by a child should not be read by the staff of the home; exceptionally, the head of the home after consultation with the children's officer in the case of homes provided by a local authority, may find it necessary to supervise correspondence.

34. It is essential that children should learn to make friends outside the home and should be used to meeting other young people and to visiting ordinary homes. Both children and staff should be encouraged to invite their friends to the home; the children may thus experience the pleasure of giving as well as receiving hospitality. It is important that a child who has no parents or other relatives who visit him, or whom he visits, should be befriended individually by local people who are on friendly terms with the staff of the home. Women's Voluntary Services, Youth Organisations, Rotary Clubs and other bodies are ready to make arrangements of this kind for children in homes.

HOLIDAYS

35. The summer holiday is an important event in the lives of children, and it is specially desirable that children who are being brought up in children's homes should have an annual holiday of the kind best suited to their needs. In a family group home, there is something to be said for the group going away together for the children's holiday, the children sharing their experiences with those who look after them in the home. Children who lead a community life in larger homes will be likely to benefit by a complete change of surroundings, such as may be found with suitable relatives or in private foster-homes where they may see something of normal family life. Members of youth organisations, such as scouts and guides, should be given opportunity to go to camp or to take part in other holiday arrangements. There will be scope to arrange for older children to join others in using youth hostels. Organised camps or holiday homes, catering for large numbers, should be used with discrimination; younger children are likely to find such places exhausting. The aim should be to arrange as far as possible for each child to have the kind of holiday which, beside giving him pleasure at the time, will widen his interests and provide him with those experiences and memories which are so important in the pattern of young lives.

DIETARY

36. Menus should be varied and well-balanced. Contact should be maintained with the local Food Office so that ration permits may be altered as circumstances change. Breakfast should be served always within one hour of rising and should include a main dish. Mid-day dinner will often be taken at school. Where this is not done, application should be made for the additional food allowed for five main meals a week based on "school meals" rations, and dinner should generally consist of meat or fish and two vegetables (green leafy vegetables being served about three times a week) followed by a suitable pudding. The children should have a high tea (including, whenever possible, meat, fish, cheese or egg) and a light supper; alternatively, if preferred for the older children, a light tea and a substantial supper should be provided. Children should be encouraged to drink sufficient water, which should be readily available between meals and at meals.

37. Protein should be given twice daily, and can with advantage be included in all three main meals. Adequate quantities of salads and fresh fruit should be given. Milk should be tuberculin tested or pasteurised, and each child should have not less than a pint a day, including school milk. Children under five should have the special allowance of cod liver oil and orange juice available for them. Regulation 3 and the Schedule, item 5, require records to be kept of the food provided. The records should be examined from time to time by persons visiting the home on behalf of the local authority or voluntary organisation.

The Ministry of Health have published a booklet, "Feeding the One to Fives," obtainable from H.M. Stationery Office (Sales Offices), price 6d. (post free, 7½d.), or from any bookseller.

MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS

39. Regulation 5 requires the appointment of a medical officer for each local authority and voluntary home. His duties include regular attendance at the home and, as far as practicable, the periodic routine examination of the children, the provision of suitable medical attention as required, the supervision of medical records, and general supervision of the health of the children and hygiene of the premises. He should take an interest in the progress of the children and in their general welfare. It is, therefore, desirable that he should visit frequently, and get to know the children and the staff. Regular visits will enable the staff to keep him informed of matters which are not of sufficient consequence to justify a special call. The fullest possible information as to the previous medical history of each child and his family should be available to the medical officer. It is particularly important that this should include details of any immunisations. Regulation 6 requires arrangements to be made for dental care of the children.

40. Sick children can be provided with treatment under the National Health Service, but payment will have to be made for the general supervision and the routine examinations which are outside its scope. Although it is desirable that one doctor should undertake all the duties of medical officer, a local authority may have to make special arrangements for their homes by employing their own medical staff.

41. The advice of their Medical Officer of Health could be sought with advantage on all medical matters affecting homes provided by a local authority, including the appointment of the medical officer for the home, matters concerned with the health of the staff, precautions against the spread of infectious disease, and, where appropriate, the medical aspects of the planning of accommodation. Voluntary organisations may also find it an advantage to seek the advice of the appropriate Medical Officer of Health on such matters. It is desirable for the local Medical Officer of Health to be informed of the outbreak of any non-notifiable disease, such as gastro-enteritis, in any children's home.

42. It is recommended that the frequency of medical examinations, of dental inspections, and of other routine arrangements should be as follows:—

(a) Medical examination—
On admission.
At least monthly for children aged 0—1 year.
At least quarterly for children aged 1—5 years.
At least yearly for children over the age of 5.
On discharge.

(b) Weight (in a single garment)—
On admission.
Weekly—for children aged 0—6 months.
Monthly—for children aged 6 months to 2 years.
Quarterly—for children aged 2 years and over.
On discharge.

(c) Height (for children aged 2 years and over)—
On admission.
Quarterly.

(d) Dental inspection—
This is very desirable for children over the age of 2 and, if possible, should be arranged shortly after admission and at intervals of not more than six months.

Individual records should be kept showing condition on admission, and progress, and should include a record of sickness. Dates of immunisations should be noted. Condition on discharge should be recorded.

Suitable medical record cards for children aged five and over, and similar cards for children under the age of five, can be obtained from H.M. Stationery Office (Sales Offices), price 15s. 2½d. per hundred for the cards, and 10s. 2d. per hundred for the continuation cards including purchase tax in each case. The cards should be ordered under the references "Home Office RHM" for children aged five and over, and "Home Office RNM" for children under five, and the continuation cards under references "Home Office RHM (C)" for children aged five and over, and "Home Office RNM (C)" for children under five. The cost of the carriage is 1s. 2d. per hundred for the cards and 10d. per hundred for the continuation cards. (See Home Office circular 18/51 of 23rd January, 1951 and circular letter of 23rd January, 1951.)

43. Children attending local education authority schools will be examined by the school medical service at intervals. A member of the staff of the home should endeavour to be present, and should tell the doctor anything of note about the child just as a parent would.

44. While a good standard of cleanliness should be maintained in the home, this need not be carried so far as to produce an institutional atmosphere. Personal cleanliness among those employed in the kitchen is essential, and kitchen waste should always be stored in covered bins pending removal. The larder window should be efficiently fly-proofed, but should allow adequate ventilation.

45. When numbers of children live together there is a risk of epidemics and precautions must be taken to prevent the spread of infection. One of the most important methods (too often neglected) of preventing epidemics is the early diagnosis and isolation of the first case. The sick room, which should be a bright room and within call of a member of staff, should be ready for immediate use. In homes for fewer than about twelve children, arrangements should be made to enable a suitable room to be brought into use as a sick room at any time. If a sick child has to be kept apart from the others he should be provided with toys or books or suitable interests, and will need extra attention and mothering. If a child has to be admitted to hospital, the staff of the home should keep in frequent touch with him both by letters and visits, and there should be no delay in taking him back when he is ready for discharge.

46. In view of the close contact between staff and children, it is desirable to safeguard the well-being of the children by ensuring, as far as is possible, that the staff are free from any disorder likely to harm the children. A medical examination, including an X-ray of the chest, before appointment, and an X-ray of the chest subsequently at yearly intervals, is advisable, and local authorities and voluntary organisations are recommended to consider what measures should be taken to this end, and to consult the Regional Hospital Board as to ways and means of arranging for X-ray examinations.

SAFETY PRECAUTIONS (REGULATIONS 8 AND 9)

47. The advice of the Chief Officer of the Fire Brigade should always be obtained on fire precautions and on fire drills. The subject is dealt with in full in Appendix II. Open coal, electric or gas fires should be provided with fixed fireguards, and in rooms used by young children, radiators and hot pipes should be suitably guarded. Medicines and disinfectants should be kept in locked cupboards to which children cannot get access. Where windows, verandahs or staircases are potentially dangerous, or where there are main roads, ponds, rivers, etc., in the vicinity, the risks should be assessed, and suitable safety measures taken.

DISCIPLINE

48. Some form of discipline is necessary in every community, if the general well-being is to be maintained. Most children are difficult at times, and those coming into care may be specially difficult at first. Many will be disturbed by removal from their homes, and some will never have had a chance of learning to consider the interests of others. Measures taken to preserve discipline should not be such as would be likely to undermine the self-respect of children or to lessen their sense of responsibility for their actions. In general, the consideration and courtesy shown by members of the staff to each other and to the children will provide the example which is likely to influence in the right way all members of the group.

49. The difference in the relationship existing between staff and children and between parents and their own children calls for a careful approach to discipline in a children's home. Children who have lacked affection previously and who have become possessive and jealous about persons or things will need considerate treatment; it would be useless, and often harmful, to punish for this kind of behaviour. Where, on the other hand, correction is needed, it should aim at helping the child towards self-discipline and a developing sense of responsibility towards the people with whom he lives. It is by patience and interest, and the understanding of each child's problems and needs that the staff will win response and loyalty from the children.

50. Appendix III deals with the subject of discipline and the effect of the relevant Regulation.

EDUCATION AND THE HOME

51. Local authorities and voluntary organisations should do all that interested parents would do to enable a child to obtain and take advantage of opportunities of education and training suited to his ability. In the children's interests, the staff of the home should keep in close touch with the school and watch each child's progress there. The children should be given every facility to enable them to take part in handwork, sewing and cookery classes, and, if they wish, to buy the things they have made. They should be free to join in out-of-school activities. Children should always have a quiet place at home where they can do their homework undisturbed.

52. Training in health and hygiene is one of the responsibilities of the housemother, and in this she will be helped by the teaching given in most schools. Children are interested in their physical development, and want factual information about it as they grow up. The housemother should be ready to answer questions in a way appropriate to the age and intelligence of the child.

53. The staff of the homes should take advantage of the opportunities offered by many schools through parent-teacher associations and open days to acquaint themselves with the life of the school. Children's enjoyment of prize-giving, sports day and school functions may be greatly increased by having present someone belonging to them.

CHOICE OF EMPLOYMENT

54. When children are ready to leave school and go out to work advantage should be taken of the facilities provided by the Youth Employment Service for advising them on their choice of a suitable occupation and helping them to find satisfactory employment. Children usually come into contact with the Service through the schools they are attending. Youth Employment Officers visit schools and give preparatory talks on the choice of employment to groups of boys and girls in their last year at school, and at a later stage arrangements are made for school leavers to be interviewed by a Youth Employment Officer and to receive personal advice about the type of work best suited to their individual capacities. It is important that children in homes should attend for interview, and that a member of the staff of the home who knows the child's aptitudes and particular interests should be present. The placing facilities of the Youth Employment Service are available not only to young people on leaving school but at any time up to the age of eighteen. The Service has also certain responsibilities for keeping in touch with the boy or girl after he has been found work and until he reaches the age of eighteen. The objects of this procedure (called "review of progress") are to ensure as far as possible that the placing has been satisfactory, and to provide young workers with opportunities for discussing their progress and their problems with a Youth Employment Officer and for receiving such further vocational advice and assistance as may be necessary. The Youth Employment Service administers a scheme of training and maintenance grants under which young workers with special aptitude for a particular skilled industrial occupation (for which training facilities are not available within daily travelling distance of their homes) can receive financial assistance to enable them to take up training in that occupation with employers in other areas. Youth Employment Officers welcome the co-operation of those concerned with the care of the children. Those responsible for homes in which education is provided within the premises should ensure that full use is made of the facilities provided by the Youth Employment Service.

PROVISION FOR CHILDREN ON LEAVING CHILDREN'S HOMES

55. It is recognised that the transition to life outside cannot always be easy for those who have been brought up in a children's home. It is accordingly important that the older children should be prepared for this and should be given every opportunity to become self-reliant. For example, it will be helpful if they can have for a time before they leave a room of their own to accustom them to the conditions of increasing independence. It will usually be desirable for children to leave the home on reaching school-leaving age, or soon afterwards, although there can be no hard and fast rule and it may be right in exceptional cases for children to remain in the home beyond that age. The retention of girls in homes to do domestic work is deprecated. While children should leave the home well-equipped, they should retain some familiar articles of clothing as well as taking with them their personal possessions.

56. Section 19 of the Children Act, 1948, empowers local authorities, with the consent of the Secretary of State, to provide hostels for young people who are or have been in care and have reached school-leaving age. Where hostels are provided, local authorities should make use of their power to accommodate in them young people who have not been in the care of a local authority, and thus to enable those who are, or have been, in care to meet and live with others from ordinary homes.

AFTER-CARE

57. Where a child has left the care of a local authority or voluntary organisation since reaching school-leaving age, the local authority in whose area he is living, unless satisfied that the welfare of the child does not require it, have a duty to advise and befriend him until he reaches the age of eighteen. This task will normally be undertaken by the children's officer and staff, but the local authority, if satisfied in the case of a child who has left the care of a voluntary organisation that the organisation have the necessary facilities, may arrange for the voluntary organisation to undertake his after-care. The housemother or housefather should have a close link with the child, and co-operation between them and those responsible for after-care will often be of value.

58. It is hardly practicable to confine consideration of this subject to the records which should be maintained in respect of children who are in children's homes. For this reason, what follows is related to the maintenance of records in respect of all children in the care of local authorities and voluntary organisations.

59. It is essential that a comprehensive record should be kept of every child in care. These records will provide the material on which informed decisions about a child's future can be taken, and will form a continuing account of a child's progress including his progress at school. They will serve also as a means of checking whether action that should be taken has been taken, for example, whether a child should be restored to his parents, whether a child should be boarded out, and whether, if he is boarded out, the requisite visits have been paid to the child in his foster home. The building up of reliable records is not easy, and the staff should be given a full allowance of time for this work, which will be of value not only in relation to the individual child but also in the wider field of improving the knowledge of the treatment of children in care.

60. There should be a personal case history for every child in care. This might consist of a folder containing:—

(a) The basic record of all relevant information about the child and his family, including reports completed at the reception centre;

(b) history sheets with a continuing record of matters of consequence in the child's life, including relevant information about his health;

(c) copies of all reports, including school reports, court orders or correspondence concerning the child; and

(d) certificates, including birth certificate, photographs and other papers which the child may like to have later.

61. It will be wise to keep the entries in the history sheets factual and as simple as possible. Opinions about a child change and may vary from worker to worker; over-elaboration should be avoided, as records can quickly become the master and not the servant of those who use them.

62. It may not always be easy for the local authority or voluntary organisation to decide to whom the full records of the children should be made available. In the case of a local authority, it is to be expected that they will be seen by the children's officer, and the boarding out or other field staff concerned with the child's supervision. It is considered that the person in charge of a children's home should ordinarily have full information about the children. When a child is boarded out, sufficient information (including information about his health) should be given to the foster parent. In general, it is to be expected that it will be to the child's advantage if those immediately responsible for his care are informed about his background.

63. When a child is placed in a children's home, it will be for the responsible officers of the local authority or of the voluntary organisation to decide in what form information is to be given to the person in charge of the home. It is suggested that a copy of the basic record, a summary of relevant information contained in the history sheets, and copies of reports of interest should usually be given.

64. A central register of children in care is no doubt maintained by all local authorities and large voluntary organisations, and this would serve as an index to the personal case history folders. The records to be maintained by children's homes may be summarised as follows:—

(a) record of children admitted to the home, showing name, date of birth, religious persuasion, dates of admission and of leaving, and a record of absences;

(b) daily register of children in the home;

(c) personal case history for each child in the home, with a continuing record of matters of consequence in the child's life ;

(d) log book of events of importance in the life of the home ;

(e) records of the food provided ;

(f) record of weight and height (see paragraph 42 above) ;

(g) punishment book.

It is intended that the log book mentioned at (d) above should contain not a list of occurrences of everyday interest, but a record of events of importance such as affect materially the running of the home, that is, matters of which an official visitor to the home should take account. (See Regulation 3 (2) and the Schedule as to the records required to be kept.)

CONCLUSION

65. The success of family life within a children's home will be seen in the degree to which a child who has been brought up there feels himself to be an individual with rights and responsibilities, equipped to take his place in the world. Every aspect of life within the home should contribute to this end, since the aim of all that is done is to produce stable, happy and self-reliant citizens.

APPENDIX I

RECOMMENDATIONS RELATING SPECIFICALLY TO LARGE HOMES

1. This appendix contains recommendations relating specifically to large homes, and particularly to those which are organised neither as grouped cottage homes nor as boarding schools. The appendix is to be read in conjunction with the memorandum which, though written in the main with direct reference to children in care for an indefinite period who are being brought up in family groups, applies for the most part to all long-stay children's homes and, with necessary modifications, to short-stay homes.

2. The size of some homes, and the nature of their premises and organisation, are such as to make them in greater or lesser degree institutional in character and thus particularly unsuitable for young children. It is of the first importance that all possible steps should be taken to lessen the disadvantages of the large home.

3. Where the children do not go out to school, the home should be run as far as possible as a boarding-school with arrangements for the children to spend the school holidays with parents, relatives or foster-parents. It will be all to the good if some of those attending such a school are children living in their own homes. In other cases, the home might be organised, after suitable adaptation of the premises, in family groups, each under the charge of a house-mother, so that the conditions of a family group home are reproduced as nearly as possible. Where the nature of the premises makes this impracticable, it may be possible to adopt a house system. Whatever the method of organisation, the aim should be to secure that certain members of the staff have continuing responsibility for the care of certain children, so that constant change is avoided.

4. A defect of some large homes is that there is insufficient recognition of a child's need of occasional privacy, and that the children may never know what it is to be alone. Some small rooms, comfortably furnished and provided with small tables for study and quiet occupation, should always be available. There will be need for rooms with equipment for games and physical exercise, and for play in bad weather.

5. Reference is made in paragraph 17 of the memorandum to the undesirability of the children's using names suggestive of institutional life, such as master or superintendent, which are alien to the idea of family life.

6. The serving of all meals for the whole home in a central dining room is not conducive to a family atmosphere or to social training, and should be avoided where possible. As far as practicable, the staff should take their meals with the children who should usually be kept within their own family or house group at table, with their own housemother or housefather. Wherever possible, the housemother should give her children at least one meal a day (perhaps tea) in a room set aside for the use of the group

APPENDIX II

ON FIRE PRECAUTIONS

1. All children's homes must have adequate fire precautions and means of escape, but the measures to be adopted will vary widely with the age and number of the children and the type of building; the extensive precautions necessary in a large nursery, for example, will have no place in a family group home. The aim should be to provide for the safety of the children without adopting measures which are over elaborate or which might tend to differentiate the home too much from neighbouring premises.

2. The Chief Officer of the Fire Brigade should be asked to arrange for visits to all children's homes, and to advise on the suitability of the measures already adopted; he should be consulted also at the planning stage when premises are to be adapted to provide a home or when a new home is to be built. He should be asked to advise on fire drills, and, if there is no standing arrangement with the manufacturers for maintenance, to inspect patent fire extinguishers and other apparatus which may deteriorate.

3. Although the necessary fire precautions will vary widely, some features are common to most homes. The provision of adequate alternative means of escape, a simple but efficient warning system, and a method of rapid communication with the fire brigade are essential; fire drills should be held at frequent but irregular intervals to accustom the children to a routine that they may have to carry out in emergency. A good time for surprise drills is shortly before normal waking time. The need to hold fire drills more frequently in short-stay homes than in long-stay homes should be borne in mind.

4. While fire precautions and means of escape must be adequate, care should be taken to see that as far as possible they do not interfere with the running of the home or mar the internal or external appearance. This is particularly important with family group homes which, for example, will often be given an institutional appearance by an external steel fire escape; where an external escape must be provided, it should be sited, if possible, at the side or rear of the house. Similarly, internal escape ladders should be sited so that they do not restrict unduly the use of the rooms or spoil the appearance of living rooms. Escape hatches should be placed so as to interfere as little as possible with the normal life of the home.

5. Means of escape such as patent lowering lines, transportable ladders, chutes and similar equipment have various disadvantages and cannot usually be recommended with any degree of confidence for use in children's homes.

(See paragraphs 48 to 50 of the memorandum)

ON DISCIPLINE

1. Reasonable compliance with a code of conduct devised in the interests of the group is necessary, and this can be secured as children become socially adjusted. There may be special difficulty in the case of adolescent children who come into care and who have not learned to live as members of a group. Children can be helped most effectively by staff who understand their needs and can exercise imagination in their relations with them; an important factor is that children should be confident of, and secure in, the immediate and continuing interest of the staff.

2. Speaking broadly, happy children are good children. All children are naughty sometimes; their growing sense of personality leads them to trials of strength with authority and with each other. But if a child misbehaves persistently, there is need to discover what is wrong. Misbehaviour may be only naughtiness which can be dealt with by simple corrective measures, or it may be irrational conduct due to some underlying emotional disturbance, or a mixture of both. In the second case, punishment is not likely to eradicate it; those in charge of the child should direct their efforts to seeing that his difficulties are resolved. A child may, for instance, behave aggressively, sometimes because of an emotional disturbance such as jealousy, or a sense of inferiority, sometimes because he has found that it pays in getting his own way. In the one case, the feeling of jealousy or inferiority must be cleared away; in the other, the child has to be educated to control his desires and harmonise them with the interests of other individuals and of the group.

3. When correction is needed it should aim (as is suggested in paragraph 49 of the memorandum), at helping a child to develop self-discipline and a sense of responsibility towards the people with whom he lives. It should follow the fault as quickly as possible and, once over, the matter should not be brought up again. The aim should be to correct the child in such a way as to bring home to him the effect of his action on the group. Measures which are purely punitive in intention and effect make no contribution to a child's education.

4. As long as correction does not take a form which is likely to damage a child's self-respect, it is usually to his advantage to feel that he has paid for his fault and that the account is closed. Some deprivation of treats or of special kinds of food (for example, ices or a portion of his sweets) may be justified on occasion. At the same time, the privileges and treats which children enjoy should be regarded as a normal part of the life of the home and not as things which are given or withdrawn by way of reward or correction. The withholding of normal meals is open to objection, as is the practice of keeping a child in bed during the day. Regular meal times and bed times help to convey a sense of security, and interference with them as a punishment should be avoided. An early bedtime may be the right course to take with a child who has become irritable through tiredness.

5. It may be right sometimes to make a child help someone whom he has hindered by bad behaviour (taking care that help in the home is not degraded to the level of a punishment), or to give up some part of his pocket money towards the cost of making good something that he has spoilt wilfully or through disobedience or wanton carelessness. It is important that children should not be left with a sense of resentment. For this reason, mass punishment for the offences of individuals cannot be justified.

6. The effect of Regulation 11 is to prohibit corporal punishment of any kind, except:—

(a) smacking the hands of boys and girls under the age of ten; and

(b) caning (applied by the person in charge of the home), in the manner and to the extent permitted by the Regulation, boys who have reached the age of ten but not school-leaving age.

7. The provision for corporal punishment as referred to in the preceding paragraph has been included in the Regulations for use as a last resort. While it might seem natural to smack the hand of a small child in need of correction, to practise this indiscriminately would be to risk aggravating the condition of some children, who are troublesome because they are emotionally disturbed as a result of past experience. Although provision for corporal punishment has been made in the Regulations, it is open to any local authority or voluntary organisation to instruct their staffs that it is not to be used.

8. The Regulations do not attempt to prohibit specified punishments (other than corporal punishment of a kind not provided for in Regulation 11), because there would be inevitable omissions from any list of objectionable punishments. For example, no person with understanding of children could think a punishment suitable which had the effect of frightening a child, of isolating him from his fellows, or of leaving him unoccupied for long periods. Children should never be shut in dark places, or "sent to Coventry," or made to wear distinctive dress or left for long in an empty room. If it is necessary to remove a child from companions because he is hysterical or for some other good reason, one of the staff should be with him or within reach so that he cannot feel himself deserted. The setting aside of a quiet room may in itself provide a refuge for a child who needs to be alone.

Chapter 3:

Findings

Contents Para

Findings

1 In this Chapter we set out our findings volume by volume in respect of each module, preceded by a brief introduction explaining the institution(s) or topic examined by the Inquiry in that module. The full report in respect of each module will be found in the volume and chapter identified below at the start of each section. Because of limitations of size we have grouped the chapters relating to institutions and topics in each volume in sequences that are not necessarily in the order in which each module was dealt with by the Inquiry, but reflects a thematic link between the chapters.

2 We have arranged the chapters relating to each institution or topic in volumes in a sequence that enables the reader with a particular interest in several institutions or topics to find the chapters relating to those institutions or topics in the same volume or the preceding or succeeding volume. Thus we placed the chapter on child migration to Australia between the chapters relating to the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Derry and Belfast because the Sisters of Nazareth sent most of the children to Australia from Northern Ireland on the Child Migrants Scheme. The chapter on Fr Brendan Smyth was placed after the last chapter relating to the Sisters of Nazareth homes but before the chapter on Rubane House because he abused children in both homes. The chapters on Rubane and St Patrick's Training School were placed together in Volume 4 because both institutions were run by the De La Salle Order. The chapters relating to all the other juvenile justice institutions have been placed in Volume 5. The chapters in Volume 6 all relate to voluntary homes that were not run by central or local government, or by statutory authorities. Because of their size the five chapters relating to the Kincora Boys Hostel have been placed in Volumes 8 and 9, and Volume 10 consists of the report by the Acknowledgement Forum.

Volume 1 – Chapter 1 – Introduction

3 This explains the origin and Terms of Reference of the Inquiry, its structure, procedures and practices, as well as a brief overview of the social and economic background of Northern Ireland against which the residential institutions examined by the Inquiry have to be viewed.

Volume 1 – Chapter 2 – Governance and Finance

4 This chapter examines in detail the legal and government structures within which residential institutions operated during the period covered by the Inquiry's Terms of Reference, and the funding arrangements for those institutions. We made one finding in this chapter. While we do not underestimate the demands on the limited number of staff in SWAG (the Social Work Advisory Group) in the 1970s and early 1980s and recognise that they were contributing to policy developments and consultations at that time as well as maintaining some limited contact with children's homes. We accept that the visits SWAG made to children's homes meant that the children in those homes had the benefit of some external scrutiny of the conditions they were living in and the care they were receiving. However, as will be clear from our findings in relation to individual children's homes we found the lack of inspection by SWAG in this period amounted to a systemic failing by the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS) to ensure these homes provided proper care.

Volume 1 – Chapter 3 – Summary of Findings

5 In this chapter we briefly explain the nature of each institution or issue examined by the Inquiry during its public hearings, followed by a summary of the findings of the Inquiry in respect of the issues examined in respect of that institution or issue. As these are summaries, it should be noted that some headings may encompass several distinct findings of systemic failings of the same type. The summary is not meant to replace those findings, and the individual findings in each chapter represent our definitive findings.

Volume 1 – Chapter 4 – Recommendations

6 This chapter contains the recommendations of the Inquiry relating to an apology and a memorial, together with the Inquiry's detailed recommendations as to the scope of financial redress to be made to those who were abused while in residential institutions and homes within our Terms of Reference.

Volume 2 – Chapter 5 – Module 1 – Sisters of Nazareth, Derry

7 The Inquiry devoted Module 1 to the examination of evidence relating to two homes run by the Congregation of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry, namely St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca, and Nazareth House in Bishop Street. For simplicity's sake we referred in this chapter to St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca as "Termonbacca" as this was the name by which it was commonly referred to by witnesses and officials alike. These institutions were dealt with in the same module because there are a number of overlapping features of the manner in which they were run and other links between them although we examined them separately.

8 The Inquiry devoted thirty-nine sitting days to this module commencing on 27 January 2014, spread over ten sitting weeks from 27 January to 29 May 2014. During the ten sitting weeks, one of which (week 6) was a closed session, the Inquiry received oral evidence from sixty-two witnesses and received written statements from a further ten witnesses. The evidence of one other witness was not admitted because they failed to turn up or give a reasonable explanation for not doing so.

9 In addition to the oral and written evidence we have taken into account the detailed written and oral closing submissions made on behalf of fourteen individuals against whom allegations of abuse were made, and we also received written and oral admissions on behalf of the Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health and Social Services, each of which had statutory responsibility for these homes during the period with which we are concerned.

10 We also received oral and written submissions on behalf of the Health & Social Care Board, as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children in this area. We considered all of this evidence and paid careful attention to the various written and oral submissions which were made to us, however in accordance with our general approach and our Terms of Reference, we do not propose to refer to each and every detailed allegation that was made, whether against an individual or either institution, although we have taken all of the evidence and the submissions into account.

Findings in respect of the Sisters of Nazareth at Termonbacca

11 There was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care.

12 There was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by other adults, employees, visitors and priests towards children in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth.

13 There was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by older children towards children in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth.

14 There was emotional abuse in the form of improper behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

15 There was emotional abuse in the form of improper behaviour by other adults, namely employees, visitors and priests towards children in their care, behaviour which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

16 Individual sisters and those in positions of authority within the Congregation at Termonbacca were aware of the matters above.

17 Although there was evidence of poor childcare in some respects, we consider this did not amount to systemic neglect.

18 No, or alternatively inadequate, steps were taken by the Sisters of Nazareth to prevent such abuse.

19 Individual sisters, and those sisters in positions of authority within the Congregation, did not take proper steps to report such abuse to the relevant civil authorities, namely social services and the police.

Findings in respect of the Sisters of Nazareth at Bishop Street

20 There was improper physical behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care.

21 There was improper sexual behaviour by a visitor and by priests towards children in the care of the Sisters.

22 There was improper physical behaviour by older children towards children in the care of the Sisters.

23 There was improper behaviour by individual sisters towards children which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

24 The Sisters of Nazareth were aware of the abuse and took no steps to prevent such abuse.

25 The Sisters of Nazareth did not take proper steps to report such abuse to the relevant civil authorities, namely social services and the police.

26 The Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth did not take adequate steps to ensure that they had:

(a) suitable premises, and

(b) sufficient Sisters and lay staff, and

(c) suitably selected and trained sisters and lay staff to prevent abuse of the children in their care, and

(d) an adequate system of internal inspection, and

(e) an effective system of managerial support and supervision.

27 The Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth did not take sufficient steps to try to obtain adequate funding for either Termonbacca or Nazareth House.

Findings in respect of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services

28 The Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services failed to:

(a) construct, and

(b) implement an appropriately rigorous inspection regime to ensure that children in St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca and Nazareth House were safe from abuse.

29 The Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services did not take sufficient steps to ensure that St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca and Nazareth House were required and/or helped to provide:

(a) suitable premises, and

(b) sufficient Sisters and lay staff, and

(c) suitably selected and properly-trained sisters and lay staff to ensure that the children in these homes would be provided with childcare that was:

(i) in accordance with the standards of the time, and

(ii) of the same standard as that received by children in homes in the statutory sector.

Failings by the welfare authorities

30 Neither the county borough welfare committees (or the Western Health & Social Services Board as their statutory successor) as the statutory bodies which placed, or assumed responsibility for, children in care in St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca or Nazareth House, took adequate steps to monitor the care given to individual children in either home.

31 None of the statutory bodies which placed, or assumed responsibility for, children in either home took adequate steps to monitor the facilities for, and standards of care provided to, children in either home.

32 None of these statutory bodies took adequate steps to inform themselves of the provision made by the Sisters of Nazareth for the care of other children in either home whose circumstances might have brought those children within the responsibility of the statutory bodies concerned.

33 None of those statutory bodies provided adequate financial or administrative support for the children they placed in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth in either home.

Volume 2 – Chapter 6 – Module 2 – Child Migration to Australia

34 This portion of the Inquiry's Report is concerned with its investigations into why and how a number of children from institutions in Northern Ireland were sent to Australia, almost all of whom went in the years after the Second World War. When the Inquiry publicised its existence in Australia in 2013 we received a very large number of applications from people resident in Australia, mostly in Western Australia, and it became obvious that there were two main aspects of their experiences that required investigation: firstly, the allegations of abuse which they say they suffered in residential institutions in Northern Ireland before they went to Australia; and secondly, how and why these children were selected to go to Australia, because many allege that the process was itself abusive.

35 Many applicants were bitterly critical of the institutions for sending them to Australia, and of the Northern Ireland and United Kingdom Governments for permitting and facilitating their being sent to Australia. They also complain of the effect that being sent has had on their lives, not least because they allege they were subjected to serious forms of abuse in the institutions to which they were sent in Australia. In their evidence many described how they lost all contact with their parents and siblings. Although, after many years and much effort, some were able to re-establish some contact with their relatives, for others it was too late, because their parent had died, or, when they were able to trace their parent or family members, the reunions were not successful. Their complaints also extend to other matters, such as not being able to obtain birth certificates, or discovering that their names or dates of birth had been altered, things which created major difficulties for them in later life when they had to prove their identity for official purposes.

36 Many of those who spoke to us in person, or who described their experiences in their written statements, spoke movingly of the profound effect that being sent to Australia as children had upon them. Those who wish to study their accounts in greater detail will find them on the Inquiry website, together with the relevant documents and transcripts, at Days 42 to 50. The words of HIA 324[1] in his statement provide a striking example of the effect upon him of being sent to Australia as a child, views which are representative of the views of many applicants:

> "My life in institutions has had a profound impact on me. I have always wondered what it would be like to have had a family – a mother and father and brothers and sisters. I never got the chance to find out because I was sent to Australia. We were exported to Australia like little baby convicts. It is hard to understand why they did it. I know the theory – to populate Australia. I still cannot get over the fact that I was taken away from a family I never got the chance to know. I was treated like an object, taken from one place to another. I found it very hard to show affection to my children when they were young. I have improved as the years have gone on. I have a nightmare every night of my life. I relive my past and am happy when daylight comes."

37 HIA 324, who was born in 1938, was 75 when he spoke these words to the Inquiry legal team in Perth in 2013. Sadly he died before he was able to sign his statement and see the Inquiry consider his account, and the accounts of the other child migrants who have contacted us.

38 It became clear that many questions were raised by what we were told.

- Why were child migrants sent to Australia?
- How many were sent?
- Who sent them?
- Who decided that they would go?
- How were they chosen?
- Were their parents consulted?
- What happened before they were sent?
- How did they get to Australia?
- What happened to them when they got there?
- Were they able to contact their parents or families afterwards?

39 In this part of our Report we examine each of these questions except for "What happened to them when they got there?" We took the view that the institutions remained responsible for any child they sent until the child disembarked in Australia, and so we examined the arrangements that were made for the children travelling to Australia, and the conditions during the voyages to Australia.

40 We made clear at the beginning of the public hearings of the module relating to Australia that our powers do not permit us to investigate the experiences of the applicants in the institutions to which they were sent once they arrived in Australia.[2] However, in order to examine whether the institutions in Northern Ireland took any steps to keep contact with the children, or to inform themselves of the progress of the children, it was necessary for the Inquiry to know what the applicants themselves had to say about these matters. Almost every applicant was very concerned about the difficulties they experienced in later life because of the inadequate information available to them about their origins and families in Northern Ireland. In addition, the applicants themselves had much to say about their experiences in Australia. In order to obtain a complete picture of all these matters, when the Inquiry recorded statements from these applicants we therefore included their accounts of the experiences to which they say they were subjected in various institutions in Australia.

41 Many applicants who gave evidence to us in this module were unable to remember anything, or if they did they often remembered very little of their time in institutions in Northern Ireland. Where they can recall such matters, their evidence is referred to, where necessary, in those parts of our Report which deal with the particular institutions in Northern Ireland. This portion of our Report is solely concerned with the experiences of those who spoke to the Inquiry in relation to how they came to be selected to be sent to Australia, their experiences on the way to Australia, their experiences after they arrived to maintain contact with their relatives in Ireland during their childhood, or in later years, the success or otherwise of these efforts, and the effects on them of being sent to a different country many thousands of miles away as young children.

42 As part of our investigations we sent members of the Inquiry to Australia for approximately a month at a time in September to October 2013, and June to July 2014. On each occasion the team was made up of two members of the Acknowledgement Forum panel, two members of our legal team and two witness support officers. They went to Australia for two reasons. Firstly, to enable those applicants now living in Australia to have the same opportunity to describe their experiences to the Acknowledgement Forum as applicants who live in Northern Ireland and elsewhere. Some of the Australian applicants chose only to describe their experiences to the Acknowledgement Forum and did not wish to engage with the Statutory Inquiry element of the Inquiry's proceedings. The second reason was to enable our legal team to record witness statements from applicants in Australia, as well as to gather a considerable amount of documentary material and other information in relation to the matters which the Inquiry will consider later in this part of the Report.

43 Although the majority of the applicants who had been sent to Australia as children landed in, and still live in, Western Australia, some now live in other parts of Australia. In order to enable as many applicants as possible to speak to the Inquiry team at convenient locations, the Inquiry team saw applicants in Perth in Western Australia, in Brisbane in Queensland, and in Melbourne in New South Wales. Many of the applicants travelled considerable distances to speak to the Inquiry team and we are very grateful to them for doing so.

44 The Inquiry then devoted nine days of public hearings[3] to examining the experiences of those who were sent to Australia. During that time the Inquiry received oral evidence from eleven applicants. Three who were in Northern Ireland at the time were able to give evidence in person at Banbridge Courthouse, and the other eight did so by live TV-link from Australia. A further 38 witnesses gave their evidence in the form of the written statements which they had provided to the Inquiry; these were read out by Counsel to the Inquiry in public. Altogether we received evidence from 52 of the 65 applicants from Australia, because three further witnesses were not called during the Australian module but gave evidence in a later module in respect of their experiences in institutions in Belfast. Their evidence in relation to those institutions is considered in that part of the report that deals with those institutions, but their accounts of experiences relating to their migration to Australia are included in this portion of the Inquiry Report.

45 The remainder of the 65 chose not to speak to the Statutory Inquiry, and those who wished to do so spoke only to the Acknowledgment Forum. Sixty-five applicants represent almost half of all those whom we believe were sent to Australia from Northern Ireland as child migrants, and their evidence enabled us to piece together a detailed picture of many of the procedures involved.

46 The Inquiry received many helpful documents from applicants in Australia that greatly assisted us in our work. The Inquiry also carried out exhaustive searches in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI), as well as receiving evidence from the Sisters of Nazareth and the Health and Social Care Board. We also received helpful information from the Child Migrants Trust (CMT) and from Tuart Place in Australia. Documents we obtained from the National Archives of Australia at the end of the module threw considerable light on the arrangements for child migration to Australia between 1938 and 1950, and this file was subsequently added to the evidence bundle.

47 We wish to place on record our thanks to the Royal Commission, which provided staff to accompany applicants at the locations in Australia from which they were speaking to the Inquiry by live link, thereby enabling us to provide the same level and type of support to witnesses giving evidence as we did for witnesses in Northern Ireland. We are also most grateful to the Chief Justice of the Family Court of Western Australia, and to his staff, and to the staff of the Family Court of Australia at Melbourne, for their invaluable help in making available their premises and staff to allow applicants to give evidence by live link.

48 The Inquiry was fortunate in securing evidence from Dr Ann Mary McVeigh, of the Public Records Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI), and from Dr Margaret Humphreys OBE, OAM. Dr McVeigh made available to us her thesis on the topic 'History of the Child and Juvenile Migration Schemes to Australia', for which she was awarded a doctorate by The Queen's University Belfast in 1995. The greater part of the information contained in the portion of the Report relating to the historical background to child migration to Australia is drawn from Dr McVeigh's work, supplemented by her oral evidence.

49 The topic of child migration to Australia is one that has generated a considerable amount of controversy in both the United Kingdom and in Australia for more than 20 years. It was brought to the attention of the wider public by the work of Dr Margaret Humphreys in particular, and by her book Empty Cradles: One Woman's Fight to Uncover Britain's Most Shameful Secret, published in 1994. Not only did this provide much important background material for the Inquiry, but Dr Humphreys also prepared a detailed witness statement to which we refer later in this Report. In that statement, and in her oral evidence, she described many of the problems faced by former child migrants in re-establishing contact with their families in Northern Ireland and elsewhere, and the impact of their experiences upon them. These were matters which were also dealt with by applicants in their witness statements.

50 In addition, the Inquiry received a document entitled 'Report on the Impacts and Outcomes of Child Migration Experienced by Former Child Migrants in Northern Ireland', prepared by Dr Philippa White, Director of Tuart Place.[4] The accounts given by many of the witnesses and Dr White's report, taken together with the evidence of Dr Humphreys, provided a great deal of information which we shall consider later. We also received helpful information from Prof. Gordon Lynch, Michael Ramsay Professor of Modern Theology at the University of Kent. Prof. Lynch has made a special study of child migration, and his 2016 book Remembering Child Migration: Faith, Nation-Building and the Wounds of Charity[5] deserves to be read by everyone interested in the history of child migration.

Findings relating to the Northern Ireland Government

51 It was indifferent to the practice of the voluntary sector in Northern Ireland of sending child migrants to Australia.

52 It failed to fully inform itself as to what was happening once it became aware that significant numbers of such young children were being sent to Australia by voluntary organisations such as the Sisters of Nazareth.

53 It failed to make any enquiries whatever as to the fate of these children.

54 It failed to make any representations to the United Kingdom Government about the operation of the child migrant schemes.

55 The Minister of Home Affairs was wrong to approve the proposal by Tyrone County Welfare Committee that HIA 354 should be sent to Australia.

Findings relating to Tyrone County Welfare Committee

56 It was wrong to send HIA 354 to Australia.

57 It failed to give proper weight to the effect of severing contact between HIA 354 and his brother and sister when seeking approval from the Minister.

58 It failed to inform the Minister that HIA 354 had a brother and sister who were also in the care of the Committee.

59 It failed to inform the Minister that the foster parents of HIA 354 wished to adopt him.

Findings relating to the Irish Church Missions and Manor House Home

60 The home was wrong to send children to Australia who were so young.

61 The home failed to take sufficient steps to maintain contact with the children after they went to Australia.

62 The home did not give truthful information to parents of the children who enquired where their child was.

Findings relating to the Sisters of Nazareth

63 They were wrong to send children to Australia who were so young.

64 They failed to make any enquiries to satisfy themselves that the homes run by other Roman Catholic religious orders in Australia were suitable to receive their children.

65 They failed to take sufficient steps to maintain contact with the children after they went to Australia.

66 They did not give truthful information to parents of the children who enquired where their child was.

67 In many cases they did not provide detailed, accurate and timely responses to enquiries by former child migrants for information that would have assisted them to trace their parents and relatives.

Findings in respect of all institutions that sent children to Australia

68 Failing to ensure that those who accompanied the children were competent to look after the children during the voyage.

69 Failing to ensure that a suitable case history was sent with each child to the institution to which the child was being sent.

Volume 3 – Chapters 7, 8 & 9 – Module 4 – Sisters of Nazareth, Belfast

Volume 3 – Chapter 7 – Module 4 - Introduction and common issues

70 In Module 4 we considered two Roman Catholic children's homes, Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge, which were sited near each other, about one and a half miles south of Belfast city centre. The Module commenced with an introduction by Senior Counsel on 5 January 2015, and continued until 19 May 2015 when there were closing submissions. In all, there were 41 days of hearings allocated to this Module.

71 In total, evidence was received concerning the two homes, either in person or through the reading of their statements, from a total of 117 witnesses who had been in Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge as children. Of these, (taking account of witnesses who were in both homes) 74 gave oral evidence in this module. Thirty-three other witnesses, such as sisters, houseparents, social workers or inspectors also gave oral evidence. More people spoke to the Inquiry about the Belfast Nazareth homes, therefore, than about any other homes.

72 There were 50 applicants who had been resident in Nazareth House who contributed statements. The evidence of ten of these witnesses was read out as they were unable to attend for health reasons, and two because the witnesses sadly had died since preparing their statements. Three did not engage further with the Inquiry. One witness had given his evidence about Nazareth House during the module on Rubane. We therefore heard oral evidence from 34 witnesses.

73 We received evidence from 52 former residents of Nazareth Lodge. The statements of five were read out because of the ill health of the applicants, and two because of the deaths of the applicants, again sadly before they could give oral evidence. Five of the witnesses had given their evidence in the Rubane module, so that in this module we received oral evidence from 40 witnesses. In all, 31 of the people who gave evidence to the Inquiry concerning the Belfast Nazareth homes had also been in Rubane, as from 1953 to 1972 the boys in Nazareth Lodge were usually transferred there at the age of eleven. Two of the witnesses were not applicants but were former residents, one of them appearing at the request of the Sisters of Nazareth.

74 A number of children were sent to Australia as child migrants from both homes. Of these, two former residents from Nazareth House and one from Nazareth Lodge gave oral evidence during the module, and have been included in the figures above. There were also ten more applicants from Nazareth House and twelve from Nazareth Lodge who gave evidence during the module concerning Australia. Their evidence is dealt with in Chapter 6. One of these witnesses had been in both homes, and so in total, therefore, 24 child migrants who had been in Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge gave evidence to the Inquiry. It should be noted that many applicants who gave evidence in other modules provided only limited accounts of their time at Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge.

75 We received evidence from seven social workers, six middle and senior managers in the social services and five members of the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) or Social Services inspectorate (SSI). One teacher, one GP, one chaplain, one handyman, two volunteers, five houseparents and eight sisters provided evidence. Three of these people did not appear due to ill health; the remainder gave both written and oral evidence. The evidence of all but one related to Nazareth Lodge, mainly because Nazareth House closed in 1984 and they provided evidence concerning enquiries into complaints about Nazareth Lodge in the following years. In addition, one sister who gave evidence had moved from one home to the other, and her evidence related to both homes.

76 Submissions were also received from Sister Brenda McCall on behalf of the Sisters of Nazareth, from the HSCB on behalf of the predecessor bodies which had provided social work support for the children and their families, and from Dr Hilary Harrison for the then Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

77 We are indebted to the witnesses, all of whom came to address disturbing and painful personal memories or difficult issues for which their organisations had been responsible. The memories recounted to us typically related to events between forty and eighty years ago, and we have been aware that while the details of some incidents have remained sharp because of their emotional impact at the time, other memories are hazier or may have been influenced by the sharing of accounts or the passage of time. We are aware that for a small number of applicants who came to tell us of their experiences there has been the added shock that other witnesses have accused them of bullying or some form of abuse, and coming to terms with the perceptions of others will have added to their distress.[6]

78 The Congregation emphasised the risk entailed in relying on memories that may be faulty or false. We have been alert to the need to cross-check witnesses' written and oral evidence for consistency with the evidence of others and surviving documentation. As might be expected, we have come across errors and inconsistencies. One witness, for example, thought that as a very young child she had been in Nazareth House, but written records indicated that she had confused the home with another institution; in view of her age at the time and the length of time since her period in care, such confusion is thoroughly understandable.

79 The fact that we have quoted witnesses extensively does not mean that we have accepted their versions of events unquestioningly. We appreciate that some evidence will have been affected by exaggeration or false memories, and the fact that we have not qualified every statement with a clause to state that this is the witness's allegation should not be taken to imply that we accept or reject the particular observation.

80 However, the more witnesses who repeated similar accounts of life in the two homes, and the more substantiating detail they provided, the more persuasive they proved to be. It is not our role to decide precisely what happened in relation to each allegation or to determine the guilt of individuals, but to conclude whether on balance there were general systemic failures. The volume and detail of the evidence has been sufficient to provide us with a full picture of what life was like in the two homes and to reach conclusions about the allegations of systemic abuse. It should be noted that, while many witnesses have been quoted in this chapter, on most subjects there were many others who have not been quoted but who provided corroborative evidence.

81 Inevitably, the applicants to the Inquiry have largely been people who had unhappy experiences about which they wished to complain, and drawing together their evidence in this chapter has also been a selective process, primarily identifying the failings of the homes. The picture painted, therefore, is inevitably not a balanced account of life in the homes.

Findings relating to both homes

82 We consider the failure to meet the statutory requirement for both Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge to be visited monthly to have been a systemic failure.

Volume 3 – Chapter 8 – Module 4 – Nazareth House, Belfast

83 Many of the tasks which the girls were required to perform were of little use to them as preparation for managing their own households, and in our view the excessive chores expected of the girls constituted systemic abuse.

84 The infrequency of changing bath water, the use of carbolic soap to clean teeth, the use of Jeyes fluid in the bath, the rough treatment when bathing and the queuing were outdated institutional practices which should have been superseded or never adopted in the first place, and they constituted systemic abuse.

85 The punitive approaches described in the evidence would not have given the children any sense of security but would have added to their anxiety; the measures would have been ineffective in dealing with enuresis and constituted very poor childcare practice, amounting to systemic abuse.

86 The home nursing described was very poor in terms of the failure to take some problems seriously, the rudimentary treatment given, the physical abuse on some occasions, and the lack of loving care for children who were unwell. This amounted to systemic abuse.

87 There was no valid childcare justification for confiscating the children's personal possessions, and this constituted systemic abuse.

88 During the earlier decades, the combination of aspects of poor childcare (such as excessive chores, an institutional approach to bathing, the use of Jeyes fluid, the handling of menstruation and sex education, the poor quality of food, the insistence on eating unwanted food, the failure to celebrate birthdays, the poor quality of education at the school on the premises and the failure to prepare children for discharge) which were all below the standard which might reasonably have been expected at that time and we consider amounted to systemic abuse.

89 The public corporal punishments inflicted in the 1950s constituted systemic abuse.

90 The range and variety of examples and the number of witnesses, particularly in relation to SR 189, SR 31, SR 134 and SR 116, indicate that the physical abuse practised by the staff was systemic.

91 We conclude that the emotional abuse suffered by some girls was systemic.

92 We consider the lack of inspection amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure that the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

Volume 3 – Chapter 9 – Module 4 – Nazareth Lodge, Belfast

93 By the 1980s the bathing system used at Nazareth Lodge should have been abandoned long before and its continuation represented systemic abuse.

94 When Jeyes fluid was first developed in the late nineteenth century it was used for many purposes, but by the 1950s it should not have been used in baths or for hair washing. This practice was well out of date and in our view its use amounted to systemic abuse.

95 There was no justification for SR 118's cruel conduct in dealing with enuretic boys, which amounted to systemic abuse.

96 We accept that force-feeding took place and it constituted systemic abuse.

97 We consider the Sisters' failure to pass relevant information about a child's time in Nazareth Lodge, even if little was known about their lives before coming into the care of the Sisters of Nazareth, was unacceptable and showed a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well-being which we considered amounted to a systemic failing.

98 Taking account of all the aspects of daily life in the home, for the most part they constituted poor, out of date childcare practice, and we consider this was systemic abuse.

99 The physical abuse by staff, particularly on the part of SR 118, SR 34, NL 4 and NL 5, was so extensive that it created a punitive atmosphere. It was contrary to good childcare practice, the policy of the Order and the statutory Regulations under which the home worked. Furthermore the Sisters failed to apply a system of staff selection, supervision and management to prevent or limit the abuse. This was a case of systemic abuse and systemic failure.

100 The name-calling, denigration of parents, lack of care for sick boys, the emotional impact of physical punishment, and the lack of individual care in these examples all constitute emotional abuse as well as unacceptably poor child care practice, and we consider them to have been systemic abuse.

101 It was the use of charge boys to supervise younger boys in the absence of the sisters which predictably led to the most serious bullying. To rely on the older boys to control the younger ones unsupervised was a systemic failing.

102 In leaving the care and control of the younger boys to the older charge hands, the opportunities for sexual abuse were increased, and this amounted to systemic abuse.

Failings of the DHSS

103 We agree with the conclusion of the Hughes Inquiry that the frequency of inspection was unsatisfactory and consider the lack of inspection of Nazareth Lodge in that period amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

104 It is our view that in this instance the Department failed to accept its overarching responsibility for ensuring that the safety of children in residential care was maintained. We consider that this was a systemic failing.

105 We acknowledge that the Department was breaking new ground in drafting the complaints procedure at this time but we are critical that it included that agencies should undertake internal investigations of complaints and we are critical of the Sisters for conducting the investigation secretively.

Finance

106 We conclude that the shortage of finance and its consequent impact on staffing levels and physical standards of care amounted to a form of neglect and constituted systemic abuse. Although both central government and the welfare authorities bore some responsibility, this was primarily the responsibility of the Sisters of Nazareth.

Volume 3 – Chapter 10 – Module 6 – Father Brendan Smyth

107 John Gerard Smyth joined the Norbertine Order as a novice in 1945, and took the name Brendan, and so he was known as Fr Brendan Smyth for the remainder of his life. He was ordained a priest in 1951 and remained a priest until his death in 1997 while in prison in the Republic of Ireland. Until he was arrested and sentenced in Northern Ireland in 1994 he committed acts of sexual abuse against an unknown number of children in Northern Ireland, in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere. Although he was convicted of 43 separate offences against 21 children in Northern Ireland for offences committed between 1964 and 1984, and a further 74 separate offences committed against another twenty children in the Republic of Ireland for offences committed there between 1967 and 1993, he admitted on a number of occasions that he did not know how many children he had abused, saying that it could be hundreds.

108 Amongst the 43 offences in Northern Ireland to which he pleaded guilty in 1994 and 1995 and for which he was sentenced to a total of four years imprisonment, three related to children who were in Nazareth House in Belfast, and five related to children in Nazareth Lodge, also in Belfast, both of which were children's homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth. However we accept that he also committed offences against other children, some of whom he also abused in either Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge. He is also alleged to have abused children in two other children's homes in Northern Ireland. One was the home for boys at Rubane, Kircubbin, Co. Down, run by the De La Salle Order, and the other was the home for girls run by the Sisters of St Louis at Middletown, Co. Armagh.

109 Fr Smyth committed offences against many more children, and in many other places, as well as against children who were in those four children's homes in Northern Ireland. Because our Terms of Reference required us to examine whether there were systemic failings on the part of those responsible for children in residential homes in Northern Ireland, our focus had to be on how he was able to commit offences against children in those homes.

110 As Fr Smyth was able to move around and abuse children for so many years, and because the failings of several organisations and individuals contributed to his ability to abuse children over many years in different places, it was necessary for us to consider whether that abuse could have been stopped in those homes in Northern Ireland. The events surrounding his abuse of children in different places over many years were so inextricably interlinked that it was impossible to isolate what happened in the four homes in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference from the wider picture of his offending outside those homes, and the failures to protect children from him.

111 For that reason it was necessary to refer in some detail to allegations of abuse of children by Fr Smyth elsewhere, and to consider the response of various organisations and individuals to those allegations. We were aware that Fr Smyth was alleged to have abused children in schools, in the homes of their parents, on visits to Dublin, and in places as far apart as Wales, Scotland and the United States of America. We had to refer to those allegations in order to see when those organisations and individuals were aware of the threat he posed to boys and girls with whom he came in contact as a priest, and to examine what those organisations or individuals did, or did not do, as a result of this knowledge.

112 It may seem to some of those who were abused by him on those occasions that we should have devoted more attention to those allegations, but were we to examine those other allegations in detail that would have exceeded our Terms of Reference. Nevertheless, by confining our investigation into his activities in this way it should not be thought that we did not appreciate the effect of his activities on those children who do not come within our Terms of Reference, or the implications for organisations or individuals in other countries outside our Terms of Reference.

The Norbertine Order

113 Permitting Fr Smyth's ordination despite a clear warning from the Abbot General that Fr Smyth should not be ordained.

114 Failing to:

(a) properly assess the grave risk Fr Smyth posed to children; and

(b) warn the bishops of the dioceses to which he was sent in later years, namely

- Menevia in Wales
- Annan in the Diocese of Galloway
- Providence, Rhode Island, USA
- Fargo, North Dakota, USA.

115 Taking deliberate decisions to withhold information about Fr Smyth's background when he was sent to other dioceses.

116 Giving advice from the Abbot General that it was not necessary to send that information to other dioceses.

117 Failing to act on credible reports of Fr Smyth's sexual abuse of children.

118 Allowing repeated efforts to be made to 'cure' Fr Smyth by sending him for various forms of medical treatment on several occasions, even though it was clear from continuing complaints that, despite earlier treatments, he was continuing to abuse children.

119 Failing to insist that he provided adequate information as to the nature and extent of his treatment, and the prognosis, from the various doctors who treated him.

120 Deciding not to withdraw his access to a car, thereby enabling Fr Smyth to travel freely and abuse children in many homes and locations in both Northern Ireland and the Republic, even after he had been charged by the police in 1991.

121 Failing to confine Fr Smyth to the Abbey in Kilnacrott and thereby keep him away from children.

122 Failing to report Fr Smyth to the police and social services in either Northern Ireland or the Republic of Ireland, thereby preventing him from being prosecuted and convicted, and so enabling him to continue his abuse.

123 Failing to have in place adequate procedures:

(a) to prevent Fr Smyth being ordained;

(b) to have Fr Smyth reported to higher authority in the Order, and to the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes in Rome when the members of the Order received definite information that he was committing crimes against children.

124 Failing to notify the bishops of the Diocese of Down and Connor and the Diocese of Kilmore of the dangers Fr Smyth posed to children in their dioceses when he was known, or suspected, to be going to these dioceses.

125 Failing to vigorously pursue the existing procedures and to notify the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes of Fr Smyth's crimes.

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Kilmore

126 Failing to notify the police and social services in the Republic of Ireland when the 1973 complaint was received, and failing to institute ecclesiastical proceedings against Fr Smyth at that time.

127 Failing to have Brendan Boland's father in the room with the child whilst the child was being questioned; and in the case of FBS 39 failing to notify his parents of the alleged abuse, or to have his parents present during questioning. In both cases there was also a failure to follow up with the parents of each child how the child was reacting to the abuse afterwards.

128 Failing to take all the steps open to the diocese to thoroughly investigate each allegation relating to Fr Smyth that came to its notice and to report the matter to the proper civil and ecclesiastical authorities on each occasion.

129 Failing to inform the civil and ecclesiastical authorities in Belfast about what had, or may have happened, to the two named children from Belfast.

130 Failing to report the allegations relating to Fr Smyth to the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes.

131 Failing to exercise sufficient pressure on Abbot Smith to take vigorous action against Fr Smyth, such as laicisation or restricting his freedom of movement.

132 Failing to use the existing process properly by short-circuiting matters and proceeding directly to investigate Fr Smyth instead of referring the matter to the Archdiocese of Armagh.

133 Failing to ensure that all Fr Smyth's ecclesiastical faculties were permanently withdrawn.

134 When the faculties were renewed from year to year, failing to take proper steps to ensure that Fr Smyth was not still offending.

135 Failing to warn other dioceses, and in particular the Diocese of Down and Connor, about the allegations so that they could take steps to protect the children in homes in their diocese from being abused by Fr Smyth.

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Down and Connor

136 Failing to disseminate to other bishops and institutions the concerns known to the Diocese about, and later the knowledge of, the sexual abuse alleged against Fr Smyth.

137 Failing to report the allegations against Fr Smyth to the social services and the police in Northern Ireland when they were received by the Diocese.

138 Failing to institute a penal investigation or process against Fr Smyth in the Diocese of Down and Connor on the basis of the allegations of his abuse in that Diocese.

139 Failing to exert greater pressure upon Abbot Smith in 1971, by (1) asking for urgent and immediate information, and for that to be confirmed; (2) threatening to institute the church inquiry process in Down and Connor against Fr Smyth as had been done in Kilmore by Bishop McKiernan.

The Sisters of Nazareth

140 The failures of SR 31 and SR 46 to report the complaints made to them about Fr Smyth to the mother superior.

The De La Salle Order

141 Failing to notify the police and social services in Northern Ireland of the allegations against Fr Smyth made to BR 1.

Volume 4 – Chapter 11 – Module 3 – Rubane House, Kircubbin

142 The Inquiry devoted Module 3 to the examination of evidence relating to Rubane House (Rubane), a home run by The Institute of the Brothers of Christian Schools, a Roman Catholic male religious order, on behalf of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Down and Connor. The Institute of the Brothers of Christian Schools has always been best known throughout Ireland as the De La Salle Order and it will be referred to as 'the Order' in this chapter of the report.

143 The Inquiry devoted 30 sitting days spread over eight sitting weeks to this module, commencing on 29 September 2014 and finishing on 17 December 2014. Fifty-seven former residents of Rubane applied to give evidence to the Statutory Inquiry and we heard oral evidence from 47 of them. The witness statements of six applicants were read to the Panel during Module 3: four were read because they were unable to attend for medical reasons;[7] and, sadly, two because the applicants died before they could give oral evidence.[8]

144 The statements of two witnesses were also read because they had previously given evidence in person in Module 1, which dealt with the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Derry/Londonderry, and had only brief comments to make about their time in Rubane.[9]

145 We also heard evidence in Module 3 from two former residents of Rubane put forward as witnesses by the Order.[10] A statement from another witness[11] put forward by the Order was submitted towards the end of the module; we took this statement into account but did not consider it necessary to ask him for the evidence to be given in person.

146 The statement of one witness[12] was discounted because he failed to attend to give evidence and provided no reason for his lack of attendance.

147 The evidence of four witnesses was heard in Module 4,[13] which dealt with the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Belfast, as these applicants had only brief comments to make about their time in Rubane. Three gave their evidence in person and the statement of the fourth was read because he was unable to attend for medical reasons.

148 Therefore, in total, the Inquiry had the benefit of receiving evidence from 60 former residents of Rubane. Twelve of these former residents were admitted to Rubane in the 1950s, 26 in the 1960s, seventeen in the 1970s and five in the 1980s.

7 HIA16, HIA 160, HIA 262 and HIA 388.
8 HIA 159 and HIA 427.
9 HIA 381 and HIA 382.
10 DL 40 and DL 455.
11 DL 244.
13 HIA 89, HIA 368, HIA 210 and NL 122/DL 208.

149 The Order provided written responses to each witness statement and we took these responses into account. We also received written statements from nine current and former brothers of the Order[14] who lived and worked in Rubane and received oral evidence from five of these brothers.[15] BR 2 gave evidence on two occasions; on the first he responded to allegations made against him and on the second, as a former brother director of Rubane, he provided more general information about how the home operated and was managed.

150 Brother Pius McCarthy, the Provincial Secretary to the Order in Ireland from 1974 to 1976 and from 1995 until his death in May 2014 provided witness statements and helpful background material to the Inquiry. The current Irish Provincial, Brother Francis Manning, also provided written statements and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Order.

151 Four former members of lay staff who worked at Rubane[16] gave evidence in person to the Inquiry. The Inquiry was only able to locate one former member of lay staff, DL 11, towards the end of the module. We accepted there were good reasons why he could not attend in person at short notice and took his written statement into account.

152 The Inquiry also considered statements from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) and the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS), each of which had statutory responsibility for the registration and regulation of Rubane as a children's home. We heard oral evidence from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of the DHSSPS and from a former employee of the Social Work Advisory Group[17] who was involved in the regulation of Rubane.

153 The Health & Social Care Board (HSCB), as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children placed in Rubane, provided written evidence including statements from fifteen current and former social workers who had experience of Rubane, as well as from Valerie Watt, the current Chief Executive of the HSCB. We considered these statements and asked for, and received, oral evidence from five of these individuals.[18]

14 BR 2, BR 3, BR 7, BR 10, BR 25, BR 29, BR 33, BR 62 and BR 77.
15 BR 2, BR 7, BR 10, BR 29 and BR 77.
16 DL 1, DL 81, DL 509 and DL 149.
17 DL 521.
18 DL 503, DL 515, Mr Bunting, DL 516 and DL 517.

154 Father Timothy Bartlett, Episcopal Vicar for Education and Director of Public Affairs for the Diocese of Down and Connor, provided statements and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Diocese.

155 We also considered documentation relating to police investigations and civil claims against the Order that identified 158 former residents of Rubane who did not apply to the Inquiry but who alleged similar types of physical and sexual abuse as that alleged by witnesses to the Inquiry. Counsel to the Inquiry brought relevant information from these investigations and civil proceedings to the attention of the Panel during the public hearings. Rubane was considered by the Committee of Inquiry into Children's Homes and Hostels chaired by His Honour Judge William Hughes (The Hughes Inquiry) and we considered the findings of that Inquiry in relation to Rubane.

156 We also considered written and oral closing submissions from the De la Salle Order, the DHSSPS, the HSCB and eight individuals[19] against whom allegations of abuse were made. In total, we considered almost 40,000 pages of documentation in this module, 20,000 pages of which were provided by the police.

Findings relating to the Ministry of Home Affairs

157 It failed to insist from the outset that Rubane be developed on the smaller children's home model in line with government policy.

158 It contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while over-crowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory.

159 It failed as the registering body to clarify with the Diocese and the Order the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care.

160 It failed to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing the number of boys accommodated to more than double from 30 to 71 within six years without requiring the necessary improvements to the facilities or increases in staffing levels.

19 BR 2, BR 3, BR 10, BR 25, BR 62, BR 77, HIA 21 and HIA 147.

161 It failed to seek confirmation of who was the administering authority for Rubane and failed to check that monthly visiting was happening and thereby allowed crucial aspects of the statutory framework designed to promote and protect the welfare of children in voluntary homes to be ignored by the Diocese and the Order.

The Department of Health & Social Services

162 It failed to inspect the standard of care being provided in Rubane between 1976 and 1981.

163 It failed to ensure that the inspections of Rubane that were carried out in the 1970s gained a genuine insight into the quality of care being provided.

164 It failed to properly respond to the concerns raised by the EHSSB in 1981 about the general care provided to all boys in Rubane and thereby failed to acknowledge and exercise its statutory authority and powers as the registration and inspection body for Rubane

165 It failed to maintain information about an investigation into sexual abuse in a children's home in a manner that allowed its existence to be known to relevant staff and thereby shared with the Hughes Inquiry.

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Down and Connor

166 It contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while overcrowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory.

167 It failed to clarify with the Order and the MoHA as the registering body the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care.

168 It failed to meet statutory regulations for voluntary children's home, in particular it failed to confirm the administering authority for Rubane and to appoint a monthly visitor.

169 It failed to take responsibility for negotiations with the MoHA about the development of the home and by only holding annual meetings of the governing board during the Order's negotiations with the MoHA caused delay and late interventions in planning.

170 It failed to hold meetings of the governing board between 1968 and 1972 and between 1982 and 1985 and thereby to assure itself of the quality of care being provided in Rubane.

171 It failed, through the chaplains appointed to Rubane, to find a means that respected the seal of confession but enabled information provided by boys about the physical and sexual abuse they were suffering to be shared with the relevant bishop and acted upon.

172 It failed through Father McCann's response to the first assault by BR 77 to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

Findings relating to the De La Salle Order

173 It contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while overcrowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory.

174 It failed to clarify with the Diocese and the MoHA as the registering body the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care.

175 It failed to meet statutory regulations for voluntary children's home, in particular it failed to confirm the administering authority for Rubane and to appoint a monthly visitor.

176 It failed to prevent excessive physical punishment by some brothers and lay staff.

177 It failed to prevent random violence by some brothers and lay staff which in some cases amounted to serious physical assault.

178 It failed to ensure that corporal punishment was administered in line with statutory regulations and the Order's own rules.

179 It failed to accurately record and report the use of corporal punishment as required by statutory regulations.

180 It failed to deal adequately with incidents of physical violence by brothers and lay staff towards boys which were brought to the attention of Brother Directors.

181 It failed to take necessary action to enable the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving physical abuse.

182 It failed to inform the Department or the Health and Social Services Boards about the search of Rubane and the reasons for it and therefore did not work with them to identify and manage any continuing risk to the welfare and safety of the boys in Rubane at that time.

183 It failed to report serious assaults by BR 77 to the police in order to protect the brother and the reputation of the Order rather than protect vulnerable children.

184 It failed to curtail BR 77's contact with children while he was subject to police investigations about physical assaults of boys in Rubane and instead moved him to work in a school.

185 It failed to provide guidance and effective supervision to brothers and to ensure, particularly in the earlier years, that they had a reasonable workload that avoided excessive contact time with the boys.

186 It failed to provide guidance and effective supervision to lay staff in Rubane, particularly to those who were clearly having difficulties in meeting the challenges of working with adolescent boys.

187 It failed to address understaffing, thereby allowing a lack of oversight of the brothers' interactions with boys, particularly in the evenings and at night time, that enabled sexual abuse to occur and continue unchecked.

188 It failed to properly investigate allegations of sexual abuse.

189 It failed to take necessary action to enable the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving sexual abuse.

190 It failed to report its investigation of the allegations of sexual abuse against BR 17 to the governing board, the MoHA or the police.

191 It failed to be truthful about the extent of BR 14's sexual abuse of boys and deliberately misled the MoHA about it.

192 It failed to report its investigation of the allegations of sexual abuse by HIA 36 against BR 15 to the governing board, the MoHA or the police.

193 It failed to implement and monitor adherence to its rules about how brothers should manage their interactions with boys and thereby betrayed the implicit trust that other bodies such as the MoHA, the welfare authorities and the Diocese placed in the Order as a faith-based organisation suitable to be entrusted to run a residential home for children.

194 It failed to curtail the activities of BR 17 or increase monitoring of him despite suspicions that he sexually abused boys in Rubane and then moved him to a school where he would have continued trusted access to children which he ultimately abused.

195 It failed to report brothers who admitted sexual abuse of children to the police and thereby protected the position of such brothers and the reputation of the Order rather than seeking to prevent further harm to children.

196 It failed to keep boys free from the pain, fear and distress caused by the physical and/or sexual abuse they suffered or witnessed others suffering in Rubane.

197 It failed to limit the boys' help with potato-picking to the farm in Rubane and instead required them to pick potatoes and undertake other types of labour in neighbouring farms in adverse weather and with inappropriate clothing.

198 It failed to ensure initially that all boys in Rubane were adequately clothed and in later years up to 1981 failed to ensure that all boys were appropriately clothed.

199 It failed to require the Sisters of Nazareth to provide relevant information about at least a child's time in Nazareth Lodge when they were being transferred to Rubane and thereby demonstrated a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well being.

Findings in respect of Welfare Authorities

200 In the period prior to the opening of chalets in 1968 they failed to address the fact that the home they were placing boys in had inadequate facilities and was poorly staffed.

201 The EHSSB failed to alert social workers to the police investigations in 1980 into physical and sexual abuse in Rubane.

Volume 4 — Chapter 12 — Module 7 — St Patrick's Training School

202 The seventh Module concerned four training schools, the first being St Patrick's, a Roman Catholic school run by the De la Salle Order. The Module commenced on 1 September 2015, Day 134 of the Inquiry, with a general introduction to the training school system by Senior Counsel, followed by an address by Junior Counsel concerning St Patrick's, and it ended on 14 October 2015, Day 150.

203 A total of 27 applicants provided statements which related to St Patrick's. Of these, eleven were read out for various reasons. Two had sadly died, some had given evidence in a previous module about another home, so their observations on St Patrick's had been provided earlier, and some were unwell. One witness who had provided a statement decided not to give oral evidence after consultation with counsel on the day. Four former residents at St Patrick's also gave evidence, while not being applicants. In all, we therefore received oral evidence during the Module from 19 witnesses who had been resident in the training school. A further 39 former residents had given information to the police about allegations or had made civil claims, so that evidence was considered from a total of 70 people who had attended St Patrick's.

204 Seven brothers and seven other members of staff gave oral evidence. One witness who had inspected St Patrick's gave evidence. Mary Madden, who had worked for the Northern Ireland Office in the final years of our remit when the NIO bore responsibility for the training schools, and Karen Pearson, who represented the Department of Justice and the then Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety, gave evidence. The Diocese of Down and Connor, the De la Salle Order and the Health and Social Care Board were also represented as core participants.

205 We are indebted to all these witnesses for providing their accounts of events at St Patrick's. We are aware that recalling difficult times and presenting evidence in a public hearing will have been stressful for many witnesses, but both the written and oral evidence was invaluable in providing a full picture.

Findings

206 The failure of St Patrick's to conform to the Training School Rules in respect of secure accommodation, and of the Inspectorate to note the breaches and take action, constituted systemic abuse.

207 The use of informal corporal punishment was systemic abuse.

208 Permitting older boys to punish others when supervising them in the dormitory was a breach of the Training School Rules and was systemic abuse.

209 The humiliation of stripping a boy naked to stand in full view on a number of occasions constituted systemic abuse.

210 The failure to report the abductions of Bernard and Gerard Teggart to the Police was clearly a systemic shortcoming on the part of the Brother Director. The failure of the Board of Management to meet immediately after the boy's death, to investigate and to provide support to the staff and boys was negligent and constituted systemic abuse.

211 There is nothing to suggest that the NIO took any steps following the death of Bernard Teggart to investigate whether any policies or procedures needed to be changed to protect boys from suffering a similar fate, and their failure to do so represents a systemic failing on their part.

213 The failure to circulate the findings of the report on absconding from Rathgael more widely and assist St Patrick's in finding ways of dealing with persistent absconding was a systemic failure on the part of the NIO.

214 Furthermore, the APRU, which had been set up as a combined unit to support all the training schools and which had undertaken the research on absconding, also failed to share their findings with St Patrick's, when they must have known that it had a similar problem.

215 The failure of St Patrick's to take adequate measures to counter absconding constituted systemic abuse, in that it left boys vulnerable in terms of the risks they faced when absconding, in the patterns of criminality which were fostered while absconding, and in the effect of their absconding pattern on their later lives.

216 We consider that the frequency with which the secure rooms were used and their use for young children, contrary to the Training School Rules, amounted to systemic abuse on the part of St Patrick's and by the SSI in failing to address this breach of the Rules.

217 The failure to appoint sufficient staff amounts to systemic failure.

218 We consider it to be a systemic failure that St Patrick's was not inspected between 1971 and 1988, and we consider the lack of formal inspections a systemic failing.

219 The sexual abuse perpetrated by the Brothers, particularly as reported in the television room, was systemic.

220 BR 1 sexually abused boys while he was at St Patrick's and this constituted systemic abuse; if he had been apprehended and had not been promoted to be Brother Director of Rubane House, the boys there would not have been abused by him.

221 Bishop Farquhar was at fault in failing to suspend BR 26 during the police enquiries, and St Patrick's was at fault in undertaking their own limited investigation. These failures were systemic, potentially putting the boys then and subsequently at St Patrick's at risk.

222 The failure of the Brother Director:

(i) to inform both the police and his Committee of the allegations of abuse by DL 137 in 1978 and again in 1980,

(ii) to dismiss DL 137, permitting him to resign,

(iii) to protect potential victims of sexual abuse in providing DL 137 with a positive job reference which omitted the reason for his departure from St Patrick's were systemic failures.

223 The prevalence of unauthorised physical punishment in the 1960s and early 1970s was contrary to the Training School Rules, and constituted systemic abuse.

224 It was a systemic failure that potential whistle-blowers felt unable to speak up.

Volume 5 – Chapter 13 – Module 7 – Introduction

225 In Module 4 we considered Nazareth Lodge, which was an industrial school until 1950. In Module 7 we heard witnesses from St Patrick's, which was an industrial school and reformatory until 1950, when it became a training school. In the same Module we also considered Rathgael, a training school which admitted both boys and girls, a few of the witnesses having also been in Malone or Whiteabbey, Rathgael's predecessors. We also heard from applicants who had been in Lisnevin, a secure training school, and Hydebank, a young offenders' centre. In Module 10, witnesses who had been in Millisle, a borstal, gave evidence. In Module 11 we heard from applicants who had been in St Joseph's, which was the only training school specifically for girls which we considered.

Volume 5 – Chapter 14 – Module 7 – Rathgael Training School

226 Rathgael was registered as a training school for boys in 1968, but its role was rooted in the earlier history of the reformatory and industrial school system in Northern Ireland, and in particular Balmoral Industrial School, Malone Reformatory and Whiteabbey, a school for girls.[20]

Findings

227 RG 17's practice of using frequent unrecorded informal corporal punishment was unacceptable and amounted to systemic abuse.

228 NIO's failure to ensure that Rathgael was inspected from 1973 to 1987 was a systemic failing.

229 The extent of the unregulated physical punishment applied by some staff amounted to systemic abuse.

230 The failure to prevent bullying by peers amounted to systemic abuse.

231 The lack of training in control and restraint was a systemic failing.

232 RG 47's sexual exploitation of HIA 236, his failure to raise concerns about HIA 236's crush with colleagues and their failure to question the relationship properly all constituted systemic abuse.

233 A small number of staff sexually abused girls during this phase and this amounted to systemic abuse.

20 For a fuller history of Rathgael and its predecessor institutions, see RGL 22202-22246. We are indebted to Campbell Whyte and Lindsay Conway for much of the information describing the running of Rathgael.

Volume 5 – Chapter 15 – Module 7 – Lisnevin Training School

234 We considered evidence about Lisnevin Training School (Lisnevin) during Module 7, which dealt with juvenile justice institutions. Module 7 commenced on 1 September 2015 and concluded on 24 November 2015. Twelve applicants referred in their written statements to time they spent in Lisnevin. Two of these applicants, HIA 320 and HIA 50, referred to spending periods in Lisnevin but made no further comment about their time in the school.

235 The evidence of HIA 418 and the responses to it were summarized as HIA 418 could not attend in person for medical reasons. We set aside the evidence of HIA 275 and did not take it into account as he did not appear to give evidence in person and gave no reason for not doing so. We heard evidence in person from the remaining eight applicants.

236 Dr Bill Lockhart OBE, a chartered forensic psychologist, provided psychological services in Lisnevin from 1973 until 1983 as part of the Adolescent Psychology Research Unit (APRU). Dr Lockhart provided a detailed statement with exhibits about Lisnevin[21] and gave evidence in person. We also received a statement[22] and evidence in person from LN 25 who worked as a care worker and then manager in Lisnevin. LN 8, a former teacher in Lisnevin, provided a written statement.[23]

237 We considered response statements to the evidence of applicants and contemporaneous documentation to support these statements provided by the Department of Justice (DoJ) and the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB).

238 We were assisted by a joint statement submitted by the DoJ and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS), which provided background information about the establishment and operation of Lisnevin.[24] The DoJ also provided a helpful and detailed closing submission responding to the evidence given about Lisnevin during Module 7.[25]

239 We were also assisted by a written statement and exhibits from Alan Shannon CB,[26] a retired civil servant who held senior policy and operation responsibility for training schools from 1990 to 1992 and a statement from his successor Mary Madden CBE, who held that responsibility from 1992 to 1995[27] and who gave evidence in person during our consideration of St Patrick's Training School.

240 Dennis O'Brien was appointed deputy headmaster at Lisnevin when it first opened. Later in his career he was appointed as an inspector with the Social Services Inspectorate (SSI) and in that role he was a member of the team who undertook the first SSI inspection of Lisnevin in 1988. Mr O'Brien provided a statement which we also took into account.[28]

Findings

241 The lack of schooling from September 1981 to May 1982 amounted to a systemic failing by the Lisnevin Management Board, the NIO and the Department of Education to ensure the institution provided proper care.

242 The failure of the director to refer allegations of the assault of a boy by staff to the RUC amounted to a systemic failing to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

243 The delay in providing adequate training for staff in control and restraint methods amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

244 Accommodating boys in bedrooms with limited furnishing and making them store their clothes in the corridor outside their bedroom amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the institution provided proper care.

245 The use of a tariff system of standard sanctions, and the associated reduction in managerial involvement and oversight of use of separation, amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

246 The failure to address inadequate staffing levels which were clearly having an impact on the daily experience and care of the boys amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Board and the NIO to ensure the school provided proper care.

28 LSN 875-877.

247 The lack of inspection of Lisnevin from when it opened in October 1973 until the first inspection by the SSI in April 1988 was a systemic failing by the NIO to ensure that the school was providing proper care.

248 The leave arrangements during the summer months, which led to a dependence on casual staff, was a systemic failing by senior managers to ensure the school provided proper care.

Volume 5 – Chapter 16 – Module 7 – Hydebank Wood Young Offenders Centre

249 During Module 7 we heard evidence from four witnesses who were admitted to Hydebank Wood Young Offenders Centre (Hydebank) during the period 1983 to 1990. HIA 275 referred to his time in Hydebank in his statement but we left his evidence out of account as he failed to appear to give evidence in person or to provide a reason for not doing so.

250 We also heard from Maxwell Murray who commenced work as the deputy governor of Hydebank on October 1984 and remained there until April 1987. He acted as governor of the facility for most of the last two years he worked there. Mr Murray provided a very full and helpful statement to the Inquiry and appended exhibits of relevant documentation, for example guidance provided to officers about what type of clothing inmates should be allowed to wear,[29] and how they should report incidents and occurrences.[30] His statement and exhibits amounted to 1,202 pages. We are grateful for the detailed background information Mr Murray provided about how Hydebank operated in the period he worked there and for his responses to the evidence witnesses gave about their time in Hydebank. We also received a helpful statement and exhibits about the use of control and restraint techniques in Hydebank from Mr David Dowds of the Northern Ireland Prison Service.

251 We were assisted by a joint statement for this module provided by the Department of Justice (DoJ) and the Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and a closing submission provided by the DoJ. We considered response statements to the evidence of witnesses from the DoJ, the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and from a former prison officer, HB 4, who responded to specific allegations made against him.

30 HYD 1311.

Findings

252 On admission to Hydebank boys experienced a strict regime, and the repetitive cleaning tasks and requirement to maintain their cells to a strict high standard were aimed at ensuring inmates conformed to the discipline of Hydebank and the authority of officers. It is probable that some officers took the approach of intimidating boys at the committal stage in order to enforce obedience and discourage any resistance to the regime.

253 Hydebank was a prison and was dealing with some boys who had been found unmanageable in open training schools, and a firm approach was necessary in order to maintain discipline. Despite that imperative, the evidence of Mr Murray and that provided through inspection reports and reports of the visiting committee indicated that a progressive regime was operated that allowed boys to gain privileges and to move purposefully towards release. That evidence also indicated that there was a range of educational, vocational and training activities available to the inmates.

254 The witnesses we heard from had negative experiences in Hydebank and did not consider their time there in a positive light. However, having carefully considered the evidence provided to us, we decided that the complaints we received did not amount to evidence of systemic abuse in Hydebank.

Volume 5 – Chapter 17 – Module 10 – Millisle Borstal

255 Woburn House, as it was officially known, was a borstal for males aged sixteen to twenty-one from 1956 to 1980, but it was usually known as Millisle Borstal. It was designed to provide training for work, education and leisure activities for young offenders who were unsuited to training schools and who would otherwise have been sent to prison.

256 The Inquiry addressed the allegations of ten applicants in Module 10, which commenced with an introduction by Junior Counsel on 18 January 2016. Seven applicants were heard in person and two statements were read out on the grounds of the ill health of the applicants, HIA 262 and HIA 320. The statement of one further witness, HIA 294, was based on the account he gave to the Acknowledgement Forum, as he had hoped to give evidence in person but was sadly deceased before he was able to prepare a witness statement. Evidence was heard from three former officers and one former governor (Duncan McLaughlan), as well as Stephen Davis on behalf of the Department of Justice. Evidence for the Module was completed on 26 January 2016.

257 We wish to express our appreciation for the help provided by the witnesses concerning their experiences as trainees at Millisle, nearly all of whom had already given evidence in relation to other residential institutions. We are aware that recalling such memories can be a painful process. We are grateful to all those in the Department of Justice who identified relevant records and contributed to the statements for the Inquiry presented by Stephen Davis, the Director of Operations for the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS). We are indebted to the officers who were employed at Millisle for providing first-hand recollections, and in particular to Duncan McLaughlan who was Governor during the period covered by most of the allegations.

258 Nearly all the evidence was provided by the Department of Justice, but some records, such as Prison Service personnel details, were not available, presumably as a result of destruction of files considered to be no longer required. In particular, there was a review of records at Millisle in May 1977 at which it was noted that there were 'dead' files for over a thousand trainees and these were presumably destroyed.[31] There are therefore some gaps in our knowledge. Unlike other institutions investigated by the Inquiry there were no social services files concerning the trainees during their time in Millisle as there were no social workers actively involved with them then. There was also very little police documentation, as (with one exception) the witnesses had not complained to the police and their allegations had not been investigated previously.[32]

259 We accept that there was on occasion low-level violence in the closed unit between 1977 and 1980. This was contrary to Governor McLaughlan's instructions and may have reflected working practices introduced by prison officers from other prisons in the early months of the closed section, but it was unacceptable and constituted systemic abuse. It is our further conclusion that on occasion low-level physical abuse was also reported in the open borstal, and that this was also systemic abuse.

260 We consider Officer Skillen's behaviour to have been systemically abusive.

261 We also consider it a systemic failure that at times information about Officer Skillen and his misconduct failed to reach senior officers who could have taken action, and that when it did reach them, as reported in the evidence, they failed to take action.

32 MIL 106-107.

262 The Prison Service complaints system whereby trainees could address complaints to the Governor, the Visiting Committee or the Department was undermined by the pressures exerted by prison officers and rendered largely ineffective, and we consider this to have been a systemic failure.

263 The emotional impact of the training methods in the closed unit and the emotional damage associated with physical abuse constituted systemic abuse.

264 The night staffing was insufficient to prevent peer abuse, and the failure to protect trainees was systemic.

Volume 5 – Chapter 18 – Module 11 – St Joseph's Training School

265 In Module 11 we considered evidence about St Joseph's Training School (St Joseph's) which was run by a Roman Catholic congregation, the Sisters of St Louis. Module 11 commenced on 8 February 2016 and concluded on 22 February 2016. We received evidence from sixteen former residents of the school, five of whom gave evidence in person during Module 11: HIA 203; HIA 178; HIA 161; HIA 198; and HIA 376.

266 The statements of two former residents, HIA 249 and HIA 176, were summarised and read out during Module 11 because they were unable for medical reasons to give evidence in person. We also took into account statements from three former residents of St Joseph's who wanted to tell us about their positive memories of the care they received in the school: SJM 73; SJM 74; and SJM 75.

267 Two former residents, HIA 49 (Day 9) and HIA 233 (Day 16) gave evidence in person about their time in St Joseph's during Module 1, which dealt with children's homes in Londonderry run by the Sisters of Nazareth. Four other former residents - HIA 124 (Day 96), HIA 195 (Day 101), HIA 175 (Day 100), and HIA 84 (Day 109) - gave evidence in person about their time in St Joseph's during Module 4, which dealt with children's homes in Belfast run by the Sisters of Nazareth.

268 During Module 11 we heard evidence in person from four nuns who worked in St Joseph's: SR 235, SR 234, SR 247 and Sister Canice Durkan. We considered helpful statements from SR 240 who was the Director of St Joseph's for almost thirty years from 1972 to 2000. Unfortunately SR 240 was unable for medical reasons to give evidence in person. We also considered a statement from SR 254. In addition to these statements the Sisters of St Louis provided written responses to the statements of former residents and related contemporaneous documentation.

269 A former member of lay staff of St Joseph's, SJM 4, provided a statement in response to allegations made against her and a written closing submission. SJM 56, who was HIA 176's social worker when she was in St Joseph's, provided a statement about his work with HIA 176.

270 We were assisted in developing our understanding of the establishment and operation of St Joseph's by the access we were given to extensive records relating to the school, which were maintained and retained by the Sisters of St Louis. These included daily logs, visitors' books, punishment books, the minutes of meetings of the Board of Management and quarterly returns about the use of corporal punishment, which were submitted to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA). We were also assisted by police material and civil claim papers in relation to St Joseph's.

271 The Department of Justice (DoJ) provided a general statement about St Joseph's and written responses to the statements provided by former residents. However, it was unable to provide detailed responses to the statements of applicant witnesses born before 1957 as its records for residents of St Joseph's only extend back to those born after that year. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) provided witness statements about the inspection and regulation of St Joseph's.

272 The Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) provided a general statement about St Joseph's and written responses and background documentation about the involvement that any of its predecessor bodies had in the care of applicant witnesses.

273 The Sisters of St Louis, the DoJ, HSCB and the DHSSPS also provided written closing submissions. We are grateful for the evidence all witnesses provided for this module and the assistance it gave us in considering whether there were systemic failings in the care provided in St. Joseph's.

Failings by the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Northern Ireland Office

274 The lack of formal inspections in the period from 1968 to 1987 was a systemic failing by the MoHA, and then the NIO, to ensure that St Joseph's was providing proper care and meeting statutory requirements about the operation of training schools. This meant that girls in the school at that time did not have the benefit of external monitoring of the facilities and practices in the school.

Failings by the Sisters of St Louis

275 During the period of SR 237's directorship, between 1957 and 1971, she was physically abusive to girls to the extent that it amounted to systemic physical abuse.

Volume 6 – Chapter 19 – Module 8 – Barnardo's

276 The Inquiry devoted Module 8 to the examination of evidence relating to two homes run by the organisation now known as Barnardo's, but for most of that time as Dr Barnardo's, in Northern Ireland. These homes were known as Macedon and Sharonmore, and were dealt with in the same module because Sharonmore succeeded Macedon, and many of the applicants, and much of the evidence, related to a period when some of the applicants were in one or other of the two homes. Some at least of the issues and the evidence relating to these issues overlapped both homes.

277 The Inquiry devoted two weeks covering eight sitting days between 7 December 2015 and 17 December 2015, during which we heard oral evidence from three applicants and received the written statement from a fourth. We also received oral and written evidence from Lynda Wilson, the Director of Barnardo's Northern Ireland, and from five former employees of Barnardo's. The Inquiry tried unsuccessfully to locate BAR 2, but on 17 December 2015 he made contact with the Inquiry. He was then provided with the relevant evidence, and ultimately provided the Inquiry with a statement dated 24 February 2016. He was offered the opportunity to give oral evidence but declined to do so.[33]

278 We had written submissions from a number of those who were the subject of allegations, as well as submissions on behalf of Barnardo's, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MOHA), and the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS), which had statutory responsibility for these homes during the period with which we are concerned. We also received written submissions on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB), as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children they placed in Barnardo's.

Findings of systemic failings by Barnardo's in relation to Macedon

279 The failure to detect the bizarre behaviour of BAR 3, and then to take appropriate action, were systemic failures because they demonstrated a lack of knowledge of what was happening among the staff on the part of management at Macedon.

280 We consider the amount of unsupervised access by BAR 4 to HIA 216, and the failure of Barnardo's to inform the EHSSB that this access was taking place, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to provide proper childcare.

281 There were systemic failings in the way in which the allegations about BAR 3 were handled by Barnardo's staff at Macedon.

(1) They were not reported for some months by BAR 8 to BAR 24.

(2) A deliberate decision was made by BAR 24 not to report the full facts to his superiors or to anyone else.

(3) BAR 75 does not seem to have reported the remark made to him by BAR 47 that BAR 3 was a "real fruity boy" to his superiors at Barnardo's.[34]

282 The reluctance on the part of some Barnardo's staff in Northern Ireland in the 1980s to report allegations about staff to the proper authorities was a systemic failing.

283 The manner in which the relationship between HIA 516 and BAR 12 was allowed to develop, and the length of time for which it was allowed to continue, represented systemic failures by Barnardo's to ensure proper childcare of HIA 516.

284 The 'wooden spoon' episode, and the way it was ultimately dealt with, represented a number of systemic failings on the part of Barnardo's.

- The three staff who struck HIA 101 acted in breach of Barnardo's policy of no corporal punishment.

34 BAR 8619.

- That each resorted to the use of a spoon in such an impulsive fashion suggests this may well have not been the only occasion that staff resorted to a wooden spoon to administer minor corporal punishment.
- To admonish the three staff, and to place a note on each of their personal files, was an inadequate and inappropriate response. The proper course to have taken at that time would have been for each to have received a formal written warning.

285 The way in which BAR 1 was allowed to frighten children with ghost stories and the 'evil eye' practice, and that it went unreported and/or undiscovered for several years, represented a sysytemic failure by Barnardo's staff to exercise proper supervision.

286 BAR 1's bathing of male children who were of an age when they should have been left completely to bath themselves was an unacceptable practice which should not have been allowed to occur. That it was allowed was due to inadequate supervision of BAR 1 by management at Macedon, and amounted to a systemic failing.

287 BAR 1 had shown herself to be a completely unsatisfactory employee to be placed in the care of children for a considerable period of time before she finally resigned and Barnardo's failure to terminate her employment at an earlier stage represented a systemic failing to ensure that suitable staff were in place to look after the children in Barnardo's care.

288 We agree that the failure of Barnardo's management to investigate the nature of Mains's connection with BAR 1 and Macedon represented a systemic failing on the part of Barnardo's.

289 The failure to prevent the relationship between BAR 2 and BAR 47 developing, and then to put a stop to it, represented a systemic failing on the part of the management at Macedon to ensure proper standards of professional behaviour on the part of BAR 2.

290 There was poor management at, and of, Macedon during BAR 1's employment.

291 There was a failure on the part of the management at Macedon to ensure proper standards of professional behaviour on the part of BAR 2.

292 The failure to carry out inspections of Macedon in the 1970s.

Volume 6 – Chapter 20 – Module 9 – Manor House

293 The Inquiry devoted Module 9 to the examination of Manor House Home (Manor House), a children's home in Lisburn, County Antrim. Manor House was run by The Society for the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics, which was a mission agency associated with the Church of Ireland. The organisation is now known as the Irish Church Missions (ICM) which is a registered charity concerned with the encouragement of Gospel growth in Ireland.

294 The Inquiry devoted four sitting days to this module commencing on 5 January 2016 and finishing on 8 January 2016. We received complaints about Manor House from six former residents. We heard evidence from two of these witnesses, HIA 346 and HIA 341, on 4 September 2014, as part of Module 2 of the Inquiry which dealt with child migrant schemes. During Module 9 we heard three witnesses, HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 366, and a summary of the statement of HIA 289 who was unable to attend in person for health reasons.

295 HIA 354, who gave evidence on 3 September 2014, during Module 2 of the Inquiry, referred to a brief stay he had in Manor House in November 1950 prior to being sent to Australia. HIA 354's only memories of Manor House were of being taught hymns and being given a bath and new clothes prior to his departure to Australia. He had no complaints about how he was treated in the home.[35]

296 In addition to the evidence from witnesses, we considered information provided by the ICM about the establishment and operation of Manor House and its written responses to the statements provided by witnesses about the home. Reverend Edmund Coulter, the current Superintendent of ICM and Reverend Courtney, a retired Church of Ireland clergyman, gave evidence in person. Dr Hilary Harrison provided a written statement and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS). Fionnuala McAndrew, Director of Social Care and Children's Services, Health and Social Care Board, provided a statement and exhibits on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB), and the HSCB also provided written responses to the statements from former resident witnesses.

297 We also examined police material about investigations into allegations of peer sexual abuse in Manor House, sexual abuse of a resident by an adult visitor to the home and sexual abuse of another resident by a man unconnected to the home.

298 We spent some time considering the initial funding and inspection of the home by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA). This was because the MoHA's engagement with Manor House provided the only example we are aware of where the MoHA contemplated removing registration granted to a voluntary children's home under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968.

Findings of systemic failings by the ICM

299 The irresponsible approach by the General Committee of the ICM to re-open Manor House as a children's home amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

300 The general state of dilapidation of Manor House in 1953, the inadequate sleeping, toilet and washing facilities for the children, the poor heating and the low staffing levels amounted to a systemic failing by the Management Committee to ensure the home provided proper care.

301 The harsh response by staff in the 1940s and 1950s to children who suffered from enuresis, including segregating these children and making them sleep in unacceptable conditions amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

302 The Management Committee's delay in appointing an officer in charge during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and its failure to appoint a monthly visitor amounted to a systemic failing to meet statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

303 The Management Committee's failure in the early 1970s to engage directly with the MoHA to find out more about and address Miss Forrest's criticisms of the home amounted to a systemic failing on its part to ensure the home provided proper care.

304 In relation to the sexual abuse of HIA 365, HIA 290 and HIA 289 by a male visitor to the home there was a systemic failing on the part of the staff to take proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

305 The extent of sexual activity between boys in the home in the period 1975 to 1977 indicates a lack of supervision of children particularly at night time which amounted to a systemic failure by staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose peer sexual abuse in the home.

306 The lack of investigation of the claim by MH 25 that MH 39 had sexually interfered with another girl in the home as well as her amounted to a systemic failing by staff to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

307 The lack of supervision that allowed MH 23 to be sexually active from an early age with girls and boys in Manor House amounted to a systemic failing by staff to prevent, detect and disclose abuse in the home.

308 MH 9's decision with Assistant Principal Social Worker MH 73's in 1980 that an informal approach should be used to deal with a member of staff hitting a child with a stick amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

The Ministry of Home Affairs and the DHSS

309 The lack of inspection of Manor House for a period of over two and a half years following the initial registration of it as a children's home amounted to a systemic failing to ensure the home provided proper care.

310 The failure to ensure that an officer in charge was appointed during the period August 1963 to June 1965 and arrangements were in place for monthly visiting amounted to a systemic failing to implement statutory requirements and ensure the home provided proper care.

311 The low level of formal inspections of the home in the 1960s, and the MoHA's failure to raise Miss Forrest's criticisms of the home in the early 1970s with the Management Committee, amounted to a systemic failing by the MoHA to ensure the home was providing proper care.

312 The continuing lack of formal inspections in the 1970s when the SWAG took over responsibility for inspection of children's homes on behalf of the DHSS was unacceptable and amounted to a systemic failing by the DHSS to ensure the home was providing proper care.

The SHSSB

313 Assistant Principal Social Worker MH 73's agreement with MH 9 in 1980 that an informal approach should be used to deal with a member of staff who hit a child in the care of the SHSSB with a stick amounted to a systemic failing by the SHSSB to ensure the home provided proper care.

Volume 6 – Chapter 21 – Module 12 – Good Shepherd Sisters

314 As the Chairman explained on 4 November 2015, and again in his opening remarks at the start of this module on 7 February 2016, in this module the Inquiry investigated only those allegations made to it in relation to institutions in Northern Ireland run by the Roman Catholic female religious order The Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd (also known as the Good Shepherd Sisters) by those witnesses who were under the age of eighteen when they were placed in one of these institutions. This was because only children in residential care who were under the age of eighteen are within our Terms of Reference. For convenience in this chapter we refer to the Congregation as the 'Good Shepherd' or the 'Good Shepherd Sisters'.

315 The Inquiry investigated allegations relating to Good Shepherd institutions at three locations in Belfast, Derry and Newry. Because of the small number of applicants to the Inquiry who were in each institution, and because some of them were in more than one of the institutions, we decided to investigate all three in the same module. Module 12 started on Monday 7 March, 2016 and the public hearings extended over seven working days, finishing on Tuesday 15 March, 2016.

316 Although there were a number of references by witnesses to their experiences, or the experiences of others, when working in laundries in the three institutions we have investigated, the Inquiry has not engaged in a wider investigation into what are commonly called Magdalene homes or laundries, or mother and baby homes. Because such institutions contained adults over the age of eighteen, and as our Terms of Reference confine us to examining residential homes or institutions for children under eighteen, the experiences of people in such institutions who were over eighteen are outside our Terms of Reference. Whether their experiences should be investigated is a matter for the Northern Ireland Executive and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

317 During Module 12 we heard from nine applicants, seven in person and two whose written statements were read out because they were unable to attend due to poor health. We also received two statements from individuals who came forward to offer favourable accounts of their time as children when they were looked after by the Good Shepherd Sisters in these three institutions.

318 We heard evidence from five Good Shepherd sisters who served in one or more of the three homes at various times, and from Sr Ethna McDermott on behalf of the Congregation. We received witness statements and substantial quantities of material from the Good Shepherd Sisters, from the HSCB, and a small amount of material from the PSNI. We also received a witness statement from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of the Department of Heath, Social Services & Public Safety.

319 We concluded that there were the following systemic failings on the part of The Congregation of the Good Shepherd Sisters.

The Good Shepherd Sisters

320 It was unacceptable for young girls under the age of eighteen to be expected to do industrial work in the Good Shepherd laundries.

321 Permitting girls to be asked by a priest whether each was a virgin was a systemic failing.

322 The practices of reading out misdemeanours in front of others and making the offender kneel, or making an offender stand to eat her meal was a systemic failing.

323 By accepting children under school-leaving age, such as HIA 107 and her companions, on a long-term basis the Good Shepherd Sisters failed to ensure that proper care was provided for these children.

324 The failure of SWAG to carry out inspections of each of the three Good Shepherd Sisters Homes was a systemic failing.

325 The failure of each of the three Good Shepherd Sisters Homes to put in place a system of monthly visitors was a systemic failing.

The Ministry of Home Affairs

326 Failing to take steps to prevent children under school-leaving age, such as HIA 107 and her companions, being in the Good Shepherd on a long-term basis.

The Ministry of Home Affairs and/or the DHSS

327 Failing to detect the absence of a system of monthly visitors was a systemic failing on the part of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Social Work Advisory Group.

Volume 6 – Chapter 22 – Module 15 – Bawnmore Boy's Home

328 Although Bawnmore Boys' Home was examined as part of Module 15 of the Inquiry because a number of those who were resident there were later moved to Kincora Boys' Hostel, we considered that Bawnmore should be dealt with in a separate chapter of our Report. Bawnmore is not to be confused with another children's home of the same name in South Belfast. The Bawnmore in this chapter was the home at Mill Road, Newtownabbey, County Antrim, which existed between 1952 and 1977.

329 The evidence relating to Bawnmore was considered on Days 208, 209 and 210, during which we heard evidence in person from four applicants: HIA 112, HIA 532, HIA 199 and HIA 409. We considered the evidence of HIA 83 who gave evidence at an earlier stage of the Inquiry, and we considered it unnecessary to ask him to give evidence again. We also received evidence from two former members of staff: BM 4 gave evidence in person, whilst BM 13 provided the Inquiry with a written statement.

330 We received a witness statement from Fionnula McAndrew on behalf of the Health and Social Care Board, as the successor to the Belfast Welfare Authority and the Northern Health and Social Services Board (NHSSB), which took over Bawnmore with the reorganisation of local government in 1973 and ran it until it closed in 1977. We also received a witness statement from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of what was at that time the Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and is now the Department of Health, and from Richard Pengelly, who is Permanent Secretary of the same department.

331 Bawnmore was one of the houses investigated by the Hughes Inquiry because of offences involving the abuse of children at the home. The offences came to light during the wider Caskey Phase One investigation by the RUC, which had been set up following the publication of the article in the Irish Independent of 24 January 1980 to which we refer in greater detail in the chapters relating to Kincora. The Caskey Phase One investigation was not simply confined to Kincora; it covered a number of children's homes or hostels, including Bawnmore. As a result of that investigation the police uncovered allegations against five men, two of whom (Peter Bone and Robert Elder) were prosecuted, pleaded guilty and were sentenced by Lord Lowry, Lord Chief Justice, on 16 December 1981 for offences relating to Bawnmore, at the same time that Mains, Semple and McGrath were sentenced for offences related to Kincora, and Eric Witchell was sentenced for offences relating to Williamson House.

Belfast Welfare Authority

332 The failure to vet Peter Bone amounted to a systemic failing by the Belfast Welfare Authority.

333 The failure of BM 1 to report the abuse of HIA 532 by Bone to his seniors.

334 In relation to the allegations made against Elder by HIA 532 to BM 3.

- BM 3 did not make a written record of the allegations, or of Elder's response.
- BM 3 did not investigate the allegation about the photographs made by HIA 532 against Elder by asking to see them as he should have done.
- BM 3 did not report the matter to his superiors as he ought to have done.

335 The number of boys who were subjected to sexual abuse by staff members.

336 The failure of the Welfare Committee to fulfil its statutory duty to carry out inspections.

337 The failure by SWAG to carry out inspections.

Volume 7 – Chapter 23 – Module 5 – Fort James Children's Home and Harberton House Assessment Centre

338 The Inquiry devoted Module 5 to the examination of particular aspects of the operation of two children's homes in Londonderry: Fort James Children's Home and Harberton House Assessment Centre. Both these homes were managed by the Western Health and Social Services Board (WHSSB), now succeeded by the Western Health and Social Care Trust (WHSCT). Our focused consideration of these homes was prompted by evidence we received from former residents and by police material about investigations they carried out in relation to the homes.

339 Two former residents of Fort James, HIA 108 and HIA 60, and one former resident of Harberton House, HIA 233, raised issues about the care they received in these homes as part of the evidence they gave during Module 1 of the Inquiry, which considered children's homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry.

340 The material we received from the police concerned their investigations into an allegation that FJ 5, the officer in charge of Fort James from September 1980 to August 1983, sexually abused a male resident in the home, and into incidents of peer sexual abuse in Harberton House in 1989-1990, 1992 and 1994.

341 The Inquiry devoted eight sitting days spread over two weeks to this module, commencing on 8 June 2015 and finishing on 18 June 2015. HIA 108's evidence about her time in Fort James in 1980 and HIA 233's evidence about her time in Harberton House in 1991-1992, and responses to their evidence, were heard in Module 1. Therefore, HIA 108 and HIA 233 were not required to go through the pressure of giving evidence in person again in Module 5. Transcripts of relevant parts of the evidence they gave in person in Module 1, and responses to it, were considered during Module 5. HIA 60's evidence about his time in Fort James in 1980-1981 was not heard when he gave evidence in person in Module 1 and therefore he did attend and gave evidence during Module 5.

342 In addition to the evidence from these former residents, we heard evidence from staff who worked in the homes, HH 5, FJ 33, HH 22 and FJ 7, and from senior managers responsible for the operation of the homes, Dominic Burke and Gabriel Carey. Dr Kevin McCoy, Dennis O'Brien and Marion Reynolds gave evidence about the inspection and regulation of the homes and Dr Hilary Harrison gave evidence on behalf of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS).[36]

343 We also considered written statements from previous senior WHSSB managers such as Thomas Frawley, who was the Area General Manager of the WHSSB from 1984 to 1995,[37] and from the current Director of Women and Children's Services and Executive Director of Social Work of the WHSCT, Kieran Downey.[38]

344 We found that the WHSSB's failure to:

(1) effectively address strategic issues in relation to the provision of residential childcare and lack of foster care, which were clearly having an adverse effect on the appropriateness and level of care that could be given to children in Fort James;

36 FJH 60077-60081.
38 FJH 771-791 and 838 -859.

(2) address the excessive overtime worked by staff, in particular FJ 5 the officer in charge, and the implications such work patterns would have for the quality and safety of the care provided to children in Fort James; and

(3) question the appropriateness of FJ 5's close relationship with FJ 30 and respond seriously to comments from children in the home about that relationship and about FJ 5 and FJ 30's sexuality all amount to systemic failings by it to ensure Fort James provided proper care.

The Social Services Inspectorate

345 We found that the SSI on behalf of the Department failed to engage with the WHSSB to support it to consider how best to implement the recommendations of the Bunting Review, although it was aware adverse conditions were continuing to affect the care that children were receiving in Harberton House, and that this failing amounted to a systemic failing to ensure Harberton House provided proper care.

The WHSSB

346 We found that the WHSSB failed in its strategic planning of Harberton House to ensure that complementary services were in place that would allow its remit as an assessment centre to be realised and protected so that it could assess the needs of children and make arrangements for them to receive planned care appropriate to their assessed needs.

347 The WHSSB failed to instigate a fundamental review of its childcare services despite the findings of the Bunting Review and failed to increase its scrutiny of its children's homes in response to Ms McGowan's concerns.

348 These failings amount to systemic failings by the WHSSB to ensure Harberton House provided proper care.

Volume 7 – Chapter 24 – Module 13 – Lissue Hospital

349 Lissue Hospital was unique among the institutions considered by the Inquiry in that it was the only hospital to be investigated, and its functions therefore included medical and nursing care. It is not the Inquiry's role to evaluate the medical care provided, and if there remain medical issues which require investigation the task will need to be allocated to another inquiry to be undertaken by professionals with the appropriate qualifications and experience.

350 However, much of the work of Lissue concerned the residential care of children who were displaying behaviour or conduct disorders, and who might well have been cared for in other types of children's home or residential school if they had been available. Furthermore, most of the allegations made by witnesses were concerned with aspects of childcare, which is within our remit.

351 Module 13 commenced on 4 April 2016 with an introduction by Senior Counsel and we heard the evidence of ten witnesses who had been patients at Lissue Hospital as children. Sadly, one had died, and his evidence was therefore read out. Three former staff gave evidence concerning their respective roles in the multidisciplinary team - three nurses, Moira Mannion, LS 7 and LS 21, two consultant psychiatrists (Dr William Nelson and Dr Roger McAuley), and LS 80, a social worker. On behalf of the core participants Dr Hilary Harrison spoke for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, (since renamed the Department of Health) and a joint statement was presented by Dr Carolyn Harper and Mary Hinds for the Public Health Agency and Fionnula McAndrew for the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB). Since the closure of Lissue there have been twelve inquiries and reports based on investigations of issues related to the Hospital's functioning. Although undertaken following the end of the Inquiry's remit, their contents have a bearing on our findings, and the chapter therefore concludes with a summary of their contents. After nine days of hearings, the Module closed on 27 April.

352 The governance structure of the hospital from 1973 onwards was a systemic failure, and it is fortunate that it did not engender serious management problems.

353 The successes of the psychiatric unit at Lissue were thanks to cooperation between the individual professionals involved; the managerial structure within which they worked was faulty and systemically unsound.

354 We considered the absence of both formal and informal inspections of Lissue Hospital on a regular basis to have been a systemic failure on the part of the Ministry of Health and Local Government and the Northern Ireland Hospital Authority from 1948 to 1973, and on the part of the Ministry / Department of Health and Social Services and the Eastern Health and Social Services Board from 1973 to 1989.

355 While we cannot say what the outcome of a disciplinary inquiry might have been, we consider the failure of the Eastern Health and Social Services

Board to conduct its own investigations into the allegations of sexual abuse against LS 21 in 1993 to have been a systemic failure.

356 In view of the risk to the children who climbed on the roof at Lissue and the danger which they caused to other people, the lack of action to prevent access to the roof was a systemic failure.

357 The occasions on which physical restraints were used may have been few, but their use was unacceptable; they would not have been used in other types of residential childcare, and their use in a hospital cannot be justified.

358 While the policy was not at fault, the implementation of 'time out' at times was not always in accordance with the policy and constituted systemic abuse.

359 On the occasions when children were sedated to render the nursing task easier, the use of injections constituted systemic abuse.

360 At times some staff did overstep the mark and were unduly rough in their treatment of the children, and that this constituted systemic abuse.

361 We accept that some patients were sexually abused and consider this to have been systemic abuse.

362 There were many instances when staff were unfeeling and failed the children who required their support, and that these shortcomings were sufficiently frequent to be deemed systemic emotional abuse.

363 Any further inquiry into Lissue would be subject to diminishing returns; the additional information which might be gained could well be very limited and it would not justify the time and expense entailed.

Volume 8 – Chapter 25 – Module 15 – Kincora Boys' Hostel

364 Chapter 25 takes the form of an introduction setting the scene for Chapters 26, 27, 28 and 29. In Chapter 25 we briefly described the history of the Hostel, the nature of the allegations which resulted in the prosecution and convictions of Mains, Semple and McGrath; the various police investigations; the Hughes Inquiry; the continuing allegations; as well as explaining the arrangements made to enable this Inquiry to examine the allegations relating to the government departments and agencies which have not been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive and so lay outside the original Terms of Reference of the Inquiry, and the approach of the Inquiry to all these matters.

Volume 8 — Chapter 26 – Module 15 — The Nature and Extent of the Sexual Abuse of Adolescent Boys Resident in Kincora

The number of residents of Kincora known to have been sexually abused

365 Kincora opened in 1958 and closed in 1980. During that time 309 boys resided in the hostel. In their investigation in 1980 the RUC took 1963 as the starting point for their investigation. Of the 245 boys who resided in Kincora between 1963 and 1980, 104 (42% of the total) were traced and interviewed by the police. We now know that 38 boys were abused at some point during Kincora's existence. Although not all the surviving former residents could be traced, or have since come forward, it can be seen from these figures that the great majority of those who were traced were not sexually abused during their time in Kincora.

366 Indeed the great majority of residents of Kincora who were interviewed by the police were unaware at the time of what was happening in the hostel, and were very surprised to learn of the allegations that emerged afterwards. For example, of 92 former residents of Kincora between 1966 and 1980, 76 (that is 88.33%) told the police they were surprised by the allegations of the extent of sexual abuse that took place during their time in Kincora, even though some of them described how they themselves were abused, or had engaged in homosexual activity with others, whether with McGrath or other residents.

Awareness of abuse

367 It may seem strange that so many of those who were in and out of Kincora in various capacities, not just the residents but the domestic staff and visitors, were unaware of what was happening, but there was a consistent pattern of concealment of their behaviour by Mains, Semple and McGrath.

368 They approached boys who were vulnerable, or who they thought might be easily intimidated. If their initial approaches were firmly rebuffed they generally did not approach that person again. If they did, they went to considerable lengths to approach the boy when others were not around.

369 During McGrath's time at Kincora he appears to have often worked in the evenings and in the mornings, when Mains or Semple was not about, because the duties involving the supervision of the residents were distributed between all three. Mains had other administrative duties as well, and our impression was that more of the direct supervision of the residents in the 1970s was carried out by Semple or McGrath, and because of the way their duties were arranged McGrath was often on duty on his own.

The knowledge by Mains, Semple and McGrath of each other's sexuality

370 Whilst Mains and Semple knew each other before Semple was appointed as deputy warden, and Mains definitely knew of Semple's sexual abuse of residents before Semple was reappointed, there is no evidence either knew McGrath before he was appointed.

371 The evidence suggests that by the time McGrath was appointed Mains had stopped sexually abusing residents, and was engaged in a long-term homosexual relationship with an ex-resident. Semple did not engage in sexual abuse of residents after he was reappointed, and found outlets for his sexual urges elsewhere. This meant that McGrath was the only member of staff who abused residents between his appointment in the summer of 1971 until the home was closed in 1980.

Volume 8 – Chapter 26 – Module 15 – Belfast Welfare Authority, the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, the RUC, The Ministry of Home Affairs and the DHSS

Failings by Belfast Welfare Authority

372 Kincora was never adequately staffed, and this meant that for significant periods only one member of the care staff was on duty in the building.

373 Kincora was a hostel for boys who had reached school-leaving age, but too many children were admitted to Kincora when they were under school leaving age. These children were too young to be placed in such an environment, and too many of them spent too long in that environment when they were admitted.

374 In addition, there were insufficient staff with appropriate training or experience to deal with such young children.

375 Understaffing also meant that staff had to work very long hours, particularly in the case of Mains during the early years, when he was the only member of the care staff for a very long period of time. This meant that he was effectively expected to be on duty all the time. This was very poor practice, and the long hours and low pay put significant pressure on staff, and meant that recruitment of suitable staff was very difficult.

376 The insufficient levels of staff provided Mains, Semple and McGrath with opportunities which they exploited to target their victims when no one else was about to see what was happening, or to suspect what was happening.

377 The way the adolescent boys in Kincora were looked after meant that far too much was done for them by the domestic staff. We consider this created an attitude of dependence by the boys on the staff, and this dependency was exacerbated by inadequate preparation of the residents for independent living when they left Kincora.

The Ministry of Home Affairs and the DHSS

378 The Ministry of Home Affairs, and then the DHSS, failed to maintain an adequate inspection regime of the hostel.

The handling of complaints by the Belfast Welfare Authority and the EHSSB

379 When complaints were made by residents, first of all to the Belfast Welfare Authority, and later to the EHSSB, these were not properly dealt with. In 1967, when the first complaints were received, Mr Mason decided that Mains's conduct did not amount to a prima facie indication of wrong doing. We consider that he was wrong to do so. The Town Clerk's Department was wrong not to implement Mr Mason's recommendations that clear procedures were not put in place to ensure that any further complaints about Kincora were properly reported to the City Welfare Officer. Written and clear instructions should have been given to relevant managers for the closer supervision of Kincora in the future.

380 Again in 1971 the Town Clerk and Town Solicitor did not report the allegations to the police as they should have done. Following the decision not to report the allegations to the police, the following steps ought to have been taken.

a. It should have been re-emphasised to Mains that he should avoid doing anything that could lead to allegations of impropriety.

b. Instructions should have been given that a very close eye was to be kept on both Mains and Kincora.

c. Procedures were not put in place to ensure further allegations about Kincora were properly collated and then referred to the City Welfare Officer, or to his deputy, for immediate attention.

381 After 1971 and throughout the remainder of the 1970s, anonymous phone calls and rumours that appear to have circulated about Kincora amongst staff and other social workers were not made known to senior staff in the EHSSB as they ought to have been.

382 When the RUC told the EHSSB in 1976 of the allegations against McGrath, the EHSSB did not give clear written instructions to ensure that there would be increased supervision of Kincora, of Mains and of McGrath, and staff did not pass to the EHSSB management important information about allegations against McGrath. EHSSB management did not take sufficient steps to press the RUC to find out what was happening with the RUC investigation.

The RUC Cullen/Meharg Investigation

383 In 1974 when the RUC became aware of the allegations made by Roy Garland against McGrath, about which he reminded them in 1976, the Cullen/Meharg investigation was inept, inadequate and far from thorough. The response in 1974 by D/Supt Graham to what he was told by Valerie Shaw about McGrath was wholly inadequate.

384 It was not simply the case that over these years there were a small number of missed opportunities by the Belfast Welfare Authority, by the EHSSB and by the RUC. There were so many failings by all of these agencies that they amount to a catalogue of failures by each. Had the 1971 allegations been reported to the RUC, as they should have been, or if an effective investigation had been carried out by the RUC in later years, it is reasonable to infer that a thorough and competent investigation by trained detectives may have been successful in exposing the abuse in 1976, and possibly even in 1974. This would have meant that those who were sexually abused after 1976, and possibly after 1974, would have been spared their experiences.

Volume 9 – Chapter 28 – Module 15 – Kincora and the security agencies

385 We are satisfied that the RUC Special Branch first learnt of William McGrath in July 1966 when he was reported as present as one of the platform party at a rally led by the Reverend Ian Paisley in the Ulster Hall in Belfast. McGrath was otherwise an unknown figure. In 1971 MI5 learnt that a man named McGrath was reported to be the OC of Tara. However, despite efforts to establish who this person was, and gathering much information about him that was inaccurate, it was not until April 1973, 20 months later, that RUC Special Branch identified the Commanding Officer of Tara as the William McGrath seen on the platform in 1966. It seems that it was not until November 1973 that MI5 learned that the OC of Tara and McGrath were one and the same person, probably as the result of a letter sent to MI5 in November 1973 by RUC Special Branch.

386 The security agencies soon concluded that Tara was not a significant force, and they only paid intermittent attention to it and to McGrath in succeeding years.

387 By May 1973 both RUC Special Branch and other RUC officers knew that McGrath was reputed to be homosexual, but they had no proof of this. It was not until Roy Garland spoke to Detective Constable Cullen on 1 March 1974 that the RUC received an allegation that McGrath had engaged in homosexual conduct of a grooming nature in the past with Roy Garland when Roy Garland was a teenager. For understandable reasons Roy Garland was not prepared to come forward to give evidence at that time, and the result was that the RUC had a witness who would not appear in court and who was describing events involving homosexual acts that had occurred a considerable number of years before.

388 Although in 1973 the RUC Special Branch were aware of the allegation that McGrath was homosexual from what appears to have been another source, they did not pass the information relating to the other source to their RUC colleagues as they should have done. Had Special Branch passed on that information then their RUC colleagues, whether in CID or in uniform departments, could have added it to the information that they had already received from the anonymous Robophone message.

389 Despite Roy Garland's commendable efforts to alert Social Services and the RUC to the risk he accurately identified that McGrath might be taking advantage of his position in Kincora to sexually assault residents there, just as he had sexually assaulted Roy Garland when a teenager, Roy Garland's efforts to do so were unsuccessful through no fault of his own.

390 Although the RUC, MI5, SIS and Army Intelligence were all aware of allegations that McGrath was homosexual, such allegations were common at the time against various political and other figures. In the absence of positive evidence of homosexual acts there was little that could be done by these agencies because no one other than Roy Garland had come forward with a definite allegation that would allow the matter to be pursued.

391 We are satisfied that it was not until 1980 that the RUC Special Branch, MI5, the SIS and Army Intelligence became aware that McGrath had been sexually abusing residents at Kincora, and they learnt of that when it became the subject of public allegations and a police investigation was launched. All four agencies, whilst aware that McGrath was alleged to be homosexual, had no proof of that. They were aware that he worked in a boys' hostel where he was in a position of authority. They were aware of allegations that he had abused Roy Garland a long time before McGrath went to work in Kincora.

392 However, by November 1973, MI5, unlike the other three agencies, were also aware that the person who had by then been identified as William McGrath had been accused of "assaulting small boys". By virtue of Section 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967, MI5 officers were subject to the same legal obligation as everyone else in Northern Ireland to report the commission of an "arrestable offence" (that is an offence punishable by five years imprisonment) to the police where they knew or believed that such an offence, or some other arrestable offence, had been committed. An alleged assault on small boys could, depending on the nature of the alleged assault, have been an arrestable offence which ought to have been reported to the police.

393 With the benefit of hindsight, and in the light of what is now known about McGrath's abuse of residents in Kincora, it might be argued it was the duty of MI5 to bring to the attention of RUC Special Branch that MI5 had received a report that McGrath had been accused of assaulting small boys, and that by not doing so the MI5 officers who had this information were in breach of that duty. However, we consider that to take that view would be unjustified for several reasons. First of all, although the information was known to MI5 because it had been received eighteen months before, eighteen months separated the receipt of that information and the information confirming the identity of William McGrath as the leader of Tara. Secondly, the information came to MI5 in a letter from James Miller who was simply reporting what an unidentified source said at a time when unsubstantiated allegations of discreditable behaviour by Tara members about each other were commonplace, and the report was therefore assessed as being of dubious reliability. Thirdly, the MI5 officers were concentrating on establishing what sort of organisation Tara was, and whether it could be a possible Loyalist terrorist group in the context of the extremely volatile political and security circumstances of that time. In all of those circumstances we do not criticise them for failing to appreciate the significance of this information.

394 We consider that had this information been passed to the RUC Special Branch, and by it to their CID and uniformed colleagues, that information may still not have made a significant difference to the approach of the RUC. The RUC had received, and was to receive, much more detailed allegations from the Robophone message, from Valerie Shaw's conversation with D/Supt Graham, and from Roy Garland's conversation with DC Cullen that brought about the Cullen/Meharg investigation. An anonymous allegation of assault on small boys in an unspecified context and at unknown point in time that had been passed by MI5 might not have added much, if anything, to that information. On the other hand, we consider that if it came from MI5 it might have prompted the RUC to look at the existing information it held about McGrath and to investigate it more robustly.

William McGrath

395 Based on our extensive examination of a very large number of files held by RUC Special Branch, by MI5, by SIS and by the Ministry of Defence, we are satisfied that McGrath was never an agent of the State, although he may have enjoyed creating an air of mystery about his activities, part of which may well have involved him hinting at, or implying in an oblique fashion, that he was an agent of the State.

396 Not only have we found no evidence to indicate that McGrath was an agent of any of the four agencies, we have found many documents and references which very strongly indicate that he was not an agent.

397 William McGrath was a sexual pervert who had political and religious views of an extreme and bizarre type who managed to trick gullible young men who were interested in political matters into regarding him as an important political figure. William McGrath was never more than a minor player on the wider political stage who managed to create a spurious air of self-importance through Tara at a time of great political instability, communal violence and terrorist activity. Tara was never more than an organisation of occasional interest to the security agencies.

Volume 9 – Chapter 29 – Module 15 – Conclusions about Kincora

Were prominent individuals involved in the sexual abuse of residents of Kincora 398 There have been frequent allegations that various individuals, including Sir Maurice Oldfield, a former head of the Secret Intelligent Service who was later the Security Coordinator in Northern Ireland, and a number of named and unnamed Northern Ireland Office Civil Servants, and unnamed business men and other prominent figures, resorted to Kincora for sexual purposes. We are satisfied there is no credible evidence to support any of these allegations. Kincora was a small hostel and for most of its existence had only nine or fewer residents at any one time. The great majority of all of those residents who were interviewed by the Sussex Police were very surprised at such allegations and did not believe them to be of any substance.

399 There were a small number of former residents of Kincora who returned to Kincora as visitors and who engaged in consensual homosexual activity with Mains, or on a small number of occasions, with some of the residents. A number of residents engaged in consensual homosexual activity with each other, or did so with others away from Kincora in circumstances which were completely unconnected with Kincora. We are satisfied that Kincora was not a homosexual brothel, nor used by any of the security agencies as a "honey pot" to entrap, blackmail or otherwise exploit homosexuals.

Allegations of a cover up

400 Both the Belfast Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor died before the Hughes Inquiry investigated the sexual abuse at Kincora. The reasons why the Town Clerk and the Town Solicitor decided not to accept the recommendation made by Mr Mason in 1971 that the complaints against Mains should be reported to the RUC were never recorded. There are a number of possible reasons why they took this step. One was that they did not agree that the information contained in Mr Mason's report was sufficient to justify the matter being reported to the police. If that was their reason then that was a wrong decision. Another reason may have been to protect the Belfast Welfare Authority from the embarrassment that would flow from a police investigation into a boys' hostel under its control. Another explanation may have been that either or both were determined to protect Mains from exposure as a homosexual. That would only be a possible consideration were there evidence to show that either the Town Clerk or the Town Solicitor knew that Mains was a practising homosexual. In the absence of any evidence, each of these possible reasons is no more than speculation.

401 Apart from that unexplained decision, we are satisfied that there were no attempts by the Belfast Welfare Authority or the EHSSB to engage in a "cover-up", that is concealing from relevant individuals or authorities their knowledge of, or information about, wrongdoing by Mains, Semple or McGrath.

Allegations by Colin Wallace and others

402 We are satisfied that Mr Wallace was moved from his post in the Army Information Service at HQNI, and subsequently dismissed, solely because there was very strong circumstantial evidence that he had been engaged in, and was still engaged in, the unauthorised disclosure of classified documents to journalists. We are satisfied that whatever he claims to have known about Kincora had nothing whatever to do with his posting to Preston or his subsequent dismissal.

403 We are satisfied that Mr Wallace was treated unjustly in two respects connected with the subsequent appeal he brought against his dismissal to the Civil Service Appeal Board. First of all the MoD did not reveal to the CSAB the full job description which had been prepared showing the true nature of his work. Secondly, the MoD briefed the Chairman, and then the Deputy Chairman, of the CSAB with information that was not made known to Mr Wallace, to his representative, or to the other members of the Board who sat on his appeal. That they did so, and that the gentleman concerned received the information, was thoroughly reprehensible and should never have happened.

404 These injustices were accepted by David Calcutt QC in his report to the MoD in which he recommended that Mr Wallace be paid £30,000 compensation. We understand that Mr Wallace eventually accepted this amount.

405 We do not regard Mr Wallace as truthful in his accounts of what he knew about sexual abuse in Kincora, or of what he did with that knowledge, between 1972 and 1974. In particular, for the reasons we have given, we do not accept that the critical document of 8 November 1974 was created at that date.

MI5

406 During the Caskey Phase Three investigations MI5 consistently obstructed a proper line of enquiry by their refusal to allow the RUC to interview a retired MI5 officer, and by their refusal to authorise that retired officer to provide a written statement to the RUC answering 30 questions the RUC wished to ask him. We consider these questions were proper and relevant questions to the enquiry being conducted by D/Supt Caskey at that time.

Sir George Terry's report

407 While the Sussex Police carried out a thorough re-examination of the way the RUC carried out the initial Caskey Phase One investigation into the offences committed by Mains, Semple and McGrath, Sir George Terry was not justified in stating that military sources had been "very frank with me and perfectly open".

The NIO and the limited Terms of Reference of the Hughes Inquiry

408 The reliance by the NIO on the decision by the DPP that there should be no prosecution, and on Sir George Terry's Report, as adequate reasons for not setting up an Inquiry with Terms of Reference that would have enabled an investigation of the issues relating to the security agencies was not justified at the time. The decision failed to properly take account of the public disquiet at the time about issues which were deliberately excluded from the Terms of Reference of the Hughes Inquiry.

The steps taken by the Ministry of Defence in 1989 and 1990 to correct incorrect statements 409 The recognition by the MoD in 1989 that incorrect answers may have been given by Ministers to the House of Commons and to others led the MoD to carry out a wide-ranging and detailed investigation to establish the correct position. When the correct position was known, the Ministry took the necessary action to place the correct facts before the House of Commons and to correct the errors that had occurred in the past. It appointed Mr Calcutt QC to consider the injustices suffered by Mr Wallace to which we have already referred. We are satisfied that once the MoD appreciated that incorrect information had been given, and that Mr Wallace had not been treated properly before the CSAB, it acted promptly and properly to establish the correct position, and to ensure that the injustices Mr Wallace suffered in the appeal process were remedied. The injustices were remedied by the payment of £30,000 to him as compensation.

Why the sexual abuse by Mains, Semple and McGrath was not stopped sooner

410 Those residents of Kincora who were sexually abused by Mains, Semple and McGrath were let down by those three individuals who abused their positions of authority and committed numerous acts of sexual abuse of the gravest kind against teenage children in their care while they were living in this hostel. When their conduct was exposed, they were prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to appropriate periods of imprisonment.

411 In our investigations into Kincora the Inquiry examined hundreds of files held by Government and by the Police, MI5, the Secret Intelligence Service (MI6), the Ministry of Defence and other departments and agencies. We have also examined the police files relating to the earlier investigations that were carried out by the RUC and then by the Sussex Constabulary into what did or did not happen at Kincora. As we explained, those investigations by the RUC and the Sussex Police were extremely thorough and comprehensive. D/Supt Caskey and his officers went to great lengths to identify every possible person who may have been in possession of information that could lead to the identification and possible prosecution of anyone else who had committed a criminal offence of whatever kind relating to Kincora, whether that was sexual abuse or the suppression of evidence.

412 Those investigations did not find, and our Inquiry has not found, any credible evidence to show that there is any basis for the allegations that have been made over the years about the involvement of others in sexual abuse of residents in Kincora, or anything to show that the security agencies were complicit in any form of exploitation of sexual abuse in Kincora for any purpose.

413 The reality of the situation was that it was because of the multitude of failings by officials of the Belfast Welfare Authority, of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, and by the RUC, that the sexual abuse of residents at Kincora was not stopped earlier, and that those responsible for perpetrating these grave crimes were not brought to justice sooner.

Chapter 4:

Recommendations

Introduction

1 The Inquiry's Terms of Reference require the Inquiry to make recommendations and findings on the following matters:

- an apology - by whom and the nature of the apology;
- findings of institutional or state failings in their duties towards the children in their care and if these failings were systemic;
- recommendations as to an appropriate memorial or tribute to those who suffered abuse;
- the requirement or desirability for redress to be provided by the institution and/or the Executive to meet the particular needs of victims.

2 As can be seen from the Terms of Reference, it is for the Northern Ireland Executive to decide whether to accept our recommendations:

> "However, the nature or level of any potential redress (financial or the provision of services) is a matter that the Executive will discuss and agree following receipt of the Inquiry and Investigation report."

3 Throughout the Inquiry we have heard evidence about systemic physical, sexual and emotional abuse of children in institutional care and about neglect and unacceptable practices in children's homes. Whilst we recognise that any recommendations we might make cannot undo the hurt suffered by the survivors of abuse, in making our recommendations we have adopted the following criteria.

- They should, so far as reasonably possible, ensure that the nature and scale of the experiences of children abused whilst in residential institutions in Northern Ireland are appropriately acknowledged.
- Where there were systemic failings on the part of the state and/or the institutions that provided residential care to children under eighteen, that practical forms of redress are made to them.
- Where necessary, appropriate steps are taken to ensure that such abuse and systemic failings are prevented in the future.

4 From the beginning of our work we have given considerable attention to the subject of redress, and conducted our own researches into redress schemes in other jurisdictions. Part of this process involved discussions with those who have been involved with, or have studied, redress schemes for the victims of sexual and other forms of abuse in Canada, Australia, the Republic of Ireland, the Netherlands and Germany. Whilst we found these discussions extremely helpful, and some of our recommendations echo steps that have been taken in other jurisdictions to provide redress for the victims of historical institutional abuse, each jurisdiction has its own views on what is appropriate, not least in deciding what is the appropriate level at which financial compensation should be paid.

5 Because we believed the recommendations for a redress scheme that we make to the Northern Ireland Executive should take into account the views of those who may be affected by such a scheme, witnesses who gave evidence during the public sessions that they have been abused were asked for their suggestions as to what form of redress might be appropriate. We recognised that witnesses who had already spoken to the Inquiry in public sessions may, on further reflection, have additional suggestions or comments to make on the issue of redress. The witnesses who spoke to the Public Inquiry part of our process were not the only ones whose views we wanted to hear. The 129 applicants who only spoke to the Acknowledgement Forum did not have the same opportunity to make comments and suggestions on the subject of redress, and because they were equally entitled to make comments and suggestions we gave them the same opportunity to give us their views on this subject.

6 We gathered additional evidence by way of a consultation in which we invited comments and suggestions from all our applicants on what form a redress scheme might take. We believe that this was an unprecedented step for a public inquiry to take, certainly for an inquiry in Northern Ireland.

7 The consultation took the form of the questionnaire to be found at Appendix 1, and the numbers of responses to each question are shown in the table in Appendix 2. 541 questionnaires were issued and 330 were returned, a very high return rate of 61% for a document of this type. 232 of those responding added “General Comments”. We have taken the responses into account when formulating our Recommendations.

8 We received information from The Executive Office on aspects of redress schemes for those abused as children in residential institutions in other jurisdictions. We were also sent proposals by a group calling itself “The Panel of Experts” consisting of representatives of groups active on behalf of children abused in some residential institutions, lawyers who acted on behalf of such individuals, and academics with an interest in this field. We have taken this information and these proposals into account when finalising our proposals.

An apology

9 Mixed views were expressed about the desirability of an apology from any institution by applicants who gave their views during the public hearings. Some firmly demanded one, others equally firmly said that they either saw no point in one, or would not accept one if it was given. During each module the core participants had the opportunity to express an apology for any abuse and systemic failings for which they or their predecessors were responsible, and many did so.

10 We believe that an apology can be valuable as a formal recognition by government, or by a public authority, or by an institution, that they, or their predecessors, made mistakes in the way they treated the children in their care. As our conclusions on individual modules make clear, it was not only the religious and voluntary bodies that provided and organised the institutions we investigated that were at fault, we also found systemic failings on the part of the public authorities in the form of County Welfare Authorities, Health and Social Service Boards, the Ministry of Home Affairs, the Department of Health and Social Services and the Northern Ireland Office, when it was responsible for criminal justice institutions, and the RUC.

11 We recommend that the Northern Ireland Executive and those who were responsible for each of the institutions investigated by the Inquiry where we found systemic failings should make a public apology. The apology should be a wholehearted and unconditional recognition that they failed to protect children from abuse that could and should have been prevented or detected. We also recommend that this should be done on a single occasion at a suitable venue.

Memorials

12 Physical structures such as sculptures or plaques are valued as visible reminders of past events or individuals whose memory should be commemorated. As in the case of an apology, there were differing views expressed by applicants, many of whom were very strongly of the opinion that a memorial was not appropriate because they did not want to be reminded of their experiences as children in residential institutions. Whilst we respect that view, we are of the opinion that a memorial should be erected to remind legislators and others of what many children experienced in residential homes. We recommend that a suitable physical memorial should be erected in Parliament Buildings, or in the grounds of the Stormont Estate.

13 The design of such a memorial should be chosen by a competition conducted by the Arts Council of Northern Ireland. The Arts Council should invite representatives of those who were abused as children in residential institutions in Northern Ireland to help in the selection of the successful design. The memorial should be paid for by the Northern Ireland Executive.

Additional provision for those who were abused

14 A common theme of the comments by applicants during their evidence at the public hearings, and in their responses to the Questionnaire, was that their experiences as children who were abused had a lasting effect on their lives, and that services should be available to them to enable them to cope with these problems. The areas that were most frequently identified as still causing difficulties for those who were abused we identified in the Questionnaire.

- Mental health problems.
- Other health problems.
- Literacy and numeracy problems.
- Counselling.
- Addiction problems.
- Employment problems.
- Access to education.

15 No single agency can deal effectively with such a multiplicity of issues, but steps to address these issues will need to be co-ordinated to ensure that existing facilities are made readily available to those who need them, and where there are gaps in the services already available these can be identified and remedied. We consider that the best means of addressing the specific needs of those who experienced abuse as children would be by the creation of a post whose holder would act as an advocate for those children who were subjected to abuse whilst under 18 and resident in institutions within our Terms of Reference. We therefore recommend that a designated person should act as an advocate for such children, and should be responsible for ensuring the co-ordination and availability of services, and identifying suitable means whereby such services can be made available to those who need them.

This person should be called the Commissioner for Survivors of Institutional Childhood Abuse (COSICA).

16 The Commissioner (who should be assisted by the necessary staff) should be entirely independent of government and the organisations that ran the institutions, but should be funded by government. The Commissioner would have a number of responsibilities.

(a) Act as an advocate for all those who were abused as children in residential institutions in Northern Ireland between 1922 and 1995.

(b) Encourage the co-ordination and provision of relevant services free of charge for those who were so abused.

(c) Provide a central point of contact for providing advice on the services and facilities available; and provide assistance to those who suffered abuse to contact those services. This would include providing a hotline and internet advice.

(d) Be responsible for monitoring the matters referred to at 22 (a) and (b) below.

(e) Assist in the provision of advice and information to those who wish to apply for compensation to the HIA Redress Board proposed below.

(f) Assist people to access records about the time they spent in homes including admission and discharge dates to enable them to apply for compensation to the HIA Redress Board proposed below.

(g) Monitor the operation of the HIA Redress Board proposed below.

17 We recommend the Commissioner should be assisted by an Advisory Panel consisting of individuals who as children were resident in residential homes in Northern Ireland. The members of the Advisory Panel should be chosen by the First Minister and deputy First Minister in accordance with the normal processes for public appointments in Northern Ireland.

18 We understand that The Executive Office has funded a number of groups of former residents of residential homes for children, and we recommend that such funding should continue on a transitional basis until such time as the members of the Advisory Panel have been appointed.

19 The operation of, and need for, COSICA should be reviewed after five years.

20 Our Terms of Reference were limited to abuse that occurred in those institutions that came within our Terms of Reference, but we heard some evidence of abuse of children in other circumstances, such as schools or foster care. It is not for us to say whether there should be other inquiries into allegations of abuse and systemic failings in such areas. However, if our Recommendations are implemented, we suggest that consideration be given to expanding the functions of COSICA as necessary to include other forms of abuse suffered by children, such as clerical abuse, abuse in schools or abuse suffered whilst in foster care.

21 So that the Commissioner would be, and would be seen to be, independent, and to ensure that the office would be adequately resourced, the office of Commissioner should be:

(a) created by statute;

(b) allocated a separate budget; and

(c) required to report once a year to the NI Assembly.

Specialist care and assistance

22 Sufficient funds should be made available by government on a ring-fenced basis for a fixed period of ten years, subject to a review after five years, to establish dedicated specialist facilities in Belfast, Derry and, if necessary, at other suitable locations across Northern Ireland to provide:

(a) general counselling services for those who have suffered abuse as children in residential institutions in Northern Ireland, supported by appropriate links to the health service and to other relevant housing, education and employment services; and

(b) practical help with literacy and numeracy, education, employment, housing and benefits advice tailored to the needs of individual victims of institutional abuse.

Financial compensation

23 On 4 November 2015 we announced that, based on the evidence we had heard, we would recommend that compensation should be payable to those who had been abused whilst in residential children's homes within our Terms of Reference.

24 The great majority of redress schemes that we have considered throughout the English-speaking world provide for lump sum payments to those entitled. Some argue that a more sensible form of redress would be to provide regular payments in the form of a benefit or pension, thereby ensuring that the money is regularly available and is less likely to be dissipated unwisely. Whilst we can see some validity in that argument, we consider that a lump sum payment is preferable for a number of reasons.

- The recipient has the benefit of a lump sum to use as he or she thinks best, for example by giving some or all of the money to their children, by purchasing an annuity, or by paying for the cost of travel to the United Kingdom or Ireland to have contact with relatives.
- It is easier to identify the possible total cost of the redress.
- It is easier to administer, particularly if a redress scheme is time limited, and does not require a permanent organisation to be created and staffed as would be the case were the compensation to take the form of regular payments.

We therefore recommend that compensation should take the form of a lump sum payment.

25 Although some have argued that the institutions responsible for any abuse should be responsible for compensation, it must be remembered that the Inquiry has not investigated every institution in respect of which there have been allegations of abuse. As well as those we examined during our public hearings, as we explained on 4 November 2015 there were some other homes that were subject to specific, targeted investigations.

26 In addition there were another 43 homes or institutions where we decided that any further investigations into them would not be justified. This was because we were satisfied that further investigations were neither necessary nor proportionate, and would not add to our understanding of the nature and extent of systemic abuse of children in homes and institutions in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference. We emphasised that this did not mean that we had decided that abuse did not occur in those homes or institutions. Any compensation scheme has therefore to provide for those who may have been abused in homes or institutions that we did not investigate.

27 In addition, there may well be applications for compensation by individuals who were abused in homes or institutions against which no complaints were made to us. Some of those homes or institutions may no longer exist, nor may the organisations that ran them. Even if they do exist, those responsible for them now may not have sufficient funds to pay compensation, or may not be covered by insurance. If compensation were only payable by those responsible for the homes we investigated, and have the funds to pay, that would mean that many who were abused might not receive compensation.

28 A further important factor is that we have found that employees of local authorities, health boards and Government departments were also guilty of abuse. In addition, these organisations were guilty of systemic failings in the homes or institutions they organised, such as Rathgael, Millisle, Lissue, Kincora and Bawnmore, or were responsible for inspecting in the case of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the DHSS.

29 For these reasons we believe that only a government-funded compensation scheme can ensure that all of these contingencies are provided for. If such a scheme is not provided, it is likely that many of those who should be compensated will not be compensated. We recommend that the Northern Ireland Executive create a publicly funded compensation scheme.

The HIA Redress Board

30 This publicly funded compensation scheme should be distinct from the Northern Ireland Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme 2009 (The 2009 Scheme). As there will be similarities to the 2009 Scheme we considered whether the most effective and economical way to administer such a compensation scheme would be through Compensation Services who administer the 2009 Scheme. However, as we understand the position, in practical terms Compensation Services operates in a different fashion to the compensation scheme we propose below. First of all, when deciding whether an application comes within the 2009 Scheme it is dependent on information provided by the PSNI following a police investigation into the criminal offence(s). Secondly, in assessing the amount of compensation to be awarded it applies a tariff-based scheme to identify where on a wide scale of injuries the applicant's injury or injuries can be said to fall. The amount(s) prescribed by the tariff scheme is then selected.

31 Whilst such an approach is no doubt appropriate for a permanent compensation scheme where the facts of each case have been investigated by the police, we consider that such an approach would not be appropriate for a compensation scheme covering a wide range of different institutions where different conditions prevailed at different times, where the circumstances of individual applicants should be individually assessed, and where not every institution has been investigated by our Inquiry.

32 We consider the appropriate method of administering the compensation scheme is to create a specific Historic Institutional Abuse Redress Board for that purpose, and we so recommend. The HIA Redress Board should be responsible for receiving and processing applications for, and making payments of, compensation.

33 It should be set up by the Northern Ireland Executive and consist of a Chief Executive and such administrative staff as required to administer the HIA Redress Board.

34 The HIA Redress Board would also consist of such judicial members as may be required, one of whom should be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice as President of the Redress Board.

35 The Chief Executive would be the accounting officer for the HIA Redress Board, and responsible for the administration of the HIA Redress Board, but would be obliged to comply with all directions given by the President of the Redress Board for the allocation of business to, and the discharge of functions by, a judicial member, whether sitting as a single member or as a member of the Appeal Panel.

36 The President of the Redress Board would be responsible for all matters relating to the discharge of functions by the judicial members.

37 We consider that the decisions to be made by the judicial members of the HIA Redress Board would be of the type made by judges in civil proceedings. In order that the judicial members would be seen to have the necessary experience and independence we recommend that the judicial members be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice and be persons who hold, or who have held, judicial office as judges of the Court of Judicature in Northern Ireland or of the County Courts in Northern Ireland.

38 We recommend (a) that a sufficient number of judicial members be appointed as members of the HIA Redress Board. Each judicial member should be remunerated on a fee paid basis for each day or half day they were engaged on the business of the HIA Redress Board. (b) Rules governing the applications for compensation, and the procedures to be followed by the judicial members, including the Appeal Panel, should be made by the Department of the Northern Ireland Executive responsible for the funding of the HIA Redress Board, subject to the consent of the Lord Chief Justice.

Procedures for awarding compensation

39 Many applicants to the HIA Inquiry who apply to the HIA Redress Board will have given their account of their experiences on more than one occasion. In addition, in order for a decision to be made whether they are entitled to compensation, and if so what the amount of compensation should be, it may be necessary to explore sensitive personal matters that many victims of abuse would find it upsetting to have to discuss in a public forum. We therefore recommend that the judicial member and the Appeal Panel should make decisions as to whether compensation should be paid, and if so, the amount to be paid, solely on the basis of the written material submitted by the applicant, and any other written material the judicial member or the Appeal Panel consider relevant.

40 We recommend that the Redress Board should be structured in the following way.

(a) A single judicial member of the HIA Redress Board should decide whether compensation should be payable, and if it is payable, the amount to be paid. Brief reasons for the decision should be given in writing.

(b) A person or persons dissatisfied by the decision of the single judicial member of the HIA Redress Board should be entitled to appeal to an Appeal Panel whose decision would be final.

(c) The Appeal Panel would consist of three other judicial members of the HIA Redress Board selected by the President of the Redress Board.

(d) The Appeal Panel would make their decision on the same materials that were before the judicial member.

(e) The appeal would take the form of a complete reconsideration of the application.

(f) The Appeal Panel should have the power to affirm the decision of the judicial member, or to substitute its decision for that of the judicial member, including the power to vary the order made by the judicial member by awarding a higher or lower figure for compensation.

(g) In exceptional circumstances if it is necessary in the interests of justice the single judicial member or the Appeal Panel should have the power to (i) admit fresh evidence, and (ii) order an oral hearing.

(h) Any oral hearing, whether by a single judicial member or the Appeal Panel should be held in private.

(i) Decisions of the Appeal Panel should be by a majority, and the reason(s) for the decision should be given briefly in writing to the applicant and any other person the single member or the Appeal Panel consider should receive a copy of the decision.

Eligibility for compensation

41 We consider compensation should not be payable to anyone merely because they were resident in an institution within our Terms of Reference. Many of those who were resident in these institutions were not abused in any way, and we consider there is no justification for awarding compensation to individuals merely because they were in homes where others were abused, but they were not themselves abused, and were unaware of abuse taking place.

42 We therefore recommend that compensation awarded by the HIA Redress Board should only be payable to, or in respect of, a person who can show (or their estate can show) on the balance of probabilities that they:

(a) suffered abuse in the form of sexual, physical or emotional abuse, or neglect or unacceptable practices, between 1922 and 1995; and

(b) were resident in a residential institution in Northern Ireland as defined by the Terms of Reference of the HIA Inquiry when they suffered the abuse; and

(c) were under 18 at the time.

43 In some, though not all, of the institutions we investigated there was a harsh environment that affected all the children in that institution at that time. Other children who were exposed to that harsh environment, but were not themselves abused, were still affected by the general regime and the impact of what they witnessed, and therefore were also abused. We recommend that such persons also should be regarded as having been abused and should also be eligible for an award of compensation by the HIA Redress Board.

44 Living persons should be eligible to receive a full payment.

45 Not all redress schemes allow the surviving spouse or children of a person who was abused but who died before they could receive compensation to receive all or part of the amount the person would have had they lived. Payment under a redress scheme is designed to compensate an abused person for the effect of the abuse on him or her. However, many applicants to the Inquiry stressed the adverse effect of their experiences upon their adult lives when it came to being a spouse or parent, and said their families suffered as a result of their parent's experiences. We accept that was the case for many of those who spoke to us.

46 An additional consideration is what happens to those who were abused but died before they could claim compensation, or before their claim was dealt with. We are aware that, so far, at least eleven applicants to the Inquiry have died since they made their application, and sadly more may die before the HIA Redress Board could come into operation, or before their claim may be dealt with by the HIA Redress Board.

47 We believe that it would be just and humane for only those directly affected, namely the spouse or children of a person who died after a prescribed date to be able to claim 75% of the compensation that would have been awarded to their spouse or parent, and we so recommend. The Northern Ireland Executive announced that it intended to set up an Inquiry on 29 September 2011, and we recommend that that should be the prescribed date, and that any person living on that date should be entitled to compensation from the HIA Redress Board.

48 Where a person entitled to compensation died after 29 September 2011 we recommend that the following provisions should apply.

(a) Only the spouse or children of the deceased should be able to recover 75% of the award that would have been made to the person had he or she survived.

(b) Those entitled to the 75% proportion of the award will be the beneficiary or beneficiaries of the person's estate where the victim left a will. If the person died without leaving a will then the entitlement will be decided in accordance with the law of the country in which the person resided at the time of his or her death.

(c) Where more than one person is entitled to share in the estate of the deceased their respective shares will be decided in accordance with the law of the country in which the person lived at the time of his or her death.

49 We believe that a person should not be entitled to be compensated twice for abuse they suffered. If a person has already received compensation through civil proceedings for his or her time in a residential institution within our Terms of Reference we recommend that person should not be entitled to a payment from the HIA Redress Board.

50 A person who has instituted civil proceedings against an institution or a public body or a government department for abuse suffered by that person whilst under 18 in a residential institution in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference must decide whether to continue his or her civil action or apply to the HIA Redress Board. They should not be able to do both, and must terminate those civil proceedings in a final manner before they apply to the HIA Redress Board.

51 We consider that a person who wishes to institute, or continue, civil proceedings instead of applying for compensation to the HIA Redress Board should be entitled to do so, but should not be able to top up any payments they have received, or may receive, by applying to the HIA Redress Board in the hope of obtaining a further payment in respect of abuse suffered in the same institution.

52 However, for the avoidance of doubt we wish to make it clear that this would not prevent a person who has already received compensation in civil proceedings in respect of abuse suffered whilst a resident in one institution from receiving compensation from the HIA Redress Board for abuse suffered whist resident in a different institution, provided that institution was not managed by the same organisation against whom the earlier civil proceedings were taken.

53 To allow applicants to claim in civil proceedings and from the HIA Redress Board would be contrary to the principle that compensation from the HIA Redress Board should be an alternative, and not a supplement, to compensation received as a result of civil proceedings.

54 To allow applicants who have accepted settlements, or who have instituted civil proceedings that were unsuccessful, would be contrary to the principle that litigation should be final; would cause difficulties for the courts and HIA Redress Board in deciding which case was to be dealt with first; and would cause difficulties for the courts and HIA Redress Board when deciding what the other had already taken into account and why.

55 However, in one instance only we consider that those who have been unsuccessful in civil proceedings based on abuse they suffered under the age of eighteen while in residential institutions in Northern Ireland should still be allowed to claim from the HIA Redress Board. As can be seen from the decisions in McKee v Sisters of Nazareth and Irvine (Una) v Sisters of Nazareth to which we refer below, claims for abuse suffered by former residents in institutions within our Terms of Reference brought by way of civil proceedings can be defeated by the operation of the limitation defence.

56 Possible changes in that defence in civil proceedings raise complex issues which are not for us to address, but we have recommended that compensation should be paid under the HIA Redress Scheme to anyone who suffered abuse between 1922 and 1995. We consider that it would be unjust if the small number of individuals whose claims in civil proceedings were defeated solely because of the application of the limitation defence were not to receive compensation from the HIA Redress Board when others who suffered abuse during the period 1922 to 1995 would be compensated by the HIA Redress Board. We therefore recommend that a person who brought civil proceedings based on abuse in institutions within our Terms of Reference whose cases were dismissed solely because of the operation of the limitation defence should not thereby be disqualified from claiming compensation from the HIA Redress Board.

57 We also make the following recommendations relating to the payment of compensation by the HIA Redress Board:

(a) It should not be a requirement for the payment of compensation that the person has to have reported the abuse to the police, nor should it be a requirement that the person engaged with the HIA Inquiry.

(b) Criminal convictions should not result in the withholding of, or the reduction of, compensation otherwise payable. It should not be a bar to compensation if the abuse happened within a family in the case of a child who had been placed by a residential institution with a family for a short time.

(c) It should not be a bar to compensation that the abuse occurred outside the physical boundaries of an institution but within its area of responsibility. For example, abuse that occurred on camping trips or holidays organised by the institution, or when a child had been placed by the institution with a family, or in the care of a volunteer authorised by the institution, should result in compensation.

Compensation procedures

58 A number of important practical aspects of the procedures for applications for compensation to the HIA Redress Board have to be provided for if those procedures are to be as straightforward, effective, and efficient as possible, and the following recommendations are intended to enable these objectives to be achieved.

(a) The statement of a person who made a statement to the Statutory Inquiry or to the Acknowledgement Forum if they did not also apply to the Statutory Inquiry should be accepted as the basis for compensation unless the person did not appear to give evidence to the Statutory Inquiry when requested to do so.

(b) The application forms for, and the procedure for assessing entitlement to, compensation must be designed in such a way as to be simple and user-friendly so as not to be off-putting to applicants.

(c) The judicial members of the HIA Redress Board should apply the definition of abuse used by the Inquiry, and take the findings of the Inquiry into account when considering whether an individual person was abused.

59 Many have urged that a redress scheme be set up as a matter of urgency, not least because many applicants to the Inquiry were elderly or in poor health, and may not live to receive compensation if it takes a long time to set up a redress scheme. Whether the HIA Redress Board is put on a statutory or on an ex gratia basis, we urge the speedy implementation of our Recommendations.

60 As we have provided a detailed framework for the recommended compensation scheme and for the HIA Redress Board that would administer the compensation scheme we consider that if the implementation of our recommendations is addressed by the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly in a positive and energetic fashion any legislative or administrative procedures that are required to create the HIA Redress Board can be put in place in time to enable the first payments to be made by the HIA Redress Board by the end of 2017.

61 We recommend that priority is given by the HIA Redress Board to those applicants who are over 70 or in poor health.

62 The Inquiry gave anonymity to applicants, although some chose to waive that anonymity. We intend that anonymity should continue indefinitely. The Inquiry also gathered a great deal of information, some of which is specific to the person concerned, such as their social services records, or is important to a proper understanding of the circumstances surrounding their time in institutions. This would include records held by the police or the institution concerned which would have a bearing on the proper level of compensation. Examples include witness statements made where there were complaints to the police, or admission records showing the time an individual spent in different institutions, because quite understandably many are not sure of the exact dates when they were in a particular institution, especially if they were in more than one institution.

63 While much information relevant to compensation is contained in the transcripts of the evidence relating to particular individuals, where the identity of that individual is covered by a designation that could be a significant impediment to establishing the necessary facts upon which an award of compensation should be made by the HIA Redress Board. Many documents such as social services records contain information about parents and other family members that may be relevant, but which should not be publicly available.

64 The Inquiry does not intend to place all the documents we have gathered in the public domain, but we will place such material in the Public Record Office for Northern Ireland (PRONI) subject to the condition that access is prohibited for 100 years.

65 To enable a person who applied to the Inquiry to seek compensation from the HIA Redress Board we recommend that PRONI may only give access to material lodged by the Inquiry to an applicant to the HIA Redress Board where the applicant agrees to disclose his or her full name, date of birth and such other details that the HIA Redress Board reasonably considers necessary to decide whether compensation should be paid by the HIA Redress Board, and if compensation should be paid, the amount of the compensation.

66 We recommend that those details, and the relevant material relating to the applicant, shall only be disclosed by PRONI to the applicant and to the HIA Redress Board as either may reasonably require in order to decide whether compensation should be paid to the applicant, but, subject to the next paragraph, shall not be disclosed to anyone else without the written consent of the applicant.

67 We recognise that there may be circumstances where a court in Northern Ireland considers that the interests of justice require the disclosure of such material deposited by the Inquiry with PRONI, and we recommend that regulations be made to enable such court orders to be complied with.

68 We recognise that in some cases, particularly if claims are made for compensation for abuse alleged to have been suffered in any institution that was not investigated by the Inquiry, it may be necessary for the HIA Redress Board to put in place procedures to give notice to the institution concerned, or its successor if there is one, and to an identifiable individual who is alleged to have committed the alleged abuse, or who could give information about the allegation, to provide that information to the HIA Redress Board. We recommend that the HIA Redress Board put in place such procedures as may be necessary to enable such steps to be taken, and that the necessary powers be provided to enable this to be done.

Amount of compensation

69 As part of our consideration of the issue of compensation, and who should be compensated, and what the amount of compensation should be, we gathered information about as many civil claims that have been brought against institutions within our Terms of Reference as we could. We then analysed the awards to see what amounts of compensation had been awarded to, or accepted by way of settlement, by plaintiffs who had taken civil action against any of these institutions in Northern Ireland.

70 We believe that such an exercise on such a scale has never been attempted before in the United Kingdom because of the difficulty in obtaining information in respect of awards in civil claims against institutions within our Terms of Reference as many have been settled on confidential terms. We exercised our powers under section 9 of the Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse Act (Northern Ireland) 2013 to require the provision of this information. Whilst we regard the details of individual awards as confidential, we have been able to gather much relevant information, the results of which are contained in Tables 1 and 2 in Appendix 3.

71 We know that 147 applicants to the Inquiry have instituted civil proceedings, and 67 individuals who did not apply to the Inquiry have also done so. We have established that of the 214 cases, 34 cases brought by applicants to the Inquiry, and 33 cases brought by individuals who did not apply to the Inquiry, resulted in payments being made to the plaintiff. We understand that 147 cases are therefore still unresolved.

72 We analysed the amounts that have been accepted in settlement by those who have taken civil proceedings, and the results are shown in the Tables at Appendix 3 to this Chapter. As the figures show, of the 67 cases where compensation has been paid as the result of civil proceedings in Northern Ireland no settlement has been for less than £5,000; and only seventeen settlements exceeded £20,000. Of those seventeen cases, only seven exceeded £30,000. Of the seven settlements over £30,000 the highest settlement figure was £60,000, and that was in only one case. We consider that the amounts to be paid by the HIA Redress Board should be in line with the amounts that litigants who have taken civil proceedings in Northern Ireland have received in respect of abuse suffered whilst they were residents in institutions within our Terms of Reference.

73 We have also taken into account the recent decisions in the High Court of Justice in Northern Ireland McKee v Sisters of Nazareth [2015] NIQB 93 and Irvine (Una) v Sisters of Nazareth [2015] NIQB 94. In both cases the actions were dismissed because the plaintiff could not overcome the limitation defence, but Mr Justice Horner and Mr Justice Colton respectively helpfully indicated the amounts they would have awarded the plaintiffs had their cases succeeded. In McKee Mr Justice Horner felt that the range of damages would have been between £5,000 and £7,500, and the award would have been £6,500. In that case the judge said that he would have awarded:

> "…a modest sum to reflect the nature of the harsh and brutal regime that was in place at Nazareth Lodge during [Mr McKee's] short time there."

74 In Irvine Mr Justice Colton accepted that the plaintiff:

> "…was subjected to corporal punishment which went beyond what was reasonable or lawful. An obvious example of this was her being punished by being struck with a stick with nails in it after she had been stealing apples from a nearby orchard. I also accept that she was subjected to unlawful assaults by way of discipline in particular from > Sister Coleman. There is also in my view credibility to her allegation that she was not permitted to go to the toilet when she wet herself and that generally she was subject to a harsh and uncaring regime...In terms of physical injuries it does not appear that the Plaintiff sustained any significant injuries. At no stage for example did she require medical assistance because of any assaults. Nonetheless, on the Plaintiff's evidence assaults were fairly frequent and occurred over a sustained period of time. For the physical injuries suffered by the plaintiff I would have awarded £7,500."

The judge dealt with a claim for psychiatric injuries in the following passages of his judgment.

> "The main complaint relates to the emotional trauma suffered by the Plaintiff and psychiatric injury. By reason of the assaults to which I have referred and to the overall harsh nature of her care the Plaintiff alleges that she has suffered both emotional stress and psychiatric injury... This is not a case where the Plaintiff can establish that as a result of tortious acts by the defendant she has suffered an actual psychiatric injury. At best she has been rendered vulnerable to psychiatric injury and that injury has materialised because of other stressors in her life. Had it not been for the limitation defence my judgment is that a figure of £20,000 would be an appropriate award for this aspect of the case having regard to the medical evidence which I heard and carefully considered."

The judge therefore indicated that he would have awarded the plaintiff £27,500 in total had her case not been defeated by the limitation defence. Whilst the plaintiffs' claims in both cases were defeated by the operation of the limitation defence, their experiences were typical of many applicants who gave evidence to our Inquiry.

75 We do not consider that there is any reason why awards by the HIA Redress Board should be materially out of line with amounts that have been already been paid as a result of litigation, whether against individual institutions or public authorities, or by the state in the form of Criminal Injury Compensation, or which may be awarded by the courts. We believe that such awards are the appropriate benchmark against which awards by the HIA Redress Board in this jurisdiction should be measured.

76 We consider that there should be a minimum amount that would be awarded to a person who can show that they have been abused in a residential institution, and that the upper limit of awards should be capped at a figure that would be sufficient to provide fair compensation for the worst cases, taking into account the highest settlements that there have been to date on the basis that there are likely to be few such awards by the HIA Redress Board, whilst leaving a certain amount of headroom in case a small number of cases are brought that would justify awards between £60,000 and £80,000. In what we believe would be a handful of cases where awards exceeding £80,000 (or £100,000 in the case of Australian applicants) might conceivably arise, the option of civil proceedings with an unlimited award would continue to be available.

77 Some applicants believe that had they not been abused whilst resident in a children's home that they would have had had more success in life, and so earned more money. We consider that if a person wishes to claim for loss of earnings in adult life then they should pursue such a claim for loss of earnings as part of a claim in civil proceedings, and that claims for loss of earnings should not be allowed under the capped compensation scheme we recommend.

78 We therefore recommend that every person entitled to compensation should receive a standard award sufficient to cover those forms of abuse that were widespread and suffered by a significant number of children, such as unacceptable living conditions, excessive domestic work, loss of earnings for excessive work done by children in children's homes, minor physical abuse, or being subjected to emotionally abusive behaviour, but not for any other form of loss of earnings.

79 Those who may have been more significantly affected, or who were subjected to more serious forms of abuse of any type, such as sexual abuse or serious physical abuse, would be entitled to an enhanced payment from the HIA Redress Board.

80 Those sent to Australia under the Child Migrants Scheme should receive a special payment in addition to any other payment to which they might be awarded by the HIA Redress Board. The special payment should be of a sum sufficient to recognise the injustice they suffered as young children by being sent to a far away land and losing their sense of identity as a result.

81 We recommend that the amount of compensation should therefore consist of one or more of the following elements.

(i) A standard payment of £7,500 payable to anyone who was abused, including those who experienced a harsh environment, or who witnessed such abuse.

(ii) An additional payment of £20,000 in respect of a person sent to Australia under the Child Migrants Scheme.

(iii) An additional enhanced payment to anyone who was more severely abused.

82 The maximum amount of compensation payable in respect of (i) and (iii) should not exceed £80,000, and the maximum payment in respect of (i), (ii) and (iii) should not exceed £100,000.

83 We also recommend that social security payments should not be affected by lump sum payments awarded by the HIA Redress Board.

84 Lump sum payments of damages for personal injury, or by way of criminal injury compensation, are not taxable, and we consider that lump sum payments made by the HIA Redress Board should be treated in the same way. We recommend that payments of compensation should not be taxable, and that the Northern Ireland Executive make representations to the Treasury and to HMRC to achieve this.

Legal Aid

85 We accept that in order for them to pursue their claims effectively applicants to the HIA Redress Board, particularly those who were resident in an institution not investigated by the Inquiry, will require legal representation in order to obtain the necessary evidence to bring their application. We recommend that applicants should be eligible for legal aid to allow them to obtain legal assistance to make an application for an award.

86 We recommend that the costs of a successful application should be paid to the applicant's legal representatives on the County Court Scale. The County Court Rules Committee should be invited to suggest a scale of costs for cases for awards between £30,000 and £80,000. No additional costs should be payable where the award is between £80,000 and £100,000 because anyone who went to Australia under the Child Migrant Scheme would receive a fixed award of £20,000 and so there would be no real additional work or responsibility that would justify an extra fee for an award over £80,000.

87 As the Table in Appendix 3 shows, the overwhelming majority of civil abuse cases have been settled for amounts below £30,000, and we see no reason to assume that awards by the HIA Redress Board should not follow a similar pattern. This assumption is subject to the caveat that it is not possible to predict how many people may apply to the HIA Redress Board, or what the amounts of compensation are to which individuals might be entitled.

88 However, not every applicant who was a resident in any institution would be eligible because in most institutions there was not a harsh environment of the type that we found existed at certain times within the homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth and the De La Salle Order. In some institutions there were instances of abuse but overall standards of child care were satisfactory.

89 In the case of those who were sent to Australia when they were so young that they have no recollection of their experiences in the homes in Northern Ireland before they were sent then such individuals should not receive the standard payment but would receive the special payment of £20,000. A person who could recall the harsh environment in the institution from which they were sent to Australia should receive the standard payment of £7,500 and the special payment of £20,000, a total of £27,500. A person who was sent to Australia and who could show that they had been more significantly affected, or who were subjected to more serious forms of abuse of any type, such as sexual abuse or serious physical abuse, would be also be entitled to an enhanced payment, but could not receive more than the maximum capped award of £100,000.

90 We consider that the operation of the HIA Redress Board should not continue indefinitely, but should be time limited, with a reasonable period being allowed in which prospective applicants could be expected to make an application for compensation. We recommend that applications must be made within five years from the coming into existence of the HIA Redress Board, which should then close to new applicants after that date. If other forms of abuse such as clerical abuse, or abuse in schools, were to be added to the HIA Redress Board then the five year period might have to be amended accordingly.

91 We recommend that the existence of the HIA Redress Board should be adequately publicised in Northern Ireland and elsewhere, and that once the Commissioner's post has been filled such publicity should be the responsibility of the Commissioner. Until the Commissioner's post is filled The Executive Office should be responsible for publicity about the HIA Redress Board.

92 We recommend that the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority (RQIA) and the Northern Ireland Social Care Council should have regard to any recommendations made to them by the Commissioner about practice issues relating to residential care.

Contributions to the cost of the compensation scheme

93 There is a widely expressed view, which we believe to be valid, that the total cost of compensation awarded to the victims of historical institutional abuse should not fall completely on the taxpayer. We recommend that any voluntary institution found by the Inquiry to have been guilty of systemic failings should be asked to make an appropriate financial contribution to the overall cost of the HIA Redress Board and any specialist support services recommended by the Inquiry.

94 The amount, and how it would be paid, should be negotiated between the Government and the institution(s) concerned in the first instance. For example institutions may wish to argue that their funds, or their other obligations, are such that they are not in position to make such a contribution, or, in the case of institutions that have already made payments, that the payments or other outlay such as travel costs from Australia, should be taken into account and set off against any contribution to which they may be asked to make so that they do not pay twice over for their failings.

95 If agreement as to the amount(s) to be paid by the institution(s) cannot be reached, we recommend that the Northern Ireland Executive and the institution(s) concerned submit all issues to mediation. If mediation fails then all remaining issues should be dealt with by the Northern Ireland Executive and the relevant institutions agreeing to submit to binding arbitration.

Chapter 5:

Module 1 – Sisters of Nazareth, Derry/Londonderry

Part One:

Part Two:

Part Three:

Introduction

1 The Inquiry devoted Module 1 to the examination of evidence relating to two homes run by the Congregation of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry, namely St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca, and Nazareth House in Bishop Street. These institutions were dealt with in the same module because there are a number of overlapping features in the manner in which they were run and other links between them although, as will be apparent from the remainder of this chapter, we have examined them separately. The Inquiry devoted thirty-nine sitting days to this module commencing on 27 January 2014, spread over ten sitting weeks from 27 January to 29 May 2014. During the ten sitting weeks, one of which (week 6) was a closed session, the Inquiry received oral evidence from sixty-two witnesses and received written statements from a further ten witnesses. The evidence of one other witness was not admitted. In addition to the oral and written evidence we have taken into account the detailed written and oral closing submissions made on behalf of fourteen individuals against whom allegations of abuse were made, and we also received written and oral submissions on behalf of the Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health and Social Services, each of which had statutory responsibility for these homes during the period with which we are concerned. We also received oral and written submissions on behalf of the Health & Social Care Board, as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children in this area. We have considered all of this evidence and paid careful attention to the various written and oral submissions which were made to us, however in accordance with our general approach and our Terms of Reference, we do not propose to refer to each and every detailed allegation that was made, whether against an individual or either institution, although we have taken all of the evidence and the submissions into account. For simplicity's sake we shall refer in this chapter to St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca as "Termonbacca" as this was the name by which it was commonly referred to by witnesses and officials alike. At this point it is appropriate to say something about the background of each of these institutions and how they operated.

Background

2 Nazareth House was the first of these institutions to come into existence. Its origin can be traced to a legacy from a Mrs. Watters, a native of Derry, to the then Roman Catholic Bishop of the substantial sum of £7,000. In 1892 the Bishop bought a property in Bishop Street and eight smaller houses in the same street for £3,360. The home was expanded in 1889 when some adjoining properties were purchased. As a result of an invitation from the Bishop, the Congregation of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth came to Derry in February 1892, and Nazareth House formally opened as a home for elderly and young people on 2 March 1892. Throughout the period with which the Inquiry is concerned, Nazareth House made provision for the care of both old people and young children, and the Sisters of Nazareth also ran a school for young children as part of the same site. Nazareth House ceased to be a home for children in 1998, and the old people's home which continued on the same site closed in 2012. The site still contains a primary school.

3 The main building comprised four floors with classrooms, bathrooms and playrooms on the ground floor. A nursery was located on the first floor; whilst the second and third floors contained dormitories for older children. The dormitories were intended to sleep up to forty children, and the children, including siblings, were separated according to age. The Foundation Book says that in 1956 the largest dormitory was divided into three small rooms, and in 1958 two large dormitories were divided into four small rooms. The home remained in this form until it was extensively modified in the early 1970s when the building was adapted to provide accommodation for family groups. This was brought about by the creation of separate apartments, each comprising bedrooms, sitting rooms, toilet facilities and small kitchens created by the conversion of the large dormitories. At this time the children continued to take their meals together in the common dining room. However, in the last years of its existence as a childrens' home the family units were further modified and upgraded to provide separate bedrooms, each containing a wardrobe and sink, as well as the installation of central heating and separate unit dining rooms so that all of the children in the home no longer ate in one large group.

4 Though it appears that Nazareth House could accommodate as many as 180 children up to the age of fourteen, for the greater part of the time with which the Inquiry is concerned it contained between 60 and 100 girls. When Nazareth House was formally registered as a children's home in July 1950 the Sisters of Nazareth declared that it would be capable of accommodating 180 children up to the age of fourteen, although, as stated above, the normal number appears to have been between 60 and 100, usually at the upper end of this range, and the Sisters of Nazareth have informed the Inquiry that throughout its existence as a children's home a total of 2,347 children were received into their care at Nazareth House.

5 A particular feature of Nazareth House was that until the late 1970s the individual sisters who looked after the children also taught in the school on the same site. As a result they had not only to perform their regular teaching duties, but they were also individually responsible for the care of a very large number of children outside school hours. This meant that they had to get the children up in the morning, prepare them for, and supervise, their breakfasts then get them out to school and spend the rest of the school day performing their teaching duties. Then in the afternoon and early evening they had to resume their duties in charge of the children, supervising them after school, getting them ready for bed and so on, although they were assisted from time to time by other sisters who had time to spare from their respective duties, whether as collectors or looking after the old people on the same site. They also were helped by older girls who continued to live on the premises after they had left the home. These girls would volunteer to help out with the sisters in the evening and supervise the younger children when the sisters were at prayer or having their own recreation time.

6 St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca was founded in November 1922 when the Sisters of Nazareth purchased a substantial house and one hundred and ninety five acres of land situated in the town land of Termonbacca. Termonbacca is Irish for "a sanctuary for lame, crippled or poor person". From its inception the home was supported by the proceeds and produce of the farm, which was actively farmed by the Sisters. The original building was not large enough to house the number of boys who eventually lived there and as a result a number of extensions were added over the years. In 1926 two substantial iron huts were donated to the Congregation and placed on land behind the main house. These comprised a dormitory, bathroom and toilets, together with a dining area for twelve senior boys who were also engaged in working on the farm. When Termonbacca came into existence, and for a considerable period thereafter, it was in a completely rural area somewhat remote from, although relatively close to, the city, until the creation of new housing estates in the adjoining Creggan area meant that the urban sprawl of Londonderry expanded almost to the home.

7 By the 1950s it had expanded in size and its stated capacity as a voluntary home was 92 boys. It remained purely a home for boys until a major change of direction was undertaken in the late 1960s when girls were admitted as part of family groups to Termonbacca. The Congregation has informed the Inquiry that 1,834 children were received into Termonbacca in the sixty years of its existence. The actual number of boys accommodated at Termonbacca was close to the stated maximum capacity throughout the 1950s and early 1960s, for example in 1953 there were 86 children[1] and in 1957 there were 92 boys.[2] However, in the early 1960s the pattern of care changed. Children were no longer admitted for their whole childhood, but they typically stayed at Termonbacca for a period of a few years or less. By the late 1960s the numbers being received into Termonbacca had almost halved and a major rebuilding exercise was embarked upon. This resulted in the construction of completely new family units with the conversion of the children's wings into three such units, each with a capacity of fifteen children with one sister in charge of each unit. Each of these units consisted of two or three bedrooms and the three new units, with a maximum capacity of forty five children, replaced what had hitherto been two large units accommodated in dormitories, each the responsibility of one sister. The fall in the number of children being admitted to Termonbacca by the late 1960s reflected a general move away from large institutions to the increased use of foster care, as well as a reduction in the number of children being placed voluntarily in the home. The construction of the new family units took some years to achieve and involved a total cost of almost £100,000 of which the Sisters of Nazareth raised more than half, with the remainder being provided by a government grant. We shall refer to this again later in this Chapter.

8 In summary, the roles of the two homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in the Londonderry area changed dramatically between 1950, when Section 92 (1) of the Children and Young Persons Act enabled the welfare authorities to develop residential childcare services, and 1998, when the Nazareth House in Derry closed. By 1950 Termonbacca and Bishop Street provided approximately 200 places between them, and there was no other residential childcare provision. Although most of the placements in these homes in the 1950s were voluntary and there was no involvement on the part of the welfare authorities, it is clear that the authorities were highly dependent on the services provided by the Sisters of Nazareth and they would have been in dire straits if the homes had been closed or seriously reduced in resident numbers.

9 Throughout the United Kingdom the homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth were among the largest institutions, at a time when local authorities were opening family group homes for eight or ten children, with a scattering of larger homes for 20 – 26 children. The welfare authorities opened Fort James children's home with fifteen beds, and Mourne Drive family group home with six beds. In 1980 Harberton House opened with 20 beds (rising later to 25) to undertake the reception, assessment and treatment of children. Also within the Western Board's area, Coleshill children's home in Enniskillen had 26 beds. Some children were placed elsewhere in training schools or in homes in Belfast, but these were relatively few, and the welfare authorities liked to look on the residential services in the area as being self-sufficient.

10 Meanwhile the numbers of children in Termonbacca and Nazareth House were being reduced, partly on a planned basis with the introduction of smaller internal 'family' units, and partly because of decreased demand. As benefits were improved and less social stigma was attached to single mothers, fewer babies and young children were being received into care. The children who were being received into care tended to be older, many had been deemed in need of care and control and some displayed very disturbed behaviour. It is clear that the WHSSB increasingly used its homes for the care of such children and we saw examples of children whose behaviour could not be contained in Termonbacca and Nazareth House being transferred to statutory homes. By the time Termonbacca closed in 1982 and Bishop Street in 1998 these homes were seen as dated.

11 Since Termonbacca closed it has been owned and run as a retreat centre by the Carmelite Order of Friars. This Order had no previous involvement with Termonbacca and had no connection with the running of the property as a children's home, and since 1982 the Sisters of Nazareth have had no involvement with Termonbacca.

12 Although Module 1 was concerned with the allegations relating to Nazareth House and Termonbacca, these homes have to be viewed in the context of a third home run by the Sisters of Nazareth at Fahan, Co. Donegal, which was closely connected with both Nazareth House and Termonbacca. The house at Fahan was purchased by the then Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, Bishop Farren, and was initially used to house 40 babies evacuated from Nazareth House as a safety measure during the Second World War. Bishop Farren's long-term aim was that it would be used as a mother and babies home: it was later used by the Sisters of Nazareth for that purpose for many years. Fahan received babies from mothers living in Northern Ireland, principally in the City and County of Londonderry, as well as children placed by families from Co. Donegal. In addition, another house in the grounds was acquired and was used as a holiday home for many years by the children of Nazareth House. For a significant period of time the house at Fahan kept babies until they were in or around two years old, many of whom were then transferred either to Termonbacca or to Nazareth House.

13 A significant number of the children admitted to both Nazareth House and Termonbacca over the years came from the Republic of Ireland, principally from Co. Donegal. Although many of those children were the children of mothers resident in Northern Ireland who chose to place the children in Fahan, the majority of the children in respect of whom information has been provided to the Inquiry by the Sisters of Nazareth appear to have been born in Co. Donegal. Figures relating to Nazareth House provided by the Congregation indicate that 88 children, all but three of whom were girls, came from Co. Donegal up to 31 December 1989.

14 A similar pattern is evident in relation to admissions to Termonbacca. Seventy-five children were admitted from Co. Donegal: seventy-one boys and four girls.

15 The Government and the relevant local authorities were well aware at the time that children were coming from Donegal. In January 1957 Eddie McAteer, a nationalist Member of Parliament at Stormont, wrote to the County Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee in relation to both Termonbacca and Nazareth House. In these letters he pointed out that of 87 boys in Termonbacca, 21 (24%) had been born outside Northern Ireland, and of one hundred and fifty seven girls in Nazareth House, 35 (22%) had been born outside Northern Ireland. The Report of the Northern Ireland Child Welfare Council for 1956 to 1959 also drew attention to this, saying that of the 84 children in voluntary homes born in the Republic of Ireland, 63 of them (75%) were concentrated in two Roman Catholic Homes in Londonderry (i.e. Nazareth House and Termonbacca). The report continued:

> "This transfer to Northern Ireland at the age of 3 years of children born in Eire represents the continuation of the long-standing tradition of sending deprived children from the babies' home in County Donegal to the children's homes in Londonderry which are run by the same organisation."[3]

16 Until the early 1970s both Nazareth House and Termonbacca received the great majority of their children as the result of parents or other relatives placing children with them voluntarily, and so the children in question were not officially in care so far as the relevant local authority county or county borough welfare committee was concerned, and so were not regarded by the welfare committees as their responsibility. In the 1950s the principal reason why children were placed in these homes, as in many other voluntary homes in Northern Ireland, was because they were illegitimate. For example, the Northern Ireland Child Welfare Council report already quoted observed that of the six largest voluntary homes in Northern Ireland, two out of every three children were illegitimate, and in Nazareth House 57.7% were illegitimate and in Termonbacca 60% were illegitimate (although these figures were considerably lower than several other houses in Northern Ireland).[4] Other reasons why children were placed in homes were because they may have been the responsibility of a single parent, a widow or widower, who could not cope, or because the overall family circumstances were such that the family was unable to cope with their children, possibly for financial or health reasons. Such children were often from large families, and there were many examples of groups of siblings being admitted to residential care at the same time. However, older and younger siblings at times remained at home, and this made it difficult for the children admitted to care to understand the rationale for their placement.

17 In a great many cases the introductions of the children to the home in question were made by parish priests or other religious. The figures already referred to the Inquiry by the Sisters of Nazareth indicate that of the 67 children admitted to Termonbacca from Co. Donegal, all were admitted on the recommendation of Catholic clergy. Of the 88 children admitted to Nazareth House from Donegal, 25 were recommended by priests, and five by female religious such as the Sisters of Mercy at Stranolar, Co. Donegal. These figures are not surprising because it was extremely common in the Roman Catholic community of the time for the mother, father or other relatives of a child to seek the advice of their parish priest, as was pointed out by Bishop Daly in his evidence to the Inquiry. The Child Welfare Council in its 1956 to 1959 report touched on this when it said:

> "The choice by clergymen of voluntary homes is explained partly by their concern that the child's religious upbringing might not be so well secured in the care of a welfare authority as in a voluntary home which is run by a religious community or by an organisation with a religious connection, and partly by the determination of the parents and relatives, whom the clergymen are trying to help, to seek the privacy of a voluntary home for an illegitimate child."[5]

18 Although until the late 1960s or early 1970s the great majority of children in Nazareth House and in Termonbacca were placed voluntarily, by the late 1950s there were a number of children placed in these institutions by local county welfare committees. In September 1960 five girls had been placed in Nazareth House by County Londonderry Welfare Committee,[6] and a small number of children had been placed in both homes by Co. Donegal County Council as the welfare authority there. The figures provided to the Inquiry by the Sisters of Nazareth indicate that six were placed in Nazareth House by the Co. Donegal welfare authorities. Although there are no overall figures for the position at Termonbacca, fragmentary pieces of documentary evidence support the oral evidence of some witnesses who say that they were placed there by the Co. Donegal welfare authorities. For example, there is a record that £1 per week was paid for HIA 46 upon his admission in 1955,[7] and evidence given to the Inquiry in closed session stated that the Co. Donegal Welfare Committee contributed £24 per annum, and a clothing allowance, to the upkeep of HIA 68 who was placed in Termonbacca in November 1950.

19 It seems that it was not until the late 1950s that local welfare committees in Northern Ireland started to place children in Termonbacca[8] on a regular or substantial basis. By the end of 1959 Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee had placed two children in Termonbacca; this increased to three by the end of 1961.[9] By 1963 there were four children, two from Londonderry County Borough, and two from County Tyrone, County Welfare Committees,[10] and by the end of 1963 out of 87 children in Termonbacca, eight had been placed by welfare committees.[11]

20 The placing of children in care in both institutions by local welfare committees and their successors increased in the 1970s until all the children in both had been placed in care by social services, but were being cared for by the Sisters of Nazareth. Throughout the period during which children were placed in care by local welfare authorities in this way, a charge was made by the Sisters to the authority concerned, and we will consider this later in this portion of the report when dealing with funding. For present purposes it is sufficient to state that the amounts charged for such children were always modest compared to the amounts charged by and allowed by local authorities, and by central government, to statutory homes in the public sector. This is a matter which we consider in greater detail later in this chapter, but in the early days the Sisters were solely dependent upon their own financial resources, and even when the local welfare authorities were placing children in either Nazareth House or Termonbacca, the amounts were not particularly substantial so far as the overall income of either institution was concerned.

21 At both Nazareth House and Termonbacca for the greater part of the period within the Inquiry's terms of reference the position was that the Sisters of Nazareth at both institutions were almost completely dependent upon the goodwill and extremely generous practical and financial support given to both homes by members of the Roman Catholic population in the City of Derry, in Co. Londonderry and in Co. Donegal. This support manifested itself in a number of ways. The Sisters at Nazareth House for many years carried out regular collections throughout the streets of Derry and in country districts. As the number of sisters available to carry out collecting diminished parish collections were instituted instead. Many of the witnesses who gave evidence to the Inquiry were fulsome in their praise of the generosity of the local population and of many local businessmen and business concerns. It is important that the allegations against the Sisters which we have to consider are viewed against the background of considerable poverty in the community from which they drew their financial and practical support. Nazareth House, in particular, was dependent to a very considerable degree on the proceeds of these collections, although it appears that at least by the late 1960s or early 1970s, if not before, it was the practice of Nazareth House to provide substantial proportions of the money it raised by collections to its sister houses at Termonbacca and Fahan. That at least was the evidence of SR 52 who served in Nazareth House from 1967 to 1975. She said[12] that the Saturday and Sunday collections always went to Termonbacca and Fahan, and that £1,000 per month went to each. As will become apparent when we examine the question of funding, both Nazareth House and Termonbacca received little financial support from either central or local government until some capital grants were provided in the late 1950s. A greater degree of capital grant funding was made available in the 1960s and 1970s, but almost to the end of the period covered by our terms of reference both institutions had to grapple with constant problems in obtaining sufficient funds to meet their day to day running costs.

22 We refer to these matters at this stage to emphasise that whatever criticisms may or may not be legitimately leveled at the manner in which the Sisters of Nazareth discharged their obligations to the children in their care in both Nazareth House and Termonbacca, throughout this time the individual sisters, and the Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth in general, had to struggle with very limited financial resources and had to do the best they could within those resources. The sisters who gave evidence before us repeatedly expressed their appreciation of the financial and material help provided to them by the people of Derry and County Londonderry, as did a number of those who were placed in both institutions. The practical and financial help given by members of the St. Vincent De Paul organisation together with generous donations from individual benefactors over the years, and frequent gifts of material and money by local businessmen and firms such as Desmonds, and the kindness extended to individual children by working people in businesses such as Woolworths, must be acknowledged. Without such generous help the Sisters of Nazareth could not have looked after these children at all. In the course of receiving evidence we came across many and varied examples of good practice, including holidays and day trips to the seaside, the arrangement of large numbers of summer placements, visits by St Vincent de Paul, choirs (including success in public competitions), the Termonbacca band, instances of educational encouragement for some children, finding jobs and accommodation on discharge for most witnesses, dealing with the IRA during the Troubles, the appointment of a social worker at Termonbacca to improve collaboration with the welfare authority social workers and attempts to improve aftercare.

23 It is also right that we acknowledge that many witnesses who spent their childhood in either institution and gave evidence to the Inquiry recognised that individual sisters devoted their lives to looking after children, and made many material sacrifices in order to follow their vocation (or apostolate as the Sisters refer to their calling) to serve others. Whilst many were bitter about the way they were treated, some accepted that even those who they say ill-treated them displayed kindness on occasions. Indeed, many who made allegations of various forms of ill-treatment by named or unnamed sisters acknowledged that other named sisters and unnamed sisters were kind and affectionate towards the children in their care. Many of the witnesses who spent most of their childhood in either institution (12.9 years on average until 1963 when stays became shorter), regarded the sisters as their family, and kept in touch with individual sisters long after they left either Termonbacca or Nazareth House, including in some cases those sisters against whom they now make allegations of wrong-doing.

24 A number of witnesses came forward during the course of Module 1 to give evidence contradicting allegations made by other witnesses because they wished to publicly put on record that they regarded the evidence given by others as inaccurate and unjustified slurs on the Sisters of Nazareth as a whole and on individual sisters. One witness came from Australia at his own expense for that purpose, and one from England, to give evidence in relation to Termonbacca, and two came forward for the same purpose in respect of Nazareth House. We have taken their evidence into account when reaching our conclusions, although it has to be said that in a number of instances parts of the evidence of those witnesses corroborated some of the allegations made by others, as will appear in later parts of this chapter.

25 Although the individual houses were in what was described to the Inquiry by the Congregation as a "semi-autonomous" relationship with the mother house and the central administration of the Congregation, each home had some connections with, and attempted to help, the other. Termonbacca was supported by its substantial farm, although this does not always seem to have been profitable, and we accept that the Sisters at Termonbacca provided produce to the Sisters in Nazareth House in return for bread baked by the Sisters in Nazareth House. Mention has already been made of the share of the collections which was apparently passed to Termonbacca by Nazareth House. Nevertheless each institution operated as a separate organisation in financial terms, and we shall deal with the implications of this later in this chapter.

26 The day-to-day functioning of both Nazareth House and Termonbacca was of course marked by the Roman Catholic ethos which each sought to observe and promote. Each sister had taken vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, and obedience was therefore one of the central tenets of the Congregation. This naturally led individual sisters to show obedience to those placed in authority above them, and, we are satisfied, sisters expected it of the children towards them. Understandably, in accordance with the widespread attitudes of many in Northern Ireland society at that time (whether Roman Catholic or Protestant), individual sisters and the Congregation as a whole held very strong views on the sinfulness of sexual activity outside marriage, as well as espousing virtues such as hard work and humility.

27 We have already referred to the burden placed upon individual sisters who were expected to look after the children in their care, as well as teach them in Nazareth House, and a similar burden was placed upon individual sisters in Termonbacca. It was not until the change that was made to bring in small family units in the late 1960s that appreciable numbers of sisters were assigned to look after the older children in Termonbacca. Figures supplied to the Inquiry by the Congregation indicate that in 1950 only one sister was in charge of nearly ninety children, and one sister was in charge of the babies. In 1951 there were two sisters in charge of the children and one in charge of the babies, but in 1952 and for each year thereafter, up to and including 1957, only one sister was apparently allocated to look after all of the children other than the babies in those years. In 1958 there were two, in 1959 there was one, and from 1960 onwards there were two sisters, each of whom took responsibility for up to forty children. One of the allegations made to us relates to the extent to which younger children at Termonbacca were left in the care of older children. Several sisters denied that this happened. We do not accept their evidence on this, and we are satisfied that there was considerable reliance by sisters on older children supervising younger children. This was inevitable. In the life of each house provision had to be made for the spiritual life of the Sisters, which involved time for prayer and attendance at Mass. Whilst this provided a degree of respite for the individual sisters, we have no doubt that this brought about a situation where younger children were left under the supervision of older boys, something which we later examine in detail and which we believe was a wholly unsatisfactory state of affairs.

28 Another effect of the low staff numbers in the 1950s and 1960s was that in order to cope, the Sisters needed children to conform and be biddable, even if that at times entailed repressing them. The Sisters appear to have had difficulty in dealing with certain behaviour such as running away or “escaping”, as it was termed (which does not appear to have been frequent), serious disobedience or aggressive behaviour towards sisters. At times this appears to have led to loss of temper, inappropriate control measures, or threats of transfer to another institution.

Part One:

Termonbacca

29 The number of complaints made to us, and the number of witnesses from whom we received evidence either in oral or written form relating to Termonbacca, was substantially greater than the number who made allegations in relation to Nazareth House, and we therefore propose to deal with Termonbacca first. We will consider the allegations made to us under the various headings which comprise our definition of abuse, but before doing so there are a number of general observations which it is appropriate to make at this point. The number of complaints which we received, and the individual allegations, are relatively consistent in terms of their distribution over the individual decades from the 1940s until the closure of Termonbacca in 1982. It is not possible to identify in every instance an allegation to a particular year, because a number of those who gave evidence to us were unable to be so precise, nor is it possible to divide the complaints by decades because individual witnesses may have spanned more than one decade. However, allegations were made by fourteen people who entered Termonbacca in the 1940s, or in one case from 1939; fourteen made complaints relating to the 1950s, and eighteen made complaints relating to the 1960s. The number reduced somewhat thereafter because thirteen made complaints relating to the 1970s; and seven who were still in Termonbacca when it closed in 1982 made complaints.

30 As these broad figures demonstrate, some of the allegations go back sixty years and more. Although there are some facts which can be established with some degree of accuracy as to when individual sisters were in Termonbacca, the records produced by the Sisters of Nazareth were not always reliable. Sometimes it is not apparent when a particular sister came or left during the year in question, and in some instances the recollections of individual sisters did not tally exactly with the rather elementary records which the Congregation appears to have kept as to the whereabouts of individual sisters at any given time. There are a number of instances where contemporary records may confirm or disprove the recollection of witnesses, but unfortunately these are relatively few and far between. Ultimately in a great many instances the Inquiry has had to make a decision as to whether individual allegations or categories of allegations have been established on the basis of our own assessment of the reliability of individual witnesses, and in many instances it came down to whether we believed the evidence of one individual when compared to another.

31 In making these decisions we have of course been alert throughout to the risk that some witnesses may not be reliable in their recollections of what they say occurred. The most obvious factor in this context is the passage of time which has elapsed since so many of the witnesses were children. Another possible factor that has to be considered is that some witnesses may have been motivated by hope of financial gain. Another factor that has to be considered is whether some may have been influenced in their recollections by discussions which they have had with others over the years; or, as was suggested by the final submissions on behalf of the Congregation, by knowledge of findings of the Ryan Commission in relation to allegations that were made in relation to religious institutions in the Republic of Ireland. We have considered the detailed submissions that were made on behalf of the Congregation and on behalf of individual sisters. We have also considered the submissions made on behalf of those individuals who are themselves alleged to have been abusers. They were alleged to have committed abuse as older children, or as former residents, or as employees of the Congregation (and some fall into more than one of these categories). On their behalf, submissions were made that some allegations were at best mistaken or unreliable, or at worst were fabricated.

32 In this context there are a number of observations of a general nature which we wish to make in response to both general and specific submissions made to us in relation to the evidence of witnesses in this module. Some of those who are vocal in their condemnation of the behaviour of either individual sisters or the Congregation as a whole accepted that they kept in touch with individual sisters by letter or postcard, by making visits to Termonbacca from time to time, either on their own or with members of their families, or by attendance at functions connected with Termonbacca in some way, such as weddings of former residents, reunions with former residents and sisters, or funerals of individual sisters. A common response on behalf of those against whom allegations have been made is that such contact was inconsistent with abuse having been inflicted on the person remaining in contact, because if the individual concerned had been abused in the manner he or she alleges they surely would not have kept in contact with the sister or sisters concerned; contact which was frequently on very friendly terms. We reject that as a general proposition. In the case of both Termonbacca and Nazareth House the home and those who lived and worked in it was the only family which many of the witnesses knew. In a great many instances they had effectively been abandoned by their families, or were unable to establish contact with their surviving parents or siblings in later years until they themselves were well on in years. We accept that many who suffered abuse do not find it easy to speak to anyone about such matters. Indeed, for a variety of reasons such individuals often continue to have what appear to be, or in some instances may in fact be, friendly relations with those whom they now say abused them. It has been accepted in countless criminal trials that such apparently friendly relationships are not inconsistent with an individual who now comes forward and complains of having been abused in some way as a child having actually experienced that abuse, because victims of abuse frequently have an emotional or psychological dependence upon their abuser, even if that person is a member of their family or someone else, such as a friend, with whom they come into contact on a frequent basis later in life.

33 When reaching our conclusions as to whether there were systemic failings, we have of course had to form our own conclusion as to the veracity and reliability of the evidence given by individual witnesses. However, in reaching our conclusions we have not been solely dependent on our own view as to whether we prefer one person's unsupported word against the denials of those who are alleged to have inflicted abuse. This is because a number of pieces of evidence emerged from the testimony of individuals who are not themselves applicants to the Inquiry, but who came to give evidence to the Inquiry. Sometimes they did so in response to allegations made against them to which the Inquiry considered they should have the opportunity to respond, or because in a small number of cases the individuals themselves came forward to offer their testimony to the Inquiry. In some instances, material emerged from the testimony of such individuals which supported the evidence of applicants.

34 Three examples in relation to Termonbacca will suffice to make this point. One of the most significant allegations concerns the way in which many sisters treated those who had the misfortune to be regular bed wetters in their childhood. Those sisters who gave evidence to us denied that the allegations which we shall consider in greater detail in due course were well-founded. However, SND 76 was one of those who came to give evidence in support of the Sisters. He said that during his time in Termonbacca in the late 1960s a bucket was placed in the dormitories for the boys to urinate into at night, and this allegation had also been made by HIA 98, who did not give oral evidence but submitted a written statement which we received. The other example relates to the allegations of sexual abuse. SND 48 was one of those witnesses alleged to have committed abuse. His evidence was that during his time as a child in Termonbacca he was aware of boys doing sexual things to other boys, and he conceded that he may have done so himself. SND 23 not only admitted engaging in consensual sexual activity with other boys when he was twelve to sixteen, but accepted that he was aware that former residents and adults with access to Termonbacca had engaged in sexual activity with boys who were still resident there. Indeed he alleged that he himself had been abused by an adult who visited Termonbacca on a weekly basis.[13] We consider that although there are only a small number of such instances, they are of considerable significance because they come from witnesses who were not applicants to the Inquiry. That they conceded that such events occurred provides significant support for the similar accounts of those who are alleged to be unreliable witnesses.

35 A great many of those witnesses who gave evidence to the Inquiry as applicants impressed us with their evident sincerity, even if they may have been mistaken in some details. We consider this to be understandable because of the passage of time, or their lack of appreciation of the significance of events at the time when they were children, or their failure to report the abuse to those in authority at the time. A common statement was that the individuals concerned were giving evidence not only so that their own experiences could be placed before the public, but so that the voices of those who had died, often tragically as young men, and who therefore did not have the same opportunity to describe their unhappy lives, would have said had they been able to give evidence. Many of the applicants plainly found the experience of having to recall the events they described deeply upsetting, and in a great many instances we are satisfied that the individuals concerned were doing all that they could to give an accurate account of their experiences. They may not always have been accurate, and that is only to be expected because of the passage of time, but they were sincere.

36 Finally, it is not just our own conclusion that many of the allegations made to us were well-founded. Although it was not conceded on behalf of the Congregation that every allegation was well-founded, nevertheless when Sister Brenda McCall gave her evidence on behalf of the Congregation she made it clear that the Congregation accepts that there were abuses, although she did not concede that every individual allegation was well-founded. On 20 May 2014 there was the following exchange between Counsel for the Inquiry and Sr Brenda:

> Q. "[Counsel] if I might explore that somewhat with you, Sister, can I ask you how you accept that? Where do you say - where does the Congregation accept that the standard of care was not at the appropriate level?
> A. Well, I think, having listened to evidence given here, which was very shocking and harrowing for us, we must accept at certain times by certain sisters things were just not right."[14]

She was then asked:

> "…in general terms does the Congregation accept that members of the Congregation did physically assault children in their care?
>
> A. Unfortunately, yes, I would accept that.
>
> Q. And equally older boys, as we have heard, and ex-residents, it is accepted by the Congregation there were physical assaults committed by those people?
>
> A. Yes, yes.
>
> Q. And indeed the lay staff who would have been employed by the Congregation, whether in terms of volunteers who were coming in or in terms of employees, is it accepted that there was also physical assaults committed by those people?
>
> A. In some instances yes."

Sexual abuse

37 There were a very large number of allegations that sexual abuse was perpetrated against young children. We are satisfied that repeated episodes of non-consensual sexual activity were perpetrated by older boys against younger boys. The older boys were often referred to by the witnesses as "seniors". We have concluded that almost all the episodes which we believe did occur did so: at night when children were in the dormitories and were meant to be asleep; or when the sisters were at prayer; or in locations, whether on the farm or elsewhere within the buildings at Termonbacca, where the perpetrators believed that they would not be seen by others in authority. We accept that the offences which occurred ranged from masturbation to inflicting oral sex on younger children or requiring younger children to perform oral sex and included episodes of attempted buggery and actual buggery.

38 We also accept that in later years when girls were admitted to Termonbacca two girls were subjected to episodes of digital penetration by boys in the home.

39 There were many allegations where it is alleged that adult males repeatedly perpetrated non-consensual sexual behaviour on younger children. These males fell into one or both of two separate categories. The first was that there were a number of male employees who worked on the farm or around the buildings. Whilst a great many of the applicants spoke very highly of the late Robert Ennis, and referred to him as a very fair and supportive man, other employees were identified to us as alleged abusers. The other category of perpetrator consisted of those who had been children in Termonbacca themselves and who continued to return to the premises after they had left as adults. For convenience these are referred to as ex-residents. A number of sisters gave evidence denying that ex-residents were able to have access to the premises in a fashion that would have allowed them to commit offences of this sort. We reject their evidence, not least because a number of those who gave evidence to the Inquiry who were not applicants conceded that they themselves had been abused by older men who returned to the premises.

40 There were a number of instances where it was alleged that individual sisters came across unmistakable evidence of improper physical activity between older boys and younger children, and a number of the witnesses said that they reported episodes of sexual abuse to individual sisters. In almost every case where this was done, the evidence of the individual concerned was to the effect that no action appeared to have been taken against the perpetrator(s). Indeed on a number of instances the witnesses claimed that the response of the sister was to say that they did not believe the allegation, and the child was often physically or verbally chastised for making such an allegation.

41 We accept that there is credible evidence that these reports were made on many occasions, and have concluded that these reports should have alerted both the individual sisters and the Congregation as a whole to the substantial risk that existed in Termonbacca that boys would be subjected to sexual abuse by other boys. Effective precautions should have been, but were not, put in place to prevent the sexual abuse taking place. Not only are we satisfied that a number of allegations were made to the sisters which should have put them on notice of this danger, but the wide disparity in ages between many of the boys itself created an obvious risk of improper sexual advances and sexual exploitation of younger boys by older boys.

42 In reaching this conclusion we have had regard to the evidence of many of the social workers who gave evidence to the Inquiry that peer sexual abuse was not on the radar of those active in the social work field until very late in the period covered by the Inquiry's terms of reference. Nevertheless, for decades it has been a recognised problem in male communities involving children that various forms of sexual abuse can be inflicted by older boys on younger boys. It may not have been as widely recognised or publicly discussed at that time as it has become in recent times, but we are in no doubt that the collective experience of the senior members of the Congregation should have alerted them to this risk, just as they were alert to the risk of older boys bullying younger boys. As SR 2 put it:

> "[Bullying] was something you were always looking out for to protect the smaller children or even boys of the same age, because some were more powerful than the others. You had to watch out for the vulnerable ones."

She also conceded that the sisters were aware of the potential for the children getting into sexual exploration at that age.[15] With that knowledge the Sisters should have taken steps to instruct sisters in the risks that could arise, and devised methods that would have at least reduced the likelihood of such abuse taking place.

43 In addition to allegations of sexual abuse by older boys, ex-residents and employees, sexual abuse by three named and two unnamed priests have been made. We have considered these carefully, and taken into account both the oral evidence from the witnesses concerned and the documentary material made available to us by the PSNI and the Roman Catholic Diocese of Derry. Whilst we are not persuaded that each of the priests identified to us did commit acts of sexual abuse in relation to children at Termonbacca, we do accept that at least three priests, one of whom is deceased and two of whom cannot be exactly identified, may well have committed serious sexual offences in relation to children whilst those priests took advantage of opportunities presented to them when they were in Termonbacca to hear confessions or celebrate Mass.

44 Although we accept that there were episodes of serious sexual abuse in the form of masturbation of the children or attempts at buggery, it does not automatically follow from this that there was a systemic failure on the part of the Congregation to prevent such sexual offences being committed against children in their care. We say this because in any form of religious or other institution of a similar type at that time a great many people regarded it as simply inconceivable that individual priests or clergy, of whatever denomination, could abuse what was regarded by their fellow communicants as the sacred trust which they held as ordained clergy, or as people who were to be ordained. Sadly it is now only too well known that many Roman Catholic priests have abused their position to inflict grave sexual crimes against children, as indeed have clergy from other Christian denominations. However, it is our view that unless the Congregation in these particular instances, or an individual sister, had reason at the time to suspect that the priests in question were capable of committing these offences it could not be said to amount to a systemic failure on the part of the Congregation to prevent such abuse, because at that time neither the Congregation, nor the vast majority of other people, could have conceived that a priest would behave in that way. Were we to conclude that precautions which would now be regarded as appropriate, or a failure to recognise danger signs which would now be realised to exist, should have been taken account of by the Sisters of Nazareth at the time that these matters occurred, that would be to require the application of present day standards in the light of present day knowledge to a different time when the requisite knowledge was not as widespread as it now is.

45 There were also two instances where sexual abuse of children is alleged to have been perpetrated by females in Termonbacca. One of these relates to allegations which were made by HIA 125 against a sister identified as SR 5. It is alleged that the sister in question bathed him and two other boys when he was about fourteen over a period of some three weeks or so, during the course of which the sister is alleged to have touched the genitals of the boys. We accept that there may have been an incident when some teenage boys were supervised whilst they were being bathed, although we are not persuaded that any contact with the genital areas of the boys concerned has been shown to have been for a sexual motive. On balance we consider it more probable that such actions were properly carried out to ensure that the teenage boys were washing themselves thoroughly at the time. That is not to say that such action would have been wise, because plainly it would not have been.

46 The second episode related to events described by HIA 46. As he said that he was five or six at the time, if his recollection is accurate that would mean that the incident he described occurred around 1957 or 1958. He was unable to recall whether the female in question was a sister or a lay staff member, but as the Congregation has informed the Inquiry that from the best of their records there were no lay staff employed at Termonbacca before 1962, if this episode occurred as alleged by HIA 46, it must have involved a sister. Although the incident he described where the female attempted to achieve sexual gratification by placing the penis of such a small child against her vagina appears improbable, it was described in considerable detail by the witness, and on balance we accept the truthfulness of his account and that this episode occurred. As such it was plainly an episode of sexual abuse, however it was a one-off episode by an individual in a position of trust, and as such we consider that such an abuse of trust was almost impossible to prevent. For that reason we do not consider that this episode amounted to systemic abuse, although it was a form of sexual abuse.

47 A number of complaints were made that some sisters had a practice of publicly inspecting the underwear of the children, and it seems from the descriptions of the witnesses concerned that the sisters were seeking to identify signs of sexual activity by the boys concerned resulting in the emission of semen on the underwear. We accept that such inspections were carried out, and were carried out in an insensitive and public fashion. The manner in which the inspections were carried out amounted to a form of sexual and emotional abuse. In addition, verbal and physical abuse by sisters followed if staining was found. Other witnesses complained that pockets were sewn up to ensure that boys did not fiddle with their genitals. We consider that actions such as these were a manifestation of the inability of the Sisters to cope with issues of sexuality with young people.

Physical abuse

48 In his evidence to the Inquiry HIA 69 alleged that SR 6 assaulted him on various occasions, including beating him with the flex of a kettle.[16] The WHSSB records confirm that HIA 69 alleged to SND 484 who was his WHSSB social worker that SR 6 caught him by the throat on one occasion. She spoke to SR 6 who accepted that she had done so, saying that he had been quite insolent to her and that she had lost her temper with him.[17] HIA 69 was moved to a different section in Termonbacca. In her evidence on Day 23 SND 484 explained that whilst such an incident would be dealt with differently today, at the time there may have been no further action because the matter had been brought out into the open and dealt with by HIA 69 being moved to a different section where he would be under the supervision of a different sister.

49 A significant feature of the allegations made to us in Module 1 concerned allegations that there were many instances where unidentified sisters, and a number of sisters who were identified, resorted to frequent, severe and wholly unjustified physical chastisement of children. The allegations ranged from beating with whatever implement in the form of a chair leg or an electric flex came to hand; the practice of "knuckling", that is hitting a child on the head with the knuckles; or striking the child on the head with a bunch of keys, as well as other forms of blows with hands, or in some instances feet. Several sisters gave evidence to us including a number of those against whom such allegations were made. Although in almost every instance any form of physical chastisement or attack was denied by the surviving sisters who gave evidence, nevertheless we are satisfied that there was a large body of credible evidence provided by many of those who gave evidence of persistent and widespread resort by both named and unidentified sisters to a practice of severe, frequent and wholly unjustified physical chastisement of children which in some instances involved severe beatings. These practices may well have been unlawful in some instances as going beyond what was permitted by adults in loco parentis of children, and in any event was behaviour which was completely against the principles of the Congregation. As long ago as 1897 the General Chapter of the Congregation decided that children must not be severely punished,[18] and Sister Brenda McCall accepted that it was part of the ethos of the Congregation, and that "..the Sisters themselves knew that the Congregation didn't accept corporal punishment of any kind."[19]

50 We accept that there were occasions when individual sisters lost control of themselves to such an extent that they used their limbs, and resorted to whatever object was to hand, as weapons against the children. We further accept that these assaults were random, frequent and created a pervasive atmosphere of fear on the part of many children, making them reluctant to complain to anyone in authority about sexual or physical ill treatment by anyone, whether other boys or lay or clerical staff, lest they themselves received a beating as a result of their complaint. Even leaving aside the more extreme forms of beatings, which we accept occurred on some occasions, we are satisfied that the use of excessive chastisement was not merely a reflection of the widespread resort to such behaviour that was common in some homes, schools and other sections of society in Northern Ireland at that time, but was part of a deliberate practice by many sisters to maintain strict discipline, often by a single sister who was responsible for up to forty boys at a time, and thereby keep control of a large number of boys, some of whom were approaching manhood and strong young men.

51 In addition to allegations of beatings administered by nuns, there were many complaints to us of beatings administered by "charge boys" or "seniors", older boys who were acting as some form of informally appointed or recognised prefect. Such unusual terminology is itself an indication of such a practice. A common theme of such accounts is that beatings were administered for perceived offences such as not cleaning floors properly (a particular source of complaint), or to enforce discipline. In one instance it was asserted that a sister said "put some manners in him", a remark which clearly implied that the use of force would meet with the approval of the nun concerned.[20] There was also a certain amount of straightforward bullying.

20 HIA 351 in closed session on Day 1, 26 March 2014.

52 We consider it noteworthy that some ex-residents, who were not applicants to the Inquiry, in their evidence corroborated allegations of beating and bullying by older boys. We recognise that some of the allegations may be exaggerated, but we are satisfied that there remain many credible allegations which lead us to conclude that this occurred on a widespread scale. We further consider it likely that at least some of those sisters who themselves resorted to physical chastisement of a severe and persistent nature were aware that "seniors" were also engaging in such behaviour, or at least suspected that it was occurring and did nothing to prevent it, because they wished to encourage by turning a blind eye to such actions by older boys in order to maintain discipline over the large number of children who they had to supervise.

Emotional abuse

53 We have defined emotional abuse as improper behaviour which undermined a child's self-esteem and emotional wellbeing. Four principal forms of emotional abuse emerged from the evidence placed before us. The most common complaint was of the way children of all ages, some of whom were very young, who wet their beds, or sometimes wet their clothes, were treated by sisters. It was alleged that sisters would beat the children concerned; that on occasions they were beaten on the soles of their feet, and that seniors also would beat children who had wet their beds. A particularly common and serious allegation was that bed wetters were made to stand with the wet sheets over their head, and then made to parade to the bathroom with these wet sheets over their head. A related allegation was that they were made to stand with the wet pants over their head if they had wet their clothes. It is alleged that bed wetters were often made to sit in the bath together, or were made to change straightaway into dry clothes without being washed and so smell of urine all day. One piece of evidence which we regarded as particularly striking in this context was the evidence to which we have already referred of one witness who gave oral evidence to the Inquiry, supported by one who did not, that in an attempt to resolve the problem of bed wetting in the 1960s a bucket was placed by the sisters in the middle of dormitories at night into which the boys were required to urinate to ensure they did not wet their beds. Given that there were bathrooms with toilets nearby we found this a revealing precaution, and a practice which was degrading and indefensible.

54 Despite the denials by individual sisters that these practices occurred we consider that there is overwhelming and credible evidence that the attitude of many sisters towards bed wetting was backward, extremely unsympathetic, and harshly punitive throughout the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, although the scale of the problem may have abated to some extent once the boys moved from the dormitories into the new build with the smaller units that were completed by the early 1970s.

55 Bed wetting can be a difficult problem for any institution with a large number of unhappy children to deal with. There was evidence that the sisters tried to deal with bed wetting in a number of ways, such as placing mackintosh or rubber sheeting under the sheets, or, as was said on one occasion, putting the end of the bed up, apparently in the belief that this would reduce the problem. There is no evidence to suggest that the sisters, whether individually or as a whole, at Termonbacca understood the problem of bed wetting or how to deal with it. This was despite the fact that in 1952 the Ministry of Home Affairs sent to every voluntary home in Northern Ireland[21] a memorandum prepared by the Home Office in England on Conduct of Children's Homes.[22] The 1952 memorandum contained much wise advice on how to deal with bed wetting at paragraphs 23 and 24 which, because of their importance, we set out in full below:

> "Bed wetting cannot be attributed to any one cause; if effective help is to be given, the child must be studied as an individual. The trouble may be due to an organic cause, to delay in learning bladder control, or to emotional disturbance due to loneliness, a sense of being left in strange surroundings, or of not being wanted. A feeling of hopelessness about the habit may cause it to persist. A child who persistently wets the bed should be seen by the medical officer so that he can advise on treatment or, if necessary, refer the case to a hospital or child guidance clinic. Understanding and consideration on the part of the staff are of the first importance. Bed wetters should not be separated from other children, and members of the staff dealing with the child or with the wet bed should proceed in a matter of fact way, and should never exhibit impatience, disgust or anxiety. Mackintosh sheets should be used only when necessary, when they have to be used, a thin blanket should be placed between > the mackintosh and the bed sheet. Sheets should always be changed after being wet. Bed wetters should not be required to wash their sheets. There is nothing to be gained by restricting drinks unreasonably, but it is undesirable that any child should drink large quantities late in the evening. There should be easy and lighted access at night to a lavatory, and where necessary the children should have their own chamber pots."[23]

56 Only one of the sisters who gave evidence had any knowledge of this guidance, despite it being circulated to all voluntary homes with the request that everyone relevant should be made aware of it. Nor do the individual sisters, or the Sisters in general at Termonbacca, appear ever to have sought medical advice on the general problem or on individual cases.

57 Whilst one witness said that he was made to remain in clothes smelling of urine all day, the bulk of the evidence was that children who had wet the bed were sent to wash. Nevertheless, we accept that the other allegations which we have set out above have been established, and amount to a widespread and systematic behaviour by the Sisters. We consider that the way in which the sisters individually, and as a group, dealt with children who were bed wetters amounted to a serious form of emotional abuse.

58 Another form of emotional abuse alleged was that many sisters frequently made cruel and belittling comments about children in Termonbacca. Remarks such as the dependency of the children on the sisters because they had been placed in the home - "your mother and father don't want you"; and "nobody paying for you to be here" appear to have been widespread. As already pointed out, many of the children placed in the home were illegitimate, and we accept that on one occasion a visiting priest characterised the child concerned "as product of an evil and satanic relationship." Whilst this was made by a priest and not by a sister, we consider that the remark was indicative of a widespread view shared by many of the sisters, as indicated by HIA 157, who was illegitimate himself and said that he was brought up to believe that he was "a mortal sinner".[24] Other derogatory remarks were common, such as "Jew", "tinker", "fishwife" and others. We accept the evidence of many witnesses who described such remarks as diminishing and demeaning them. These remarks have been denied by the individual sisters who gave evidence, but we are satisfied that this was a widespread practice resorted to by many sisters.

59 Another form of emotional abuse alleged was that it was common for sisters to use threats that children would be removed from the home if they did not behave, by being sent to Muckamore Abbey (a psychiatric hospital to which children with learning difficulties were admitted), or a particular social worker would be sent for, the implication being that they would be removed from Termonbacca and sent to another institution. We are satisfied that such threats were routinely made, and were clearly designed to frighten the children into submission. We accept that this amounted to another form of emotional abuse.

60 Finally, a pervasive complaint is that there was a lack of individual love and care and affection shown by individual sisters to many of the children in their care. It is true that some had a very close bond with individual sisters, although it is our view that many of these instances are because the sisters concerned showed favouritism towards some children which they denied to others. We have occasion elsewhere in this chapter to refer to Miss Kathleen Forrest's 1953 report, and a number of sisters, such as SR 3, did concede in their evidence that it was impossible to show as much love and affection towards each child as they would have liked because of the large number of children for whom each nun was responsible.[25]

Neglect

61 There were a number of separate allegations that may constitute systemic neglect, and we will deal with these in turn. The first was that children at Termonbacca received inadequate medical attention, in some respects, in relation to specific injuries inflicted by other children or by sisters. In addition, there were more general allegations of poor or inadequate medical attention. A number of applicants alleged that they received no medical treatment in relation to specific injuries. For example, HIA 66 alleged that his nose was broken by another resident, and HIA 94 alleged that he was hit on the head a number of times by sisters, and despite bleeding was not provided with any medical treatment. As against this, a significant number of other applicants said that they were provided with medical treatment which involved their being taken to hospital and being given appropriate treatment. One example was HIA 22: he said he was hit on the head with a brick thrown by another boy and taken to hospital where he received eleven stitches. HIA 102 said that a wire lodged in his leg as the result of a sister pulling at him as he was trying to get over a wire fence. He was taken to hospital to have this removed. HIA 125 said that he fell and broke his arm while doing circuits in the gym as a punishment and was then taken to hospital to have his arm set. HIA 151 alleged that he collapsed and had to be admitted to hospital for a week, and he links this collapse to a sister beating him on the head with a towel rail.

62 These are merely a selection of the allegations and evidence by twelve applicants, and we have concluded they indicate that the sisters were prepared to take children to either hospital or to a doctor to receive appropriate medical treatment. Whilst many applicants complained that they were taken to see dentists where they received what they regarded as rough or unsympathetic treatment, their evidence, and some contemporary documents, confirms that regular medical attention was provided. For example, SND 6214 shows that the sisters were sending children to a Dr Devlin, apparently a local general practitioner. A number of documents were produced to us that showed that children did receive medical examinations at the home. In addition, those documents relating to inspections to which we shall refer in greater detail in a later section in this chapter indicate that for a considerable number of years in the 1950s and 1960s inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs jointly inspected Termonbacca (and other homes) in the company of a doctor from the Ministry of Health. Whilst not many documents have survived showing what the doctor did, nevertheless there is no reason to assume that a medical inspection would have failed to reveal that the children were ill-fed or neglected in some other way.

63 We have come to the conclusion that it is unlikely that the children were denied necessary medical attention as a general practice. It is, however, possible that on a number of occasions individual sisters were reluctant to take children to hospitals or to general practitioners in relation to what may have been regarded by the sisters at the time as relatively minor injuries which they felt that they should deal with themselves. Therefore, looking at the evidence as a whole, we are not satisfied that the evidence supports a finding of a systemic failure on the part of the sisters to provide adequate medical attention, either for specific injuries, or as part of the general duty to look after the health of the children in their care.

64 Poor and inadequate food was alleged to have been provided by many of the applicants. However, the evidence in this respect is contradictory. Some applicants said that the food was poor, others felt that it was good or adequate. Particularly in the years immediately following the end of the Second World War, and in the early 1950s, rationing was in force, and it may well have been the case that for many years the food was monotonous and of an institutional type, but that is not neglect. We have referred in the preceding paragraph to medical inspections, and if the children were malnourished we would have expected this to have been identified and remarked upon by medical inspectors and by other visitors to the home, and there is nothing to suggest that this was the case. We feel that there is insufficient evidence to justify a finding that children were neglected because they were inadequately fed.

65 A number of the applicants complained that from time to time they were clothed in hand-me-down clothes. However, whilst this no doubt embarrassed teenagers in particular, it has to be remembered that in the years after the Second World War rationing and poverty meant there was little scope for the Sisters to provide new clothes in the way that would be regarded by a present generation as almost a right. We had the benefit of a number of photographs, which were both obviously posed and unposed, in particular a cine film received from SND 14 of a trip by children to Donegal. All of the photographs show that the children were adequately clothed, and we conclude there is no evidence which would support a finding of a systemic failure on the part of the Sisters to provide adequate clothing for the children at Termonbacca. Some complained that because they were made to wear a Termonbacca uniform to school, or kept in short trousers for longer than other boys, they were singled out as “home boys” at school. Whilst they were embarrassed by this we do not consider that it was abusive to make them wear a uniform.

66 There were some complaints that the bedrooms were very cold, however we consider these were insufficient to be representative or indicative of systemic abuse in the form of failing to provide adequate heat.

67 There was a reference to there being rats in the walls of the temporary structures that were put up in the late 1960s to house the children whilst the new units were being constructed. Given that the home was situated on a farm this may well be correct, but it has to be viewed against the background of the Sisters being in the process of building new accommodation and we do not consider that this can be said to amount to a systemic failing.

68 A common complaint was that gifts of toys, clothes and money given to children were then taken from those children by the Sisters. A related complaint was that items of new clothing sometimes provided to children by their parents immediately before they were placed in the home, or by foster parents with whom they were placed over the summer, were also removed. We accept that this occurred. Whatever may have been the motive for it, we do not consider that this was a justifiable practice, and we consider that it was a form of neglect.

Unacceptable practices

69 A considerable number of allegations were made which we group together under the general heading of unacceptable practices. As will become apparent, some of these are capable of amounting to emotional or physical abuse, or other forms of systemic failing, and we propose to deal with these in turn.

70 Many applicants complained that excessive time and effort was spent on cleaning and polishing floors. This seems to be a characteristic of their experiences in the 1950s and 1960s, and many applicants referred to being made to polish the floors at weekends, a task which seems to have occupied them for many hours, and to have been chastised by seniors if they did not do so properly. Sisters who gave evidence denied that an excessive amount of time was spent on cleaning and polishing floors, or on other tidying duties around the home. However, given that many witnesses described the rhyme “River front, river back” we believe that the Sisters must have been aware of this, and that seniors would beat children on occasions if they did not do the work properly. The 1952 Home Office memorandum to which we have referred suggested that children “should be expected to take a moderate share in the daily running of the home, but not at the expense of sleep, meals, education or reasonable recreation."[26] We consider that it would have been a perfectly reasonable requirement to ask the children to do chores to keep the place clean and tidy, provided always that the requirements were within their physical capabilities and were not excessive in the amount of time or physical effort required of the children. We accept that in the 1950s and 1960s children were expected to expend an excessive amount of time and energy cleaning and polishing floors. We consider that this went beyond what was acceptable at the time and was a form of abuse. By the 1970s it appears to have been the case that chores were allocated to children on a rota basis, and were not as physically demanding, something that was much more satisfactory.

71 Several witnesses referred to children being required to help with the sowing and picking of potatoes at the appropriate seasons. Not all complained of this, and this practice has to be viewed against the widespread, if not universal, practice on farms at the time when children were expected to help with potato picking. Indeed so widespread was this practice in Scotland that the Scottish educational curriculum provided for a break in the school year for some two weeks or so in the autumn to allow children to help with potato picking. Therefore, unless the demands were either physically excessive, or involved an inappropriate amount of time, and/or interfered with the children's schoolwork, the requirement to help with potato sowing and picking cannot be described as abusive. We are not persuaded that the demands made were either physically excessive or interfered with the children's schoolwork, and so we do not consider that this amounted to a form of abuse.

72 Girls were admitted to Termonbacca in the late 1960s in an attempt to keep families together. Three female applicants who gave evidence referred to being asked as girls to look after young children in the nursery. Two of the three resented being asked, the third enjoyed doing so. Asking older girls to help with young children can hardly be regarded as abusive provided that it was not something which was demanded of them to an excessive degree; we are not satisfied that it was, and we do not consider that these allegations amount to a form of abuse.

73 Many of the applicants gave evidence that the Sisters took no steps to make them aware that they had siblings in either Termonbacca or in Nazareth House when children from Termonbacca went to primary school at Nazareth House. This is one of the allegations which clearly caused great and lasting distress to many of our witnesses. Sometimes children did learn that they had brothers or sisters in either Termonbacca or Nazareth House, but often acquired this knowledge purely by accident as a result of a casual comment or question by another child. Whilst some of the allegations in this regard were contradictory, as when different members of the same family said on the one hand that they did not know of the existence of siblings when others said that they did, nevertheless we accept the evidence in general of many applicants that they either did not know that they had siblings, or only learned that by accident. For example, HIA 151 described how he was separated from his brothers on arrival and it was some time before he learned that he in fact had two brothers. HIA 68 did not know for several years that he had two brothers in a different home, and HIA 157 only learned that he had a brother in the home when his uncle and aunt and another brother came to visit. HIA 351 described how he had no contact with his two older sisters who were in Nazareth House, nor with an elder brother, HIA 284, who was sent to Australia. SND 48 (who had not originally applied to the Inquiry) gave evidence that he had not been told that he had a sister or a brother.

74 Despite the 1952 Home Office memorandum saying that "The child's link with his own family and relatives should be preserved wherever possible..,"[27] we accept that there was a widespread and pervasive practice of ignoring and concealing the existence of siblings, whether those siblings were in Termonbacca or Nazareth House. We regard this as a cruel and unjustified practice, and one which was a serious and systemic form of emotional abuse.

75 Linked to this are the allegations that a great many children were prevented from receiving letters from, and having contact with, their parents. There is ample evidence that in several instances letters were not passed on to the child concerned, and we regard this as wholly unjustified and consider that it also constituted a form of systemic emotional abuse. That is not to say that in every case contact with their parents was denied to children who were in Termonbacca. A number of witnesses described how their parents came and spoke to them, but did so in the presence of one or more sisters who would remain in the room. We have no doubt that in many cases both parents and children found the presence of sisters and the overall atmosphere to be an intimidating one, and certainly not one that would have encouraged children to speak freely to their parents. There appears to have been a common practice of visiting falling off, and whilst this may well have been due to difficulties which some parents had in travelling to Derry from remote country areas, or perhaps moving away from the Derry area and losing touch with their children, we have little doubt that the reality was that the intimidating atmosphere was such that visitors were discouraged from coming, even if this was not a deliberate policy but merely a consequence of the atmosphere that pervaded Termonbacca over many decades.

76 Many witnesses referred to what they described as a widespread practice whereby sisters referred to individual children not by name, but by the number placed on their laundry. It is not disputed that the sisters allocated a number to each individual child, and that these numbers were placed on their clothing so that the item could be correctly reunited with the child in question after it had been laundered. This is a sensible approach, but the witnesses who complained of the practice say that the sisters were in the habit of simply referring to the individual child by their number and not by name, and that the witnesses found this a dehumanising experience. It is significant that many of those who gave evidence to us were able to remember their numbers many years later.

77 However, not all the witnesses agreed that they were always known by numbers, for example HIA 144 and HIA 150 both gave evidence to the effect that they were only called by numbers when clothing had to be identified. The sisters who gave evidence asserted that numbers were only used when it was necessary to identify individual items of laundry. HIA 11 asserted that the practice of referring to individuals by number lasted until as late as 1969 or 1970, and he said that it stopped because he told his foster parents about the practice, and they complained to the sisters.[28] The evidence on using numbers is contradictory, and whilst we accept that there may well have been occasions when some sisters referred to children by number, as in the situation described by an applicant, who said that children were called by name and number, because there were four "Johns" (of whom he was one), we are not persuaded that there was a widespread practice of referring to children only by number. We therefore conclude that this did not amount to systemic abuse.

78 Eight witnesses allege that in various ways they were forcibly made to eat unattractive or unwelcome food. Thus HIA 7 said that she was forced to eat lumpy porridge, and HIA 352 said that she was forced to eat carrots. Five of the seven witnesses who said that they were forced to eat food were female, suggesting that whatever may have occurred before girls were accepted into Termonbacca, this was something that occurred from the late 1960s onwards. Whilst we recognise that this may have happened in some individual instances, it is more likely that many of the children were compelled to eat but were not physically force fed. We feel that there are insufficient instances to justify a finding of systemic abuse in relation to this.

79 A significant complaint by a good many witnesses related to being forced to bath in bathwater which had had Jeyes Fluid added to it as a disinfectant. Information provided to the Inquiry by the makers of Jeyes Fluid indicates that at the beginning of the twentieth century adding Jeyes Fluid to bathwater as a disinfectant was a permitted use by the makers, although this was no longer a suggested use by the 1960s, suggesting that the practice may have changed at some point which cannot now be identified.[29] Nevertheless, the evidence of the majority of the witnesses who referred to the use of Jeyes Fluid was that excessive amounts were added to their bathwater, and as a result caused considerable physical discomfort to them. This practice appears to have been more prevalent in the 1950s. We consider that Jeyes Fluid was frequently used in excessive quantities; this was unjustified, and was a practice which should have been more tightly supervised and controlled by the Sisters to ensure that the minimum amount necessary was added to the bathwater. We consider that this was a form of physical abuse.

80 Another complaint relating to bath-time practices was that the bed wetters were made to have a cold bath with Jeyes Fluid in it, as was alleged by HIA 144 and HIA 130. A further complaint was that wooden scrubbing brushes were used with Fairy floor soap to scrub the children concerned. HIA 146, for example, alleged that a deck scrubber was used to wash children. Whilst we accept that there may have been isolated instances of conduct such as this, we do not consider that it was sufficiently widespread or frequent to amount to systemic abuse.

81 A number of witnesses alleged that they were either prevented from, or discouraged from, seeking to make academic progress whilst at school, and they attribute their lack of success in later life to the absence of encouragement to do better whilst they were in Termonbacca. As against this, there is some evidence that a number of children were helped to prepare for the eleven-plus examination, as was the case for SND 76. However, this does not appear to have been a common practice, and we are of the view that where some children were coached or provided with additional support in the form of extra teaching, it may well have been limited to some individuals who were the favourites of the sisters concerned. However, we do not consider that the evidence in relation to this is sufficient to amount to a form of neglect that amounted to abuse.

82 A number of witnesses complained that in various ways they were deprived of toys, presents that took the form of gifts of money, or were not provided with birthday cards or any form of celebration of a birthday. It is convenient to deal with these together. HIA 67 complained that when he was given sixpence by priests for serving at Mass he was required to hand this over to the Sisters. This is an isolated case, but there is a considerable body of evidence that the Sisters provided boys with pocket money from the 1950s onwards, although understandably recollections differ as to the amounts involved. For example, HIA 130 recalled being given a gift of £20 at Christmas, which hardly seems likely in the straitened circumstances in which the Sisters had to exist. Others frequently mentioned receiving two shillings and sixpence, a substantial and reasonable amount of money in the 1950s and early 1960s. Others recall smaller amounts. One allegation that was made was that toys were gathered up and stored, and either not given to children, or only distributed on the basis that all children got something. There was considerable evidence to confirm that until the civil disturbances started in Derry in 1968 children were allowed to go unsupervised down into the city for some hours on Saturdays with their pocket money. This was a reasonable and sensible practice, and one which suggests that the Sisters did all that they could to ensure that children were provided with some form of pocket money and the opportunity to spend it as they wished. So far as the provision of pocket money is concerned, we are not persuaded that the children were neglected in any fashion in this respect.

83 There were complaints that birthdays were not marked in any way in earlier years, and in later years were only marked by the provision of a fried meal. Some witnesses said that their birthdays were marked by the provision of a fry and an angel cake as a special treat, others said that they did not celebrate their birthdays in any way, nor did they receive presents. On balance we are satisfied that the Sisters did make attempts to mark children's birthdays.

84 A matter to which a considerable amount of attention was directed during Module 1 related to the allegation that older boys were allowed to supervise younger boys, and as a result there was widespread bullying and sexual abuse of younger boys by older boys. A number of the sisters who gave evidence denied that older boys were allowed to supervise younger boys in this way, but we have no hesitation in rejecting their evidence in this respect. Many of the witnesses, including a number of those who otherwise gave favourable evidence as to the way they were treated by the Sisters, admitted that older boys did supervise younger boys. We are satisfied that this was a widespread practice resorted to by the Sisters because their numbers were insufficient to enable them to supervise and control the number of children they had in their care. We are also satisfied that this was a highly undesirable practice and should have been recognised as such at the time by the Congregation, although we would not go as far as Dr Hilary Harrison who opined that it was never appropriate in terms of good childcare for older boys to supervise younger boys and that such a practice would be a recipe for disaster.[30]

85 However, we are satisfied that there was a deliberate practice for many years on the part of the Sisters to rely upon the supervision by older boys of younger boys when the sisters were otherwise engaged, perhaps because they were at their personal devotions or because they simply had other duties to attend to and could not be everywhere at once. We repeat that this was a highly undesirable practice, and we are satisfied that it was a major contributory factor to the frequent and widespread bullying and sexual abuse that we are satisfied occurred and to which we have referred earlier.

86 A significant number of allegations of sexual abuse were made against individuals who had been themselves resident in Termonbacca as children, and who returned as adults to visit individual sisters or their friends in Termonbacca. In a number of instances these ex-residents were individuals who were employed by the Sisters on the farm. Those who were employed on the farm, or around Termonbacca itself, clearly were entitled to be on the premises, but the allegation is that in many instances individuals who returned took advantage of their presence to sexually abuse younger children. It is clear there was a willingness on the part of individual sisters to allow ex-residents to return to Termonbacca, apart from a short time at the beginning of the 1970s when the then mother superior stopped ex-residents coming to the home because she felt that they should be made to stand on their own feet. That ex-residents returned was entirely understandable because it was the only home these individuals knew, and in many cases the ex-residents regarded individual sisters as their parents. However, we are satisfied that a number of ex-residents took advantage of the freedom with which they were allowed to move around the building to sexually abuse younger children. At best there was a naivety on the part of the Sisters in allowing what we consider (despite denials to the contrary), to have been largely unrestricted and unsupervised access by adult males to younger children. This is so obviously an undesirable and dangerous practice that it should never have been permitted. We consider that in this respect there was a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters to prevent sexual abuse of the children in their care.

87 One of the tragic consequences of the sexual and physical abuse suffered by some of the boys as young children was that when they achieved positions of responsibility as older boys, or returned to the home in whatever capacity in later years, they also engaged in sexual and physical abuse of younger boys, thereby illustrating that those who are abused may become abusers themselves. We believe that this pattern may well account for at least some of the sexual and physical abuse perpetrated by these individuals at Termonbacca.

88 This conveniently leads to consideration of what may be called the aftercare of ex-residents. Until SR 2 started to take an interest in the aftercare of ex-residents in the 1970s, there appears to have been a very maternalistic approach by the sisters to helping the boys in their care find employment when they left the home. A complaint made by several witnesses was that they did not know until the day that they left the home that they were leaving or where they were going, and that all they were given was a suitcase of clothes and a ticket to their destination. There is a lot of evidence that suggests that the great majority of the boys at Termonbacca were found menial jobs, although for many the Irish Army seems to have been a favourite destination.

89 In the 1970s SR 2 started to make considerable efforts to provide a form of aftercare for the children at Termonbacca. A social worker was employed by the Sisters and his evidence to the Inquiry was that he spent a considerable proportion of his time helping ex-residents. Whilst this was commendable, nevertheless we feel that other provision should have been made for ex-residents by the Sisters, and that the social worker in question should have been required to devote his entire time to looking after the children and improving childcare standards in the home, rather than being told to divert much of his time away from the children.

90 It is clear that the Sisters went to great lengths to arrange for summer placements of children with families. This was a praiseworthy practice in principle, and one that seems to have worked well for several witnesses who spoke in glowing terms of the kindness shown to them by the families to whom they went, sometimes for several years in succession. In many cases they have remained in close contact with members of those families in later life. Nevertheless, we accept the evidence that some were regrettably exposed to sexual and/or physical abuse by the families with whom they were placed. We are concerned that in a number of instances complaints were made by children about the way they had been treated, and their evidence suggests that the Sisters do not appear to have reacted well to any complaints made to them. We are satisfied that there was a lack of willingness to investigate complaints, or at least there is a complete absence of any evidence that the Sisters to whom these complaints were made investigated any such complaints. We accept that a failure by the Sisters to investigate complaints of sexual or physical abuse made by children against foster parents when those children returned to the care of the Sisters was a form of neglect, and that there was a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters in this respect.

91 The practice appears to have been that the children were placed with a local family who were recommended as suitable by the local priest to the Sisters, but that no other formal vetting took place. Given the number of children involved, vetting of the more elaborate type that was resorted to by social services in later years may well have been impossible in the 1950s and 1960s. When the numbers in Termonbacca declined, as they did towards the end of the 1960s, there was less justification for this not being done, and we consider that the failure by the Sisters to properly vet the families concerned in later years was a form of neglect that amounted to a systemic failing.

92 At this point it is appropriate to refer to the statutory obligation upon the Sisters under Section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968. Section 1 placed a statutory obligation upon the Sisters to notify the county welfare authorities of placements with others for periods exceeding one month. It is clear from the evidence that we have received that many of the summer placements were for periods in excess of one month, and therefore the Sisters were obliged to report this to the county welfare authorities. We are satisfied that there was an almost complete disregard by the Sisters of this requirement, and, as we shall explain later, a complete failure on the part of the Ministry inspectors to uncover that this was happening, save in one instance in 1958 where it was discovered by accident as the result of the police apprehending a detainee or internee at a farm in Co Londonderry where two boys from Termonbacca had been placed.[31]

93 A small number of witnesses complained that they were turned away on some occasions after they had left Derry, and when they returned sought admission to Termonbacca because they had nowhere to go. As the ex-residents in question may have been over eighteen when these events occurred they would fall outside our Terms of Reference; we simply record that these allegations were made and make no finding in respect of them.

94 Finally, a number of those who gave evidence complained of an excessive emphasis on religious observance throughout their lives in Termonbacca. Many say that their faith in the institutional church was irretrievably damaged or destroyed by their experiences as children in this home. To many at the present day it may seem neither attractive nor desirable to require young children to attend regular or frequent early morning services, but this was a widespread part of Roman Catholic practice at home and at school, and we do not consider that it can be said to amount to a form of abuse.

Staffing

95 We have already referred to the small number of sisters who were responsible for directly looking after the children in Termonbacca (as opposed to those working in the kitchen and the laundry). Many of the witnesses who had been children in the home referred to the pressures on individual sisters of having to look after so many children, with one sister being responsible for as many as 40 children or thereabouts at some times. HIA 22, who was in Termonbacca from 1960 until 1975, observed that he did not know how so few sisters could look after 60 boys, and in the 1950s and 1960s the number of children who were looked after by each sister was even greater. That the Sisters were understaffed was conceded by a number of the sisters themselves. In her witness statement SR 2 accepted that "we were under staffed and could not physically watch all of the boys twenty-four hours a day."[32] SR 3 also accepted that the sisters were understaffed when dealing with older boys during her first period in Termonbacca between 1958 and 1960 or 1961.[33]

96 In order to identify the responsibility for this state of affairs, it is necessary to look first of all at the role of the Congregation in these matters. All sisters were allocated from the mother house at Hammersmith by the Mother General of the Order to a particular home. We accept that individual sisters were often asked what form of work they wished to do, but ultimately it appears to us that it was the responsibility of those governing the Congregation to ensure that there were sufficient sisters in Termonbacca who were able to properly look after children in their care, and if there were insufficient sisters available to the Congregation to perform this task, then steps could and should have been taken to try to obtain funding elsewhere in order to employ lay staff to perform tasks which the individual sisters could not perform. It is important to remember that one or two sisters had to look after the needs of a very large number of children, particularly in the 1950s, and that this involved looking after all of the requirements of the children when they were not at school, getting them up in the morning, seeing they were properly clothed and fed and ready for school, and then looking after them when they returned from school, and supervising them in the evenings and at weekends. It is hardly surprising in those circumstances that individual sisters could be overwhelmed by the amount of work which they had to do, and as a result were unable to look after the children without the assistance of older children. Most importantly of all, the sisters were plainly unable to show adequate love and affection to the individual children in their care because of the number of children with whom they had to deal.

33 See Day 29 pp. 9 and 22.

97 The 1952 Home Office memorandum to which we referred dealt with the question of staffing at paragraph 7. Whilst it is hard to be precise, because of the difficulty in identifying the number of hours which individual sisters had to work, the complement of sisters available to look after all of the needs of the children was plainly inadequate for many years. If one assumes that Termonbacca had as many as 100 boys at its peak, applying the staff ratios suggested in the 1952 Home Office memorandum would have required in the region of three full-time staff for every twenty children, a total of fifteen childcare staff to look after the children, as well as ancillary staff to cover cooking and domestic work. Given that other sisters had other duties to perform, such as being bursar or being in charge of the laundry, there is no doubt that for decades the staffing establishment at Termonbacca was wholly inadequate. As a result, individual sisters had to work very long hours and resorted to assistance from older boys to supervise the young children. Many of the deficiencies which we have identified can be directly traced to the inadequate number of staff, and the inadequate number of staff played a considerable part in bringing about and perpetuating deficiencies, notably the failure to show sufficient love and affection to individual children.

98 A further relevant factor is that few, if any, of the sisters working directly with children in Termonbacca had any form of formal childcare training before they started to look after children. It was common for young and untrained women of nineteen or twenty who had come from a sheltered religious background to be given a great deal of work and responsibility because of the number of children they had to look after. Although there was some evidence to suggest that some sisters were sent on Home Office courses in England in the 1950s, and did so with financial assistance from the Ministry of Home Affairs, this fell short of providing adequate professional training. Whilst the Congregation realised that those sisters who had teaching responsibilities needed professional teacher training, substantial childcare training does not appear to have been regarded as necessary until the 1970s, although it improved thereafter. By the time Termonbacca closed, the levels of qualification were comparable to those in other residential childcare services. An excessive reliance on learning on the job means that poor childcare practices may well be perpetuated. We do not regard this as a systemic failing as this approach was no different to that adopted generally to the training and achievement of residential childcare workers.

99 A further factor in the staffing of Termonbacca which we found to be unsatisfactory was that there was a very high turnover amongst many of the sisters, and it was very much the exception for a sister such as SR 2 to remain in the home for several years. An analysis of the information provided to the Inquiry by the Congregation of the number of sisters who were in Termonbacca reveals that during the 1950s four sisters who worked with boys only stayed for one year, whereas in later years they tended to stay for three-year periods. Only two of the sisters who worked with boys stayed for more than four years, and their average length of stay was 2.2 years. The significance of this is that staffing stability is extremely important to children in care, and so the policy (for so it appears to be) of the Congregation of moving individual sisters so frequently when those sisters were directly in contact with children was wrong. This is because such short periods of time meant that the children were exposed to frequent changes of "parents", and this was poor childcare practice. The work of John Bowlby on bonding and attachment was well recognised from the early 1950s onwards, and the policy of frequently moving staff amounted to a systemic failing because the Congregation had the ability to keep sisters in post for much longer periods. This practice materially contributed to the unsatisfactory form of childcare which many of the children in Termonbacca experienced because it resulted in the children, who commonly stayed for twelve to fifteen years, being exposed to a succession of carers.

100 By the late 1960s, the Congregation appreciated the need for a radical change and improvement to the physical facilities at Termonbacca. This took the form of converting the children's wing into three units, each of fifteen children with one sister in charge of each unit. Each unit contained a number of two or three bedded rooms. By then the numbers had fallen to 40 or thereabouts from an average of between 86 to 90 in 1953 to 1958. This reflected a general move away from large institutions and the increased use of foster care, and as a result the reduced number of children coming into residential care were generally being accommodated in converted or purpose-built accommodation that was much more like a family home. To judge by the report of the Ministry of Home Affairs inspectors on their inspection of Nazareth House in 1960, the Congregation recognised the need to move in this direction by then, because the inspectors recorded that the previous year the mother general recommended dividing the older girls into three groups, and that some work to provide accommodation for this was under way.[34] However, this change in approach does not seem to have moved forward as rapidly as might have been hoped so far as both Termonbacca and Nazareth House were concerned, no doubt in part at least due to the cost involved in converting old buildings to provide the necessary accommodation for the smaller units. As we shall describe, funding such changes was a major problem for Termonbacca later in the decade.

101 There are a number of issues in relation to the funding of Termonbacca which are intimately intertwined with similar issues that arose in relation to Nazareth House and we consider it more convenient to deal with these together. We therefore propose to express our views in relation to the systemic failings which we find in relation to the conduct by the Sisters of Nazareth of Termonbacca before we deal with the equivalent allegations in relation to Nazareth House. We will then consider the question of funding both in the context of funding from other sources available to Termonbacca and to Nazareth House and funding from the relevant local or central government bodies together before expressing our views in relation to systemic failings on behalf of both central and local government authorities.

Findings as to systemic failings by the Sisters of Nazareth at St Joseph's Home, Termonbacca

102 At the conclusion of the public hearings in relation to Module 1, Senior Counsel to the Inquiry posed a number of questions which it was suggested the Inquiry might wish to make in relation to both Termonbacca and Nazareth House, and at this point we propose to answer ten of those questions in relation to Termonbacca only. The remaining questions are more appropriately dealt with in the context of the findings which we express later in this report in relation to funding.

103 In the light of the conclusions which we have expressed in the earlier part of this chapter the Inquiry makes the following findings in respect of the Sisters of Nazareth and the children in their care at Termonbacca.

(1) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care.

(2) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by other adults, employees, visitors and priests towards children in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth.

(3) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper sexual or physical behaviour by older children towards children in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth.

(4) We are satisfied that there was emotional abuse in the form of improper behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

(5) We are satisfied that there was emotional abuse in the form of improper behaviour by other adults, namely employees, visitors and priests towards children in their care, behaviour which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

(6) Although there is evidence of poor childcare in some respects, we consider this did not amount to systemic neglect.

(7) We are satisfied that individual sisters and those in positions of authority within the Congregation at Termonbacca were aware of the matters dealt with at 1,2,3,4, and 5 above.

(8) We are satisfied that no, or alternatively inadequate, steps were taken by the Sisters of Nazareth to prevent such abuse.

(9) We are satisfied that individual sisters, and those sisters in positions of authority within the Congregation, did not take proper steps to report such abuse to the relevant civil authorities, namely social services and the police.

Part Two:

Nazareth House, Bishop Street

104 Although it seems that 2,347 children were accommodated in Bishop Street during its existence of approximately a century, only eleven witnesses came forward to the Inquiry to complain about the way they were treated. One of these did not give evidence in person due to her ill health in Australia, and another made a statement to the Inquiry but did not attend to give evidence when requested. As she did not provide a satisfactory explanation as to why she did not attend, the Inquiry decided to disregard her evidence. This leaves nine witnesses who came forward and gave critical evidence in person in relation to their time at Nazareth House. In addition we heard from two other ex-residents who gave evidence after being put forward as witnesses by the Sisters of Nazareth, and one of those criticized the pre-1950 period. We heard also from four sisters, three social workers and three others. The allegations made to us, and the conclusions which we have reached, have therefore to be viewed against a much lower number of allegations in relation to Nazareth House when compared to those in respect of Termonbacca.

Improper sexual behaviour by an adult or another child towards a child

105 We received a single allegation of sexual abuse committed by a sister in Nazareth House. HIA 105 alleged that when she was four to five years of age, and still in the nursery, a sister whose name she could not remember brought her into the sister's own room within the nursery, told her to lie on the floor, pulled up her habit, straddled her and made HIA 105 lick her vagina. Many years later she says that she contacted SR 18 and told her about this incident because she had remained in contact with SR 18 over the years and considered that she was on good terms with her. When SR 18 gave evidence to the Inquiry she accepted that HIA 105 had contacted her, and that the witness did tell her about sexual abuse to which she had been subjected by a sister. HIA 105 further alleged that SR 18 rang her back shortly after the initial telephone conversation and identified a particular sister as the possible perpetrator of the alleged offence. However SR 18 was subsequently interviewed by the police in January 2012 and made a statement to them about a number of matters, including this conversation. In the account SR 18 gave to the police[35] it is clear that she is denying that there was such a conversation, and that account does not sit easily with her acceptance in her evidence to the Inquiry that there was such a conversation. SR 18 denied that she identified the possible perpetrator in the manner alleged by HIA 105. We found HIA 105 to be articulate and objective in her account of other matters, and we accept that she was generally an impressive witness.

106 Having considered all of the evidence by both witnesses in relation to this matter we prefer the evidence of HIA 105 on this allegation. Accordingly, we are satisfied that a sister who cannot be accurately identified did commit this isolated act of sexual abuse towards this witness. This leads us to consider whether or not this amounted to a systemic failing. We do not consider that it can be so regarded, because whilst it was a grave breach of trust on the part of the sister concerned to behave in this fashion, there is no evidence that would justify us in concluding that the Congregation could have prevented this. However, the fact remains that SR 18 accepts that such an allegation was made, the matter has been placed in the hands of the police and is a matter for them. So far as the Congregation is concerned, neither SR 18 nor the Congregation reported this to the police at the time it first came to their attention in and around 2003 or 2004 as HIA 105 alleges. We regard this failure to report as a systemic failing.

107 HIA 49 alleged that she was persistently abused by two separate priests. One has been given the designation SND 61. She alleges that on a constant basis between the ages of eight to twelve she was sexually abused in a number of different ways by this priest when she was taken to confession conducted by him. She says that he took her into the confession box and put his hand down the front of her pants when she was eight years old. On later occasions she alleges that he took her into the sacristy behind the altar, locked the door and then performed a number of sexual acts. She alleges that he masturbated in front of her, made her perform oral sex on him, frequently penetrated her vagina digitally and had anal sex with her. In addition she alleges that he was very rough with her and pulled her hair. When he had finished abusing her she says that she would return to her group and sometimes he gave her a mint. She alleges that one of the sisters must have known what was going on, because she always placed the witness at the end of the queue and put her hand into the priest's hand. We accept that such events occurred.

108 HIA 49 makes a separate set of allegations against another priest whom she identified as SND 106. She alleges that this priest bounced her up and down on his lap in the playground of Nazareth House when he had an erection. We have carefully considered the nature of her identification of the priest in question, and have concluded that she was inaccurate in her identification of SND 106 as this priest. However, SND 407 (who is now deceased) was a priest with the same name as SND 106 and, unlike SND 106, did serve as a chaplain at Nazareth House for a number of years. In addition, the physical description of the priest in question as "short and stocky" is compatible with the appearance of SND 407. We have concluded that as the two priests had the same name, HIA 49 is mistaken in her belief that she was assaulted by SND 106, but we accept she was assaulted by SND 407.

109 In the light of the accounts given of the abuse to which she was subjected by these two priests, we accept that HIA 49 did suffer sexual abuse. So far as SND 407 is concerned, we consider that this did not amount to systemic abuse on the part of the Sisters, because if his behaviour had been observed it would have appeared to be innocuous behaviour that would not have raised concern, because at that time no one would have believed that a priest would have behaved in that fashion. However so far as SND 61 is concerned, that the priest had the child in question in the sacristy with the door locked for a significant period of time should not have gone unnoticed. This, together with the fact that confessions would have been heard in the confessional and not in the sacristy, leads us to conclude that there was a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters to appreciate that some form of improper conduct may have been perpetrated when the priest was repeatedly spending a lengthy period of time locked in the sacristy with a young child when the child was supposed to be making a confession. Such a situation could not account for such a prolonged absence of the child from view.

110 HIA 233 alleged that a priest in Nazareth House who came to say Mass at the chapel every Sunday, and who is now dead, put his hand on her leg and rubbed her thigh. This happened on more than one occasion. Whilst a less serious form of sexual abuse, if such conduct occurred it was plainly a form of abuse which was perpetrated in circumstances where it could have been observed and should have been prevented. However, the amount of detail given by the witness does not enable us to conclude whether or not her account is reliable in this respect.

111 Two witnesses described how they were sexually interfered with during periods of time when they had been placed with families in the country during the summer months. HIA 367 said that this happened on two separate farms. On one occasion a workman on the first farm touched her private parts and was observed by the farmer. She alleges that on other occasions the farmer called her into a private part of the farm where they would not be seen and also touched her private parts. On one occasion when she was sharing a bed with another girl the farmer came into bed between them but his wife discovered him and told him to get out. The witness said that she was taken back to Nazareth House, where she tried to tell SR 9, who was the sister in charge of her group, what had happened. She alleges that SR 9 would not listen to her and said that she did not want to know.

112 The witness also alleged that on another occasion she was sent to a different family when she was aged about twelve and spent two months there over two summers. She alleges that the father of the house sexually propositioned her and offered her money, but he was disturbed when someone returned to the house. She said that in the early hours of the following morning she ran away and went to the farm of the first family to which reference has been made. She was picked up by the wife who asked her what she was doing and in due course HIA 367 wrote to SR 9 and asked her could she return to Nazareth House. She was put on the bus and returned. It does not appear that she disclosed this episode to SR 9.

113 Broadly similar allegations were made by HIA 169, who described how she was sent to different families on a number of occasions. She alleges that on two of these visits she was sexually interfered with. The first occasion was when she was either five or seven years old. She says that she was propositioned by the son of the family who offered her money and she remembers lying on the haystack on her back with him on top of her and experiencing a severe pain in her vagina with something inside her, which she assumed was his penis, and she believes that he raped her. She went out of the field and was found by the mother of the house and the next day she was sent back to Nazareth House. She did not disclose what had happened.

114 The other occasion that she describes occurred when she was eleven or twelve and she describes how the son of that family had intercourse with her, both vaginal and anal. A sister from Nazareth House came to collect her the next day, and on her return SR 9 beat her, calling her horrible, filthy names and telling her that what had happened was her fault.

115 We accept the accounts by HIA 367 and HIA 169. The Sisters may not have been able to properly vet the families concerned at the time, given the very large number of children involved, nevertheless the children were still in the care of the Sisters, despite being on a placement, and the Sisters should have realised that children in care were more liable to sexual exploitation, and taken the allegations more seriously. There was a clear failure to take proper action when the allegations were disclosed to the Sisters by these witnesses. There is nothing to suggest that these serious matters were reported by the Sisters to either social services or to the police, a course which should have been taken and which we are satisfied was not taken. We are satisfied that there was a failure on each occasion to pay proper attention to the children's complaints and then to pass them to the social services and/or police. The failure of the Sisters to do that was a clear systemic failing in their duty to properly consider, and then report the allegations to the proper authorities.

116 An isolated episode of sexual abuse alleged by HIA 233 was that when she was a child of seven in 1966 and in Nazareth House, she was sexually interfered with by her half brother, SND 283. She says that he digitally penetrated her every other night for weeks when he came to her room from a separate room where he lived. She alleged that this was observed on the first occasion by another girl with whom she shared the room. She also alleged that she later told her mother what SND 283 had been doing to her in front of one of the sisters whereupon her mother slapped her face. She also alleged that she had reported this to a social worker.

117 It is clear from the witness's evidence that if these matters were reported to her social worker as she says then the matter was placed in the hands of the proper authorities. However, there is no evidence to support her assertion that it was reported to her social worker,[36] and in these circumstances we do not reach any conclusion as to whether or not this episode occurred.

118 HIA 242 (who was unable to give oral evidence due to ill health) made a statement in which she alleged that during her time at Nazareth House, when the children were playing in the playground at the back of the home, some of the elderly men who lived in the old people's section of the complex "would walk past us and expose themselves to us. We never reported this to the nuns." Whilst we accept that repeated acts of indecent exposure of the type alleged could amount to a form of sexual abuse, and could amount to a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters if they were aware of it and did not take steps to prevent it, the statement suggests that they may not have been aware of it because it was never reported. In any event, this is an isolated complaint, and even if these events occurred, in the absence of any report we are not satisfied that it could amount to a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters.

119 There was only one allegation of sexual abuse of an applicant, when HIA 49 alleged that on one occasion she was made to touch another girl's vagina. We do not have to determine whether some such incident occurred, because if it did it was plainly an isolated incident which could not have been prevented and therefore would not amount to a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters.

Physical violence

120 Seven witnesses altogether, six of whom applied to the Inquiry and one of whom (SND 463) came forward to give evidence in support of the Sisters, alleged that significant violence was inflicted by a number of named sisters on many occasions, although SND 463 alleged that this type of conduct was only prevalent until 1950 or thereabouts. We accept that, as in Termonbacca, a number of sisters repeatedly and frequently resorted to significant violence against a number of the children in their care. A number of these allegations were directed at SR 9. HIA 169 alleges that on two occasions SR 9 struck her with such severity as to break her nose. On another occasion it is alleged that SR 9 struck her a severe blow with a brick. A fourth allegation is that on a separate occasion SR 9 struck HIA 169 on the side of the head causing the child's head to bang against a protruding ledge on a wall. So far as the first three incidents are concerned, we have taken into account the evidence of a number of witnesses such as SND 463 who spoke extremely highly of SR 9, and who believed that she would not have been capable of such behaviour. So far as the fourth occasion is concerned (the ledge incident) the account by HIA 169 was to a limited degree corroborated by the evidence of SR 18, another sister who was present at the time and who gave oral evidence to the Inquiry. In her witness statement SR 18 described how she had reason to be displeased with the behaviour of HIA 169 and so she took her to SR 9. She went on to describe how SR 9 "lifted her hand to give HIA 169 a clip on the ear but HIA 169 quickly moved her head to the side to avoid SR 9's hand, but banged the side of her head against a cabinet nearby. I did not see what happened next, because SR 9 asked me to go upstairs. I believe HIA 169 has a scar on the side of her head as a result of this incident. I was shocked as I never previously witnessed anything like this incident."[37]

121 In her oral evidence SR 18 confirmed that she witnessed this incident,[38] and we regard the evidence of SR 18 as providing substantial corroboration of the allegation by HIA 169 against SR 9 in respect of these incidents, and we accept that she was struck a severe blow with a brick with such violence by SR 9 that she banged her head against the side of the wall. We regard this as unjustified and excessive physical chastisement.

122 Looking at all of the evidence of HIA 169 and of the remaining witnesses who have alleged that violence was inflicted upon them by individual named or unnamed sisters, we are satisfied that a number of sisters frequently resorted to severe chastisement of an excessive and wholly unjustified nature in relation to a significant number of girls.

123 Three witnesses, HIA 105, HIA 394 and HIA 49, allege that they were beaten by senior girls. For example, HIA 105 said that a particular girl who was the only one she could remember "was left do a lot of things on her own in her own way and was allowed to."[39] HIA 394 made similar allegations, saying that the older girls were in charge and were quite brutal: "they seemed to be allowed to do anything, and I did once report their behaviour to a nun, because I was being so badly - I was being very badly beaten because I was trying to get up into the nursery and I was being beaten down." She repeated that she did complain to a sister and "was told to go away and stop telling tales".[40] HIA 49 alleged that when she was in the bath her back was scrubbed with a brush, which appears to have been a floor brush of some sort, by senior girls.

38 Day 29, p. 155.
39 Day 8 p. 14.

124 Although there are only a small number of such complaints, given that there were a small number of sisters available to look after a large number of children, a problem to which we have already referred and which was compounded by the teaching duties of the same sisters, we accept that at times and to a significant degree there was a practice of giving too much unbridled authority to some senior girls, who then abused the power that they were given and assaulted younger girls. We consider that it was an unacceptable practice and one which allowed abuse to be perpetrated and constituted a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters for the reasons we have already set out in respect of the same practice at Termonbacca.

125 One witness (HIA 127) alleged that on one occasion he became involved in an altercation with one of the houseparents in Nazareth House, SND 43. She was married and during the course of the altercation HIA 127 alleges that he struck SND 43, and he further alleges that SND 44, who was SND 43's husband, later came in to the home and assaulted him because he, HIA 127, had assaulted SND 43. SND 43 gave evidence and denied that her husband had come in and acted in this way, but we did not find her evidence persuasive on this matter and we are satisfied that there was such an incident. In his response to the Inquiry Warning Letter SND 44 denied that such an incident took place. HIA 127 was not the only witness to allege that this individual had ready access to the home because similar evidence was given by HIA 233. We accept that he did have ready access to the home, and we regard this as indicative of a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters to exercise proper control over who was allowed into Nazareth House, and where they were allowed go. The fact that the individual concerned was the spouse of a staff member should not have permitted ready access by him to any part of the home.

Unacceptable practices

126 A number of witnesses described the manner in which children who wet their beds were treated. Although only four witnesses referred to this matter, the allegations cover several decades. The earliest in chronological terms was the account given by SND 463 in relation to the pre-1950 period. She described how bed wetters were woken and then made to have a cold bath. HIA 242 (who did not give oral evidence) described a similar practice during her time at Nazareth House between 1948 and 1964. She also described how bed wetters were woken, but went on to say that they were then made to put the wet sheets on their heads. The two remaining witnesses were HIA 105 and HIA 169, who were in Nazareth House between 1962 and 1975 and 1961 and 1976 respectively. HIA 105 described how she saw bed wetters being singled out by being made to stand for breakfast and only being given half a cup of tea at nighttime. Bed wetters were also made to wash their own sheets. HIA 169, who was herself someone who had a problem with bed wetting throughout her time in care, recalled how bed wetters were humiliated by being made to put their underwear on their heads and stand at the breakfast table so that everyone could see. HIA 105 also referred to girls who wet their pants having to wear their pants on their head and parade up and down the corridor where the dormitories were.

40 Day 8 p. 59.

127 We accept that the attitude towards girls who wet their beds, or their underwear, in Nazareth House was evidence of a backward and unpleasant attitude towards them, just as there was at Termonbacca. We have already referred to the wise guidance given by the Home Office memorandum in relation to bed wetting at paragraph 54 above. We are satisfied that some sisters dealt with children who were bed wetters in a manner which amounted to a serious form of emotional abuse.

128 Several witnesses referred to several sisters making humiliating, cruel and disparaging remarks in a way which made the witnesses feel unwanted or worthless. HIA 113, who transferred to Nazareth House when Termonbacca closed (and who had no other complaints about her time at Nazareth House) recalled how she was about to go to a nearby shop with other children when a sister pinned her by the arms and said "Are you going whoring?"[41] Some of these remarks were about their background, some about stains on their underclothing and others about the changes to their body with puberty. For example, HIA 105 was constantly told that she was lucky to be there and she said "they still made you feel very unwanted, worthless, no sense of belonging" and that they "made you feel very worthless".[42] HIA 233 alleged that one sister called her and her sisters, "bastards" whilst HIA 242 recalled how she was always being told that she was no good and how SR 9 constantly made fun of the changes in their bodies during puberty. HIA 179 asserted that the sisters used "humiliation, shame and guilt to keep us submissive".[43] Although these complaints are few in number, they chime with similar evidence from Termonbacca; we regard them as credible and consider that they amounted to a form of emotional abuse.

129 A related complaint was that the sisters were markedly unsympathetic to girls facing the problem of the onset of menstruation. This allegation was made by HIA 242, and a number of other witnesses described how they received little if any instruction in the use of sanitary towels, and how sanitary towels were only provided on a limited basis. Although we do not consider that this was sufficiently widespread to justify a finding that there was a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters to treat children who were menstruating in an abusive fashion, nevertheless it shows a marked lack of appreciation of the emotional needs of girls entering into a stage in their development which can be upsetting and embarrassing for the girls concerned if not treated sympathetically.

130 Two witnesses, HIA 105 and HIA 179, alleged that when they gagged upon, and then regurgitated, food which they found inedible they were made to eat their own vomit. In the case of HIA 179 this occurred on one day and she said that the person who made her eat was a civilian worker. HIA 233 and HIA 394 said they were forcibly fed by several sisters and by a civilian worker. However, we are not persuaded that a general practice existed of force feeding children.

131 Only HIA 242 made specific allegations about the quality of the food, saying that she found it poor and inadequate. Given that only one of the small number of witnesses who came forward made such a complaint we accept that the food, whilst no doubt institutional, particularly in early years, was adequate and nutritious.

132 HIA 105 and HIA 367 said that birthdays were not celebrated. They also gave contradictory accounts about Christmas. HIA 105, who was in Nazareth House between 1962 and 1976, said that she did receive a single present at Christmas, such as a selection box and nightgown, and that Christmas was lovely, whereas HIA 367, who was a contemporary in that she was there from 1958 to 1970, said that although they were given clothes and shoes at Christmas, they received no toys. We consider that there is insufficient evidence relating to the provision of toys, clothes and the marking of Christmas and birthdays to amount to evidence of a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters to provide for the children in these respects.

42 Day 8 p. 39.

133 So far as pocket money is concerned, HIA 367 said that they only received pocket money when children were going on trips to somewhere like Butlins, and HIA 105 said they received a small amount "once in a blue moon then it stopped." However HIA 169, who was a contemporary of both of these witnesses since she was at Nazareth House between 1960 and 1974, said that the girls did receive pocket money unless they were punished, in which case it was withheld. In relation to a matter such as this, the fact that one child says that they did receive pocket money is of greater significance than those who say they received it only on a limited basis, and we are therefore satisfied that pocket money was provided to the children and there was no failing on the part of the Sisters in this respect.

134 HIA 367, HIA 105 and HIA 169 all made complaints in relation to the provision of bathwater. For example, HIA 367 said that there were only two baths for over a hundred girls and that the water was never changed. The account given by HIA 105 was slightly different in that she said that ten to fifteen people had to use the same water, whereas HIA 169 said that all girls used the same bathwater. SND 463, to whom we have referred earlier as coming to give supportive evidence on behalf of the Sisters, accepted that the children were made to bath three at a time, but that there was plenty of hot water. She also referred to small amounts of Jeyes Fluid being added to the bathwater. The fact that more than one child used the bathwater is not surprising in a large institution, indeed many families would have adopted the same practice. Nonetheless the evidence suggests that the changes of bath water were not sufficiently frequent. While this did not represent abuse in the sense of neglect, it did represent poor childcare.

135 Several witnesses alleged that the children were made to perform heavy and repetitive household chores to an excessive extent, such as HIA 367 who referred to being made to spend a long time washing clothes on one occasion when the washing machine broke down. HIA 242 (who did not give oral evidence), and who was in Nazareth House between 1948 and 1964, also alleged that a great deal of time was spent by the children cleaning and scrubbing and waxing floors. HIA 105 also referred to the amount of time spent helping others clean corridors and classrooms. However, SND 60 (who was in Nazareth House from 1962 to 1976), described how the children were made to wax and polish floors, saying that it was not a hard job, they always had a laugh and enjoyed doing it because three girls would stand together in a line and "we used to sing a song '0,1,2,3, Mary at the cottage door. 5,6,7,8, eating cherries off a plate'." The evidence is therefore contradictory as to the practice of cleaning floors in the 1950s and 1960s. We are not persuaded that excessive or unreasonable demands were made of the children in that respect.

136 An additional allegation made by HIA 105 was that when she was five she was made to clean toilets every Saturday. HIA 49 and HIA 179 also alleged that they had to clean the toilets. We accept that these episodes occurred, and in view of the ages of the children, and the nature of the tasks, we consider that this amounted to a form of abuse.

Staffing

137 Whilst the questions of staffing and funding are closely intertwined, it is appropriate to look at the number of sisters who were available to look after the children in Nazareth House. It is clear that for many years the number of sisters was extremely limited. HIA 105 and HIA 394 were both in Nazareth House in the early 1960s: HIA 394 from 1961 to 1964; and HIA 105 from 1962 until 1976. HIA 394 commented "I wondered if it was just overwhelming for them. I just wondered if they knew how to cope themselves." As already explained, the practice until well into the 1970s was that some sisters were allocated to spend the day collecting in the community, whilst others were trained as teachers and were expected to teach full-time in the primary school run by the Sisters on the same site, and, as we have heard, for many years the boys from Termonbacca attended this school with the girls from Nazareth House. The teaching sisters were also expected to look after the children in the morning and the evening before and after school. SR 52 who was in Nazareth House between 1967 and 1975 (apart from one year when she was in Belfast undergoing a course on nursery education) described how one of the three teaching sisters would get the children up in the morning, see that they were dressed and made their beds. A second teaching sister then supervised and served breakfast, and after breakfast the third teaching nun prepared the children to leave for the various schools. After her day's work as a teacher, SR 2 returned to the home and it was her responsibility to take the boys from Termonbacca to the bus that they would get back to Termonbacca. She then went back to Nazareth House, and organised and supervised games and other activities until the children had their tea at five o'clock. Another sister then usually took over at teatime, followed by another sister who took over at about 6.30pm. After that the sisters went for prayer, and on their return put the children to bed.[44] Any other teaching sister who was free would help out, as would the collecting sisters. SR 147 was a collecting sister, and in a letter which she wrote on 23 July 2013[45] she described how when she arrived in Derry in 1968 or 1969 "I was expected to go and help make beds in the two dormitories, also to clean the bathrooms, and sweep and mop the dormitories before I went out."

138 This pattern continued for many years; SR 52 pointing out that between 1967 and 1975 when she was in Nazareth House there were no civilian staff employed to help.[46] The evidence from SR 18 was the same. She was in Nazareth House between 1972 and 1973 and returned to Derry from Belfast in 1977. When she returned in 1977 she found that there were still no civilian staff, and as a result she had to arrange for a lady to come in to help between 4pm and 9pm.[47] Overworked individuals may well have felt it necessary to resort to violence or abusive language in order to try and maintain discipline over a large number of children.

139 Quite apart from the pressures created by the inadequate numbers, the teaching sisters had no childcare training as such, although SR 18 claimed they did have a significant element of childcare development training as part of their teacher training course.[48] However, as SR 52 conceded, she was very ill-prepared for the dual role she was expected to undertake when she arrived in Nazareth House as a trained teacher in her early twenties. As we shall see when we consider the question of funding, it was not until the vigorous efforts of SR 2 in the late 1970s and early 1980s led to a substantial recruitment of lay staff, so that by the time Nazareth House closed it was fully staffed with trained staff. Given that in the earlier years few, and inadequately trained, sisters were responsible for looking after a large number of children, it is hardly surprising that the routine in the house was a regimented one, a state of affairs that remained until the smaller units were created in the mid-1970s. As we have already observed in connection with Termonbacca, it was the responsibility of the Congregation either to ensure that there were sufficient and adequately trained sisters available to properly look after the children, or to seek to obtain the necessary funding in order to recruit civilian employees to perform the tasks which the sisters could not cope with. Whatever may have been the responsibility of public authorities to provide funding, the Congregation itself must bear a substantial share of the responsibility for this state of affairs.

Findings as to systemic failings by the Sisters of Nazareth at Nazareth House, Bishop Street

140 At this point it is appropriate to consider a number of the questions that were posed to the Inquiry and which we have already answered in relation to Termonbacca. We propose to do so in relation to Nazareth House at this point before we turn to other matters, principally funding. In the light of our conclusions set out above we make the following findings in relation to the Sisters of Nazareth at Nazareth House.

(1) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper physical behaviour by individual sisters towards children in their care.

(2) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper sexual behaviour by a visitor and by priests towards children in the care of the Sisters.

(3) We are satisfied that there was abuse in the form of improper physical behaviour by older children towards children in the care of the Sisters.

(4) We are satisfied that there was emotional abuse in the form of improper behaviour by individual sisters towards children which undermined the self-esteem and emotional well-being of the children.

(5) We are satisfied that the Sisters of Nazareth were aware of the matters alleged at 1, 2, 3 and 4 above, and took no steps to prevent such abuse.

(6) We are satisfied that the Sisters of Nazareth did not take proper steps to report such abuse to the relevant civil authorities, namely social services and the police.

We will deal with the remaining questions relating to premises, staffing and funding after we have considered the evidence in relation to these matters.

Sexual abuse and the responsibility of the Western Health & Social Services Board

141 At this point we turn to consider a specific allegation made against a residential social worker employed by the Western Health & Social Services Board (WHSSB) in Nazareth House, and whether there were any failings on the part of the WHSSB in relation to these events. HIA 127 spent a number of short periods in Termonbacca as a very young child before being placed in foster care with his five siblings, three of whom were applicants to the Inquiry, and the fourth of whom gave evidence. All six siblings remained with their foster parents until allegations of sexual misconduct made against the foster parents led to four of the children being placed in Harberton House. HIA 127 remained there for some months until he was placed in Nazareth House with two of his siblings in April 1986. By then HIA 127 was aged ten, and he remained in Nazareth House for just over four years until he was discharged in 1990 aged fourteen. During the time he was in Nazareth House he was in the unit in the charge of SR 21.

142 The allegations made by HIA 127 fall into two distinct categories. He makes a number of allegations about the way he was treated by the staff, both lay and religious, during his time in Nazareth House. He says that he was shouted at and punished every day for various misdemeanours. He suffered from psoriasis, and the contemporary records show that he was prescribed Polytar to be applied to the skin to treat this condition. He alleges that despite instructions to the home by his doctor that it was inappropriate that he should be bathed every night because this would remove the positive effect of the natural oils from his body, he was either bathed or showered every day, sometimes being forced into the shower by the staff. Another allegation he makes is that when he was aged about ten he had to undergo an operation on one of his testicles, and when a nurse came to the home to check the condition of the wound after the operation the nurse inspected him lying on a sofa in front of everyone, something which made him feel humiliated and degraded. It is appropriate to record at this point that, without going into unnecessary detail, HIA 127 has had an extremely disturbed and dysfunctional life, and it was said very strongly on behalf of SND 38 in the closing submissions, notably those set out at SND 18558, that this affects his reliability.

143 These allegations are made against SND 38, who was employed as a residential worker at Nazareth House and was appointed as the key worker for HIA 127. The allegations are that over a substantial period of time SND 38 groomed HIA 127 in various ways. HIA 127 acknowledges that SND 38 treated him kindly and sensitively at the beginning of their relationship, but also refers to him being given frequent treats by SND 38, such as being taken to ten pin bowling and being bought computer games. He goes on to allege that SND 38 subsequently subjected him to episodes of sexual abuse on a regular basis in a number of different locations. These episodes occurred in Nazareth House, both in HIA 127's bedroom and in a bathroom there; the home of SND 38's girlfriend; in a mobile home or caravan in Portstewart in the summer of 1990, and in SND 38's mother's home during a Christmas visit in 1990.

144 HIA 127 alleges that the sexual abuse took the form of SND 38 touching the penis of HIA 127, masturbating HIA 127 and himself, and subjecting HIA 127 to oral sex. After his period of time in Nazareth House HIA 127 was placed in foster care, and he alleges that during his period of foster care SND 38 regularly visited him at his foster parents' home where he took advantage of being allowed to be alone with HIA 127 to subject him to further episodes of masturbation and oral sex.

145 It is clear from both the evidence of HIA 127, and from the contemporary records kept by the WHSSB, that when HIA 127 left foster care he continued to have a very disturbed childhood, being eventually returned to Nazareth House for several months before he was placed in St. Patrick's Training School in Belfast. After he was discharged from St. Patrick's on attaining the age of sixteen he lived in a number of locations and in 1996 he made a complaint that he had been subjected to sexual abuse by SND 38. This resulted in a police investigation in 1996 during which he made a lengthy witness statement.

146 SND 38 also gave evidence to the Inquiry by way of a written statement and oral evidence. He denied all of the allegations, and pointed to a number of significant inconsistencies in the accounts which HIA 127 has given of these events. In particular, it was pointed out on his behalf that HIA 127 changed the date of the Portstewart episode from 1990 to 1989 as it had been pointed out that it could not have happened in 1990 as originally alleged, because by that time he had been placed with his foster parents. In his police statement made on 12 August 1996 HIA 127 alleged that SND 38 drove him around in a red Lada car, but SND 17174 shows that SND 38 did not obtain such a car until July 1990, which is asserted to be a further significant contradiction in the account given by HIA 127.

147 A significant aspect of the allegations, and the surrounding circumstances, relates to the circumstances in which SND 38 came to perform the role of both key worker and "befriender". It is clear that the suggestion that HIA 127 could benefit from someone acting as a "befriender" came from SND 38 himself (although it was signed off by the sister in charge of the unit, SR 21). The reason recorded at the time for this was that HIA 127 "enjoys and thrives on the individual attention that is not always available in a residential setting."[49]

148 We accept that there are numerous contemporary references in the WHSSB records showing that the relationship between SND 38 and HIA 127 was seen as positive at the time. However, the appointment of a residential worker who was already the key worker of the child concerned in the additional capacity of a "befriender" was a highly unusual one. It certainly provided an enhanced opportunity for SND 38 to be alone with HIA 127 on many occasions, and to develop a very close relationship with him, something that would facilitate acts of sexual abuse of the type alleged by HIA 127 if such episodes occurred.

149 We have carefully considered the evidence in relation to the allegations, and there are a number of matters which appear to us to be of considerable importance when considering the clash between the evidence of HIA 127 and SND 38. We accept the evidence of SND 500 that, contrary to the suggestion made by SR 21 in a police statement, it was not the policy of the WHSSB at the time to try to have children visit the homes of key workers.[50] That SND 38 took HIA 127 to his then girlfriend's home on a number of occasions is a matter of considerable significance. In addition, when one considers that the suggestion that a "befriender" be appointed came from SND 38,[51] that has added significance in the context of the setting in which it is alleged that these acts of sexual abuse occurred.

150 We also attach significance to the number and regularity of the visits which SND 38 paid to the home of the foster parents with whom HIA 127 was placed after he left Nazareth House. Whilst SND 500 referred to these as being not normal practice but something about which SND 38's superiors or other social workers would not have been unhappy if they did occur, the frequency of such visits provided a further opportunity for sexual abuse to occur it if it did occur.

151 We regard as particularly significant that the foster parents themselves told the Board that they were concerned about the nature and frequency of the visits which SND 38 continued to pay to HIA 127. It was minuted on 19 October 1990[52] that:

> "…they feel that it is too intensive, that they were not fully consulted about setting it up, and that it represents something of an intrusion into the routines of their home. It was established in the course of the review that this form of support was not planned when HIA 127 was discharged from residential care;".

The minutes go onto record that a social worker was to discuss this with SND 38 with a view to "reducing the extent of his involvement". There is no reference in social work records to this discussion having taken place with SND 38, and in his evidence to the Inquiry SND 38 stated that he had no memory of having any such discussion with HIA 127's social worker.

152 On balance we have come to the conclusion that HIA 127 was sexually abused by SND 38 on a number of occasions whilst HIA 127 was in the care of SND 38. There were a number of significant opportunities which we consider were deliberately created by SND 38 in highly unusual and inappropriate situations which should not have been allowed to occur, and which gave SND 38 the opportunity to behave in the way we are satisfied that he did.

153 This leads us to consider the responsibility if any, of the WHSSB for what occurred. We are satisfied that the situation in which SND 38 was able to put forward the suggestion, which was then adopted by the Board, of making SND 38 both the key worker and the "befriender" of HIA 127 should not have been permitted. While we recognise that the WHSSB only had two such situations in its time, one of which resulted in a very successful relationship which produced considerable benefits for the child and led to a relationship with the "befriender" which has lasted for many years, nevertheless such a highly unusual arrangement should have been very carefully and rigorously scrutinised and supervised. In its closing submissions the HSCB asked the Inquiry:

> "To accept the evidence of TL 4 and SND 500 that befriending by a key worker was an exceptional circumstance and that the Western Board did not approve a policy of keyworkers in Nazareth House taking children in residential care home."

154 This submission contradicts the contemporary material which shows that the WHSSB did approve SND 38 taking HIA 127 to his home. In those circumstances the Board has to accept responsibility for the consequences of such a practice being permitted. It is clear to us that SND 38 was allowed to have a very considerable amount of access to HIA 127 over a lengthy period of time, especially after HIA 127 was placed in foster care after he had been at Nazareth House. The Board was aware of this from the complaints of the foster parents at the time, as can be seen from the documents already referred to. We consider that SND 38 was at fault in creating and perpetuating an unprofessional relationship with HIA 127 by being both key worker and "befriender". As his employer the Sisters of Nazareth were primarily responsible for overseeing and managing the work of SND 38 and should have been alert to and questioning of the level of contact he was having with HIA 127 outside the home and often in his own time. They should also have considered more carefully whether it was appropriate for SND 38 to act as key worker and "befriender" to HIA 127. However, the Board had ultimate responsibility for making decisions about and overseeing the care of HIA 127 including the decisions to place him in Nazareth House and in foster care. The Board failed to adequately inform itself about what SND 38 was doing, and appears to have been prepared to take on trust his account of the nature and extent of his contact with HIA 127, when it ought to have exercised very much closer and rigorous supervision over what was clearly a highly unusual relationship which it had approved. In these circumstances we are satisfied that there was a systemic failing on the part of the Western Health & Social Services Board in approving, and then failing to properly monitor, the highly unusual relationship which SND 38 was permitted to have as both key worker and "befriender" of HIA 127, and in not intervening to manage his continued involvement with HIA 127 after his discharge from Nazareth House.

Part Three:

Inspections

155 The Inquiry had difficulty in obtaining as much detail as we would have wished in relation to both Termonbacca and Nazareth House because of deficiencies in the records relating to both homes held by the Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth, and by various government departments. Most of the records relating to Termonbacca were burnt by the Sisters when Termonbacca closed because they did not have sufficient space in which to store their records. Although some individual records relating to particular children did survive, this was largely a matter of chance. Similarly the files on both Termonbacca and Nazareth House compiled by the Ministry of Home Affairs cannot be found, and it is probable that they were destroyed as part of a routine destruction policy some years ago. When children came into the care of the WHSSB some records for each child were handed over to the Board by the Sisters, but, despite exhaustive searches, some of these files cannot be found.

156 The result of this scarcity of records is that the Inquiry has had to rely on a number of isolated documents which have survived, supplemented by references to Termonbacca and Nazareth House in Northern Ireland Cabinet papers obtained from PRONI. Some Ministry of Home Affairs inspector's reports have survived for other institutions, and these provide some assistance by indicating the type of material which the inspectors looked for. Although the inspection reports themselves have not survived, the records of the Sisters refer to a considerable number of occasions on which Ministry inspections were carried out. By drawing all of these various fragments together it has been possible to recreate a reasonably complete picture of the various forms of inspection process to which both houses were subjected, although it has to be accepted that this is a relatively broad-brush picture as much essential detail does not appear to have survived. Nevertheless, the material which we have been able to obtain has enabled us to draw a number of broad conclusions in relation to the period before the mid-1980s when reports of more detailed inspections instituted by the Social Welfare Advisory Group (SWAG) of the DHSS have survived.

157 The initial level of inspection or supervision of each home was performed by the mother superior. In her evidence Sister Brenda McCall suggested that each mother superior would carry out a daily visit to all areas within her home, in the course of which she would speak to the children.[53] Very few of the applicants who gave evidence to us had any recollection of such visits, though that would not have been surprising as we would not expect children to remember detail such as that to any significant degree. In any event, we believe that many mothers superior would be seen as remote and authoritarian figures, particularly in the early years, although of course much would depend upon the personality of the individual mother superior. That would appear to be the position to judge by the recollections of SR 147, who described her experiences in early years in a letter written in July 2013.[54] In the letter she said in relation to when she went to Nazareth House between 1968 or 1969 and 1971 "I lived in fear of the Superior who was quite hard, never bid us the time of day or ask us if we had a good day at the collecting when we came in." In 1974 she was sent to Portadown where she referred to the Superior as "quite strict". She went on to say that in 1977 she was changed back to Derry to do the city collecting. Her memories of the mother superior in Nazareth House at that time are revealing.

> "We had another hard Superior! We came home one evening to be told that the Superior had been changed; there were no tears shed! We got a lovely Superior full of compassion, with time to talk to us."

158 Given that a sister formed these views of different mothers superior, it is unlikely that those mothers superior would be able to establish a close rapport with children, or persuade the children to take them into their confidence. Such daily tours of each home provided an opportunity for a mother superior to come across any form of ill-treatment that might be occurring when she entered a room, and we believe that at least some mothers superior must have been aware that some of their sisters did resort to severe physical chastisement on occasion. Although it is an isolated incident, HIA 367 described one evening when the girls were all gathered in the church at Nazareth House for Benediction when they heard screaming coming from outside because one of the sisters was hitting a girl, and "the screaming was unbearable". She described how the reverend mother went out and asked what was going on, and was told that the girl was answering the sister back, whereupon the reverend mother said "not outside the church". HIA 367 was unable to remember the name of the reverend mother concerned,[55] but episodes such as this must have caused individual reverend mothers to have concerns about the way in which some of their sisters were maintaining discipline. We believe that the need to maintain discipline by a small number of sisters over a large number of children, whether boys or girls, was likely to have led at least some of the mother superiors in both homes to turn a blind eye to what they considered to be the less severe forms of chastisement and punishment which we have found to be administered in both homes.

159 The next level up of internal inspection by the Congregation consisted of periodic visitations of each home by the Superior General of the Congregation (also referred to as the Mother General), or one of her senior assistants. The "visitator" (as the individual was known) was obliged to visit each home every three years or so, and we accept that such visitations were carried out every three years or so from 1928 onwards.[56] In the 1960s a new level of inspection and administration was created with the appointment of regional superiors, each of whom was responsible for the homes in a particular region. The regional superior was obliged to visit each home in her region every three years.[57] The inspections by the superior general or the regional superior alternated, thereby ensuring that every three years or so an external inspection was carried out by a high ranking member of the Congregation. These appear to have been carried out on a regular basis.

160 In her written statement Sister Brenda McCall described the duties prescribed for the visitator.[58] These included moving around all areas of the house concerned, speaking with the residents (including the elderly where appropriate), the children, staff and any visitors whom they meet. The visitator was also required to check the documentation including registers, inspection reports by the relevant statutory authorities and other documentation considered to be relevant. The visitator was obliged to check whether any recommendations or requirements that had been made at any inspection have been followed up, and whether they are being, or have been, implemented. If there were any areas of concern the visitator would give directions that further steps be taken.

56 These are listed year by year in SND 13948.
57 SND 15849.
58 SND 15849.

In addition, each sister would be interviewed by the visitator and "is encouraged to speak openly and honestly to the visitator about any matter of concern to her in regard to her own position, development or in regard to the running of a house."[59] In her evidence Sister Brenda McCall accepted that the requirement that the visitator speak to the children was one of the requirements that applied throughout the period within the Inquiry's Terms of Reference.[60] The reports follow a standard format, with brief paragraphs under each heading, and the format meant that there was more content about the maintenance of the physical facilities of the house, such as the kitchen, laundry and chapel, and that records were kept up to date, than about the children. Where remarks are recorded about the children they are mainly limited to their appearance and behaviour, and are positive in tone.

161 There are few references to the challenges the Sisters faced in caring for the children although the report of the visitation to Termonbacca on 26 March 1973 records:

> "For many years past, the Sisters had to work under very trying conditions and it was difficult to make a success of their work with the children. It is a credit of all that this project was undertaken at this time and that the new building incorporates the most modern facilities conducive to good childcare."[61]

162 A report has survived for the visitation of Termonbacca held between 26 April and 3 May 1966.[62] This describes how attention was paid to the observance of the Rule and Religious spirit, but also describes in some detail checks that were made on the administration of the home, the kitchens and the laundry, and that the records had been kept up to date. It referred to the farm and to the boys themselves. It recorded that there were 65 boys aged between five and fifteen, and:

> "all are healthy looking, well fed, well dressed and shod and have the voluntary service of many barbers."

The report also refers to attendance at school and recreational activities such as football matches.

163 In November 1971 advice was provided in the visitation to Nazareth House about the design of the accommodation for the children, saying that "It was suggested that the children should be divided into two groups and that two self-contained flats be provided for them on the top floor."[63] Comments such as these, and the visitation reports themselves, show that close scrutiny of individual houses was exercised at the highest levels of the Congregation, and that the mother general, or a high-ranking member of the Congregation, would suggest the direction in which the particular home should move.

164 Whilst the system of internal inspection was carried out regularly, it did not address every aspect of the management and running of each home in the way that it should have done. These internal investigations by the visitator failed to identify, or ignored, non-compliance with a significant statutory requirement under the provisions of the Voluntary Homes Regulations. The Voluntary Homes Regulations (NI) 1975 replaced the original 1952 regulations, but Regulation 4 (2) of both required two forms of regular monthly inspections to be carried out. The "Administering Authority" (in this case the Congregation) was required "to make arrangements for the home to be visited at least once in every month." This was usually done by the appointment of voluntary visitors who were required to visit once a month. This requirement was ignored by both homes for many years, and even after it was accepted in the 1980s that these steps should be taken, their implementation was not as regular as required by the Regulations. Reports by the SWAG in 1987,[64] 1988[65] and 1990[66] drew attention to the fact that these monthly meetings were not being regularly carried out. For example, it appears that notwithstanding attention being drawn to this in previous years, monthly inspections were not performed in August or September 1989.

165 Had these inspections been carried out by visiting individuals appointed for that purpose as required, then there would have been an additional means for children who had complaints or concerns about the way they were being ill-treated to disclose them in confidence. The failure of the Congregation to ensure that the statutory requirement was met for so many years is something which we consider constitutes a systemic failing on the part of the Congregation.

166 As already indicated, a number of children were placed in both Termonbacca and Nazareth House by the welfare authorities of Donegal County Council. See paragraphs 13 to 15 above. Virtually no information has been uncovered which throws any light upon the detailed arrangements made between the Sisters of Nazareth and Donegal County Council in relation to placing children in either home, although HIA 144, who was placed in Termonbacca by Donegal County Council, recalled that a social worker from Donegal County Council came to speak to him, but he was unable to remember exactly when that was.[67] HIA 46 and his brother HIA 121 told the Inquiry that they recall being taken from Termonbacca to Salthill in Co. Galway by an official of Donegal County Council in or around 1960 or 1961. They were placed in an industrial school at Salthill, where they remained until they were discharged some years later. It seems extremely surprising that an official of a local authority from outside the jurisdiction was able to remove children in this fashion from a home in Northern Ireland, even though HIA 46 and HIA 121 were not the statutory responsibility of either local or central government authorities in Northern Ireland. However, given the paucity of evidence in relation to this which we have been able to obtain we merely draw attention to this. For the same reason we are unable to comment as to whether, and if so to what extent, Donegal County Council social services made a regular practice of coming to see children which they had placed in the home in the way described by HIA 144. In its response to the Inquiry's Warning Letter the DoH pointed out that even today, children from the Republic of Ireland may be placed in a children's home in Northern Ireland with the consent of the Republic of Ireland care authority, and where relevant, parents and/or a court. Children from Northern Ireland may also, for example, be placed outside the jurisdiction in special placements in England or elsewhere. In such cases, the placing authority retains responsibility for the child and has the authority to determine the length of the placement and, if necessary, remove the child from the placement. However, our concern was that the removal in this case appears to have been carried on an informal basis without any notice to the relevant authority in Northern Ireland.

167 The other form of local authority informal oversight that we have considered relates to the practice of the appropriate local authorities in Northern Ireland. Prior to the reorganisation of local government in 67 Day 26, pp.59 to 60.

1973, the responsibility for children who were taken into statutory care, as opposed to being placed privately in voluntary homes, remained with the county or county borough welfare committees. As has been pointed out earlier, from the late 1950s onward a small but increasing number of children in statutory care were placed by welfare committees in both Termonbacca and Nazareth House, predominantly by the Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee (i.e. the committee for the City of Londonderry). The Inquiry has not been able to obtain any records in relation to any form of systematic visit by representatives of any of the county welfare committees before 1969. The only references we have been able to obtain come from the records of the Sisters, which record that in December 1969 the Children's Officer for Tyrone "called to the children in her care".[68]

168 Such contact as there was between any county welfare committee and Termonbacca or Nazareth House relating to the children (as opposed to funding, a separate issue to which we refer later) appears to have been very limited. In September 1966 the secretary of Londonderry Welfare Committee wrote to the Mother Superior of Nazareth House stating that at its meeting on 5 May 1966 the Committee approved a recommendation from the Children's Officer that Nazareth House should be asked to give prior notice of holiday arrangements made for any children accommodated in Nazareth House who were the responsibility of the Committee in order that applications could be investigated. It appears from the minutes of the meeting of 5 May 1966 that the purpose of the investigation would be to see whether the families offering summer placements would be suitable for longer term fostering. There is no record of any response from the Mother Superior, and there is no indication in the minutes of subsequent meetings of the Committee that they received the information they requested.[69] Another reference in the same records kept by the Sisters records that, apparently in December of 1972, there were visits by the Children's Officers from Counties Derry, Tyrone and Fermanagh as well as members of the Derry Development Commission (which had assumed the responsibilities of Londonderry Corporation at the time).[70]

70 SND 13947.

169 Whatever may have been the position by the late 1960s, the absence of any welfare authority records to show that any form of oversight was carried out by local authorities in Northern Ireland of the facilities at either Termonbacca or Nazareth House, and the standard of care given to the children, is striking. We did hear evidence from SND 502 who was employed as a social worker by County Tyrone Welfare Committee, and who visited Termonbacca in that capacity in order to see one of the children placed there by that committee in 1964 and 1965.[71] Although the absence of evidence makes it more difficult to draw any conclusions as to the nature of any interest shown by county welfare committees in children they placed in either Nazareth House or Termonbacca prior to the reorganisation of local government, the fact that only references to visits by County Tyrone Welfare Committee employees have survived is significant. The lack of any reports in the documents relating to the Londonderry Welfare Committee records in PRONI suggests that the City and County Welfare Committees may well have taken little if any interest in the children whom they placed in Termonbacca and Nazareth House from the late 1950s onwards. Had there been proper interest in at least the conditions in which the children whom they were placing were being brought up we would have expected references to these to have survived, and to be incorporated in the records from the county welfare committees which are held in PRONI. The absence of any such references confirms our view that there was little, if any, effort by the relevant county welfare committees to inform themselves of the conditions in which the children in their care were being looked after prior to the late 1960s. We consider that the apparent failure of the relevant county welfare committees to regularly visit the children in their care whom they had placed in Termonbacca and Nazareth House represented a significant failing in their obligation to inform themselves of the progress of, and the conditions in which, their children were living in these homes. We regard this as a serious institutional failing on their part.

170 The situation so far as Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee was concerned appears to have changed somewhat with the appointment of SND 483 as a children's officer in 1969. That SND 483 chose not to come and give oral evidence to the Inquiry, is something which we regret. As she resides outside the jurisdiction we had no power to compel her to attend, nevertheless we have no reason not to accept much of the account which she gave in her witness statement.[72] She described the department which she joined as having a system which appeared to be completely unregulated, indeed she was the first person to work in that department who had any social work qualifications. She appears to have interested herself in the situation regarding the placement of children in Termonbacca because she was approached by families who sought approval from "the welfare" so that they could adopt boys in Termonbacca. On looking into the situation she found that none of the boys in Termonbacca had any involvement with the welfare system, nor did they have an assigned social worker. She states that she put in place an arrangement whereby if a family arrived at Termonbacca and sought to place a child there, the sisters would contact her and she would then carry out an assessment to see whether or not the child should be taken into care. She states that if she decided that they should be, she put the matter before the City Council, and if the child was taken into care a weekly payment of £2 10s was made to the home by the Council for the maintenance of each child. She described how she then visited Termonbacca when she could, and as the children were normally at school she would speak to the sisters. These were normally unannounced visits, and she did see the younger children who were underage on her visits. However, her interest in Termonbacca only related to those boys whose placement she had sanctioned. She remained in a similar role, but responsible for a different geographical area, until she left the WHSSB to take up a position with the Roman Catholic Diocese of Derry. This evidence confirms the finding which we have just expressed, and indicates that from 1969 onwards the Londonderry County Borough County Welfare Committee, and its successor the Derry Development Commission, did take a greater interest in the children it had put in care. It may not be coincidental that the references to visits by the County Tyrone Welfare Committee Children's Officer in 1969 are also recorded.

171 By 1970 or 1971 there was an increasing practice to place children in Termonbacca on the part of the Londonderry County Welfare Committee, because the evidence of SND 484 was that she placed one of the applicants in Termonbacca in 1971 when she was a social worker with the County Londonderry Welfare Committee. It is striking that her conclusion about the children was that whilst they appeared safe and well-cared-for, they were probably very institutionalised, and this was going to be difficult for them in later life.[73] She found at that time that social workers could come and go to Termonbacca as they wished, and whilst her view of the children during her earlier visits to Termonbacca was that they seemed quite subdued, at the time of her visit to Nazareth House in the 1980s the children seemed to be more spontaneous and to be enjoying themselves more, and the atmosphere was better.[74]

172 By the mid-1970s there was a much greater degree of contact by what was now the WHSSB with Termonbacca. TL 19, who started visiting Termonbacca in 1975, felt that the environment was a warm and caring one, and that although it was a very large establishment, and one which might well have been intimidating for children, the caring and the atmosphere were welcoming, although he did recognise children could become institutionalised in that setting.[75] Nevertheless, the practical value of such visits was reduced because meetings between social workers and children took place in either the parlour or in a corner of the recreation room, neither of which provided a suitable environment to have a confidential talk with the children.

173 We consider that the evidence of TL 19 revealed two significant failings on the part of the Board in so far as Termonbacca was concerned. His evidence was that he did not remember the WHSSB ever considering taking children into care by virtue of the provisions of Section 103 of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968 where the children had been placed privately in Termonbacca.[76] Nor were there any arrangements in place throughout the 1970s and 1980s whereby the Board would make arrangements to befriend children who had been discharged from voluntary care on reaching the age of sixteen, despite there being a clear duty upon the Board to do so under Section 131 of the 1968 Act.[77]

174 Although the evidence of SND 502 was that when the WHSSB was formed in 1973 it was short of staff,[78] her evidence was that the WHSSB worked on the principle that it considered children for admission into statutory care who had been placed in Termonbacca voluntarily only when their existence was brought to their attention,[79] in other words the Board had a reactive and not a proactive approach in this context. However SND 502 said that she "would have been shocked if there were children going in and out of care (i.e. in Termonbacca) that we didn't know about, because we had an overall responsibility."[80] The voluntary sector in general, and therefore Termonbacca and Nazareth House in particular, valued their independence, and that independence meant that their ability to function effectively and independently was accepted by both central and local government for reasons that we should consider shortly. Nevertheless, even allowing for administrative difficulties and the internal pressures created by the need to create a new service, we consider that the Board could and should have done more to inform itself about the arrangements that were being made for the reception into voluntary care of children in a geographical area for which it was responsible, so that the Board could consider whether any of these children should be accepted into statutory care.

175 Nor does the Board ever appear to have concerned itself with whether or not the Sisters in either home were complying with their statutory obligations to put in place their own monitoring and inspection procedures,[81] although monitoring and inspection were a function of the relevant central government department, initially the Ministry of Home Affairs, and later the Department of Health & Social Services (the DHSS).

176 We now turn to inspections carried out by the Ministry of Home Affairs, and later by the DHSS. So far as the Ministry of Home Affairs is concerned, the absence of files means that that the Inquiry has been dependent upon the evidence of inspections contained in the records of the Sisters and fragmentary reports and references that have survived elsewhere. We are satisfied that there were frequent and regular, apparently annual, inspections of both Nazareth House and Termonbacca by inspectors of the Ministry of Home Affairs throughout the 1950s and 1960s, and these continued in a different form when those responsibilities were transferred to the DHSS after the imposition of direct rule and the reorganisation of governmental and local authority responsibilities in the early 1970s. There are numerous references in the Sisters' own records to such visits, all of which indicate they received positive feedback about the care they were providing, and a small number of inspection reports have survived. Therefore, we conclude there were ample opportunities for the state to assure itself of the quality of care being provided in both these homes.

177 At an early date it was decided that these inspections would be carried out by an inspector employed for that purpose by the Ministry, and by the early 1960s the inspections were carried out jointly by an inspector from the Ministry of Home Affairs and a doctor from the Ministry of Health and Local Government. This was a sensible and progressive arrangement, but the question arises as to the quality of the inspections. In this context a seminal document is a three-page, typed, report prepared by Miss Kathleen Forrest, one of the Ministry of Home Affairs inspectors, on 28 April 1953. She carried out many such inspections in the ensuing decades. Her April 1953 report[82] gave what she described as "some brief summary impressions of the different Voluntary Children's Homes." As can be seen from the entirety of this document she focused on not merely the physical facilities provided at various homes but on the size and quality of the staffing and on the general atmosphere. She identified Termonbacca as "very institutional" and "short of staff", and she described Nazareth House as having the "best play equipment of any of the four Nazareth Homes, at any rate for toddlers. Still very institutional." She then proceeded to comment on the four Nazareth House homes, i.e. Nazareth Lodge, Belfast, Nazareth House, Belfast, Termonbacca and Nazareth House, Derry in the following terms:

> "The children in these 4 Homes especially have nothing like a normal upbringing. They must feel unloved as it is just not possible for the number of staff to show affection to such large numbers of children. They can know little or nothing of the world outside, (as with one exception school is on the premises), and must be unprepared for it, either in character or knowledge. I find these Homes utterly depressing and it appalls me to think that these hundreds of children are being reared in bleak lovelessness. This is not meant entirely as criticism of the staff, but their task is impossible."

She concluded the report with the following words:

> "In short, I think we must press for complete overhaul of the whole set-up of these Homes, and assist them in every way possible."

82 HIA 1462 to HIA 1464.

178 The comments by Miss Forrest just quoted are of the utmost importance as they are central to a consideration of the way in which inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs subsequently carried out their inspections, and how the Ministry and the Government of Northern Ireland at the highest level approached the question of funding of these two homes in succeeding decades. Miss Forrest was not alone in her assessment in 1953 that the standards of accommodation and care in Roman Catholic voluntary homes left a lot to be desired, because a year later we find the following comments written on a paper showing, inter alia, that of 787 children in voluntary homes, excluding children placed there by welfare authorities (in other words voluntary placements) 688 were Roman Catholic. The writer commented:

> "It could be argued from these figures that the RC community have such a keen appreciation of what is due to deprived RC children that they prefer to bear a greater share of responsibility for their maintenance than Protestants are prepared to do for deprived Protestant children. But it would not be a very strong argument, I'm afraid, unless the all-important questions of standards of accommodation, etc. are ignored."[83] (Emphasis added)

179 As we have already stated, the Termonbacca files no longer seem to exist, but a crucial document has survived in the form of a letter from an as yet unidentified senior civil servant to his counterpart, L.G.P. Freer in the Ministry of Home Affairs.[84] This letter deserves to be considered in its entirety. It refers to a file and to a minute which Freer appears to have sent to his staff (neither of which have been found). The writer of this letter makes reference to his experience in the equivalent department of the pre-1922 Local Government Board, and says that he is returning the file "about the inspection of the voluntary organisations." He says:

> "I would say that I wholeheartedly agree with your minute to your staff on the subject, and I disagree equally wholeheartedly with the action that they took on your minute. I think they took you up completely wrongly, and that they have gone much too far, and made much heavy weather out of the whole business."

180 When one reads the extended account he gives of the manner in which staff of the Local Government Board carried out inspections it is clear that he is suggesting that the inspectors should not concern themselves unduly with the manner in which an institution was run by the responsible organisation. Towards the end of the letter he says:

84 HIA 1586 and HIA 1587.

> "In other words, I think if a Government Department has had any hand in paying grant it ought to display a reasonable interest in how the place was run, but unless there is a definite responsibility on them for ensuring that it is managed in the best and most economical way possible I don't think they ought to undertake this responsibility.
> I imagine these are exactly your views on the subject.
> However, in the present case, what has been done has been done, and so if I were the responsible person (which thank God I am not) I think my inclination would be just to see that we did not get more deeply involved than we are at the moment."

181 We consider that the tenor of this letter, and in particular those parts quoted above, indicates that an influential civil servant was drawing on his own pre-1922 experience to disagree with the view of their responsibilities that appears to have been adopted by the inspectors, and to agree with the observations of his colleague. We consider the appropriate inference to draw is that he was recommending to his colleague that inspectors should not become "more deeply involved" in the manner in which the institution was run; in other words, he was advocating a stance that would concern itself merely with seeing that minimum standards were observed, and not become involved in trying to persuade the institutions concerned to improve the way in which they looked after the children in their care. In view of some striking omissions from subsequent reports which have survived we consider that this appears to have been the stance which the Ministry thereafter adopted, and that they did not follow the recommendation by Miss Forrest that the Ministry should "press for complete overhaul of the whole set-up of these Homes, and assist them in every way possible."

182 That a less interventionist approach appears to have been adopted by the Ministry, at least so far as the inspectors' reports are concerned, may be seen from the terms of two relatively brief but informative reports which have survived. Miss Wright (a colleague of Kathleen Forrest) reported on her inspections of Termonbacca in July 1960[85] and Nazareth House in September 1960. Neither of these otherwise detailed reports make any reference to the question of staffing and the problems related to it that Miss Forrest had identified. This suggests that a deliberate policy of not concerning themselves with staffing had been adopted by the inspectors. Dr Harrison accepted that the question of staffing in the home was a fundamental issue which should have been addressed.[86] As she pointed out in her answer in relation to a question from Inquiry counsel in relation to the report of the 1961 inspection of Nazareth House, "There certainly is an emphasis on material standards and physical well-being as opposed to emotional or development needs."[87] She accepted that what was missing was any consideration of the consequences to the emotional needs of the child if the staffing of the institution concerned was inadequate.[88]

183 Whilst the absence of references to staffing in later reports suggest that what was being done in practice was to adopt what Dr Harrison categorised as "a hands-off approach",[89] there was another deficiency in the reports. Not only did they fail to look in a comprehensive way at the needs of the children, but they did not detect that there was a failure to deal with the statutory requirements under Section 103 of the 1950 Act. As Dr Harrison conceded, and we accept, there is no evidence that significant changes were made in the attitude taken by the Ministry of Home Affairs despite the comments made by Kathleen Forrest in 1953,[90] nor is there any evidence of the Ministry adopting a proactive approach.[91] This was a very disturbing situation because, as Dr Harrison accepted when Inquiry Counsel put it to her, Miss Forrest's report "should have set off major alarm bells in the Ministry of Home Affairs."[92] As Dr Harrison agreed, there is nothing to show that in later years the staffing issue in either home was addressed by the Ministry of Home Affairs.[93]

184 Not only was the failure to deal with staffing issues an indication of an unwillingness by the Ministry of Home Affairs to take a proactive approach on this subject, but the failure to check whether basic statutory requirements such as those relating to Section 103 of the 1950 Act were being met was a clear defect in the manner in which the inspection was carried out. We consider that this should have been a question that was raised in the 1960 reports of Miss Wright because of an episode the year before when it emerged that two children were working on a farm in the country and the home had not notified the Ministry as it was required to do under Section 103. This is a further illustration of the justification for the point which Dr Harrison made to the Inquiry that the then Department of Health & Social Services accepted in the light of the report by the Hughes Inquiry in 1986 that "the frequency and rigour of its inspection programme left a lot to be desired" between 1960 and 1980, and, she commented, "one can assume then that there was certainly no difference in the 1950s, that, in fact, those deficiencies were prevalent during the 1950s."

185 Although the inspection regime responsibility was placed with the SWAG of the DHSS in the early 1970s, and whilst the reports which were prepared thereafter were very much more extensive and informative than the shorter earlier reports prepared by the inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs, nevertheless not all of these reports reached a satisfactory standard. In the 1983 report, which commences at SND 9976, there was no reference to the fact that the Congregation as the "administering authority" was not complying with the requirements of the Voluntary Homes Regulations that required monthly visits from voluntary visitors. Dr Harrison found that to be a very surprising oversight in the 1983 inspection,[94] and we agree. By this time Termonbacca had closed and this report was of an examination of Nazareth House by SWAG, nevertheless it demonstrates that as late as 1983 central government inspections of Nazareth House, and the earlier inspections of Termonbacca, failed to identify that these important requirements were not being met. Not until new guidance was issued by the Department in 1985 did subsequent SWAG reports on Nazareth House refer to this requirement. Even when it was mentioned, a relaxed attitude appears to have been adopted by the inspectors because they merely made anodyne recommendations that compliance with the regulations should be improved. It is obvious, since these recommendations were made in several successive reports, that the Sisters were not complying with the recommendations.

94 Day 38, p. 29.

186 Although in other respects the later inspections by the DHSS were, as we have just said, comprehensive in most respects so far as we can judge from the limited examples that have survived in relation to Termonbacca and Nazareth House, and the early reports in the 1960s were quite detailed, we are of the opinion that the inspection regime that operated from 1950 until the mid-1980s was deficient in a number of respects. First of all, despite the clarion call of Miss Forrest's 1953 report, we can only conclude from the absence of references in the reports to staffing in the decades thereafter that the Ministry of Home Affairs decided not to concern itself with this, vital indeed, fundamental aspect of the management of the homes in question. This failure was a significant systemic failing on the part of that department. In addition, the inspections which were carried out for many years failed to pick up that the monthly voluntary visiting requirements of the Voluntary Homes Regulations were not being complied with in either home. Nor was attention paid with sufficient determination to whether or not the notification requirements of Part 1 of the 1950 Act were being complied with by the Sisters of Nazareth. Although we acknowledge that the inspection regime developed in the 1980s was a much more satisfactory regime than had been in place before that, we consider that all of these amount to a significant systemic failing on the part of the relevant government departments until the mid-1980s.

Funding

187 The arrangements for the funding of Nazareth House were different from those relating to Termonbacca. Accounts that have been provided for Nazareth House for 1954[95] and 1955[96], confirm the dependence on alms and legacies as the home was dependent upon the proceeds of the daily collections carried out by sisters specifically allocated to collecting money door to door in both the city and country areas. In addition to legacies there were presumably large donations of money or gifts in kind of the type referred to earlier. When a child was placed in the home by a parent it was expected that a weekly or other payment would be made by the parent, but the reality appears to have been that in many such instances payments were not made at all, or were discontinued after a period of time. We accept that the main burden of providing for the children rested on the Sisters' own resources. Accordingly, it became clear in the 1950s in circumstances which we will describe later, that Nazareth House would have to look either to the mother house in Hammersmith for financial support, or to the local authorities in the form of county welfare authorities, or to central government for financial aid for both capital and revenue expenditure. As there were few children placed by local authorities in Northern Ireland in Nazareth House at this time it is likely that the amount received under this heading for each such child was modest. We have already referred to the number of children placed in the home by the County Donegal County Council, but there is little evidence as to how much was paid for each child, although there are fragmentary records which suggested that some form of weekly or annual payment was made by Donegal County Council for such children.

188 The position at Termonbacca was somewhat different. The sisters at Termonbacca did not take part in collecting themselves but, as we have already recorded, by the 1970s they were receiving £1,000 a month from the proceeds of the collections carried out by the sisters from Nazareth House. It seems that this was a long-standing practice. Accounts for Termonbacca for the years 1954, 1955, 1956 and 1957 show that in each of these years £3,200 is shown as income from "Alms". Given that the same amount is shown each year and described as "Alms" we infer that this may well have been money provided on a regular basis to Termonbacca by Nazareth House. In addition there were various payments made by parents when children were placed in the home and as children began to be placed by the county welfare committees regular maintenance payments were made in respect of those children also. It is unclear the extent to which Termonbacca benefitted from individual cash donations as the figures vary in each of the four years, from £1,313 in 1954 to £6,377 in 1956.[97] These figures would suggest that regular and substantial monetary support was given to Nazareth House by the Roman Catholic community. However, the principal difference between the funding arrangements for Termonbacca and Nazareth House related to the farm run by the Sisters at Termonbacca. The farming enterprise appears not to have been successful in the early to mid-1950s to judge by the entries in the accounts for 1954, when £2,347 is shown as the proceeds of "auction of cattle and implements", and in 1955 £223 is shown as the proceeds from the "sale of milking machine". In the years

189 Both Nazareth House and Termonbacca were regarded as being in a semi-autonomous relationship with the mother house. Essentially this meant that each had to stand on its own feet financially, although a close rein was kept on the local finances by the mother house, with even relatively modest items of expenditure requiring the approval of the mother general, as in 1967 when she gave permission for the purchase of a new car. Loans were made from time to time from the mother house, which it was expected would be repaid when the house in question was in a position to do so. For example, in November 1969 it was agreed to pay off "£1,000 off our debt to the Mother House".[100] In the Termonbacca accounts already referred to it appears that £10,300 was transferred in the form of loans from Hammersmith to Termonbacca in the years 1953 to 1957: £5,000 was sent in 1953, although there are no accounts available for that year; in 1954 a loan of £2000 was made by the mother house; in 1955, £200 was received in this way; and in 1956 £3,000 was received by way of loan from the mother house.[101] Therefore in the years 1954 to 1956, of a total income of £39,078, £5,500 came from the mother house, or 14.08% of the total income of Termonbacca.

190 It is clear that both Termonbacca and Nazareth House were heavily dependent upon the generosity of individuals, businesses and other donors in Londonderry and the surrounding area, and in the 1950s at least it appears that Nazareth House subsidised Termonbacca to some extent as well. Whilst Termonbacca was able to rely in part upon its farming activities these do not appear to have been successful in the early 1950s. Both homes were therefore in a parlous financial position, and if their own resources were inadequate to fund either substantial capital expenditure to replace or repair buildings, or to engage more staff, and the mother house could not provide extra money, their only option was to seek financial support from central government or the county welfare committees. Both homes did so in a number of instances, which we now consider.

191 Applications were made by Nazareth House and Termonbacca in the 1950s and 1960s for capital grants from the Ministry of Home Affairs. A number of such grants were made, and where a grant was made to a voluntary home for such capital work under Section 118 (1) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 local authorities were then required to contribute 50% of the grant by the Ministry. This took the form of a levy by the Ministry on each welfare authority, the exact contribution being proportionate to the population in the county or county borough concerned. Thus when a grant of £800 was made towards the cost of improving the kitchens at Termonbacca, this, together with 50% of a grant of £100 during the same period to Glendhu Childrens Hostel, Holywood Road, Belfast, was then recouped from each authority. Londonderry County Borough was required to repay £16 8s 10d, and Londonderry County £34 12s 3d. Other welfare authorities across Northern Ireland were also required to contribute, and this requirement was one which gave rise to considerable opposition on the part of the welfare committees. Their opposition was described in a Ministry of Home Affairs memorandum in April 1953[102] as "no taxation without representation" because these amounts had to be found by county welfare committees from local taxation in the form of the rates raised by their parent county councils. The welfare committees objected to this because they said that some committees had to contribute towards services which were not being provided in their area, and therefore from which they received no benefit. In addition they felt that they were paying for services being provided by other bodies for the care of children who may not have passed the care threshold imposed by the welfare committees in relation to children taken into care in their own homes. Finally, they had no say in how the money was spent. However, although the Ministry decided not to give in to this argument, it did set up the Childrens Home and Training School Committee, commonly known as the Maconachie committee after its Chairman, Miss Bessie Maconachie MP. The committee was set up in May 1956 "to advise the Minister whether or not the circumstances appear to be such as to call for special financial assistance from public funds under the Act". The committee contained representatives of the churches, the Child Welfare Council and local authorities.[103]

192 So far as capital funding is concerned, an application was made by Nazareth House for a grant towards the provision of a new play hall, and the cost of upgrading the fire precautions. The application for the play hall appears to have caused the Ministry considerable political difficulty to judge from letters written by the Unionist MP for the City of Derry, E.W. Jones QC MP, to the Minister of Home Affairs, G.B. Hanna QC MP.[104] Jones was strongly opposed to what he refers to as the "proposed grant to the Nazareth Home in Londonderry", saying:

> "On further reflection about this matter I am even more strongly convinced that this Grant should not be made at any time but particularly at the present time when public monies should be so carefully guarded."

He went onto say that he felt so strongly about the matter that he felt it should be put to the Prime Minister and before the party.

193 In a memorandum by the Minister of 1 February 1956[105] he reviewed the practice to date in making grants under Section 118 of the 1950 Act and observed:

> "In the circumstances prevailing in Northern Ireland, grants to voluntary homes must necessarily be a source of great political danger. In my opinion it is unwise to increase the difficulties for this Department in the political field. The whole matter will have to be reviewed and I would like to have suggestions as to possible courses which we could adopt."

103 SND 6019 and 6020.
104 SND 7504 and SND 7503.
105 SND 7415.

Whilst the nature of the "great political danger" is not specified, it has to be remembered that the political atmosphere in Northern Ireland was particularly tense at the time; there had been attacks by republican terrorists on Gough Army Barracks, Armagh in June 1954, and on Rosslea RUC Barracks in Co. Fermanagh in November 1955. In December 1956 the IRA launched a terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland which continued for some years. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the clear political nervousness demonstrated by these documents, a substantial grant was made for the play hall and towards the cost of the fire precautions, amounting to £5,000 for the play hall alone.

194 This grant was made under Section 118 (1) of the 1950 Act, and in 1957 an application was made by Termonbacca to Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee for a grant and a grant was made of £250. No doubt emboldened by this, in 1958 E. McAteer, a nationalist MP, applied to the Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee for grants for both Nazareth House and Termonbacca. The Welfare Committee agreed to make a payment of £1,000 to Termonbacca,[106] but this required approval by the Ministry of Home Affairs and the matter was referred to it. This caused the Ministry to look into the whole position of grant aiding voluntary homes under the provisions of Section 118 (2) of the 1950 Act. It consulted the Home Office, and was advised that it took the same view as the Ministry proposed to take, namely that it did not regard Section 118 (2) as being a proper method for grants to be made for what were effectively revenue purposes. The reasoning behind this was set out at length in a letter to Mr. McAteer dated 3 October 1958,[107] in response to a letter from Mr. McAteer at an earlier stage of the correspondence dated 30 September 1958.[108] In that letter he took issue with the Ministry's interpretation of the extent of its powers under Section 118 (2) and concluded by saying:

> "All that is needed here is a right act of will. Be assured that the public purse is on a very good bargain in getting £12,000 of first class Welfare work for a mere £1,000."

195 So far as contributing towards the cost of staffing and other costs, which would now be regarded as revenue expenditure, this remained the government's position for many years. This was despite a recognition within the Ministry, earlier referred to, that the standard of accommodation left a lot to be desired, and Kathleen Forrest's warning about the inadequate staffing. The Ministry accepted that there was by no means a clear intention to limit the provision of assistance under Section 118 (2) in a way that would prevent financial aid being given to voluntary homes for staffing costs, just as it recognised that it would relieve the cost which would ultimately fall on the public purse if voluntary homes were assisted in this way. As early as 1954 the Ministry recognised that:

106 SND 12978.
107 SND 6001 and 6002.
108 SND 6003.

> "Giving such grants was more economical than direct provision of new Homes by Welfare Authorities, as the Voluntary Homes do not charge full rate, as they have their own voluntary fund and labour. In fact there was the question as to whether there should not be a halt to the provision of Statutory Homes and the using of more Voluntary Homes."[109]

Not only that, but at the same meeting it was suggested that:

> "Not all Voluntary Homes were up to the standard of Statutory Homes and it was difficult in some cases to obtain progressive reports as to the children accommodated in some of them."

196 In July 1958 the matter had been put to the minister in the following way:

> "Myself, I have always thought that the sub-section is intended to go rather further, and that if the welfare authority feels that the managers of a children's home in their area are, in fact, helping and relieving them indirectly of looking after children, some of whom would otherwise fall to be taken into care and perhaps housed by the welfare authority, and if that Home is finding it impossible to make ends meet it is a legitimate and proper thing, and incidentally good business, to make some contribution to the Homes' general funds by grant under Sub-section (2)."

197 It is apparent that the Ministry chose to adopt a narrow interpretation of its powers to make grants to support the general funds of voluntary homes such as Nazareth House and Termonbacca, when it could, by "a right act of will" as urged upon it by Mr. McAteer, have justifiably taken a more generous view of the construction of the Act. Such a view would have enabled it to make payments which would have had the benefit of providing money for Nazareth House and Termonbacca to employ lay staff to improve their staffing ratios, whilst ensuring that the public purse did not have to pay as much to support children who would otherwise have to be supported by it if the children were not being taken into Termonbacca or Nazareth House because the Sisters were unpaid and worked long hours.

198 The result of the narrow view taken by the Ministry, whilst it was in accordance with Home Office practice in England at the time, was that the Sisters of Nazareth were unable to find the money which was required to improve their staffing ratios. If such financial support had been forthcoming, it is our view that many of the abuses due to, or substantially contributed to, by the absence of sufficient qualified staff could have been avoided.

199 In reaching this conclusion we have not ignored the problem created for itself by the Congregation through its practice at that time of not disclosing its overall financial position. As several of these memoranda observed, when applications were made for both capital and revenue grants both the Home Office and the Ministry of Home Affairs asked to see the accounts of the parent organisation in order to ascertain whether or not the organisation as a whole, and not merely the local institution by whom the application for grant aid was made, could meet the cost of running the local home.[110] The difficulty which the Congregation created for itself was that it was not willing to reveal its overall resources, and therefore the Ministry of Home Affairs adopted the same view as the Home Office in London when such applications were made: they asked to see the accounts of the Congregation as a whole, and the applications were then withdrawn. Sister Brenda McCall conceded that at that time the Congregation's policy was to maintain complete secrecy in relation to its financial affairs, and by failing to provide the information which the Ministry of Home Affairs sought the Congregation made it difficult for itself to obtain the support it was seeking.

110 SND 6007-6008.

200 The consequence of this was that the Ministry refused to approve the grant of £1,000 which the Londonderry County Borough Welfare Committee had proposed to make to Termonbacca in September 1958.[111] This impasse between the Sisters and the Ministry of Home Affairs over the question of accounts continued for some years. In February 1964 plans for a drastic change in the nature of the accommodation provided at Termonbacca so that small units could replace the existing dormitories were approved by the mother general.[112] An application for grant-aid for this large project was duly made to the Ministry of Home Affairs with the support of the Ministry inspectors. The Sisters noted in their records that:

> "Doctor Simpson and Miss Hill paid us a visit, February 4. Both were very pleased with the boys and most anxious that we would build dormitories as more sleeping accommodation was needed, said they would say so at Stormont and hoped we would get a Grant."[113]

201 The application came before the Northern Ireland cabinet in July 1964 and there were again discussions about the policy of asking the Congregation for details of its accounts and the refusal of the Congregation to provide this information. It was decided to seek further information because substantial sums were involved.[114] However, it is noteworthy that the Minister noted in his memorandum to the cabinet that this information was not sought in Scotland "on the assurance that the houses were required to be self supporting."[115] In the supporting memorandum the Minister drew attention to a number of relevant factors, two being of particular relevance:

> "that in a special Northern Ireland circumstance it could safely be assumed that quite a large number of the children voluntarily accommodated in homes like Termonbacca would, if these homes were not available, have to be accommodated at much greater expense by the welfare authority; that there is no doubt that the children in this home have at present an undesirably low standard of accommodation and there is at the very least no guarantee that the right sort of improvements, or indeed any improvements, will be made if there is no possibility of grant aid."

114 SND 6017.
115 SND 6013.

202 The matter was referred for further investigation and came back before the Cabinet in January 1965. The Cabinet was told that the Sisters of Nazareth "again firmly refused to supply such details".[116] The Cabinet decided to offer 25%, and it appears that this offer was communicated to the Sisters,[117] but it must have been declined by them because it was less than would enable them to complete the building with their own resources. It was not until October 1966 that the matter came back before the Cabinet, when it was pointed out that while the Minister "was not particularly happy about extending the principle of State grants to voluntary homes, the present proposal would undoubtedly result in considerable economies to the public purse".[118]

203 However, the Government did not change its position, and it was not until February 1970 that the matter came before the Cabinet again. The then Minister of Home Affairs, R.W. Porter QC MP, noted in his memorandum that:

> "In March 1966 my Department asked St. Joseph's to consider the matter further and in particular to consider the possibility of introducing more enlightened methods of care. The proposals so far put forward have been limited because of cost and my Department was concerned lest these would perpetuate the existing system of segregation of sexes in dormitory sleeping.
> After discussion with my Department St. Joseph's has produced acceptable plans on modern lines for new house units where children will live with staff. The cost is estimated to be £93,500 and a formal application for a grant of 50% of the cost has been made."[119]

204 There was a lengthy discussion of the relevant matters in the memorandum, and it was pointed out that:

> "…it is difficult to argue that the accounts of an organisation covering some sixty or seventy foundations scattered throughout the entire world and covering a wide range of social need have any significant bearing on a children's home in Londonderry."[120]

116 SND 6025.
117 SND 14258.
118 SND 6030.
119 SND 6035.
120 SND 6036.

205 The Minister recommended a grant of 50% and this was approved. The offer was subsequently made,[121] and the work put in hand. Over the next two years the work continued with stage payments being made by the Ministry as the work progressed, and the building was formally opened on 21 November 1972.[122] Shortly afterwards a further grant of £12,500 was made by the Ministry of Home Affairs to Termonbacca to help with the running costs.[123]

206 The change of approach by the Ministry was a welcome, but extremely belated, recognition of the need for substantial contributions from public funds to the capital costs of making changes at Termonbacca. Whilst the attitude of the Congregation in not producing its central accounts created a significant obstacle to the Government making the necessary contribution towards the building, had a more enlightened and realistic attitude been adopted much earlier by the Northern Ireland Government, a position it knew had been adopted in Scotland, then this building could have been available for children six years earlier than it was. That would have enabled essential improvements to be made to the physical facilities at Termonbacca, improvements which the Government knew for many years were needed, and which would have significantly improved the care of the children in Termonbacca.

207 We consider that the Ministry failed to do enough to pro-actively encourage the Sisters to convert Termonbacca into smaller units of the type recommended by the 1952 Home Office memorandum, despite being aware from the reports of its inspectors, and from other information made available to it, that the children in Termonbacca were existing in outdated accommodation with inadequate numbers of staff to look after them, conditions significantly inferior to those enjoyed by children in the statutory sector. Had it done so, that would have gone a long way towards reducing the opportunities for abuse which were a feature of the earlier structure. The length of time that it took the Government to bring itself to make the only sensible decision open to it was such as to amount to a systemic failing on its part, even though some of the responsibility for that state of affairs must still be borne by the Congregation because of its unwillingness to produce its accounts when an application was being made by it for a grant of a very substantial sum of public money.

Post 1972 funding for Termonbacca and Nazareth House

208 Capital funding for Termonbacca does not appear to have been a problem after the completion of the new build in 1972. Nazareth House then embarked on a similar programme in order to transform the existing dormitories into smaller family units by converting the second floor of Nazareth House into two flats in 1972,[124] and similar work to create a third flat was completed by May 1974.[125] No suggestion was made that this work at Nazareth House required any government help, and we therefore infer that the Sisters were able to fund this work themselves. Similarly there appears to have been no call upon government funding for any other work carried out at Termonbacca before it closed in 1982.

209 However, lack of funding for extra staff continued to be a significant problem for Termonbacca until it closed in 1982 and for Nazareth House for sometime thereafter. Funding for extra staff came under the heading of revenue funding, i.e. for day-to-day expenditure, and after the reorganisation of local government in 1973, which resulted in the creation of the WHSSB, any additional public funding for extra staff for either Termonbacca or Nazareth House had to go through the WHSSB. The WHSSB then had to obtain that funding from the DHSS and, as we shall see, Nazareth House continued to experience significant problems in obtaining extra funding until shortly before it closed.

210 A complicating factor was that from the early 1970s fewer children were privately placed in either Termonbacca or Nazareth House. As a result the number of children in statutory care increased in numerical terms, and as a proportion of the overall number of children in each house, because the overall number of children being admitted to care was declining at the same time. The combined effect of these factors was that both houses eventually became completely dependent upon the WHSSB. Eventually all of the children in both were in statutory care and had been placed there by the Board. As was the practice by voluntary homes throughout Northern Ireland, each house then charged the Board a set amount for the care of each child. The Board therefore paid Termonbacca and Nazareth House to look after some of the Roman Catholic children taken into statutory care by the Board, although the Board also ran its own homes, such as Fort James in Londonderry, Coneywarren in Co. Tyrone, and Coleshill in Co. Fermanagh.

211 The Board was therefore both purchasing services from Termonbacca and Nazareth House, and in a sense competing with them because it ran its own homes as well. This dual function of the Board generated a perception on the part of the Sisters that the Board would, or might, favour its own homes over the voluntary homes such as Termonbacca and Nazareth House in the allocation of financial resources. This perception, and the financial problems of Termonbacca and Nazareth House, were significant concerns, particularly by the mid-1980s when Termonbacca had closed, Nazareth House was the only voluntary home within the WHSSB area.

212 We accept that the Sisters took significant steps throughout the 1970s to improve the standard of childcare provided at Termonbacca. SND 484 described her first acquaintance with Termonbacca in 1971 when, as a young social worker, she came to place a child in Termonbacca. She felt that it could be a very intimidating environment for a young child, and she considered that it would not be the ideal place to bring a child.[126] Although the children appeared safe and well cared for, she thought that they were probably very institutionalised and would find it difficult to cope in later life.[127] It was apparent to her that there were not that many staff, and that a lot of responsibility rested on one nun who was "like the parent substitute for the whole group."[128] However, by 1978 she considered that the atmosphere was more benevolent than that described by Miss Forrest 25 years before.[129]

213 Whilst she recalled no complaints from individual sisters, or Termonbacca itself, about funding, there were requests from time to time for extra money, for example to fund school trips, no representations were made about staffing. She was unaware that ex-residents were supervising children instead of staff, and that is a further example of how the lack of adequate funding had adverse consequences for the children in Termonbacca.

214 So far as Nazareth House was concerned, when she was in contact with it in the 1980s she considered that the children seemed to be more spontaneous and enjoying themselves more in a better atmosphere, in contrast to her experience at Termonbacca where the children seemed quite subdued.

127 Day 23, pp. 35 and 36.
128 Day 23, p. 37.
129 Day 23, p. 41.

215 She was impressed by the employment of a residential social worker in 1978, something she regarded as quite enlightened. The employment of SND 332 was as the result of an initiative by SR 2. SND 332 described how SR 2 was very concerned about the need to provide aftercare support for former residents of Termonbacca, and encouraged him to devote a considerable proportion of his working time to ex-residents. Notwithstanding that, we are critical of the amount of time SND 332 did spend with the ex-residents, because that reduced the time he had available to spend with the children, something which we believe should have been regarded as a greater priority. However, the decision to employ a residential social worker was a progressive step, and we mention it at this stage because that appears to have been entirely funded by the Sisters themselves.

216 Another example of the anxiety of the Sisters to provide as high a standard of childcare as they could came in Nazareth House in the 1980s. By this time SR 2 had moved from Termonbacca to take charge of the children in Nazareth House. It was decided that it was necessary to employ waking night staff in all children's homes. Despite the Sisters having no funding to employ such staff, rather than wait until the funding became available SR 2 went ahead and engaged such staff at the expense of the Sisters, although eventually funding was provided by the Board. This is an illustration of the determination of the Sisters at Nazareth House, and SR 2 in particular during her time there, to do as much as they possibly could to obtain adequate financial resources to enable them to provide the highest standard of childcare for their children. HH 5, who was a senior official with the WHSSB said of SR 2 that "she was extremely professional in that she was trying really hard to bring up the standard",[130] and "she was very keen to actually implement any suggestions or any support she was offered and she took advantage of that", and "… [SR 2] [was] making real efforts to try to create a much more family environment for the children."[131] The tenor of the evidence was that she was determined to do the best she could for the children in her care and made many determined efforts to obtain funding for various purposes so that the children placed in care at Nazareth House by the Board would have the same material opportunities as other children looked after by the Board in their own homes.

131 Day 24, pp. 112 and 113.

217 Although the Board and the DHSS were prepared to provide small amounts of funding from time to time for staff related costs, such as covering staff absences when staff were released for training, the long-term difficulty of insufficient staff remained at Nazareth House until almost the end of the period of our Terms of Reference. A particular problem was that the Sisters were not calculating the charge which they made to the Board for the children in their care on a realistic basis because they were not including in their costings an allowance for the monetary value of the unpaid work they did, nor for the long hours they worked. In order to achieve a realistic figure for the per capita cost of the care of a child it was necessary to allow for the cost of replacing the sisters with paid staff, and because more staff would be required to cover the longer hours which the sisters worked this meant that more staff would be required. Allowance also had to be made for the salary costs of the extra lay workers who might be required to replace the sisters, or whose work the sisters performed. We accept that individual officers of the Board encouraged the Sisters to be realistic in calculating the amount they charged. However, the amount allowed for Nazareth House by the Board on a per capita basis remained a significant problem for a considerable period because it was less than was needed.

218 This became increasingly apparent when Nazareth House applied for capital grants. In May 1983 an application was made for assistance for the cost of replacing windows, and the Board identified that there were 22 children in the home and agreed to contribute 75% of the cost of the work.[132] In 1984, £2,199.38 was paid for this.[133] In 1987 Nazareth House made a further request for financial assistance to help meet the cost of necessary work for fire precautions. The DHSS requested sight of the Nazareth House accounts and a careful assessment of the financial viability of Nazareth House was carried out by the DHSS. The matter was complicated by virtue of the costs of running the old people's home, which were separate from costs relating to the children's home. The DHSS identified that of a total deficit in relation to both homes of £172,075, no less than £114,870 was attributable to deficits in the two preceding financial years on the running of the children's home. The DHSS officer commented:

133 SND 13409.

> "This is a large deficit and could not be sustained by a central body over a long period. It can be seen that the Old People's Home reached a surplus situation in 1985-1986 and Mr. McAteer tells me that this surplus situation is likely to continue. I also understand that an attempt has been made to back-date an increase in the per capita rate for children and this is one of the items being dealt with in a letter dated 22 December 1986 from Mr. Carroll (WHSSB) to our Mr. PJ Armstrong. I have not seen this letter.
> In conclusion, the only doubt I have is whether the losses being incurred on the children's home can be sustained over a long period by the sponsoring body in London, thus bringing the viability of the home into question. Provided you are satisfied that the continuation of the children's home is assured, I would agree that Nazareth House is worthy of support on financial grounds at the maximum grant which can be given."[134]

219 The DHSS made a number of payments to pay off the accumulated deficits generated by Nazareth House. In 1987 the Board was allocated £65,000 by the DHSS "to provide additional assistance for voluntary Children's Homes". As Nazareth House was the only voluntary home in the Western Board area, that should all have gone to it, but the Board paid £47,642 to Nazareth House, thereby paying off the 1985-86 deficit only, and paid £8,000 to Rubane in respect of an outstanding bill. The Board was unable to say how the balance was used, although all of the allocation should have gone to Nazareth House.[135] Although substantial deficits were paid off on a number of occasions in succeeding years, by 1995, the end of the period covered by our Terms of Reference, there was still a significant disparity between the cost of running Nazareth House by the Sisters, and the income they were receiving from the State, in the form of payments by the Board made available by the DHSS.

220 In September 1993, £15,230 was sent to Nazareth House,[136] and in December 1993 a further £51,670 was sent. In both instances the money was sent by the Foyle Unit of Management of the WHSSB.[137] It is significant that as late as November 1992 a report from the Social Services Inspectorate[138] commented:

134 SND 13307.
135 SND 13180.
136 SND 8140.
137 SND 8143.
138 SND 9775.

> "Current staffing levels are unacceptably low, particularly when one considers the low level of training within the staff group. As the main purchaser of services the WHSSB, as the corporate parent, is responsible for the standard of care and equity of provision experienced by children in residential care within the voluntary and statutory sectors. There should be comparability of provision across sectors. The current capitation funding for each child prohibits the employment of additional staff and is much below the average costs both within the statutory and voluntary childcare sectors."

221 As TL 19 accepted in his evidence, as early as 1983 funding had been flagged up by inspectors from the SWAG, and yet nine years later the same concerns were being highlighted within the Board.[139] The calculation of per-capita funding is an arcane and complex subject, influenced by the individual services being provided by separate institutions, services which may result in markedly different capitation fees being appropriate. Nevertheless the reality is that throughout the 1970s and 1980s the Western Board was getting services on the cheap from the Sisters of Nazareth, as TL 19 was driven to accept.[140] It is clear that resulted in a "pass the parcel" approach between the Board and the DHSS about how this should be resolved. As TL 19 put it:

> "…the Department were writing to us telling us we needed to look at the level of money being paid to the Sisters of Nazareth, we were writing to them asking them for support to enable us to provide care in some of our facilities to meet the needs of the children."[141]

However, although the DHSS as the ultimate paymaster was well aware of the problem, we consider that it took a remarkably long time for this matter to be addressed. It appears from TL 19's evidence that in 1984 all four health and social services boards began to look at the question of what the capitation fee should be for voluntary residential care in an attempt to reach a level playing field right across Northern Ireland.[142] However, we understand this was not resolved by the end of our period of Terms of Reference, and as late as 1993 when SR 2 was seeking funding to employ three or four extra staff. In June 1993 it was acknowledged in a memorandum from Mr. T. Haverty to TL 19 that

140 Day 24, p. 63.
141 Day 24, p. 64.
142 Day 24, p. 65.

"As you know I've always been concerned about the staffing levels in Nazareth House."

222 We are satisfied that this concern was not promptly addressed by the Department. Had it done so in a timely and determined fashion it would have resolved the long-running difficulties in a way that would have ensured that Nazareth House was provided with the same level of facilities and staffing that statutory homes received, thereby ensuring that all children in all institutions, whether voluntary or statutory, who were in care across the Province received the same level of childcare. This was not achieved due to the dilatory and indefensible manner in which all those responsible for analysing and dealing with financial help for Nazareth House failed to successfully grapple with the problem. We regard this as a serious systemic failing on the part of the DHSS whose ultimate responsibility as the provider of funding this was, because when the problem was drawn to their attention they failed to act appropriately and expeditiously to resolve the problem in an appropriate way.

Further findings of systemic failings by the Sisters of Nazareth; the county and county borough welfare committees, and their statutory successor the Western Health and Social Services Board; the Ministry of Home Affairs; and its successor the Department of Health and Social Services 223 We now set out our findings in relation to a number of systemic failings which we have concluded were made by: the Sisters of Nazareth in respect of both Termonbacca and Nazareth House; by the county and county borough welfare committees; and by the Western Health & Social Services Board, their statutory successor. We also deal with systemic failings by the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services, who were in turn both the ultimate funder and the government department responsible for the statutory inspection and overall oversight of the voluntary homes sector.

224 For the reasons that we have set out above, we conclude that in addition to those systemic failings we have already identified there were further systemic failings in the following respects.

(1) The Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth did not take adequate steps to ensure that they had:

(a) suitable premises, and

(b) sufficient, and

(c) suitably selected and trained sisters and lay staff to prevent abuse of the children in their care, and

(d) an adequate system of internal inspection, and

(e) an effective system of managerial support and supervision.

(2) The Congregation of the Sisters of Nazareth did not take sufficient steps to try to obtain adequate funding for either Termonbacca or Nazareth House.

(3) The Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services failed to:

(a) construct, and

(b) implement an appropriately rigorous inspection regime to ensure that the opportunity for abuse of children in St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca and Nazareth House was minimised.

(4) The Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Health & Social Services did not take sufficient steps to ensure that St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca and Nazareth House were required and/or helped to provide:

(a) suitable premises, and

(b) sufficient, and

(c) suitably selected and properly-trained sisters and lay staff to ensure that the children in these homes would be provided with childcare that was:

(i) in accordance with the standards of the time, and

(ii) of the same standard as that received by children in homes in the statutory sector.

(5) Neither the county and county borough welfare committees (or the Western Health & Social Services Board as their statutory successor) as the statutory bodies which placed, or assumed responsibility for, children in care in St. Joseph's Home, Termonbacca or Nazareth House, took adequate steps to monitor the care given to individual children in either home.

(6) None of the welfare authorities which placed, or assumed responsibility for, children in either home took adequate steps to monitor the facilities for, and standards of care provided to, children in either home.

(7) None of these statutory bodies took adequate steps to inform themselves of the provision made by the Sisters of Nazareth for the care of other children in either home whose circumstances might have brought those children within the responsibility of the statutory bodies concerned.

(8) None of those statutory bodies provided adequate financial or administrative support for the children they placed in the care of the Sisters of Nazareth in either home.

(9) We are satisfied that there was a systemic failing on the part of the Western Health & Social Services Board in approving, and then failing to properly monitor, the highly unusual relationship which SND 38 was permitted to have as both key worker and "befriender" of HIA 127, and in not intervening to manage his continued involvement with HIA 127 after his discharge from Nazareth House.

Chapter 6:

Module 2 – Child Migrant Programme (Australia)

Introduction

1 This portion of the Inquiry's Report is concerned with its investigations into why and how a number of children from institutions in Northern Ireland were sent to Australia, almost all of whom went in the years after the Second World War. When the Inquiry publicised its existence in Australia in 2013 we received a very large number of applications from people resident in Australia, mostly in Western Australia, and it became obvious that there were two main aspects of their experiences that required investigation: firstly, the allegations of abuse which they say they suffered in residential institutions in Northern Ireland before they went to Australia; and secondly, how and why these children were selected to go to Australia, because many allege that the process was itself abusive. Many are bitterly critical of the institutions for sending them to Australia, and of the Northern Ireland and United Kingdom Governments for permitting and facilitating their being sent to Australia.

2 They also complain of the effect that being sent has had on their lives, not least because they allege they were subjected to serious forms of abuse in the institutions to which they were sent in Australia. In their evidence many described how they lost all contact with their parents and siblings. Although, after many years and much effort, some were able to re-establish some contact with their relatives, for others it was too late, because their parent had died, or, when they were able to trace their parent or family members, the reunions were not successful. Their complaints also extend to other matters, such as not being able to obtain birth certificates, or discovering that their names or dates of birth had been altered, things which created major difficulties for them in later life when they had to prove their identity for official purposes.

3 Many of those who spoke to us in person, or who described their experiences in their written statements, spoke movingly of the profound effect that being sent to Australia as children had upon them. Those who wish to study their accounts in greater detail will find them on the Inquiry website, together with the relevant documents and transcripts, at Days 42 to 50. The words of HIA 324[1] in his statement provide a striking example of the effect upon him of being sent to Australia as a child, views which are representative of the views of many applicants:

> "My life in institutions has had a profound impact on me. I have always wondered what it would be like to have had a family - a mother > and father and brothers and sisters. I never got the chance to find out because I was sent to Australia. We were exported to Australia like little baby convicts. It is hard to understand why they did it. I know the theory – to populate Australia. I still cannot get over the fact that I was taken away from a family I never got the chance to know. I was treated like an object, taken from one place to another. I found it very hard to show affection to my children when they were young. I have improved as the years have gone on. I have a nightmare every night of my life. I relive my past and am happy when daylight comes."

HIA 324, who was born in 1938, was 75 when he spoke these words to the Inquiry legal team in Perth in 2013. Sadly he died before he was able to sign his statement and see the Inquiry consider his account, and the accounts of the other child migrants who have contacted us.

It became clear that many questions have been raised by what we have been told:

- Why were child migrants sent to Australia?
- How many were sent?
- Who sent them?
- Who decided that they would go?
- How were they chosen?
- Were their parents consulted?
- What happened before they were sent?
- How did they get to Australia?
- What happened to them when they got there?
- Were they able to contact their parents or families afterwards?

4 In this part of our Report we examine each of these questions except for "What happened to them when they got there?" We take the view that the institutions remained responsible for any child they sent until the child disembarked in Australia, and so we examined the arrangements that were made for the children travelling to Australia, and the conditions during the voyages to Australia. We made clear at the beginning of the public hearings of the module relating to Australia that our powers do not permit us to investigate the experiences of the applicants in the institutions to which they were sent once they arrived in Australia.[2] However, in order to examine whether the institutions in Northern Ireland took any steps to keep contact with the children, or to inform themselves of the progress of the children, it was necessary for the Inquiry to know what the applicants themselves had to say about these matters. As we explain in the next paragraph, almost every applicant was very concerned about the difficulties they experienced in later life because of the inadequate information available to them about their origins and families in Northern Ireland. In addition, the applicants themselves had much to say about their experiences in Australia. In order to obtain a complete picture of all these matters, when the Inquiry recorded statements from these applicants we therefore included their accounts of the experiences to which they say they were subjected in various Institutions in Australia. After this module we sent their statements to the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse (the Royal Commission) which was carrying on its work in Australia at the same time as our Inquiry carried out our work in Northern Ireland. We did this to ensure that all of these matters were drawn to its attention, because if these allegations are within the Terms of Reference of the Royal Commission it is for the Royal Commission to investigate them.

5 Many applicants who gave evidence to us in this module were unable to remember anything, or if they did they often remembered very little of their time in institutions in Northern Ireland. Where they can recall such matters, their evidence is referred to, where necessary, in those parts of our Report which deal with the particular institutions in Northern Ireland. This portion of our Report is solely concerned with the experiences of those who spoke to the Inquiry in relation to how they came to be selected to be sent to Australia, their experiences on the way to Australia, their experiences after they arrived to maintain contact with their relatives in Ireland during their childhood, or in later years, the success or otherwise of these efforts, and the effects on them of being sent to a different country many thousands of miles away as young children.

6 As part of our investigations we sent members of the Inquiry to Australia for approximately a month at a time in September to October 2013, and June to July 2014. On each occasion the team was made up of two members of the Acknowledgement Forum panel, two members of our legal team and two witness support officers. They went to Australia for two reasons. Firstly, to enable those applicants now living in Australia to have the same opportunity to describe their experiences to the Acknowledgement Forum as applicants who live in Northern Ireland and elsewhere. Some of the Australian applicants chose only to describe their experiences to the Acknowledgement Forum and did not wish to engage with the Statutory Inquiry element of the Inquiry's proceedings. The second reason was to enable our legal team to record witness statements from applicants in Australia, as well as to gather a considerable amount of documentary material and other information in relation to the matters which the Inquiry will consider later in this part of the Report.

7 Although the majority of the applicants who had been sent to Australia as children landed in, and still live in, Western Australia, some now live in other parts of Australia. In order to enable as many applicants as possible to speak to the Inquiry team at convenient locations, the Inquiry team saw applicants in Perth in Western Australia, in Brisbane in Queensland, and in Melbourne in New South Wales. Many of the applicants travelled considerable distances to speak to the Inquiry team and we are very grateful for them doing so.

8 The Inquiry then devoted nine days of public hearings[3] to examining the experiences of those who were sent to Australia. During that time the Inquiry received oral evidence from eleven applicants. Three who were in Northern Ireland at the time were able to give evidence in person at Banbridge Courthouse, and the other eight did so by live TV-link from Australia. A further 38 witnesses gave their evidence in the form of the written statements which they had provided to the Inquiry; these were read out by Counsel to the Inquiry in public. Altogether we received evidence from 52 of the 65 applicants from Australia, because three further witnesses were not called during the Australian module but gave evidence in a later module in respect of their experiences in institutions in Belfast. Their evidence in relation to those institutions is considered in that part of the report that deals with those Institutions, but their accounts of experiences relating to their migration to Australia are included in this portion of the Inquiry Report. The remainder of the 65 chose not to speak to the Statutory Inquiry, and those who wished to do so spoke only to the Acknowledgment Forum. Sixty-five applicants represents almost half of all those who we believe were sent to Australia from Northern Ireland as child migrants, and their evidence enabled us to piece together a detailed picture of many of the procedures involved.

9 The Inquiry received many helpful documents from applicants in Australia that greatly assisted us in our work. The Inquiry also carried out exhaustive searches in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI), as well as receiving evidence from the Sisters of Nazareth and the Health and Social Care Board. We also received helpful information from the Child Migrants Trust (CMT) and from Tuart Place in Australia. Documents we obtained from the National Archives of Australia at the end of the module threw considerable light on the arrangements for child migration to Australia between 1938 and 1950, and this file was subsequently added to the evidence bundle.

10 We wish to place on record our thanks to the Royal Commission, which provided staff to accompany applicants at the locations in Australia from which they were speaking to the Inquiry by live link, thereby enabling us to provide the same level and type of support to witnesses giving evidence as we did for witnesses in Northern Ireland. We are also most grateful to the Chief Justice of the Family Court of Western Australia, and to his staff, and to the staff of the Family Court of Australia at Melbourne, for their invaluable help in making available their premises and staff to allow applicants to give evidence by live link.

11 The Inquiry was fortunate in securing evidence from Dr Ann Mary McVeigh, PhD, of the Public Records Office of Northern Ireland (PRONI), and from Dr Margaret Humphreys OBE, OAM. Dr McVeigh made available to us her thesis on the topic 'History of the Child and Juvenile Migration Schemes to Australia', for which she was awarded a doctorate by The Queens University Belfast in 1995. The greater part of the information contained in this portion of the Report relating to the historical background to child migration to Australia is drawn from Dr McVeigh's work, supplemented by her oral evidence.

12 The topic of child migration to Australia is one that has generated a considerable amount of controversy in both the United Kingdom and in Australia for more than 20 years. It was brought to the attention of the wider public by the work of Dr Margaret Humphreys in particular, and by her book Empty Cradles: One Woman's Fight to Uncover Britain's Most Shameful Secret, published in 1994. Not only did this provide much important background material for the Inquiry, but Dr Humphreys also prepared a detailed witness statement to which we refer later in this Report. In that statement, and in her oral evidence, she described many of the problems faced by former child migrants in re-establishing contact with their families in Northern Ireland and elsewhere, and of the impact of their experiences upon them. These were matters which were also dealt with by applicants in their witness statements. In addition, the Inquiry received a document entitled 'Report on the Impacts and Outcomes of Child Migration Experienced by Former Child Migrants in Northern Ireland', prepared by Dr Philippa White, Director of Tuart Place[4]. The accounts given by many of the witnesses and Dr White's report, taken together with the evidence of Dr Humphreys, provided a great deal of information which we shall consider later. We also received helpful information from Prof. Gordon Lynch, Michael Ramsay Professor of Modern Theology at the University of Kent. Prof. Lynch has made a special study of child migration, and his 2016 book Remembering Child Migration Faith, Nation-Building and the wounds of Charity[5] deserves to be read by everyone interested in the history of child migration.

Historical Background

13 The practice of child migration, that is sending young, unaccompanied, minors from the United Kingdom to other countries, is one that has a long history, and antedated the period with which this Inquiry is concerned by over three centuries. In her evidence, Dr McVeigh[6] drew a valuable distinction between what she termed the child and juvenile migration schemes, distinguishing between those who were under fourteen when they were sent, and those over fourteen. At that time, fourteen was an acceptable age to leave school and get work, whereas those who were under fourteen were in the care of an institution or a parent. She found that those over fourteen were mainly people who chose of their own volition to emigrate. Such individuals approached the various organisations and sometimes paid their own fare, or had it paid for them, and went to Australia or elsewhere with the option of going to work. Children under fourteen would have been too young to work and so someone would have made the decision for them to emigrate.

4 AUS 6056-6057.
5 Bloomsbury, 2016.
6 Day 42, page 88.

14 In May 1947 the Australian Assistant Under-Secretary for Lands noted that the "Catholic Episcopal Migration and Welfare Association [in Australia] has asked for 60 boys under 14 years", and that would suggest that a distinction was made at that time between children under and those over fourteen[7] (although some older children did emigrate to Australia under the child migrant schemes). We consider that Dr McVeigh's distinction is a valid one and we have applied it in our consideration to the evidence before us. The overwhelming majority of those who applied to us were fourteen or under when they were sent, and whilst a small number of children were over fourteen at the time they emigrated, in many of those instances we are not concerned with their experiences because they were of a sufficient age to make an informed decision for themselves as to their future, and in almost all cases have not applied to the Inquiry.

15 It is now well recognised that the practice of sending young, unaccompanied, minors abroad has a long and varied history, indeed the first contingent of young migrants was sent to Virginia in 1619. Throughout the remainder of the 17th century, and during the 18th and 19th centuries, child migration to various colonies and dominions within the British Empire and Commonwealth was widespread. Although various acts of the United Kingdom Parliament were passed which permitted this policy, the actual migration was arranged by statutory, voluntary or religious organisations, which made all the necessary arrangements. In later years subsidies of various sorts were paid to these organisations both by the British Government and by the authorities in the countries to which the children were sent.

16 Throughout the 19th century large numbers of young children were assisted to emigrate, mostly to Canada. Canada remained the favourite destination for child migrants for many years, although critical reports of the experiences of children sent to Canada led to the practice being brought to an end by the Canadian Government in the 1920s.[8] Despite many contemporary reports which revealed serious shortcomings and abuses in the practice of child migration to Canada,[9] there still remained a considerable body of opinion in the United Kingdom that was strongly supportive of the principle of child migration. Therefore, despite child migration to Canada becoming less popular, in the 20th century Australia became a more popular destination for child migrants, although some children did go to other countries such as New Zealand, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe). It is noteworthy that whilst in general the Canadian authorities wanted older children who could work, the Australian authorities, as we shall see, and the Roman Catholic Church in Australia, wanted younger children who could then be moulded into Australian citizens.

17 In the early part of the 20th century a number of schemes for child migration were created by voluntary societies which flourished at the time. The Big Brother Movement was launched in London in July 1925, and the first consignment of 'Little Brothers' arrived in Australia in 1927. The Big Brother Movement was essentially an assisted passage scheme for boys aged sixteen to seventeen and a half. It guaranteed to find employment and accommodation for each young man, and to be his legal guardian until the age of 21. It provided a surrogate 'Big Brother' who would keep a fraternal eye on the youngster. Between 1925 and 1931, it introduced 1,926 boys into Australia, until its activities were halted by the Depression. It re-established itself in the late 1930s but its efforts were interrupted by the onset of the Second World War. It again re-established itself after the war and sent an average of 200 boys a year from 1947 until the 1970s.

18 The Fairbridge Society was named in honour of its founder Kingsley Fairbridge. It sent children to be brought up in farm schools where they would be taught to be farmers and farmers' wives. Kingsley Fairbridge bought a small farm near Perth, Western Australia, and the first party of boys arrived in January 1913. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s the farm school continued to grow and a second farm school was opened in New South Wales. By the outbreak of the Second World War, the Society had sent 1,202 children to Australia. When migration resumed in 1947, approximately 600 more unaccompanied child migrants passed through Fairbridge. The Society was a non-denominational organisation, and such was its reputation that many other organisations, including local authorities, church-based associations, and various children's societies sent children in their care to be brought up on Fairbridge farms in Australia.

19 One of these societies was Dr Barnardo's. In due course it opened several more homes and training schools in Australia, and by 1960 there were nine Barnardo's centres in Australia, all in New South Wales. From 1921 approximately 3,000 children emigrated to Australia under Dr Barnardo's auspices, 500 of whom left Britain after 1947. Barnardo's sent the last group of migrant children to be sent to Australia, a party of nine, in 1967. Seven children who were born in Northern Ireland emigrated to Australia from Barnardo's homes.

20 As we describe later, the Roman Catholic Church was also closely involved in arranging for child migrants to go to Australia, mostly after the Second World War.

Legislation

21 In the 19th and early 20th centuries a number of acts were passed by the United Kingdom Parliament which made provision for the emigration of children. Section 70 of the Children Act, 1908[10] provided for the apprenticeship or disposal by emigration of any youthful offender, or child detained or out on licence from a certified school, by the managers of the school, as if they were the parents of the child (provided that the consent of the Secretary of State was given), where the disposal was to be by way of emigration. After a separate Government came into existence in Northern Ireland in 1921 this power was availed of on a number of occasions by the Ministry of Home Affairs in Northern Ireland.

22 The principal legislative provision with which the Inquiry has been concerned was the Empire Settlement Act of 1922, which was replaced by the Empire Settlement Act of 1937, which in turn was succeeded by the Commonwealth Settlement Acts of 1952, 1962, 1967, and these three acts are properly cited as the Commonwealth Settlement Acts 1922 to 1967. Section one (1) of the 1922 Act stated that:

> "It shall be lawful for the Secretary of State, in association with the government of His Majesty's Dominions, or with public authorities or public or private organisations either in the United Kingdom or in any part of such Dominions, to formulate and co-operate in carrying out agreed schemes for affording joint assistance to suitable persons in the United Kingdom who intend to settle in any part of His Majesty's Overseas Dominions."

10 document, HIA 118.

23 The Act and its successors did not specifically empower voluntary organisations, or anyone else, to send children in their care abroad. However, if the Secretary of State agreed that a child migration scheme, whether set up by a voluntary organisation or any other body, fell within the terms of the Act, public funding could be provided to subsidise the cost of the scheme. The 1922 Act was time-limited, and the scheme was therefore extended by the Acts of 1937, 1952, 1962 and 1967 until it lapsed on 31 May 1972.

24 Other statutes gave the Secretary of State, or other responsible Minister, power to consent to the emigration of an orphan or deserted child where certain formalities were complied with. In the rest of the United Kingdom the relevant legislation was section 84(5) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 which gave the Secretary of State power to authorise arrangements for the emigration of any child in the care of a fit person, if it appeared to him that it would be for the benefit of the child. The Secretary of State had to consent to the emigration, and was required to be satisfied that the child consented, and that his parents had been consulted, or that it was not practicable for the parents to be consulted. The Act also provided (paragraph 7, schedule 4) that managers of an approved school had the power to arrange for the emigration of a child in their care with the written consent of both the child and the Secretary of State.

25 Prior to the enactment of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 (the 1950 Act), the relevant statutory provisions that operated in Northern Ireland after 1921 were sections 21 (6) and 70 of the Children Act 1908. Section 111 (5) of the 1950 Act contained a similar provision to the 1933 statute for those children committed to the care of a fit person. A fit person could be either an individual or a voluntary home, as was the case in respect of those children from Barnardo's where consent was sought from the Ministry of Home Affairs in relation to children committed to its care before the children were sent abroad.

26 Schedule 4, paragraph 7, of the 1950 Act empowered the managers of a training school to arrange the emigration of a child in its care, with his written consent and that of the Ministry. In Northern Ireland it was the consent of the Minister of Home Affairs that was required, not that of the Secretary of State, although, as we shall see, little use was made of this provision in Northern Ireland.

The rationale behind child migrant schemes

27 The arguments of those who supported such schemes embraced both concern for the child, and concern for country or community. A very important consideration for many societies of all religious denominations was the religious and moral welfare of the young person. There was a desire to safeguard the child's religious and moral well-being, by removing the child from the danger to which it was felt that child could be exposed if it were to remain either in its own, unsatisfactory, home or in an institution. There was also a belief that the British Isles were over-populated, whereas the colonies were under-populated. A similar, but separate, argument was that there was a need to build up and maintain the Empire, and to ensure that the predominant population of the Empire was of white, British stock.

28 The most enduring argument in favour of such schemes was a financial one. Those youngsters who were selected and sent to the colonies would have a chance to "better themselves", and, by their removal, more room would be made available in over-crowded workhouses, orphanages and homes for other children in need of care. The fare to Australia would therefore be money well spent. All the major child and juvenile migration agencies used some variant of this economic argument. At its simplest, it was reckoned that it was cheaper to send a youngster abroad than to keep it for several years in a workhouse. In later years, this argument was refined, by providing emphasis on the benefits to the child and to the colonies of child migration. The child or youth who was otherwise un-provided for should be sent to the colonies where he or she could find farm or domestic work, thereby relieving unemployment at home, whilst increasing the labour force of the receiving country.

29 As was the case with child migration to Canada, a further consideration was the belief that sending children to a healthy outdoor life in the fresh air and sunshine of Australia, far away from the slums, from evil influences and from institutional life, would do more for a poor child than all the charity offered at home. This view was expressed by Arthur Lawley in his epilogue to The Autobiography of Kinsgley Fairbridge in 1934 when he said that children could become "strong, sturdy and efficient citizens able to play their part in developing the vast resources of Australia."[11]

11 Arthur Lawley, in the epilogue to The Autobiography of Kingsley Fairbridge (London, 1934), p.179.

30 Some people considered the risk of drifting into the "wrong" religion even more damaging. Most religious denominations had their own homes, each replicating the work of homes of other religious denominations. Each jealously guarded its own sphere, and great emphasis was placed by many denominations on the need for children who migrated to be brought up in what was regarded as the "correct" religion. As we shall see, the Roman Catholic Church was also influenced by the desire to increase the number of Roman Catholics in Australia.

31 In the 1920s the Australian Commonwealth (i.e. central) Government and state governments offered grants to support assisted passages, but by 1930, as the Australian Year Book of 1932[12] makes clear, those concessions were limited to: "boys for farm work, young women for household employment, and to nominees, mainly wives and children of husbands in Australia." These concessions were revoked in 1932, and although assisted migration resumed in 1938, it was curtailed due to the approaching hostilities, and assisted passages were not reintroduced until 1947.

Attitude of the Australian Government post 1945

32 The Australian Senate Report makes clear[13] that the Commonwealth Government had been developing plans to bring large numbers of child migrants to Australia before the end of the Second World War. On 2 August 1945, the Minister for Immigration referred to the Government's plan to bring 50,000 orphans to Australia during the first three years of peace. The Minister, the Hon Arthur Calwell, said:

> "Pending the resumption of large-scale adult migration, the Government will take every available opportunity to facilitate the entry into Australia of accepted children from other countries. The Government has already approved in principle a plan to bring to Australia, in the first three years after the war, 50,000 orphans from Britain and other countries that had been devastated by the war. Discussions on the details of this plan are proceeding with the States, and we hope soon to reach a stage where the full possibilities of the scheme can be properly assessed."[14]

13 Senate Report, paragraphs 2.60-2.65.
14 Ibid, paragraph 2.61, quoting House of Representatives, Debates, 2 August 1945, p.4914.

33 When it became clear that the target of 50,000 war orphans could not be reached, not least because there were not as many true orphans as had been anticipated in Britain and in other European countries, it was decided that as far as possible the Commonwealth Government would rely on private organisations such as Barnardo's, Fairbridge, and the religious organisations to promote child migration. Neither private fostering nor adoption of child migrants was favoured, partly for legal reasons as the death of the parents of refugee children might be impossible to determine.[15] As had been the position before the war, it was agreed that maintenance payments for children would be shared between the British, Commonwealth and state governments.[16] Some figures illustrate the type of payments that were made. In Western Australia the payments for child migrants up to 16 years were:

Commonwealth child endowment	10s per week
State subsidy	3s-6d per week
British Government subsidy	6s-3d per week
Lotteries Commission	3s per week
Total	£1-2s-9d

Commonwealth child endowment	10s per week
State subsidy	15s per week
British Government subsidy	£1-5s per week
Lotteries Commission	10s per week
Total	£3-0s-0d.[17]

In succeeding years considerable differences developed in the amounts allowed by individual states and these are described in greater details in the Australian Senate Report.

Concerns about Child Migration

34 Child migration had been the subject of expressions of concern, both about the rationale for the schemes, and about their operation, prior to the Second World War, particularly as the reports we have referred to above began to surface showing the unsatisfactory conditions experienced by children sent to Canada. At the end of the Second World War the British Government set up a committee chaired by Miss Myra Curtis CBE, which reported in 1946. The Report of the Care Children Committee (the Curtis Committee) considered the various options available for care of children in need in Britain. Although primarily concerned with the British childcare system, the Curtis Committee did consider the matter of child migration. Given the many difficulties and experiences experienced by the witnesses to this Inquiry, the following passage from the Curtis Committee report is particularly noteworthy:

15 Ibid, paragraph 2.63.

> "We understand that organisations for sending deprived children to the Dominions may resume their work in the near future. We have heard evidence as to the arrangements for selecting children for migration, and it is clear to us that their effect is that this opportunity is given only to children of fine physique and good mental equipment. These are precisely the children for whom satisfactory openings could be found in this country, and in present day conditions this particular method of providing for the deprived child is not one that we especially wish to see extended. On the other hand, a fresh start in a new country may, for children with an unfortunate background, be the foundation of a happy life, and the opportunity should therefore in our view remain open to suitable children who express a desire for it. We should however, strongly deprecate their setting out in life under less thorough care and supervision than they would have at home, and we recommend that it should be a condition of consenting to the emigration of deprived children that the arrangements made by the Government of the receiving country for their welfare and aftercare should be comparable to those we have proposed in this report for deprived children remaining in this country."[18]

The report further stipulated:

> "The emigration of deprived children should be subject to the condition that the receiving Government makes arrangements for their welfare and supervision comparable to those recommended in this report."[19]

35 The qualified approval for the principle of child migration, and the note of caution, expressed by the Curtis Committee was not the only expression of concern about the propriety and effectiveness of child migration to Australia at this time. The president, chair and secretary of the British Federation of Social Workers wrote to The Times on 24 March 1948 raising concerns about the system.[20] The British Federation of Social Workers attempted to obtain changes to the bill then going through Parliament which ultimately became the Children Act 1948, but were unsuccessful. The National Council of Social Services also published a critical report in relation to child migration in 1951.

36 In view of these concerns we consider that it can fairly be said that although after the Second World War the principle of child migration continued to receive support from governments, and from secular and religious groups, it behoved all those concerned with child migration to look very closely at what was being done in order to prevent well-known difficulties and problems happening again.

The Role of the United Kingdom Government

37 On 24 April 1939, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on behalf of the United Kingdom Government signed an agreement with the Christian Brothers of Western Australia under the Empire Settlements 1922 and 1937. This agreement, which was stated to be made with the approval of the Commonwealth and Western Australian governments, provided that the UK Government would provide money to the Christian Brothers towards the cost of extending the Christian Brothers' Agricultural Training Farm at Tardun, and contribute towards the maintenance of up to 50 British migrant children at Tardun. The agreement, which was not to extend after 31 May 1952, contained provisions regarding the type of education and training the children would receive at Tardun.[21]

38 Because of the outbreak of the Second World War it was not until after the end of the War that child migration resumed. It is clear from the documents the Inquiry has obtained from the National Archives of Australia that the involvement of the United Kingdom Government was not confined to providing the legislative framework that allowed organisations to arrange child migration to Australia, nor (as we shall see later) to making a financial contribution towards the operation of such schemes, because it would only allow children to be sent to Australian institutions that were approved by it. Inspections of institutions were carried out by British government officials, and in one case the findings about the Christian Brothers' institution at Clontarf were so critical that Clontarf was removed from the list of approved institutions, and the numbers that could be sent to Tardun and Bindoon were reduced, until the United Kingdom Government was satisfied that the necessary improvements had been made.[22] Detailed examinations of these institutions were then carried out by the Australian authorities.

39 In 1953 John Moss, about whom we shall say more later, made use of a visit to Australia to carry out a fact-finding mission on behalf of the United Kingdom Government. He and his wife visited many of the institutions to which children were sent. Although his report was critical of some aspects of these institutions, he nevertheless supported the principle of child migration. In 1956, a further fact-finding mission was sent to Australia by the United Kingdom Government. This was chaired by John Ross, who expressly criticised five institutions. Ross attached a secret annex to his report that was not published at the time. In that annex he was very critical of a number of other institutions that he had not publicly criticised, because he had not been to all of them, and the information was not sufficiently strong in some instances to allow him to express public criticism.

40 The Australian Commonwealth and state governments took time to respond to these criticisms and as both reports became available, the two reports, and the responses to them, were furnished to the Northern Ireland Government by the United Kingdom Government. However, although the Australian response was prepared on 16 January 1957, the last group of children sent from Northern Ireland by the Sisters of Nazareth embarked for their voyage to Australia on 24 December 1956. Apart from a small number of older children who were sent to Australia in 1969, the children who embarked on 24 December 1956 effectively represented the end of child migration from Northern Ireland to Australia so far as this Inquiry is concerned.

22 NAA, A445, 133/2/8, letters 9 June 1947 Garnett to Wheeler, and cablegrams 30 April and 10 June 1947.

41 For whatever reason, the numbers of children going from the United Kingdom as a whole to Australia declined significantly during the 1950s. In a debate on 9 February 1959 the Under-Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations (C.J.M. Alport) told the House of Commons that whereas 388 children had emigrated in 1950, in 1958 only 80 had done so. At the end of November 1958 out of nearly 2,000 places available to the United Kingdom, over one half were unfilled, and only 62 children were awaiting transport to Australia.[23] The numbers going to Australia from the United Kingdom as a whole continued to decline very significantly, and by the end of the 1970s child emigration to Australia had virtually dried up.

The Position of the Northern Ireland Government from 1921 Onwards

42 We have not directed our attention to any of those who were sent from Northern Ireland prior to the outbreak of the Second World War because none of those individuals applied to the Inquiry, and in some instances at least the children concerned were over the age of 14. In the pre-Second World War period the Northern Ireland Ministry of Home Affairs policy in relation to child migration by children from training schools can be seen from the following passage from a letter of 4 May 1928[24] by the Assistant Secretary responsible, who wrote to the clerk of each county borough council and each county council:

> "...in the majority of cases the disposal of a child by emigration will effect a substantial saving in the sum which would otherwise be expended in capitation grants by the Government and the local authority if the child were to complete its full term at the School. But apart from such financial considerations the Ministry considers it desirable in the interests of the children that when a suitable opportunity for emigration presents itself this should not be lost by reason of lack of funds. It will be realised that owing to the present prevalence of unemployment in this country it is difficult to ensure a means of livelihood for young persons on discharge from Certified Schools and it sometimes happens that in such cases young persons after discharge from the School drift back to a life of crime a result which might have been avoided had they been enabled to obtain work in the colonies."

23 Hansard (House of Commons Debates), 9 February 1959, pp 9 and 10.

43 It is significant that in the response of 31 May 1928 from the Children Act Committee of the County Borough of Belfast (Belfast Corporation) a pertinent point was made about the age of children who should be considered for emigration from Industrial Schools when the Town Clerk stated that:

> "...in their opinion it would not be desirable except in very exceptional circumstances, when a child was being emigrated in the care of near relatives, that children under 16 years of age should be emigrated. They quite agree with you, however, that the important consideration in the matter is the welfare of the child."[25]

44 After the Second World War the role of the Northern Ireland Government and the Ministry of Home Affairs was largely confined to the Minister considering whether to approve the emigration of children who were in care, either because they were in a training school or other penal institution, or because they were in local authority care. As we shall see, the number of such children was small. Whilst ministerial consent was not required for the migration of children who had been placed voluntarily in homes of whatever denomination or from secular homes, because these children were not covered by the legislative provisions, nevertheless the Government was well aware of the considerably larger numbers that were likely to be sent to Australia under the child migration schemes that were supported by various Roman Catholic organisations. It is convenient to consider the position of the Northern Ireland Government in relation to two distinct categories of children: the first being those children who were in the care of statutory organisations, such as county welfare committees or training schools; the second being those children who were in voluntary care.

45 Different considerations of both law and practice applied to each category. With the enactment of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950 (the 1950 Act) provision was made for the emigration of three categories of children, each category requiring the consent of either the Minister, or the Ministry of Home Affairs.

(1) Under section 94 (1) and (2) of the 1950 Act, welfare authorities were given power to arrange for the emigration of children in their care, but this was subject to the consent of the Ministry.

(2) Section 111 (5) of the 1950 Act gave the Minister power to consent to the proposed emigration of a child who had been "committed to the care of a fit person", subject to the Minister being satisfied as to certain matters. This applied to those who had been placed in care by a court, or who had been formally taken into care by a welfare authority.

(3) The managers of training schools were empowered to arrange for the emigration of a child, provided (a) that the child gave written consent, (b) the Minister also gave his consent, and (c) before exercising their powers "the managers shall, where it is practicable to do so consult with the parents of the person concerned."

46 Thus, in May 1950, the St. Patrick's Boys School run by the De La Salle Order put forward several boys as candidates for emigration to Australia, all but three of whom had already completed their period of supervision in the training school. Therefore only the three candidates still under detention required Ministerial consent by virtue of paragraph 7 of schedule 4 of the 1950 Act. Two of the three boys were aged sixteen and nine months, and the third was aged eighteen and five months. Ultimately the Minister gave his consent and all three boys emigrated.[26]

47 It is unclear how many boys ultimately went to either Canada or Australia by virtue of the provisions which governed emigration from training schools, but all the boys sent before and after the Second World War were close to adulthood at the time. Although all of these children fall within the ambit of the Inquiry, so far as the Inquiry has been able to ascertain all were in the fifteen to eighteen year old age bracket, and we consider that they were therefore of an age when they could make an informed choice as to whether they wished to go to Australia. Indeed several of those in this category seemed to have taken the initiative to do so. None have approached the Inquiry, and because of that, and their age when they emigrated, we have not considered the circumstances surrounding their emigration any further.

48 We know that in November 1950, ten children sailed on the same vessel, all of whom came from either county welfare committee care, or from the Protestant run home at Manor House, Lisburn, Co Antrim. Despite intensive efforts by the Inquiry we have obtained little information about many of those children who went from local authority homes, 26 See AUS 5923, letter dated 16 June 1950.

but we are aware from a passenger list that two children, AU 110 and AU 111, sailed in November 1950 with several other children, some of whom are applicants to the Inquiry. The passenger list suggests that these children were sent to Australia by the County Londonderry County Welfare Committee, but the HSCB has been unable to find any documents relating to either person.[27]

49 Of those who have been identified by the Inquiry's researchers, or of whom we have been told, the position appears to be as follows:

(1) Three children (including AU 110 and AU 111) were sent for emigration by various county welfare committees in November 1950.

(2) In 1952, three brothers were put forward for emigration to Australia by County Armagh Welfare Committee. Although the records do not expressly state that they were sent to Dhurringle, this appears highly probable because there is a reference to them being sent to a Church of Scotland (i.e. Presbyterian) Foundation. It is noted that they sailed on 11 June 1952, and their arrival in Australia was reported on 28 November 1952. Whilst the ages of the three brothers are not stated, it appears probable that two of them were no longer of school age because they were described as working. Whilst the age of the third brother is not stated, because no reference is made in the records to his working or being available for work, it may be inferred that he was still of school age, in other words under fourteen.

(3) The South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust has found evidence that suggests that two brothers (aged sixteen and four months and fifteen and one month respectively), were discharged from Marmion Childrens Home to Australia on 24 February 1954.

(4) A third boy was discharged from the same home to Australia on 14 April 1957, although no further information is available.

50 A number of other children in the care of county welfare committees were put forward for, and it appears were ultimately given approval for, emigration.

(1) In 1951 or 1952 a child who appears to have been fifteen or sixteen, and to have been boarded out (i.e. fostered) by Antrim County Council was accepted by the Big Brother Movement.[28]

27 AUS 5993, Statement of Fionnula McAndrew.
28 AUS 5167.

(2) In November 1956 County Down County Council noted on 30 November 1956 that a boy was at Dhurringle, although no further record in relation to his emigration has been found.[29]

(3) In 1965 two boys were apparently given permission, and financially assisted, in their emigration to Australia.[30]

(4) Finally, in April 1964 Belfast County Borough Welfare Committee sought authority for a boy of unspecified age to travel to Australia under the auspices of the Big Brother Movement so that he could join his foster parents. It appears that he did not emigrate, because he was turned down by the Australian Chief Migration Officer in July 1964.[31]

Therefore, of some fourteen children who appear to have been sent to various institutions in Australia from County Welfare Committee Homes, four were in the fifteen to eighteen year bracket and so we have not considered them further.

51 Of the remaining ten, we have been able to discover nothing other than the barest details, except for HIA 354. His case is of particular importance because, uniquely so far as we can discover, in his case voluminous records have survived which enabled the Inquiry to establish with very considerable precision all, or virtually all, of the relevant circumstances surrounding his migration. These include what steps were taken, and by whom, at almost every stage of his migration at the age of eight years and four months until he was twenty one. As a result, much light has been thrown on the procedures of the County Tyrone Welfare Committee, the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the Australian immigration authorities. His case also provides an example of what could have been done by other institutions that sent children to Australia, such as Manor House, Lisburn, and the Sisters of Nazareth. For this reason we have examined the circumstances relating to the emigration of HIA 354 in detail.

52 Before doing so, it is appropriate to examine the attitude of the Northern Ireland Ministry of Home Affairs towards those children who were sent to Australia but who were privately placed in care, such as those from Manor House and the four Sisters of Nazareth homes in Northern Ireland. It appears the Northern Ireland Government chose not to include provisions in the 1950 Act which corresponded to those of the Children Act, 1948 (a Westminster statute which did not extend to Northern Ireland), and which would have enabled the Ministry to control any activities of voluntary organisations in connection with the emigration of children. The reason was that the Second Parliamentary Draftsman informed the Ministry of Home Affairs that the question of including similar provisions in the 1950 Act had been considered when the Bill was being drafted, and the view was taken that the control of emigration was a matter for the United Kingdom Government and that the Stormont Parliament had no power to legislate in the matter. We accept that the position at that time was that the Ministry of Home Affairs did not have any legal responsibility for the emigration of children who were in voluntary homes because those matters were legally the sole responsibility of the United Kingdom Government. There was therefore no legal duty on the Ministry of Home Affairs to inform itself about arrangements being made by voluntary organisations for the migration of children in their homes. Nor was there a legal duty on those voluntary organisations to inform the Ministry of any arrangements the organisation was making for the migration of children in its care.

53 However, even if such powers had been taken they may not have been exercised, because the Westminster Government did not make any regulations of that type under the legislation corresponding to the 1948 Act until 1982, when the Emigration of Children (Arrangements by Voluntary Organisations) Regulations, 1982[32] were made under section 62 (1), (2), and (3) of the Child Care Act 1980. Given that the United Kingdom Government did not consider it necessary to make regulations to enable it to control the arrangements for emigration by voluntary organisations for many years after the events with which this Inquiry is concerned, and as it was the almost invariable practice of the Northern Ireland Government to follow as closely as possible in every respect corresponding legislative and procedural processes being followed in England and Wales, it may well be that the Northern Ireland Government would never have utilised any such powers even if, contrary to the advice it had been given, it had enacted such provisions in the 1950 Act.

54 Nevertheless, despite the legal position, the Ministry of Home Affairs was well aware from several sources that the Sisters of Nazareth were sending children to Australia. First of all, the Roman Catholic body that was closely involved in arranging for children from Roman Catholic homes in Northern Ireland provided a great deal of information to the Ministry of Home Affairs when the secretary of the Australian Catholic Immigration Committee (ACIC) wrote to the Ministry in August 1949.[33] In the letter it was explained that whilst the Scottish Secretary of State would not normally consent unless the child was over ten, there were many children in Catholic homes in Northern Ireland whom the ACIC "would willingly place in the Australian homes", saying that Termonbacca "would like us to take about eighteen boys whose ages vary from two years to twelve." The writer commented that as all these children were privately placed she thought they would probably be available to go. She also said that other children from other homes might be sent in the future.

55 Enclosed with the letter was a copy of the ACIC's quarterly progress report relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland. This was a very detailed document,[34] and included information about the numbers of children sent from Roman Catholic homes in Scotland and Northern Ireland. It stated that by 1949, 63 children emigrated from Northern Ireland, thirteen of whom came from Nazareth House in Londonderry, 27 from Termonbacca, and 23 from Nazareth Lodge in Belfast. The Ministry of Home Affairs was therefore fully informed about several crucial matters: namely the number of children being sent from the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Northern Ireland; that some of the children were as young as two; and that the Scottish authorities would not normally agree to children younger than ten being sent.

56 In 1949 the views of the Northern Ireland Government were also sought by the Westminster Government about a query raised by the Australian Commonwealth Government concerning the provisions made in Australia for the guardianship of the children who were sent from the United Kingdom, and the meaning of the term '"guardian" in section 17 of the Children Act, 1948[35], one of the matters also raised in the letter from the secretary of the ACIC. The Ministry of Home Affairs decided they would apply the broader definition of "guardian" applied in England and Wales and not the limited Scottish view, as can be seen from a letter of 13 February 1950[36] in which it said that:

34 AUS 4078 to 4079.
35 AUS 4081-4083.
36 AUS 4089.

> "Our Children and Young Persons Bill will enable a Welfare Authority to procure, or assist in procuring, the emigration of any child in their care, but where the child is capable of giving his consent such consent will be necessary. Where the child is too young to form an opinion he must emigrate in company with a parent, guardian, or relative, or must be emigrating to join a parent, guardian, relative or friend. In all cases the parent's consent must, where practicable, be obtained and the Ministry's approval will also be necessary in each case. As regards children in training schools, the Managers may, with the child's consent and with the consent of the Ministry, arrange for his emigration, and must, where possible, consult with the child's parents."

The Ministry felt that should a limited definition of 'guardian' be applied then, as feared by the High Commissioner in Canberra:

> "...the consequences will be a virtual cessation of the migration to Australia, under the auspices of and for placement with voluntary child migration organisations approved by our respective governments, or children maintained whether wholly or partially by Local Authorities responsible to the Scottish Home Department."[37]

57 These communications from the Home Office and the ACIC were not the only sources of information available to the Ministry of Home Affairs about the scale of child migration connected with the Sisters of Nazareth. On 21 November 1955 Miss Forrest (one of the Ministry's inspectors of voluntary children's homes) reported on a visit to Nazareth Lodge, Belfast in which she referred to being told by the Mother Superior that the home was about to send 23 children to Australia, and possibly another 20. In the event, it seems that no children were sent from Nazareth Lodge in 1955, because the information provided to the Inquiry by the Sisters of Nazareth (and we will comment upon the reliability of that evidence later) suggests that the next group of children who went after November 1955 consisted of one boy from Nazareth Lodge who went on 21 September 1956, followed by thirteen who went on 24 December 1956. It would seem that, for whatever reason, Nazareth Lodge did not send as many children as it had contemplated in November 1955.

58 The significance of the cumulative effect of these sources of information is that they show that for several years the Ministry of Home Affairs was well aware that significant numbers of young children were being sent to Australia by the Sisters of Nazareth in Northern Ireland. There was also considerable information in the public domain to suggest that very young children were being sent, because it was well publicised at the time that children were being sent from Northern Ireland to Australia. For example, a picture in the Derry Journal of 2 August 1947 shows a group of boys from Termonbacca ready to leave for Australia. When they arrived in Australia considerable publicity was given to their arrival, which was recorded on newsreel films and in Australian newspapers. The practice of child migration from Northern Ireland was therefore widely known, and, so far as the Inquiry is aware, did not result in any adverse comment in Northern Ireland at the time.

59 The Inquiry has found no evidence to show that the Ministry was aware that children had been sent from non-Roman Catholic homes, such as Manor House, Lisburn.

60 Given that the Ministry was alerted to the practice of voluntary homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Northern Ireland sending children to Australia on a significant scale over a number of years, ought it to have made efforts to find out more information about those being sent, such as their ages? After all, the Minister had been advised that his consent should be refused when it was required in respect of children who were in care and who were under twelve years of age, and in the light of the information they had, should the Minister and the Ministry not have taken steps to inform themselves more fully of the circumstances of children being sent by voluntary institutions, even though the Minister had no responsibility for those institutions, in order to see whether the standards being applied to the emigration of children by those institutions were no less stringent than those he applied to the children in care who were his responsibility? Was it sufficient for the Northern Ireland Government to leave the matter purely in the hands of the United Kingdom Government? After all, a memorandum of 2 January 1950 pointed out that the scheme was "being worked mainly through the Roman Catholic voluntary homes here in Northern Ireland", and after referring to the decision not to seek power to control child migration by voluntary organisations, the writer observed "the whole question is more likely to arise in connection with voluntary organisations than in relation to children in the care of Welfare Authorities."[38]

61 In her oral evidence on Day 223 on behalf of the Department of Health (the successor of the DHSSPS by this time), Dr Harrison explained that the concessions made by the Department had been agreed by the First Minister and deputy First Minister on behalf of the Executive. Dr Harrison dealt with this issue at 7.12:

> "The migration of children was an initiative of the UK Government and there was no evidence to suggest that MoHA or the Executive Committee of the Privy Council (the Northern Ireland governing body) were involved in the establishment of such schemes. Nevertheless MoHA and members of the Northern Ireland Cabinet were aware of their existence and operation in Northern Ireland. The Department has already conceded that the migration of children was a misguided policy. The Department has stated to the HIAI that it fully endorsed the Prime Minister's apology and acknowledgments in this matter."[39]

62 We consider that the Department's acceptance that the child migration policy was misguided, and the endorsement of the Prime Minister's apology and acknowledgements do not constitute a clear admission by the Department that there was a systemic failing by the Northern Ireland government of the time in its attitude to child migration. We are satisfied that the Ministry of Home Affairs was content to leave matters in the hands of both the United Kingdom Government and Roman Catholic organisations, and was indifferent to what the Roman Catholic or other voluntary organisations were doing. Although, as we have said earlier, the Northern Ireland Government did not have a responsibility towards those children who were in voluntary care, whether the children were in the care of statutory bodies or voluntary organisations they were Northern Ireland children, and it is our firm view that the Northern Ireland Government was therefore under a moral responsibility to ensure that such children were treated by voluntary organisations in the same way as those children for whom it had statutory responsibility. We consider that this indifference was unjustified, and that the Northern Ireland Government ought to have taken steps to fully inform itself as to what was happening once it became aware that significant numbers of such young children were being sent to Australia by voluntary organisations such as the Sisters of Nazareth. We regard its failure to do so as a systemic failing on its part.

63 Although primary responsibility for sending children in voluntary care to Australia must rest with the Australian and United Kingdom Governments for encouraging, permitting and facilitating this, with the voluntary organisations concerned that sent the children, and with the Australian organisations that encouraged Northern Ireland organisations to send children to them, the Northern Ireland Government cannot escape a degree of responsibility for what happened, because there is no evidence to suggest that the Northern Ireland Government took any steps to satisfy itself that the children it had approved for child migration were being properly looked after in Australia, let alone that it concerned itself with the children sent by the Sisters of Nazareth.

64 The attitude of the Northern Ireland Government is in contrast to the actions of the Scottish Home Department and the United Kingdom Government. In 1950 the Scottish authorities sent Miss H.R. Harrison to inspect homes in Australia, although she thought Bindoon "the best of the RC Homes she has ever visited".[40] In the light of such comments, and the qualified approval contained in the Moss Report there is no reason to suppose that an inspector from Northern Ireland would have formed a different view of the circumstances in Australia at that time. However, we regard the failure of the Northern Ireland Government to make any enquiries whatever as to the fate of these children, whether of the authorities in London or Australia, as further evidence of its complete indifference to their welfare. We regard this as a further systemic failing on its part. As we shall see, it was not until the end of 1956 when the Home Office sent the Ross report that the Northern Ireland Government appears to have given any thought to the issue, and by then the last children had sailed.

65 In our view, the Northern Ireland Government should have taken greater steps to inform itself of what was happening. If it had done so, it is hard to see how it could have failed to have become aware how many children from Northern Ireland were being sent to Australia when they were of an age at which the Government would normally refuse to consent to their emigration had the children been in statutory and not in voluntary care. In those circumstances we consider that it should have made vigorous representations to the United Kingdom Government to prevent this practice, and not remain indifferent to the practice. We consider the failure of the Northern Ireland Government to take the steps we have described amounts to a systemic failure on its part.

The experience of HIA 354 and the lessons to be learnt from that 66 Reference has already been made to the evidence of applicant HIA 354. His evidence, and the voluminous documentary material which has been provided to the Inquiry in relation to these matters, is of considerable importance for a number of reasons, not all of which are directly connected with the circumstances of his own case. However, in order to fully appreciate these considerations it is necessary to set out in some detail the chronology of events, and the background circumstances, of HIA 354 and his siblings. These can be conveniently divided into a number of stages, with the first stage relating to the events leading up to his emigration to Australia.

(1) HIA 354 was a seven-year-old boy who had a younger brother (AU 98) and a younger sister (AU 99) who were orphaned when their mother died in August 1949. All three were then taken into care by Tyrone Welfare Committee (TWC).

(2) Each of the three children had health problems, and although HIA 354 was cleared, at the time he was taken into care his younger brother AU 98 was in Crawfordsburn hospital (the headquarters of the Northern Ireland Tuberculosis Authority). HIA 354 and his sister AU 99 had been taken to Tower Hill hospital, Armagh where they remained until November 1949 when they were amongst the first children to be placed in Coneywarren children's home. On 28 September 1950, AU 98 was admitted to Coneywarren from Crawfordsburn. His sister AU 99 remained in Coneywarren with him until she was boarded out with a foster mother on 9 February 1951. AU 98 was discharged from Coneywarren later that month and boarded out with foster parents in Co. Londonderry.

(3) HIA 354 and his sister AU 99 had therefore been together in Coneywarren for some seven months before HIA 354 was boarded out to his foster parents in Donemana. AU 98 did not enter Coneywarren until 28 September 1950 and so at the very most would have had recent contact with his brother for about a month before HIA 354 went to Australia, although it is not clear from the documents produced to the Inquiry whether any contact took place. None of these matters were made known to the Ministry by TWC.

(4) On 3 July 1950 HIA 354 was boarded out for a three-month trial period with a family in Donemana, Co. Tyrone, who had hoped to adopt a six-year-old boy. For some reason that arrangement had fallen through.[41] AU 99's foster mother was the sister of the foster mother of AU 98, and AU 99 was later boarded out to a foster mother who lived on the same country lane as the foster parents of HIA 354.[42]

(5) By the time HIA 354 was fostered out the Tyrone Welfare Officer was already considering HIA 354 as a possible candidate to go to Dhurringle in Australia. The County Welfare Officer (CWO) said, "being an Australian myself and being intimately acquainted with the Fairbridge Farm School projects, I can appreciate what this opportunity might mean to an orphan boy".[43] He pointed out that the child was in a Presbyterian foster home, and the Presbyterian minister consulted felt that "migration to Australia may afford [HIA 354] more opportunity that [sic] he would have in County Tyrone."

(6) It is noteworthy that it was recorded at the time that "in regard to separating the family, [the Presbyterian minister] feels that the brother's and sister's health condition is such, that it might never be possible to re-unite them".[44]

(7) On 10 July 1950 the CWO wrote to the Reverend Boag, the representative of Dhurringle in Scotland, suggesting that HIA 354 would be a suitable child to send to Dhurringle.[45]

(8) On 17 July 1950 the TWC agreed that the CWO could pursue enquiries regarding the possibility of HIA 354 emigrating.[46]

(9) On 21 July 1950 the foster mother was informed that HIA 354 had to undergo an intelligence test.

(10) On 27 July 1950 HIA 354 underwent an Intelligence Quotient (IQ) test administered by a local doctor,[47] and that record survives.[48]

(11) On August 1950 the CWO wrote to the Ministry of Home Affairs giving brief details of the background of HIA 354 and asking whether the Ministry would approve of the Tyrone Welfare Committee recommending HIA 354 for the migration scheme.[49]

(12) This application was carefully considered by the relevant officials in the Ministry, and a recommendation was made to the Minister of Home Affairs on 9 August 1950 that the Minister should refuse to agree to the proposal. Two passages from that memorandum are worthy of quotation. After referring to the relevant statutory provisions, and in particular section 111 (5) of the 1950 Act, the writer continued "a child of eight years of age is obviously too young to form or express a proper opinion on the advantages or disadvantages of emigration. In the circumstances the Section would appear to debar any prospect of emigration in this case for the present".

(13) The writer then referred to representatives of Dhurringle Training Farm recently approaching welfare authorities in Northern Ireland, stating that it was possible that other requests for information may be received from welfare authorities:

> "Whilst it is difficult to say that what age any particular child may reach the stage of mental development at which he is capable of forming a proper judgement on such a question, it is unlikely that such a stage would be reached before the age of twelve years at the earliest. I think, therefore, that unless the conditions laid down in paragraph (sic) 111 (5) are satisfied we should not agree to the emigration of any child under that age."

(14) A note on that memorandum records that the Minister was spoken to about this matter, and continues:

> "The Minister agrees generally. As it would probably be in the interests of the child (illegible) if he could emigrate under a scheme sponsored by a responsible body such as the Presbyterian Church he would be prepared to approve if a responsible officer or agent of the managing body of the Farm could assume guardianship of the child or other reasonable arrangements made for travel and subsequent care."[50]

49 AUS 11259.

(15) The Ministry replied to the CWO on 19 August 1950 observing that:

> "the position of orphanage children who are too young to be able to form a proper opinion as to the advantages and disadvantages of emigration is one which has given rise to some concern to the Ministry. Where, however, it is obviously in the interests of any child that he should be allowed to emigrate and satisfactory arrangements can be made for safeguarding the child's interests, the Ministry will not raise any objection to his emigrating under a scheme conducted by a reputable organisation."[51]

(16) On 13 September 1950 the Tyrone children's officer took HIA 354 to Tyrone County hospital where the child was examined for the presence of tuberculosis and cleared. On the same day the children's officer took HIA 354 back to his foster parents' home at Donemana, "and discussed privately with [the foster mother] the proposed migration of this boy. While if selected, she will be sorry to lose [HIA 354] but realises the opportunities he will be afforded in Australia."[52]

(17) On 18 September 1950 the TWC gave final approval to his emigration subject to his being accepted on the scheme.[53]

(18) On 5 October 1950 HIA 354 was interviewed by the representative of the Australian migration authorities at the Omagh office of the Ministry of Labour and National Insurance. The note made of that visit is revealing:

> "[HIA 354] was today interviewed by Mr. Hill representative of Australian Government. The boy was very shy, and would not talk freely."[54]

He was then accepted for the scheme.

(19) On 31 October the necessary instructions and documents for HIA 354 to sail from Liverpool on 7 November 1950 were received in Omagh.[55]

(20) On 1 November 1950 the divisional children's officer of TWC called with the foster family to collect clothing and other articles relating to HIA 354 in preparation for his forthcoming migration. The note of that visit reads:

> "There was an air of depression and deep resentment in the [foster family] home at the removal of the boy, and all I could say, was that the decision to send the boy abroad was taken, after long and most careful consideration."
> "The decision would prove to be the right one, while the opportunity, from the point of the boy's future was too good to be overlooked".[56]

(21) HIA 354 recalls that he then went to Manor House, Lisburn where he stayed until he and other children were taken to the boat in England.

(22) There can be no doubt that the foster family decided that they wished to keep HIA 354 with them at a very late stage indeed. On 2 November 1950 the husband of the foster family, accompanied by a local Presbyterian minister, called at the County Welfare Committee and asked if arrangements could be made for the adoption of HIA 354. The divisional children's officer reported:

> "I have been requested by [foster father] to call at his house today but I prefer to wait until this matter blows over."

(23) There the matter appears to have rested, and on 7 November 1950 HIA 354 sailed for Australia in the company of several other boys from Northern Ireland.[57]

(24) Two further matters are relevant. The first is that HIA 354 kept in touch with his foster parents in succeeding years. The second is that, as Mr. O'Reilly on behalf of the DHSS&PS pointed out in his closing submissions, "two of the foster families were living almost directly opposite one another, and in the case of a third child the mother in that family was the sister of the mother in one of the other families."[58]

67 Several aspects of this sequence of events cause us considerable concern. Firstly, Tyrone Welfare Committee did not inform the Minister that HIA 354 had two younger siblings who were in their care. Given that one of the matters that the Minister was required to consider under section 111 (5) of the 1950 Act before giving his consent was whether the child was to emigrate "for the purpose of joining ...a relative", it must have been apparent to the CWO that this child being put forward for emigration had a younger brother and a younger sister in the care of his Committee. Had the Minister been told that, then he would have had to have taken into account that if he gave his consent to HIA 354 being sent to Australia that would result in the child being separated from his siblings. The failure of the CWO to inform the Ministry of these matters is all the more surprising given that he had discussed with a Presbyterian minister that if HIA 354 were to be sent for migration then it could lead to the permanent separation of HIA 354 from his brother and sister.

56 AUS 11654.
58 Day 50, 15 September, 2015, p.305.

68 The second is that the foster parents of the two siblings were both geographically and in terms of family connections closely connected with HIA 354's foster parents, circumstances that were also of considerable importance.

69 Thirdly, it is arguable that the Minister stretched the definition of "guardian" to include the body responsible for Dhurringle, but as against that it was clearly the policy of the United Kingdom Government to regard the Australian authorities as being the guardian once a child arrived in Australia and that position was a valid one.

70 Fourthly, we are firmly of the view that at that time it was wrong for the Minister to approve an eight-year-old child for emigration to Australia where he had no relatives or friends with whom he could live, but would live in an institution there, no matter how advantageous that course of action may have been thought to be for the child at the time. The Minister's decision flew in the face of the advice of the officials of his own Ministry, and was at variance with the practice in Scotland where the Scottish authorities would not consider a child so young. These were not isolated views, because as long ago as 1928 the view was taken by Belfast Corporation that it could not countenance the emigration of a child in its care under the age of sixteen, save in exceptional circumstances. The Minister's decision was therefore contrary to a substantial body of advice and professional opinion.

71 The next matter is that it is apparent that the Tyrone Welfare Committee did not inform the Ministry of the approach by the foster family to adopt HIA 354. This appears to have been a last minute change of attitude on the part of the foster parents, and no doubt it would have been administratively extremely awkward if it had been accepted, probably resulting in wasted time, medical fees, and money spent on fitting out the boy for his new life. Nevertheless, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that Tyrone Welfare Committee officers had formed the view that it was in the best interests of HIA 354 to go to Australia as they had arranged, and were not prepared to countenance any change of circumstances at such a late stage.

72 In her statement to the Inquiry, Fionnula McAndrew said on behalf of the HSCB (as the successor body to Tyrone Welfare Committee) that there is no evidence to suggest that this last minute approach was given due consideration.[59] However, we consider that the matter goes further than that, and as Dr. Harrison conceded[60] in her statement on behalf of the DHSSPS, "the record of the visit would indicate that the Welfare Committee was determined that the request would not be further pursued." We are satisfied that the officials of the Tyrone Welfare Committee did consider the matter, and decided to go ahead and send HIA 354 to Australia, notwithstanding that there was a very late proposal for adoption, which, if it had been properly considered, could well have resulted in three children being kept close together in Northern Ireland. We regard this as only one of several systemic failings in the way that HIA 354's case was dealt with by both the Tyrone Welfare Committee and the Ministry of Home Affairs. The others are set out in the next three paragraphs.

73 Tyrone Welfare Committee did not tell the Ministry of the existence of HIA 354's siblings, thereby depriving the Minister of important and relevant information which should have been before him in order that he could make a proper and informed decision as to whether or not to give his consent to the child's emigration. Whilst of course it is to some extent speculative whether the Minister's decision would have been any different had he had this information, nevertheless it might well have been.

74 Tyrone Welfare Committee did not tell the Ministry of the approach made by the foster family to adopt this child. We regard this to be a systemic failing on the part of the Welfare Committee. Although the approach was made at a very late stage, nevertheless there remained about a week before the anticipated sailing date, and so there was ample time in which to inform the Ministry of this new development and seek the views of the Minister accordingly.

59 AUS 5994.

75 The Minister was wrong to take the view that it was appropriate to send a child of eight to Australia in the particular circumstances relating to HIA 354 because the Minister ought to have taken the view that no child of that age could be expected to form, or express, a proper opinion on the advantages or disadvantages of emigration. Indeed it is noteworthy that so far as the Inquiry can ascertain on no other occasion did a Minister of Home Affairs give approval for the emigration of such a young child where that approval was required. The decision by the Minister reflected a policy that it was appropriate to send a child of eight to Australia. We regard that policy as a systemic failing.

76 The second stage of the history of HIA 354 consists of his experiences on the voyage from England to Australia. Two experiences are relevant. Despite being only eight he was made take part with other boys in a boxing match for the entertainment of the passengers. On crossing the Equator he was tipped backwards into a tub of water, this apparently being a traditional type of ceremony for those who cross the Equator for the first time, but an experience he found extremely frightening.[61]

77 The third stage commences with his arrival at Melbourne, Australia on 15 December 1950, from where he travelled to Dhurringle. As we have already explained, the Inquiry does not have power to examine his experiences in Australia. For those who wish to consider them, they may be found in his statement and in his evidence to the Inquiry.[62]

78 The next relevant development did not concern HIA 354 directly but concerned AU 98, his younger brother, because in 1952 TWC considered whether AU 98 should be sent to Australia to join his brother at Dhurringle. In the event this suggestion never came to fruition because of concerns about the health of AU 98, and when his health improved some years later he was boarded out with foster parents in Co. Londonderry. The suggestion that AU 98 be considered for emigration to Australia to join his brother shows that TWC was prepared to reunite the two brothers, although that would have meant depriving AU 98 of the possibility of future contact with his sister AU 99 because she was not being considered for emigration and would remain in Northern Ireland.[63] It is clear that it was the Committee's intention that when AU 98 attained the age of eight years "he should if possible, join his brother at Dhurringle Training Farm School".[64]

62 Day 44, 3 September 2014.

79 The proposal to send AU 98 to Dhurringle was significant for another reason, because the CWO reported to the Children's Committee of the County Welfare Committee on 1 September 1952 that:

> "…it was decided to make tentative arrangements for [AU 98] to rejoin his brother [HIA 354] at the County Dhurringle Farm Training Centre in Australia but that since then, by indirect manner [the County Welfare Officer] had learned of rather disquieting reports considering the unhappiness of the boys there. He stated that he had written to the Supervisor of the Centre and also to some personal contacts in Australia and that he awaited replies. In the circumstances, it was agreed to defer further arrangements in regard to the migration of [AU 98]."[65]

80 As a result of this "disquieting report" the CWO sought information on HIA 354 from the Presbyterian Church authorities in Australia, and received reassuring reports to the effect that the complaints had been made by a homesick boy within a few days of his arrival, and were trivial.[66] The letter was received on 2 September 1952. However the CWO had made private enquiries through Mr J.T. Massey OBE, a friend who was the National General Secretary of the Committee of the YMCAs of Australia. Mr. Massey's response was that so far as he could gather the conditions in Dhurringle:

> "compare quite favourably with other similar Institutions being run by various Churches. My impression is that it is not as far advanced as some others, e.g. Methodist Church Tally - Home Scheme, but I know of no reason why a boy should not have a great opportunity as a result of attending the school."[67]

81 As that letter was dated 9 October it would not have been available to the CWO, (although the letter of 2 September which has been referred to would have been available to him) when the Reverend A. Bell made a presentation to TWC on 6 October 1952. To judge by the minute of the meeting, his presentation received a polite but non-committal response.[68] It seems likely from the absence of any further reference to these concerns that they must have been allayed by both the official and unofficial responses to the enquiries made by the CWO.

82 The proposal to send AU 98 to Australia was dropped because of his health, but we consider it significant that the suggestion that AU 98 be sent to Australia was not well received by his foster mother, nor by the Co. Londonderry Welfare Committee. Its CWO pointed out that AU 98 was living near his sister AU 99 "who could not go to Dhurringle" (presumably because that was an all boys institution). Co Londonderry also criticised Tyrone because no indication had been given to his foster mother that the boy might be sent to Australia when she had taken him, nor had they discussed with her beforehand that they were now considering sending him to Australia to join his brother. Not surprisingly, the foster mother was extremely upset when she learnt of this plan. We consider the relevance of this to be that it is a further indication that the Tyrone Welfare Committee did not give any, or at least proper, weight to the desirability of keeping as many of the children of this family together as possible.

83 The third stage of the history of HIA 354 relates to the efforts of TWC to keep in touch with him in Australia. An initial report from Dhurringle was received in September 1951, but although further letters were sent on 11 June 1952, 8 July 1952 and 14 August 1952, no replies were received. At the same time, steps were being put in hand to send AU 98 to Dhurringle and although there was a response to a separate letter of 11 June 1952 containing some information from the Reverend Boag, who said he had asked the Superintendent of Dhurringle to send an official report[69], it would seem that no such report was sent.

84 Despite the lack of further information it would appear that no further enquiries were made about HIA 354 until 1956. During that time HIA 354 has said he and his sister wrote to each other every couple of months[70] and this would appear to be confirmed by a reference in a letter of 7 September 1956[71] to AU 99 being "terribly disappointed at

68 AUS 11293.
69 AUS 11759.
70 AUS 11249.
71 AUS 11435.

not receiving a letter from him since March 1956". Therefore, whilst HIA 354 only wrote to his brother once or twice, there does appear to have been a much greater and continuing level of correspondence between himself and his sister.

85 The letter of September 1956 from the Children's Officer of TWC was to the secretary of the Department of Social Service, which was the body of the Presbyterian Church in Australia responsible for Dhurringle. She requested a full report on HIA 354 and a photograph. She also said that if she did not hear from the Department she "would be forced to take the matter up with the High Commissioner".[72] This letter had the desired effect because a detailed report dated 20 September 1956 was received. Although this letter suggested that the previous superintendent may have failed to deal with the earlier letters, as the writer had been in post since 1954 he did not explain why he had not followed his professed practice of sending six monthly reports on HIA 354 as he said he did in respect of other boys sent by overseas organisations. Thereafter detailed progress reports about HIA 354 were sent by Dhurringle to TWC on a regular basis until he reached the age of twenty one and so ceased to be their responsibility.[73]

86 We have set out this stage of HIA 354's history at length because it shows what could be done by a welfare committee, and therefore by another body with the will and the means to do so, to keep in touch with the children it had sent abroad, and to ensure that siblings or other family members who tried to do so could maintain contact with those children who had been sent to Australia.

87 Whilst Tyrone Welfare Committee's efforts to get information about HIA 354 were commendable in virtually every respect, it must be noted that the records suggest that it did not take any steps to get information between the cessation of letters in 1952 for four years until further correspondence was initiated by it in 1956. Had the determined and successful course of threatening to write to the High Commissioner been attempted earlier then that gap might not have occurred. Although we consider that the gap should not have happened, nevertheless it seems to be the position that during the gap Tyrone Welfare Committee was aware HIA 354 was in regular contact with his sister AU 99, and so we do not consider that this lapse on the part of the Tyrone Welfare Committee, whilst significant, should be regarded as a systemic failing by it in view of its other efforts.

88 The history of HIA 354 also throws light on the approach of the Ministry of Home Affairs to the question of child migration initiated by county welfare committees, and enables us to see almost the entire administrative process involved in child migration. We have already considered some of these in preceding paragraphs, but others that are of wider significance to issues which we will examine later can be summarised as follows:

(1) He underwent a formal interview with an Australian immigration officer.

(2) He was examined as to both his physical and intellectual capacities, something that was organised at the insistence of the Australian authorities.

(3) Those, such as his brother AU 98, who did not come up to the physical and intellectual standards required by the Australian authorities were rejected.

(4) In the case of Dhurringle regular reports on the children would be sent to the organisation which had sent the children to their care in Australia.

(5) If such reports were not sent back, then the sending organisation was able to pursue that information, and, if information was received, pass it onto the siblings or other family members.

(6) Direct contact between the child and its siblings in Northern Ireland was certainly feasible, and facilitated by Dhurringle at least, as a normal procedure.

Irish Church Missions

89 The Society for Irish Church Missions (previously known as the Irish Church Mission to the Roman Catholics) is a society run by clergy and laity of the Church of Ireland within the wider Anglican communion, and although its principal address is in Northern Ireland, its registered office is in England. For many years until 1984 the Irish Church Missions (ICM) ran a children's home in Lisburn, Co. Antrim, known as Manor House. In the 1940s and 1950s Manor House was attached to the Church of Ireland Parish of Christ Church, Lisburn, and as appears elsewhere in this Report the way in which Manor House was run has been investigated by the Inquiry. The ICM published a magazine called

The Banner of the Truth in Ireland and reference will be made to this, and to written submissions made to the Inquiry by the ICM. The ICM did not appear, nor was it represented, during the hearing of the second module dealing with Australia, although it was informed of the dates on which evidence would be given relating to it, and when it could make any further submissions.

90 The connection of the ICM with the child migrant scheme is twofold. In November 1950 seven boys from Manor House accompanied HIA 354, as did two other child migrants who were sent to Australia by the County Londonderry Welfare Committee. These may well have been AU 110 and AU 111 referred to above. In 1969 three more boys from Manor House emigrated to Australia. These were HIA 365, HIA 290 and their half brother AU 83. HIA 365 and his twin brother HIA 290 were fourteen and nine months of age when they emigrated, and AU 83 was thirteen. These three children migrated with their father at his request, and in view of that, and the fact that they were in their teens, the Inquiry has not considered their experiences as child migrants. However, HIA 365 and HIA 290 made serious allegations about the way they were treated as children in Manor House and these are considered elsewhere in the section of the Report relating to Manor House.

91 Although a minute of the proceedings of the committee of the ICM written in the 1960s said that six boys went from Manor House, this is inaccurate. Both the June 1951 issue of The Banner of the Truth in Ireland,[74] and a committee minute of 2 November 1950[75] both say that seven boys went, and that it is confirmed by the passenger manifest which records that seven boys were sent by the home. Two of the seven boys are applicants to the Inquiry. HIA 341 was nine years and six months of age when he was sent, and HIA 346 was eight years and ten months of age when he was sent.

92 HIA 346 described how he was in Manor House from the age of six, having been placed there at the time by his unmarried mother. Although he describes her as visiting him regularly at the home, the consent form in his case was signed by the matron of the home on 20 July 1950. He claims that his mother, who married on 2 July 1949, told him in later life that when she and her husband came to Manor House to take him home, she was told that he had been adopted by a wealthy family in

Dublin.[76] In his written statement HIA 346 described how he obtained his school records, which he said showed that he was taken out of school for a period of about one month. He believes that that was when his mother, her husband and her stepchildren came to the home to collect him. However, the Inquiry has been informed that the school records no longer exist and therefore this cannot be confirmed.

93 The mother of HIA 341 did give consent to his being sent.[77] If his mother did visit regularly it might be thought that Manor House may have been able to contact her to ask whether she did consent, but it may be that they could not contact her, and since HIA 341's mother did consent we cannot be satisfied that Manor House did not try to contact HIA 346's mother.

94 Although the surviving migration records suggest that both underwent medical examinations, neither can recall these. The ICM has no records relating to interviews by the migration authorities of either child, or of either child being made to sit intelligence tests of any sort. However, given that the Inquiry is satisfied that these steps were normally carried out, it may well be that they did undergo some form of intelligence assessment. If so, it is not surprising that neither applicant can recall any such event, which would have occurred when they were eight and nine years of age respectively.

95 HIA 346 alleges that on the voyage he was kept short of food,[78] and whilst HIA 341 does not allege that he was kept short of food or ill-treated on the voyage, it should be noted that HIA 354 says he was made to box against his will on the same voyage.[79]

96 In later years both applicants had considerable difficulty establishing contact with their parents. HIA 341 did write to Manor House in the early 1960s in an effort to contact his mother and the Manor House authorities replied saying that they had not been able to trace her. Fortunately, HIA 341 was able to trace his mother by using a genealogist he employed for that purpose. HIA 346 did not try to find out any information about his family until many years later, when he was reunited with his mother through the efforts of the Child Migrants Trust.

97 We accept that the various preliminary procedures that have already been described in respect of HIA 354 were probably carried out for HIA 341 and 346 because all three were sent to Australia on the same boat, and it appears likely that the elaborate procedures applied to HIA 354 at the insistence of the Australian migration authorities were applied to HIA 341 and HIA 346 as well.

98 We are satisfied that Irish Church Missions were guilty of a systemic failing in sending children of this age to Australia. Whilst we accept they took the view that the children would have greater opportunities in Australia than they had in prospect in Northern Ireland, nevertheless it was wrong to send children of that age to Australia, even where, as in the case of HIA 341, a child's mother gave consent, because we are satisfied that the initiative for the child being sent came not from the mother but from the ICM.

99 HIA 346 said that he received no communication from Manor House after he left in 1950. Apart from a report in 1951,[80] it would seem that no information was received on these boys until 1961 when a letter came from Dhurringle.[81] No evidence has been provided to us to suggest that ICM took any steps to keep in touch with their children in Australia for a decade after they were sent. The information they received in 1961 was sent from Australia, and not sought by them. We are satisfied that ICM failed to make sufficient efforts to stay in touch with the children in later years, and consider that this failure amounts to a systemic failing on their part.

100 HIA 346 said that when his mother asked for him later she was told that he had been adopted by a wealthy family in Dublin. We consider him to be a reliable witness, and we accept that his mother was misled in this way. We also regard this as a systemic failing on the part of ICM.

The Sisters of Nazareth

101 The Sisters of Nazareth were involved with child migration well before the children who are being considered by this Inquiry were sent to Australia. It appears that they sent children to Canada in or before the 1920s. In 1923 the General Chapter considered an approach from a Major Macaulay who suggested that the Sisters might send children aged about twelve to Australia. This proposal was put before the General Chapter by the Mother General. She suggested that if the children were to be sent they should go to Brisbane in Queensland after a suitable arrangement had been made with "Archbishop Duhig, who is also anxious for Catholic girls to go there." The General Chapter agreed that the scheme would be a good thing and it is recorded that "the scheme would need to be well thought out."[82]

80 AUS 11063.

102 A further discussion took place at a General Chapter in 1925. The Mother General referred to the earlier approach two years before, and it would seem that in the intervening period someone from the Order had visited Australia and spoken to Archbishop Duhig, "who not only approved of and encouraged the proposal but was prepared to get a hostel for them, but this we shall not require as we have now a large house in Brisbane." The proposal was to send out about 20 girls "from 12 to 16 years old." Queensland was favoured because it "is a very Catholic State and considered the best for our girls." They would be sent to the Sisters' home in Brisbane in the first instance "where they could help with the work and be trained more or less for situations for about two years or so. There are much better openings for girls in Australia than at home, and as a rule, they get on better."[83]

103 The Sisters were clearly anxious about the way children would be selected to be sent because the minutes continue:

> "Care must be taken in the selection of these children so as to send out sensible, well developed healthy girls who are likely to turn out well, otherwise they may not get a good name for Nazareth House and we may not be able to continue sending them."

The minutes refer to the availability of assisted fares, children under twelve going free and those over twelve for £5 10s each. The majority approved of the scheme "if it could be worked out – it would help to spread Catholicity." One superior remarked that sending out children to Canada through the Catholic Emigration Society was very satisfactory.

104 The matter was considered again at a General Chapter in 1928, and it would seem that a number of girls had been sent in the intervening period of time, as the minutes record:

> "Reports very satisfactory of girls who had emigrated under the care of our Sisters, and being received in our house at Brisbane. The > Bishop there is very interested in the scheme. A site for a new foundation has been procured in Melbourne, this house might be used to receive children emigrated from the Home houses."

82 AUS 5386.

The same minute refers favourably to reports of the children who had emigrated to Canada under the care of the Catholic Rescue Society, saying that "Reports of these children are good and the supervision exercised over them in Canada is highly satisfactory."[84]

105 The matter seems to have rested there until 1938 when a fresh approach was made to the Mother General about a scheme for the emigration of boys to Western Australia. The History of Foundations provided by the Sisters of Nazareth records that on this occasion the scheme was for the emigration of boys to Western Australia under the auspices of the British Government, the Commonwealth and State governments. The records state that "Rev Brother Conlon of the Christian [Brothers] Schools was the chief organiser." Other entries in the History of Foundation describe boys being hurriedly selected and sailing on 8 July, apparently arriving in Australia on 9 August. There were 25 boys in the first party, and another party of about 30 went in the week of 16 July. It appears that one boy from Nazareth House Belfast was included in a further group as he is recorded by the Sisters as sailing on 29 August 1938. Two boys from Termonbacca sailed on 17 February 1939. The Australian Senate Report records that in 1938, 68 boys and one girl were sent by the Sisters, and in 1939 46 boys were sent.[85] Therefore three of these boys were sent by the Sisters from Northern Ireland to Australia before the outbreak of the Second World War brought this scheme to a rapid end.

106 The initiative for British Catholic children to be sent to Australia came from the Christian Brothers in Australia. In Changing Times Changing Needs A History of the Catholic Children's Society (Westminster) (2009) Jim Hyland states that the Christian Brothers made a plea for 100 English Catholic boys to be sent to the newly established farm school set up by the Christian Brothers in Western Australia, and that when the approach was made in 1938 Cardinal Hinsley, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster at the time, and the Catholic Emigration Association "agreed reluctantly to support the idea." Hyland reports that in 1938 the Christian Brothers were approached by the London County Council with a request to establish a scheme for girls, and that it was hoped that the Sisters of Nazareth would run a project for girls in one of their Western Australia projects, which they later did.

85 Senate Report 2.52.

107 Hyland quotes a letter from Canon Craven, the Administrator of the (Catholic) Crusade of Rescue, written in 1939 to Bishop (later Cardinal) Griffin of Father Hudson's Society in Birmingham (a society of which Bishop Griffin had been Administrator). Canon Craven said that whilst he supported the plans:

> "I should myself have been very much opposed to girls going out simply to be trained for domestic service and I ought to tell you that the [London County Council] were absolutely opposed to such a scheme. They are afraid, like myself, that it would mean using poor girls as drudges on farms and in the towns. This we must certainly prevent."[86]

Hyland records that:

> "It was agreed by the Bishops of England and Wales in February 1939 that the Catholic Child Welfare Committees (CCWC) of which the Crusade of Rescue was a member should have exclusive control and management of the emigration and settlement of all children up to the age of seventeen. The outbreak of World War II put an end to all such activity until 1945."[87]

The Role of the Roman Catholic authorities in arranging post-war child migration

108 There can be no doubt that the Roman Catholic bishops in Australia, and in Western Australia in particular, were extremely anxious to encourage the migration of Roman Catholic children to Australia before and after the Second World War. Archbishop Redmond Prendiville was the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Perth at the time. In 1947 when welcoming the first group of 147 Catholic child migrants to arrive in Perth after the resumption of child migration following the end of the Second World War he is reported to have said that "At a time when empty cradles are contributing to empty spaces, it is necessary to look for external sources of supply."[88] Hyland records[89] that in May 1945 Archbishop 88 The Record, 25 September, 1947. The Record described itself as the "Official Organ of the Archdiocese of Perth".

89 Hyland, Changing Times Changing Needs, p.75.

Prendiville wrote to Cardinal Griffin seeking the Cardinal's agreement to restarting child migration. As can be seen from a booklet published by the Christian Brothers publicising the schemes which they ran in Western Australia, the Archbishop publicly commended the Christian Brothers for their efforts, saying:

> "I wholeheartedly commend the proposal to arrange for the reception of children from the United Kingdom at the Institutions in Western Australia and commend the Catholic Episcopal Migration and Welfare Association which is to arrange and control the migration scheme."[90]

109 Hyland also records that in May 1946 Cardinal Griffin wrote to Canon Craven at the Crusade of Rescue "about the pressure he was having from the Church in Australia and suggesting a meeting of the Catholic Child Welfare Council to discuss the issue." Significantly, in the light of what the Inquiry heard about the experiences of many of those children who were sent to Australia by the Sisters of Nazareth, Hyland continues:

> "The Cardinal also refers in his letter to 'adverse reports' about Australia of which he thought Brother Conlon, of the Australian Christian Brothers schools should be made aware. Canon Craven replied that he was not aware of such reports but agreed that if they existed Brother Conlon should be told about them. He added that he believed that before any further migration of children began the whole issue needed to be explored on the spot in Australia."[91]

110 At the subsequent meeting of the CCWC it was noted that the Australian Government was seeking 70,000 migrants a year, of whom they expected 17,000 would be children. Hyland states "They agreed that someone from the Council should visit Australia before resuming the scheme, although there is no record of anyone going at this time."[92] He refers to Brother Conlon travelling around England and agreeing with various Catholic agencies the number of children who could be sent to Australia. Brother P.A. Conlon was the moving spirit behind, and was closely involved in arranging, the child migration of Roman Catholic children to Australia before and after the Second World War, although he was not the only person so involved. It is clear from the material presented to the Inquiry by the Sisters of Nazareth, and the material submitted by them to the Australian Senate and contained in the Senate Report, that the Sisters sent a substantial number of children to Australia from their homes throughout the United Kingdom, and not just their homes in Northern Ireland, following the initiatives by Brother Conlon and others.

How many children were sent to Australia by the Sisters of Nazareth?

111 Figures prepared by the Sisters of Nazareth for the Australian Senate and supplied by the Sisters to this Inquiry record that 1,109 Roman Catholic children from the United Kingdom were sent to Australia between 1938 and 1956, 775 of whom were sent by the Sisters of Nazareth. It has proved extremely difficult to establish exactly how many children from Northern Ireland are included in the total number of children sent to Australia by the Sisters of Nazareth. The Sisters informed the Inquiry that 122 children were sent by the Sisters from their institutions in Northern Ireland, and if that figure is correct it represents over 10% of the total number of children sent by the Sisters of Nazareth from the United Kingdom to Australia as child migrants. When the Inquiry asked that inconsistencies in the figures provided to it be resolved, further investigation by the Sisters resulted in their modifying that figure and giving the names of 111 children. However, there is information which suggests that ten girls from Northern Ireland who sailed for Australia on 8 February 1950 are not included in the revised total of 111. That suggests that the total may have been at least 121 or 122.

112 It has not been possible to identify all of the children who sailed on 8 February 1950. The Congregation has informed the Inquiry that the records relating to this sailing appear to be missing, although there are other documents which show that children did go on that occasion, notably an entry from the History of Foundation for 1950 which records that two sisters left for Australia on the Asturias on 8 February 1950 escorting child migrants from Nazareth Houses in Birmingham, Belfast, Aberdeen and elsewhere.

113 One of the ten was HIA 326, an applicant to the Inquiry. The Inquiry has not been able to resolve this discrepancy, and so the best judgement we can make is that at least 111 children were sent to Australia by the Sisters, but it may be that as many as 127 were sent. That is because although the total of 122 in the following table includes the ten who appear to have sailed on 8 February 1950, there were a further five children from Sligo who are not included in the figure of 54 shown in the table below as having sailed on 29 August 1947, and we consider the five children from Sligo separately.

Children from Nazareth House, Sligo and children born in the Republic of Ireland

114 A curious feature of the information supplied by the Sisters of Nazareth to the Inquiry is that it suggests that six boys were sent from Nazareth House in Sligo to the Sisters' House at Termonbacca in Londonderry, five of whom appear to have sailed to Australia on 27 August 1947 with other boys from Termonbacca. That is stated in Sr Brenda's statement of 6 July 2014,[93] and in other documents supplied to the Inquiry by the Sisters,[94] although the names of the five boys do not appear on the list of 111 children referred to earlier. Two of the five, HIA 302 and HIA 333, applied to the Inquiry. Information provided by the Sisters suggests that a third child from the group of five also sailed, but none of the three appear on the list of 111 children. A fourth child who was on Sr Brenda's list as having sailed to Australia contacted the Inquiry and confirmed he did not go to Australia. This is a further illustration of the extreme difficulty faced by the Inquiry in trying to reconcile conflicting information provided by the Sisters to establish a reasonably definitive list of all the children the Sisters sent to Australia.

93 AUS 11409.

115 As HIA 302 and HIA 333 were sent to Australia it appears likely that three of the other four children from Sligo went with them, making five in all, although some documents provided by the Sisters suggest that only three out of five actually went. We have not been able to establish why the five children were sent from Sligo to Termonbacca before they were sent to Australia. So far as can be ascertained from various documents produced to the Inquiry by the Sisters, four of the five children who we think were likely to have been sent to Australia were born in Northern Ireland. Although HIA 333 was born in Co. Monaghan his mother may have been a native of Co. Fermanagh. The legal position relating to the citizenship of such children under the law of the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State at that time is complex, and because of the limited information the Inquiry has about the children and their parents we cannot form any view as to whether at the time they moved from Sligo to Termonbacca all or some of the five children would have been regarded as citizens of the Irish Free State under its law, or of the United Kingdom under its law, or citizens of both. It is possible that there was other information available to the Sisters that has not survived, which led the Sisters to regard all five (and not just the four born in Northern Ireland) as Northern Ireland children, but that must remain speculation. What we can say is that we regard it as likely that all five were sent to Australia from Termonbacca on the first sailing on 29 August 1947. One was aged 10, one was 12, two were 11, and the fifth was 5. We therefore consider it likely that at least 117 children, and quite possibly as many as 127, were sent to Australia by the Sisters, all but three of whom were sent between 1947 and 1956.

116 Other applicants born in what was then the Irish Free State, and is now the Republic of Ireland, also complained to us that they should not have been sent to Australia because they were not British children. HIA 307, one of the Australian applicants who had been in Nazareth Lodge in Belfast, gave evidence during the fourth module.[95] He was one of the final group of child migrants from Northern Ireland who sailed on 24 December

1956, and he believes that because he was born in Dublin it was illegal for him to be sent to Australia. However, as in the case of those children discussed in the previous paragraph, there is insufficient evidence about his mother to enable the Inquiry to reach any conclusion about the legality of his or other children born in the Irish Free State being sent to Australia as a child migrant.

117 Therefore the Sisters sent three children in 1938 and 1939, and possibly as many as 124 more children spread across ten sailings to Australia between August 1947 and December 1956. The first sailing after the Second World War was on 29 August 1947 and contained 54 children from all four Nazareth House institutions in Northern Ireland. The last sailing left on 24 December 1956 and contained fourteen boys from Nazareth Lodge, and one girl from Nazareth House, in Belfast. It is significant that no children were sent from Londonderry after five boys went from Termonbacca on 8 May 1953, and SND 482[96] said he remembered SR 11 saying that no more children from Termonbacca were going to Australia. Although the Congregation as a body decided to support the migration of children to its homes to Australia, as each house was semi-autonomous it was for the mother superior and her local council in each house to decide whether to take part in the child migrant scheme, and if so, how many children each house would put forward for emigration. No children from Termonbacca were sent after 1953 and, at the latest, girls were sent from Nazareth House, Bishop Street in 1950, whereas girls from Nazareth House, Belfast, and boys from Nazareth Lodge, Belfast, were sent until 1956.

118 The Congregation has not been able to provide a definite explanation as to why there was a different approach between the Belfast and Londonderry homes, but it appears to us that it may possibly have been due to greater pressure on accommodation in the Belfast homes. That may be inferred from a remark contained in a report by Miss Forrest to the Ministry of Home Affairs in November 1955 that the Mother Superior of Nazareth Lodge said that she was contemplating sending 23 boys to Australia soon, and may send another 20 later. Miss Forrest continued "Rubane can't absorb all their output and this is how they are to be disposed of."[97] Whether the words "disposed of" were those of Miss Forrest or those of the Mother Superior may be open to interpretation. In the event it seems that the boys were not sent. So far as the Londonderry homes were concerned, the remark attributed to SR 11 would suggest that there was reluctance on the part of both homes in Londonderry to see their children go, and thereby change the character of the home.

119 Many of the girls sent from Northern Ireland went to Sisters of Nazareth houses in Western Australia, although it would seem from the History of Foundation entry for 8 May 1953 that the girls from Nazareth House in Belfast were to go to the Nazareth House in Melbourne, New South Wales. Incidentally, that entry states that there were five children, although the figures submitted to the Inquiry by the Sisters say that six children went on that occasion. Girls who did not go to homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth went instead to the Sisters of Mercy at Subiaco, Western Australia. It appears that all the boys went to homes in Western Australia run by the Christian Brothers.

Ages of children selected for migration

120 In her Analysis of computerised database[98] which examined all the available information held by the Sisters of Nazareth relating to 1,147 children sent to Australia from the United Kingdom by Roman Catholic religious orders and organisations, Rosemary Keenan commented that "The highest single percentage of children sent [from the United Kingdom as a whole] were eight year olds with about half of all children aged between 7-10 years of age."[99] As can be seen from the table below the pattern of the ages of 117 children sent from Northern Ireland by the Sisters whose dates of birth we have was similar to the age pattern for the whole of the United Kingdom (the numbers in brackets are the totals when the ages of HIA 326 and the five children from Sligo are included).

Therefore, out of 117 children identified to the Inquiry by the Sisters, or which the Inquiry believes were likely to have been sent, 85 were ten or younger, 57 or 59 were eight or younger, and of this group two were four years old, thirteen were five years old, and nine were six years old. Only six of the 117 were over fourteen. This pattern of the majority of children being ten or younger reflected a deliberate policy on the part of the Roman Catholic Church in Australia. Keenan observed that "The majority of children sent were between the ages of five-thirteen years, the Roman Catholic Church preferring younger children to be sent."[100] Three examples show that it was a deliberate policy to send such young children. In June 1946 Br Conlon wrote to Dr Farren, the then Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry, seeking permission to visit the homes or institutions in his diocese "with a view to select suitable children, boys and girls, between the ages of five and fourteen for the Australian Bishops' migration scheme."[101] On 21 March 1952 Fr. Nichol wrote to the mother superior in Termonbacca, and enquired whether there were any boys she might suggest for emigration, saying "The age groups should be as follows: eight-twelve and five-six. In the case of brothers we are prepared to extend the ages either way."[102] That the Sisters were quite willing to send children as young as five was confirmed by the Superior General of the Congregation in her circular letter of the same day to superiors when she emphasised that "only normal children from five to ten years of age are to be emigrated and this is the responsibility of Superiors and Sisters in charge of the children."[103]

121 The Sisters of Nazareth were not alone in sending young children, although it was unusual for children under seven to have been sent, if the approach of Dr Barnardo's (now known as Barnardo's) is typical of other organisations which sent children to Australia. When explaining its approach in 1955 Barnardo's stated:

> "The best age for children to make the move is when they are between seven and twelve years, but when a family group is involved such a limiting condition need not apply. Normally girls should not migrate between the ages of thirteen and seventeen years."[104]

Parental consent

122 One of the matters about which the great majority of applicants were most bitter was whether their parents (almost always the mother) were asked to consent to their child being sent to Australia. Many allege that their parent was not asked for their consent, or were lied to, when the parent returned to the home to see, or take back, their child. HIA 330 is such a case. She says that her mother told her in later years that SR 139 gave the authority for her to go to Australia but her mother was never asked. HIA 274, another applicant born in the then Irish Free State, said:

> "I was sent to Australia without my mother's consent or knowledge and from that day I lost my identity and all connections to my family, my home and my country."[105]

It would seem from the information provided by the Sisters that hers is one of a large number of cases where they are unable to provide information to show that the consent of the child's parent was sought.

123 There is ample evidence that the Sisters were well aware that parental consent was required in those cases where the parent(s) could be traced, and that they tried to contact a parent (usually the mother where the child was illegitimate). For example, in the History of Foundation of the Carlisle house of the Sisters of Nazareth an entry in July 1938 relating to eight boys who left for Australia recorded "We were sorry that we were not able to send a greater number but we could not get the consent of their relatives." An undated letter sent by Canon Cyril Stinson to the Mother Superior of Termonbacca contained a list of sixteen boys who had been accepted for emigration and who were due to sail on 28 January, presumably the sailing which actually occurred on 29 January 1953. The letter also referred to a list of names of children submitted by Termonbacca for a future sailing. Canon Stinson said "Could you let me know…whether or not we have to get parents' consent." Finally he says "I understand [AU 32] was withdrawn because his grandmother refused consent."[106] A circular letter of 21 March 1952 from the Superior General to all superiors said "be careful not to select children belonging to people who may object to their going."[107]

124 In December 1955 the Catholic Child Welfare Council (the CCWC) wrote to the mother superior at Termonbacca in relation to "the eleven boys whom you wish to emigrate to Australia." This letter referred to the necessity to "have the parents' consent form signed in triplicate and duly witnessed. This matter is of special importance owing to a new ruling from Australia House."[108] A further letter from the Secretary of the CCWC to the mother superior at Termonbacca dated 17 January 1956 also referred to the necessity to send a brief history of the child to Australia giving:

> "…the date and reason of the child coming into care, whether or not the parents had been in contact with the child and a few details regarding the physical and educational history and religious practice of the child up to the present date."

The final sentence of the letter (which is hard to decipher) reads:

> "Should the mother still be in contact with the child, then you should state that the mother (wishes?) the child to be emigrated for the future benefit of the child. I trust that is clear."[109]

125 At various times the Sisters of Nazareth have attempted to identify those cases where it can be established that parental consent was obtained, and they have conceded that in the majority of cases their records do not allow them to show this. In her Analysis of computerised database, already referred to, Keenan concluded that "Consent by birth parent(s) was given to the migration of children in 219 instances (19%). In 913 (80%) instances it is unknown whether or not parental consent was given as the documentary evidence remains unfound."[110]

126 In their final written submissions at the end of this module of the Inquiry the Sisters argued that there were references in their records in Hammersmith, and in the evidence of some applicants to the Inquiry, that suggested that the Sisters had obtained, or from which it could be inferred that they had tried to obtain, parental consent in many cases. They base this submission on references in their records, which they suggest refer to efforts to get parental consent in 48 of the 111 cases where the Sisters accept they sent children from Northern Ireland to Australia, sixteen of whom are applicants to the Inquiry.[111] An analysis of the often cryptic comments extracted from the Sisters' records in Hammersmith suggests that these 48 cases fall into three broad categories. In twenty cases the only known parent could not consent because they were either (a) dead, (b) mentally ill, or (c) could not be traced. In thirteen cases the entries suggest that (a) the mother had handed responsibility for the child to the Order, or (b) did not want the child, or (c) the parent or relative had consented. The remainder do not expressly state whether the parent could or could not be traced, although that might be inferred in some cases, as where the father of three children was described as "a pedlar". In two cases where the mother was described as "irresponsible"[112] the children were sisters and their mother was declared a person in need of special care under the Mental Health Act (Northern Ireland) 1948. She was admitted to the Good Shepherd Convent in Newry, and so both applicants might be added to the twenty already referred to. In the case of HIA 284 it is said the applicant "had rickets on admission" which gives no indication whether or not his parent consented. He told the Inquiry that while he agreed to go to Australia the sisters at Termonbacca told him he had no family.

127 Instances such as this make it difficult, and sometimes impossible, to decide in an individual case whether parental consent was sought or not, given the passage of time, the deaths of those involved, and inadequate records held by the Sisters. However, even if all 48 cases are regarded as cases where a genuine effort was made to obtain parental consent, they represent only 43% of 111 children the Sisters accept they sent to Australia (and, as pointed out earlier, the actual number might be as high as 127). Whilst that is a significantly higher proportion than the 19% of all the United Kingdom cases analysed by Rosemary Keenan in 1996, it means that in more than half of the 111 cases the Order cannot show that parental consent was sought, let alone obtained, where that was possible. Although many applicants asserted that their parents had not in fact consented, a number of witnesses who gave evidence to the Inquiry in module one confirmed that their parents were approached and refused their consent to their children being sent to Australia.

(1) HIA 121 said that he learnt from his mother and father in 1965 that they took him and his brother off a list of boys who were due to go to Australia. However it is unclear from his account whether his parents learnt about the proposed emigration by accident or were formally consulted. He also said[113] that he remembered the nuns talking about the boys going to Australia, and a nun walking along a line with a doctor to select the boys.

(2) HIA 66[114] described how what he referred to as the "emigration people" came and picked people out.

(3) HIA 151[115] said that he remembered a line of boys being selected for Australia when he was about seven. However, as the last group went in 1956 when he was four he is clearly mistaken about the dates.

(4) HIA 235[116] said that he learnt from his cousins that his mother wouldn't allow him to be taken to Australia.

128 A further issue is that two applicants have alleged that their migration forms were not in fact signed by their parents. HIA 273[117] said that she did not believe that it was her father's signature on the form, although she declined to say why. We note that the signature was witnessed by the chaplain of Nazareth House, Ormeau Road, Belfast. HIA 308[118] doubted that his mother signed. That signature was also witnessed by a Roman Catholic priest. We are unable to reach a firm conclusion about these allegations. Eight applicants said that their parents told them that when they (or other relatives) approached the Sisters to enquire about their child the Sisters lied to them about their whereabouts, saying the child was no longer there or, in four cases, that the child had been adopted. These applicants came from Termonbacca, Nazareth House in Londonderry, and Nazareth Lodge in Belfast, and were sent to Australia in 1947 and 1953. The allegations relate to different homes at different dates, and we see no reason to disbelieve them, indicating as they do that there was a pattern of behaviour by the homes indicative of an attitude that they had made the right decision for the children and it was not in the interests of anyone for the parents to re-establish contact with their child. Whilst it may seem strange today that a parent would not pursue the matter more vigorously, given the high regard in which the Sisters were held, and the deference paid to religious institutions by many Roman Catholics at that time, it would not have been easy for a single parent who had placed a child in the care of the Sisters then to question the actions of the Sisters.

129 It is not now possible to say in every case whether the Sisters did attempt to contact every parent who was alive at the time to obtain that parent's consent to their child being sent to Australia. Looking at the evidence as a whole, we can only say that there is a considerable body of evidence to show that the Sisters did make such efforts, although in some cases they may not have been successful.

Medical examinations and Intelligence Quotient (IQ) tests

130 Some of the procedures involved at particular stages were introduced at the insistence of the Australian authorities who were dissatisfied with the physical and intellectual standard of many of the children being sent to Australia in the early years. This dissatisfaction can be seen in correspondence between the Secretary of the Department of Immigration in Canberra, the Chief Migration Officer in London, and the Under-Secretary for Lands and Immigration in Perth in late 1949 and early 1950. This correspondence set out the reasons for their concern at considerable length, but the flavour of the Australian concerns can be seen from the following extract from a lengthy letter of 6 January 1950 from the Secretary of the Department of Immigration to those officers just described. Referring to tests carried out "at various Catholic Institutions in [Western Australia] on child migrants from the United Kingdom" he continued "...I agree that the situation is very disturbing." Having referred to various explanatory factors that might influence these findings he observed "Nevertheless, the percentage of dull, and borderline defective children shown in the report is too high." The letter continues:

117 Day 46, 8 September 2014, p.20.

> "It is also to be realised that the children who have been examined arrived in 1947, before the immigration schemes were properly under way and it may be that the supervision over the selection of the children could have been tighter at that time."

He goes on to refer to a discussion of this at the conference of Commonwealth and state ministers held at Canberra on 16 May, 1949, and to a decision of the conference that the Chief Migration Officer in London "was then advised to exercise a careful supervision of the children selected", before saying that he has again asked the Chief Migration Officer "to carefully watch the selection of children and let me have his observations."[119]

131 The Sisters of Nazareth were well aware of these criticisms, as can be seen from the circular letter of 21 March 1952 from the Superior General, which has already been referred to. She said:

> "I am grieved to say that the Australian Department for Emigration has complained about problem children, wet beds and mentally deficients [sic] being sent from Nazareth Houses to Australia, and these children will be returned by the Australian Government to the Houses from which they were sent...The Home Office, London has been notified by the Australian Government about this matter, even the Nazareth Houses in this country that sent such children have been named to the H[ome] O[ffice], so it is humiliating for the > Congregation, and looks as if we were putting our obligations on other people. This is very serious, as I have been notified that some Catholic Homes in Australia were to be closed to children on account of the unsatisfactory state of affairs among these children."[120]

132 The manner in which the procedures involved in child migration were applied and developed can be seen by comparing the experiences of HIA 330 and HIA 336. HIA 330 was placed in Nazareth House, Bishop Street, and she remembers very little about her time there. She was one of 54 children from Northern Ireland, and one of twelve girls from Nazareth House, Bishop Street, who sailed on the first sailing of children to Australia from the United Kingdom on 29 August 1947. She was six-years-old at the time and so it is not surprising that she has little recollection of what happened. It appears from the Commonwealth of Australia immigration documents she obtained that she underwent a medical examination by a doctor at Australia House in London, which appears to have been carried out on 16 July 1947. The sponsoring organisation is described as the Catholic Council for Child Welfare of Coleshill, Birmingham, and the certificate relating to her background was signed by SR 139 who was the mother superior of Nazareth House, Bishop Street, at the time. She also signed as the child's guardian on 15 July 1947. Her signature was witnessed by P.A. Conlon, clearly Brother Conlon, who gives his qualification as a migration organiser, and his address as 38 Strawberry Hill, Twickenham. As her ship sailed on 29 August, if the medical examination took place on 16 July in London as the form implies, it would seem that on or about 15 July HIA 330 left Londonderry and travelled to London, presumably spending the time between her medical examination and her sailing on 29 August at a Sisters of Nazareth home somewhere in England.

133 HIA 336 (who was an applicant to the Acknowledgement Forum only), provided the Inquiry with a comprehensive set of papers showing that the process had become considerably more elaborate by 1956. These documents show that his unmarried mother gave her consent to his migration on 28 November 1955. Application forms sent to the Department of Immigration in December 1955 said (a) that he was in care and (b) that the Secretary of State had given his consent to HIA 336's emigration. The Sisters of Nazareth sent a formal application to the Department of Immigration at Australia House in London, which was received by it on 16 January 1956. He underwent an initial medical examination on 26 February 1956, and was medically examined again on behalf of the Australian Department of Immigration by a Belfast GP, Dr John McSorley on the Ormeau Road, whose report was compiled in or around 10 April 1956. In August 1956 HIA 336 was one of nine children from Nazareth Lodge, Belfast who were then subjected to IQ tests by Prof. Seth, the Head of the Department of Psychology at Queens University, Belfast. Professor Seth sent his results to the Australian Department of Immigration in London.[121] HIA 336 was just six when he sailed from Southampton on 24 December 1956 on the SS Strathnaver, arriving in Freemantle on 22 January 1957.

134 In HIA 336's case thirteen months elapsed between his mother giving her consent in November 1955 and his sailing on Christmas Eve 1956, and no doubt the process of identifying him as a possible emigrant child started some time before that. The process from being selected for consideration for emigration until sailing was often a particularly long drawn-out one, in most cases taking several months. Although the manner in which this happened is not clear in every respect, it appears to have been the position that in many, if not all, of the cases where children were sent from one of the four Sisters of Nazareth institutions in Northern Ireland, the mother superior of the house started the process by nominating individual children to one of the Roman Catholic organisations responsible for child migration, such as the Australian Catholic Immigration Committee (ACIC). That would seem to be the position from a letter sent on behalf of the Director of the ACIC to the mother superior of Termonbacca in 1951. He indicated that he already had a list of names on file and suggested four names to the mother superior. He stated that application forms, birth certificate, baptismal certificate, confirmation certificate if confirmed, case history, IQ report and school report were required, saying "many of these documents we have already." He then set out the papers which he held for each of the children, and asked whether or not the children were still available for emigration, together with any other names that might be put forward for inclusion in a later batch. He concluded "We would point out that very careful selection is now taking place and, therefore, if children are anyway below average and do not come up to the required standard, they are being sent back."[122]

135 The emphasis placed by the Australian authorities on the need to select children who were in good physical and mental health is clear, and is confirmed by his next letter. As that letter was believed to have been wrongly addressed, a further letter was sent including the name of a fifth boy who was thought to be the brother of one of those mentioned in the earlier letters. It again makes the point about the need for children to reach a certain standard, because the letter concludes "when submitting further applications, Father Nichol asks you to bear in mind the fact that if these children are in any way below average, mentally or physically, they will be sent back..."[123]

136 Only a few applicants have any recollection of being medically examined, or of undergoing IQ tests, before they were sent to Australia. Nine applicants remember undergoing medical examinations, and the immigration documents for many more record medical examinations. Whilst there is documentary evidence of the IQ tests on nine boys in 1956, it is noteworthy that two applicants who sailed on the first sailing on 28 August, 1947 have clear memories of undergoing IQ tests,[124] and HIA 350 (who was seven years and five months old when she sailed) recalls that Br Conlon, a sister and a government official were present. Correspondence from the CCWC to the mother superior of Termonbacca in 1952 requested both school and IQ reports.[125] Given that children in the first and last groups to go to Australia from Sisters of Nazareth homes in Northern Ireland underwent such tests, that there is substantial evidence that the Australian Government placed considerable emphasis on assessing child migrants' intelligence, and that IQ tests were required by children from the state sector as in the case of HIA 354, we are satisfied that IQ tests were conducted on applicants who do not now recall them. We are satisfied that it is highly likely that after 1947 all children went through the required procedures, including medical examinations and IQ tests, and it is not surprising that 50 or 60 years later applicants do not remember some parts of the process, given that the process was often long drawn out, and that many would not have appreciated the significance of what was happening.

Were illegitimate children singled out for emigration?

137 A number of applicants expressed the belief that the children selected for emigration were chosen because they had no parents to speak for them, and the implication in those cases is that all or many of the children were selected because they were illegitimate. As we have pointed out, there is evidence that the Sisters tried to contact a parent of a child being considered for emigration, and that in a number of cases where contact was made the parent or relative refused to consent. It also has to be remembered that during the decade in which child emigration took place the proportion of illegitimate children in all children's homes in Northern Ireland was very high, as can be seen from figures gathered in 1957 by the Northern Ireland Child Welfare Council.[126] It found that in the six largest children's homes, two out of every three children were illegitimate. Of the six homes, the percentages were 82.8 % in Nazareth Lodge, Belfast; 62.1% in Nazareth House, Belfast; 57.7% in Nazareth House, Londonderry; and 60% in St Joseph's, Londonderry (Termonbacca).[127] We have no reason to believe that the position was significantly different in the ten years before 1957. A further consideration is that, as the same report pointed out, many parents did not maintain contact with their child once the child was placed in a home. The report gave the following percentages for parents in the four Sisters of Nazareth homes who did not maintain contact with their children: 57.4% in Nazareth Lodge, Belfast; 48.8% in Nazareth House, Belfast; 13% in Nazareth House, Londonderry; and 45.5% in St Joseph's, Londonderry (Termonbacca).[128] With the proportion of illegitimate children so high in each of these homes, it was inevitable that there would be a high proportion of illegitimate children amongst those selected. We note that of the witnesses who contacted the Inquiry, only four were members of families of five or more children.

138 Because the sisters who made these decisions and the parents of the children are dead, and because there are not many contemporary records that throw any light on why an individual child was selected other than the migration forms, there is insufficient evidence to enable the Inquiry to decide in each individual case whether, and if so to what extent, the fact that a child was illegitimate was a factor that led that child to be selected for emigration. All that we can say on this issue is that because the percentage of illegitimate children in each of the four homes was so high, and so many parents no longer maintained contact with their children, and therefore could not be asked for their consent to their children being sent to Australia, it was likely that illegitimate children would form a high proportion of the children who were selected.

What were the children told, and were they asked if they wanted to go?

139 Many applicants, but not all, had some recollection of Australia being mentioned to them before they went, although there are considerable variations in their accounts of what was said to them. A very common theme amongst those applicants who could remember being told something was that they were given a wholly misleading picture of the conditions they could expect to find on arrival in Australia. HIA 335 said that Br. Conlon "said we would be able to ride horses and pick oranges off trees."[129] HIA 299, who went to Australia in September 1947 aged ten and a half said:

> "Brother Conlon brought books about Australia and told us it would be good there, the aboriginals were great, there was plenty of orchards and fruit and we would never go hungry...I had no idea where Australia was but I was convinced by his description of the country."[130]

140 HIA 299 described how he helped to build the buildings and clear land when he arrived. Although conditions in Australia are not within our terms of reference, we note that there is ample contemporary evidence that the boys engaged in heavy physical labour helping to construct large buildings at places such as Bindoon. Captions to photographs of Bindoon in the undated pamphlet about the Western Australian institutions already mentioned such as "Administration block in course of construction by boys",[131] and "Boys tiling the Refectory Block",[132] make this very clear.

141 Not all applicants remembered being given any explanation about where they were going, or, if they were told, say they were not told the truth about their forthcoming journey. HIA 300, who was eight years old when he went to Australia in August 1947, recalled that the sisters said "all those who want to go to Australia put your hands up. We all put our hands up as it sounded exciting but I had no idea at the time where Australia was, nor did the other boys."[133] HIA 350 remembered doing an IQ test, being patted on the head and told that she was a smart girl and was going on a trip to Australia. "We were given the impression that life was going to be like a fairy tale, with lots of fruit, sunshine and kind people."[134] However, HIA 240 said that a priest told him he was being sent on a three-week holiday to England and instead he was sent to Australia.[135]

142 Australian officials in the United Kingdom were required to interview each child to ask the child whether he or she wanted to go to Australia, but of 28 applicants who were sent by the Sisters of Nazareth, twenty-one said that either they were not asked at all whether they wished to go, or they were simply told that they were going. However, although HIA 299 was one of the twenty-one who were not asked, he remembered Brother Conlon asking the boys in Nazareth Lodge if they wished to go, and seven applicants remembered being asked. Five of them were in Termonbacca, one in Nazareth Lodge, and one in Nazareth House, Belfast. That children from three different homes remember being asked if they wished to go, suggests that each child was asked if he or she wanted to go to Australia. In addition, we were provided with correspondence from January 1951, March 1953 and March 1956 between the Australian emigration authorities and the mother superior of Termonbacca making arrangements for interviews of boys at Termonbacca itself or at the local employment exchange.[136] Given that the majority of the children sent by the Sisters were younger than ten, it is not surprising that many have no recollection of being asked, and we are satisfied that the children in the four Sisters of Nazareth homes with which we are concerned were asked whether they wanted to go to Australia, although it is unclear whether this was always done by Australian officials, by the Sisters or by other Catholic officials such as Br. Conlon.

143 Whilst many children may have been asked in some form whether they wanted to go to Australia, we accept that they were given an idealized and wholly unrealistic picture of what their lives in Australia would be like. While we accept that there was discussion with the children about going to Australia, we do not accept that the children were in a position to give an informed consent, and we do not accept that asking children of such a young age for their consent had any worthwhile purpose. We have already pointed out that where the consent of the Minister of Home Affairs was required many responsible bodies and senior civil servants expressed the view at the time that no child under the age of ten (or even older in the view of some) could reasonably be expected to understand the implications of what they were being asked. Given that many of the children sent from Northern Ireland were under eight, and some as young as four or five, we are satisfied that the procedure of asking children under fourteen to obtain their informal consent to go was a worthless and wholly indefensible practice, and should have been recognised as such by the Sisters, the Australian Commonwealth and state governments, and the United Kingdom Government.

Travel arrangements for the children

144 There were suggestions that there was a financial incentive for the Sisters to send children to Australia, and that they profited from doing so. For example, HIA 401 said she had seen documents whilst doing some archival work which suggested that the Sisters received either £10 or AUS $10 for each child. This was explored with her when she gave evidence and she said that the Australian Government was "basically helping to finance the child migrants coming to Australia."[137] Sr Brenda explained that the Sisters were reimbursed for the cost of travel and clothing provided to the children for the journey, but the Congregation did not profit by doing so. It is clear that the Australian Government provided travel warrants for the travel costs of the children to the point of embarkation. It also paid the passage fare for the children to Australia. It also appears that, at least in some cases, it reimbursed the Sisters for the cost of providing new clothing for the children they sent. That can be seen from an entry in the Sisters of Nazareth History of Foundation for Nazareth Lodge disclosed to the Inquiry during module four. This recorded that on 7 May 1949 the Sisters received a cheque for £55 "from the Australian Migration Scheme towards the outfits of the fourteen boys who went to Australia in August 1947."[138] However, we have found no evidence to suggest that the Sisters of Nazareth profited financially from taking part in the Child Migrant Scheme.

145 The children were provided with new clothes for their journey, and then travelled by train and boat from Northern Ireland to England. Some of those sent by the Sisters seem to have stayed for a short time in one of the Sisters of Nazareth houses in England, others went direct to the port of embarkation where they joined their ship. All children, whether sent by the Sisters of Nazareth, by county welfare committees or by the Irish Church Missions, were accompanied during the voyages by adults assigned to look after them during the voyage. Some were priests, sisters, or Protestant clergy in the case of children going to Dhurringle; others were young women recruited for the purpose who had their fare paid to Australia in return for looking after their charges. Most, though by no means all, of the children had happy memories of the voyage, having ample food and being allowed to go where they wished on the ship. Others, as in the case of HIA 346 and HIA 354, whose experiences we have already recounted at paragraph 95, did not consider they were well looked after on the voyage. Given the post war shortages of food and general austerity in Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom the conditions on board for many seem to have been a considerable improvement on what the children were used to. However, none of the institutions appear to have paid much attention to checking the suitability of those to whom the children were entrusted to look after them in any structured fashion.

146 Very little information about the children appears to have been sent with them. By 1954 the migration forms required "case histories", but we have found nothing that would suggest that the Sisters in particular provided anything that could be described as a "case history". We consider that even in 1954 good practice would have required a minimum of a half page outlining the nature of the family, its problems and the reason why the child was in care. The absence of such information was unacceptable at the time, and the lack of information undoubtedly also contributed to the difficulties experienced in later years by many former child migrants when they tried to get employment or trace their families. We regard this failure to be a systemic failing on the part of any institution that sent children and cannot show that such information was sent.

Efforts by the British and Northern Ireland Governments to ensure that children were being properly looked after in Australia

147 As mentioned earlier, John Moss CBE was a member of the Curtis Committee, and was the Kent County Welfare Officer. When the Home Office learnt that he was due to make a private visit to Australia in 1951, it asked him to make some enquiries into conditions in those homes where children emigrating from the United Kingdom were received. His report Child Migration to Australia was published in 1953 and described by the United Kingdom Government as "an independent record of Mr Moss's impressions, and is not to be taken as expressing the views of the Home Office or of any Australian authority." His report was broadly favourable to the principle of child migration, although he did make comments about a number of individual homes. He also made a significant number of recommendations, which might suggest that although he was broadly satisfied with what he found, nevertheless there was considerable room for improvement. In his conclusions he said:

> "I hope this report will give an impetus to the emigration of children from the United Kingdom to Australia as I have no doubt that many children who are in children's homes here would have much better prospects in Australia if they are carefully selected and are of suitable ages."[139]

Of particular relevance to the work of this Inquiry is that he "formed the opinion that the Roman Catholic establishments for children in Australia compare very favourably with those in this country."

148 It is also significant that whilst he noted that some 2,000 children had been emigrated under this scheme since the end of the Second World War:

> "Local Authorities have taken very little interest in the scheme, either in relation to children in their own children's homes or children for whom they are contributing in voluntary homes such as Roman Catholic orphanages. Local Authorities must naturally be satisfied that any action they take as to children in their care is in the interest of the children. There seems to be a feeling in some quarters that it is wrong to send a child, for whom a Local Authority is responsible, some 10,000 or 12,000 miles away."

139 Page 41.

Moss concluded that if those responsible had the same opportunity as he and his wife had of inspecting these premises:

> "I am sure they would have no hesitation in helping to fill the vacancies which now exist in approved establishments and would adopt a general policy of sending a regular, but small, flow of suitable children. They would then not only be doing good to the children but helping, in a small way, to increase the English-born population of Australia."

He completed his report in January 1952, and it is clear from the Northern Ireland Government file that a copy of this report was received by the Ministry of Home Affairs, as the title page of the report bears a number of hand-written references to the Big Brother entries and those relating to Dhurringle in the report.

149 The Empire Settlement Acts were due to expire in 1957, and as payments were made under the Acts to those voluntary societies concerned with child migration to Australia the United Kingdom Government appointed a fact-finding mission to visit Australia. This was chaired by John Ross CB, a former Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office. He and his colleagues produced their report in March 1956. It was highly critical of the conditions in Australia in many of the institutions, 26 of which were visited by the committee, and the Australian Government would not agree to its publication until its own officials had visited the institutions. The Australian Senate Report noted that shortcomings were only detected at Dhurringle and Bindoon and minor improvements suggested. The Australian Government investigation concluded "in view of [this], it is felt that there is no justification for your [the British] government to take any action, to cause even a temporary deferment of child migration to Australia." In the United Kingdom the Commonwealth Relations Office recorded that "as we feared the Australian authorities focus only on material things like bathrooms and carpets, and ignore what had been said about atmosphere and management." A United Kingdom Home Office official noted that the Australian report "confirms my view that Australian and United Kingdom thinking on childcare matters is poles apart."[140]

150 The Ross Report was extremely critical of the principle of child migration, in particular about matters such as the unsatisfactory premises, the isolation of the homes, that children were being separated by gender and also that siblings were being separated, and as Ross put it, not all the staff had "sufficient knowledge of childcare methods". In addition to the five institutions which he expressly criticised, he attached to his report a secret annex which was not published. In that, he was very critical of a number of other institutions he had not publicly criticised because he hadn't been to all of them, and the information was not sufficiently strong in some instances to allow him to express public criticism. The Ross report was also made available to the Northern Ireland Government, including its secret annex, and the copy in the Ministry of Home Affairs file carries a manuscript note that it was copied to Miss Forrest, Miss Wright and Miss Miller in February 1957. At this time the Northern Ireland Government anticipated a visit from Australia by a leading public figure there and was somewhat embarrassed by the position in which it found itself. In the event, the last children to be sent by the Sisters of Nazareth had already sailed on 24 December 1957, and so far as the Inquiry is aware no further children were sent from Northern Ireland other than the three children who went from Manor House in Lisburn in 1969. However, as they were older and went at their father's request they do not fall into the category of child migrants with whom we are concerned.

Contact between the homes and child migrants after they went to Australia

151 It is a common complaint by applicants that they received no letters from home, that letters were kept from them if they were sent, and that their parents in many instances either were unaware that their children had been sent to Australia, or maintained subsequently that they had been deceived about that. HIA 392 said that he received some letters from his mother for the first eight months after he went, although these stopped when he asked her why she sent him to Australia.[141] HIA 274 said that her mother managed to trace her to Australia and wrote to her, and although HIA 274 wrote back she doubts whether the letter was ever sent. However, even the minimal contact both experienced was exceptional to judge by the evidence of the great majority of applicants to the Inquiry, only five of whom received letters from parents or other family members after they went to Australia. These are all matters which we have considered in the context of the acts or omissions of those who were responsible for these children in Northern Ireland. The efforts of Tyrone County Council in trying to keep in touch with its child migrants demonstrates what could, and we believe should, have been done in this respect by everyone who sent a child who was in their care to be placed in the care of another institution in a country many thousands of miles away. If the Tyrone Welfare Committee could go to such efforts to keep in touch with one child what was to prevent other organisations pursuing the same policy? Although the Sisters of Nazareth may not have the same financial and administrative resources as public bodies, we consider that they could and should have done much more to keep in touch with the children in Australia. The girls went to other homes run by the Sisters, such as Geraldton, and there was nothing to stop the mother house in Hammersmith asking their sister houses in Australia, or the Roman Catholic Orders to which the boys had gone, such as the Sisters of Mercy or the Christian Brothers, for a short report of a few lines on each child once a year, and passing this information to those parents or relatives for whom they had contact details, or who enquired after a child. We regard the failure of the Sisters to do so as a systemic failing on their part.

152 The Inquiry has no power to investigate the way these children may have been treated by those responsible on the spot for the Australian institutions to which they were sent after they arrived. Nevertheless, our view is that it is necessary to consider what steps the Sisters of Nazareth took to keep themselves informed about the progress of the children in Australia because the Sisters had sent children in their care to a distant country. In only one case that we are aware of did information come back from Australia to the Sisters in Derry, and through them to those close to the applicant. HIA 342, who sailed in August 1947, said that in later years she learnt from a family with whom she had lived in Derry before going into Nazareth House in Bishop Street that the Sisters in Australia sent back photographs of her growing up. The photographs included photographs of her graduation, although she could not remember graduating.[142] If what she was told is accurate, that would suggest that in her case at least an effort was made by the Sisters in Australia to send back information, but, if so, that would appear to have been an exceptional event. There is no other evidence to suggest that the Sisters in any of the four homes in Northern Ireland made any effort to seek information, or received information, which they passed on to the families concerned about the children sent from their homes. In some cases the children went to homes in Australia run by the Sisters, such as the home for girls at Geraldton in Western Australia, and whilst it is possible that the mother general or her representative may have enquired after such children in the course of visitations to the Australian homes run by the Sisters, if any information was gathered in this way no evidence has been produced to show that it reached any of the four homes in Northern Ireland.

153 Even if the Sisters sought such information, we consider it likely that very little, if any, information was provided, because that appears to have been the experience of other Catholic organisations in the United Kingdom involved with child migration when they tried to obtain information from Australia about the welfare of the children they had sent there. That this was the case can be seen from the following passage in a discussion paper report prepared for the Catholic Children's Society (Westminster) by its director, J. M. Richards in July 1993:

> "Between the start of the migration programme in 1938 up until May 1956, concerns were often expressed about the migration programme within C.C.W.C. and the Church hierarchy but nothing in effect was done about it. In May 1956 in a letter to Canon Flood, R.T. Rainer from Southwark Catholic Children's Society wrote 'I am keenly interested in these problems of supervision of children in Australia, as I made all the arrangements for all our children to emigrate and interviewed all the available parents but so far have not seen one official report about the welfare and progress of the Southwark children'. He goes on to say that without 'positive evidence of its standards and achievements that the local authorities will not be prepared to use the scheme' for the Catholic children it has in care. Further he states, 'there is an opinion in some quarters that we have merely succeeded in transferring children from one institution to another and unfortunately we do not possess any information which suggests the position is in fact satisfactory'. In another letter, he makes clear that Australia and England do not appear to understand each other's conception of child care. By June 1956 Southwark were no longer prepared to send children to Australia until they had details of the welfare and after care of children already out there. Reports from Australia on children that had been sent out there were very brief in content and spasmodic in arriving."[143]

154 Because only five applicants received letters from parents or other family members after they went to Australia, for virtually every applicant the effect of being sent to Australia as a child migrant was that they were cut off from their families in Northern Ireland. As a result in later years the great majority of applicants had great difficulty in tracing their families; difficulties caused, or exacerbated, in many cases by not being able to obtain their birth certificates. Twenty-six applicants mentioned that they had to get their own birth certificates in later life, and nineteen described how the details were inaccurate. Whilst some errors may have been due to clerical error, in the case of HIA 326 and others names had been changed, apparently on an arbitrary basis, by the Sisters before they went to Australia. It appears that birth certificates may have been sent by the Sisters with each child, at least to judge by the experience of HIA 273 who described envelopes with birth certificates inside being taped inside the lids of their suitcases before they left, and being taken from them on arrival in Australia.[144] As the correspondence already referred to makes clear, birth certificates were sent by the homes when the applications were being made to the Australian authorities in London. It appears that only short form birth certificates were sent, and because such certificates only include the name and date of birth of the child, and does not contain details of the parents and place of birth, this also created great difficulties for child migrants who wanted to trace relations in later years.

155 Many applicants complained that the Sisters were extremely un-cooperative when contacted in later years for information that would help trace their parents and families, although some individual priests were helpful in providing baptismal and other records. This lack of co-operation by the Sisters in different houses, and not just those in Northern Ireland investigated by the Inquiry, caused enormous difficulties, and great distress and unhappiness, for applicants as they tried to trace their families and roots in Northern Ireland or elsewhere.

HIA 312 expressed the feelings of many of those who spoke to the Inquiry when he said:

> "I regret never having the opportunity to meet my birth mother and having no knowledge of my Irish ancestry. I never made any further enquiries about my family. If you've written me off, you've written me off for life."[145]

156 The practical difficulties experienced by so many applicants who tried to trace their relatives are graphically illustrated by the example of HIA 333 given to us by Dr Margaret Humphreys.[146] He started to search for his mother in the 1950s, but, despite his efforts, had no success. In 1992 he contacted the Child Migrants Trust and it took up the search. In July 1997 Dr Humphreys and HIA 333 visited Nazareth House in Sligo for the first time. The search continued for several years, and, amongst other things, included efforts to exhume the body of a possible relative in California for DNA tests. The search came to an end in 2008 when HIA 333 visited the Nazareth House in Sligo in June and was given a photocopy of a 1937 document which referred to the recommendation of a Catholic curate in Co. Fermanagh. A third visit by Dr Humphreys to the Nazareth House in Sligo in November 2008 resulted in the back of the photocopied document being produced after a three hour delay. On the back was the applicant's mother's address, and within three days that address had been located, only for HIA 333 to learn that his mother had died in 1999. Throughout her life she lived at the same address, and at one stage when she was still alive the search was being carried out half an hour's drive from where she was living. Had that information been produced in 1997 HIA 333 could have been reunited with his mother before she died and many years of fruitless, time-consuming and extremely expensive enquiries could have been avoided.

157 Even when applicants were able to trace their families the result was sometimes disappointing for them. Sadly, there can be no doubt that some parents wanted their child out of their lives as demonstrated by the experience of those applicants who were able to trace their mother in later life, only to find that she did not want to acknowledge that the applicant was their child. In some cases this was because they had married but never told their husband or children that they already had a child, as in the case of HIA 304. Through his wife's efforts he was able to trace his mother, but when he contacted her "…she was pleased to hear from me, but also horrified. She had put a lid on her past and now it was reopened."[147] Although they corresponded by letter, this was only for a couple of months as she was terrified her husband would find out. The experience of HIA 341 was even less satisfactory, as his mother refused all contact other than one long telephone conversation. The mother of HIA 326 tried to persuade her to pretend she was her niece and not her daughter. HIA 326 later traced the man in Northern Ireland she believes to be her father, and spoke to him by telephone. He did not admit he was her father, nor did he respond when she sent photographs of her children.

158 The experience of HIA 333 may be an extreme example, but it illustrates the great difficulty experienced by many applicants in obtaining basic information about the past from the Sisters of Nazareth. These difficulties could have been avoided in many cases had the Sisters been more forthcoming when applicants approached them for information. Whilst we recognise that in some cases information was forthcoming, in too many cases it was not produced as willingly or rapidly as it should have been. Although in some instances the Sisters may have felt that withholding such information might prevent further distress or rejection, nevertheless we regard the failure of the Sisters to provide detailed, accurate and timely responses to enquiries by child migrants for help in tracing their parents as a systemic failing on the part of the Congregation, and one that added a great deal of avoidable suffering to many applicants.

159 These difficulties still continue for many applicants, and the Child Migrants Trust informed us on 4 November 2014 that it was working with nineteen former child migrants who have unresolved and complex family research relating to Northern Ireland, although some of these may relate to former child migrants from Great Britain whose parents originated in Northern Ireland. Many applicants spoke in glowing terms of the effectiveness of the efforts of the Child Migrants Trust in helping them to trace their relatives. The continuing need to search for documentary evidence to enable former child migrants to trace their relatives is an acute problem for a number of individuals. A suggestion made to us was that the institutions concerned should be placed under an obligation to bring together all the papers relevant to such individuals in a central location where they could be conveniently accessed by the individuals concerned, or by organisations acting on their behalf, such as the Child Migrants Trust. Whilst this suggestion is attractive, we are concerned it could prove difficult to achieve in practice. It would require a central location to be identified and then funded, although if such a location was considered desirable it might be possible to make an arrangement with the Public Record Office for Northern Ireland to store records there. However, there would remain the risk that documents might not be accurately identified by institutions which hold them, or may be mislaid whilst being assembled.

160 Perhaps the most compelling objection is the difficulty in defining what documents should be brought together in this way, because birth or baptismal records, school records, social services and national insurance records, to name just a few, might be helpful in tracing relatives, depending upon the information already available. On balance, we consider that a more effective course would be for the Northern Ireland Executive to provide adequate funding to the Child Migrants Trust to enable it to continue its valuable work. It has developed invaluable expertise in carrying out such searches, and enjoys the confidence of those who rely upon it to help them trace their relatives. Rather than creating a new body to do the work already being done by the Child Migrants Trust we recommend that it be given an annual grant for up to ten years, with a review of the effectiveness of, and continuing need for, such work after the first five years. The amount of the grant would be for the Northern Ireland Executive to agree with the Child Migrants Trust.

How many child migrants were sent to Australia from Northern Ireland?

161 Whilst it is impossible for the Inquiry to be certain, we are satisfied that at least 138 children under the age of fourteen were sent to Australia as child migrants within the period covered by our Terms of Reference: of these, 121 were sent by the Sisters of Nazareth; ten by various local authorities; and seven by the Irish Church Missions. If the Sisters of Nazareth sent 127, then the overall number was at least 144.

162 We accept that institutions, local authorities and the Northern Ireland Government believed at the time that it was in the interests of the children to go to Australia, where it was thought that the children would have a much better future than they could expect in Northern Ireland. It is essential to remember that in the decade after the Second World War there were serious economic problems throughout the United Kingdom, such as rationing and shortages of materials to rebuild damaged buildings and factories, at the same time as the need to rectify the pre-war conditions of slums, widespread unemployment and poverty that had existed in Northern Ireland for decades. In such circumstances it is not surprising that those who had immediate responsibility for children in their care were attracted by the prospects of a better life for those children in a developing country, prospects encouraged by the pleas from the Australian authorities; pleas that gained added weight in the case of the Sisters of Nazareth because they were also made by their co-religionists in Australia.

163 Nevertheless the manner in which the child migration schemes were conceived, planned and implemented was gravely defective. The lessons of the problems associated with earlier child migrant schemes to Canada, and the concerns of many professionals in the childcare field, were ignored. Those responsible for the homes were content to rely on unrealistic assurances about the conditions in the homes to which the children were to go. Had they checked beforehand they would have found that in some cases the buildings were still in the course of construction, and that the children were expected to work as labourers to an extent that would have been prohibited on building sites in the United Kingdom. Neither the homes nor the children were given realistic information about the conditions that would face them when they arrived in Australia. The great majority of the children were far too young to make an informed choice if they were asked. They were being sent many thousands of miles away without any preparation for their new life.

164 Had these children, and particularly those from homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth, remained in Northern Ireland they would not have experienced the harm caused to them by child migration. In almost every case nothing was done by the institutions to maintain links between the children and their families in Northern Ireland after they had gone. In many cases when relatives did enquire about the children they were deliberately misled. In later years when former migrants contacted institutions seeking information that might enable them to trace their families all too often the institutions concerned did little to help, particularly in the case of the Sisters of Nazareth.

165 The first recognition by the UK Government that child migrants had been badly treated came in the establishment of an inquiry set up by the House of Commons Select Committee on Health in 1997. It gathered evidence not only in the UK but also through a visit to Australia where former child migrants presented their case to the parliamentary delegation forcefully. The outcome was a report entitled The Welfare of Former British Child Migrants published in July 1998 (CM 4182).

166 Among its seventeen recommendations, nearly all of which were accepted by the Government, it argued for a central database to help former child migrants access material to help them trace their families. It proposed the establishment of a travel fund so that former migrants could make links with their families, and the government set up a £1 million fund. The Select Committee had highlighted the invaluable work being done by the Child Migrants Trust and the government increased funding for the CMT to £500,000 over three years.

167 The Select Committee did not recommend that compensation should be paid to former child migrants as they had received markedly differing evidence, and many people had expressed concern that agencies might be less cooperative in providing records if they became unduly nervous about possible financial consequences; the government concurred. The Select Committee had also received differing evidence on the value of an apology; while they felt that an apology was in order, they argued that action on their recommendations would be the best acknowledgement of concern on the part of the government, who responded by expressing regrets and accepting that they considered that the child migration policies had been misguided.

Steps taken by the United Kingdom Government and the institutions to address the effects of the child migrant scheme

168 In recent years in different ways both the British Government and the Sisters of Nazareth have acknowledged the grave injustice done to child migrants from the United Kingdom, apologised to them, and provided practical financial support to some of those who are still alive. On 24 February, 2010 the Prime Minster, the Rt Hon Gordon Brown MP, made the following statement to the House of Commons:

> "Until the late 1960s, successive UK Governments had over a long period of time supported child migration schemes. They involved children as young as three being transported from Britain to Australia, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa and Zimbabwe. The hope was that those children, who were aged between three and fourteen, would have the chance to forge a better life overseas, but the schemes proved to be misguided. In too many cases, vulnerable children suffered unrelenting hardship and their families left behind were devastated. They were sent mostly without the consent of their mother or father. They were cruelly lied to and told that they were orphans and that their parents were dead, when in fact they were still alive. Some were separated from their brothers and sisters, never to see one another again. Names and birthdays were deliberately changed so that it would be impossible for families to reunite. Many parents did not know that their children had been sent out of this country.

The former child migrants say they feel that this practice was less transportation and more deportation - a deportation of innocent young lives. When they arrived overseas, all alone in the world, many of our most vulnerable children endured the harshest of conditions, neglect and abuse in the often cold and brutal institutions that received them. Those children were robbed of their childhood, the most precious years of their life. As people know, the pain of a lost childhood can last a lifetime. Some still bear the marks of abuse; all still live with the consequences of rejection. Their wounds will never fully heal, and for too long the survivors have been all but ignored.

When I was first made aware of this wholly unacceptable practice, I wrote to the Prime Minister of Australia to urge that together, we do more to acknowledge the experiences of former child migrants and see what we could achieve. It is right that today we recognise the human cost associated with this shameful episode of history and this failure in the first duty of a nation, which is to protect its children.

Shortly, I shall be meeting a number of former child migrants here in the Palace of Westminster to listen first-hand to their experiences, and as Prime Minister, I will be apologising on behalf of our nation. To all those former child migrants and their families, to those here with us today and those across the world - to each and every one - I say today that we are truly sorry. They were let down. We are sorry that they were allowed to be sent away at the time they were most vulnerable. We are sorry that instead of caring for them, this country turned its back, and we are sorry that the voices of these children were not always heard and their cries for help not always heeded. We are sorry that it has taken so long for this important day to come, and for the full and unconditional apology that is justly deserved to be given.

I would like to recognise the work of my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) as Chairman of the Select Committee > on Health, and of his predecessor the former Member for Wakefield, David Hinchcliffe. For their commitment to this cause, I would also like to praise all past and present members of the Commons Health Committee and the all-party group on child migrants. I would also like to pay tribute to the work of the Child Migrants Trust and the International Association of Former Child Migrants and their Families, which have campaigned for justice over many years. I know that the House will join me in paying special tribute to Margaret Humphreys, who founded the Child Migrants Trust and has been a constant champion and fighter for child migrants and their families.

>
> Although we cannot undo the events of the past, we can take action now to support people to regain their true identities and reunite with their families and loved ones, and to go some way to repair the damage that has been inflicted. I can announce today support for former child migrants that includes the establishment of a new £6 million family restoration fund.
> There are many painful memories as a result of the child migration schemes, and for many, today's apology will come too late for them to hear it. We cannot change history, but I believe that by confronting the failings of the past we show that we are determined to do all we can to heal the wounds. I commend this statement to the House."[148]

169 A number of applicants to the Inquiry were present when this statement was made, and in their evidence to this Inquiry they and others welcomed the apology. The Family Restoration Fund referred to by the Prime Minister provides financial assistance to former child migrants by paying for flights to, and accommodation in, the United Kingdom by former child migrants who want to re-establish links with their families and relations. A significant number of applicants have taken advantage of the Fund to return to the United Kingdom for two-week visits, and it is apparent that they have greatly appreciated this practical assistance to enable them to meet their families. During the Inquiry it emerged that HIA 401 wrote to the Secretary of State for Health pointing out the difficulties created by the three-year limit on the life of the Fund. The Inquiry asked that the position be clarified, and was informed by counsel for the DHSSPS that it has been confirmed that the life of the Fund will be extended until 2017.[149] Whilst the Family Restoration Fund has undoubtedly been of considerable assistance to many former child migrants, it will therefore expire in 2017 unless the United Kingdom decides to further extend its operation.

170 In recent years the Sisters of Nazareth have supported about 50 former child migrants in a similar way by paying for their flights back to the United Kingdom.[150] The Sisters have also apologised to those children in their care who were sent to Australia from the Sisters' homes in Northern Ireland. In 2005 they issued a statement in which they said:

> "We, the Sisters of Nazareth, sincerely apologise and are deeply saddened by the pain and distress suffered by so many men and women as a result of the Child Migration Scheme. We wholeheartedly commit ourselves to continue to support those who contact us and warmly welcome each one to Nazareth House, welcoming accommodation if required."[151]

171 At the conclusion of her evidence to the Inquiry on behalf of the Sisters, Sr Brenda said:

> "I think hindsight's a great thing and I think – looking back now, I think the Congegation regrets the grave injustice done to these children in sending them out, not just to the children but to their families as well, and I think no matter the most eloquent apology, or the most beautiful monument, or no matter how much money they receive will never make up for what we took from them in sending them there. I know some made good lives for themselves, and having been out in Australia and spoken to some migrant children, they still have this, 'What if...? What if I had stayed in Ireland?' even though they had made good lives for themselves out there, and I think we have to acknowledge – that's the government, the British Government, the Australian Government, the churches, the congregations, the institutes – we all have to put our hands up and acknowledge that maybe it wasn't the right thing, even though it was done in the best interests of the child at the time."[152]

Systemic Failings by the Northern Ireland Government

172 (1) It was indifferent to the practice of the voluntary sector in Northern Ireland of sending child migrants to Australia.

(2) It failed to fully inform itself as to what was happening once it became aware that significant numbers of such young children were being sent to Australia by voluntary organisations such as the Sisters of Nazareth.

(3) It failed to make any enquiries whatever as to the fate of these children.

(4) It failed to make any representations to the United Kingdom Government about the operation of the child migrant schemes.

Module 4 – Sisters of Nazareth, Belfast: Introduction

Para

Introduction

1 In Module 4 we considered two Roman Catholic children's homes, Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge, which were sited near each other, about one and a half miles south of Belfast city centre. The Module commenced with an introduction by Senior Counsel on 5 January 2015, and continued until 19 May 2015 when there were closing submissions. In all, there were 41 days of hearings allocated to this Module. In total, evidence was received concerning the two homes, either in person or through the reading of their statements, from a total of 117 witnesses who had been in Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge as children. Of these, (taking account of witnesses who were in both homes) 74 gave oral evidence in this module. Thirty-three other witnesses, such as sisters, houseparents, social workers or inspectors also gave oral evidence. More people spoke to the Inquiry about the Belfast Nazareth homes, therefore, than about any other homes.

2 There were 50 applicants who had been resident in Nazareth House who contributed statements. The evidence of ten of these witnesses was read out as they were unable to attend for health reasons, and two because the witnesses sadly had died since preparing their statements. Three did not engage further with the Inquiry. One witness had given his evidence about Nazareth House during the module on Rubane. We therefore heard oral evidence from 34 witnesses.

3 We received evidence from 52 former residents of Nazareth Lodge. The statements of five were read out because of the ill health of the applicants, and two because of the deaths of the applicants, again sadly before they could give oral evidence. Five of the witnesses had given their evidence in the Rubane module, so that in this module we received oral evidence from 40 witnesses. In all, 31 of the people who gave evidence to the Inquiry concerning the Belfast Nazareth homes had also been in Rubane, as from 1953 to 1972 the boys in Nazareth Lodge were usually transferred there at the age of eleven. Two of the witnesses were not applicants but were former residents, one of them appearing at the request of the Sisters of Nazareth.

4 A number of children were sent to Australia as child migrants from both homes. Of these, two former residents from Nazareth House and one from Nazareth Lodge gave oral evidence during the module, and have been included in the figures above. There were also ten more applicants from Nazareth House and twelve from Nazareth Lodge who gave evidence during the module concerning Australia. Their evidence is dealt with in Chapter 6. One of these witnesses had been in both homes, and so in total, therefore, 24 child migrants who had been in Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge gave evidence to the Inquiry. It should be noted that many applicants who gave evidence in other modules provided only limited accounts of their time at Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge.

5 We received evidence from seven social workers, six middle and senior managers in the social services and five members of the Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) or Social Services inspectorate (SSI). One teacher, one GP, one chaplain, one handyman, two volunteers, five houseparents and eight sisters provided evidence. Three of these people did not appear due to ill-health; the remainder gave both written and oral evidence. The evidence of all but one related to Nazareth Lodge, mainly because Nazareth House closed in 1984 and they provided evidence concerning enquiries into complaints about Nazareth Lodge in the following years. In addition, one sister who gave evidence had moved from one home to the other, and her evidence related to both homes.

6 Submissions were also received from Sister Brenda McCall on behalf of the Sisters of Nazareth, from the HSCB on behalf of the predecessor bodies which had provided social work support for the children and their families, and from Dr Hilary Harrison for the then Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

7 We are indebted to the witnesses, all of whom came to address disturbing and painful personal memories or difficult issues for which their organisations had been responsible. The memories recounted to us typically related to events between forty and eighty years ago, and we have been aware that while the details of some incidents have remained sharp because of their emotional impact at the time, other memories are hazier or may have been influenced by the sharing of accounts or the passage of time. We are aware that for a small number of applicants who came to tell us of their experiences there has been the added shock that other witnesses have accused them of bullying or some form of abuse, and coming to terms with the perceptions of others will have added to their distress.[1]

8 The Congregation has emphasised the risk entailed in relying on memories that may be faulty or false. We have been alert to the need to cross-check witnesses' written and oral evidence for consistency with the evidence of others and surviving documentation. As might be expected, we have come across errors and inconsistencies. One witness, for example, thought that as a very young child she had been in Nazareth House, but written records indicated that she had confused the home with another institution; in view of her age at the time and the length of time since her period in care, such confusion is thoroughly understandable. The fact that we have quoted witnesses extensively does not mean that we have accepted their versions of events unquestioningly. We appreciate that some evidence will have been affected by exaggeration or false memories, and the fact that we have not qualified every statement with a clause to state that this is the witness's allegation should not be taken to imply that we accept or reject the particular observation.

9 However, the more witnesses who repeated similar accounts of life in the two homes, and the more substantiating detail they provided, the more persuasive they proved to be. It is not our role to decide precisely what happened in relation to each allegation or to determine the guilt of individuals, but to conclude whether on balance there were general systemic failures. The volume and detail of the evidence has been sufficient to provide us with a full picture of what life was like in the two homes and to reach conclusions about the allegations of systemic abuse. It should be noted that, while many witnesses have been quoted in this chapter, on most subjects there were many others who have not been quoted but who provided corroborative evidence.

10 Inevitably, the applicants to the Inquiry have largely been people who had unhappy experiences about which they wished to complain, and drawing together their evidence in this chapter has also been a selective process, primarily identifying the failings of the homes. The picture painted, therefore, is inevitably not a balanced account of life in the homes.

The Homes

11 When the land was acquired and the homes were built, they were in countryside on the edge of the city. Since then, because of urban growth, the sites became embedded in a built-up area, but at the time of their construction the two homes were ideally situated in accordance with the thinking of the time, as they were readily accessible to Belfast, but the children were able to enjoy the space of the countryside, away from the cramped and squalid city conditions where many of them had previously lived.

12 Both homes were run by the Sisters of Nazareth, and each had its Mother Superior. Both were accountable through the Mother Regional, who was responsible for the Order's services throughout Northern Ireland and the Republic for most of the period covered by the Inquiry to the Mother General, who was based in Hammersmith. The Order, its Rules and its systems of finance, governance and quality assurance are described more fully in Chapter 5 of this Report on Termonbacca and Nazareth House, Bishop Street, which were also run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Londonderry.

13 Although the two homes were sited only two hundred yards apart, they were managed separately, and each had its own community of sisters. For most of their history the main distinction between the two homes was that Nazareth House was for girls while Nazareth Lodge was for boys. Their backgrounds were, however, also distinct, as Nazareth House was a children's home from the start, whereas Nazareth Lodge was originally an industrial school. Until Nazareth Lodge was reclassified as a children's home in 1950, they worked under different regulations and were subject to different systems of inspection.

14 It was the practice in homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth to divide up children by gender and age. This may simply have been a matter of convenience, in view of the need to cope with large numbers of children whose needs did indeed differ with age and gender. Within Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House not only were the children separated out by gender, but they were also divided by age group. There was a nursery unit for babies and toddlers and separate groups for young children of primary school age and older children of secondary school age.

15 Until families became smaller in the 1970s it was quite possible that the Sisters would be asked to admit several children from one family at the same time, following family breakdown caused by the death of a parent, severe illness or absence through working in England. In consequence, when groups of siblings were admitted, it was possible that they would be placed in different homes and different units within the homes, such that they had very little contact. Children were often unaware of the whereabouts of their siblings, even when they were living in the same building, and witnesses provided many examples of separation from their siblings.[2]

16 Although this practice of dividing and managing children may have been necessary as a way of supervising large numbers in the early history of the homes, it was considered contrary to good practice throughout most of the period covered by the remit of the Inquiry, as the Home Office Guidance circulated in 1952 made clear.[3] Some witnesses were of the opinion that there was a deliberate policy to split siblings, but it seems that the splitting was essentially the consequence of the way in which the homes were organised, though the impact proved to be sufficient to damage long-term relationships between brothers and sisters.

17 The Congregation was clear that it had no such policy. They denied that there was any attempt to conceal siblings from each other, but admitted that they themselves might have been unaware of siblings placed in other homes.[4] Nor was there any attempt to separate siblings, though the age-based organisation of the homes meant that they might meet infrequently.[5] In their final statement the Sisters said:

> "For the avoidance of doubt, the Congregation maintains that throughout the relevant period it encouraged family and sibling contact wherever it was possible and practical."[6]

Indeed, in their final statement the Congregation gave several examples of families maintaining contact.[7]

18 The splitting of families is a practice that appears to have changed from 1968 onwards, when boys were first admitted to Nazareth House. Almost all of the concerns about the splitting of families were expressed by witnesses who were in the homes prior to 1968 and the witnesses who reported ongoing contact with siblings were in the homes from 1968 onwards.

19 In their later years, the Sisters acknowledged that separating siblings was no longer acceptable and both homes admitted both boys and girls. The Hughes inquiry was informed that the first girls were admitted to Nazareth

Lodge in 1967,[8] but HIA 423 was admitted to Nazareth Lodge as a baby in 1964 so that she could remain with her older brother, with the intention that they would be fostered together. In the event, HIA 423 was six years old before this happened.[9] In 1969, on the direction of a judge, HIA 175's little brother was the first boy to be placed in Nazareth House and he was given the bed next to hers so that she could keep an eye on him.[10]

20 Although the two homes were sited near each other, they do not appear to have interacted much. The Nazareth Lodge boys played football on the playing fields adjacent to Nazareth House, and on occasion the nuns organised visits for girls to go and meet their brothers. HIA 204 only remembered seeing his sisters in the summertime when they played on a field in front of Nazareth Lodge.[11]

21 The children also mingled when invited to Christmas parties provided by Belfast businesses. At times in the 1970s, boys visited Nazareth House to act as altar boys but they recalled that they had no contact with the girls on such occasions. In the later years there were a few examples of children being transferred from one home to the other. There were also a few staff who worked in both homes. By and large, however, the homes were run quite independently as two separate communities.

22 Although the two homes were separately run, there were many parallels in their styles of management, the childcare methods employed and the types of abuse which former residents have alleged. It will be noted that similar patterns could be seen in the two homes run by the Order in Londonderry considered in Chapter 5. While some of these similarities may in part have developed because of the policies of the Order of the Sisters of Nazareth, it seems more likely that they resulted mainly from contacts between people working in Roman Catholic homes sharing ideas on the grapevine, as similar systems and problems have also been reported in other homes, not only run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Northern Ireland, but also by other Orders, and in the Republic of Ireland and in Australia.[12]

23 Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge are dealt with in separate chapters below, but the similarities mean that there will be some repetition of the key issues, and the headings and subheadings within the two chapters are almost identical. Both homes were very large and institutional. Both were seriously underfunded in the early decades of the Inquiry's remit, and this was particularly apparent in the poor levels of staffing, which inevitably led to a dearth of personal individual attention and care for many of the children. Unsurprisingly, a number of impersonal institutional systems were adopted in order to keep the homes going.

12 Many of the childcare practices reported by witnesses in this chapter are also described in a book about St Joseph's Industrial School at Cavan in the Republic of Ireland where there was a serious fire in 1943.Children of the Poor Clares by Mavis Arnold and Heather Laskey (1985).

24 Over the main decades covered by the allegations (the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s) a variety of improvements were made in both homes, with the introduction of smaller units, the appointment of lay staff to augment the nuns, better living conditions and investment in training for staff. By the end of the period covered by the Inquiry the quality of childcare in both homes had greatly improved, but the use of the homes by the Boards was reduced for a variety of reasons, such as better preventative work, an increased use of foster care, shorter periods in residential care, alternative residential provision and smaller families. In consequence this meant that in the 1980s and 1990s the occupancy of the two homes was steadily reduced and both were eventually closed as they were not economically viable - Nazareth House in 1984 and Nazareth Lodge in 1999.

25 Unhappily, despite the progressive improvements, for a variety of reasons many of these developments appear to have been implemented one or two decades too late. The Home Office Guidance on the division of large homes into small groups issued in 1952, for example, did not become reality until about 1970 in Nazareth House and 1972 in Nazareth Lodge. The care methods being employed by the Order were therefore out of date throughout most of the Inquiry's remit.

26 The failure to update the childcare practice in the two homes appears to have been influenced by two main factors. First, following the implementation of the Children Act 1950, which permitted the welfare authorities to finance the care of children in homes run by voluntary organisations, the state was content to allow the Sisters to continue to proceed as before, relying solely on the funds they could raise from the Catholic community to cover their running costs, though the MoHA helped with capital grants and money to support training programmes. It was only in the 1960s that the welfare authorities took significant steps to take children in the two Catholic homes into care and therefore pay for the care of the children. Thereafter the two homes had increasing levels of income and were able to recruit more staff and to make improvements to the buildings.

27 The second factor is that the Order wished to be self-sufficient and feared the impact of state intervention. It was felt that the appointment of lay staff could have an effect on the values which the Sisters wished to promulgate in the way that they worked with children, and that if they came to rely upon finance from the state, they risked becoming beholden to it. These fears had some grounding. The nature of the care offered did change with the appointment of lay staff, which coincided with a reduction in the number of sisters available to do the work. More significantly, when the Health and Social Services Boards were funding every child and the demand for residential childcare places diminished, the two homes were no longer independent of the state but inevitably had to be reduced in size and eventually closed.

28 It was against this background that witnesses have alleged abuse. It has to be acknowledged that in both homes the sisters responsible for the children must have been under severe pressure, especially in the earlier years, in having to provide for the children's material needs, keep up standards of hygiene and maintain order, day in day out, with few holidays or days off. (The summer period when many of the children were placed with families appears to have been the one time when the Sisters could hold retreats or take time off.) Because of the poor staffing and the pressure on the sisters' time, however, very few children could have experienced personal attention for more than a few moments in the early decades, contrasting sharply with the guidance given in 1970 in the standard text book Residential Life with Children that each child should have an hour's individual attention each day.

29 The evidence suggests that in both homes the sisters and other staff fell into three groups.

(a) Despite the pressures, some nuns still managed to remain caring and imaginative in trying to provide homely personal care, and witnesses have spoken warmly about the care they offered, and have maintained links subsequently.

(b) A number of nuns and lay staff are the subjects of small numbers of allegations of abuse, while also being found to be generally supportive and caring by witnesses.

(c) At the core of the witnesses' statements, though, there were in each home a very small number of sisters and lay staff who were the subject of multiple allegations. It was during their tenure that the greatest numbers of allegations of physical and emotional abuse were made.

The sheer volume and detail of the allegations is persuasive, and the difficult conditions under which these staff worked did not offer an excuse for the persistent physical abuse, at times amounting to cruelty, which they inflicted. The accounts given of the abuse meted out by these people will be dealt with individually.

30 In both Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House there were some children who clearly had miserable childhoods, experiencing a very basic standard of living, receiving no individualised love and attention, and wondering when they were next going to be subject to abuse. It must be stated, though, that other children clearly managed to avoid being abused or positively enjoyed their time in the homes, and many have kept contact with the sisters and lay staff up to the present day. Even some who stated that they were abused stayed in contact because the nuns were the only family they had. Similarly, some witnesses have clearly had most unhappy experiences as adults, probably influenced at least in part by their treatment in the homes as children, while others have had happier lives as adults and have come to terms with their childhood experiences.

31 Although we heard from 118 witnesses in this module, they were only a small proportion of the total number of children - approximately 6,000 - who lived in the two homes. It is impossible to obtain an accurate picture of the experiences of those who did not come forward. We have heard of some who clearly suffered from ill-health and mental health problems, and from anecdotal evidence more ex-residents appear to have died prematurely than one would expect in the population as a whole. We have heard of others who have succeeded in life. Our remit, though, is to respond to the people who came forward as witnesses and to determine from their evidence whether there was systemic abuse.

The History of Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge

32 The development of Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge was motivated by the drive on the part of the Roman Catholic Church to provide services for Catholic children, so that they would not need to be admitted to workhouses, state institutions or homes run by non-Catholic organisations where the Church felt that their spiritual needs might not be met appropriately. This was a matter of considerable concern to the Roman Catholic Church in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, as there was some active proselytisation to attract children to become Protestants. The concern continued to influence thinking concerning childcare services within the Roman Catholic Church up to the 1970s. As Sr Brenda explained, there is now no such concern, and it is the responsibility of those who manage children's homes to ensure that children have opportunities to practise their faith.[13]

33 In 1868 The Industrial Schools (Ireland) Act provided for setting up Industrial Schools for "neglected, orphaned or abandoned children", and "for the rescue and care of younger boys ... who were in danger of becoming delinquent". It was, however, over thirty years before a Catholic home was set up in Belfast to meet this specific need.

34 On 9 May 1876 Bishop Dorrian invited the Sisters of Nazareth to establish an old people's home and to care for children in Belfast, initially in the Bishop's own house in Ballynafeigh on the Ormeau Road. It consisted of two semi-detached villas, which were merged into one to form the home and later incorporated into the main home.[14] Mother St Basil, who was the founder of the Congregation of the Poor Sisters of Nazareth, and three other sisters established the home.[15]

35 in 1877 a number of whitewashed cottages sited on the same property were used for Nazareth House.[16] In 1884 the Sisters of Nazareth had a new building on a site adjacent to the Bishop's house on the Ormeau Road in Belfast.[17] In 1897 a site formerly known as Fox Lodge (which had been used as an industrial school for Protestant boys) was purchased by the Sisters of Nazareth to provide accommodation for 50 boys in Belfast; until then they had lived in a wing of the home for old people.[18] At first, five or six sisters were seconded from Nazareth House to run the home, but it was on 8 August 1900 that Nazareth Lodge, Belfast, was opened for boys by the Sisters of Nazareth as a separate community, and it was registered as an industrial school on 11 November 1902 to accommodate 50 Catholic boys under the age of ten.[19] The girls remained at Nazareth House, and from this time onwards the sexes were segregated for nearly seventy years.

36 The demand for places was considerable, and as Nazareth Lodge was inadequate for the 200 boys living there, an additional wing was erected, and on 15 October 1905 it was opened by Cardinal Logue. The new building was financed by a loan from the National Bank of £10,000. It is clear that the then Mother General did not approve of the new building or the certification, which had been undertaken at the behest of the Diocese.[20] The Industrial School Certificate was extended in April 1912.[21] The home then served as an industrial school for boys until 1951.

37 The first baby was admitted to Nazareth Lodge on 16 October 1934, when the home took on the role of providing a diocesan service for babies. A purpose-built nursery named Bethlehem was later erected, serving up to 90 babies. Although this was staffed and run by the Sisters of Nazareth and was within the curtilage of Nazareth Lodge, it was technically under diocesan control.

38 The city of Belfast was subjected to severe bombing in April and May 1941. The boys in the upper floors of Nazareth Lodge could see the impact on the city. They were moved to lower floors as a safety measure, but the homes were not evacuated, and fortunately neither home suffered any damage.

39 Overcrowding appears to have been an ongoing problem as the Sisters did not want to turn any child away, but this had a serious impact on the quality of care which could be offered. On 23 December 1949, for example, Nazareth Lodge Industrial School was inspected. It was certified for 206 children, but it was seriously overcrowded and 282 boys were present. There were many detailed criticisms: for example, there were only four toilets for 164 boys aged over 5 years and their accommodation was badly lit and badly ventilated. As a result of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, reformatories and industrial schools became training schools and an inspectorate was set up. However, very few of the boys at Nazareth Lodge had been committed by the courts: by December 1950 there were only three boys committed by the courts and 274 voluntary cases in Nazareth Lodge.[22] Indeed, all of the applicants from the period when Nazareth Lodge was an industrial school were there on a voluntary basis.[23] It was decided therefore in 1951 that it should be registered as a children's home.

40 The next major change in the role of Nazareth Lodge was in 1953. Rubane House at Kircubbin was opened, with a Board of Management appointed by the Diocese of Down and Connor, to be run by brothers of the De La Salle Order, to provide for older Roman Catholic boys, and to reduce the overcrowding at Nazareth Lodge.[24]

41 For several years thereafter, parties of a dozen or so eleven-year-old boys were transferred to Rubane every autumn, and Nazareth Lodge became essentially a home for boys up to the age of eleven, though occasionally an older boy was permitted to stay on in order to attend a school in Belfast. This system continued until 1972. This change also addressed the concern that, in being cared for by the nuns, the older boys at Nazareth Lodge had had no male role models during their adolescence.

42 This development had a number of consequences. One was the change in group dynamics without the influence of the older boys. Witnesses such as HIA 159 said that when the older boys moved to Rubane in 1951 there was no more abuse from them, which was a great relief.[25] HIA 159 said that with the older boys in Rubane:

> "It was great when none of the older boys were there or the nuns, as we could throw water, soap and flannels about".[26]

The opportunity was used to break the large groups up and about 1951-52 the home was split into four groups. HIA 159 noted that each boy had a bed and a locker.

43 The development of smaller units was consistent with professional thinking at that time. The Home Office issued Guidance, which was circulated to voluntary organisations in Northern Ireland in 1952. This recommended the use of family group homes and it contained an appendix on ways in which large institutions might be broken down into smaller units in order to create family-sized groups and offer the children a more personalised type of care. The four units in Nazareth Lodge each had the capacity to hold about thirty boys, and each of these units was therefore still the size of a largish children's home, much bigger than the small groups recommended by the Home Office.

44 The early 1950s were a difficult time for agencies providing residential care. Belfast had suffered terribly from the bombing raids during the Second World War and nationally priority had to be given to housing. Food rationing only ended in 1953, the economy had not picked up, and the Sisters of Nazareth were still relying totally on financial support from the community to run the homes. It is not surprising therefore that standards of physical care were still very poor.

45 A detailed inspection report by Kathleen Forrest, an Inspector in the Ministry of Home Affairs, has survived from this period. She wrote that she visited Nazareth Lodge on 9 January 1954 and found that the babies were:

> "well-cared, well-clothed and fed" but "The whole premises - except the parts immediately above the laundry and boiler-house - were dreadfully cold. ...The babies' hands were blue with cold and felt icy to touch. ...The school-children are now the worst off and Rev. Mother agrees that they are not getting any sort of chance in life and cannot make proper development, especially those who have known nothing but this institutional care from babyhood. ...What is needed here is really fundamental re-organisation so that these little creatures can have some individual loving care instead of being dragooned. Rev. Mother recognises this and even went so far as to say that children playing in the gutters of the slums were better off, if they had a father and mother to care for them, however poorly".[27]

46 The needs of Nazareth Lodge were recognised in the distribution of grants in June 1954. £1000 had already been allocated out of the Ministry's budget to support voluntary homes, and a further £5000 was allocated to help with redecoration, upgrading the dining room, fencing, reconditioning the dormitories and providing toys. It was recognised that the headquarters of the Order in Hammersmith were not supportive of the "new-fangled" idea of breaking the dormitories up into smaller bedrooms, but this was clearly the Ministry's aim, in accordance with Home Office thinking.[28]

47 One of the reasons for the opening of Rubane at Kircubbin was to alleviate the pressure on Nazareth Lodge, as there was a considerable demand for places. Nazareth House faced similar problems and a number of children from both homes were sent as child migrants to Australia. The migration of children from Northern Ireland to Australia is dealt with in Chapter 6, but three of the migrants gave evidence in this Module.

27 SNB 16116.
28 SNB 16116.

48 It was also in 1953 that St Joseph's baby home was opened, superseding the Bethlehem wing at Nazareth Lodge.[29]

49 In the early years, nearly all of the children placed in the two homes were placed voluntarily. This meant that:

(a) the children's parents had requested, or at least agreed to, their placements;

(b) the placements had been arranged by their parish priest or someone else in a position of authority in the Roman Catholic Church, such as the Mother Superior of a nursery;

(c) by implication, the welfare authorities had not been involved in the placements, had not assessed the children's needs, were not accountable for the children's care, did not pay for the placements, and indeed were usually unaware of the children's existence.

50 The Sisters of Nazareth were at this stage reluctant to be beholden to the secular authorities, but their independence came at a price. In continuing the practice of voluntary placements they were choosing to forgo substantial payments by the welfare authorities, which affected their resources to improve physical standards of care and staffing. The welfare authorities for their part did not seek to involve themselves and were prepared to let the Catholic homes care at their own cost for children who otherwise might have needed to be taken into their care.

51 By 1956 the outdated nature of the large institutions was already noted. In Children in Care, a report by the Northern Ireland Child Welfare Council published by HMSO, it was concluded that the practice of voluntary placements was:

> "likely to lead in the future to serious difficulties unless allied with closer co-operation with welfare authorities" and suggested that voluntary agencies should seek the help of the welfare authorities before admitting children. It was noted that:

> "some voluntary organisations are already committed to buildings that are difficult to alter".[30]

The report also addressed staff training needs, staffing ratios, inspection, discipline, domestic work expected of children and the danger of institutionalisation.

52 It was unfortunately another decade before the Sisters of Nazareth were offered financial and professional support from the welfare authorities, and while foster care was expanding and the welfare authorities were opening smaller homes (mostly family-sized) Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge remained in their large and increasingly outdated buildings.

53 In establishing smaller groups within the two homes the Sisters of Nazareth were constrained not only by their limited resources but also by the number of sisters available, as they were reluctant for some time to appoint lay staff, for fear that the Order's influence might be weakened through the involvement of staff who had not committed their lives to the service.

54 The problems of the voluntary sector persisted and in 1966 The Role of Voluntary Homes in the Child Care Service was published for the Northern Ireland Child Welfare Council by HMSO. The report was based on visits to all voluntary homes and concluded that:

> "in the majority of homes it was evident that improved standards of accommodation, education and training were required".[31]

The homes were:

> "hampered to a greater or lesser degree by lack of money".[32]

The majority of homes had no trained field officers and decided on admissions without reference to the welfare authorities. Staffing levels were inadequate. Some voluntary organisations were concerned that they might lose their independence if they developed too close a relationship with the welfare authorities, but the report concluded that:

> "The best hopes lie in increased mutual understanding and sympathy and in an appreciation of what each has to offer the other". [33]

55 In 1968 Belfast Welfare Authority was the first authority to decide to allocate a social worker to every child in residential care. It should be noted that families became smaller, and the welfare authorities, and later the boards, increasingly undertook preventive work to support children at home, fostering services were developed and small children's homes were built. The result was that the children requiring residential care were fewer in number, were generally older, and were often more disturbed, having experienced failed foster placements, for example.

56 The demands placed on residential childcare staff became more complex, and a higher degree of professionalism was required if homes were to continue to be used by the welfare authorities. Robert Moore expressed sympathy for the staff, saying that prior to the implementation of the Hughes Report's recommendations homes were essentially being run by amateurs, who were "understaffed, underpaid and undervalued".[34]

57 From the late 1960s onwards the two homes were affected by the Troubles. The families of many of the children lived in areas where there was social unrest, and the children would have been concerned about their safety. Unlike some of the other homes and training schools we have considered, neither Nazareth House nor Nazareth Lodge was directly involved in the Troubles (with the exception of one visit by soldiers looking for rifles, following a hoax call)[35] and they could be seen to have offered a safe haven for children from home areas where there was civil disorder and a serious risk of danger to the children and their families. The main problem identified by witnesses was that children and young people who had been protected from sectarian discrimination and violence when living in the homes had not been prepared to deal with it when they were discharged as teenagers, and this put them at risk.

58 In 1972 a two-storey extension known as the Bethlehem wing of Nazareth Lodge was converted into two small units, each with its own dining room and other daytime facilities on the ground floor and bedrooms on the first floor. Shortly afterwards, the main building was converted to create two more small units, so that the home now consisted of four family-sized groups.[36] It was probably this development which heralded the introduction of a number of improvements over the next two decades.

59 It was September 1972 before the Belfast Welfare Committee agreed that the remainder of privately placed children should be received into care and funded by the welfare authorities.[37] From then on, weekly capitation fees were paid and, as the Order's income increased, lay staff were recruited, and with the improved staffing levels the groups were also reduced in size, improving the opportunities for children to receive more individualised care.

60 Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House both had large catchment areas and were seen as regional resources, but the majority of the children came from Belfast. The Eastern Health and Social Services Board, which covered Belfast, however, added considerably to its own range of residential provision, which was more up to date and consisted largely of smaller homes. The demand for residential placements diminished as foster care was used increasingly, and the length of children's stay in children's homes was also being reduced as social workers found long-term foster placements for them. Having quoted the details of thirteen children who spent more than ten years of their childhood in Nazareth Lodge or Nazareth House and who were placed there voluntarily, HSCB stated that:

> "Within the Applicants there are no examples of children that were placed in Nazareth Lodge, Belfast, or Nazareth House, Belfast, by the welfare authorities at a young age, and who then remained in the Home for such a long period."[38]

61 According to Mother Gertrude's evidence to the Hughes Inquiry, it was in 1967 that girls were first admitted to Nazareth Lodge.[39] Originally, as noted above, Roman Catholic providers had divided their homes by gender and age as a way of coping with the high level of demand, but this basic framework had served to split families. Making the homes mixed countered this problem.

62 Both Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge had their own schools at first. In 1974 the school on Ormeau Road at Nazareth House was closed and it amalgamated with the school at Nazareth Lodge, opening on 7 September 1974 under the name of St Michael's Primary School, which also provided services to children in the locality.

63 In 1975 the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) were introduced following the enactment of the Children and Young Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1968, but their content was very similar to the 1952 Regulations.[40]

64 In the later years Nazareth House provided residential care for children in three units, which acted virtually as separate homes, although the heads of the groups were all technically accountable to the Mother Superior. However, as the numbers of children admitted dropped, various options were considered, and the sisters involved decided to propose to the Mother

General in Hammersmith that the home should be closed. In doing so they were following a pattern which was being replicated in homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth throughout the United Kingdom. Despite all the internal improvements, the buildings remained large and institutional and were now well out of date.

65 By October 1980 there were only two groups in operation with twenty children resident in all.[41] By September 1983 there were only four children remaining.[42] On 31 May 1984 Nazareth House, Belfast, was closed, having accommodated 2,909 children since its opening in 1876. It continued to care for older people until 2000, when it finally closed.[43]

66 From the early 1970s there were five family groups in Nazareth Lodge, with twelve children in each group, but by April 1985 the numbers had reduced to 38 children and there were only three groups. Demand for places continued to fall and the last child was admitted in 1998. In 1999 the home, which had accommodated 3,708 children since its opening in 1900, was closed. Despite a campaign to preserve some of the buildings, they were demolished and the site was redeveloped. Nazareth Care Village has replaced Nazareth Lodge.[44]

67 Between them the two homes had, therefore, in total accommodated over six thousand children and young people in a period covering approximately a hundred and twenty years.

Governance

68 As noted above, the Mothers Superior of the two homes were accountable to the Regional Superior who in turn was accountable to the Superior General in Hammersmith. Decisions about the policies and plans for the Order were taken by the Congregation, which met every six years and elected the Superior General.

69 The Order was independent and not, therefore, accountable to the local Bishop, but the homes had close working links with the Diocese of Down and Connor. The bishops visited frequently, providing pastoral oversight to the Sisters, and in 1938 Bishop Mageean turned to the Sisters to run a nursery for babies on its behalf. This work was undertaken by Nazareth

Lodge until St Joseph's Baby Home was opened in 1953. The Bishop was supportive in the opening of Rubane, enabling Nazareth Lodge boys to transfer at secondary school age. The Diocese provided chaplains for the homes, and was also involved in the after-care of young people when they left the homes, as the Bishop was Patron of the Nazareth Lodge Welfare Committee.[45]

70 There is one reference to a House Committee being set up in 1952 for Nazareth House, chaired by Canon O'Neill to undertake the monthly statutory visits, but there is no information on its subsequent history.[46] There are references in the evidence to Nazareth Lodge having appointed a Management Committee in 1987 following the Hughes Inquiry, and it was treated as such, for example in its authority in establishing a subcommittee to inquire into complaints, but it had no managerial powers nor did it fulfil any statutory role.[47] It is considered in more detail in the section on inspection.

71 Prior to the 1980s, when the system changed, the Mother Superior of Nazareth Lodge was supported by two councillors, sisters who were drawn from the community who were not part of the residential child care staff, to provide her with confidential support. They met regularly, but their meetings were not minuted. The first councillor was older and more experienced; the second councillor was younger. This system was seen as augmenting Mother Regional's visits and meeting the statutory requirement for a monthly visit.[48]

Finance

72 The finance of residential childcare is dealt with more fully in Chapter 2, and the approach taken by the Congregation is considered in some detail in Chapter 5 concerning the Order's other two homes, Termonbacca and Bishop Street, Londonderry. This section is therefore brief and relates solely to Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge, Belfast.

73 As an industrial school, Nazareth Lodge had a mixed role which was not well defined. On the one hand, training schools admitted young offenders and the most disturbed children, and on the other, children's homes were intended to take children who for the most part did not exhibit serious behaviour problems. The remit of industrial schools lay in between; they were intended to take children on the verge of being in trouble, and prepare them for work.[49]

74 Some children at Nazareth Lodge were committed by courts, and the state funded their care. A Committee on Reformatories and Industrial Schools, set up by the Ministry of Home Affairs in 1922 reported in 1923 that funding for the schools was inadequate, and the Committee recommended a capitation grant of 2/6d per head per week from the Government and an equal amount from the relevant welfare authority.[50] By 1937 the Government payment had risen to 7/6d a week with an equal amount paid by the local authorities.

75 The boys committed by courts were aged 6 to 10; on reaching 10 they were transferred to St Patrick's. The numbers of committed boys were very low, however. In 1939 and again in 1944 there were only eleven committed boys, as against respectively 179 and 174 boys placed voluntarily by their families.[51]

76 When Nazareth Lodge became a children's home in 1951 the welfare authorities presumably replaced the state in taking responsibility for such placements, but the numbers placed under Fit Person Orders were also very low. The income from such placements was too small to have a significant impact on the home's budget. Some children were placed in the homes by welfare authorities, and there is a record of Belfast Welfare Committee paying £3 per week for a child's maintenance in 1956.[52] The numbers funded in this way at that time were, however, small, and the Sisters of Nazareth took no steps to increase their income by requesting that other children were funded by their welfare authorities.

77 The Sisters of Nazareth raised all the funds required for the provision of the services that they offered to boys admitted voluntarily. According to HIA 159:

> "The nuns used to go out every Wednesday and Saturday with their black bags and go door to door collecting. …They were known as the penny nuns", 49 The categories of children included neglected children, offenders under the age of 12, children under 14 who were beyond parental control, and children who persistently failed to attend school or refused to submit to reasonable school discipline. (SNB 13639).

51 SNB 13708, SNB 13750.

because they never refused to accept even a penny.[53] Some of the sisters were designated as 'questers' to undertake the collection of funds, and it should be noted that many of the people who donated were from the poorer sections of the community. SR 52 said that the rate paid to Nazareth Lodge by Health and Social Services Boards was low for voluntary homes and they could not have managed without these voluntary contributions.[54] The rates were, however, based on data provided by the homes which, pre-1973, took account of the income which the homes could raise voluntarily, though the later per capita fees ignored this. Furthermore, as the HSCB has pointed out, there were additional grants to cover birthday and Christmas presents, and holidays. The level of donations can be seen in the records for 1973-1984.[55] There was also a steady flow of legacies; some of these were sizeable, but they were not a reliable source of income.[56]

78 Businesses also contributed in kind, donating clothing or food. There are references, for example to Marks and Spencer providing food. Others, such as Mackies, provided parties for the children at Christmas, which were much appreciated. The problem was not as acute as in Londonderry because the economy in Belfast was stronger, but raising sufficient funding remained a major problem.

79 HIA 159 also noted:

> "There were also open days when hundreds of people were allowed to come up and look around to see where all the money the nuns collected door to door was going".

There were badges with a boy's face on it for 6d or a shilling, sold in the early 1960s.[57]

80 Some income was obtained from parents, but it is likely that this was more of a token gesture than a serious source of finance. HIA 204 said his mother paid 10/- per week for his upkeep. HIA 36 said his mother paid £5 a month throughout his stay at Nazareth Lodge.[58] HIA 43 said that although her father was not well off he was intimidated by the nuns into giving them money, handing over ten shilling notes on numerous occasions, and that they took advantage of him as he was a countryman.[59]

81 The witnesses' evidence contains a number of examples where small amounts of money were taken from children, after visits to families, for example. The Order has stated that this was done for safe-keeping, but none of the witnesses mentioned receiving the money later. Working children were also charged for their keep. Similarly toys, clothes and sweets were taken from children, and it was believed by witnesses that these were sold in other parts of the country to raise funds though this was denied by the Sisters.[60]

82 As noted earlier, the Order wished to remain self-sufficient, in order to avoid becoming beholden to the state. The consequence of the Sisters' approach was that, while the nuns themselves received no salary and only required their keep, the Order had insufficient resources to appoint paid staff. As HIA 87 put it:

> "Everybody had a job to do. ...they didn't have the staff to run the place."[61]

83 There was a steady increase in the number of placements financed by the welfare authorities. By March 1965 there were 88 voluntary placements and 31 funded by the welfare authorities in Nazareth House, and in Nazareth Lodge 81 placements were voluntary and 28 were paid for by the authorities.[62] From 1973 the Health and Social Services Boards paid a per capita rate in both Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge, irrespective of whether the children had been placed by the Boards or privately by their parents. The amount took account of the fund-raising undertaken by the voluntary bodies however, and the Sisters' success in obtaining donations and legacies therefore reduced the income they received from the state.[63] The Boards negotiated rates with each voluntary home and the HSCB accepted that at first they did not meet the actual costs of placements. They explained that in some cases this was due to lack of full information about the actual costs, but that it was more generally due to the Boards increasing the rates they were prepared to pay incrementally. The HSCB acknowledged that the voluntary sector argued in 1985 that the Boards were expecting them to provide a professional service provided by suitably trained staff without paying the economic rate for such care[64] but argued that the Boards did support the voluntary sector to professionalise its workforce. The weekly payments to the voluntary sector ranged from £42 to £198 in 1985, while the average cost of residential care per week in homes run by the four Boards ranged from £185 to over £250.[65] By 1991 Nazareth Lodge had accumulated a deficit of £45,000 this was cleared by a one-off grant from the Eastern Board, which was helpful, though it was unsatisfactory as a method of resolving an ongoing revenue problem.[66]

84 The matter was unresolved when Nazareth House closed, but the improvements made in the 1980s were substantial. In consequence there was sufficient funding both to improve physical standards of care and to appoint paid lay staff. Indeed, as the number of sisters diminished, the balance between lay and religious staff changed until the sisters' role was primarily to act as the managerial staff in charge of the units. By the time Nazareth Lodge closed, some of the team leaders were lay staff. This change was paralleled by an increase in staff training for both nuns and lay staff, and the introduction of a more professional approach to residential social work.

85 Following the implementation of the Children and Young Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1950 state funding was available to voluntary providers under Section 118 to improve premises or equipment. This measure proved problematic as welfare authorities were required to contribute towards the funding, but the decisions on approval were taken by the Ministry of Home Affairs. The welfare authorities therefore found it difficult to budget as they had no idea what the level of demand might be and they resented having to pay towards services which they did not use. Tyrone County Welfare Committee, for example, protested about contributing to grants to Nazareth Lodge. [67]

86 The grant awarded in 1954 by the Ministry of Home Affairs has already been mentioned.[68] The Ministry also paid grants to assist in providing qualifying training for staff. Typically this covered fees, expenses and replacement staff, though in the period before the Order started to employ lay staff the need for additional staff salaries might not have applied. Nazareth Lodge is recorded as having received £1000 in 1954 for this purpose, but the records do not detail how the money was used.[69]

87 Homes run by the Order could apply to the mother house in Hammersmith for loans, but the expectation was that such loans would be repaid, for example when legacies were received. In 1980, for instance, there is a record that £10,000 was repaid and, when in 1983 Nazareth Lodge was in difficulties prior to a substantial increase in the per capita allowance, a further £30,000 was borrowed from Hammersmith.[70]

Inspection

The Order's Systems

88 The Sisters of Nazareth had their own internal inspection system. The Superior General, who was based in Hammersmith, visited all homes once every three years and conducted a full inspection, which included the spiritual life of the community as well as the childcare. Mother Regional, who was responsible for all the services in both the Republic and Northern Ireland, was based in Dublin and typically visited three or four times a year, though she told the Hughes Inquiry that she had visited Nazareth Lodge 13 times in 1984. In evidence to the Hughes Inquiry Mother Gertrude, the then Mother Regional, said that the statutory requirement to undertake the monthly visits required under the Regulations rested with her.[71] If she typically visited only three or four times a year, this would have fallen well short of the statutory requirement of monthly visits.

89 In a report dated 14 April 1996 SR 189 said that in the 1950s Nazareth House had a committee consisting of the School Manager, the Local Superior, two teachers from the school and the sister in charge of the children. This committee met monthly and received reports from their appointee who visited the children; according to SR 189 any recommendations they made were implemented. It was a system established by the Congregation and was not intended to fulfil statutory visiting requirements.[72]

90 In October 1984, as a result of the Hughes Inquiry, a monitoring team was set up for Nazareth Lodge. The Committee was referred to as the Management Committee but its role was strictly advisory. Pat Kinder, who had been a senior administrator in the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, was invited by SR 36 to set up an Advisory Committee for Nazareth Lodge. He contacted a number of persons who had professional skills in sociology, psychology, medicine, teaching and the law.[73] All agreed to help; SR 36 approved the list and Pat Kinder agreed to act as secretary.

70 SNB 19896,19897.
71 SNB 50044.
72 SNB 16906.

91 The members of the Committee were allocated to one of the three groups within the home and they visited, meeting both staff and children. The Committee met monthly with the three sisters in charge of the groups and discussed any issues which they wished to raise. The Committee's purpose was to give the children access to someone other than their carers, and they inspected the complaints book.[74] SR 18 referred to a committee of volunteers who carried out monthly inspections in the 1980s and 1990s, which presumably was this Committee.[75] This Committee was asked to produce a written report every six months, to be presented to the Sister in Charge and Mother Regional.[76]

92 Neither the advisory systems to support the homes' Mothers Superior described above, nor the (approximately) quarterly visits of the Mother Regional, appear to have met the statutory requirement laid down in paragraph 4 (2) of the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Authorities Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland), issued in 1952 and reiterated in 1975, that both the homes should have been:

> "visited at least once in every month by a person who shall satisfy himself whether the home is conducted in the interests of the well-being of the children and shall report to the administering authority upon his visit and shall enter in the record book ... his name and the date of his visit". [77]

Mother Regional acknowledged that it was her role to meet this requirement, but her visits appear to have been too infrequent and there is no indication that reports were prepared on the visits. The other support systems were explicitly advisory. We consider the failure to meet the statutory requirement for both Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge to be visited monthly to have been a systemic failure.

State Systems

93 As an industrial school Nazareth Lodge was inspected annually by the inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs. The Ministry was authorised to inspect under Section 46 of the Children Act 1908, but the Ministry had no direct control over the training schools and industrial schools which it inspected. Its limited remit was to report on the health of the children, the conditions in which the children were kept and the schools' record-keeping. Reports dating from 1927 to 1944 are extant, and they are broadly positive about the state of the premises, the health of the boys and the training and education being offered. Visits made by Ministry of Home Affairs Inspectors to Nazareth Lodge from 1950 onwards are listed in Annex C of the evidence prepared by Dr Hilary Harrison, indicating consistent annual visits.[78]

94 Following the passing of the Children and Young Persons (Northern Ireland) Act in 1950, Regulations were introduced for voluntary children's homes, and these would have been applied to Nazareth Lodge which had been re-registered as a children's home. (These Regulations appear to have been based on Regulations which had been applied in England and Wales following the Children Act 1933, which was not replicated in Northern Ireland.) In 1975 the Regulations were updated, following the 1968 Act, but they remained largely the same.

95 The Regulations were applied by the Ministry of Home Affairs, and there are records to indicate that Kathleen Forrest visited Nazareth Lodge. Her visit reports indicate real concern for the children, awareness of the practical issues, and a desire to take action to remedy unsatisfactory conditions.[79] Her visits were not considered to be formal inspections, such that neither Nazareth House nor Nazareth Lodge was deemed to have been inspected until 1983.[80]

96 The Social Work Advisory Group was established in 1973, the DHSSPS (now DoH) has claimed that adopted a new approach, by which it offered advice and support, and ceased to undertake annual inspections. In the light of Kincora and the Hughes Inquiry the advisory approach was dropped and a more rigorous inspectorial approach was resumed. This development and the philosophy behind the changes of policy are examined more fully in Chapter 2.

97 The effect of these changes was that there was a hiatus of several years in which there were very few formal inspections. The Social Work Advisory Group carried out an inspection of Nazareth Lodge in October 1983 and provided evidence to the Hughes Inquiry.[81] From 1985 the Social Services Inspectorate undertook annual inspections, the last being in November 1995.[82] Our criticisms of the lack of inspection by SWAG and the content of the inspections referred to above are dealt with in the respective sections of this chapter on the two homes.

98 The SWAG and SSI also had a co-ordinating role. Following the Sheridan Report and the Hughes Inquiry there were annual "Review of Registration Meetings" at which SWAG, the Department's Policy Branch, voluntary providers and Boards were all represented, and these meetings were used to discuss the planning of residential childcare provision.[83] These developments did not affect Nazareth House, which had closed by this time.

Chapter 8:

Module 4 – Sisters of Nazareth, Belfast: Nazareth House

Site and Premises

1 Nazareth House was sited on a wedge-shaped piece of land at the junction of Ravenhill Road and Ormeau Road on the south side of Belfast. The site also housed a home for older people.

2 At the front of the building there were rooms for visitors, where the chaplain had his breakfast after Mass. The residence for elderly men was on the ground floor on the Ravenhill side. There was a long corridor on which the classrooms were situated and beyond them, the girls' dining room. There was also a staircase leading to the first floor. The elderly ladies lived on the first floor, and there was the chapel and a large hall, used for entertainments.[1] The bedrooms for the children were on the upper floors, and during the period when many of the allegations were made, there was a partition and an open doorway dividing the dormitories, with 20 beds on one side and 19 on the other.

3 There were three gardens. The nursery garden for the little children had railings round it. The girls' garden had swings and climbing frames which were in constant use, and they used the garden also for skipping and netball. The nuns' garden, which was full of flowers, was only open to children on special occasions.[2] HIA 234 noted:

> "There were big walls all around Nazareth House and there were bits of broken glass embedded in the tops of the walls, as well as barbed wire".[3]

Whether this statement is factually accurate or not, it conveys the sense that the home was an enclosed community which met all the children's needs on site.

The Groups

4 In the 1940s there were three groups, named Our Lady's, St Joseph's and Sacred Heart, which was for the younger children. The names appear to have changed at some point, as St Joseph's was replaced by St Anne's. Our Lady's wore blue for Sunday Mass; Sacred Heart wore red; St Anne's green.[4] The girls wore tweed skirts and matching jumpers in the colour of their group on Sundays and, as weekday uniform for their primary school, gingham dresses.[5] In the early 1950s the seniors and juniors were divided into three groups of about thirty children in each group. During the period covered by the majority of the allegations of abuse, they were Our Lady's, under SR 31, St Anne's, under SR 116 and Sacred Heart, under SR 134. The nun responsible for the group slept in a small cell in the corner of the dormitory.[6] In the 1960s cubicles were installed, providing some privacy in the dormitories.[7]

5 About 1972 the big dormitories were replaced with smaller bedrooms for three girls. The girls were also given thicker mattresses and minty toothpaste and scented soap instead of carbolic,[8] a wardrobe, cupboard and chest of drawers.[9] Writing about Nazareth House in 1973, SR 18 said:

> "At that time there were three independent family groups in the home, each supervised by a sister; each group consisted of eight to ten children, made up mainly of two to three sibling groups. The units had just been refurbished. The layout of each was very homely, easy to manage and tastefully decorated. It consisted of four bedrooms, each with two/three beds, a lounge, dining room with adjoining kitchenette, a study room, two bathrooms/toilets, a laundry room and a bedroom for each sister."[10]

About 1975 the numbers reduced to under twenty and so two groups were amalgamated. Another sister arrived, so that there were two per group. Boys were admitted about this time.[11]

6 The cooking of the main meals still took place in the central kitchen, with the food taken by trolley to the groups' dining rooms. Food was supplied at no cost by Marks & Spencer at this time, including marzipan cakes, big bags of crisps and meat.[12]

7 When they were aged 16, the girls moved from the children's section to the girls' dormitory, where they had curtains round beds and could stay up till 9 pm. HIA 28 commented that it was great to have that privacy.[13]

Daily Life

8 In the following sections a number of aspects of daily life in Nazareth House will be considered. It will be seen that some of these indicated poor or unacceptable childcare practice, while others reflected standards which would have been acceptable at the time. It should be noted that approximately three quarters of the allegations were made by witnesses who were in the home in the 1950s and 1960s. The number of allegations relating to the 1930s and 1940s is understandably lower, but there was a significant reduction from 1970 onwards. As noted above, the quotation of evidence does not necessarily imply that it is accepted as accurate.

Admission

9 It is recognised in residential childcare that the admission process is critical, not only in helping a child settle in to a children's home but also in establishing their understanding of what is happening to them, why they can no longer be at home and what will happen to them next.

10 HIA 387 found admission to Nazareth House in 1953 an intimidating process. She said that a nun dragged her along the hall by the hair, her doll was taken from her, and she was given the number 49.[14] HIA 370 said the clothes she wore on admission were handed to other girls to wear when they went out to visit their families.[15]

11 HIA 95 said that the admission process for her and her two sisters in the early 1950s took all day, as they were stripped, bathed, put in different clothes and deloused by older girls.[16] HIA 375 found the admission process daunting. She and her sisters were taken to Nazareth House by their parents but the children were never told why their mother and father were leaving without them.[17] Throughout her time in the home she was tearful and clung to her sisters.[18]

12 In 1960 HIA 43 was placed in the nursery section while her older sister went into the girls' group. It was only in the segregated playground that they saw each other, and HIA 43 said that even then the nuns pulled them apart if they tried to touch each other. She felt that this was cruel and inhumane, as they should have been allowed to comfort each other.[19] She stated:

> "My first memory of Nazareth House was the sheer loneliness which hit you as soon as you walked in the door. We were just left in beds and cots crying. The nuns never showed any warmth or affection; they never touched you. To this day I cannot stand being touched as a result of this".[20] 13 The evidence above suggests a lack of explanation, a failure to provide affection to compensate for the loss of family, and a process which was designed to accustom the children to institutional living. In our opinion the practices described failed to meet acceptable standards of childcare at that time. However, the dates of the evidence indicate that these witnesses were admitted when staffing was inadequate, and it would have been difficult for the sisters to give children the time and individual care and attention they needed on admission, though this would not excuse measures such as the confiscation of dolls.

Routines

14 HIA 161 said that the girls were woken every morning by a nun ringing a bell,[21] though HIA 32 said that a whistle was used in the 1930s, when, as seven or eight year olds, their first task was to go in their nightdresses and bare feet to polish the chapel.[22] HIA 327 described SR 31 coming into the dormitory and clapping her hands to get everybody up.[23] HIA 171 said that they got up each morning at seven, knelt down by their beds to say their prayers, made their beds and then went to Mass. When they came back from Mass they had breakfast (as with other meals) in silence.[24] According to HIA 20, this practice changed about 1960.[25]

15 SR 18 said that by the 1970s older children got up at 7.30 am to give them time to walk to school, while younger children, who went to a school in the grounds, got up at 8am. Transport was arranged for children attending special schools.[26]

16 In the 1970s, children were back from school between 3.30 pm and 4 pm, and after a snack they changed out of their uniforms, did homework or watched television. According to HIA 161 there was Benediction every afternoon.[27] HIA 117 said:

> "There was a garden with swings and climbing frames in it. We got to be outside for one hour each day. That was when you got to speak to other children and a nun would have walked around the garden with her prayer book watching you. I like to read a lot, but there was nothing to read. The TV was very limited. You had to watch mostly what the nuns wanted to watch."[28]

17 According to HIA 20 the evening meal was at 5.30pm. They had semolina pudding, or bacon and bread, or cheese and bread, but she said they always went to bed hungry.[29] At 6pm there was the Angelus. The meal was followed by television, games, or activities such as swimming, ice skating, the cinema, local clubs, guides, Irish dancing and ballet.[30]

18 During the evening the lay staff supervised the children while the nuns spent time in their community, sharing a meal and in worship. During the earlier years, while the nuns were praying, older girls were left in charge. HIA 43 observed that as the older girls had been bullied themselves, they in turn bullied the younger ones once they had power. She said that, by way of example, even though the girls only had short dresses and were crying to come indoors, the older ones locked them out in the yard.[31]

19 At night the girls had to sleep with their hands crossed over their chests. HIA 14 said that SR 116 explained that this was so that they would go to heaven if they died in their sleep. She told them that if their arms were not crossed they would burn in hell.[32] HIA 439 surmised that it was so that they would not interfere with themselves, and said that if they were found with arms uncrossed, they were hit hard.[33]

20 On Fridays the girls had confession, for which they "would often make up stories about any sins we had in order to have something to say", and there were the Stations of the Cross.[34]

21 Also on Friday nights there was inspection of underwear and the provision of clean clothes. HIA 129 said that in the 1940s, the clean clothes were laid out in semi-circular rows and when they had changed into them the girls had to take the dirty underwear to the nun for inspection. She remembered:

> "...trying to figure out why I had to show the nun my underwear when my mother had never made me do this."[35]

It was reported that the girls wore slips during the underwear inspections.[36] though HIA 387 said the girls stood naked in the big hall and:

> "If my underwear was soiled, I would be punished and called a rank, smelly, dirty girl."[37]

Having dirty underwear merited "a couple of whacks on the palm of your hand" with a cane, and according to HIA 62 SR 122 used to give a girl with dirty underwear "a crack round the head". One consequence was that on a Friday night the older girls bullied the younger ones into swapping underwear to avoid trouble.[38]

22 The rationale for this routine is unclear. HIA 223 was of the opinion that the purpose of the inspection was to show who was in charge.[39] The Order said that they were aware of these allegations but denied that they were common practice.[40] Systems for changing clothes such as that described above would have been good institutional practice in dealing with a large number of girls. We find the witnesses' accounts about the use of the occasion to conduct humiliating inspections coupled at times with punishment convincing, and this practice was unacceptable.

23 Saturdays were spent by the girls fine-combing each others' hair, polishing shoes, darning socks and, once a month, changing their bedding.[41]

24 On Sundays they went for walks and played for half an hour in Ormeau Park, but they were told not to speak to anyone from outside.[42] If it was very wet they played in the hall.[43]

Chores

25 The 1952 Home Office Guidance said that:

> "Boys and girls should be expected to take a moderate share in the daily running of the home" and should "progress from light routine tasks, such as dusting, bed-making and washing up, to skilled work such as cooking, bottling [and] ironing…" They could also be "given some responsibility for planning meals, purchasing household goods and checking the laundry".[44]

Sr Brenda said:

> "Whilst children would have been asked to carry out some chores such as polishing the floors and assisting with tidying the dining area and making beds, these chores were appropriate to their age and were not excessive."[45]

26 We received a considerable amount of evidence on this subject. HIA 166 said that all the children in the home had to do the cleaning:

> "From the age of seven or as soon as you could kneel down, you'd be scrubbing."[46]

HIA 361 also emphasised the involvement of all the children, whatever their age:

> "We were all trained in cleaning. We started our chores at the age of five and these would have been lighter chores. At the age of seven we would have been given something harder to do, and again, a few years later, the chores would have got worse".[47]

27 Some witnesses focused on the excessive nature of the chores. HIA 43, for example, said that they were "treated like slaves", "forced to scrub", "constantly down on our hands and knees scrubbing with deck brushes and orange wax", till her arms were aching and her back was in agony.[48] HIA 223 wrote:

> "We were glorified slaves for the nuns. We were exhausted. We got nothing for all the work we did".[49]

HIA 387 felt that the nuns were "trying to break them down".

28 Others pointed out the inappropriateness of some of the work for children. HIA 197 said that she had to work in the laundry. She had to rinse out soiled sheets, including bedding from the old people's home, till her fingers were raw, and to reach the sink she had to stand on a stool. She then put the sheets in an industrial washing machine, pressed them and folded them up. Eight or ten girls assisted the lay laundry workers in this way.[50] [51] HIA 37 said that at the age of thirteen she was made responsible for the upstairs bathroom, which had thirty sinks, four toilets and four baths. She also had to dispose of the soiled sanitary towels in the furnace every Tuesday which, she said, the nuns termed a privilege.[52] HIA 29 said that her chores included cleaning, laundry work, shovelling coal into the furnace, scrubbing the halls, dormitories and church, polishing the pews, and cleaning the nun's cell in the corner of the dormitory.[53]

29 Girls were at times asked to help out in the old people's home. HIA 61 started when aged seven, laying the tables. She said that none of the girls enjoyed working with the old men, as they tried to touch the girls.[54] At the age of nine or ten she was told to wash and lay out the body of an elderly female resident whom she had known, and she was punished by SR 116 for not putting cotton wool in her orifices. She was then required to pray for her soul in the "dead house". This incident affected her badly.[55] Sr Brenda said:

> "While [HIA 61] may have helped in the old people's home, she would have been merely assisting a lay staff member or Sister in carrying out their duties."[56]

The question remained whether a young girl should have been undertaking such duties at all.

30 HIA 117 said that between the ages of nine and fourteen she helped out in the old people's home, bathing old ladies, changing nappies, sitting up with the dying, and washing dead bodies.

> "[SR 31] said it was to get the devil out of me and to keep me away from the other children."[57]

The Order did not accept that HIA 117 did more than assist in the lighter duties.[58] However, HIA 335 said that in the 1940s she also helped in the morgue from the age of ten, dressing the bodies and putting pennies in their eyes, which petrified her.[59]

31 There were additional chores at weekends and during the school holidays, ranging from polishing wooden floors in the recreation hall[60] to going up high ladders to wash the walls.[61] A summertime job was the painting of the bed-frames, in which some of the girls helped the handyman.[62] The Order said that the girls would not have been expected to paint their bed-frames every summer.[63]

32 HIA 166 said that a nun or an older girl supervised the work and substandard work was punished with a clip across the ear, a punch or a kick.[64] HIA 37 said "I never once saw the nuns do any physical work, always the children."[65]

33 By the mid-1970s the emphasis on chores appears to have diminished; floors, for example, were mopped rather than scrubbed.[66]

34 Even if one allows for a degree of exaggeration through the passage of time colouring the memory, it is clear that the girls at Nazareth House were expected to do an excessive amount of chores, starting at an early age. In most children's homes domestic staff would have been appointed to clean communal areas, and the residential care staff would have participated, for example in cooking meals or doing laundry when the ancillary staff were on holiday or at weekends.

35 One argument for involving children in chores is to accustom them to household work with a view to having the necessary skills for independent living. However, the tasks described by the witnesses refer to a laundry functioning on a commercial scale and the cleaning and polishing of large rooms such as the dormitories, hall and chapel; this was no help in learning how to cope on a domestic scale. It seems likely that the involvement of the girls in chores on this scale was of long standing, dating back to the early days of the home, at a time when girls would have been expected to play a major part in house-work in families. Using the girls as the workforce (rather than employing domestic staff, as in most children's homes) would have kept costs down and kept the girls occupied, but neither of these arguments is acceptable as a rationale in the period we are considering. Many of the tasks which the girls were required to perform were of little use to them as preparation for managing their own households, and in our view the excessive chores expected of the girls constituted systemic abuse.

Bathing

36 Complaints about the systems used for bathing ranged from the 1940s, when there were only girls in Nazareth House, to the late 1960s, when boys were also admitted. HIA 439 said that in the 1940s bath day was on a Thursday and there were three baths of different sizes. Hair was washed in the first bath; then the girls were dipped in Jeyes fluid, resulting in red eyes the following day. They cleaned their teeth with washing soda or soap at first, but a new Mother Superior introduced toothbrushes.[67] It was also during the 1940s that HIA 361 said that on one occasion SR 145 sent her back to wash again eight times as she had a swarthy neck. She lost her temper and pulled SR 145's "habit" off (presumably the nun's wimple, as her ginger hair was visible), for which HIA 361 was punished.[68]

37 The 1952 Home Office Guidance emphasised the need for children to learn about personal hygiene and to care for themselves. They were each to have all their own equipment such as towels, flannels, toothbrushes and toothpaste, and fresh water was recommended for each child when bathing.[69]

38 First thing in the morning in the 1950s, according to HIA 387, the girls were stripped naked and walked down cold halls to the bathroom, which she found embarrassing.[70] In the 1950s and 1960s, bath days were Tuesdays and Fridays[71] and bathing was in three stages. First, girls washed their feet and knees beside the bath; then they sat in the bath with Jeyes fluid; finally they stood in a corner to dry themselves.[72]

39 Contrasting with HIA 387's and HIA 14's account below, there was an emphasis on modesty. HIA 166 said:

> "We wore a sleeveless shaped shift dress garment while we had a bath so we couldn't see what our bodies looked like. We used a flannel under the dress to wash ourselves".[73]

When the girls got out of the bath a sheet was held up to conceal them while drying.[74]

40 The use of Jeyes fluid was a recurrent theme. HIA 14 said:

> "We were bathed in Jeyes fluid and scrubbed all over with carbolic soap, including our genitals. The older girls would have scrubbed us and the nuns would just have supervised. It was awful and it made my skin and my vagina really sore. I suffered from eczema and I think it was as a result of the carbolic soap".[75]

41 According to HIA 327, older girls supervised the bathing and could be rough.[76] HIA 84 said that the older girls were in charge at bath times and that they used a fine tooth comb for nits, hurting their scalps. She felt that some of the older girls had been treated badly over the years and they were repeating their experiences in maltreating the younger girls.[77]

42 HIA 387 said that there were special arrangements for hair-washing. The girls had to stand in their underwear in the yard for their hair to be washed in big tin baths, regardless of the weather. The nuns cut their hair off if there were nits, and poured Jeyes fluid onto their skin.[78] HIA 63 said:

> "There were three tin baths for washing our hair out in the yard - one for each group. We had to queue up and take our turn. The water was warm but it was never changed so you were lucky if you got washed first you got the clean water but if you got washed last the water was filthy".[79]

43 HIA 368 was aged eight on admission in 1969 and was placed at Nazareth House as he refused to be parted from his sister. At bath time he shared a bath with the older girls.[80]

44 In view of the cost of heating bath water, sharing would have been common practice in many households in the earlier decades, despite the Home Office Guidance. However, the infrequency of changing the water, the use of carbolic soap to clean teeth, the use of Jeyes fluid in the bath, the rough treatment of younger girls by older ones when bathing and washing hair, and the queuing were outdated institutional practices which should have been superseded or never adopted in the first place, and they constituted systemic abuse.

Bedwetting

45 According to HIA 62 bedding was adequate though the mattresses were thin, and there was a lukewarm central heating system.[81] In the earlier years the mattresses had brown mackintosh covers, presumably as a universal response to possible bedwetting.[82]

46 Many witnesses reported that the nuns took a punitive approach to bedwetters. HIA 30 said that in the 1940s, children had their wet sheets draped over their heads.

> "They would be lined up inhaling their own urine in the freezing cold. Everybody lived in fear of being associated with the 'wetbeds'".[83]

HIA 62 said she witnessed SR 134 making an eight-year-old who had wet her bed kneel by her bed with the wet sheet over her body. SR 134 was reported to have said:

> "Yes, you can smell that for the rest of the night."[84]

The Order did not accept that this happened.[85]

47 HIA 197 said that SR 134 "degraded" bedwetters in front of everyone else, on one occasion rubbing HIA 197's nose in the wet sheets.[86] HIA 387 made the same allegation.[87] HIA 370 both wet and soiled her bed, and she said she was punished by having to sleep in a wet bed. One night, perhaps because she had soiled herself, she was hosed down by a nun in the presence of a man. She said she went to bed, soaking wet, unable to breathe because of asthma.[88] HIA 316 said that bedwetters had to queue up outside the nun's cell to be caned.[89]

48 These practices were said to have continued when boys were admitted to Nazareth House. HIA 175 said that most children had to line up on the right of the corridor to go down in a single file to breakfast. The children who had wet their beds, including her little brother, HIA 368, had to stand on the left hand side with their sheets over their heads.[90] The Order stated that they could not accept that this could have happened.[91] HIA 175 said her brother smelt of Jeyes fluid. She attempted to steal sheets from the laundry so that she could change his bed and conceal his sheets. He corroborated her account.[92]

49 It seems that the bell and pad system was introduced about 1950. HIA 166 wet her bed regularly; her bed was moved to be near the nun's cell and a bell and pad system was tried for one or two weeks, but her bedwetting continued. About 1951-52 she attended the Royal Victoria Hospital for tests.[93] A number of girls used the bell and pad system, including HIA 197 when she was 13 or 14. One of the problems about employing the bell and pad was that it awoke everyone in the dormitory. HIA 124 said that when the alarm went off SR 31 grabbed her out of bed and beat her.[94] HIA 117 said that when bedwetters were given alarms, hers always went off first, and SR 31 used to come out of her cell and give her "a terrible hiding". According to HIA 30, if the buzzer system went off SR 31 "would go mad" and make the girl kneel by her bed in her wet nightie the rest of the night. Sometimes SR 31 shouted to an older girl to deal with it.[95] Girls who wet the bed were also given some purple medicine, but this proved ineffective.[96] HIA 197 summarised:

> "I believe we were wetting the bed because we were a bundle of nerves" and "It was an awful way to treat a child".[97]

50 SR 153 was at Nazareth House from 1970 to 1973, by which time, the children lived in smaller groups. She put all the bedwetters in one bedroom, and to reduce embarrassment got them up earlier than the others so that they could take their sheets to the laundry and shower.[98] Sr Brenda said:

> "As the Sisters cared for a number of children from a number of various backgrounds, it may have been difficult for them to consider the individual needs of each child. The reason behind a child's bedwetting was clearly not dealt with appropriately and methods used to prevent bedwetting were not well known at this time. Medical advice was later sought by the Congregation to help the children and the Congregation do accept that their methods were not acceptable."[99]
> "The requirement that a child carry their wet sheets and pyjamas to a laundry collection point was clearly a source of embarrassment and humiliation and ought not to have occurred."[100]

51 Although the Congregation disputed the witnesses' evidence, we accept that it forms a consistent pattern showing that from the 1940s to the 1960s enuresis was treated primarily by punishment and humiliation. The use of the bell and pad system in the 1950s was progressive, but its effectiveness appears to have been undermined by the way in which the system was applied. If the outcome was a beating or other punishment, as well as waking other girls in the dormitory, the girls using the system would have been apprehensive. While some children require medical help, many cease to wet their beds when they relax, feeling cared for and safe at night. The punitive approaches described in the evidence would not have given the children any sense of security but would have added to their anxiety; the measures would have been ineffective in dealing with enuresis and constituted very poor childcare practice, amounting to systemic abuse.

Health Care

52 The Congregation's evidence indicates that a GP was appointed as doctor to Nazareth House and he visited weekly, as well as undertaking the periodic examinations required by the Regulations. The evidence of witnesses suggests that on some occasions health matters were taken seriously and girls were taken to hospital, but at other times problems were not properly addressed, and the health care provided by the sisters was at times rudimentary.

99 SNB 2009.

Furthermore, four of the witnesses quoted below attributed life-long problems to the way they were treated at Nazareth House.

53 HIA 166 said that the doctor visited annually, but a nun always sat in on the examinations and the girls never complained, as the nuns would have given them a hiding for not speaking to them first.[101] SR 145 was responsible for the "work room" where the medicines were kept, but girls were afraid to attend in case she slapped them across the ear. As an example of the girls' reluctance to seek help, HIA 30 suffered a serious ear infection when she was thirteen but she was:

> "afraid to say anything because I didn't want to be accused of showing off and drawing attention to myself".

She told us that SR 134 gave her a clap on each ear in school one day and it took HIA 30 a minute to recover. From then on she had serious problems, ending up in inflammation and swelling which required a week's treatment in hospital.[102]

54 In the 1940s HIA 335 used to sleepwalk and she said that SR 177 strapped her into bed to stop her getting out at night, though the strapping appeared to have been removed during the night.[103] HIA 166 helped a girl who was feeling sick, but was blamed for disturbing others in the dormitory. In consequence a nun hit her, first with her hands, and then with a studded shoe, splitting her eyebrow open. She put a plaster and a bandage on HIA 166's eyebrow, and HIA 166 was not allowed in the classroom until the swelling had gone down in case visitors saw her. She was told to say that she had fallen out of bed and knocked her head on the bedside locker. HIA 166 was never seen by the doctor and the scar is still visible.[104]

55 HIA 430 said that a nail went through her leg when she slipped on a chair, and it took a long time to heal but she never saw a doctor during her time in the home.[105] HIA 166 got three splinters in her knee when scrubbing the babies' dormitory; she removed two, but the third became seriously infected and she spent two or three weeks in bed. The doctor prescribed a poultice and the sisters gathered round her bed to pray for her.[106]

56 HIA 234 said she fell off a climbing frame and was knocked out, but was not treated. From this time she started to suffer headaches and problems with her vision and balance. Eventually a brain tumour was diagnosed and it was removed at the Royal Victoria Hospital.[107] HIA 134 broke her arm, but she said it was three days before SR 199 believed her; she then saw a doctor and her arm had to be put in a cast.[108]

57 HIA 85 said that Jeyes fluid had got into her ear and her ear drum had burst, causing severe pain. She was taken to the Mater Hospital in Dublin, but they were not able to help, and it was only later in life that it was successfully treated.[109] When back in Nazareth House, HIA 85 told SR 145 about her ear, and she slapped the other one, saying "Now you have two sore ears."[110]

58 HIA 37 commented that when girls required care, such as taking up food to girls in bed with measles or dealing with head lice, the nuns always left this to the girls and they never exposed themselves to risk.[111]

59 In summary, there is no indication in the evidence that there was poor medical care once the health service had become involved. Perhaps because of the destruction of records, it is not possible to corroborate these allegations, but it is clear that the incidents described were significant to the witnesses, and the effects of some were still apparent in later life. The home nursing described was very poor in terms of the failure to take some problems seriously, the rudimentary treatment given, the physical abuse on some occasions, and the lack of loving care for children who were unwell. This amounted to systemic abuse.

Menstruation

60 The onset of menstruation was a traumatic time for several witnesses, as they had not been prepared for it and had no understanding of what was happening. HIA 117 said that when she had her first period she thought she had cut herself and that she was dying. She said she was put in a dark room and then brought out to the canteen and put in front of everyone to tell them she was a woman now.[112] HIA 62 said she was unaware that she was having her first period when on the way to her first day at secondary school. She was taken back to the home and placed in the isolation room.[113] HIA 95 started periods early at the age of nine; nothing had been explained to her, she said in oral evidence, and so she did not know what was happening to her and found it frightening.[114]

61 Witnesses also criticised the sanitary equipment and way in which the sisters provided it. In the 1950s sanitary towels were made from sheets and each girl was given six with their names on them. If they did not wash them well enough, the laundry worker called the girl out in front of everyone.[115] Next they were provided with leather belts and thick pads, which they had to wash and re-use, drying them out under their mattresses.[116] HIA 95 said that sanitary towels were put in a box to be washed.[117] The re-use of pads was denied by the Order.[118]

62 Later, HIA 63 told us that the girls had to approach the nuns, and the sanitary towels were left under their pillows and limited to one for the day and one for night time, which was said to be never enough.[119] HIA 61 said that the limited availability of sanitary towels, which were rationed by the nuns, meant that the girls smelt awful at school and other girls commented that they smelt foul.[120]

63 The Sisters' failure to offer sex education was also criticised. HIA 30 said that the only sex education they got in the home was to marry a Catholic and keep the faith.[121] Girls were given a copy of My Dear Daughter to read.[122] HIA 63 said that the girls were told to say a prayer to Our Lady but were given no sex education at all, and anything they learned was from the older girls.[123] By contrast with the evidence of other witnesses, HIA 37 said that SR 116 used to talk to girls privately in her cell and go through My Dear Daughter with them.[124]

64 To put these practices into context, it should be noted that in society in general sex was a taboo subject in the earlier decades; women, for example, were still churched in the days before the Second Vatican Council in 1962-5.[125] As Sr Brenda put it, sex was "shunned as a bad thing".[126] It is understandable that the sisters were uncomfortable in dealing with it. Nonetheless, the Order had chosen to take on the task of caring for adolescent girls, and it was one of their responsibilities to prepare them for menarche, to deal with their physical needs sensitively, to explain to them what was happening and to help them to cope emotionally. The evidence demonstrates that the nuns clearly failed as far as the witnesses were concerned. When the staff was expanded to include lay workers, the girls' keyworkers were said to have undertaken this task.

Clothes

65 Witnesses made relatively few comments about clothing. They spoke of their own clothes being removed on admission, and of being given old clothes in the 1950s and 1960s. The children all wore hand-me-downs but HIA 316 said that they were given a new skirt every six months, and they had two jumpers, which were changed once a fortnight.[127] HIA 28 said that the nuns also made pinafore dresses for the girls.[128] HIA 9 considered the clothing satisfactory, though SR 122, who did all the sewing, smacked girls' heads if they ripped their aprons.[129]

66 Footwear presented problems for some. In the 1950s, shoes were handed out by older girls and the younger ones were frightened to complain, so that at times they ended up with shoes which were too tight.[130] HIA 316 said that they were given shoes at the start of winter.

67 HIA 250, who was at Nazareth House throughout the 1960s, said that each child had her own toiletry bag with her own toothbrush and toothpaste, and she brought her bag to show the Panel.[131]

125 Churching was a ceremony in which a mother was blessed following the delivery of a baby; it included purification and a woman who had not been churched was considered unclean.

68 A concern for some witnesses was that they felt that they were distinguishable from the day pupils when at school. The Congregation made sure that the girls all had the necessary school uniforms when at secondary school off the premises. At St Monica's School, which was attended by the majority of the girls, they all wore the standard uniform, but HIA 327 said that the home girls still stood out because they had bowl haircuts.[132]

69 In the later years, children were consulted and allowed to choose their own clothes within a budget.[133]

70 Because the home had to rely on inadequate income in the earlier decades it is understandable that the Sisters had to rely on donations of clothing. Many people in the wider community would have passed on clothes from older children to younger ones, so that hand-me-downs were considered acceptable. The Order also augmented donations with clothing which was made in their workshop. The account of ill-fitting shoes described above was of course unacceptable. The main problem, however, is that if the Sisters had obtained per capita funding from the welfare authorities at an earlier stage the quality of clothing could have been significantly better, and children could have had more choice and individuality of style in the use of clothing grants.

Numbers and Names

71 HIA 32 was at Nazareth House in the 1930s and 1940s, when there were 160 girls in the home. They were "always called by a number", but on the odd occasion their names were used, which was how she found out she had two sisters in the home.[134] In the 1940s, HIA 439 said that the children were only known by numbers, not names, and if a nun wanted to speak to a child, she called out her number.[135] In the 1950s HIA 85 said that when she was called out to be publicly punished her number was used.[136]

72 HIA 61 was at Nazareth House in the 1960s:

> "We were all given numbers which the nuns would use to identify us, but at a later stage they started to use our surnames."[137]

HIA 161 said that in the 1960s surnames were used to call the girls, rather than first names.[138] HIA 171 said that in the late 1950s and 1960s their numbers were printed on their clothes, which was embarrassing outside the home. At school they were called by their numbers as well as their names, which annoyed her.[139]

73 The Congregation denied that children were known by numbers and not by their names;[140] they have stated that there was no policy about the use of names and numbers, and there was no point at which it was decided to abandon the numbers. They saw this as a purely practical matter, to help with the organisation of clothing. From the evidence, we accept that numbers were used for a number of purposes in the earlier decades, but possibly only for laundry during the period covering the majority of the witnesses. In a large home such as Nazareth House, using such a system was certainly preferable to having a common pool of clothing. In so far as numbers continued to be used for other purposes, this would have been unacceptable.

Food

74 A number of witnesses commented on the poor quality of the food from the 1930s to the 1960s, presenting a fairly consistent picture throughout. HIA 32, for example, said that food in the 1930s and 1940s was not great and the girls were often hungry, with cocoa and a round of bread dipped in lard for breakfast, a potato and stewed onions for lunch, and lumpy porridge for tea. She said that they ate the slops from the nursing home, ate raw turnip skins and stole sweets and fruit. The washerwoman, NHB 35, caught her taking pears and apples for the other girls, and she said she was still scarred on her thigh from the nails in the plank with which NHB 35 hit her.[141]

75 One of the main targets for criticism was the meat - "usually bits of fat" according to HIA 361, "lumpy fatty stew" said HIA 387, and "sausages full of gristle" according to HIA 43.[142] HIA 103 said "The stew was water with bits of grizzled fat in it".[143] On one occasion, when the girls were due to go on holiday to Glenariff, they were served mutton stew which had gone off, but the nuns threatened that they would not go on holiday if it was not eaten. HIA 37 said that despite the smell and the consequent vomiting, the stew was eaten.[144]

76 Other items which were mentioned included lumpy porridge, "black boiled eggs", "pork pies that were just full of jelly and fat",[145] tapioca and greasy fried bread. References to eggs give an indication of the diet provided. HIA 30 was at the home during the later 1940s and 1950s.

> "My mother came from a farm and she used to send me up half a dozen eggs once a year or so. The nuns would single me out because of this and make sure I wasn't getting any ideas above my station just because I was getting a fried egg and nobody else was."[146]

HIA 361, who was at Nazareth House in the 1940s when rationing was in force, said she did not see an egg till she was ten or eleven years old.[147] HIA 439 was used to "good country food", but at Nazareth House it was only on Easter Sunday that they had a boiled egg.[148] HIA 316 said that on Christmas Day the girls were "so excited" because they had a fried egg.[149]

77 The food provided was contrasted with what others had, and in particular the nuns. The Congregation insisted that the nuns had the same food as the children, and if anything they ate less well so that the children had enough.[150] HIA 63 worked in the kitchen, however, and said that while the children's food ranged from acceptable to horrible, the nuns ate very well, having meat without fat and omelettes.[151] HIA 223 said that when she worked in the kitchen she could not believe what the nuns had to eat: meat, potatoes, vegetables, trifles and cakes.[152]

78 HIA 328 said that girls from the community attending school used to bring things which the home girls were not used to, and they had pocket money to spend in the tuckshop, which the home girls did not have. They never saw sweets, biscuits or crisps.[153]

79 Several witnesses mentioned that they were hungry, including HIA 387, HIA 166, and HIA 103. HIA 327 wrote:

> "The food was terrible, but we were always hungry so we just had to eat it."[154]

The girls reacted in various ways. Bullies sent HIA 439 over the wall into the orchard to steal apples and pears, but she was caught and told off by Canon O'Neill.[155] HIA 52 said that once, during a nuns' retreat, a girl got hold of the keys and they raided the pantry. The girls never had luxury items such as cakes, and she was not the only witness to have claimed that the girls resorted to eating grass because of their hunger.[156]

80 Several witnesses commented on the nuns' insistence that they ate the food provided:

> "The nuns would walk up and down the tables and stand behind us, always watching to make sure we ate our meals."[157]

HIA 361 said that if food was not eaten, it reappeared at the next meal. If she tried to sneak it into the bin, the nun made her take it out and eat it, even if she was sick.[158] HIA 387, HIA 197 and HIA 439 also mentioned being made to stay at the table till food was eaten, or being forced to eat vomited food. HIA 298 was given a large lump of fat to eat and when she refused, a nun told her she could not leave the dining room until she had eaten it. A lay member of staff later took the plate from her and told her to go to bed.[159] HIA 124 said there was frequent force-feeding, with one nun pulling her hair back and holding her nose, while another put carrots in her mouth and held her chin till she swallowed them. HIA 124 believed that it was this force-feeding that caused her to develop anorexia later on.[160]

81 Some witnesses were less critical. HIA 316 said she could not remember starving: "the food wasn't great but it kept us alive."[161] Others criticised the diet as being bland and stodgy. It was only on feast days and at Christmas a bottle of HP sauce and a bowl of sugar would have been put on the table.[162]

82 By the mid-1970s the food seems to have improved. The girls ate in smaller dining rooms in the groups, and by this time the per capita allowances should have enabled the Sisters to spend more on the children's food. SR 153 was at Nazareth House from 1970 to 1973 and she said that by that time the sisters ate with their groups of children; they had the same food and plenty to eat.[163] HIA 257, who was at Nazareth House in the late 1960s and early 1970s, said the food was good, with fruit and crisps, and jam and bread for the children to fill up on.[164]

83 In common with other aspects of the care provided by the Sisters, it seems clear that standards of food improved considerably over time. In the earlier decades, however, the volume of evidence provided by the witnesses indicates that the quality of the food provided fell below the acceptable. The number of complaints about the fatty stew suggests that butchers provided the home with the cheapest cuts of meat, which is unsurprising if the budget was tight and there were large numbers of girls to provide for. The rarity of eggs on the menu suggests a lack of variety in the menu. That the food was also insufficient is underlined by the stories of girls raiding the orchard and the pantry, and the number of complaints about hunger. If the Sisters had approached the welfare authorities for payments, some of these problems could have been avoided. We conclude that the standards of food at times fell below what should have been seen as the minimum in both quality and quantity. While the sisters' basic food may have been the same as the children's, we are not persuaded that they did not enjoy extras at times which were unavailable to the girls.

84 The Order denied that girls were force fed or that they were forced to eat unfinished meals.[165] However, seven of the witnesses reported undue pressure exerted on the girls by the nuns to eat food which they did not want to consume, though only one described being force-fed in detail. Most of these complaints related to individual girls, but on one occasion the whole group was threatened with the forfeiture of their holiday if they did not eat some rank mutton. The one instance of force-feeding is insufficient to be considered as systemic abuse, but we accept that the nuns did compel children to eat food, and this was very poor childcare practice, as the Sisters should have known at the time. It would not have persuaded the children to like or appreciate the food, but was perhaps more a demonstration of authority, as the refusal of food can be seen in residential care as symbolic of rejection of the provider's parental role.

Activities

85 Witnesses did not comment much on the activities available during the evenings, weekends and holidays, but in general observations were positive. There were swings and climbing frames in the grounds, but HIA 328 felt they were only for show, so that people going past in buses would be impressed. She said that "there wasn't a toy or a book inside the convent", other than the Bible and prayer books.[166] HIA 327 said that television was allowed once a week, on Saturdays. Even on cold days they had to stay out in the garden until the bell rang, and she remembered freezing.[167] Children's activities in the units were limited to watching television and doing chores.[168]

86 HIA 257 was at Nazareth House till the mid-1970s, and by then the range of activities had expanded to include skipping, Irish dancing, violin and accordion classes, choir, ballet, elocution, swimming, cinema, walks with picnics, trips to museums or the beach.

> "There were always activities ongoing and the nuns supported us and encouraged us in whatever we were good at".[169]

Witnesses also mentioned drama lessons, scouts, girl guides and the availability of second-hand bikes to take trips.[170] Nor was it just a question of the range of activities:

> "As we got older we were granted a lot more freedom. The older girls could go out to dances and were given a key to get back into the house".[171]

87 A woman taught Irish dancing, and the children won lots of medals and cups.[172] HIA 39 found the dancing "an escape from the routine of the home", which she really enjoyed as the costumes were beautiful and they won cups and medals.[173] HIA 257 said that she herself was a champion

Irish dancer, competitive in everything and encouraged to be the best.[174] HIA 103 was given the opportunity to learn the violin, taught by a music teacher from outside which she enjoyed.[175]

88 In the summer time all the children went on black taxi trips to Tyrella beach, with six or eight children to a taxi, which they enjoyed.[176] On one occasion in the 1940s the US Navy took the children to see a submarine.[177]

89 It appears from the evidence that in the earlier decades the girls were left to their own devices when playing outside, but that there was a range of occasional organised activities in which good use was made of volunteers, such as the Irish dancing classes and the summertime taxi trips to the seaside. From the mid-1970s a wider range of activities seems to have become available, perhaps in part because of the increases in staffing.

Birthdays

90 HIA 361 who was at Nazareth House in the 1940s and HIA 327 who was there in the 1960s both said that birthdays were never celebrated.[178] HIA 223 was born on Christmas Day, and she learnt that it was her birthday in 1958 when she was ten, when she was selected to put baby Jesus in the crib on the grounds that it was her birthday.[179]

91 The Congregation say that birthdays were celebrated, but this could have been from the 1970s onwards. Birthday celebrations are one of the most obvious ways of giving individual attention to children and their introduction would have been a significant (if delayed) milestone in the change from institutional to individual styles of care in the home.

Christmas

92 The girls were invited to parties, for example at Mackies' factory, but if they were given presents, witnesses said they were removed as soon as the girls returned to the home and they did not see them again.[180] Any sweets they were given were also taken from them on their return.[181] HIA 327 disliked Christmas parties as they made her feel like a charity case.

She saw her brothers at parties, but did not know they were her brothers and only got to know them on leaving care.[182]

93 Bishop Street Ceilidh Band from the Derry Nazareth House visited and put on a show.[183] HIA 55 said that being taken to the Christmas pantomime was her only good memory of Nazareth House.[184] HIA 28 said that shows were put on at Christmas, which was:

> "... the only time the nuns were good to you and you got a decent dinner. We might have got a pair of slippers in a Christmas box and maybe an apple and an orange. We thought that was brilliant; it was such a treat."[185]

94 HIA 55 was given a game called Smugglers, but it was taken off her the next day.[186] HIA 361 was given an orange and two sweets for Christmas; she wanted to savour the orange and kept it, but it went mouldy.[187] HIA 14 said that NHB 102, the handyman, dressed up as Santa Claus and handed out second-hand items which people had donated; she received an umbrella with holes in it.[188] They had to scrub the home if visitors were expected, smile and tell them everything was great.[189]

95 Christmas was clearly special to some of the children, but it also seems to have been a time of disappointment. It is hard to see why the Sisters would have removed toys and sweets from the girls, but in addition to the witnesses who were in Nazareth House it appears to have been a pattern in evidence from other homes run by the Order.

Education

96 The primary school was on site, and the nuns who taught the girls were also those who looked after them in their groups, which confused HIA 197. HIA 327 said there was no escape from SR 31, who ran their group before and after school and taught them as well, but she was not as harsh at school, in the presence of pupils from outside.[190] In the primary school there was a system for girls to have partners and they were responsible for each others' clothes, shoes and hair, for example darning each others' socks.[191]

97 A number of witnesses were critical of the quality of education provided. According to HIA 166:

> "The education was very basic, there was no such thing as special attention, and rather those with difficulties were ignored or made an example of".[192]

It was said that in the class for backward children they spent their days in two groups divided by age, drawing, knitting or in silence.

98 Several witnesses spoke of being emotionally abused by being humiliated in class. HIA 32 hated her teacher, SR 112, because she was English:

> "[SR 112] made me spend a lot of time in the corner with a sheet of paper pinned to my back with either 'dunce' or 'thief' written on."

When SR 112 refused to let her go to the toilet she wet herself and SR 112 humiliated her by making her walk through all the classrooms to get a mop and bucket.[193] HIA 197 said that SR 134 mocked her in front of the whole class, undermining her self-confidence, and she put her academic underachievement down to fear, rather than stupidity. HIA 52 said she was called a dunce and made to stand in the corner with hands on head:

> "You were always put down and told you were good for nothing".[194]

99 HIA 361 wrote:

> "They didn't teach us anything other than religion. It was religion, morning, noon and night. There was constant praying. We had to pray when we woke up, before meals, after meals, at the start of school, and before we went to bed. When I later went to school in England, I couldn't believe how much I knew about religion. My hand was always up, but it was the only subject I knew. I could barely read and I couldn't count. I could write but I wasn't good at it. I couldn't tell the time".[195]

100 HIA 85 said that clever girls were picked out and sent to night school, but the nuns did not bother with the rest.[196] HIA 197 also noted that the nuns took an interest in clever girls who were succeeding.[197] There appears to have been a selection process, with a small number of clever girls passing the 11-plus, the majority moving on to St Monica's secondary school and a few being transferred to a special school. HIA 14 found the education in general good and she passed the 11-plus.[198]

101 HIA 20 said she was labelled backward, and was sent to Immaculata School for the educationally subnormal after half term at St Monica's.[199] In oral evidence she said that the labelling had been damaging and had had a life-long impact, but later in life she nonetheless qualified as a nurse and wrote a book about her experiences.[200]

102 HIA 117 said that she was withdrawn from the 11-plus examination as she had a fit of nervous giggling. However, she added that all the girls, including herself, were sent to St Monica's Secondary School anyway.[201] HIA 63 said that SR 31 stopped her taking the 11-plus and kept her back.

> "The nuns never encouraged education. I believe if I had stayed in school longer and got some qualifications it would have been better for my career".[202]

It is possible that the withdrawal from the 11+ was due to a misunderstanding about HIA 63's age. HIA 195 felt she had the capability to do well academically, but SR 31 sent her to Oakwood special needs school, where she had a difficult time, being attacked by Protestant children.[203]

103 HIA 52 said that the girls were slapped, strapped and caned at St Monica's. After she had thrown a snowball at the head's house, HIA 52 was put on the stage, told she was the worst girl in the school and expelled, for which SR 116 gave her a hiding.[204] In oral evidence she said that girls from Nazareth House stood out at St Monica's both because of their clothes and because they did not know how to interact with other people.[205]

104 The combined roles of teacher and head of a residential group in the home will have meant a very long working day for the sisters involved. They will have had very little time for leisure or the preparation of teaching materials. It is not surprising, therefore, that the picture painted by witnesses is of lack of stimulation and a punitive approach to discipline. While the quality of the education provided in the school is not a matter for this Inquiry the girls' experience of school is relevant because the school was in the same premises as the home, nuns worked in the home and the school and their approach to discipline and administration of punishment was similar in both settings. It could have been anticipated that many of the girls who were admitted to Nazareth House were under functioning educationally because of poor stimulation at home and unhappy early experiences of schooling. It was for the Sisters to compensate for these drawbacks by assessing the individual girls' needs and encouraging them and helping them to catch up through homework and study and achieve their potential. The evidence suggests that they fell short of these aims.

Family Contact

105 Some witnesses felt that in the earlier decades the Sisters deliberately kept siblings apart, but the Congregation denied this. There is evidence that siblings were introduced to each other, but this appears to have been occasional and insufficient to maintain family bonds. The instances recalled by witnesses indicate that such contacts were unusual, but all except one example relate to the period before the home admitted boys, which permitted families to remain together.

106 HIA 361 was at Nazareth Lodge in the 1940s; she never met her sister and did not know she had sisters and brothers; retrospectively she felt that they had been deliberately kept apart.[206]

107 HIA 28 and HIA 39 were two of three sisters who were together in Our Lady's group in the 1960s. HIA 39 was playing leapfrog in the playground one day in the yard with her two sisters, when SR 31 took them to the railings which separated the nursery from the girls' groups and introduced them to their youngest sister, who was in the nursery section. They rarely saw her after that until they left the home.[207] Previously they had not known that they had a sister in the nursery.[208]

108 Once or twice a year the nuns arranged visits between Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House, and in the 1950s HIA 95 was taken once to Nazareth Lodge where she managed to meet one of her brothers.[209] It was also on an organised visit that HIA 37 met her brother in the 1960s; she also met him once by chance at a pantomime.[210]

109 HIA 124 was at Nazareth House twice in the late 1960s and she alleged that her parents did not allow her to see her sister in hospital when she contracted leukaemia, and when her sister died HIA 124 was not permitted to attend the funeral.[211] The Order commented that they could not understand how this happened.[212]

110 Parents were able to visit when they chose, but usually called on the home at weekends. HIA 103 said that her father was never made to feel welcome by the nuns; he passed HIA 103 a bag of oranges over the wall and the sisters always asked for money when he visited.[213] HIA 103 said that he gave her an envelope each week to pass to the nuns.[214]

Confiscation of Possessions

111 We have already noted that on admission children were issued with clothing by the home and their own which they wore on arrival was removed. Mention was also made of toys given to children at Christmas being removed. The evidence of witnesses suggests that these were only two examples of a much more widespread practice whereby clothes, toys, presents, fruit and money were taken from children by nuns. Sometimes they were passed to other children; often they were never seen again by the witnesses.

112 Every Christmas HIA 161's mother sent a tea-chest full of dolls, clothes and selection boxes. It was the one time in the year that she and her sisters were called together, to see the contents, so that her elder sister could write to their mother to say that they had seen everything and to thank her. HIA 161 said that the nuns then took the dolls from them and said that the contents were going to a better cause.[215] The Order accepts that toys and presents might have been tidied up and put away, but not that they were maliciously taken from the children.[216]

113 HIA 375 said that her parents brought little presents and they were told to put them in their lockers, but the presents disappeared and HIA 375 said she would have known if other children had taken them.[217] HIA 103 gave examples of personal items which she alleged were taken by the nuns and disappeared - a yellow jumper bought for her by her father, a lambswool dress, and a doll called Rosebud which was given to her at a Christmas party. She believed that these items had been sold.[218] HIA 134 was financially supported by her stepfather, who sent her dolls and dresses, which she said she never received.[219]

114 HIA 95 said that when her father brought her sweets, the nuns took them.[220] HIA 327 said that dolls appeared when there were due to be visitors, and disappeared afterwards.

> "If a child came into the home with a toy, it was taken off them. The nuns seemed to enjoy being cruel".[221]

HIA 368 said that clothes bought for him and his sister by their social worker were also removed by the nuns as soon as they returned to Nazareth House and were never seen again. There is a record of the purchase of the clothes.[222] His sister tried to tell the social worker, but there is no record of a complaint being made.[223] HIA 14 stayed with her aunt and uncle in the holidays. The nuns took any presents she took back with her to the home, together with any clothes which her aunt had made - "We had nothing we could call our own".[224]

115 HIA 175 went to a football match with her sister, who entered her name in a competition, and a man arrived at the home with her prize, a football signed by the Down team, He presented it to her but she never saw it again.[225] A slide was donated to the home, as recorded in a photograph which includes the benefactor, but it was never seen again.[226] In oral evidence HIA 43 mentioned a newspaper cutting which alleged that the Order was selling clothing and toys at jamborees. She believed that her hair had also been cut and sold.[227] On the day of her First Communion HIA 124 and her sister were given money by a neighbour; they were going to spend it on something for the girls, but the nuns took it from them.[228] The Order stated that this was to keep the money safe.[229]

116 The Order was no doubt hard pressed to find sufficient funding, but some of these confiscations were of items of little value, that would not have produced significant income if sold. A possible justification could have been that children who did not receive presents might have felt deprived on seeing other children with new clothes or toys, but if so, it was for the Sisters to give them clothes or toys to compensate, not to deprive the fortunate children, making them all equally deprived. Indeed, the situation offered an opportunity for the nuns to indicate their concern for the more deprived children and so create closer relationships with them.

117 The approach adopted proved to be cruel and negative. Personal possessions are important to children in defining their individuality; the 1952 Home Office Guidance spoke of children's treasured possessions needing to be treated with respect.[230] Confiscating possessions as described by the witnesses was a depersonalising institutional process. It was also emotionally abusive, as children lost precious items which reminded them of home links, such as the yellow teddy-bear jumper which HIA 43 was given by her father, and which disappeared - "the only reminder I had that somebody cared for me", as she put it in evidence.[231] Today such confiscation would be considered theft. There was no valid childcare justification for confiscating the children's personal possessions, and this constituted systemic abuse.

Foster Care

118 Every Sunday people from outside used to walk round the garden and identify children they wished to consider for a foster placement. Any child who was identified had to wash their face and go to the parlour to discuss the possible placement. HIA 62 irritated SR 134 because she wished to remain in the home and be with her sisters, and did not want to be picked.[232]

119 HIA 270 wrote:

> "On most Sundays we were dressed up and lined up for people to come look and take us out for the day if they chose us. I was chosen once… We were taken to a caravan and we were playing ball and I burned myself so the young couple panicked and we ended up in Casualty, I didn't seem to get taken out after that."

Fortunately for HIA 270, she formed a strong relationship with a member of staff whose brother and sister-in-law fostered her, and this became a long-term supportive relationship. HIA 270 was of mixed race, and a nun advised her foster-mother to pick a nice blond-haired blue-eyed child instead, but she refused firmly.[233]

120 HIA 124 went to stay for weekends with a policeman and his family, but when she returned, any presents such as sweets or a teddy were taken from her.[234] The girls were also sent to stay with families during the holidays. HIA 95 said that she was sent to a family with a newborn baby and she was supposed to help look after it. However the father of the family "tried it on" with HIA 95 during the night, and when HIA 95 resisted he drove her back to Nazareth House, saying that she was not doing the job she was sent to do.[235]

121 The idea of parading children for selection by potential foster parents would now be considered institutional and abhorrent, but the system appears to have resulted in successful placements according to witnesses in other homes, and it was commendable that the Sisters attempted to give children an experience of family life, with the possibility of long-term fostering and adoption.

Work Experience, Discharge and Aftercare

122 A number of girls were sent to Australia from Nazareth House under the child migrant scheme. Their evidence is dealt with in Chapter 6.

123 For children who stayed at Nazareth House till school leaving age, the Sisters found accommodation and employment. It appears that there was little preparation for discharge, and girls were not consulted about what they wanted to do. The jobs to which they were allocated were often poorly paid and menial. In the later years, there was independence training and aftercare practice was improved.

124 HIA 439 was sent to work at St John of God Hospital in Newry, but she walked out the next day and contacted Fr Jeffrey who got her a job working with Rev and Mrs Cupples. She said they were brilliant, as this was her first experience of real family life, and the placement was an interesting example of interdenominational co-operation, as they were Presbyterians.[236]

125 HIA 328 left Nazareth House in 1970. The nuns told her "out of the blue" that she was going and gave her a suitcase and a set of clothes. She was not allowed to say goodbye to her younger sisters, and she was taken home to her mother's house.

> "Everything was strange. It was awful. I didn't know how to get a bus or ask for anything in a shop. They didn't prepare us for the outside world at all."[237]

She felt that after leaving, girls were not welcome to return.[238]

126 HIA 171 was exploited by her first employer who gave her £4 for three months' work, cleaning and baby-minding for long hours.[239] HIA 20 was told to collect a suitcase and take it to the parlour, where she met a lady who took her to a family where she was expected to act as skivvy. She was not prepared for the outside world and no one visited to check how she was getting on.[240]

127 When no outside employment or accommodation could be arranged, girls sometimes stayed on at Nazareth House. When HIA 316 left school she was told that she was to work in the old people's home at Nazareth House. This entailed laying out dead bodies, which petrified her.[241] The Congregation denied that at the age of fifteen HIA 316 would have been required to lay out dead bodies.[242]

128 HIA 52 also worked for the nuns in the old people's home and in the kitchen from the age of fifteen to eighteen, and she said that she was not paid.[243] The Order stated that HIA 52 would have been paid, but that money would have been deducted for her keep.[244] HIA 9 obtained a job

stitching clothes when she left school at fifteen, but she also alleged that SR 31 took all her wages to pay for her keep at Nazareth House.[245]

129 HIA 62 complained that the preparation for her discharge was inadequate, especially in view of her upbringing in an insular environment. She left Nazareth House in 1974 during the Troubles, following an incident in which she and two others went to a disco without permission; she was placed by her social worker in a Protestant hostel, which put her at some risk.[246]

Religion

130 Religious observance was taken seriously. A chaplain was nominated by the bishop, but paid a weekly stipend of £5 by the Sisters. He said Mass every morning and Rosary and Benediction several days a week, he heard the girls' confessions monthly, and he prepared them for First Communion and Confirmation, though these services were held in the parish church.[247] First Communion and Confirmation were seen as special days, and HIA 335 said that in the 1940s the girls wore white and were allowed to ride on trams. People gave them sweets and pennies.[248]

131 HIA 316 said that the girls attended Mass every morning, and said Rosary and Benedictions throughout the day.[249] In the 1960s the three groups took turns to attend Mass.[250] It appears that in the 1970s there was a degree of choice and some girls chose not to attend, but they were exceptional and risked being labelled pagans by SR 31.

132 Misbehaviour in the chapel was treated as a serious misdemeanour. For example, when bullies pressured HIA 439 into making a joke confession, NHB 34 slapped her and took her into the chapel to kneel at the altar rail. Benediction was being held, and she said that the nuns shook their fists at her.[251] One priest slapped girls' faces if they did not say amen in a loud voice, according to HIA 161 and children who did not know their catechism were caned or whipped[252] or "whacked over the ear or hit across the hands with an implement".[253] SR 116 grabbed girls by the hair if not kneeling upright when praying. HIA 28 said that they had to kneel on the sitting room floor in their bare legs for half-an-hour prayers in the evening.[254] When she was about to make her Holy Communion, the nuns discovered that HIA 161 had not been baptised, and she said she was punched, kicked and put in another room away from everybody because she was deemed a pagan.[255]

133 There were occasional retreats, during which the children were not allowed to speak for three days, and they filled their time with reading or knitting. When caught talking, HIA 28 said, she was beaten on the hands and made to kneel and pray for three hours.[256]

134 Since the old people's home was part of the premises, HIA 328 saw dead bodies in a room near the chapel which she found "quite disturbing". She said that the girls were lined up on one occasion to kiss a dead nun, and as she was too small to reach she had to be lifted up.[257] About 1961 a girl making her way back from a foster home got lost in the snow and died. HIA 20 saw her in her coffin and thought she was asleep.[258]

135 HIA 234's conclusion was that:

> "Religion was drilled into us. I was on my knees all the time".[259]

HIA 234 was, however, the only witness to offer this criticism. In our opinion the level of observance was consistent with what might reasonably have been expected at that time in a home run by a Catholic Order.

Records and Care Planning

136 It seems likely that in the earlier decades records were rudimentary, and former residents seeking information have sometimes obtained little beyond their dates of birth, baptism and confirmation, admission and discharge, together with notes of any contact maintained after their discharge. When in 1964 at the age of eleven HIA 250 wanted to know more about her parentage, SR 31 gave her the details of her background.[260] Although there is no record that documentation has been destroyed, it seems likely that with the closure of the home, and in the absence of premises to store such material, most of it no longer exists.[261]

137 By the mid-1970s more attention was being paid to the planning of the care and education of individual girls. HIA 257, for example, was assessed by a psychologist because of her temper tantrums, and she was shown considerable tolerance at school so that she did not have to be transferred elsewhere.[262] HIA 195 said that SR 31 sat in when they met social workers - "We weren't allowed to tell them anything".[263]

Staffing

138 The community in Nazareth House Belfast was made up of a group of sisters whose responsibilities were allocated annually.[264] Some were fund-raisers and travelled round the community to obtain money. Some were responsible for specific practical duties such as cooking or overseeing the laundry or chapel. There was also often a small number of retired nuns. For the early decades there was one sister per group of girls, about four in all, who were accountable to the Mother Superior. The Order accepted that these staffing levels were inadequate.[265] As noted in the section above on education, some of the sisters also acted as teachers, though this practice ceased in the later years. The nursery had a separate team of a sister and some helpers. In the early years before paid lay staff were appointed, the staff who were not sisters were "mostly old girls who had been out in service and could not settle, or had not the ability to survive outside", and they helped in the kitchen and laundry.[266]

139 It was probably in the late 1950s or 1960s that the sisters were first augmented by the appointment of lay staff who were often young single women, only a little older than the teenage girls whom they were supervising. The appointments were made by the Sister Superior.[267]

140 From the 1970s onwards, staffing levels improved and the size of the groups was reduced, so that the ratio of staff to children was more generous. Along with improvements in staffing levels, training for staff was improved. They were seconded on qualifying courses, and by the time that the home closed, a high proportion were qualified.

Childcare

141 In this section we shall draw together our overall conclusions about the quality of residential childcare provided at Nazareth House, based on the evidence in the sections above on different aspects of daily living.

142 A number of witnesses were highly critical of the overall quality of childcare that they experienced HIA 55 said that the nuns were "physically and emotionally cruel" to the girls, and showed "no warmth or affection".[268] This was echoed by HIA 361 who said:

> "They never taught us anything positive. They just criticised us over everything. There was no affection or praise."[269]

143 A number of witnesses said that it was not simply a question of the nuns displaying a lack of affection, but that they discouraged girls forming relationships with friends or family members. HIA 37 said that "The nuns never showed any compassion or nurturing", but went on to state "They even discouraged affection between families".[270] HIA 27 said:

> "We had no real opportunity to make friends in the home as the nuns did not like us talking to each other".[271]

HIA 361 wrote:

> "I was always a loner. ...I used to stand in the corner. I didn't want anyone to notice me, particularly the nuns. ...I knew that if the nuns paid no attention to me, I wouldn't get slapped".[272]

144 It should be noted that three of the four witnesses quoted above were in the home in the 1940s and one in the 1950s. During the lifetime of Nazareth House standards of childcare improved greatly. Staffing levels were increased. Staff training was introduced. Physical conditions were better. The size of groups was reduced, together with the overall number of children. Boys were admitted, so that siblings could stay together. Recording, care planning and the involvement of children in decision-making were all introduced. These changes were not all made at once, but in the final years the quality of childcare was acceptable, and the only serious criticism was that the children were still housed in a large old institution.

145 During the latter years there were fewer grounds for complaint, therefore, and this is reflected in the lower number of witnesses who were in the home then. The majority of the witnesses were in the home in the late 1940s, 1950s, 1960s and early 1970s, and our observations on childcare essentially relate to those decades. Those who were in the home before the Second World War or early 1940s gave similar evidence and made similar complaints, but they are fewer in number.

146 Residential childcare is difficult and demanding, especially if the children have suffered disturbed backgrounds and have to come to terms with unhappy and damaging experiences. Success requires a united staff team with shared values and aims. In this respect the community will have been a great support to the sisters responsible for the groups in Nazareth House, in helping them maintain their motivation in the face of very limited resources and unremittingly long hours of work, year in year out. The beliefs which they held in common and the vows which they had all made will have sustained them in their lifetime commitment to be of service.

147 It is possible, however, that some of the problems encountered in the evidence reflected the other side of the same coin. The Order was highly hierarchical; sisters were expected to be obedient, and would not have readily challenged the existing way of doing things. Indeed, they were directed to work where the Order required them. Until training was introduced they were not exposed to new ideas in childcare, and they therefore maintained - and did not challenge - methods which were decades out of date. Even in the later years the split between the sisters in charge of the groups and the lay staff whom they managed introduced a sort of class system which some lay staff resented and which detracted from teamwork.

148 For adults who voluntarily submitted themselves to be members of the Congregation, obedience will have reflected their life-long commitment, but if it was then expected of disturbed adolescents, there was a real risk of confrontations.[273] The main response of the sisters to any girl who was bold or cheeky appears to have been punishment, usually physical, but often involving humiliation. To help such children overcome their difficulties a much more tolerant and understanding approach was required, involving much more individual attention and discussion of the issues in question.

149 The sisters had given up much in becoming postulants, novices and then full members of the Order. They presumably had very few private possessions. Their lifestyle was modest – despite the allegations by some witnesses that they had better food than the children. Their contacts with their own families were severely limited. It is possible, then, that they did not appreciate how significant some possessions were to children or that they thought that children should not become attached to material possessions. Whatever the thinking, it is clear from the evidence that many witnesses bitterly resented having to give up clothes, toys or teddies on admission or after visits to their families or foster carers. While the sisters may voluntarily have chosen self-abnegation, the children had made no such choice.

150 A number of the witnesses observed that the nuns did not want them to make friends, sometimes separating girls who had formed friendships or warning other girls not to associate with them. Similarly, some witnesses had the impression that the nuns wished to split families. Although the Sisters say that they had no policy to break up families, there were few attempts to help siblings to maintain contact in the earlier decades, and the absence of frequent contacts often created life-long rifts. This was in the context of the Northern Ireland community, where family and extended family links were of great importance. The reasons for taking such a negative approach to family links, which was contrary to childcare thinking at the time, are hard to fathom, but the sisters themselves were expected to avoid developing close relationships which might harm the general wellbeing of their community, and it is possible that they applied this concept to the children.

151 The Sisters appear also to have feared that parents whom they saw as immoral or feckless would influence their daughters, and that the unacceptable characteristics of the parents would be replicated by the children. This is understandable, but the use of severe punishments or humiliation will not have been effective in countering the problem. HIA 161, for example, was in St Anne's group with SR 116, who, she said, beat her the most.

> "We came from bad people, bad homes, we were the scum of the earth, children of drunks and prostitutes and goodness knows what, and so we had our parents' sins to answer for, and that had to be beaten out of us".[274]

The children needed to be loved and offered a more attractive way of living.

152 Sex education must have presented particular problems for the sisters. The childcare task at Nazareth House was to help adolescent girls learn how to relate to the opposite sex with a view to the roles they might fulfil as partners and parents. Having usually been members of the Order all their adult lives and taken a vow of chastity, the nuns presumably found their own life experience of limited help in this respect. Moreover, they appear to have equated sex with sin, and anything connected with sex was seen as abhorrent. This was apparent in the lack of preparation of girls for menarche; they were generally given the booklet My Dear Daughter to read and it was left to older girls to explain about periods. The system for handling menstruation was also punitive.

153 As noted above, the quality of childcare changed overtime. Systems became more flexible. The introduction of lay staff brought new perspectives on preparing girls for adulthood. Perhaps most importantly, the increases in staffing levels meant that children could have greater individual attention, and there would have been time for things to be discussed.

154 We have already concluded that the treatment of bedwetting, poor home nursing and the confiscation of the children's possessions were all systemically abusive. However, during the earlier decades, the combination of aspects of childcare (such as excessive chores, an institutional approach to bathing, the use of Jeyes fluid, the handling of menstruation and sex education, the poor quality of food, the insistence on eating unwanted food, the failure to celebrate birthdays, the poor quality of education at the school on the premises and the failure to prepare children for discharge) which were all below the standard of childcare that might reasonably have been expected at that time, we consider that this amounted to systemic abuse.

Allegations of Abuse

Physical Abuse by Staff

155 Over the years covered by the Inquiry, allegations of physical abuse were made against a number of nuns and lay staff. However, the bulk of the allegations relate to four sisters, SR 189, SR 31, SR 134 and SR 116. SR 189 was Principal of the school in the 1950s. The three last named were each responsible for one of the three groups of girls and their time at Nazareth House overlapped for most of the 1960s. The three were all firm disciplinarians, and shared a common approach to childcare, such that they dominated the atmosphere in the home at that time. During the overlap there were typically over 20 girls at any one time in Nazareth House who have approached this Inquiry as witnesses. It is unlikely that there were more than forty girls in residence during this decade, and so the applicants will have formed an unusually high proportion of the total number of residents. Once the four sisters had left, in 1970, only two children were admitted in the following fourteen years who have made allegations of abuse to the Inquiry. The four sisters are considered individually below, following examples of evidence of physical abuse relating to other staff.

156 In the 1940s, HIA 439 considered the Mother Superior, SR 112, "very bad to us", as "she battered us stupid", using her cane, which she kept hanging from her belt, and hitting HIA 439 on her feet.[275] If girls refused communion, they were caned, and if they pulled their hands away when being caned, they were hit on their legs.[276] HIA 335 also said that SR 112 and SR 177 used a belt, a thick leather strap or a ruler to beat her.[277]

157 In the 1950s some of the punishments were inflicted formally in the presence of all the girls. HIA 95 said that NHB 42:

> "... was paralysed down one side and the nuns brought her up to the stage in the big hall, bent her over and beat her on her bare backside in front of one hundred girls. She couldn't even fight back."[278]

HIA 20 recalled a similar occasion when three girls were taken up onto the stage and were smacked on their bare bottoms in front of the rest of the girls,[279] and HIA 37 recalled this incident, saying that:

> "...the nun went at them and whipped them with a cane over and over. They did this in front of everybody else and listening to the screams of the girls was terrible."[280]

On another occasion NHB 51, was caned in public and HIA 37 said that she "counted each slap and I remember stopping at 100 because it was so distressing."[281] HIA 85 explained from personal experience how she was told to lie down on the stage, with one nun holding both her legs in the air, whilst another nun hit her repeatedly across the bottom with a stick, a hairbrush or whatever implement they could get their hands on. She said it happened to her once and she saw it happen to other girls on numerous occasions. She considered it degrading.[282]

158 The Congregation pointed out that corporal punishment was widely used in families, schools and homes[283] but conceded that:

> "…with regret, the Sisters believe that the policy of 'no physical punishment' may not have been adhered to."[284]

Such punishments were contrary to good childcare practice, the Order's policies and the statutory 1952 Regulations for voluntary homes. Regulation 11(3) explicitly stated that caning should not exceed six strokes, that no caning should be administered in the presence of another child, and that children with known physical or mental disabilities should not be subject to corporal punishment without the sanction of the medical officer.[285] In the absence of records it is not possible to determine whether the last requirement was met or whether the punishments were recorded as required. These formal corporal punishments constituted systemic abuse.

159 Other physical punishments in the 1950s were informal. HIA 30 said the last beating which she received was from SR 190 when she was aged 15:

> "Her eyes were blazing with rage and she lunged at me".[286]

HIA 166 was hit for dropping the nuns' wimples in the mud. SR 145 said she was a child of the devil and battered her with a stick in the workroom.[287] HIA 387 summarised the maltreatment she experienced: being "slapped around the head and the back of the neck", "hit … on both sides of our hands with a ruler, until our hands bled", "punched most days for something or other", picked up "by the ears", and "hit with leather belts."[288] HIA 234 said that when she was seven or eight years old, while on the way to the bathroom, SR 183 pulled her out of line, threw her onto the stairs, pulled up her petticoat and hit her hard in the stomach repeatedly with her fist. She found this upsetting as she said she had no idea why the nun did this.[289]

160 Further allegations of informal physical punishments were made by witnesses who were at the home in the 1960s. One of HIA 62's earliest memories was that when she was aged three or four she was knocked out by SR 180 by banging her head on a radiator for looking at the contents of her handkerchief after sneezing; she woke up in the isolation room.[290] This is one of the few allegations relating to the nursery.

161 HIA 62 also said she witnessed girls being assaulted, the worst being when her sister had her head banged against white tiles for not washing properly. She recalled that there was "blood all over the white tiles", and her sister suffered hearing problems thereafter.[291]

162 HIA 103 wrote that if the girls were carrying on:

> "…the nuns would come down shouting and roaring and would often thump you on the head with a bunch of keys or their fists. The nuns used to grab us by the hair on the side of our heads when we were being disciplined. They would also use a pointer cane on occasion or their fists if you did anything wrong."[292]

Witnesses also complained about physical abuse by lay staff. NHB 32 was an older girl who worked at Nazareth House in the laundry; HIA 14 said that NHB 32 pulled her hair and hit her round the head if she did not do the laundry correctly.[293]

163 HIA 14 said:

> "We just took the beatings and said nothing. There was no one to tell and no one would have believed us. Nobody would have believed that the nuns would have been capable of treating children that way. We also did not know any better and didn't fully appreciate at the time how wrong it was."[294]

164 As HIA 28 pointed out, many children, whom she termed the "goody-goodies", were not hit. Punishment was for those who stepped out of line, and they were clipped for not dusting under their beds properly, or making their beds or not doing the cleaning. Sometimes they were taken to the sewing room on the ground floor near the changing room to be hit.[295]

165 Other punishments were applied in addition to beatings. SR 122, for example, was said to use Jeyes fluid as a punishment and bathed sores with it.[296] When HIA 171 used a de luxe soap which she had been given at a Christmas party, a nun accused her of being vain, and made her kneel outside her cell.[297] For running away, girls were made to kneel outside the nuns' cells and then scrub the passage the following day.[298]

166 There was only one example of a group punishment. According to HIA 20 some girls went out onto the fire escape to watch a firework display. SR 134 punished them by making them kneel all night with their hands behind their heads. Girls in other groups had to spend the night on the fire escape.[299]

167 HIA 197 said:

> "It seemed to me that the girls who didn't have any family always got it hardest from the nuns, probably because they had no one to turn to. We were also punished more often than the children who had family come in to see them. They were very harsh on us, and slapped and picked on us for very minor things. They were always crushing us. I believe the nuns knew they had to be more careful and they couldn't be as hard on the girls with families in case they were caught out".[300]

This was not only a question of physical abuse; HIA 197 thought that girls with families also had lighter chores, dusting instead of scrubbing.[301]

168 By contrast, HIA 43 thought that the children who had been at Nazareth House since birth formed a clique and were treated better.[302] She thought that the nuns were aware of each other's punishment of the children and said that there was a general atmosphere of fear.[303]

169 HIA 37 said:

170 It should be noted that of the thirteen witnesses quoted in this section, three were admitted to Nazareth House in the 1940s, six in the 1950s and three in the 1960s. Only one was admitted in the 1970s. The single witness to complain about punishment in the 1970s was HIA 25, who said that he tried to escape at every opportunity. On his return, his shoes were removed till he had to go to school, and he was punished with a beating for doing so every time. On one occasion he and his sister were put in a dark room, where a nun hit them with a broom. HIA 25 had lost both his parents in the previous couple of months and he was desperate to be with his siblings. He felt that the nuns should have understood this but they never sought an explanation.[307]

171 SR 153 said that it was for individual sisters to decide how to run their groups and she had no idea what other sisters did. No one explicitly said that caning was wrong, but only sisters were allowed to hit children. She said that in her unit when children misbehaved she usually punished children by stopping them from watching television, but even then she often relented and talked to them instead.[308]

172 SR 189 entered the Congregation in 1939 and died about 2004. She was at Nazareth Lodge from 1945 to 1948 but then transferred to Nazareth House from 1948 to 1959, and it is to the latter period that the allegations made by witnesses refer. In 1976 at a General Chapter, SR 189 was elected as Superior General of the Congregation and she served for twelve years in this ministry.[309]

173 SR 189 was clearly highly thought of within the Order. Sr Teresa Walsh wrote:

> "[SR 189] although strict was very straight and direct and was not afraid to confront or challenge a person when appropriate. Sister was an extremely hard worker and would not suffer fools gladly. She was a formidable lady but had a good sense of humour."

The Order denied the more serious allegations made against SR 189, while accepting that she might have used corporal punishment.[310]

174 Witnesses made a wide variety of allegations against SR 189. HIA 95 considered her "a rough wicked woman", and the worst of the nuns. She belted the girls and grabbed them so tightly under the arm that she caused bruises. HIA 95 thought that SR 189 took against her because she was feisty.[311] HIA 30 said SR 189 threatened her and two friends that she would put the three of them in a sack and bury them in a hole because they were bold. HIA 30 said she believed SR 189 because they never doubted anything the nuns said.[312]

175 HIA 166 said that SR 189 caned her for an incident in the chapel, and that she also scrubbed HIA 166's neck with a scrubbing brush till it was raw and bleeding to get rid of sunburn.[313] According to HIA 161, SR 189 was vicious, smacking girls' heads on the wall. When she bled, she was told to clean it up.[314] HIA 85 made the same allegation:

> "Quite regularly when playing out in the garden, we would be subjected to having our heads banged repeatedly by the nuns against a red-brick wall. On one particular day [SR 189] was banging my head against the wall so severely that [SR 134] announced that she thought I had had enough and [SR 189] stopped."[315]

176 The Order did not accept that a child would be subjected to this treatment.[316] It is no doubt hard to accept that someone who has held high office in the Order could also have inflicted the type of cruelty which has been alleged. As the person in charge of the home, SR 189 will have seen herself as being responsible for maintaining overall control, particularly in dealing with bold or feisty girls, but that does not excuse breaches of the Order's policies and the Regulations. We accept that SR 189 not only inflicted formal punishments which breached the Regulations, but also informal physical punishments.

SR 31

177 SR 31 was responsible for Our Lady's group on the top floor. She was also in charge of the school at Nazareth House, and later the school at Ravenhill Road. She was at Nazareth House from 1959 to 1970. In addition to the witnesses who made allegations to the Inquiry, 36 people complained to the police about her conduct.[317] The evidence below includes accounts of both physical and emotional abuse.

178 Like SR 189, SR 31 was reported to have beaten children in public. HIA 117 ran away. The police picked her up and took her back to Nazareth House. HIA 117 said that after they had left, SR 31 stripped her, placed her on the stage and beat her in front of all the other children as a punishment for running away. SR 31 used some black sticks which were kept in a container. HIA 117 said that she was also belted and hit with rosary beads that night.

179 For informal punishments, SR 31 was said to have used a variety of instruments. According to HIA 117, SR 31 had a practice of knocking her on the head with her knuckles.[318] HIA 29 said that SR 31 hit her over the head with her keys.[319] HIA 327 wrote:

> "[SR 31] had a massive bunch of keys, like jailer's keys, and she had a habit of digging them into our heads. If we were talking at mealtimes, she would come up behind us and hit us with the keys. They are what I remember most about [SR 31]".[320]

HIA 195 also alleged that SR 31 hit them with keys.[321] SR 31 told the police that she only held one or two keys, and she suggested that the witnesses had colluded and shared information.[322] HIA 175 responded that no one had put being hit with keys into her head.[323] HIA 29 said that SR 31 carried her cane all the time, but sometimes she used a black leather strap. HIA 9 said SR 31 also used a mop handle to hit her across the legs.[324] According to HIA 39, SR 31 also took girls' pants down to smack them on their bare bottoms.[325]

180 Girls were hit for a variety of reasons. HIA 124 said that if girls back-chatted or tutted or showed an expression the nuns did not like they were taken to SR 31's room to be caned, to beat the stubborn streak out of them.[326] HIA 84 said that when she cut her knee, SR 31 had no sympathy and beat her for being out of bounds, leaving the cut on her knee to become a permanent scar.[327] HIA 195 said that SR 31 beat her in school for being left-handed. When HIA 84 was caught wearing pants in bed, SR 31 stripped her of her pants and beat her on her bare bottom in front of the whole room.[328] HIA 124 said that SR 31 checked girls' beds at night to see if they were wet, and slapped her about the heads and legs when she wet the bed, making her kneel outside SR 31's cell "all night", praying to God not to wet the bed again.[329]

181 The result of SR 31's regime of punishments was that some girls were cowed. HIA 39 was very wary of SR 31 and she was always on her guard, as she saw her hit another girl very badly with a stick.[330] HIA 195 felt she:

> "could never do anything right. I was sure to get a slap every day. [SR 31] had her favourites, but I was her punch bag".[331]

HIA 124 wrote:

> "I was terrified of [SR 31]. No matter what you said or did you got hit so it got to the point where I was so subdued I never said anything."[332]

182 Some girls responded defiantly. HIA 197 told us that on one occasion when she was beaten she refused to cry, so SR 31 kept on hitting her, and she had to be kept off school for a week because her hands were black and blue and swollen.[333] HIA 430 said that she was sent to a store room just outside the dormitory for punishment but as HIA 430 was stubborn and did not cry, SR 31 did not like it and hit her more.[334] She told us:

> "...the more I didn't cry, the more she hit me, just because I think I was just stubborn and wouldn't give in to her..."[335]

183 HIA 37 said that when she and another girl truanted, SR 31 locked her in a room to prevent escape and beat her severely. HIA 37 claimed that she fought back, trapped SR 31 in a corner and made her surrender the key, so that she could get out. HIA 37 said she reached her uncle's house, who took her to the police and arranged for a medical examination. Neither the police nor the doctor could believe that a nun would inflict such injuries, and HIA 37 was returned to Nazareth House. She understood that SR 31 was disciplined.[336]

184 HIA 124 said that on the only occasion when she stuck up for her disabled younger sister, SR 31 put her in a drying cupboard on the second floor, where there was just enough room between the racks for a child to stand in the total darkness; she was left there for some time, and when she came out she had missed dinner and SR 31 put her back in the cabinet for answering back.[337] HIA 84 said that SR 31 locked her in a brush cupboard for telling lies, when she reported that an elderly resident in the home had molested her.[338]

185 HIA 430 told us that some children escaped punishment. HIA 195 contrasted the treatment of SR 31's favourites with her role as SR 31's "punchbag".[339]

186 Witnesses complained of SR 31's cruelty in dealing with children with psoriasis. HIA 195 said that when she had psoriasis, SR 31 cut off her hair, shaved her head and scrubbed her scalp with a scrubbing brush till it bled. When she screamed, SR 31 hit the top of her head with the brush, and the more she screamed, the more she was battered.[340] HIA 195's social worker noted that HIA 195 was "easy and co-operative" and had "taken the whole thing the treatment extremely well".[341] HIA 28 said that when three new girls were admitted with sore heads, SR 31 made her scrub their heads till they bled; she cried and so SR 31 hit her over the head with keys because she was not scrubbing hard enough.[342] HIA 161 alleged that SR 116 scrubbed her between the legs with a scrubbing brush, causing her pain.[343]

187 SR 31 was said not only to humiliate the girls but also to denigrate their parents, which the witnesses had found distressing. According to HIA 430, SR 31 would say:

> "You're illegitimate and you're a bastard. Who asked you to come here? We didn't ask you to come here. Your mother left you here".[344]

HIA 175 said that her mother visited every week and sometimes they went out. SR 31 ran her mother down, saying she was an alcoholic:

> "The way she spoke about mum has filled me with a hatred of her that has hurt me more than any of the physical abuse I suffered".[345]

188 SR 31 called the girls names. HIA 327 said:

> "Her comments hurt me more sometimes than being beaten. That's what stuck in my head more than the beatings. She was always humiliating us".[346]

When her mother visited, the nuns made fun of her and said she was living in sin. SR 31 read out a letter of complaint which HIA 327's mother had sent, pointing out the spelling mistakes. She said that when she was older and complained, SR 31 said:

> "You should never have been born. None of you should ever have been born. Your mother wasn't even married".[347]

189 With her combination of physical and emotional abuse, SR 31 stirred up considerable feelings of animosity among the witnesses. HIA 124 said that SR 31 was a very angry woman and "you would see her face going red with rage".[348] HIA 84 thought SR 31 very cruel and a bully. HIA 39 said:

> "[SR 31] should not have been a nun. She was very wicked and she showed no emotion or affection".[349]

HIA 29 also described SR 31 as wicked, while HIA 37 considered SR 31 "the most evil person" she had ever come across in her life.[350]

190 Having made allowance for exaggeration because of the strength of feelings which SR 31 engendered, we are clear that she physically and emotionally abused many of the children in her care.

191 SR 134 was at Nazareth House from 1953 to 1970 and she was responsible for the Sacred Heart group.

192 According to the witnesses, the forms of physical abuse employed by SR 134 were varied. HIA 28 said that SR 134 used to beat her with a wooden walking stick like a shillelagh, and she hid it under her clothes if she saw anyone like the priest coming.[351] HIA 124 said she was hit over the head by SR 134 with a big bunch of keys. It was only later that day that she found out from another girl that SR 134 had not liked the noise made by the scrunching of leaves. HIA 124 commented that the nuns always hit them on the temples with their keys or their knuckles as the girls did not bruise there.[352] HIA 95 said that in the schoolroom SR 134 hit girls' knuckles with a ruler or used the cane, carrying on till the girl cried. HIA 161 said that SR 134 whacked girls on the knuckles with a big silver serving spoon, such that their hands became swollen and could not be moved.[353]

193 SR 134 was also said to abuse girls physically directly. HIA 52 said that:

> "[SR 134] used to dig into the soft flesh under your arms with her fingers. The nuns would hit you on the head as well either with their knuckles or these big sets of keys they carried round."[354]

According to HIA 20, SR 134 used to nip girls or pull their hair if she thought they were misbehaving in church.[355] HIA 103 said that when she was given a BCG injection by the doctor, SR 134 thumped her on the arm and it became swollen and infected.[356] HIA 95 told us that she and one of her sisters were in SR 134's group:

> "You got thumped by her for anything - there didn't have to be a reason. ...She would grab you by the ears and pull you over to a door and bang your head off the door. She used to bang our heads off the wall outside as well".[357]

HIA 95 added that the grounds for punishment could be failure to do work properly, for example if a floor were not clean enough, or for no apparent reason; it depended on SR 134's mood.[358] When HIA 62 and a friend climbed over the wall and bought a lot of penny chews to share with the other girls, SR 134 caught them, and shaved their heads in front of the other children.[359] At school she had to wear a tea cosy as her head was cold.[360]

194 HIA 14 said that when she went up early for a bath, while the water was hot and clean, SR 134 shouted at her, grabbed her hair and repeatedly pushed her head under the water, holding it down and then pulling her back up by the hair. She remembered being petrified and unable to breathe. She was then beaten with the leather belt which SR 134 wore around her waist. HIA 14 said she had been left with a fear of water, and was unable to take her sons swimming as children and still did not enjoy taking baths.[361]

195 Three witnesses, HIA 20, HIA 95 and HIA 37, said that SR 134 grabbed girls' hands and made them batter themselves, saying "I'm not hitting you, you're hitting yourself" or "See, I didn't touch you."[362]

196 HIA 95 provided detailed evidence about the way in which SR 134 treated her. As a child HIA 95 suffered a nervous tic, and when she made involuntary movements in Mass SR 134 hit her, once so hard that she saw stars, or stuck a pin in her or "crunched" her in the back. When HIA 95 refused to eat porridge, SR 134 pushed her face in it. She threw brushes at girls when they were polishing their shoes on Saturdays. She shut HIA 95 in a cupboard. She gave girls hidings if there were marks when their underwear was checked.[363] The consequence, HIA 95 said, was that:

> "I lived in constant fear in the home. If you weren't getting hurt yourself, you were watching somebody else being beaten".[364]

197 HIA 62 wrote:

> "When I was fourteen [SR 134] was sent away to Hammersmith and a young nun called [SR 153] took her place. [SR 153] was a breath of fresh air. She was twenty-four and she was really artistic. She started to paint flowers on the bare walls of the dormitories and she made a list of all our birthdays. We all got a cake on our birthday - that was the first time we ever had any recognition of our birthdays. [SR 153] had just come from South Africa and she was so compassionate and caring. She saved me. She gave me a purpose in life and was the closest thing to a mother I ever had."[365]

198 This evidence demonstrates the importance of the impact of different individuals on children in their care. We are persuaded by the evidence that SR 134 used a variety of forms of informal physical abuse in her dealings with the children in her group.

199 SR 189 was replaced by SR 116 who was at Nazareth House from 1961 to 1967, running St Anne's group. She was seen as nice to begin with, while she was a novice, but HIA 37 said she was clearly influenced by the other nuns and became cruel like them.[366]

200 Several witnesses alleged physical abuse by SR 116. HIA 95 said that SR 116 took girls away upstairs and when they returned they had either been given sweets or they were crying.[367] HIA 37 said that SR 116 used bamboo canes - split and sellotaped together. HIA 20 said that SR 116 had a classroom and girls were made to stand outside and wait for her to call them in for a beating. She used a bamboo cane and hit her until she cried, so she learned to cry as quickly as possible.[368] HIA 316 said that SR 116 would always hit her on the knuckles where it hurt the most. She never got hit on the palm, and she used to have swollen black and blue knuckles all the time.[369]

201 HIA 61 thought SR 116 the worst nun as she kept picking on her:

> "…always beating me over the head and smacking me across the ear. Sometimes she just hit me with her hand and sometimes she used the metal crucifix of her Rosary Beads, her big leather belt or a big bunch of keys."

HIA 61 considered SR 116 "quite sly" as she only hit her when no one else was around.[370] On one occasion she woke up with a bandage on her head, having been hit by SR 116 on the side of her head such that her head hit a mirror. She had hearing difficulties subsequently.[371] HIA 61 was seen by a specialist who, she said, attributed her loss of hearings to the beatings she had had. She was sensitive about having to wear a hearing aid and tried to conceal it with her hair, but SR 116 embarrassed her by showing the other children.[372]

202 HIA 52 said that once SR 116 gave her a "bad beating" in a room beside the dining room:

> "She really lost her temper and lashed out at me. I was trying to protect my body so my back ended up black and blue from the hiding. It was extremely painful."

In consequence, when a teacher at school suggested that she should try on a dress she was making, HIA 52 declined, because the teacher would have seen the marks from the beating.[373]

203 When HIA 161 stayed with a family on a farm in Lurgan, the father and his brother both sexually abused her. HIA 161 told another girl, who informed SR 116, who gave HIA 161 the biggest beating of her life for "telling tales on a good Catholic family". SR 116 washed her mouth out with carbolic soap, and HIA 161 learned not to report abuse.[374]

204 HIA 257's view of SR 116 was more even-handed; although SR 116 used a roly-poly stick, a cane and a block of wood to hit her, she felt the punishments were justified and she was never hit gratuitously.[375]

205 HIA 29 said that SR 116 was the worst on bath night, as she used a scrubbing brush on their private parts. She found that the Jeyes fluid burned her badly, and made her skin brown, but the girls were not allowed to wash it off.[376] HIA 14 said that when she wet her bed SR 116 called her a "filthy cow", grabbed her head and pushed her face into the wet sheet.[377]

206 HIA 63 summarised:

> "She should never have been in charge of children; she had no compassion whatsoever."[378]

Both HIA 96 and HIA 52 saw SR 116 as a wicked woman.[379] According to HIA 61, SR 116 had problems wherever she went and had to keep moving countries and changing her name; she was also said to have had mental health problems when she joined the Order at the age of 18.[380]

207 We accept from the evidence that SR 116 abused some of the children in her care both physically and emotionally.

208 In summary, there were nuns (and later lay staff) throughout the time that the witnesses were in Nazareth House who physically abused children in ways which were contrary to the Congregation's policy. In particular, four sisters were identified as being the subject of the greatest number of allegations, highlighting the importance of the individual workers and the impact they can have on the lives of children. The fact that they were able to continue to abuse children over a period of years also raises questions about their selection, supervision and management. Their practice may have reflected the way in which some parents and teachers chastised children at that time, but it was contrary to the statutory Regulations and unacceptable as professional residential childcare. We are satisfied that several sisters and in particular SR 189, SR 31, SR 134 and SR 116 systematically abused children physically and that this was a systemic failing.

Emotional Abuse

209 The emotional abuse associated with physical abuse has already been noted. This section contains further examples where emotional abuse was alleged. The instances which witnesses found emotionally hurtful were very varied.

210 HIA 387 said she was emotionally abused and humiliated:

> "The nuns constantly told us that no one wanted us because we were bad, we were orphans."[381]

When she had her first period:

> "The nuns told me I was an evil wicked child because of what the devil had done to me. They never told me what was actually happening to me."[382]

211 When HIA 439 ran away with three or four other girls, they were returned by the police and the nuns shaved their hair when they returned so that they could be identified and known as the runaways."[383] The Order does not accept that this happened.[384]

212 HIA 171 remarked that the nuns did not like her talking to or playing with her sisters. She said:

> "The nuns tried to divide everybody; even if you got close to a friend and were having a laugh they would try to divide you".[385]

This was echoed by HIA 223 who wrote that the nuns did not like to see the girls make friends and tried to split them up. As an example, she described SR 31's attempts to break up her friendship with NHB 52, which resulted in HIA 223 being slapped and beaten on three consecutive nights.[386]

213 HIA 52 said:

> "I didn't really make friends in the home because you could never get too close to someone. You were not allowed to have friendships. We never knew anything about comfort or love. If you saw another child crying, your instinct would be to go put your arm around them but if the nuns saw that, you would get a hiding. We were never shown any love. You were completely on your own. There were no social connections at all; it was just work, work, work."[387]

These examples may have reflected the expectation within the Order that special friendships should not be formed as they could undermine the community ethos. Nonetheless HIA 166 concluded:

> "I formed strong relationships with some of the girls I grew up with and we are still in contact today. We only had each other as we were never shown any type of love or affection from those in charge of our care. I believe the nuns didn't know how to show love or affection."[388]

Some examples related to the way sisters dealt with the girls' families. SR 131 put HIA 171 in an isolation room after her grandmother had visited; she had hoped to go to stay with her, and SR 31 pointed out that if this had been possible she would not have been in Nazareth House. Grandmother stopped visiting but it was some time before HIA 171 learnt that she had died. She cried inconsolably, and was again placed in an isolation room as SR 31 thought she was waking everyone up with her "nonsense".[389]

214 HIA 161 said that SR 116:

> "…pulled me up by the hair and lifted me off the floor and she said 'Your mother is nothing but a prostitute anyway, a drunk and a prostitute, and that's how you're going to turn out'".[390]

HIA 161 said that this type of thing was said daily and she was never shown love or affection. She said she was called "scum of the earth"[391] and in oral evidence she said that the nuns declared that there was "no room in heaven" for her family, such that she thought the problem was her family name.[392]

215 HIA 197 said that the nuns told her she was ugly, dirty and worthless. When people visited to invite children out, she was sent to the back of the queue. She said she was never given any praise or encouragement and was told by the Mother Superior that she would be damned to hell.[393] HIA 134 said that "[SR 31] was very cold and I felt much neglected in the home".[394] HIA 134 said that SR 31 struck her name off the lists for parties, and she was given a toothbrush for Christmas.[395]

216 HIA 43 said that the memory had stuck with her of the occasion when she was humiliated and laughed at in front of the other children for having soiled pants. She had tried to conceal them, but her number made them identifiable. She felt that SR 31 despised her:

> "She was constantly putting me down, degrading me and making me feel stupid and worthless".[396]

She said that the nuns had favourites, who were given sweets, cinema trips and weekends with families, but HIA 43 was not given these opportunities. She concluded:

> "Those nuns should never have been involved in the care of children. They seemed to hate children; you could see it in their eyes".[397]

217 HIA 20 found teasing by other children hurtful when she was called 'fish' for bedwetting and 'dunce'. However, she found the nuns' cruelty worse, and she said they were constantly degrading the children. SR 31, for example, said:

> "Nobody wants you. Do you know why you are here? You were just dumped. Nobody wants you".

In consequence, she felt that she was only fit to scrub floors, work in the laundry and wash up in the kitchen.[398]

218 Several witnesses said that they were threatened with removal, for example to Muckamore Abbey, a special needs hospital, Middletown, a training school, or Good Shepherd, which operated a laundry where adults and a few older girls worked. HIA 63 said that these threats terrified the girls as they did not want to be separated from their siblings, and they had heard that girls who went to Middletown were never seen again.[399]

219 HIA 250 was at Nazareth House throughout her childhood from 1955 to 1972. She took a balanced retrospective view of the emotional care she received:

> "Our life in the convent was basic, which you would expect. We were fed and given a roof over our heads. Our basic needs were met, but there was no emotional side to it; there couldn't be. Who were we to get that off? In my view that was just a product of society in the fifties - who did care? My family did not. It was worse on the outside than it was on the inside. ...I was an orphan, totally on my own".[400]

397 SNB 715.
398 SNB 186.
399 SNB 687.
400 SNB 819-820.

220 It will be noted that some of the above examples related to the four nuns who were the main abusers. When SR 31, SR 134 and SR 116 ran the three groups there would have been no one to whom the girls could turn for comforting, and the whole atmosphere in the home would have been emotionally abusive, though it is possible that any favourites may have received care and attention.

221 The examples above indicate that some of the sisters belittled or humiliated some of the girls, by denigrating their families, telling them that they were evil rather than encouraging them to build up their self-confidence, breaking up friendships, failing to support girls when they were upset, and threatening them with removal to an institution deemed more punitive. We conclude that the emotional abuse suffered by some girls was systemic.

Sexual Abuse by Staff

222 There were only five possible allegations of sexual abuse by staff.

223 HIA 298 said that in the late 1940s a lay worker was bathing her at 4am, and she inserted her fingers into HIA 298's vagina. She recalled the horror of the experience, but being about nine years old there was nothing she could do about it.[401]

224 HIA 387 said that in the 1950s two nuns used to take her and other girls to the bathroom at night. Having taken off her nightdress HIA 387 had to stand on a table and spread her legs so that they could examine her, with one of the nuns putting her finger in HIA 387's vagina. The nuns also hit her, laughed at her and called her smelly and dirty.[402]

225 HIA 387 also alleged that a priest raped her in the sacristy after she had made confession. Her written and oral accounts are convincing. She told a nun some years later and was promptly transferred to the Good Shepherd Convent.[403]

226 HIA 117 said that in the late 1960s when she was about eight or nine years old a lay worker tried to get into her bed but she beat her out of it.[404]

227 HIA 316 recollected that when she was seven or eight she awoke one night to find a priest standing by her bed and her nightdress was around her waist, but she had no memory of anything sexual happening. When she awoke he moved away.[405] The Order said that a priest would ordinarily have been accompanied by a nun, and NHB 84, who was the chaplain at the time, said he never visited the children at night.[406] We accepted NHB 84's evidence though we cannot provide an explanation of HIA 316's experience. While there was no explanation for HIA 316's experience we accept that it was a vivid memory for her.

403 SNB 389,390.
404 SNB 875.

228 The incidents described in the evidence are all different and they do not form an overall pattern to suggest that sexual abuse was commonplace at Nazareth House. This is not to deny the seriousness of the allegations made by the witnesses, but to conclude that they should each be treated as individual instances.

Fr Brendan Smyth

229 Fr Brendan Smyth was a member of the Norbertine Order. He travelled widely in Northern Ireland, visiting children's homes and abusing large numbers of children. The Order acknowledged that he visited Nazareth House, and a number of witnesses made allegations that he had sexually abused them. He was eventually arrested and he died in prison. Chapter 10 deals more fully with his history.

Physical Abuse by Girls

230 There were few references in the evidence to physical bullying by peers. HIA 161 said that she was picked on by other girls, for example being tossed in a sheet, but that the nuns never intervened.[407] The nuns had favourites, known as their pets, who were given fruit and taken to parties, and when they bullied other girls the nuns turned a blind eye.[408] Some bullying in a large home like Nazareth House could have been expected, and we do not consider from the evidence that this amounted to systemic abuse.

Sexual Abuse by Girls

231 HIA 28 alleged that when she was eleven or twelve an older girl made her take off her nightdress and get into her bed, lying on top of HIA 28, kissing her, touching her breasts and vagina, and making her reciprocate. This

407 SNB 149.

continued about twice a week for four to six months, when the older girl took to somebody new.[409] HIA 85 was sexually abused a number of times by older girls who forced her to perform oral sex on them; these were her most traumatic experiences in the home.[410] HIA 103 said that an older girl tried to get other girls to touch her, but she always pulled her hand away.[411] The older girl said that HIA 103's statement was untrue.[412]

232 When she was eight or nine, HIA 134 told another girl in secret that an older girl was sexually abusing her, but the message was passed on and reached SR 199, who was responsible for HIA 134's group. She called HIA 134 a liar, which humiliated and devastated her.[413]

233 HIA 134 said that she and one of the two boys then in the home attempted sexual intercourse, but it hurt her and she pushed him off.[414] It seems that this was experimental and that they were of a similar age. HIA 368 was admitted to Nazareth House at the age of eight, and he said that older girls in their mid-teens abused him sexually by making him "climb up their nightdress and touch them intimately".[415]

234 The six instances described above appear to indicate exploration by adolescents. In view of the number of girls who passed through Nazareth House, the scale of sexual activity is unsurprising, and it is likely that the staff were in most cases unaware of it.

Inspections

235 The information available about the formal inspection of Nazareth House is very limited, and it was suggested by Dr Hilary Harrison that when the home was closed records would have been destroyed in accordance with Departmental schedules for the disposal of records.[416] It was the practice of the Ministry of Home Affairs to make annual visits, though there was no requirement as there was for industrial schools (which Nazareth Lodge was pre-1950). There are references to annual visits by MoHA inspectors in the home's log for 1953, 1964, two in 1965 and 1966,[417] but while the visits were termed 'annual', there were clearly gaps when visits were not made or when they were not recorded. Since the logs list all the films shown in the home, Christmas parties and trips out, the annual visits cannot have registered as a high priority when the log was written up. Some of the one-line records indicate that the inspectors were happy with the quality of care.

236 Speaking of the 1960s, HIA 171 said:

> "When visitors came to the home we were told the night before that people would be here and that we should all be nice. I am not sure if they were visitors or inspectors or what they were called. We were told to be up and on our best behaviour before any such visit. The nuns were the ones who were on their best behaviour on these occasions. When these visits took place you would see things coming out that we have never seen, such as books and dolls. We were never allowed to play with these toys. If any visitor had inspected any of the toys they would have noticed that they had not been played with and that the children just looked at them as if they were something out of space."[418]

237 It is reasonable to assume that the pattern of later inspections followed that which we have found in other homes. In 1973 the Social Work Advisory Group was set up, and in accordance with its name it ceased to inspect and offered support and advice instead. Following the Hughes Report it was decided to inspect all homes, and between 1984 and 1986 a systematic approach was taken by the Department of Health and Social Services to inspect all homes. This did not affect Nazareth House, however, as it closed in 1984. There is no record of the SWAG inspecting Nazareth House although there were references in the evidence given to the Hughes Inquiry of a Social Work Adviser visiting the home. We consider this lack of inspection amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure that the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

238 There is also very little evidence of complaints in the records which have survived concerning Nazareth House. In the minutes of a divisional group meeting of the Belfast Welfare Authority on 14 June 1971, dissatisfaction with Nazareth House's procedures was voiced; cases had been documented and forwarded to Mr Moore, the Chief Welfare Officer, but at that point no action had been taken. There is no further reference to this concern.[419]

Conclusions

239 The majority of the allegations about abuse at Nazareth Lodge relate to the 1960s and 1970s when the four sisters whose conduct has been considered individually were in post. Witnesses who were resident during that period look back on their time in the home as bleak misery.

240 HIA 197 felt that:

> "The whole environment of the home and the school was fear. ...The punishment seemed unnecessary for some things. It was just a way of frightening us and keeping us down".[420]

With hindsight HIA 375 said of Nazareth House in the 1960s:

> "The nuns did not have any childcare skills or understanding of children. They did not know how to show us love or comfort us. I found out in later years that they were being paid to care for us. I am still angry with Social Services as it was their duty to make sure our physical, emotional and educational needs were being met by the Sisters of Nazareth but they didn't do this".[421]

241 HIA 37 said:

> "Nazareth House was a bleak, dark place. I suffered physical and mental abuse on a daily basis during the nine years I was kept there. This amounted to thousands of incidents. I remember I used to just lie in bed and think this is a nightmare".[422]

HIA 9 concluded:

> "I have no good memories of my time in Nazareth House, only bad ones".[423]

242 It should be noted that once the four nuns had left the home, the flood of allegations virtually dried up. The many witnesses quoted by the Congregation in their final statement who enjoyed aspects of their time at Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge may have been as truthful and accurate in their accounts as those who made allegations. The fact that some children were not abused does not mean that those who complained did not suffer abuse.

420 SNB 694.
421 SNB 732.
422 SNB 054.
423 SNB 002.

243 The allegations of physical and emotional abuse have to be seen against a background which Nazareth House, Belfast, shared with other homes run by the Order. Resources were very limited and it was said that they were chasing the devil by the tail to get more money.[424] Yet they did not want to turn any girl away. The outcome was that the number of staff was insufficient to provide individual care, and some of the physical conditions were also poor. A further consequence was that standards of care were not up to date and the girls suffered institutional practices which should have been superseded.

244 It is noticeable that standards improved from about the mid-1970s onwards, and by the time the home closed it was offering good standards of care.

Summary of Findings

245 The following are our findings:

(a) Many of the tasks which the girls were required to perform were of little use to them as preparation for managing their own households, and in our view the excessive chores expected of the girls constituted systemic abuse.

(b) The infrequency of changing bath water, the use of carbolic soap to clean teeth, the use of Jeyes fluid in the bath, the rough treatment when bathing and the queuing were outdated institutional practices which should have been superseded or never adopted in the first place, and they constituted systemic abuse.

(c) The punitive approaches described in the evidence would not have given the children any sense of security but would have added to their anxiety; the measures would have been ineffective in dealing with enuresis and constituted very poor childcare practice, amounting to systemic abuse.

(d) The home nursing described was very poor in terms of the failure to take some problems seriously, the rudimentary treatment given, the physical abuse on some occasions, and the lack of loving care for children who were unwell. This amounted to systemic abuse.

(e) There was no valid childcare justification for confiscating the children's personal possessions, and this constituted systemic abuse.

(f) During the earlier decades, the combination of aspects of poor childcare (such as excessive chores, an institutional approach to bathing, the use of Jeyes fluid, the handling of menstruation and sex education, the poor quality of food, the insistence on eating unwanted food, the failure to celebrate birthdays, the poor quality of education at the school on the premises and the failure to prepare children for discharge) which were all below the standard which might reasonably have been expected at that time we consider amounted to systemic abuse.

(g) The public corporal punishments inflicted in the 1950s constituted systemic abuse.

(h) The range and variety of examples and the number of witnesses, particularly in relation to SR 189, SR 31, SR 134 and SR 116, indicate that the physical abuse practised by the staff was systemic.

(i) We conclude that the emotional abuse suffered by some girls was systemic.

(j) We consider the lack of inspection amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure that the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

Chapter 9:

Module 4 – Sisters of Nazareth, Belfast: Nazareth Lodge

Site and Premises

1 Nazareth Lodge faced on to Ravenhill Road in the south side of Belfast. It had extensive grounds, including a small farm, a walled kitchen garden and playing fields for the children, together with a range of outbuildings used as garages and stores. The main building was imposing. It was approached up a curving drive and consisted of four storeys, with a small tower at the corner.

2 In a written submission, HIA 159 gave a graphic description of the farm:

> "Nazareth Lodge had its own farm, which though not self-sufficient was able to contribute a great deal towards the running costs…".[1] "The farm took in a large rectangular area, which had hens, ducks, pigs and cows. Three or four men ran the farm."

They looked after the animals, the boiler, the hedges, and the graveyard.

> "We were allowed to watch the cows getting milked and pigs but not the hens, just in case we frightened them and they stopped laying, but we could go almost anywhere else".[2] "For a number of months each year sheep were allowed to graze the big field with its swings and sandpit where we played every day".

The boys were let off school to help get the sheep onto a lorry, but they ran all over the place. "The fun was great, the laughter merry".[3] HIA 87 said that a walled kitchen garden ran the length of the building, where they grew cabbages and turnips.[4]

3 According to HIA 159 a large area was concreted over in front of the main house, where they played football, rounders and gymnastics. There was also a large field with swings, sand pits and a large climbing frame. In the summer a fair left a large merry-go-round at the bottom of the field near the main road. They played tig, hide and seek, marbles, hop-scotch and with hoops. They also had tricycles and scooters.[5]

4 HIA 159 said that after 1953-54 a baby home and a caretaker's cottage were built halfway up the drive. The people who worked for the home, such as gardeners and cleaners and some tramps seeking assistance, went to the side of the main house for tea, bread and dinner.[6] This meant that there was some risk that such visitors could have access to the grounds where the children were playing.

5 The main block was a red-brick four-story building.[7] On the bottom floor of the main building there was an entrance hall where visitors were met, and to the right there was a bedroom for visiting priests, which was used from time to time by Fr Brendan Smyth. Also on the ground floor there was an assembly hall which was used as an indoor play room. HIA 159 said that the hall was also used for plays at Easter and in the New Year, which provided an opportunity for visitors to meet the boys, and that this sometimes led to visits on Sundays or weekends, and maybe eventually to adoptions. Later the hall was used for storage, including parcels from parents which, it was alleged, were not given to the boys, who did not know about them until years later.[8]

6 HIA 159 said that the main house had its own laundry, a washroom and a boiler room which supplied all the hot water and heating. The clothes were dried on great hot pipes.[9]

7 The main house had a connecting corridor to the nursery, and halfway along the corridor a door on either side led to the front door of the home or to the yard at the back, where there was a grotto to Our Lady. The kitchen was at the end of a corridor. On the right was the dining room and on the left another small corridor leading to the hall, the back yard and the farm.[10]

8 Until a purpose-built school was opened, there were three classrooms in the main house. In HIA 159's time:

> "[SR 34] had the first class room at the beginning of the corridor, Mr Fern the second, and Miss Comfort the third, and [there was] a smaller room for boys a bit slower taken by another nun. After 1954-5 a dozen boys who could not pick up schooling very quickly were sent outside to a special school for slow learners".[11]

HIA 24 said that in the 1940s the school room in the main house was used to show films.[12] HIA 159 said they had religious films, comedies and cowboys and indians. The hall was also used for plays at Easter.[13] The partitions which separated the classrooms were pushed apart and two sets of chairs were set out on each side of the classroom, with a centre aisle separating the boys and girls.[14]

9 On the first floor there was the chapel. The nuns also had their living quarters there, and the community included not only the sisters who cared for or taught the children, but also those responsible for 'questing' – obtaining funds through the house to house collections. There were also often some older nuns who continued to live in retirement as community members. Other than the sisters who had cubicles in the children's dormitories, all the sisters slept and lived in the nuns' quarters, and the whole group ate there. The children had no access to the sisters' accommodation.

10 The two upper floors of the main block were used as living quarters by the children. Originally there were two large dormitories, each taking up a whole floor, but these were divided into two about 1950, so that there were four dormitories, each housing about 30 boys, grouped by age, but with older boys in each one to keep order. There were at this time five groups in all, one being the Bethlehem group for babies and toddlers. According to HIA 89, bedding and heating were satisfactory.

11 With the opening of St Joseph's Babies Home, the Bethlehem group was closed and it was converted into accommodation for older boys. The number of groups was reduced to four, and then three, in the early 1960s, and this was the format during the period which was subject to most of the allegations of abuse.

12 An important development was the refurbishment of the accommodation for the groups about 1975, with the introduction of a mixture of bedrooms for three children and single bedrooms for older children on the third floor,

> "to give them privacy, personal space, independence and enable them to study and do homework in peace."[15]

All rooms and corridors were carpeted and had dressing tables and wardrobes. According to NL 4 it was in SR 172's time that the bedrooms were fitted with carpets, instead of tiles, doing away with polishing as a result, and each group had a verandah.[16] At the same time, bathrooms, playrooms with snooker tables, study rooms, dining rooms, kitchens and sitting rooms were introduced onto the upper floors, so that the group premises were self-contained, according to SR 46.[17] This was the first of the major changes which resulted in the updating and improvement of childcare standards in Nazareth Lodge, and fewer allegations relate to the subsequent two decades.

13 At this time each unit was headed up by a nun, assisted by one full-time and two part-time lay workers.[18] DL 40 was at Nazareth Lodge in the later 1960s and early 1970s, and he described the lay staff as very young untrained girls from the country.[19] He considered it "a big ask" for one nun and two teenage girls to have to care for twenty vulnerable children.[20] As demand for residential care diminished, the number of groups was reduced to three.

14 At the very top of the building there were attics, and these were used as dormitories at one stage during the Second World War, though this practice ceased after Belfast was subjected to the blitz. HIA 99 recalled that he saw air raids from an attic window, but the boys were moved and had to sleep in the basement in case of bombing.[21]

15 Because of the siting of the rooms within the building there was no need for children to go outside. This was not only convenient for the children, but it made supervision simpler for the nuns. The children were allowed outside in the grounds to play after school and at the weekends, but even then certain areas such as the garages were out of bounds. There were also times when the boys were taken out for supervised walks to the parks or to parties at Christmas. Over time, rules were eased and children were able to go unaccompanied to local shops, for example, but for many witnesses for the greater part of their childhood the children's world was bounded by the walls of the home.

The Groups

16 The group structure was set up under SR 34 about 1954.[22] There were five groups initially, including Bethlehem for the little children. Following the closure of Bethlehem, there were four groups, two on each floor, though there was a short period when NL 5 had a small group in the attic who became known as the 'Dainties' or 'Whippets'. The dormitories of the four groups were sited in two pairs, and there were adjoining doors, enabling staff, and sometimes children, to visit the other group on their level. The groups also had designated areas in the dining room. In the later years, as the overall number of children diminished, the groups were reduced in size from 30 to sixteen per group. Towards the end there were three groups, known by the names of the sisters in charge, reducing to two, then one just before closure.

17 These groups had considerable autonomy, depending upon the style of management of the Mother Superior. One Mother was known for visiting the units and talking to the children, for example, while another tended to see the management of the administration and finance as her role and stayed in her office, leaving the care of the children much more to the group staff. The four sisters responsible for the groups used to meet informally to discuss the running of the home and any problems arising at the time. The meetings were not minuted, and there were no general staff meetings.

18 Until the 1950s there was just the one sister per group, with no other care staff in support, though there were other sisters and ancillary staff working in the grounds, the kitchen, the laundry, and the workroom, where clothes were made and mended. The demands made by the care of thirty boys must have been considerable for the sisters running the groups. HIA 408, who was at Nazareth Lodge in the 1930s, said that the nuns were seen as angels, not humans, and that the boys were not allowed to talk to them, let alone feel able to tell them about abuse.[23]

19 In later years, civilian staff were appointed, first with one per unit, then two, and finally three. These staff were said to be mainly young girls, aged sixteen to eighteen, from the country, and until the later years no training was provided. The turnover of these staff was said to be high. Coping with boys who were not a lot younger than themselves must have been

23 Day 82, pp. 32 and 35.

demanding for such staff, and when the sisters were not present, at times they developed methods of control which represented poor childcare practice and in some cases abuse. Girls appear to have been admitted from the late 1960s, and by the mid-1970s there were five family groups, comprising 41 boys and 28 girls or 69 children in total.[24]

20 Each group was the responsibility of a nun, who had a cubicle in the corner of the dormitory with a curtained window from which she could observe the boys. HIA 204, however, reported that:

> "I was in St Joseph's, [then the junior] dormitory and [SR 118] was in charge. She had a cell at the end of the dormitory but it was the older boys who were in charge of us at night time."[25]

According to HIA 408 there were three rows of beds in the dormitory in the 1930s, all with rubber sheets in case of enuresis. HIA 99 said that the dormitory was warm and "scrupulously clean", with beds lined up in neat rows.[26]

21 The groups were:

(a) St Joseph's Group

(b) NL 5's Group

(c) Marion's Group

(d) Sacred Heart Group

(e) Our Lady's Group

Each of the groups was allocated a colour for their crockery in the canteen.[27]

22 One of the aims of introducing girls to Nazareth Lodge was to enable families to stay together. However, when HIA 141 was admitted in 1981, four of her siblings were placed in SR 46's group and three in SR 62's, but she was on her own in SR 29's group. Her siblings visited her and looked through the glass panels of the fire doors, but she had spent four years in St Joseph's Baby Home and did not know who they were.[28]

28 SNB 109.

23 The importance of the groups should not be underestimated. Although the children met residents from other groups at school and when playing outside, their main peer group consisted of the other children in their own group. In some cases they will have lived together for over a decade, and the groups developed some of the characteristics of a family, leading to life-long brotherly relationships.

24 Similarly, although the children met staff from other groups, for example in the dining room, it was the sister and lay staff in their own group who made all the difference to their happiness or misery. Indeed, witnesses said that if they were caught misbehaving by a member of staff who was not from their group, they were referred to the sister in charge of their group for punishment.

Admission

25 Many of the witnesses were admitted to the care of the Sisters of Nazareth as babies or toddlers. They were placed in the Bethlehem nursery section in the main building in the earlier years according to HIA 204 or in a separate unit later on, following the building of St Joseph's Baby Home, such as HIA 427. In these cases the admission to Nazareth Lodge would have been authorised by the Sister in charge of St Joseph's.

26 By the time the boys were moved from the nursery unit to one of the other groups in Nazareth Lodge they were used to institutional living. Other children were admitted direct to Nazareth Lodge. A few returned to their families, and others were fostered with a view to adoption, but the remainder stayed in the care of the Sisters in the earlier years. From 1953 they were in the care of the sisters till they were about eleven years of age and then transferred to the care of the De La Salle Brothers at Rubane. In either case, these children spent their whole childhood in institutional care.

27 HIA 33 was 12 years old on admission. He told us that his good clothes were removed and were not seen again. He said he was put in SR 118's group:

> "When she met us she asked me why I was crying and I said my mother had just died. She gave me a slap round the head and told me not to mention her again."[29]

29 SNB 138.

On his arrival, as the home was overcrowded, the boys were placed two to a bed in the attic. SR 118's group therefore filled the attic and the floor below. After a few months boys went to Rubane and to Australia, and the whole group was brought together on the floor below.

Daily Life

Routine

28 Witnesses varied in the details of their descriptions of daily routines, and indeed, practice may well have changed over the decades covered by the evidence. In general, former child residents thought that they got up earlier than the staff said they did, but it was pointed out that there were no clocks, so that we are considering people's impressions. HIA 87 said that in the late 1940s:

> "We were woken every morning at 6 am and had to attend mass at 7 am before we got our breakfast. Breakfast was usually porridge and a slice of toast."[30]

According to SR 30 and SR 46 the boys were awoken at 7.30am and had their breakfast at 8am.

29 Lessons in school took place from 9am until 3pm. The school was open for children from the community to attend, and applicants told us that the 'home children' were expected to sit at the back. In the later years, according to SR 46, children were enabled to continue to attend their schools by taxi where they were already registered.[31] During the week the children had school dinners.

30 According to HIA 87:

> "After school we had various chores to do around the home, like washing the floors, polishing the corridors, and cleaning the refectory".[32]

The children were then allowed out to play until tea-time. After tea, they were mostly allowed out to play again, but when they were called in from playing outside, they then began the evening routine of preparing for bedtime. It was one of the complaints of NL 5's group that she always called them in first, and that after going to bed at 6 pm, even in summer, they could hear the others still playing outside. After playing, there was supper: HIA 87 said supper was usually at 6pm and consisted of bread and lard with a cocoa drink.[33]

31 In the evening the sisters had an evening meal and worshipped as a community. In later years, the lay staff took over supervision at this point. In the earlier years (in particular prior to 1953 when boys aged eleven were first transferred to Kircubbin) older boys were left in charge. HIA 159 said:

> "The older boys were in charge of us, especially when the nuns were in chapel at Vespers. Winter times were the worst as they took great delight in scaring us with ghost stories, making us run down the corridor from one end to the other, shouting, 'There's a ghost coming up', so we would run to the other end. We now know that it was somebody with a sheet over him and a Halloween mask on".[34]

32 More seriously, many of the allegations of abuse relate to this evening period. At different times both lay staff and older boys were reported to have abused the younger boys in the absence of the nuns. According to HIA 204, the nuns did not enter the bathroom at bathtime. Older boys aged 14 or 15 were in charge and sexually abused the younger ones in the toilet cubicles; he said he was "made to perform impure acts".[35] The senior boys had "full control" while the nuns were dining or praying in church,[36] but the sisters were in charge during the night.[37]

33 In the earlier years, according to HIA 159:

> "All the younger boys were in one long dormitory in two long rows with a fire place at each end which was sometimes lit to warm the dormitory before we went to bed. Later, each had a pillow every night. We only had them in the winter time in 1950s."[38]

HIA 408 said:

> "In bed you had to fold your arms across your chest",[39] and HIA 5 added that SR 45 said this was "to get us ready for God".[40]

34 HIA 408 said that two or three older boys were left in charge at night, and they hit him with brushes for not replying when they called his name or for not being asleep if he responded.[41] According to SNB 139 and HIA 33, if anyone made a noise at night they were made to kneel in the corridor with their hands above their heads by the class boys, and they were hit by the nuns and the class boys if they dropped their hands. HIA 408 said:

> "[SR 118] never came back to check on us during the night."[42]

HIA 307, however, said that nuns did come into dormitories at night to check that boys were settled and to deal with crying children.[43] He said he cried himself to sleep, that the beds were never warm enough, and that he "never [had] any sense of comfort or security".[44]

Chores

35 Chores were undertaken before or after breakfast on weekdays, and on Saturday mornings. Relating to the 1950s, HIA 33 said:

> "Every morning before breakfast, we had to polish the long corridors on our hands and knees. We used to do it in lines of five. Five would put the polish on, five would rub the polish in, five would give the first shine, and five would give the final polish. The class boys would supervise and if you stopped for any reason they would hit you. The class boys were other residents who were put in charge. They had sticks and were free to hit you anytime. If they did not hit us when the nuns thought they should have they were punished by the nuns for not showing their authority".[45]

36 It was perhaps in later years that it was after breakfast that the children each had chores to perform. Opinions about chores differed. HIA 99 said that floor polishing was enjoyable:

> "We all had to swing together in a row, back and forward with the polishing cloth while a nun stood over us".[46]

DL 40 said:

> "We all mucked in with helping to keep the accommodation clean. I used to love waxing and buffering the floors. We used the buffer as a ride for sitting on".[47]

37 HIA 89, on the other hand, said that his main cleaning job was a large corridor, with three other boys. He did not enjoy the chores, "Never; never".[48] HIA 33 described the process, which was overseen by class boys, who slapped any boys who they thought were slowing up.[49] HIA 225 also complained of excessive chores, and said he was beaten if the work was not up to standard.[50] NL 5 saw the Saturday morning chores as something to occupy the boys while the sisters were out collecting.[51]

38 HIA 159 said that once a month the boys had their sheets and pillowslips changed and they turned their mattresses. They then gave the bedrooms a thorough cleaning.[52]

39 In 1944 an inspection report noted that the chores expected of the boys were appropriate.[53] However, during the period relating to most of the witnesses the system of chores at Nazareth Lodge was by this time well out of date. In many children's homes domestic staff would have been appointed to keep the communal areas clean; children would have been expected to look after their own sleeping quarters and to help out with other tasks such as preparing meals, with a view to their learning the household skills they would need when living independently. It is doubtful whether the Sisters could have afforded to appoint domestic staff. The systems they adopted kept the home clean and occupied the boys, but they bore no relation to preparation for independence.

40 We only received evidence of one instance which could have been considered seriously exploitative. HIA 422 reported that when he was nine or ten he was put through a hatch into the chimney at school and was given a wire brush to clean the inside of the boiler chimney. He was given no mask or protective clothing.[54] HIA 422 maintained his account in oral evidence. This type of task was clearly inappropriate for a young boy and was abusive, but as the only example it cannot be considered systemic.

Bathing

41 The institutional bathing routine figured frequently in the evidence. In the 1940s, according to HIA 87:

48 Day 83, p.7.

> "We usually had our baths on a Saturday evening at around 5 or 6 pm. There were three baths for the whole Lodge, and we were made to line up in two lines waiting for our turn. If you were lucky you were one of the first in the bath when the water was clean. We were stripped off and put into the bath in pairs, and were given an old sheet to dry ourselves with. If you were one of the last boys to get your bath, you were left with dirty water and a wet sheet to dry with. We had no privacy at bath times, as we were always being watched by the nuns. We did not have our own toothbrush, but had to share with each other. Modesty went out the window".[55]

42 HIA 259 said that they shared a toothbrush between seven or eight boys and they only cleaned their teeth once a week:

> "It was disgusting but that is the way it was".[56]

The sharing of toothbrushes was denied by the Order.[57]

43 HIA 24 commented on the use of carbolic soap. HIA 33 noted that as his number was 128 he always came near the end of the queue, and since the bathwater was never changed, it was cold and dirty by the time he was due to bathe.[58]

44 Bathtime routines remained institutional when girls were admitted. HIA 423 who was in Nazareth Lodge from 1964 to 1970 wrote:

> "At bath time, we were stripped and made to stand in a line. We had to walk up and down the wooden steps [as the baths were high-sided] and then we were put in a big tub. The nuns used scrubbers, like those used to scrub a floor, to bath us and we all had to share the same bath water. There would be one nun on each side of us. They would grab us by the back of the hair and pull us down under the water to get the carbolic soap out of our hair. There was always an institutional smell that we couldn't get rid of. We would be really red when we got out because of the scrubbing brush. All the children wanted to be the last to get bathed because whenever we got out of the bath we were made to stand, still naked and without any towel, until everyone was bathed. We could be left standing naked for up to an hour before we were allowed to get dressed".[59]

56 SNB 543.
57 SNB 1941.
58 SNB 1641-1642.
59 SNB 741-742.

45 HIA 5 said that in the 1980s bathtime was "horrific". Girls and boys had to queue together naked for their baths; he had never seen his brother naked before. A member of staff stood in the bath and held his shoulders down, one nun held his legs, while another nun poured a bucket of cold water and Jeyes fluid over him. Their mouths were washed out with carbolic soap to make their souls clean.[60]

46 Sisters who were consulted had no recollections of children being required to line up for baths, and the Congregation:

> "would not accept that there was any deliberate policy or policy requiring children to stand in a line with other children without clothing".[61]

They accepted that, particularly in the earlier days, bath water would have been shared, as was the practice in many families at that time.[62] The system of bathing used in Nazareth Lodge was presumably devised when the home was first opened and very large numbers of boys had to be supervised. Even in the 1950s it should have been possible to change the bath water more frequently than as described by the witnesses, and if it was necessary to economise, showers could have been introduced, reducing the likelihood of sharing infections through the dirty bath water and shared sheets for drying. By the 1950s, the system was contrary to the approach outlined in the 1952 Home Office Guidance, which said that children should be taught to bath themselves and that there should be clean water for each child.[63] In view of the minimal staffing of the home at that time it is unsurprising that such an outdated system was maintained, but this represented poor childcare practice. The bathing system should have been abandoned and its continuation represented systemic abuse.

Jeyes Fluid

47 Many witnesses recalled the use of Jeyes fluid when they were bathing. HIA 159 said that hair was washed on Fridays in a long sink like a horse trough, using Jeyes fluid, and that their underpants were examined for soiling. Three boys were made to sit in a cold bath for an hour.[64] By contrast, HIA 142 recalled the water being "always scalding hot" and that he was scrubbed till his skin was raw.[65] HIA 159 thought bathing was less frequent:

65 SNB 284.

> "We also had a bath once a month and our hair was washed once a week in a solution of Jeyes fluid to keep us free of nits and other hair infections".[66]

HIA 307 said that Jeyes fluid was put in baths, and it "stung like hell". It was thought by the boys that the Jeyes fluid was used to deal with lice.[67]

48 The Sisters accepted that a small amount of Jeyes fluid might have been used to prevent outbreaks of head lice, body lice and scabies, but did not accept that Jeyes fluid would have been used in bathing as an alternative to soap, suggesting that it was its pervasive smell when used to clean bathrooms that witnesses recalled.[68] This explanation would not account for the stinging sensation which witnesses reported, and the witnesses who recalled its use in bathing were persuasive.

49 There is no doubt that in running a home for over a hundred boys it was necessary to apply high standards of hygiene, and there was always the risk that newcomers or children on visits home could introduce lice or fleas. Cleanliness and regular checking were therefore important, but other treatments were available. Jeyes Fluid was a very strong detergent for use on floors and tiles.

50 When Jeyes fluid was first developed in 1877 it was used for many purposes, but by the 1950s it should not have been used in baths or for hair washing. This practice was well out of date and in our view its use amounted to systemic abuse.

Bedwetting

51 The first reference in the records to bedwetting arose from a complaint in 1927 that a boy had been punished for wetting his bed. A representative of the Ministry of Home Affairs told the sister and manager of the home:

> "Punishment is not the proper way to deal with these cases, but on the contrary is liable to make them worse".[69]

Advice from the Ministry in those days would usually have been taken seriously, but the evidence of witnesses suggests that bedwetting continued to be punished.

66 SNB 32188.
67 Day 84, pp.5 to 6, SNB 099.
68 SNB 1508.
69 SNB 13660.

52 HIA 204, referring to the 1930s, said:

> "When I wet the bed I was punished the next morning by being taken to the bathroom by the older boys, where they threw buckets of ice cold water over me. I then had to kneel outside [SR 118's] room. When she came out she made me lie down on the floor and she beat me on the backside with a strap. This went on for years".[70]

Nothing was done to correct his enuresis and he continued wetting the bed after he had left Nazareth Lodge.[71]

53 Although not enuretic himself, HIA 408 confirmed HIA 204's account:

> "The boys who wet the bed were treated very badly by [SR 118]. All the boys in the dormitory were brought to the bathroom to watch the bedwetters get punished. They were placed in a cold bath, regardless of whether it was winter or summer. There would be an older boy who poured buckets of cold water over the boy's head. It was so cold the boy in the bath would be unable to breathe. [SR 118] would then get the boy out of the bath and put him on the red tiled floor. She would hit him on the behind and it would sting because he was cold. If he turned over she would put her foot in his groin and hit him again. I never wet the bed so I was never punished in this way, but I was made to watch the same four or five boys being punished in this way nearly every morning".[72]

HIA 99 also described his personal experience of the same treatment in detail.[73]

54 Even when girls were admitted to Nazareth Lodge, punishment was said to have continued. HIA 423 said that she wet the bed once and was beaten and called dirty:

> "For the next week, when I was in bed, the nuns would tie my feet at the ankles to the bottom of the bed. It was an iron bed with poles and they used bits of rag to tie me to it. My feet would be freezing and the nuns would come back to check that I hadn't covered them over".[74]

55 The Order did not accept that this happened.[75] However, the Sisters did accept the complaints about the treatment of bedwetting. Sr Brenda said:

70 SNB 305-6.
71 Day 82, p.12.
72 SNB 220.
73 SNB 275.
74 SNB 741.
75 SNB 1951.

> "The sheer number and consistency of these complaints make it very difficult to deny that events such as those described did actually happen".[76]

She suggested that the treatment of the children:

> "...was done out of ignorance of the issues behind the problem and a belief that the child could just stop the bedwetting if he or she wished", having perhaps considered the children rebellious or mischievous. Sr Brenda suggested that the punishment of being bathed in cold water reflected the need to be washed before attending school and a shortage of hot water.[77] This does not explain the cruel treatment meted out by SR 118.

56 It is hard to understand why such methods were used, especially as it had been acknowledged at Nazareth Lodge as far back as 1927 that punishing enuresis did not cure it. Children who wet their beds needed to be treated sensitively; by contrast, the use of terms by the sisters such as "fish" for the enuretics was presumably intended to be demeaning. It must have been apparent to SR 118 that her approach was ineffective if she had to keep on punishing the same four or five boys. There was no justification for SR 118's cruel conduct in punishing bedwetters, which amounted to systemic abuse.

Health care

57 In their final statement the Congregation quoted four anonymous cases and twenty witnesses who described their health care at Nazareth Lodge. They also highlighted the evidence that medical officers had been appointed to the home and had visited regularly.[78]

58 After an accident in which his eye was damaged by a privet hedge, HIA 159 had the eye removed in hospital and an artificial eye was fitted. As an adult he was classed as disabled, which made getting jobs difficult.[79] He had further spells in hospital while he was at Nazareth Lodge, with an infected knee, a broken leg and a serious cut to his hand. The treatment he received while at Nazareth Lodge appears to have been appropriate.

76 SNB 1510.
77 SNB 1510.
78 SNB 100143.
79 SNB 594.

59 More than one witness spoke about being ignored when they were unwell and confined to bed. HIA 183 said that no one checked on him or brought him food, and he had nothing to eat,[80] for example, and HIA 307 said he was left in isolation and no one spoke to him for days.[81] If this happened it was poor childcare.

60 HIA 297 recalled that a nun treated a boil on his leg, but could not remember seeking a doctor or dentist during his four years at Nazareth Lodge.[82] His medical records indicate that he had audiology tests and a tonsillectomy in Belfast City Hospital. HIA 33 said that the doctor was never called and that if a boy caught a cold SR 118 administered a spoonful of castor oil.[83] Even as late as 1980, HIA 10 reported that she had scars on her neck from the use of the silver lice comb and that she had seen other girls bleeding.[84]

61 We are inclined to believe the records, rather than the witnesses' recollections. It is not surprising that inspections by medical officers were not recalled, as they probably carried little significance for the children and were viewed as part of the home's routine. The accounts suggest that, other than boys being left in isolation, the health care provide at Nazareth Lodge was satisfactory.

62 One female witness, HIA 363 alleged improper conduct on the part of a General Practitioner. Since the alleged behaviour was said to have occurred in the doctor's surgery it was outwith the remit of the Inquiry, and if the matter were to be taken further, it would need to be investigated by the Health Authority and the General Medical Council. It is not the Inquiry's role to reach conclusions on specific cases, but in so far as HIA 363's allegations related to failure on the part of the Sisters to notice her distress, the evidence of the witness was discrepant from the detailed health records maintained by the home. We concluded that there were no grounds for determining that there had been systemic abuse.

Clothes

63 Although clothing was individualised in the later years, for most of the period covered by the Inquiry's remit, the Sisters relied on donations from the community or from supportive businesses, or they made the clothes in their workroom. In consequence, although there was no uniform as such, as HIA 87 commented, all the boys dressed the same and were easily identifiable as home boys. The styles, however, clearly varied from time to time, depending on what was available.

64 HIA 24 said that in the 1940s they wore shorts and orange jackets.[85] HIA 87 was given a one-piece boiler suit; shorts, a shirt and other smarter clothes were issued if boys were going out of the home.[86] HIA 247 said that there was no official uniform but all the boys wore shorts and similar tops. HIA 89 said they wore same clothes every day, and had shorts until they were ten or twelve years old. According to HIA 422 the boys had a brown corduroy uniform and short trousers.[87] HIA 110 said that they had "wee shorts and a t-shirt."[88]

65 This was not just a matter of fashion or individuality. Because stocks were limited, clothing was often ill-fitting. HIA 89 said that the clothes were satisfactory, but his underwear was too tight. HIA 408 said that he wore shorts and boots but no socks in the 1930s. Wearing boots without socks gave him blisters and he says that he has continued to suffer foot problems caused by the badly fitting boots he had to wear when at the Lodge. HIA 99 wore sandals mostly; he had to wear tight shoes once and says he was crippled. HIA 89 had holes in his shoes.

66 The Sisters said that they provided the best clothing possible and the children were provided with a full school uniform. They did, however, have to rely on hand-me-downs and donations from firms.[89] At a time when there was widespread poverty, and children in the community often wore hand-me-downs, it is not surprising that the quality of clothing and footwear was poor in the early years. The Order in Belfast was dependent on a poor community for its income and for the donation of clothing and footwear; no doubt some of the apparel it received was already well worn. However, from the 1950s onwards, the Sisters could have obtained fees from the welfare authorities for the upkeep of the children, and they were slow in accessing these resources. From the 1960s onwards it should not have been necessary for children to wear old or ill-fitting cast-offs.

67 As social workers became more involved, grants for clothing became available and they (or the children's keyworkers) took children to the shops to buy clothing with their allowances.[90]

Numbers and Names

68 The Sisters allocated numbers to the boys, ostensibly for the purposes of identifying their clothing, and this practice was clearly preferable to having a common pool of clothing. Many of the witnesses recalled their numbers, and it appears that their numbers were at times used for other purposes. HIA 183 said he was never called by his first name, but was always known by surname or by his number, 66, for clothes. Other witnesses provided similar evidence.

69 The Congregation said that there was no specific policy on the use of numbers, which was seen as a pragmatic way of dealing with laundry. Nor was the practice discontinued at any particular time.[91] Throughout the period of the Inquiry's remit, if the Sisters were trying to create an alternative home life for the boys, it would have been best practice for staff to use first names in talking to children, and in so far as numbers were used for other than practical purposes, such as the allocation of clothing, this would have represented an institutional approach to care. It is our impression that the use of numbers rather than names happened on occasion, but there has been insufficient evidence to be certain that this was standard practice.

Food

70 Feeding a large number of boys with limited resources must have been a challenge for the Sisters, despite the presence of the farm and the kitchen garden, especially as growing boys are often hungry. The food provided appears to have been basic and without much variety. Understandably it was when the food fell below acceptable standards that the witnesses recall what was on offer. In the Congregation's final statement they quoted approving inspection reports from the 1930s and 1940s and the statements of witnesses who found the food acceptable.[92] The most approving observations, though, relate to the last decade before the home closed, though even then there were critical observations.[93]

71 HIA 408 recalled that in the 1930s the boys were made to eat food which was "smelly and bad". Breakfast was porridge with salt and sour milk, and there was a cup of hot milk and half a slice of bread and dripping at 11am. When he took breakfast to SR 118 he stole a bit of bacon as he had never seen it before.[94] HIA 422 said that the boys used to take bread out of a bin in the back yard and if there was a fire to burn rubbish they toasted the bread.[95] HIA 99 said the food was "not good". He alleged that he was forced to eat a rotten potato by SR 118. He said that the volume of food was satisfactory, but noted that the older boys dined with the nuns and had meat.[96]

72 Several witnesses reported that they had been hungry and they tried various measures to obtain additional food. HIA 408 said the boys had steamed potatoes, and that they scavenged peel from the dustbin. HIA 89 said he was always hungry and that food was of a poor standard. HIA 159 said that:

> "Most of the fruit ...was stored in the large barn at the far end of the old people's home, which was behind the baby home. Small groups of boys used to go down at night and nick a few bananas and apples".[97]

He said that he was forced to eat the stolen apples after a raid on the store and he had a struggle not to throw up.[98] HIA 183 said the food was not great - mainly stew and porridge, and he was so hungry that he sneaked into the kitchen and stuffed himself with bread.

73 By contrast, HIA 110 said that on the day of their first Holy Communion they had a fried egg; it is noteworthy that this was a special treat.[99]

74 From 1975, with the new kitchens in the units, the food improved and the children were given supper.[100] However, HIA 363, who was admitted to Nazareth Lodge in 1977, said the food was still terrible; if not eaten, it was brought out the next day, and she was force-fed when the food was two or three days old.[101]

75 According to Sr Brenda the Sisters attempted to provide the best food they could, taking account of factors such as rationing. She said that the nuns ate the same food as the children, and when there was a shortage it was the sisters who went without.[102]

76 It is apparent from the evidence that the boys were at times hungry, that there was little variety, that there was probably very little fruit for the children and that at times the quality of food was poor. However, it is likely that there were many people in the community who were in the same position, especially in the post-war period when food was still rationed. On balance, without denying any of the witnesses' evidence, we are inclined to accept that the Sisters tried to provide a reasonable diet within the limited resources available to them. However, there appear to have been times when the food failed to meet minimum standards in terms of both quality and quantity. As with clothing, the standard of food could have been improved earlier if income had been received from the welfare authorities.

Force-feeding

77 HIA 110 said they were hit across the face by the civilian staff if they did not eat the food.[103] HIA 142 said that he was force-fed held in "a clamped position" to keep him still and make him swallow, and he attributed current eating problems to this treatment.[104]

78 HIA 141 alleged that SR 29 had force-fed her with Brussels sprouts, which made her vomit all over SR 29, who slapped her face.[105] HIA 225 said he was force-fed turnip:

> "I did not want the turnip but this person pushed it into my mouth and hit me around the face and made me swallow it. This made me vomit and she then made me eat the vomit".[106]

The Order did not accept that force-feeding took place, but when this was put to HIA 225 when he gave evidence he was adamant that it happened and remembered it vividly. HIA 225 said:

> "...on this occasion I said, 'I don't like it. I don't eat turnip', and I was told to eat it and I wasn't going to eat it, and that's when...I had a spoon put in my mouth, and I said, 'I will be sick', and it continued, and I was sick, and she lifted a piece of what I threw back up and put it back in my mouth and slapped me round the face. I mean, I can't imagine what the Congregation may feel about that. That is up to them, but I know how I felt about it."[107]

79 The exasperation of staff when boys refused to eat food is under-standable, as children were expected to eat everything, not only because of the waste if it were uneaten, but also because in residential care refusal was seen as a symbolic rejection of what the staff offered in their parental role. The rejection of food is often one of the symptoms that all is not well in a children's home. However, force-feeding sets up a confrontation which staff may lose, and it does nothing to persuade the child to like the food s/he has refused or form a closer relationship with the staff involved. This practice was therefore unacceptable in residential childcare. We accept that force-feeding took place and it constituted systemic abuse.

Punishments

80 SR 30 said that there was no disciplinary policy in the later 1970s, and children were sent to their rooms or deprived of privileges, for example when a boy flushed a hamster down the toilet.[108] SR 29 said that the responsibility for discipline lay with the sisters in charge of the units:

> "…the main punishment for children who had misbehaved would have been having their pocket money reduced or taken off them for a short period, they could have been asked to do extra chores such as helping with the washing up or setting the tables and cleaning and polishing shoes, their access to the TV could have been withdrawn or not being allowed to watch movies. On some occasions they would have been sent to their rooms or could have been, what is now known in modern terms 'grounded' and not being allowed to go into town to the cinema or events like that".[109]

Such punishments would have been quite appropriate in residential childcare at that time, but they contrast sharply with the witnesses' descriptions of physical abuse.

Activities

81 On Saturday mornings there were further chores to be undertaken, but the children had free time in the afternoon. HIA 89 was at Nazareth Lodge from 1943 to 1953 and he said that:

> "Other than a football there were no toys to play with. We made up our own games".[110]

In contrast, HIA 159 said that there were swings, sand pits and a large climbing frame. They played tig, hide and seek, marbles and hopscotch. They also had hoops, tricycles and scooters.[111] In the later years they went swimming and attended a youth club, brownies or scouts.[112]

82 It was on Saturdays that the "sweetie men" called, bringing their guitars; they also accompanied the boys at holiday times.[113] Since all the staff, other than the handymen and visiting priests, were women, the involvement of male volunteers who could provide role models would have been welcome. Occasionally the boys were taken out for a walk in the neighbourhood, but the witnesses who spoke of the walks did not generally have happy memories. HIA 87, for example, recalled that in the 1940s Sunday walks in Ormeau Park were "like open jail", as the boys were not allowed to stop to play or talk to anyone. HIA 159 said:

> "On Sundays in the summer months we would go out for a long walk to the Ormeau Park on the Ravenhill Road, and it could get very hot in these little brown uniforms".

83 Other trips out were more memorable. There appear to have been regular trips to the cinema and the swimming pool and occasional trips elsewhere. DL 40 recalled that all the chaplains at Nazareth Lodge were kind and took the boys out for day trips in their cars, for example to Portrush and Portadown.[114] HIA 21 recalled being taken to the pictures on Ormeau Road, and going to the swimming pool on Thursdays.[115] HIA 159 remembered seeing The Ten Commandments from the circle, and during the break the boys had ice-cream and sweets. They also visited Dublin Zoo, and a circus at the Grand Opera House.[116] In addition to the cinema trips, they had films in the hall - religious ones, comedies, and cowboys and indians, according to HIA 159.

84 An activity which brought back happy memories and a sense of pride was the music. HIA 159 wrote:

> "[SR 152] was in charge of the choir. We used to practise upstairs in the corridor at night when it was near Christmas time, and to keep our voices clear and warm, [she] used to bring up a large pot of very hot water with loads of jam in it. We usually had two cups, then we were singing again".[117]

85 The boys' choir was used for special occasions:

> "...we got dressed up in our little brown uniform and sandals for this opening day [St Joseph's Baby Home] and...on the feast of Corpus Christi we would walk from the chapel down the avenue saying the Rosary and finish beside the statue and sing some hymns. We also wore our suits when we went away to Bangor, Dublin, as part of the choir, or Belfast city to make a record of some Christmas carols..."[118]

86 HIA 204 said that he was selected to sing and do Irish dancing at concerts organised for visiting nuns and priests, sometimes having to dress as a girl, and sometimes having to present chocolates to the visitors.[119] HIA 247 also mentioned winning a cup for Irish dancing.[120]

87 HIA 307 said that singing was one of the few good things about the Lodge. He had a good voice, they nurtured his ability and he enjoyed it, though he felt that he was used by the nuns at fundraising events. There was a lot of practising to get things right and the nuns encouraged him to have a sense of pride; he was the lead singer and actor at the time.[121]

88 In large homes such as Nazareth Lodge activities were important as ways of occupying children, and thus avoiding misbehaviour, as well as giving them positive experiences and, in the case of music, developing their talents. The Sisters appear to have made good use of their community contacts, and it is clear that the opportunities to sing and dance were much appreciated.

Birthdays

89 Birthdays were generally not celebrated, at least in the earlier decades, and some children did not know when their birthdays were. HIA 99 said that he did not know what birthdays were until he was older. HIA 422, however, said that when he was eleven there was a party for him in the dining hall,[122] and in the 1970s HIA 210 had a party every year to celebrate his birthday.[123] SR 29, who was at the home in the late 1970s and early 1980s, said that children had "small parties for their birthdays".[124] As stated to the Hughes inquiry, there is a reference in the log on 2 January 1976 to the combined celebration of two boys' birthdays.[125]

90 Even in a large home it should have been possible to make each child's birthday a special day, and the failure to celebrate each individual once a year in the earlier decades indicated the institutional nature of the childcare at Nazareth Lodge. The fact that children did not know their birthdays also indicates lack of discussion about personal matters.

Christmas

91 Christmas was recalled as a time of mixed excitement and disappointments. The main memory of Christmas time was the parties which children were invited to attend. They were held at big businesses such as Mackie's factory and Kennedy's bakery. A witness said that these parties were the only times that the boys at Nazareth Lodge and the girls at Nazareth House saw each other. HIA 247 said that at the parties, they were spoiled with cake and sweets.

92 Attendance at the parties was shared out, but selection also appears to have depended upon the behaviour of individuals. HIA 87 said:

> "Only the good boys were allowed to go out on trips or to the Christmas party [at Mackie's Iron Factory] but it was difficult to be good enough for the nuns, because they were always wanting more work out of us or finding fault with anything we had done. We could never please the nuns".[126]

93 There were other special events according to HIA 408, such as a visit to the cinema for a Mickey Mouse film and the Midnight Mass on Christmas Eve. HIA 99 said that plays were put on at Christmas. HIA 141 said that she was given a present when sitting on Santa's knee for a photograph, but the nuns removed the present immediately afterwards and she never saw it again.[127]

94 Several witnesses recorded getting presents on Christmas Day - an orange and an apple and three sweets according to one witness, a bun and an orange according to HIA 89, and apples and oranges but no toys according to HIA 87. HIA 99 said that the boys were given toys to play with on Christmas Day but they were not allowed to keep them. HIA 21 said that Christmas time was exciting, but toys had to be handed back the next day, causing resentment:

> "One year I received a toy milk float with churns and it broke my heart when I had to give it back".[128]

The Order did not accept that this happened.[129]

95 HIA 87 said that Christmas was also a time when benefactors visited, and so things were polished and better pillows and quilts were put out. HIA 21 said that on Open Days lots of people visited and gave them sweets.[130]

Education

96 The Nazareth Lodge primary school was within the grounds. HIA 408, who was at Nazareth Lodge in the mid-1930s, said that there was an emphasis on religion and Latin at the expense of other subjects such as geography and maths.[131] However, the nuns never explained the meaning of the Latin they used to the children.[132] HIA 16 wrote:

> "The standard of education was poor in the home. The school was in the [grounds of the] home. I recall I was never given homework and there was very little structure to the classes. I felt that we were taught very little."[133]

97 HIA 21 said that there were four classrooms and four teachers: SR 34, SR 47, SR 156 and NL 63, a lay teacher. He felt that they were all good teachers, though two of them NL 63 and SR 34 used the strap. He reported that no home work was required of the boys, and in consequence, their attainments were poor, which later affected their employment prospects, for example in failing to fill in application forms.[134]

98 HIA 99 said that in his time they had civilian teachers, who concentrated on the brightest children, but he had no complaints about them, as he learned to read and write. HIA 183, on the other hand, found the education poor, and he could not read or write when he left. HIA 159 said that:

> "...after 1954-5 a dozen boys who could not pick up schooling very quickly were sent outside to a special school for slow learners".[135]

99 There were, however, boys who considered themselves intelligent, but who felt that the schooling had failed them. HIA 247 took a technical examination with another resident, NL 287. They were expected to succeed but they had been taught the wrong things, so they failed and were sent instead to Rubane. Unknown to HIA 247, the Sisters had made unsuccessful efforts behind the scenes to get him a place in a Belfast secondary school.[136]

100 HIA 33 said that he was doing well academically but was never given the option of furthering his education; instead he was directed to work at the front door, scrubbing the steps, polishing the long corridor, answering the door and providing soup to vagrants who called.[137]

101 HIA 225 saw himself as intelligent and felt that if he had had a normal education he would have passed the 11-plus (as his younger brother did) and gone to grammar school. As it was, he considered his preparation for the 11-plus "woeful" and he failed. To make matters worse, NL 4 announced the result to the group, labelling HIA 225 "stupid", which hurt him more than any beating. He said that he had a chip on his shoulder thereafter.[138]

102 HIA 132 concluded:

> "The education was bad. They didn't treat you well because they thought we were orphans and wouldn't get anywhere in life anyway. They were right. Without an education you can't get anywhere and you end up in low paid jobs..."[139]

103 In September 1974 St Michael's was opened, combining both the Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House schools. It had a Board of Governors, and according to NL 63 the content of its teaching was less religious.[140]

Holidays

104 During the summer some children went to stay with members of their family, and others were placed with foster families. These placements are considered below. The children for whom no placements were found went on holiday as a group to places such as Ballyhornan, where they took up residence in some RAF huts near the seaside. HIA 159 said that during the summer they went to Tyrella beach where they camped in tents like giant wigwams. Later the home spent holidays at Waterfoot.[141]

105 To some extent the lifestyle on holiday replicated that at Nazareth Lodge, but it seems that the atmosphere was generally more relaxed. Most of the boys have fond memories of their holidays. DL 40 said they had such a great time at Ballyhornan, making friends with other holiday makers,[142] that he wanted his ashes scattered there.[143]

106 SR 46 said that she might have been too strict, but that she had been affected by a serious accident that happened to a boy when on holiday. He had been allowed to go and buy maggots climbed on rocks and fell 70 feet, suffering brain damage, such that SR 46 was more restrictive thereafter.[144]

Family Contact

107 Parents typically visited children at weekends, but mid-week visits also took place. Some children also returned home for weekends or holidays. There were some concerns mentioned in the evidence. HIA 24, for example, said that his mother visited him a few times while he was at Nazareth Lodge, but when she visited he was warned by the nuns to say nothing derogatory about them.[145]

108 The draft inspection report in 1983 was critical of arrangements for parents to visit and suggested that greater efforts should be made to make them feel welcome. Although the inspectors were told that parents were welcomed, in practice very few visited, though family contact was maintained through the children's weekend visits home.[146] When the smaller units were established, rooms were set aside for visitors. Overall, this was not a point of contention.

Personal Possessions

109 Witnesses expressed considerable strength of feeling about things which they considered to be theirs and which they allege the nuns removed and they never saw again. This included the clothes they wore on admission, presents of clothing brought in by relatives, toys which they were given at Christmas and money given to them by foster carers.

110 HIA 10 said that her mother sent her a Barbie doll with a horse and riding gear, but she was only allowed to play with it on Christmas Day and then it was taken away.[147]

111 There were some complaints that parcels sent to boys did not reach them. HIA 159 said that the nuns prevented him from having contact with his mother and his aunt. Sandals sent by his mother for him were given to NL 71 by the nuns, and he never received a promised birthday present. Later he was told that mail had been sent to him, but he had not received it. He said that he saw lots of toys and parcels in a room above the entrance.[148]

> "Some boys never received the parcels sent to them from their mothers or aunts".[149]

Sr Brenda stated that there was no policy of withholding letters from children, though in some cases the sisters might have done so if it was thought that family news would upset a child, or if a letter were being looked after for a small child.[150] The 1952 Home Office Guidance said that normally the staff should not read children's letters.[151]

112 The Sisters denied that toys would have been removed from children, and did not understand where this memory came from.[152] As NL 5 pointed out, toys that were donated were "not always new" and NL 151, the handyman, had to take some to the dump.[153] NL 4 said that children had no personal belongings but that toys were owned communally.[154] This observation was consistent with the complainants' evidence. If this were the case, it reflected poor childcare, as children should have been encouraged to develop their individuality, and having personal possessions was one important aspect, indicating their personal attachments, tastes and interests.

113 During much of the period in question it was considered very poor childcare practice to intercept mail or parcels unless there were strong reasons that a child would be in some way put at risk if staff did not intervene. It is possible that the Sisters' practice was long established and that they diverted items sent to children in order to ensure that children with generous parents did not receive appreciably more than those without families or whose parents were less well off. The Sisters themselves had had to sacrifice personal possessions voluntarily on entering the Order, and they should have appreciated how much personal possessions such as items sent by parents mattered to the children in symbolising that their parents still cared for them.

Foster Care

114 Some of the boys had been in foster care before admission to Nazareth Lodge. One example was HIA 307 who had developed a close bond with his foster mother. She visited him monthly and complained to the Reverend Mother that HIA 307 was not being cared for properly. Her visits were stopped. HIA 307 was later told by a boy who had been with him in the foster home that she was told that HIA 307 had gone to a good home and she need not visit again. The other boy stayed with her until he was 21 and got married, and HIA 307 felt that life would have been different for him if he had had the same opportunities.[155] He said:

> "That lady was the one person in my life that ever gave me any affection and I still feel her loss today. I have no doubt that the nuns lied to her because she was critical of their neglect and low standards of care. The nuns took from me the one important emotional attachment I ever had in order to protect themselves from criticism. If that relationship had been allowed to continue I think my life would be quite different."[156]

115 A large number of boys who could not spend the summer with their families were placed with families for occasional weekends or for summer breaks. These placements did not provide foster care as it is known today. It appears that the Sisters contacted priests, who sought volunteer families from their congregations. Although Section 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1950 laid down a requirement that written approval for any placements should be sought from the welfare authorities, this did not become standard practice until much later.[157] The children at Nazareth Lodge had been placed in care voluntarily, so that the welfare authorities were not involved in overseeing their care and were unaware of their existence. The Sisters were presumably continuing long-standing practice. The result, though, was that the families were not properly scrutinised, and the failure to assess them left some of the boys at risk.

116 It was in July 1972 that Bob Bunting, Assistant Director in the Belfast Welfare Authority, wrote to the Mother Superior to ask her to ensure that couples and families were approved before children in the Authority's care were allowed to visit them, even for day visits.[158]

117 HIA 21 went to foster homes at weekends, but said:

> "Ironically in most cases the boys couldn't wait to get back to the Lodge; after all it was our home".[159]

He visited a family for weekends, but "it was good to get back 'Home' to the Lodge".[160] HIA 247 visited a well-off family who wanted to foster him but they were refused, perhaps because of parental objections.[161]

118 A woman took HIA 183 out once a month and a family took him for two or three weeks in the summer.

> "I thank God for those short breaks away as they are the only happy times I remember from my childhood".[162]

On returning to Nazareth Lodge, the sister took sweets and money off him. He was not worried about the nuns having the money as he had nowhere to spend it. In oral evidence HIA 183 said that he was still in touch with both the woman, who was now 85, and with the family. He really looked forward to holidays with them.[163] HIA 247 also said that he was still in touch with a family who had had a farm at Kilkeel, where he had had "a great time" during the summer.

119 HIA 259 was first sent to a farm, which he did not like much. He was then sent to a foster family who bought him clothes, a bicycle and football boots. However, on his return to Nazareth Lodge, the clothes disappeared, NL 5 gave the boots to another boy and the bicycle was replaced with an older one; thereafter the foster parents kept things they bought for him at their home.[164]

120 HIA 225 spent Christmases with a family who wanted to adopt or foster him, but his father would not allow it. HIA 225 said, "It was my only experience of real family life", and he remained close to them till they died.[165]

121 HIA 41 said that when he stayed with a family for a weekend, a man talked to him sexually and groped him when he sat on the man's lap to drive his car on a public road. HIA 41 had been selected to stay with this family when another boy had refused to go.[166]

122 Some of the placements, as described above, were highly appreciated by the boys, as they offered a chance to experience family life and they led in some cases to life-long friendships. Arranging a large number of these placements every summer must have entailed a lot of work for the Sisters, and despite their failure to have the families properly checked and some consequent exploitation and abuse, the holiday foster care system as a whole has to be seen as one of their successes.

123 As social workers became increasingly involved, foster placements were arranged for children to move to as permanent placements. NL 190 described the problems of recruiting foster parents in the mid-1970s. At that time there was no specialist fostering team and it was for individual social workers to recruit foster carers. She wrote:

> "The social worker would place an advert in the newspaper, follow up any responses, complete a home study and obtain approval from senior staff".[167]

This task was additional to their full caseload, and each social worker requiring a placement had to learn the procedure. NL 190 was working with HIA 210 and his brother, who were members of a family of thirteen, eleven of whom were in long-term care, split between different children's homes. She felt that the splitting of the family was not good practice but was inevitable through lack of provision; the siblings, as it happened, were not enthusiastic about meeting.[168]

Work Experience, Discharge and Aftercare

124 In the period when Nazareth Lodge was an industrial school there was a requirement that the school found employment for boys who were funded by the state. In the 1930s, when HIA 408 was aged twelve, he was picked to work on a farm run by a couple, NL 82 and NL 83. He recalled that twelve boys were lined up for NL 83 to choose from, and HIA 408 thought he saw money passed by her to the sister. He said that he felt he was "sold like a slave".[169] He alleged that he worked every day from 6am to 10 pm on the farm without pay for two years; he never had a day off and he spent a lot of time cleaning eggs.[170]

125 HIA 87 finished school at 13 and was given jobs to do around the home, such as looking after little children and growing vegetables. He was made a charge boy working with the infants group, helping by feeding them, for example.[171] HIA 99 confessed to the priest about all that had happened to him while he had been at Nazareth Lodge, and he was moved the following week for adoption by a couple who had a farm.

> "I was given no preparation for leaving Nazareth Lodge and it just happened out of the blue".[172]

126 If these recollections are accurate, they represent systemic abuse. HIA 408 would have been of school age; payment for such an arrangement would have been quite improper; and the conditions which he described were exploitative. This is, however, the only evidence which we have received describing such practices, and without further corroborative evidence to indicate that was commonplace it is insufficient for us to make a general finding of systemic abuse.

127 In 1950 the Nazareth Lodge Welfare Committee was established, with the Bishop of Down and Connor as its Patron. To judge by its reports and minutes it provided impressive services for boys who had left Nazareth Lodge, for girls a paid welfare officer based at premises in Great Victoria Street, Belfast, and a number of volunteers. The services offered included help in finding employment and accommodation, and the provision of clothing. The Committee raised a considerable amount of money, for example through organising day trips to the Isle of Man.[173]

128 When Rubane opened in 1953, the boys were usually transferred there at the age of eleven. There was generally no need, therefore, for the Sisters to obtain employment for school-leavers or to provide aftercare. A small number of boys did stay on, but this was to enable them to attend schools in Belfast as they were showing some academic promise.

129 From 1953 onwards the transfer to Rubane took place each autumn. HIA 56 wrote:

> "Once we turned eleven we were taken in groups of about ten or twelve boys in a minibus to Rubane. …It happened very quickly and there was no preparation".[174]

Staff at Rubane commented on the lack of background information which they received.

130 A number of boys were discharged from Nazareth Lodge by being sent to Australia. This is dealt with in Chapter 6. In all, twelve applicants who had been sent to Australia from Nazareth Lodge gave evidence to the Inquiry.

131 School-age boys were still given tasks that entailed responsibility within Nazareth Lodge. In the early 1970s HIA 41 was given the job of minding the front door out of school hours from 4pm to 10pm; this entailed answering the door, welcoming visiting priests, brushing the paths in the garden and nuns' graveyard, giving beggars tea and sandwiches, and locking up. This role gave him both responsibility and a measure of freedom. NL 5 denied that HIA 41 undertook this role, saying that it was "pure fantasy", but it was mentioned by SR 30 and in social work records.[175]

132 HIA 132 said that his elder brother, who had acted as his protector, was adopted, and he left without the opportunity to say goodbye.

> "When he left, I was on my own".

He said that he had been unable to trace his brother since then. Such a practice no doubt precluded the tensions of a farewell scene, but it must, even in the 1960s, have been apparent that to fracture family relations in this way was poor childcare. HIA 132 was also prevented from visiting his grandmother and aunt when the nuns found out that they were not Roman Catholics, though his aunt wanted to adopt him.[176]

Religion

133 Religious observance played a big part in the boys' lives, but it was not generally a source of complaint. HIA 99 said that there was Mass every morning, and prayers before and after meals, but said he was content with the religious regime.[177] HIA 183 remembered the Mass in the morning, and after tea, Rosary and Benediction.[178] HIA 159 recalled a practical problem:

> "…going to confession always seemed a long-drawn-out affair, waiting for ages to go to the box. In the end it was decided to send just a few boys at a time, as so many wanted to go to the loo that they wet themselves when they got there".[179]

134 When HIA 423 was at Nazareth Lodge she felt privileged when going to chapel as she was provided with a special outfit and the nuns did her hair so that she looked lovely.[180] She was expected to give the impression to other church-goers of being happy.[181]

135 HIA 152, however, was critical:

> "Religion was a very big part of our daily routine with mass, benediction and confession. It was more important to the nuns than education, which is why we were not well educated in Nazareth Lodge. I have no recollection of homework or exams. We went to school in Nazareth Lodge. It felt like we never left the building".[182]

136 HIA 24's mother was a Catholic but his father was a Protestant. As an altar boy he received communion but he had not been baptised, and the nuns became aware of this while Bishop Mageean was visiting. HIA 24 said he was dragged out of the church by the ear as they were "really angry". He was therefore baptised and confirmed on the same day.[183] Coughing in church was considered the worst crime as it was seen to be disrespectful, according to HIA 33, and SR 118 hit him with the spindle of a chair back when he had a tickly cough.[184]

137 For the Sisters, religious observance was clearly of great importance. In a report on a visitation from 28 October to 5 November 1989, presided over by the Regional Superior, it was recorded:

> "The work is very demanding and time-consuming, still the spiritual life of the Sisters should always be given priority; sufficient staff should ensure that this is so."[185]

In a statutory children's home, the only purpose of the staff team coming together would be to care for the children; in the case of homes run by the Congregation the statement suggests that the spiritual life of the Sisters took precedence, with the care of children and others being the practical outworking of their faith. No doubt the spiritual life of the community strengthened the nuns in their total commitment, but the practical effects of the thinking described above (and elsewhere in the visitation reports)[186] led to the use of charge boys in earlier times and the associated problems described in this chapter.

Records and Care Planning

138 It appears that for many years the records kept about the children in Nazareth Lodge were minimal, BR 2, who admitted boys from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane, said that there were few or no records provided about them. He explained that the information received was sparse in the extreme "without names of parent/siblings, where they came from, their medical history, their educational attainments or special needs".[187] We consider the Sisters' failure to pass relevant information about a child's time in Nazareth Lodge, even if little was known about their lives before coming into the care of the Sisters of Nazareth, was unacceptable and showed a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well-being which we considered amounted to a systemic failing.

186 SNB 19892.

139 In the absence of records, any planning of the boys' care can only be inferred. There must, for example, have been some discussion and preparatory work undertaken when boys were selected to go to Australia. Planning the move to Rubane would have been simpler, as boys moved once they were eleven. Arranging summer family placements must also have taken time. However, none of this would have matched the systems established in the 1960s and 1970s in England and Wales whereby childrens' needs were comprehensively assessed and plans for their care were drawn up and reviewed at intervals.

140 In the mid-1970s the cases of children who were in the care of the local authority were reviewed every six months. The reviews were held in the office, involving the social worker and the senior social worker; no staff from the home were present. NL 190 said that, by contrast with the authority's reception and assessment home where the staff were welcoming and worked as partners with social workers, the staff at Nazareth Lodge were not looking for social work involvement, and to fulfil her commitments to the boys she felt that she had to drive the contact.[188]

141 SR 52, who worked in the two Nazareth Houses in Belfast and Derry between 1975 and 1977, said that the Belfast home was ahead of that in Derry in a number of respects. All the children had their own social workers, and they visited every month or two months. There were six-monthly reviews of their cases. The units in Belfast were mixed. Lay staff were appointed earlier in Belfast. Record-keeping was also better. Her view was that the improvements in practice had been accelerated by the involvement of social workers.[189] SR 52's views were corroborated by SR 18 and SR 2, who also worked in both homes.[190]

142 Daily logs commenced in January 1984, possibly initiated by SR 46, who was qualified in social care. According to NL 114 under SR 222 every child had their own diary.[191] At that time, social workers visited monthly, progress reports were made and reviews were held.[192] NL 114 said that, as a houseparent, she reported problems to SR 46, but did not attend or contribute information for reviews.[193] Under SR 148 the keyworker system (which she had learnt about on her qualifying course at Aberdeen) was introduced. She also gave lay staff access to files and encouraged them to contribute to daily recording.[194]

143 According to SR 46, in the later years social workers visited the children and the children could phone them. SR 46 prepared reports on the children's progress for the social workers, and copies were kept on their files, together with their medical records, details of family visits and so on, in locked filing cabinets in their respective units.[195] It would seem that by this time standards of record-keeping were probably adequate, and that social workers were undertaking the necessary care planning. Good practice would also have entailed involving children in their reviews.

144 In summary, we were critical of the lack of background information the Sisters of Nazareth provided to the De La Salle order about boys transferring from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane and considered it amounted to a systemic failing. However, it appears that, starting from a low baseline, standards improved over the period covered by the evidence we received. For some time the quality of records was poor in relation to professional expectations at that time, but once the sisters were trained, standards were improved to an acceptable level.

Staffing

145 At the start of the period covered by the witnesses' evidence, the groups were of sixty boys, later split into two thirties. At this time a single nun worked with each group. Later, lay staff were appointed, increasing in number until there was a nun and four lay staff per group. In parallel, the group sizes were reduced. These were major improvements, but they need to be set against expectations in residential childcare services at that time. Until the 1980s neither the lay staff nor the sisters were trained in residential social work, and the staff numbers remained inadequate by accepted standards.

146 Sr Brenda said that:

> "The Sisters who were responsible for attending to the children would normally have had some form of early year's childcare qualifications".[196]

The commonest qualification at this time was known as the NNEB (National Nursery Examination Board) and it was designed primarily for 16-18 year olds who wanted to work in day or residential nurseries with little children. Its academic standards were not on a par, therefore, with other professional qualifications and although there was no higher qualification in that field it was generally viewed as a preliminary award. Its curriculum did not address the needs of older children and young people, and it was inadequate as a preparation for residential childcare.

195 Day 93, p.44.
196 SNB 1502.

147 The Castle Priory report, Residential Task in Childcare, which was published in 1969, was quickly accepted as standard guidance. The standards which the report proposed reflected the staffing levels already adopted by progressive providers,and were intended as a prompt to encourage improvements among those who had not yet attained those levels.

148 There are variations in the report's recommendations, depending upon factors such as the length of the working week (40 or 45 hours). This makes comparison with the contribution of the Sisters difficult as they lived on site, and were therefore capable of covering the equivalent of two or three staff, though it is arguable whether this was a reasonable expectation. Allowance also has to be made for the support provided by the Mother Superior, the sisters who worked in the laundry, kitchen and workroom, and the gardeners and handymen, though the Castle Priory figures exclude domestic and other ancillary staff.

149 The report's recommendation was that a 30-bedded unit required between 13.5 and 18 staff, as noted in the 1983 SWAG inspection aide memoir.[197] From 1 April 1987 the weekly payments were increased by the Eastern Board from £80 to £147, on the condition that two extra staff were employed in each group.[198] Even when the units had reduced to sixteen children, the staffing complement should have been 10 per unit. The contrast between these standard expectations and the reality of staffing at Nazareth Lodge is stark.

150 There was a sharp dividing line between the sisters and the lay staff. The nuns filled the managerial roles and took the significant decisions. It appears that when they were first appointed the lay staff were resident and were expected to undertake the practical tasks of caring, but over time almost all the lay staff became non-resident, so that the sisters were the only resident staff. As a result, SR 148 observed, the nuns became the children's primary attachment figures.[199] It is significant that even in the 1980s when SR 148 was a qualified social worker, she still ate in the convent, even though the residential workers now ate with the children.[200]

151 Until the latter years, lay staff never did night duty, as the sisters were resident. An unfortunate side effect was that the lay staff had to work split shifts to cover the periods before and after school, and this was unpopular, as the working day could amount to twelve hours, and the period in the middle of the day was not useful as time off.

152 When SR 148 qualified and moved to Nazareth Lodge in 1980 she was the first to hold a social work qualification.[201] Staff were later seconded to Queen's University for the social work qualifying course and to Rupert Stanley for the social care course. By the time the home closed, all the staff were qualified. Following criticism by the Inspectorate about the lack of male role models, SR 148 was the first to employ male staff, in 1985.[202]

153 SR 52 wrote:

> "In 1980 the appointment of [SR 148], who was a qualified social worker, was a progressive and positive step. She took on a monitoring and mentoring role and was a great support to staff in each of the groups. There were serious efforts to improve practice and planning for the children. Documentation and communication was greatly improved and a greater effort to release sisters and staff for professional qualifications in social work became the norm. The issue of staff ratios and qualification was inextricably linked to the question of finance. Each child was assigned a keyworker. Sister had a lot of contacts with the social services and with Mrs Grogan from the Down and Connor office. The latter received half her salary from Nazareth Lodge."[203]

154 Jim Tracey worked as a member of the residential childcare staff at Nazareth Lodge from 1984 to 1992. He wrote:

> "The central figure, however, in most of the children's lives, was the Sister-in-Charge in each of the three units. She lived in the unit 24-7, and most, if not all of the children, often saw her as the 'mother figure'. This arrangement meant that staff (during my time) were not required to work beyond 10 p.m. This changed some years after I left the home and Nazareth Lodge complied with night-time supervision requirements in line with other statutory and voluntary residential children's homes".[204]

155 Jim Tracey trained and obtained the Certificate in Social Services, being promoted to Assistant Team Leader.[205] He could not be promoted further, as all the more senior posts were held by sisters.[206] This glass ceiling for lay staff caused irritation and was divisive.

156 The division in the staff between the sisters and the lay staff was apparent at an inspection in 1983. It was noted that staff meetings were held in only one of the three units. The lay staff had no sitting room or kitchen where they could relax off duty. This was unfortunate as they had at times to work split shifts, an unpopular practice which had been abandoned in most residential childcare services some time earlier. In consequence, while the sisters had the support of their community, the lay staff did not socialise; overall, these divisions must have undermined teamwork within the staff group as a whole.

157 The home had the benefit of volunteers, which augmented the range of relationships for the children and offered them a wider variety of activities. NL 14, for example, had been a resident at Nazareth Lodge, but on leaving he called in regularly to have his tea. He also helped by playing football with the boys and coaching them. Two girls and one boy alleged that he had abused them, which he denied.[207]

Childcare

158 Some witnesses made a variety of observations which had a bearing on the quality of childcare. HIA 141, for example, was highly critical of SR 29, who ran her group. On her first day in school SR 29 marched her down the corridor and told to go in to her classroom. "[She] just left me outside the door. I had no support or help".[208]

159 HIA 141 shared a room with an older girl who was put in charge of her to help with her homework, but the girl smacked her hard and said she was thick and punched her head until HIA 141 cried loudly. Her sisters heard from the next unit and confronted the older girl until the nuns intervened

"like a riot squad".[209] SR 29 cut her hair, so:

> "you were left that you didn't know if you were a boy or girl. ...I felt that my identity was stripped".[210]

Aged five or six she was made to stand on a tin mop bucket to do the dishes on alternate days. She also recalled being smacked a lot, stating that SR 29 put over her knee and used a leather strap to hit her.[211] This was denied by SR 29, who said:

> "...I never put a child across my knee or used a leather strap".[212]

160 HIA 141 said that her social worker never helped her, as she went straight to SR 29's office and there was never an opportunity to speak to her confidentially.

> "I think [she] was afraid to leave me alone with her in case I said anything. The Sisters and social workers never got down to my level as a child and they were always looking down at me. I always looked at the ground because I was afraid of looking into their eyes because I was so afraid of them".[213]

161 HIA 154 contrasted Nazareth Lodge with the children's home to which he and his siblings moved:

> "I was so happy to move...; it was like a holiday camp. ...It was smaller than Nazareth Lodge. ...We got better clothes, pocket money and better food. We could go to the fridge whenever we wanted and we got three meals a day. We were very well looked after."[214]

Nor was he sexually abused, as he had been at Nazareth Lodge.

162 With better resources and the introduction of up-to-date thinking, standards of childcare at Nazareth House could have been improved significantly. The children could have had better clothes and food, better bathing arrangements and better schooling. The unnecessary chores could have been stopped. There would have been no need to put class boys in charge. Staff could have been better trained. Most importantly, the children could have had individual attention and care from staff, ranging from the symbolic celebration of their birthdays to care planning involving social workers and preparation for discharge.

163 Even when staffing levels had been improved they fell short of Castle Priory expectations. The staff were simply too few to give sufficient individual attention. Understandably some children were seen by sisters as favourites and others obtained attention by misbehaviour, but many would have passed through Nazareth Lodge by keeping their heads down and avoiding attention. It is significant, though, that when improvements in staffing and living conditions had been made, the volume of allegations dropped dramatically, and the quality of care was clearly better. Jim Tracey, for example, recounted the ways in the later years the staff tried to create something of a family atmosphere, by staff and children cooking meals together, and sharing in the laundry and other chores. Although there was a central kitchen, over time the staff in the units requested budgets and prepared their own meals.[215] This was evidence of good practice.

164 In the preceding paragraphs, twenty-three aspects of daily life have been considered. In four of these (the management of bathing and bedwetting, the use of Jeyes fluid and force-feeding) we have concluded that the specific practices amounted to systemic abuse. Some aspects were positive, such as the summer family placement scheme and the holidays. For the most part, until improvements in physical conditions, staffing levels, staff training and professional practice were introduced, the evidence indicated poor, out of date childcare practice, and we consider this was systemic abuse.

165 It is against this general background of poor quality care that the allegations of physical, emotional and sexual abuse have to be considered.

Allegations of Abuse

Physical Abuse by Staff

166 A number of witnesses spoke of a general atmosphere of violence, and of physical abuse by several named sisters. The evidence below indicates the extent of the abuse from the 1940s to the mid-1970s, when the allegations diminished in frequency. In most cases a relatively small number of allegations were made against any single individual, and though some were serious, they were made by only one witness in almost every case.

167 There were, however, four members of staff against whom we have received multiple allegations of physical abuse. Two were sisters, SR 118 and SR 34, and two were lay staff, NL4 and NL 5. Between them, the four key names were the subject of perhaps 90% of the witnesses' allegations, and they are dealt with individually.

168 HIA 307 was at Nazareth Lodge in the late 1940s and 1950s, and he found the regime "bleak, harsh and cruel". He said that the nuns:

> "...were at best indifferent but more often were sadistic bullies who spoke with harsh loud voices in scornful, dismissive tones. They were quick to strike out and provided no reassurance or comfort to a small frightened child."[216]

169 HIA 192 was at Nazareth Lodge in the late 1940s and early 1950s. He said he was accused of biting a notebook and when he refused to own up, SR 101:

> "...beat me in front of the entire class. She said she was going to beat me until I told the truth. She made me kneel down in front of the class with my hands out. She hit me with the handle of a hurley stick. She kept hitting me until she got tired. My arms dropped down from the tiredness of holding them up and my fingers curled from the pain, I lost five fingernails in the next couple of weeks as a result of the beating".[217]

In oral evidence he said that he counted 66 strikes before he lost count.

> "I was fighting a battle in my mind. I can't say I done that, because I hadn't done it. So it became just me and her sort of thing. Actually I didn't feel the physical pain because it was so - so much thinking I'm going to win this. I'm going to win this".[218]

170 HIA 210's main criticisms were levelled at SR 62. Attending school was "a terrible time for me" as SR 62 beat him hard if he was thrown out of class or got his homework wrong.[219]

> "She used to beat me with brush shafts, metal parts of the hoover and large wooden tweezers you used for washing...This happened once or twice a week and I was often bruised".

He said that he was known as SR 62's pet and other boys were jealous, but it was terrible; no one would want to be her pet.[220]

171 HIA 89 said that when he was aged six or seven, nuns started to beat him, for example for failing to clean the floor to their satisfaction. He said he was hit on the palms of his hands and on his backside, with sticks, straps and hurley sticks and that SR 118 and SR 100 beat him the most. He said that nuns put the boys' hands in cold water before hitting them with a stick, so that it would intensify the pain.[221] HIA 89 said that he also had to stand naked and then be beaten.[222]

172 SR 149 looked after the chapel and HIA 89 said that she beat him with a whip. He said that she also hit him with a crutch for being late and the boiling water he was carrying scalded him, such that he spent two or three weeks in the Mater Hospital. He told us that on another occasion she threw him down the stairs and broke his arm. The Congregation said that there were no corroborative records concerning these incidents, though they doubted whether the incidents would have been as described.[223]

173 SR 47 was said by HIA 422 to have hit him regularly with a big stick "half an inch thick".[224] HIA 87 said he was involved in an incident when he was accused of killing some pet mice; he was beaten and lost his temper, eventually being caned severely and shut in an upstairs room for two weeks, as he said he was going to run away. He told us he was also shadowed for the following two weeks.[225]

174 HIA 427 spoke of regular physical assaults:

> "If you did not greet a nun properly you got a slap on the face, your hair pulled or you would be lifted up by the ears.[226] …the nuns kicked and beat us, cut and shaved our hair, and used Jeyes fluid to clean us."[227]

The boys were not allowed to leave the grounds, and HIA 427 added:

> "If you sneaked out the nuns would give you a serious beating."[228]

175 HIA 307 alleged that nuns boxed him on the ears and in 1956 his hearing was impaired. The pain was excruciating and made him nauseous. He said that his hearing difficulties had affected communication and employment prospects throughout his entire life. He said:

> "One of the most painful punishments dished out by the nuns was the beating of my fingertips with a wooden ruler. The nuns would grab my hand and squeeze the fingers all bunched up together until they went red and then strike them across the fingertips with a ruler. The pain was terrible and it was done with viciousness especially in winter when our hands were so cold, so they could inflict the greatest pain and generate fear".[229]

176 Some witnesses had mixed feelings about the sisters. HIA 41, for example, was deeply attached to SR 30, but he also alleged that she slapped him and humiliated him.[230] He said that she had a vicious temper[231] but she was "80% fantastic" and he had discussions with her about religion.[232] She also spoiled him by giving him money, budgies, canaries, mice and goldfish.[233] His evidence suggests that HIA 41 was an example of a boy who benefited from the individual attention he was given, which might have been seen by other children as favouritism.

177 A number of witnesses reported that while the sisters were caring, it was the civilian staff who abused them. When the sisters went for their evening prayers and time together as a community, the civilian staff were left in charge, and many of the allegations of physical abuse related to this part of the day. HIA 375 was highly critical of NL 155, a lay worker in her group, describing her as:

> "an animal who should never have been allowed to work with children. We were petrified of her".[234]

178 HIA 48 also said that she was chased and hit by NL 14 and NL 122, two of the gardener/ handymen.[235] DL 40 said that NL 122, one of the handymen was a nasty bully and hit him several times, such that he was terrified of him, but as NL 122 had caught him out of bounds he did not complain about NL 122's behaviour.[236] NL 122 denied the assaults, saying that he never abused, punished or chastised any child, and that he assumed the witnesses had been mistaken in identifying him.[237]

179 The physical abuse also continued in the schoolroom. Since the schoolroom was on the premises, and some of the sisters acted as both care staff and teachers, the schooling day would probably have been seen by the boys as a continuation of their life in the home. This contrasted with the experience of children who were being abused in their own homes or in children's homes but who sometimes found attendance at day school offered a welcome relief.

180 HIA 204 said that a lay teacher, NL 118, hit him across the face with a whip and left a "terrible mark"; he was told to lie to the nuns about it.[238] On the other hand, HIA 225 considered the use of the cane in the school justified, for example when a teacher NL 63 gave him six of the best for copying a wrong answer,[239] but he considered the nuns' ways of disciplining the boys to be cruel – pulling their hair, grabbing their cheeks and pulling their sidelocks.[240]

181 HIA 132 also said that NL 63 was "fond of the strap" and pulled boys up by the hair if they did something wrong.[241] NL 63 said that he had expected to be able to teach without using corporal punishment, but had found that he needed to use the strap as it was effective in maintaining control so that he could get on with teaching. He was not required to inform the Principal when he used corporal punishment.[242] Generally he was seen as strict but fair.

182 HIA 10 said she considered SR 46 the worst nun, because she nipped her and shouted at her in Mass, and used bamboo canes and "a ruler strap, a brown leather ruler with white stitching which she hit us with".[243] HIA 10 further said that SR 46 scrubbed HIA 10's skin with a scrubbing brush till it was red and bleeding, and hit her with a spatula till her sister intervened.[244]

183 SR 118 was born in 1900, joined the Order in 1919, and was at Nazareth Lodge first in 1922, then for 25 years from 1929 to 1954 when she left to move to Aberdeen, where she died in 1974.[245]

184 SR 118 was seen as "very much in charge", and "the most punitive". HIA 183 said he saw SR 118 wipe HIA 427's soiled pants "violently and cruelly" in his face.[246] We have already noted SR 118's unacceptable treatment of enuresis.

185 In his account to the police, HIA 33 referred to beatings by SR 118:

> "I had to kneel in front of [SR 118] and put both hands out and she used the rung of a chair to beat and slap us until our hands bled. This happened every morning during my stay and to other children as well and we all had witness to this. This was her idea of keeping control".[247]

186 HIA 192 told us of physical abuse by SR 118. He said that she hit him on the legs with a hurley stick to get him up in the morning. (The Order did not accept that a hurley stick would be used).[248] He said that SR 118 beat all the boys in the dormitory when the radiator leaked. She beat HIA 192 when he knocked a light with a crozier as altar boy during the Bishop's visit. As a charge boy he was beaten if one of the boys for whom he was accountable misbehaved, lost clothes or wet the bed.[249] He concluded: "She destroyed my confidence".[250]

187 According to HIA 99, SR 100 never inflicted punishment but supported SR 118 when she punished children. On the other hand HIA 427 said that SR 100 was also very cruel, hitting him on the knuckles or across the legs, with a black strap, sticks or possibly a cane.

188 HIA 89 said that SR 118 and SR 100 beat him the most. Things went wrong for HIA 89 on moving from nursery to young boys' unit.[251]

> "[SR 118] would shout or beat us even though we weren't doing anything wrong. If work wasn't done right, God help you. You would get battered on the floor. [SR 118] would usually use a hurley stick, an ordinary stick or strap to beat us. [SR 118] was a wicked old woman".[252]

189 HIA 204's report on SR 118's treatment of bedwetters in the 1930s has been quoted above, and HIA 408 said it involved hitting boys with a strap as they lay naked on the ground, and, if they turned over, putting her foot on their groin.[253] He added:

"[SR 118] was only happy when she was beating you".[254]

190 HIA 99 said that SR 31 was:

"a motherly figure to the boys" and "gave me the only comfort in that place. Whenever she was there I felt protected, and she showed us affection".[255]

Unfortunately SR 186 was often away unwell, and when she was absent SR 118 was in charge, and:

"A gloom came over the whole place".[256]

191 HIA 87 said that SR 118 could be pleasant, but "The job was sometimes too much for her". If she was in a bad mood she got rid of her ill-feelings on the boys.[257]

192 The Order acknowledged that SR 118 might have slapped children as a punishment and on occasions she might have lost her temper, but they "refuted" all the more serious allegations and denied that she would have had a hurley stick.[258] While allowing for some possible exaggeration, on balance we found the witnesses' evidence persuasive.

SR 34

193 SR 34 entered the Congregation in 1929 and died in 1997. She worked at Nazareth Lodge from 1952 to 1973. In 1960 she became Principal of the school, and remained in this role until the two schools of Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House were amalgamated.[259] As the Principal, SR 34 may have felt that standards of discipline were her responsibility, and she may have acted more firmly than she otherwise would have done in order to assert her control. While she was severely criticised by several witnesses, SR 34 clearly had positive qualities.

194 HIA 104 said that when SR 34 put him in charge of the tuck shop he let her down by stealing sweets and then denying the theft twice, until she made him empty the sweets out of his pockets.

> "She gave me a really bad beating that day because I had let her down. I ended up crawling under the table and she was grabbing me out from underneath the table. She lost it completely and she was kicking me with her feet and boots and hitting me with her hands. I was about seven or eight at the time and I felt really bad about the incident."[260]

In oral evidence he added:

> "This is the only bad thing I remember SR 34 doing, because overall I adored her, but I think on this occasion she was in a blind rage because of what I had done."[261]

195 HIA 183 said that SR 34 made all the boys kneel in the corridor for an hour, when it was very cold. She realised she had been unfair and gave them all a chocolate; this was an unusual event.[262]

196 Other witnesses were more critical. HIA 64 wrote:

> "[SR 34] was in charge of St Joseph's group and she was a bad one. She was the worst nun. If you did something wrong, she would take you by your sideburns, lift you up off the floor, drop you and then kick you. She was a big, hefty woman. She weighed about sixteen stone, and we were only six or seven years old".[263]

197 HIA 110 described SR 34 as "really bad", having hit him on many occasions with a stick, a strap or a hand. On one open day he was given threepence or sixpence by a visiting nun, and:

> "The next day SR 34 got me by the cheeks with her big nails and lifted me clean off the floor by the cheeks", leaving marks on his face.[264] He explained to police that SR 34 gripped his cheeks "with the heels of her palms near my jaws and her fingertips near to my eyes".[265]

198 HIA 422 said that SR 34 used to pick up boys by the sidelocks and swing them round; she also whipped boys round the legs with a cane.[266] HIA 19 described SR 34 as "very wicked", as she lifted him by the cheeks or the ears and threw him against the wall or on the floor in the classroom. On one occasion she thought he was reading a comic, and she pulled HIA 19 off a bench, trailed him down the passage and kicked him in the face, leaving him black and blue, only to find that he had been reading a Missal.[267] According to HIA 132 SR 34 was "a very angry person", and she hit him with sticks. She also taught him in school, smacking him in the face when his sums were wrong, and pulling him up by his sideburns or cheeks. He was also shouted down by her for showing off if he tried to answer a second question.[268]

199 When he suffered athlete's foot badly, HIA 225 cried and was beaten by SR 34 with a bat for crying.[269] HIA 427 told us that SR 34

> "would have insisted my trousers were taken down when I was being strapped for wetting the bed. After she threw the wet and dirty sheets over me I was subjected to cold baths".[270]

HIA 247 was beaten by SR 34 for running away and did not try it again.[271] He said that the nuns used their waist straps, or cinctures, to beat boys and they hit them anywhere.[272]

200 HIA 152 considered SR 34 to be an evil bully:

> "She used any excuse to beat me. If you did anything wrong, no matter how trivial, she would give you a time to be in the dining room. You had to line up and had to wait your turn to be hit. She would hit us with a strap".[273]

If the charge boys were disobeyed, they told the younger ones to go to see SR 34.

201 HIA 307 summarised:

> "[SR 34] was the most terrifying nun at Nazareth Lodge. She was an aggressive bully and she was the biggest nun. She was always yelling at the children and punching us with closed fists. She also boxed our ears. She had a nasty, angry face and seeing her coming up the corridor made you shrink back against the wall to try and not be noticed."[274]

202 In a considered view of her contribution, DL 40 said that SR 34 had the wrong temperament for the work. She worked 24/7, which he considered unfair, and when she calmed down, she was a lovely person.[275] This witness was very appreciative of what the Sisters had done for him, and his comment can therefore be taken to imply that SR 34 frequently lost her temper.

203 The Congregation accepted the accounts of SR 34's abuse offered by the witnesses, but pointed out that SR 34 was "held in very high esteem by many of the former children", which was evident in the great number who attended her funeral, and emphasised her "warm compassion for vulnerable people".[276]

204 NL 4 considered becoming a nun, like her sister, and twice she commenced her novitiate, but it did not work out. In the course of her career NL 4 worked in various care jobs, including several spells at Nazareth Lodge amounting to between seven and nine years in total.[277] She received board and lodging and "a very small wage" of 10 shillings per week at first, and £2 later on from the Sisters. She stayed overnight in staff accommodation in the attic where the staff part was curtained off from the children's, and later she lived in staff quarters.[278]

205 NL 4 worked to the instructions of the nuns. There were no staff meetings in which she could have contributed or learnt from colleagues. She was given no specific instructions on the appropriate use of physical chastisement. She played no role in the oversight of the children's care, for example through participation in reviews, communicating with social workers, or having access to the children's case files.[279] NL 4's roles were essentially practical: getting the children up, overseeing their chores, supervising mealtimes and helping in the laundry, kitchen and parlour.[280] She said that on occasion, when the nuns were out collecting, she had to supervise 80 to 100 children on her own on trips to the Curzon Cinema in Ormeau Road. She was relieved that nothing untoward occurred.[281]

206 She worked very long hours, eating lunch while the children were in school and covering the evening period when the sisters were in chapel. She and NL 5 were the only lay staff not to go home at weekends. On Thursdays she had the day off and was taken home by the handyman, returning by bus.[282] There were no set hours for residential childcare workers at this time, and when the first lay staff were appointed the Sisters seem to have expected the same dedication to the care of the children that they required of themselves.

207 According to HIA 36 NL 4 was seen as the member of staff who could deal with children who were getting out of hand.[283] If so, other staff presumably came to rely on her, and in a large children's home with a proportion of children who may be disturbed and displaying difficult behaviour, the support of such a person may be valued by colleagues. However, the fact that staff needed to maintain control does not excuse physically abusive treatment of the children.

208 NL 4 was "the worst member of staff" according to HIA 110. When he wet the bed she threatened to put him in the washing machine. When cleaning was not undertaken to her satisfaction she slapped the boys' faces and legs. HIA 110 said that he feared NL 4, who never showed any love or affection.[284] HIA 19 said that both NL 4 and NL 5 separately:

> "used to take us into the laundry and they would lift us and put us in the machine, and close the lids for a few minutes and say they were going to turn it on. They obviously never did, but it left you in fear and squealing, yelling and crying. It gave us nightmares."[285]

209 HIA 56 said that he saw NL 4 rub NL 174's face in the excrement when he soiled his bed one night, to make an example of him.[286] He said:

> "Everyone was afraid of her and they cheered in the refectory when they saw her leave with her bags. However she returned about six months later dressed as a nun."[287]

210 HIA 225 at first thought NL 4 nice, as she gave the boys sweets, but his opinion changed when he observed an incident in which DL 157 wet the bed; NL 4 shoved a flannel in his mouth and severely beat him in front of everyone in the dormitory.[288] HIA 225 said that DL 157 had a bloody nose and a split lip, and the boys were told to say that he had been fighting. NL 4 denied beating him.[289] HIA 225 said that NL 4 punched him on the head and the back, but that his father, who worked as a decorator at the home at that time knocked her over, and she left HIA 225 alone for a while.[290]

211 HIA 183 said that NL 4 "was not suitable for that job because of her vile temper".[291] In an altercation she slapped him, he responded verbally and in consequence was denied a weekend trip which had been planned for three months.[292]

212 HIA 225 described how, when the boys were on holiday at Ballyhornan, they took lemonade bottles from the yard behind a shop to get the money back on them; when she found out, NL 4 "went mad" and later that night she hit the culprits with a small wooden bat as they lay in bed.[293] HIA 147 said that both NL 4 and NL 5 used a PVC bat to hit boys on the thighs for absolutely nothing, and that they also used a stick, which they hid from the nuns. The two lay staff abused the boys while the nuns were absent, praying in the chapel.[294] HIA 16 said that NL 4 used a rubber bat to hit him all over. As a result he had "plenty of bruises", but they were untreated as they were not open wounds.[295] NL 4 denied possessing a rubber bat and using it in the manner described.[296]

213 HIA 48 wrote:

> "[NL 4] was the civilian member of staff in charge of our group. She was left in charge of us whenever the nuns were at prayers or in care meetings. She was a wicked one. I used to wet the bed sometimes and she would grab your face and rub your nose in the soiled sheets. She > would beat me as well with her hands or with whatever object she had to hand. She took a stick to my hands. You didn't have to do anything wrong to be beaten by [NL 4] ".[297]

HIA 48 said that whenever her mother, brothers or social worker visited, a nun or NL 4 sat in, so she did not tell them about abuse.

> "I didn't tell anyone about the abuse anyway because in those days nobody would have believed you. I just kept it all in. You daren't talk about it and even if you did, no one would believe you".[298]

214 HIA 21 was highly critical of NL 4:

> "From the age of six years old I suffered systematic physical and psychological abuse by lay staff member [NL 4]. These abuses continued for the next five years. I lived in total fear of her; she dominated my existence."[299]

He alleged that she punched and kicked him, force-fed him, and degraded and humiliated him in front of other children:

> "In most cases stew was the main diet, which I had a huge dislike for. I used to hide the stew in my trouser pockets and [NL 4] spotted the stain on my trousers and she asked me what I was doing. I told her I didn't like stew. Her response was to take the stew from my pockets and got me in to the middle of the dining room where she held me down on my knees and pulled my hair so that my mouth opened and she forced the food into my mouth. I was crying and terrified as the food went down my throat. She kicked and punched me and hence I swallowed the food. All the children in the room would have witness this. There were no sisters present during this episode as was the same on many other occasions she abused children. The impact of force-feeding [is that I] would limit my intake, that I became fussy about food ever since".[300]

215 He also said that when on holiday NL 4 stamped on his toe, such that he required hospital treatment.[301] On one occasion he attempted suicide "to end the nightmare".[302] He saw her as cunning and opportunist, abusing boys while the nuns were attending church. On his last day he said to her, "Thank God we are escaping from you", whereupon she kicked and punched him.[303]

216 In responding to the allegations NL 4 said:

> "I also received no guidance or instructions in relation to the discipline of children. When a child was unruly or misbehaved, I would have sometimes slapped them with my open hand. Normally I would have slapped them on their hands or legs. On occasion I may have slapped them on their bottom. This was a spontaneous thing. I did not use excessive force or cause any bruises or marks on a child's body. I also used a ruler from time to time to slap a child, but this would normally have been one or two slaps, and again I never used excessive force."[304]

217 NL 4 admitted shouting at children, but only smacked them, for example for climbing on windowsills. She felt she had to be strict, "making sure they didn't get into any harm or mischief".[305] Despite these general admissions, in responding to the evidence put forward by witnesses, she said that most of the specific allegations were untrue. She denied striking any child.[306] She also felt that in the course of giving evidence some witnesses had exaggerated or fabricated allegations to put her in the worst possible light.

218 NL 4 concluded:

> "I generally have happy memories of my time working with children in Nazareth Lodge. The conditions were far from ideal, resources were limited and I had to work long hours for little remuneration, but I saw it more as a vocation than simple employment. As I said to one of the former residents whom I met, they were hard times for everyone and in particular the children. I am disappointed that a number of former residents have made these allegations against me but I do not believe I used excessive force or was unnecessarily cruel to the children that I helped to supervise."[307]

219 NL 4 accepted that on occasion she spontaneously slapped children, which supported the persuasive accounts we received of her applying informal physical punishments.

NL 5

220 NL 5 was 88 when she gave evidence. She never married, but after working for some time at Foxes Lodge and a nursery, she joined Nazareth Lodge in 1956 and stayed till the home finally closed in 1999. She said that her work was her whole life. SR 52 knew NL 5, and said she was good at settling in new children, "a gentle efficient lady who was generous with her time".[308]

221 NL 5 was clear about her intention to bring up children properly:

> "...we all worked hard to raise the children to have good morals and manners, and I was strict about that - without ever feeling it necessary to hit a child".[309]

NL 5 was responsible for her own group for some time, and she was very particular about the way the group was run. Her group were called the 'Dainties' as they were always well dressed and well behaved. She said she taught them manners and kept them clean.[310]

> "I have fond and cherished memories of my life at Nazareth [Lodge] and many happy children went through our hands and have become responsible and decent adults".[311]

Her group was also labelled the 'Whippets', a name given to them by DL 40 who made up the rhyme:

> "7 little whippets, great and small, and [NL 5] owned them all".[312]

222 NL 5 worked from 6am to 10pm every day, sometimes staying until 11pm to lock up after a meeting, and she was resident in the attic at Nazareth Lodge. She worked closely with the sisters; when not working with her group she acted as receptionist, looking after visiting priests, or she made tea for the sisters. She said that the sisters relied on her.[313]

223 Witnesses from her group said that "after a little bit of television" they were sent to bed earlier than the other groups while the sun was still shining, and that NL 5 was very strict.[314] She acknowledged that she was strict, and saw herself as a perfectionist, demanding high standards.[315] She was conscientious and controlling in her approach to childcare, keeping the children's clothes in a central cupboard, for example, rather than in their individual wardrobes, and making their beds for them while they were in school. HIA 259 said that the group lived in an old oratory which had a lovely sitting room with a lot of toys, but it was all show, and they only had access to the toys at the weekend.[316]

224 The complaints about NL 5's treatment of children may relate to her earlier years in the home, as, according to SR 52, she moved to become a nursery assistant after her group was disbanded.[317]

225 HIA 110 said that NL 5 was not as bad as NL 4, but she hit his knuckles or the back of his hand with the side of a wooden ruler if he made a mistake.[318] HIA 64 only came across her when she was supervising two groups, and he found her all right at times and at times a "terror" as she "thought nothing of thumping you".[319] HIA 19 said she hit boys on the knuckles with the edge of a ruler, and was not nice to children.[320]

226 When HIA 259 had a bad chest infection she would hit him a smack on the head for keeping her awake with his coughing. He also said that she had a nasty temper, having once stuck a fork in his arm when he did not know how to lay a table.[321] If things were not done to her satisfaction she:

> "...would fly into a rage and punch you with her fists".[322]

227 HIA 104 said that NL 5 slapped him and kicked him severely for playing football when he should have been serving as an altar boy.[323]

228 Other witnesses were not critical of NL 5's care. HIA 36, for example, said:

> "She ruled with a firm hand but she did not cause me any harm."[324]

HIA 21 considered NL 5 strict, as she slapped him across the face and lifted him off the ground by his sideburns,[325] but he thought she had been under NL 4's influence[326] which NL 4 denied.[327]

229 HIA 397 said that NL 5 was strict but not cruel; she acted like a mother figure, and he was positive about the way that she had helped to arrange foster care and adoption for him.[328] He contrasted her with NL 19, who had a "rough and abrupt manner" and who stuck her stiletto heel on his hand.[329] HIA 132 said that NL 5 physically abused him. She inspected boys' underpants regularly and beat boys if they were not clean.[330]

230 All in all, nineteen witnesses mentioned NL 5 in their evidence, consisting of sixteen who approached the Inquiry and fifteen who gave evidence to the police, with twelve speaking to both the police and the Inquiry.

231 NL 5 said:

> "I just feel that I have been stabbed in the back after all my hard work all my life. I thought I did a good job but I didn't realise these things would come up. I can't understand it and I never will".[331]

Despite ups and downs, she had a happy time there.

> "I was very happy in Nazareth Lodge and…I wouldn't have spent forty years in it if I wasn't happy…"[332] I thought I gave my life for them and I left Nazareth Lodge that day we locked the front door, and I thought 'Well, you've done a good [job].' I said to the sisters, 'Now we have nothing to worry about. We gave all we could to the children and we looked after them and we brought them up morally. We taught them manners and we thought we did a good job. We didn't think things were going to be said about us like that because those things never, never happened.'[333] I feel sick that I devoted my life to raising these boys in their time of need only many decades later to be accused of being someone I am not. I worked long hours on little or no salary to help raise many dozens of boys to be decent young men and I was proud of my role in doing that."[334]

232 In both written and oral evidence NL 5 was firm in denying that she had ever hit any boys:

> "I should state at the outset that I never smacked or assaulted any child in my care. I deny all these allegations…"[335]

She had warm memories of her work and recalled the round of applause she had received at a reunion of former Nazareth Lodge boys.[336] It is our view that NL 5 did indeed care for the boys for whom she was responsible and she worked conscientiously for them to make sure that her group had the best conditions. It is also our view that the witnesses' allegations are correct, that she was strict, that she lost self-control on occasion, and that she had presumably simply wiped out the memories of the physical punishments she had meted out.

Staff Awareness of Abuse

233 Several witnesses have stated that other sisters were present when they were being beaten. SR 208, on the other hand, worked closely with SR 34 for a year, but said she witnessed no beatings:

> "[SR 34] was headmistress of the School and could exercise control without any effort".[337]

It is, however, hard to imagine that the abuse by SR 118 and SR 34 was unknown to the other sisters working at Nazareth Lodge at the time.

234 DL 269 thought that the nuns would have been unaware of the physical abuse perpetrated by NL 4 and NL 5, and this would be consistent with the observations that they hit boys in the absence of the sisters, when they were in church or spending time in their community.[338] While we accept that the scale of the physical abuse inflicted by the two lay staff was possibly not known to the sisters, it is highly likely that the sisters would have had some awareness of the abuse by the lay staff, either through observing bruising, through any complaints which children made or from comments in casual conversation.

235 A number of witnesses had nothing critical to say about the sisters and expressed their appreciation of their dedication to caring for the children. HIA 56 for example said:

> "The nuns were good and I have nothing bad to say about them. I was happy with them. They made sacrifices for us. I just suppose they didn't see what was going on. Even today I really miss them."[339]

236 On behalf of the Congregation, Sr Brenda McCall said:

> "One of the main elements which has to be accepted is that the Sisters' general policy of no physical punishment of children was not implemented. There are instances where children were the subject of a physical assault and this is not acceptable when the care of children is to be considered".[340]

When asked whether nuns were breaching their vow of obedience in failing to follow the Order's policy, she explained that the vow related to spiritual matters, not professional practice, and that the policy was understood but not written down. Sr Brenda acknowledged the Sisters' shortcomings:

> "Nuns are only human beings, you know. We are not plaster saints".[341]

In relation to SR 143's investigations, she said:

> "We are a family and maybe she was trying to protect sister [SR 62]".[342]

Sr Brenda expressed the contrition of the Congregation:

> "Not only do we offer an apology now at this stage, I think we need to turn to these people who we have hurt and…humbly ask their forgiveness for our trespasses".[343]

237 Sisters and lay staff who became aware of the physical abuse being inflicted by their colleagues may have felt unable to take action for a number of reasons. They may have seen the physical assaults as no different from the beatings which some parents and some teachers administered. At the most basic level, some staff may have relied upon their more forceful colleagues to maintain order, and may have been thankful that they were prepared to take firm action. If so, these staff would not have wanted to challenge the status quo. Again, they may not have believed complainants. A more complex issue is that the Order was hierarchical, and if the person meting out the punishment were more senior by length of service or role, more junior sisters and lay staff may not have felt able to criticise and challenge; this was not done. Whatever the reasons, the key staff who physically abused the boys were all in post for many years, and they would have contributed substantially to the general atmosphere of the home, apparently unchallenged by their colleagues.

340 SNB 1503.
341 Day 119, p.82.
342 Day 119, p.39.
343 Day 119, p.74.

238 We appreciate that the work was difficult and demanding, and the sisters and lay staff whom we have criticised will have been expected to work long hours with very little time off. They will therefore have been subject to stress, which may have contributed to loss of self-control. However, there were sisters and lay staff who did not resort to physical abuse in order to maintain control. The physical abuse by staff, particularly on the part of SR 118, SR 34, NL 4 and NL 5, was so extensive that it created a punitive atmosphere. It was contrary to good childcare practice, the policy of the Order and the statutory Regulations under which the home worked. Furthermore the Sisters failed to apply a system of staff selection, supervision and management to prevent or limit the abuse. This was a case of systemic abuse and systemic failure.

Emotional Abuse

239 The atmosphere of fear generated by the punitive actions of the staff was emotionally abusive. At a time when the boys were meant to be enjoying care and stability in place of their earlier unhappy life experiences at home, to live in perpetual apprehension would have risked causing further damage and preventing them from growing up into confident young people who could make the most of their education.

240 In the earlier decades in particular, the very low ratio of staff to boys meant that few could be given adequate personal attention. The sisters did develop caring and constructive relationships with some boys, but others appear to have survived by keeping their heads down to avoid trouble. The lack of individual attention they received as children may well have affected some witnesses' ability to relate closely during their adult lives.

241 There were also some specific examples of emotional abuse. HIA 307, for example, found the name-calling by the nuns "terrifying":

> "We were all called 'sons of whores', a term I never understood except that it was obviously bad and meant we were all very bad children".[344]

Name-calling was also criticised by HIA 152, as SR 34 called him "button mouth" or "pudding face". The sisters also upset him by their rudeness and the comments they made about his grandparents being poor; they brought him fruit but it was taken off him and he thought it was thrown away.[345] His brother, HIA 19 said that NL 5 labelled them "Darby and

344 SNB 097.
345 SNB 515.

Joan". HIA 16 said that both NL 4 and NL 5 called him names, such as "buck teeth" and "rabbit teeth", and they encouraged the other boys to call him names too.[346]

242 HIA 183 said that one day he was unwell and was told to go to bed. No one checked on him or brought him food and he had nothing to eat. HIA 307 said that he was left alone in isolation when he was ill, and that nobody spoke to him for days.

> "I felt profound despair, fear and loneliness".[347]

As mentioned above, the sisters also prevented his former foster mother from visiting and HIA 307 felt that this had had a serious emotional impact on him.[348]

243 HIA 247 saw NL 64, his brother, beaten for bedwetting. Seeing him beaten for something his brother could not control was the worst thing which HIA 247 experienced while he was at Nazareth Lodge.[349] His brother was later fostered by NL 285, and his foster mother said that NL 64 used to wake up, pleading for someone to stop hitting him.[350]

244 HIA 423 said:

> "There was a lot of physical and mental abuse. The nuns told us that we would go to hell or that we would burn in hell because we didn't have a mummy or a daddy and that they did not want us. We were constantly told that nobody wanted us and that we were dirty. I was always terrified of dying."[351]

245 The name-calling, denigration of parents, lack of care for sick boys, the emotional impact of physical punishment, and the lack of individual care in these examples all constitute emotional abuse as well as unacceptably poor childcare practice, and we consider them to have been systemic abuse.

Sexual Abuse by Staff

246 None of the allegations of sexual abuse involved the nuns, though there were examples in the later years of inappropriate sexual behaviour on the part of some sisters. SR 62, for example, was seen walking in the nude through the children's dormitories, and SR 63 released her from her duties.[352] SR 18 was also alleged to have acted improperly, as referred to at Complaint L below. She ceased to work in childcare.

247 Seven allegations of sexual abuse were made, of which five related to gardener/handymen. HIA 159 said that in the 1950s a young man, NL 71, abused small boys.[353] We know no more about this allegation and have to conclude that it cannot be seen as indicative of systemic abuse at that time.

248 HIA 56, who was at Nazareth Lodge from 1959 to 1968, said that he was sexually abused by NL 116, the maintenance man. HIA 56 pointed him out to SR 47 as the man who had done "dirty things" to him but he could not recall her reaction.[354] NL 10, the gardener also abused him in his bedroom, which was the projector room above the main hall, accessed by a stone staircase.[355]

249 In written evidence HIA 147 wrote that NL 10, the gardener took him into the toilets near the concert hall to masturbate him.[356] In oral evidence he gave a graphic description of the way that the gardener also buggered him. He felt that he would have survived life at Nazareth Lodge if it had not been for the sexual abuse he suffered, but that this had ruined his life and his children's lives, making Nazareth Lodge a "hell home".[357]

250 HIA 36 said that he and another resident HIA 56 were out of bounds when apprehended by the caretaker, who took them to the boiler house, where he made them strip as it was very hot, and fondled them. This happened on three occasions, and once a nun called for them but did not go down the steps in the boiler house and so was unaware of the abuse.[358]

251 HIA 10 alleged that NL 14, the groundsman (who was married to a member of the care staff) had wandering hands and had pretended to tickle her, but had groped her.[359] This allegation was denied by NL 14, who pointed out that he was never employed at the home, though he had helped coach the boys in football as a volunteer.[360] Her sister alleged that NL 151, another groundsman, had interfered with her on the bus.[361]

252 HIA 154 said that a caretaker, HIA 135 abused him, starting with giving him sweets, moving on to mutual touching and then anal rape. HIA 154 was under the impression that the caretaker was aware of what Fr Brendan Smyth was doing.[362]

253 According to HIA 41 a temporary female member of staff from South Africa lay on the floor, undid her belt and trousers, and asked him to put his hand down her trousers; he found this humiliating and declined to cooperate.[363] HIA 210 said that he was sexually abused twice by NL 67, the Irish Dancing teacher, who fondled him while cleaning HIA 210 after he had soiled himself, and when staying in the teacher's house. HIA 210 said that he told SR 62 that he wanted to give up dancing, and that she punched him on the nose, making it bleed.[364]

254 Fr Steele, who was chaplain to Nazareth Lodge from 1988 to 1990, was convicted of sexual offences against children between 1969 and 1983, but he later admitted further offences and it is not known if any of his offending was against children at the home.[365]

255 HIA 56 and HIA 210 both reported the abuse they suffered, and it is clear that SR 62 was not prepared to believe HIA 210. The refusal to give credence to such allegations or to take action was in keeping with the general disbelief at that time that adults would commit such offences. If action had been taken on the first occasion it might have dissuaded others from abusing the children.

256 Otherwise, the Sisters may well have been unaware of the other instances of sexual abuse reported by witnesses. In view of the five instances in which they were involved, it could be argued that the Sisters should have supervised the gardener/ handymen more closely, but there is no reason why they should have suspected them of sexual abuse. Clearly SR 47 should have taken HIA 56's complaint seriously, but we have insufficient information to judge what transpired. We do not, therefore, consider that the Sisters were responsible for systemic abuse in failing to identify the risks posed by the male staff.

Fr Brendan Smyth

257 Fr Brendan Smyth was a member of the Norbertine Order and he travelled widely, abusing many children. He was eventually convicted of child abuse and he died in prison. The Order accepts that Fr Brendan Smyth visited Nazareth Lodge, his first contact being a successful week-long religious retreat which he provided for the Sisters in January 1976, when he was accommodated in a room near the parlour.[366] Fr Brendan Smyth is the subject of a separate chapter of this report, where the systemic failures concerning his suitability and supervision are addressed. However, it should be noted that while visiting Nazareth Lodge he assaulted both boys and girls, and there are indications in the evidence that SR 46 and Mother Superior had some awareness of the threat he posed.

Physical Abuse by Older Boys

258 Several witnesses spoke of physical abuse by older boys. In the earlier decades of Nazareth Lodge, boys remained in the home until they were of working age. The problem was exacerbated because the nuns left the older boys in charge while they worshipped as a community in the evening. Since the nuns relied on the older boys to act as "class boys" or "charge boys", as they were known, they tended to accept their accounts of incidents, and the younger boys therefore had no means of seeking protection or redress.[367] The following examples all indicate the feeling of helplessness which the witnesses experienced in the face of bullying.

259 HIA 64 said that on wet Saturdays the charge hands picked out boys to fight each other, mismatching the opponents, until one was beaten or blood was drawn, and so he had to learn to stand up for himself.[368]

260 HIA 204 who was at Nazareth Lodge from 1929 to 1936 said that older boys bullied him and manipulated him to confess to a priest that he had broken a statue of Our Lady, which had in fact been broken by an older boy. He told his mother about the abuse, but she did nothing as she feared that the nuns might discharge him from the home. He respected his mother and so did not tell her about sexual abuse he had also suffered.[369]

367 SNB 464.
368 SNB 479.
369 Day 82, pp.8 to 9 and 14 to 15.

261 HIA 99 said that older boys threatened to hit them with hurley sticks at night. He thinks this was so that the younger boys would cover their heads with blankets so that they could not see the sexual abuse committed by the older boys. HIA 24 endorsed this view.[370]

262 HIA 427 said that the nuns had older boys as pets, and these pets pulled their hair, hit them against the wall or hit them on the head. They made him so afraid that he soiled himself and they made him eat his faeces. He felt that his hands were tied and no one was there to help him.[371]

263 HIA 33 said that SR 118 nominated "class boys", who were boys of the same age as HIA 33, but were put in charge in the sisters' absence. They had the authority to punish boys by making them kneel by their beds or in the corridor with their hands above their heads, for example for talking at night in the dormitory or for lying in bed without crossed arms. If the class boys reported misbehaviour to SR 118, she always accepted their word, and boys brought in front of her were beaten with a large belt.[372]

264 HIA 307 said he was intimidated, belted and bullied by older boys. The nuns knew, but he thought that they might have been scared of the bigger boys. Boys who complained were told:

> "'That didn't happen and if you say that again I'll box your ears'. One of the worst parts of life was the feeling of helplessness. We had no one to turn to".[373]

265 HIA 87 said that there was nobody to whom he could complain. If he told the priest in confession, the priest then told the nuns, and they told the boys, and he was beaten. He alleged in particular that HIA 192 was "an evil boy" and regularly hit him; he woke up with blood on his pillow. He said that he:

> "cannot really blame the other boys because they did not know any better; I can only blame the people that were administering the rules and regulations".[374]

266 When Rubane was opened in 1953 and boys from Nazareth Lodge were transferred there at the age of eleven, the amount of bullying suddenly dropped, and although there were some instances in subsequent decades, bullying does not seem to have been such a major problem thereafter.

371 SNB 564.
372 SNB 1640-1641.
373 SNB 099.
374 SNB 258.

267 It is unsurprising that there was bullying within a large group of boys, many of whom had come from homes where they had witnessed or experienced violence as a way of dealing with relationship difficulties and asserting power. It was for the Sisters to prevent or at least reduce the bullying and create an atmosphere in which the boys were encouraged to befriend and support each other instead. Since there was only one sister to each group of thirty boys in the early years, this was almost to ask the impossible. HIA 368 said:

> "There was a lot of fighting between the boys, so we had to be able to look after ourselves."[375]

268 However it was the Order which had offered to take on this work and to continue to run the home despite the abysmal staffing levels. Their solution in the early decades of selecting older boys to act as charge boys or class boys was understandable if the community was to enjoy a brief respite each day to come together, to worship and, no doubt, to benefit from the support and solidarity of the group. However, it was the use of charge boys which predictably led to the most serious bullying. To rely on the older boys to control the younger ones in this way was a systemic failing.

269 There was little evidence of peer abuse after girls were admitted. HIA 363, who was admitted to Nazareth Lodge in 1977, said that on her first night in the home two older girls bullied her in the girls' bathroom to make her curse, banging her head off the sink, until she gave in and said the 'F' word.[376]

Sexual Abuse by Other Boys

270 In the descriptions of physical abuse by older boys above, there are general references to sexual abuse. Eleven witnesses alleged sexual abuse by peers. Of these, six were in Nazareth Lodge before Rubane was opened, when there were numbers of older boys in the home. Four were in Nazareth Lodge in the 1960s, when presumably there were still some older boys who had not been transferred to Rubane. No other witnesses who were boys at Nazareth Lodge alleged sexual abuse by peers from the 1970s onwards, perhaps because nearly all those aged over 11 had been moved to Rubane. One girl made an allegation, probably relating to the 1980s.

375 SNB 657.

271 It was on 3 April 1929 that HIA 204 was admitted and placed in the nursery unit, prior to moving to a unit for older boys run by SR 118. While the nuns were dining or praying the senior boys were in "full control". The nuns did not enter the bathroom and so the senior boys took advantage of the smaller boys, making them "perform impure acts".[377]

272 In the 1930s, when HIA 408 was aged six or seven, NL 80 took him to the sewing room on the top floor and made him masturbate him. HIA 408 had nightmares about it and he said that it still upset him. A few weeks later NL 80 stripped and beat him in the toilets. HIA 408 told his brother NL 142, who was in the Merchant Navy, about the abuse, and it stopped.

273 HIA 24 said that in the 1940s older boys sexually abused younger boys in the dormitories at night, including NL 46 and NL 39. He was made to masturbate two older boys but he refused to participate in oral sex.[378]

274 HIA 99 was sexually abused by an older boy when he wet the bed. He said that the older boy terrified him.[379] HIA 89 said that when he was aged about nine, two older boys, NL 46 and NL 47 who were aged fourteen or fifteen, abused him. He said that he screamed and managed to run away, but afterwards they bullied, slapped and punched him and made his life hell, because he had not complied sexually.[380]

275 HIA 214 was made to masturbate older boys in the dormitory at night and he said he was buggered on two or three occasions by an older boy, which made him frightened to go to the toilet at night, such that he wet the bed.[381]

276 HIA 307 said that he suffered sexual abuse many times by older boys in the bathroom; it consisted of fondling and was not penetrative, but it groomed and prepared him for the abuse he later suffered in Australia. When lining up for the baths, the older boys helped the younger boys in and out, and in the process they grabbed their penises or stuck fingers up the younger boys' backsides in a manner that was "kind of jocular". There was a supervising sister, but the sisters were frightened of the older boys, and they did not intervene.[382] He felt that the nuns were negligent in not doing anything about abuse by older boys.[383]

277 HIA 36 said that HIA 147 tried to abuse him sexually in a large dog kennel that had been used to keep Alsatians, but he threatened to tell his mother and the other boy, who denied the incident, desisted.[384] HIA 56 said that he was sexually abused by two older boys under a table on the stage in the hall and in the henhouses; indeed the two boys fought over which should abuse him.[385]

278 HIA 19 said that he was sexually assaulted by two charge boys, that NL 5 witnessed one occasion, and that he reported the incident to SR 47, who brushed it off and would not believe him, as she knew that he did not like the charge boys.[386] HIA 355 had recollections that when he was a four-year-old someone, probably an older boy, lay on top of him and ejaculated on three occasions, but did not penetrate him.[387]

279 As with the allegations of physical abuse, some sexual experimentation and some exploitation of younger boys is not surprising. Some of the alleged abusers were named by more than one witness and there is no reason to doubt their evidence. However, it was for the Sisters to provide adequate supervision and reduce the opportunities for abuse, and there were clearly times when supervision by the sisters was non-existent. They should have anticipated that such abuse was likely and arranged for supervision throughout the evening and early night-time when the charge boys were left in control.

280 In leaving the care and control of the younger boys to the older charge hands, the opportunities for sexual abuse were increased, and this amounted to systemic abuse.

281 HIA 363 described an incident in which a boy invited her to his den and tried to involve her in oral sex. She told his brother, who hit him. The boy got a bread knife and slashed HIA 363's hand, which had to be stitched at Belfast City Hospital.[388]

282 Jim Tracey said that in his eight years working at Nazareth Lodge from 1984 to 1992 he never witnessed abuse by an adult but he was aware of peer abuse, both physical and sexual:

> "...and these cases were duly and effectively managed under child protection procedures and managed by the Child Case Conference process, chaired by the statutory children's services".[389]

Inspections

283 Up to 1951 Nazareth Lodge was inspected annually as an industrial school by Inspectors from the Ministry of Home Affairs. A number of inspection reports have survived from this period, generally indicating approval for the quality of care offered.[390] From 1951 Nazareth Lodge was registered as a children's home, and it seems that thereafter it was subjected to a lighter touch, with visits, rather than inspections, undertaken by inspectors such as Miss Forrest.[391]

284 Nonetheless Miss Forrest was perceptive and did not hold back from sharp criticisms. She visited on 9 January 1954. Following her earlier concerns, the babies and toddlers were now looked after better, and the older boys had moved to Rubane. Miss Forrest felt that it was the school-age boys who had lost out as a result.

> "We saw little 5 and 6 year-olds sitting in a row with bare legs and feet waiting to get washed before supper. A slightly larger child stood facing them, hissing at them to 'stay quiet'. Some of this stillness and quietness was probably for the benefit of the visitors, but what an unnatural state of affairs! About half a dozen of these 'little shrimps' were making up the beds with the help of the one nun in charge. Two unfortunates who had soiled their pants were standing dressed in underpants only, on the tiled floor of the bathroom, waiting to be cleaned up and looking very miserable. What is needed here is really fundamental reorganisation so that these little creatures can have some individual loving care instead of being dragooned."[392]

285 The Hughes Inquiry was critical that the only SWAG report extant for Nazareth Lodge for the period 1973 to 1983 related to an inspection carried out in 1983 which was after the abuse in Kincora came to light. It accepted that Social Work Advisers had visited the home on four occasions within that ten year period but found the level of inspection to be unsatisfactory. The Department of Health has acknowledged that its predecessor bodies failed in this respect. We agree with the conclusion of the Hughes

Inquiry and consider the lack of inspection of Nazareth Lodge in that period amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

286 Victor McElfatrick was an inspector with the Social Work Advisory Group when he and Norman Chambers conducted an inspection of Nazareth Lodge from 10 to 12 October 1983. At this time the home was registered for 58 children, but it was accepted that it was unlikely that the number would exceed 40, and one of the four units was closed.[393] It was noteworthy that 25 of the 36 children then in the home were members of sibling groups and with one exception the families had been kept together in the same groups.[394]

287 There was thought to be much room for improvement, with poor staffing levels, rigid management, petty rules, lack of individual work with children, and a preoccupation with cleanliness.[395] There was no record of important events, and therefore no details of monthly statutory visits.[396] Only one sister was qualified in residential childcare, and hers was the only unit where the running of the group could be considered "residential social work", involving primary workers for the children and letting the lay staff read the case files.[397] It was recommended that staff should be seconded for Certificate in Social Services or Certificate of Qualification in Social Work courses.[398] The management style of the home was autocratic; three sisters were each in charge of a unit and they tended not to consult with their lay staff, who had little opportunity to influence practice, which limited their job satisfaction.[399] All the care staff were female, and the inspectors felt that the appointment of men as male role models would help.[400] The staff did not eat with the children as they found the food (which was prepared in a central kitchen) unappetising. The inspectors found this practice institutional and recommended changes.[401]

288 There are two versions of this report. The first is what Victor McElfatrick referred to as an "aide memoire", though it reads like a draft report.[402] The full report, which contained nineteen recommendations, was signed by Norman Chambers, who had discussed the contents of the report with Victor McElfatrick on 17 or 18 October. It contained a number of criticisms, such as the undue amount of staff time spent on practical tasks, the lack of male staff, the gulf between the sisters and the lay staff, the small number of parents visiting and the practice of sisters eating separately from the children.[403]

289 There are, however, several discrepancies between the two versions, with the second version generally toning down or omitting the sharper criticisms of the first. An observation that the nuns' religious duties were "intrusive" and "paramount", for example, was omitted, and the description of the emphasis on chores in one of the groups as "excessive if not obsessional" was toned down.[404] All but one of the lay staff were resident and they worked between 56 and 70 hours a week, often doing split shifts, with poor living conditions and low pay.[405] By this time residential childcare workers in the statutory sector had much improved conditions and pay. The lack of individual care and the absence of independence training for adolescents were also noted.[406] Of the three sisters responsible for the groups, one was seen as competent and social work trained and "this was evident in her approach to the residential task"; one was newly arrived; and one "had little understanding of residential social work and her ideas are largely irrelevant to the statement of aims and objectives".[407]

290 Victor McElfatrick could not explain the discrepancies, nor how the Sisters were to become aware of the Inspectors' concerns if they only received the gentler revised version.[408] Norman Chambers said that lengthy lists of recommendations could be overwhelming, so that his practice was to focus on critical issues and seek to encourage good practice.[409] His opinion, however, was that:

> "Nazareth Lodge appeared to be caught in a time-warp of institutional practice, while at the same time some other voluntary children's homes were actively promoting the professionalisation of residential child care, bringing it more into line with field social work standards of practice."[410]

Dr Hilary Harrison said that following discussion the aide memoire "may have been justly modified".[411]

291 Retrospectively Victor McElfatrick thought that the report should perhaps have been more critical of the lack of a log, which prevented any assessment of the Sisters' compliance with the requirement for external monthly visits. He also felt that the inspectors should have been more specific in ensuring that volunteers were cleared by the Board responsible for a child who was being visited.[412] Norman Chambers felt that the monthly visiting requirements should also have been clarified.[413]

292 The inspectors:

> "did not come across any harsh treatment of the children or unacceptable methods of discipline."[414]

This observation was significant in view of the dispute about the investigation of complaints made in the following years by children who had been in Nazareth Lodge at this time, (see the next section of this chapter). However, they did suggest that the home would have to make changes if it were to meet the needs of adolescents with difficult patterns of behaviour, who were likely to be their clientele in future.[415]

293 The normal practice was for a letter to be sent to the head of home, to which SR 143 responded,[416] followed up by a meeting with the inspector. However, short of deregistration SWAG had no sanctions which it could apply to enforce its recommendations.[417]

294 Felicity Beagon was an inspector from 1987 to 1994, and she inspected Nazareth Lodge on five occasions from 1988 to 1992, on each occasion considering the purpose of the home, the resident group, the staff, the premises, compliance with regulations, monitoring arrangements, the complaints procedure and the home's financial position.[418] She inspected the records, such as the menus, the fire drills book and the punishment book, as well as meeting the children informally.[419]

295 She found the home to be run satisfactorily with a good standard of care, despite a high staff turnover. The per capita rate agreed with the Eastern Health and Social Services Board was raised from £287 to £450 to increase staffing levels and salaries for the secondment of staff to take Certificate in Social Services courses.[420]

296 Felicity Beagon was concerned about the institutional nature of the premises and she recommended that the three groups should be located in smaller units in the community. She never received any complaints from children or staff.[421]

297 Marion Reynolds inspected Nazareth Lodge between 4 and 11 January 1993, taking 58 hours over the inspection.[422] By this time the three units within Nazareth Lodge were looked on as separate homes. Marion Reynolds had worked primarily with the Eastern Board where there had been a range of small homes and she therefore found the large homes institutional, but attempts had been made to personalise care. She said:

> "…the Sisters had made considerable effort to personalise the homes, to make them domestic in nature, and they had done that as much as they could, given the structure of the building and the premises that they had, but I felt that because of where policy was going, these homes were in transition. They had been very large. They were reducing in size and to me it was inevitable at some stage in the future these homes would no longer have a function, but in the meantime they should operate in a way which was as domestic as they could make them…"[423]

298 Marion Reynolds noted a number of key issues:

- A plan to have four specialist units
- A plan for each unit to have intake function

- Doubts about admitting younger children short-term
- The inadequacy of staffing, without leeway for problems and to cover summer holiday
- Central lighting control
- Variability in the log
- Differences in delegated powers
- Unrecorded complaints
- Access to phones
- Admission criteria
- Sleeping arrangements concerning a known abuser sharing a bedroom with an abused child
- The lack of night staff for abused children
- The need for Team Leaders to have time to manage.

299 Although it was said that Castle Priory staffing levels had been adopted, her main concerns were with aspects of the staffing where she felt that cover was too thin to deal with crises, summer holidays and night-time cover without undue reliance on the sisters. Staffing was not inadequate, but was not ideal.[424]

300 In oral evidence, Marion Reynolds spoke about the differing personalities of the three sisters who managed the units; one of the problems in the structure was that other staff felt that there was a gap between the sisters and themselves and that they had too little delegated authority.[425] Her recommendations caused concern at the Nazareth Lodge Management Committee in view of the cost of the additional staffing required.[426]

301 After the 1994 inspection it was said of Nazareth Lodge:

> "It works on a one-to-one basis, trying to nurture and stretch children to the best of their ability. Nazareth Lodge provides high standards of physical and emotional care for children - it emphasises treating children as individuals. It delivers a high level of primary care and work in social and personal developments despite the adverse structure and layout of the building."[427]

302 As the conclusion of a formal inspection, this was high praise, and it is significant that very few allegations have been made to the Inquiry about this period. Although the buildings were still far from ideal, the quality of care appears to have been good.

303 In October or November 1995 Judith Chaddock conducted a brief inspection of Nazareth Lodge, including an examination of the monitoring system and the operation of the complaints procedure. The framework for this report consisted of a number of children's rights, which were considered in turn.[428] None of the Boards appear to have had concerns about the home at this time.[429]

Investigation of Complaints

304 It is significant that we have information concerning only one complaint from the records of Nazareth Lodge's earlier decades, two from the 1970s, and ten in the decade from 1984 to 1995, a period when good standards of care had been established. While the grounds for some of the complaints verged on the trivial, some were important, and two investigations raised points of principle. They are addressed below in date order.

Complaint A

305 In May 1927 NL 161 was hit with a stick (his version) or a strap (the Mother Superior's version) for bedwetting. A medical certificate indicated that his hands were swollen and there were marks on his thighs consistent with a beating with a strap. The police concluded that there was no doubt that NL 161 had been severely beaten but the evidence was insufficient to support a prosecution for cruelty. An inspector from the Ministry of Home Affairs visited Nazareth Lodge and interviewed the boy, who was in hospital. He "pointed out with some care" that it was an "acknowledged fact" that punishment was ineffective as a way of dealing with bedwetting, but it appeared to be the sisters' normal response. NL 161 also soiled, which the inspector felt was perhaps deliberate.[430]

Complaint B

306 In June 1976 NL 57, who was the sister of HIA 41, told her social worker NL 187 that SR 62 had hit her, but NL 187 did not believe her, as she thought that NL 57 and SR 62 had a good relationship. NL 187 recorded the allegation and informed her senior.[431] NL 57 stayed at Nazareth Lodge for a further five years, but it was only in 1990 that she complained to the police that SR 62 had punched her in the mouth and eye. The police investigated, and SR 62 denied hitting NL 57.[432]

Complaint C

307 While on a work placement at Nazareth Lodge in 1984 NL 162 raised three complaints. First, she witnessed a residential social worker NL 163 putting soap into the mouth of NL 157 for swearing, which made him retch and vomit. NL 162 reported this to the Eastern Board who, together with SWAG, interviewed the boy. SR 143 conducted an internal investigation and the residential social worker said she had acted "playfully", and that SR 52 had rubbed shampoo on NL 157's mouth for the same reason. Both staff were reprimanded and the incident was reported to the Eastern Board and deemed closed.[433]

308 Secondly, NL 162 said that children who had misbehaved were placed in a cloakroom infested with cockroaches. The SWAG inspector found that the room was light and airy and the infestation had been treated, though there was a sitting room which was more suited to time out.[434]

309 Thirdly, NL 162 reported that a major retailer passed on unsold food to the home. Upon investigation, this was considered acceptable.[435]

Complaint D

310 HIA 210 was fostered on leaving Nazareth Lodge on 9 August 1981 after eight years in the home. NL 190 was his social worker from 1978 to 1982, which covered the greater part of the period to which his allegations referred, but she said she had no recollection of the issues of which he complained at the time, although HIA 210 said that he had told her that SR 62 had hit him with a stick.[436] NL 180 then took over as HIA 210's social worker.[437] While in foster care he suffered severe nightmares which awoke his foster carers, and he disclosed mistreatment at Nazareth Lodge to his foster carers about November 1984.[438]

311 NL 180 interviewed HIA 210, first on his own and then with his senior social worker (NL 191) on 21 February 1985.[439] HIA 210 alleged that he had been hit by SR 62 with a vacuum cleaner hose and with a stick; he had been locked in a cupboard and in a bathroom overnight, and he had been given a cold bath for complaining to a social worker.[440] It was felt that the substance of his complaints could have explained his nightmares. On 3 April 1985, HIA 210's brother was interviewed; he had some difficulties remembering, but while he did not corroborate some of HIA 210's complaints, his recollections were not discrepant.[441] The events in question were already between four and twelve years earlier.

312 NL 180 believed there was "some substance" in the allegations.

> "When [HIA 210] was telling the actual incidents, ...he seemed to relive part of them. He was also, I think, generally an honest child. He wasn't one that could create elaborate deceptions".[442]

From this point responsibility for investigation moved up the line from the social worker to the senior staff.[443]

313 The senior social worker's report was dated 11 April 1985.[444] She too believed the allegations credible and reported the allegations to NL 223, Principal Social Worker.[445] He in turn wrote to Bob Bunting, Assistant Director, on 30 April 1985, noting that other Boards or units might be involved.[446] By this time SR 62 and NL 66, against whom HIA 210 had made allegations, had both left Nazareth Lodge, so that there appeared to be no immediate risk to children.[447]

314 NL 223 and the senior social worker interviewed HIA 210 on 21 June 1985. After consultations involving Bob Bunting, the Director of Social Services and the Chief Social Work Adviser, the Director asked NL 223 to write to SR 143, then Mother Superior of Nazareth Lodge, which he did on 27 June 1985, detailing eight specific complaints and suggesting that SR 143 and he should speak to two members of staff who knew HIA 210, NL 146 and NL 147 (one of whom had left by this time) about their time in the unit.[448] NL 223 interviewed them, and while their memories did not corroborate HIA 210's allegations, he felt that the allegations were credible and warranted fuller investigation.[449]

315 NL 223 felt that the Department should have investigated the complaints, as he had:

> "no power to interview staff, access to Nazareth House records or for that matter interview children from other Boards or Districts",[450] and on 18 February 1986 he wrote to Bob Bunting, stating:

> "I honestly believe that I can take this matter no further as I do not feel that I have the authority to deal with any of the issues that this incident now raises and I would ask to be freed from any further involvement in this issue until matters of accountability have been clarified."[451]

Perhaps because of pressure of work, there was no response to this letter until 30 April 1986.[452]

316 The Department suggested at one point that some of the complaints could have been seen as relating to child protection, such that the police should have been involved. Child protection procedures had been drawn up first in 1972 and revised at intervals, though it was not until 1991 following the publication by the DHSS of Co-operating to Protect Children in 1989[453] that a Joint Protocol was agreed. Under the procedures in force in 1985, police were to be notified of abuse, and a case conference was to be held involving the police, who were to notify the Board of any intended action. It was felt at this time that the evidence was not strong enough to warrant involving the police.[454] The Department's recommendation to involve the police was therefore not immediately followed up. When offered support in approaching the police in February 1987 HIA 210 declined.[455]

317 Indeed, one of the contextual problems for this Inquiry was that, following a consultation paper in October 1983, the Department had issued a draft Complaints Procedure in August 1984 and a final version on 30 April 1985. This was published as DHSS Circular HSS (CC) 2/85 and it was applied in the voluntary homes (with one exception) from May 1985. However, the trade union NIPSA declined to co-operate in its implementation in the statutory sector without safeguards for residential childcare staff.[456] Following widespread consultations and negotiations, a model procedure drafted by the Northern Board was eventually agreed for use throughout the province. The Hughes Report commented on the necessity for a Complaints Procedure[457] but in the event it was 1991 before the Procedure was fully implemented, possibly delayed by the time required to train staff.[458] The draft Complaints Procedure did not, in any case, specify the way that investigations were to be carried out, leaving it to the Boards to decide on the processes which suited them best, while reflecting a number of key points of principle which had been laid down.[459] It was, for example, up to Directors of Social Services and heads of voluntary bodies to decide whether to involve the police in the event of allegations of criminal activity. Where allegations related to voluntary homes, the heads of the agencies and Directors of Social Services were expected to collaborate.[460]

Complaint E

318 While the enquiries concerning HIA 210 were proceeding, NHB 136 a social worker working for the North and West Belfast Social Services, had some concerns about Nazareth Lodge, but discussion with SR 52 satisfied her. However, in her work with an 18-year-old former resident, NL 145, who had been in Nazareth Lodge from 1979 to 1985, she learnt of physical abuse perpetrated by SR 62, who had retired from childcare by this time.[461] Colleagues who had visited the girl when she was resident had been unaware of the abuse, though NL 145 insisted that she had tried to tell social workers, but no one had taken her seriously.[462]

319 Following preliminary investigation by the social worker, (as the complainant was only disclosing by stages), NHB 136 reported to NL 223, who on 26 November 1985 informed Bob Bunting and Robert Moore, the Director of Social Services in the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, who took the matter up with Mr P.J. Armstrong, Chief Social Work Adviser for the Department of Health and Social Services. The Department argued that it was for the Board to investigate, in view of their responsibility for the girl's welfare. The Board argued that SWAG was responsible as the allegations could have amounted to general malpractice and physical assault. Dr McCoy, Senior Social Work Advisor decided that there were insufficient grounds to investigate.[463] In any case, formal inspections of Nazareth Lodge had taken place in October 1983 and January 1986 and they had found no "adverse comment on the harshness of the regime".[464]

Complaint F

320 HIA 210 had referred to NL 97, who was in the care of the Northern Board, and the Director of Social Services of the Eastern Board therefore wrote in June 1985 and arranged for NL 223 to interview him.[465] NL 97 corroborated the allegations made by HIA 210 and NL 145, saying that SR 62 had picked on him and HIA 210 and that SR 62 had beaten them with a wooden spoon and a bamboo cane, on one occasion banging his head against a wash-basin and causing him to bleed. NL 97 also expressed affection for SR 62.[466]

321 The Director wrote to the Chief Social Work Adviser on 30 April 1986, saying:

> "There can no longer be any question that the information we now have available from three former residents amounts to alleged general malpractice and in some instances physical assault by [SR 62]".[467]

322 SR 143 investigated in 1986. It should be noted that by this time it was five years since HIA 210 had left Nazareth Lodge and more than a year since he had first disclosed his complaints.[468] SR 143, then the Mother Regional, did not speak to any young person nor to the professionals who had talked with the complainant. She interviewed six people who had been members of staff during the relevant period, and she put the issues raised by HIA 210, NL 97 and NL 145 to them. The former staff all denied witnessing any of the incidents with one exception. NL 66 had seen SR 62 hit HIA 210, who was misbehaving, with a wooden spoon in the kitchen. SR 62 acknowledged that this happened on a few occasions. SR 143 considered her enquiries to have been "exhaustive".[469] Her conclusions did not satisfy the Board. It was 1987 before the correspondence on the issue came to an end without further investigations having been concluded.[470]

323 The Eastern Board Director of Social Services was dissatisfied with this investigation and arranged for all three complainants to be informed of the outcome and promised support if they wished to contact the police.[471] On 17 February 1987 Bob Bunting informed SR 143 that NL 97 and NL 145 intended to contact the police, though HIA 210 did not wish to.[472]

324 The length of time which these investigations took before they were concluded was noted by John Duffy in his evidence. He felt that the Complaints Procedure had not differentiated the responsibilities of the parties involved clearly. Paragraph 17 of Circular 10/1983 stated that Boards had to satisfy themselves about the standards of care being provided for each child they placed in voluntary homes.[473] However, it was the Department which registered and inspected the homes, and up to late 1985 inspection reports had not been made available to the Boards. Social workers could only assume that as registration had not been withdrawn, standards must have been satisfactory. In satisfying themselves about the standards of care they could only reassure themselves about the suitability of the home in terms of the gender and age of its residents, its siting and facilities, and their own experience from previous contact and informal comments gleaned from colleagues. Social workers were not in a position to make the sort of detailed inquiries which would be made in inspections.

325 Although joint liaison between police and social services had already been in evidence from the early 1970s onwards it was not formally set out in Joint Protocol procedures until 1991. John Duffy told us that had the Joint Protocol procedures been in place at this time the police would have been required to participate in joint interviews, thought would have been given to contacting other children who might have been affected and the whole matter would have been resolved more speedily.[474] As it was, although the investigations ended, matters were not resolved but ran into the sand. Dr McCoy acknowledged that it would have been better if everyone had got round the table.[475] Indeed, there was a suggestion that a meeting might have been held between SWAG and the Eastern Board on 20 October 1986, but no notes of the meeting have survived.[476] The inspection undertaken in January 1986 was carried out in the full knowledge of these historical complaints but did not report any concerns about the current nature of the regime in the home. The DHSS Child Care Policy Branch therefore supported Dr McCoy's conclusion that no further action was required.[477]

326 It is our view that the Board was correct in its analysis. Three former residents had made allegations and had corroborated each other's accounts. Two Boards were involved. The allegations were serious, even if SR 62 had retired, and there were general issues involved, such as the quality of supervision and management. The Boards were not in a position to question the Mother Superior and Mother Regional. SWAG on the other hand was the registering and inspecting body and had the authority to investigate this matter. Passing the responsibility onto the Boards was in our view inappropriate, and the nebulous outcome of the enquiries was unsatisfactory. It should be stressed that in general, working relations between the Boards and SWAG appear to have been good. It is our view that in this instance the Department failed to accept its overarching responsibility for ensuring that the safety of children in residential care was maintained. We consider that this was a systemic failing.

327 The Department of Health responded to this finding as follows:

> "However, the Department wishes to stress again in the strongest possible terms that the investigation of historical allegations of child abuse was not a matter for Departmental Social Work Advisors within SWAG or Inspectors in the SSI. As noted above, this case concerned historical allegations made by children who were no longer in the home about staff who were no longer there. This type of investigation was neither suited to or appropriate to the role of SWAG which had to be concerned about current standards of practice in the home and whether the home should continue to be registered."

328 We find this line of argument unacceptable. In having an over-arching responsibility for social services the Department was accountable for all aspects of the provision of the services, including historical concerns. There is, of course, the question as to when complaints would be deemed historical, and the line of argument put forward by the Department could be used to dismiss any complaint or practice concern which was not current. The residents and the staff had moved on in this instance, but questions remained whether other children might have been affected, why the home's management failed to be aware of the problems, and what action they had taken to prevent a recurrence, for example. The Boards could only seek the co-operation of the Order, and did not have the authority to press the questions which needed to be put. Only the Department, in the form of the Inspectorate, had that authority.

Complaint G

329 NL 269 was a residential social worker who worked at Nazareth Lodge from September to November 1992. He complained to Marion Reynolds, SSI Inspector, by phone about a number of issues of varying levels of importance. He felt he had to resign from the Lodge because of unsatisfactory responses from his Team Leader and Sister Superior when he had raised childcare issues.[478] Notes were taken of his call and read back to him.[479]

330 He was asked to put his complaints in writing, but did not do so, and Norman Chambers, Assistant Chief Inspector, told Marion Reynolds to take no further action. She told us that she was not happy with this decision, as ignoring complaints was contrary to her practice. Nonetheless she wrote to NL 269 to say that no further action was being taken.[480] It happened that Marion Reynolds had been undertaking an inspection of Nazareth Lodge and most of the issues raised by NL 269 had in fact been addressed in her report.[481]

331 NL 269 complained of the following:

- An incident of overtly sexualised behaviour not reported to social services
- The adequacy of sleeping-in arrangements
- An incident concerning drugs
- Residential staff needing permission to contact field social workers

- A former resident who had abused a child and who had run of the house
- Staff being frightened
- Boys being left accessible to an abuser who was mother's cohabitee
- The absence of a role in the home for qualified staff
- The management of his concerns.[482]

332 Dr Kevin McCoy said:

> "The matters raised by [NL 269] were of a serious nature and should have been followed up with the home. There was no protocol either within the SSI or the wider Department that required such concerns to be conveyed in writing before being acted upon."[483]

Complaint H

333 At the 1992 inspection of Nazareth Lodge it was reported that one complaint had been made since the previous inspection – a mother alleging that her child had been beaten by staff. The child had been restrained by the staff. The incident was thoroughly investigated, recorded and explained to the parent, who withdrew her complaint.[484]

Complaint I

334 In 1993 three concerns were raised involving NL 260. First, in March he complained that confidentiality had been breached as another resident had approached him about abusing girls. Secondly, in April he said that SR 18 had locked him and another resident out until 2am. Thirdly, in May his social worker, NL 275, found him alone in his unit, as SR 18 had not taken him out with the others because of his behaviour.[485] One concern was whether such matters needed to be dealt with formally through the formal Complaints Procedure, which was now in operation.

Complaint J

335 As a social worker, NHB 137 supervised two young people at Nazareth Lodge. In 1995 NL 164 made a number of comments which could have been considered complaints, some of which impressed as being too trivial to be dealt with through the formal complaints procedure. He said that SR 18 had "poked" him, but he did not want to complain as he had provoked her. He alleged inappropriate sexual behaviour by another resident, but swift action had been taken. He had been locked in the kitchen by SR 18. Most seriously, SR 18 had put him off the minibus for misbehaviour, which had resulted in a 10-mile walk home. NL 170, a residential worker, wrote detailed reports of these incidents for SR 52 and Judith Chaddock, Inspector.[486]

Complaint K

336 Around the same time NL 168 complained in August 1995 of an incident in the office of Nazareth Lodge in which a staff member NL 227 restrained her. The residential worker in turn alleged that NL 168 had headbutted her, and the police were called. The investigation of NL 168's complaint was hampered when she and her mother consulted a solicitor who advised them not to comply with the Complaints Procedure.[487]

Complaint L

337 Soon afterwards NL 170 left Nazareth Lodge. She worked there from January 1994 to September 1995. While she was at the home, she made complaints to the Mother Superior, the social worker attached to the home NL 169 and NL 35; indeed she prepared a written report for SR 52, the Mother Superior, who told her to tell no one of its contents. She informed a social worker NHB 137, who she said asked her to tell him nothing more as there was nothing he could do.[488] HSCB have indicated that this account was at odds with NHB 137's contemporaneous records, which indicated that when NHB 137 spoke to NL 164 he told him that he did not wish to make any complaint, that NL 170 told him she did not wish to speak to him about the complaints, that she did not provide a report about the incident, even though he reassured her that any complaints would be investigated.[489]

338 Two months after she had left, as nothing had happened, NL 170 wrote to Judith Chaddock, an inspector. In all, NL 170 made fifteen complaints about Nazareth Lodge concerned with pay and conditions and a variety of childcare issues, confirmed in a letter dated 19 December 1995. NL 170 said she felt alone and isolated in raising these issues.

> "I had never worked in such an environment where there was silence, power and authority, all of which surrounded the nuns".[490]

When she gave evidence to us NL 170 added to her complaints about SR 18 and alleged she had seen her lying naked on her bed surrounded by boys in their pyjamas and that there were also suspicions about her relationship with a former residence who lived in the independence unit.

339 Judith Chaddock notified each EHSSB Trust which had a child placed in the home by letter about the complaints she had received from NL 170, and copied her letter to the Regional Supervisor requesting the Regional Supervisor to investigate and report back.

340 NL 170's complaints were investigated internally by the Order, together with those made by NL 168 and NL 164. The Nazareth Lodge Management Committee set up a Complaints Subcommittee, with three members - Mother Hilary, Mrs McNally, who acted as Chair, and Alan Chard, a Programme Manager in Down Legacy Trust, as an independent observer. The complainants and SR 18 were interviewed and she made a partial admission, which gave the complaints some validity.[491]

341 The working group presented their report on 4 March 1996 (after the end of this Inquiry's remit) and was questioned closely by the Management Committee. Alan Chard felt that they were defensive; he was required to leave after the presentation of the report, and so was unaware of their conclusions.[492] SR 18, who had been the subject of many of the complaints, decided to withdraw from childcare.[493] Copies of the Management Committee minutes were circulated to the Trusts, but the full report was not shared and the minutes did not include responses to individual complaints, nor the rationale for action taken.[494]

342 According to Dr Kevin McCoy, the Department was unaware of any report on this investigation reaching the Inspectorate at this point.[495] However, in December 1995 Judith Chaddock wrote to the Regional Superior concerning several complaints about SR 18, attaching NL 170's handwritten reports.[496] The investigation of these complaints was complicated by numerous additional allegations made by NL 164, which he withdrew when visited by an investigating social worker, and by complaints made by NL 260. Since three children were involved, each placed at Nazareth Lodge by a different authority, the correspondence covering these events is unusually detailed, continuing after the end of the Inquiry's remit. It is laid out in full in a report by John Duffy.[497]

343 The investigation undertaken by the Nazareth House Management Committee Subcommittee demonstrated that in this instance the policy for agencies to undertake internal investigations of complaints was unsatisfactory, proving to be defensive, secretive and ineffective. The policy had been followed, but none of the people who needed to know the outcome was provided with the necessary detail or the rationale for the Congregation's conclusions. As part of the Warning Letter process the Department responded that:

> "It would be inappropriate to regard voluntary organisations generally as being any less capable [than statutory trusts] of undertaking such responsibility now or at the time in question."

We question that judgement; for a voluntary organisation with a thin management structure to be able to undertake an independent inquiry is unrealistic. The principle of 'being a judge is one's own cause' applies. We acknowledge that the Department was breaking new ground in drafting the Complaints Procedure at this time but we are critical that it included that agencies should undertake internal investigations of complaints and we are critical of the Sisters for conducting the investigation secretly.

Complaint M

344 On 23 June 1995 Bob Bunting notified Norman Chambers that two retired priests were living at Nazareth Lodge. On investigation it was found that they had separate access and that any contact with the children was most unlikely.[498]

345 The number of complaints which were investigated during this decade should not be interpreted as a symptom of poor residential care. The inquiries did identify some physical abuse and other unacceptable conduct, particularly on the part of SR 62 and SR 18, both of whom left the work. The main message, however, is that throughout this period, the investigation of complaints improved. Children were probably being encouraged to voice their complaints. Social workers clearly took complaints seriously, though the process following initial identification of a complaint proved at first confused and time-consuming.

497 SNB 7381-7389.

346 It was only with the eventual adoption of the Complaints Procedure and the creation of the Joint Protocol for investigating child protection matters that satisfactory systems were set up. If anything, the main problem once the Complaints Procedure had been implemented was that trivial issues, such as squabbles between staff and children, were notified as complaints, and then often withdrawn. Nonetheless, for all the deficiencies of the systems, the contrast with earlier decades is sharp. Complainants were now being heard and refusal to believe that abuse was possible was a thing of the past.

Conclusions

347 During the period covered by the evidence of witnesses there were considerable developments in residential childcare, both in the standards of care expected and in the way care was delivered at Nazareth Lodge.

348 At the start, in the 1940s and 1950s, times were hard and there was limited money, so that staffing was minimal and food was basic. The situation at that time was summarised by the Inspector Kathleen Forrest in April 1953, writing about the four homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth:

> "The children in these four homes especially have nothing like a normal upbringing. They must feel unloved as it is just not possible for the number of staff to show affection to such large numbers of children…I find these homes utterly depressing and it appals me to think that these hundreds of children are being reared in bleak lovelessness. This is not meant entirely as criticism of the staff, but their task is impossible. …In short I think we must press for complete overhaul of the whole set-up of these homes and assist them in every way possible."[499]

349 If the drastic action proposed by Kathleen Forrest had been taken by the Ministry, it is quite probable that the number of applicants to the Inquiry would have been greatly diminished, but, as described in Chapter 5, it seems likely that the Department decided on minimum intervention.

350 By the end of the period, with the Health and Social Services Boards financing the children's care, staffing was much improved, though never generous, and living standards were much better. It is significant that the number of allegations of abuse made by witnesses was greatly reduced in the later years.

351 Because of the limited resources available to the Order and because of their initial unwillingness to approach the statutory authorities for finance, the Sisters were slow to make improvements in staffing and living conditions, which were markedly better in state-funded establishments such as training schools and local authority children's homes. In consequence the children in Nazareth Lodge were enduring physical standards of care and a shortage of staff to whom they could relate in resolving their problems, which they would not have experienced if they had been in homes run by other agencies.

352 Finance for children in voluntary residential care could have been available from the implementation of the Children Act 1950, but no action was taken for over twenty years. This shortage of finance could therefore have been obviated much earlier. We therefore conclude that the shortage of finance and its consequent impact on staffing levels and physical standards of care amounted to a form of neglect and constituted systemic abuse. Although both central government and the welfare authorities bore some responsibility, this was primarily the responsibility of the Sisters of Nazareth.

353 For some children the quality of care was acceptable and a number have fond memories of the nuns. They saw Nazareth Lodge as home and some have maintained close links with individual sisters and with their peers. Some have expressed appreciation of the dedication of the nuns, who took them in when their own families could not - or would not - care for them, and who spent their lives in the work, often without any respite.

354 It is against this background that the range of views expressed by witnesses has to be seen. HIA 87 said that his time at Nazareth Lodge made him independent and gave him self-respect. As a result he was able to make decisions and take a long-term view.[500] HIA 159 appreciated the solidarity experienced with his peer group in the face of bullying by older boys.

> "But there was support there from your friends when you were punched or kicked by older boys, slapped or strapped by the nuns and when you fell and hurt yourself - a caring arm, a laugh and a joke, and it was soon all friends together in whatever game we were playing. Yes, we did cry a lot at times, and laughed, for we knew that no one would look after us but ourselves".[501]

HIA 247 said that Nazareth Lodge had "A tough regime, but not all bad."

355 HIA 56 was at Nazareth Lodge in the late 1950s and 1960s, and he said:

"I never had any complaints about the nuns. The nuns were good and I have nothing bad to say about them. They made sacrifices for us. I just suppose they didn't see what was going on. Even today I miss them."[502]

356 Others were highly critical. HIA 159 felt that "Large homes have had their day." HIA 24 said that he did not think that homes were proper places in which to bring children up, as they did not learn anything about life, and when they were outside, they were lost. They had to learn from scratch without any help. In the homes they were not treated as individuals, but controlled as a group.[503] HIA 87 said:

"I feel that I was mistreated and humiliated in the home, which has left me psychologically and emotionally scarred to this day".[504]

He still had nightmares about beatings, and he had found both the Order and the Church obstructive when he was seeking to contact his relatives.

357 HIA 183 said "I do not remember any love or stimulation".[505] HIA 307 said:

"My life in Nazareth Lodge was bleak, harsh and cruel. The nuns were at best indifferent but more often were sadistic bullies who spoke with harsh loud voices in scornful, dismissive tones. They were quick to strike out and provided no reassurance or comfort to a small frightened child".[506]

358 That there was serious physical and sexual abuse, with strong connotations of emotional abuse, is clear. Having made allowance for possible exaggeration and faulty memories, the detail and sheer volume of these allegations, together with the strength of feeling of the witnesses, makes them credible, despite the denials by members of the Order. It may be hard to understand how nuns who had dedicated their lives to serve the disadvantaged should come to abuse vulnerable children so cruelly. It is for this reason that the children's parents, the police and doctors did not believe their allegations; it was unthinkable that nuns would do such things.

359 In trying to understand how the abuse came about it has to be acknowledged that the boys could be mischievous, disruptive and challenging. Having, in many cases, come from broken families where they had experienced violence and poor parental care, it was not surprising if their own behaviour was also disturbed. Yet society's expectations were that the Sisters would contain, control and care for these children.

360 Some of the punishments could be interpreted as the attempts of sisters to retain control of their group of boys. The pressure that they were under through a dire shortage of staff has been acknowledged. It seems, however, that the only mechanism they knew for controlling children was to punish them and repress their misbehaviour. Their status, both within the home and in the wider community, gave them considerable power over the children, and the corruption which power can bring is well known.

361 The types of punishment described were unnecessarily cruel, they were contrary to the Order's Rules, and they breached the Children's Homes Regulations.

362 In attempting to provide a balanced summary, it has to be recalled that Nazareth Lodge was open for 112 years and that 2,909 children were admitted in the course of its history. Although the number of witnesses was larger than for most other homes we have examined, they were nonetheless only a small proportion of the children who passed through Nazareth Lodge. In criticising the abuse and unacceptable practices, the good work done by many of the nuns who dedicated their lives to caring for children in difficult circumstances should not be overlooked.

Summary of Findings

363 The following are the findings concerning Nazareth Lodge.

(a) By the 1980s the bathing system used at Nazareth Lodge should have been abandoned long before and its continuation represented systemic abuse.

(b) When Jeyes fluid was first developed in the late nineteenth century it was used for many purposes, but by the 1950s it should not have been used in baths or for hair washing. This practice was well out of date and in our view its use amounted to systemic abuse.

(c) There was no justification for SR 118's cruel conduct in dealing with enuretic boys, which amounted to systemic abuse.

(d) We accept that force-feeding took place and it constituted systemic abuse.

(e) We consider the Sisters' failure to pass relevant information about a child's time in Nazareth Lodge, even if little was known about their lives before coming into the care of the Sisters of Nazareth, was unacceptable and showed a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well-being which we considered amounted to a systemic failing.

(f) Taking account of all the aspects of daily life in the home, for the most part they constituted poor, out of date childcare practice, and we consider this was systemic abuse. (Para. 164)

(g) The physical abuse by staff, particularly on the part of SR 118, SR 34, NL 4 and NL 5, was so extensive that it created a punitive atmosphere. It was contrary to good childcare practice, the policy of the Order and the statutory Regulations under which the home worked. Furthermore the Sisters failed to apply a system of staff selection, supervision and management to prevent or limit the abuse. This was a case of systemic abuse and systemic failure.

(h) The name-calling, denigration of parents, lack of care for sick boys, the emotional impact of physical punishment, and the lack of individual care in these examples all constitute emotional abuse as well as unacceptably poor child care practice, and we consider them to have been systemic abuse.

(i) It was the use of charge boys to supervise younger boys in the absence of the sisters which predictably led to the most serious bullying. To rely on the older boys to control the younger ones unsupervised was a systemic failing.

(j) In leaving the care and control of the younger boys to the older charge hands, the opportunities for sexual abuse were increased, and this amounted to systemic abuse.

(k) We agree with the conclusion of the Hughes Inquiry that the frequency of inspection was unsatisfactory and consider the lack of inspection of Nazareth Lodge in that period amounted to a systemic failing by SWAG to ensure the home was meeting statutory regulations and providing proper care.

(l) It is our view that in this instance the Department failed to accept its overarching responsibility for ensuring that the safety of children in residential care was maintained. We consider that this was a systemic failing.

(m) We acknowledge that the Department was breaking new ground in drafting the Complaints Procedure at this time but we are critical of the Department for this aspect of its policy and of the Sisters for conducting the inquiry secretively.

(n) We conclude that the shortage of finance and its consequent impact on staffing levels and physical standards of care amounted to a form of neglect and constituted systemic abuse. Although both central government and the welfare authorities bore some responsibility, this was primarily the responsibility of the Sisters of Nazareth.

Chapter 10:

Module 6 – Father Brendan Smyth

Introduction

1 John Gerard Smyth joined the Norbertine Order as a novice in 1945, and took the name Brendan, and so he was known as Fr Brendan Smyth for the remainder of his life. He was ordained a priest in 1951 and remained a priest until his death in 1997 while in prison in the Republic of Ireland. Until he was arrested and sentenced in Northern Ireland in 1994 he committed acts of sexual abuse against an unknown number of children in Northern Ireland, in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere. Although he was convicted of 43 separate offences against 21 children in Northern Ireland for offences committed between 1964 and 1984, and a further 74 separate offences committed against another twenty children in the Republic of Ireland for offences committed there between 1967 and 1993, he admitted on a number of occasions that he did not know how many children he had abused, saying that it could be hundreds.

2 Although granted bail when he was charged in 1991, he was able to leave the jurisdiction and remain at large until he returned to Northern Ireland for trial in 1994 when he pleaded guilty and was sentenced. The Inquiry has not examined why he was able to leave Northern Ireland as that is not within our Terms of Reference. Amongst the 43 offences in Northern Ireland to which he pleaded guilty in 1994 and 1995 for which he was sentenced to a total of four years imprisonment, three related to children who were in Nazareth House in Belfast, and five related to children in Nazareth Lodge, also in Belfast, both of which were children's homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth. However we accept that he also committed offences against other children, some of whom he also abused in either Nazareth House or Nazareth Lodge. He is also alleged to have abused children in two other children's homes in Northern Ireland. One was the home for boys at Rubane, Kircubbin, Co. Down, run by the De La Salle Order, and the other was the home for girls run by the Sisters of St Louis at Middletown, Co. Armagh.

3 It will be evident from the events we describe later in this chapter that Fr Smyth committed offences against many more children, and in many other places, as well as against children who were in those four children's homes in Northern Ireland. Because our Terms of Reference require us to examine whether there were systemic failings on the part of those responsible for children in residential homes in Northern Ireland, our focus has to be on how he was able to commit offences against children in those homes.

4 As Fr Smyth was able to move around and abuse children for so many years, and because the failings of several organisations and individuals contributed to his ability to abuse children over many years in different places, it is necessary for us to consider whether that abuse could have been stopped in those homes in Northern Ireland. The events surrounding his abuse of children in different places over many years are so inextricably interlinked that it is impossible to isolate what happened in the four homes in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference from the wider picture of his offending outside those homes, and the failures to protect children from him.

5 For that reason it is necessary to refer in some detail to allegations of abuse of children by Fr Smyth elsewhere, and to consider the response of various organisations and individuals to those allegations. We are aware that Fr Smyth is alleged to have abused children in schools, in the homes of their parents, on visits to Dublin, and in places as far apart as Wales, Scotland and the United States of America. We have to refer to those allegations in order to see when those organisations and individuals were aware of the threat he posed to boys and girls with whom he came in contact as a priest, and to examine what those organisations or individuals did, or did not do, as a result of this knowledge. It may seem to some of those who were abused by him on those occasions that we should have devoted more attention to those allegations, but were we to examine those other allegations in detail that would exceed our Terms of Reference. Nevertheless, by confining our investigation into his activities in this way it should not be thought that we do not appreciate the effect of his activities on those children who do not come within our Terms of Reference, or the implications for organisations or individuals in other countries outside our Terms of Reference.

6 Because Fr Smyth's activities extended over more than four decades it is convenient to consider events in a broadly chronological way before turning to consider the implications of these matters as they relate to the institution or individual concerned. However, because of the unusual structure of the Norbertine Order, and the relevance of that structure to matters which we consider, it is convenient first to examine the structures and processes of the Norbertine Order.

The Norbertine Order

7 The Canons Regular of Premontre are a group of Roman Catholic priests, brothers and sisters who are also known as the Premonstratensians, or White Canons, or as Norbertines after their founder St Norbert. They commonly refer to themselves as Norbertines and were so referred to in the evidence in this module, and we shall therefore refer to them as the Norbertine Order. Norbertines lead communal lives in priories and abbeys under the Rule of St Augustine. Each abbey is a separate community of priests, brothers or sisters, and the Order has a presence in many countries throughout Europe. It also is present in Russia, the United States of America, Canada, South Africa, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Brazil, Peru, India and Australia. Whilst all members of the Norbertine Order follow a common rule, and are governed by a common code known as the Constitutions of the Premonstratensian Order, nevertheless the individual abbeys or canonries had been described to us by Fr William Fitzgerald of the Norbertine Order as having a semi-autonomous relationship with other canonries so that they resemble a confederation of semi-autonomous communities. Whilst this may be how they regard themselves, it appears to us that in many ways each community was virtually autonomous from the others. This may be contrasted with those orders which have a more centralised and centrally controlled structure such as the Society of Jesus (Jesuits).

8 As it was described in the statement of Fr William Fitzgerald, who is the Prelate Administrator of Holy Trinity Abbey, Kilnacrott, Ballyjamesduff, Co. Cavan in the Republic of Ireland, each abbey or independent priory is a self-standing unit; the term "Order", referring simply to the fraternal union of all of the independent houses of the Order.[1] The Order is presided over by an Abbot General elected by the General Chapter of the Order. We do not propose to refer in detail to the Constitutions of the Order which are to be found in the evidence bundle for this module at FBS 1032 and following. However, a number of observations about the governance and structure of the Order are relevant to the issues that we have to consider. We are grateful to Fr Fitzgerald for his clear exposition of the constitutional and organisational structures of the Order, and in his capacity as Prelate Administrator of Holy Trinity Abbey, Kilnacroft, for his frank and forthright evidence to the Inquiry.

1 FBS 821.

9 Although the Abbot General is described in the Constitutions as the person who "governs the entire Order as the supreme moderator",[2] and is the immediate superior of the governing prelates of the Order, it appears that he has relatively little direct power or authority over the governing prelates, because the Constitutions provide that:

> "He has the right of precept only in the case of visitation, recourse and appeal or as often as the matter concerned comes under his competence."[3]

The central authority of the Order is the General Chapter which meets every six years. It elects four Definitors of the Order who serve as councillors of the Abbot General.

10 Each independent house or community is a self-governing unit, presided over by a prelate usually referred to as the abbot. Within each abbey the abbot, although the head of the community, acts in conjunction with an elected council. It appears to have been the position in the Kilnacrott Abbey at any rate that the collective view of the community of priests could override the view of the abbot.

11 The Constitutions of the Order make provision for the elections of officers known as visitators, whose function it is to carry out visitations or inspections of each house of the Order. Amongst the obligations of the visitators is to carefully examine the meetings of the prelate's council and to accurately report the general condition of the visited house. By reason of his office, the Abbot General is also entitled to undertake a regular visitation in any canonry or house of the Order.[4]

12 Norbertines are bound by vows of stability within their own canonry, and the usual vows of poverty, celibacy and obedience, and are dedicated to the dignified and public celebration of the Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Divine Office each day. In addition, they serve the needs of their Abbey or Priory in varying ways. It appears that may be one of the reasons the Kilnacrott Abbey, of which Fr Smyth was a member, was invited by the then bishop to come to the diocese. The evidence before us suggested that priests from the Abbey were regularly available to assist in the local diocese of Kilmore, or elsewhere, by helping in a supply capacity, such as covering for absences of local priests on holiday, or because of illness, or who were unavailable for some other reason. This could be done in a number of ways, such as acting as a hospital chaplain for a period, or by simply making informal and personal arrangements between a Norbertine priest and another priest who asked him to help in some capacity. However, this could only take place if the bishop of the diocese gave his permission to a Norbertine priest to preach and administer the sacraments in the diocese, a procedure known as conferring faculties on the priest concerned. We refer to the significance of this procedure for Fr Smyth later. It was also common for priests from the abbey to be sent to serve as parish priests in various parts of the world. Thus at various times Fr Smyth served as a parish priest in Wales, in Scotland, in Rhode Island and in North Dakota, both in the United States of America. Throughout the Order generally, Norbertines have also served as teachers.

2 FBS 1093.
3 FBS 1093.
4 FBS 1098.

Fr Brendan Smyth's Education and Studies for the Priesthood

13 John Gerard Smyth was born in Belfast on 8 June 1927. He was brought up in West Belfast and completed his secondary education in 1945 when he passed his Senior Certificate. It would seem from his results that he was an able pupil, obtaining credits in four of the six subjects, and distinctions in his two remaining subjects, English and Modern History. He joined the Norbertine Order as a novice in Kilnacrott Abbey, Co. Cavan later that summer. His intellectual ability appears to have marked him out as a particularly promising student because he was the first student from Kilnacrott Abbey to be sent to study in Rome. A letter written in September 1949 described him as having a "brilliant mind. Studies well and understands." However, it is abundantly clear that very soon afterwards serious doubts were expressed by responsible members of the Norbertine Order as to his suitability to be ordained to the priesthood. At this time Kilnacrott was not an independent abbey, but was a Priory dependent upon, and subject to, the abbey of Tongerlo, until Kilnacrott became a fully independent canonry and abbey in its own right in 1954.

14 Fr Hermans, the novice master responsible for Brendan Smyth in Kilnacrott at the time, wrote to his superior, the Abbot of Tongerlo in Belgium, conveying the view of Mgr. De Generaal, the Abbot General that:

> "Brendan is very independent and goes his own roads, which is also the case when he goes out. He and [another member of the Order] are the two elements who don't fit in the Communiuteit".

In the letter dated 27 April 1951 Fr Hermans asked:

> "now we are faced with the serious question: can he be ordained in this state?"[5]

15 The correspondence appears to suggest that the concern about Brendan Smyth's suitability to be ordained to the priesthood related to his inability to subordinate his character to the level of obedience required from priests of the Order. On 20 May 1951 Brendan Smyth wrote to the abbot of Tongerlo stating that:

> "at the same time I will pray that I may never fail to profess that sincere filial loyalty and obedience which we all owe to you as our Father and our Abbot."[6]

Despite the strongly-worded advice of the Abbot General that Brendan Smyth was unsuitable for ordination, as the Abbot of Tongerlo was independent he was free to, and did, ignore that advice. He put him forward for ordination to the priesthood, and it would appear that Brendan Smyth was ordained priest by the Archbishop of Dublin, Archbishop John Charles McQuaid, on 31 July 1951.[7]

16 It is clear that there remained significant doubts about his willingness to submit to the requirements of his Order notwithstanding his ordination in July, because on 4 October 1951 Abbot Stalmans of Tonglero wrote a letter to the prior at Kilnacrott instructing him that "if Brendan doesn't commit completely, he isn't allowed to return to Rome",[8] and Fr Smyth was required to make a written promise to that effect. A letter to Fr Smyth from Abbot Stalmans at that time pulled no punches, saying that it seemed he could not accept the views of his superiors and "it seems also that you will take more freedom in relations with the people". Fr Smyth was told that "it is lost money and time to send you back to Rome" unless he was prepared to sign a written promise "that you are prepared to obey completely every Superior in the future."[9] Fr Smyth duly gave the required undertaking, writing on 9 October 1951 that he promised:

> "To live peacefully in the Kilnacrott community, in complete submission to its present Superior and to his successors; I also promise to keep all the Rules and Regulations proper to the Order and to the House as > determined and explained by the Superior; finally I promise to accept whatever duties should be given to me to fulfil and I pledge myself to carry them out to the best of my abilities."

17 Pausing at this point, it is clear from the events leading up to and following his ordination that at the very least there were severe doubts as to the suitability of Fr Smyth to be ordained to the priesthood. It would seem, on the basis of the material so far referred to, that these concerns rested on his unwillingness to accept direction and subordinate his views to the requests and requirements of his superiors and the Order. That in itself was highly significant, and we shall see that in later years on many occasions he defied directions and instructions given to him by his superiors, or manipulated them in such a way as to behave as he pleased. We are satisfied that he was a powerful and headstrong character, as well as being intellectually able. He was also a forceful personality who did not hesitate to raise his voice to his fellow priests to intimidate them. Fr William Fitzgerald described how he was a difficult man to handle:

> "...they used to joke down there saying he was the Ian Paisley of Catholic Ireland. You know he had a huge, loud, roaring voice, you know, and all he had to do was yell at someone and they would nearly jump out of their skin."

Fr Fitzgerald also described how on one occasion:

> "...at the end of the Chapter [Abbot Kevin Smith] said to me, 'Oh, that was wonderful'. He said, 'You know, you should have been here for years to pull Brendan into place'. I said, 'Why didn't you do it?' He said, 'I couldn't do it', he said. 'He'd roar me out the door'".[10]

18 However, there is some reason to believe that it may have been known to his superiors at the time that he was wholly unsuitable for the priesthood because of the sexual proclivities which were to become apparent in later years. Fr William Fitzgerald informed the Inquiry that in 1973 he was told by a confrere (brother priest) that a complaint had been made that Fr Smyth had abused a child in the vicinity of the college of the Order in Rome, and that photographs of boys had been found in Smyth's room. It was suggested in 1973 that was the reason why the Abbot General advised against Fr Smyth's ordination. In 1994 Fr Smyth underwent a comprehensive assessment carried out by Fr David Fitzgerald, the programme director of Our Lady of Victory, an institution in Stroud in

10 Day 132, 24 June 2015, p.45.

Gloucestershire run by the Servants of the Paraclete, a Roman Catholic religious order. Although Fr Smyth told him that he first began molesting children shortly after his ordination in the mid-50s,[11] elsewhere in the report there were indications that he was engaging in inappropriate behaviour with a likely sexual origin whilst he was a young religious, saying he disciplined altar boys by spanking them across his knee and sometimes taking down their pants, something that would suggest that he was engaging in this behaviour prior to his ordination. Twenty years earlier on 22 February 1974 during a period of assessment at St Patrick's Hospital in Dublin it was recorded under the heading psychiatric history:

> "Psychosexual difficulties for many years. First developed in the Novitiate."[12]

The reference to his paedophilia first developing in the Novitiate, ie before he was ordained in 1951, lends considerable support to the rumour which Fr Fitzgerald heard in 1973 about Fr Smyth's abuse of a boy in Rome before he was ordained. It is therefore possible that the concerns we have already quoted about his suitability for ordination may have been due, at least in part, to known sexual misconduct, as well as to his unwillingness to obey the rules of the Order.

19 In this context we have taken into account that a minute of an abbot's council at Kilnacrott of 12 April 1994 contained an entry that "Fr Cross, Manchester, had voiced his opinion that B. G. S. was unsuitable for the priesthood". Fr Cross was a member of the Norbertine Order and for many years served as parish priest and house superior of the Order's priory in Manchester. Fr Fitzgerald told us that Fr Cross was a highly respected member of the Norbertine Order, and whilst it is not possible to establish whether Fr Cross's opinion that Fr Smyth was unsuitable for the priesthood was expressed before or after Fr Smyth's ordination, nonetheless it is of some significance. This is because both Manchester and Kilnacrott were subordinate to the abbey at Tongerlo until Kilnacrott became an independent canonry in 1954. There was likely to be a much wider knowledge amongst some senior members of the Norbertine Order because of their common connection with Tongerlo that even then Smyth was thought to have sexually interfered with children, although the lack of more detailed information makes it difficult for us to be satisfied of this.

20 In view of the matters we have so far referred to, we are satisfied that the Norbertine Order was guilty of a systemic failing in putting Fr Smyth forward for ordination as a priest despite a clear warning from the Abbot General to the abbot at Tongerlo (who was responsible for putting forward Fr Smyth for ordination) that he was unsuitable. Whether his unsuitability was due to personality clashes on his part, indicating persistent and significant insubordination to his superiors, or because he had been involved sexually with a younger person in Rome, or both, he was completely unsuited to being trusted with the privileges of a priest. Either he would not obey the rules (including obedience) he had undertaken to observe, or there was already evidence that he was prone to sexual misconduct, or both.

21 That Abbot Stalmans of Tongerlo wrote to Fr Smyth in such scathing terms on 4 October 1951, and felt compelled to extract a written promise from him of future obedience to his superiors such a short time after Fr Smyth's ordination, might suggest that Abbot Stalmans regretted disregarding the opposition of the Abbot General to Fr Smyth's ordination. The Abbot remarked "that [the abbot] was inclined to believe that opinion of the Abbot General about [Fr Smyth's] spirit [was] the truth", and that it was "lost money and time to send [Fr Smyth] back to Rome",[13] remarks which we consider strongly suggested that Abbot Stalmans now recognised that Fr Smyth's insubordination was a significant problem for the Norbertine Order.

22 It may also be significant that Fr Fitzgerald told us[14] that an unidentified confrere (fellow priest) of the Kilnacrott Canonry and Fr Smyth were about to commence their journey to Rome when the prior of Kilnacrott, Fr D'Hoine, arrived and told Fr Smyth that he needed to speak to him, whereupon Fr Smyth disembarked and left his confrere to travel to Rome without him. At that time the prior was the effective head of Kilnacrott, and that he appears to have gone to Dun Laoghaire and removed Fr Smyth from the boat, thereby delaying Fr Smyth's journey to Rome for a few days, was hardly coincidental in view of the correspondence between Abbot Stalmans and Fr Smyth referred to earlier. However, as nothing more is known of that event we do not feel that we can attach any further significance to it.

23 The only information given to the Inquiry about Fr Smyth's conduct during the period immediately following his ordination in 1951 is that we were informed by Mason Hayes & Curran, solicitors for the Norbertine Order, that they were aware of a complaint made by a father and his son to Kilnaleck Garda station in Co. Cavan as far back as about 1952.

24 When Kilnacrott Priory became an independent canonry in 1954, Fr Felim Colwell was appointed abbot and held that position until his death in 1968. Fr Smyth appears to have continued his ministry at Kilnacrott Abbey until 1957 when Abbot Colwell sent him to Annan in Dumfries, in Scotland. Information provided to the Inquiry by the Bishop of Galloway indicates that Fr Smyth served as an assistant priest in Annan for a short period between August 1957 and January 1958, and then returned to Kilnacrott.[15] [16] Neither the Norbertine Order nor the Diocese of Galloway has any other documentary information relating to his period there.

25 However, Fr Fitzgerald told the Inquiry that a confrere who had worked in Scotland between 1969 and 1987 recalled rumours that Fr Smyth had been deprived of his ecclesiastical faculties when he was in Scotland. If his priestly functions were restricted at that time, that would suggest that Fr Smyth transgressed in a substantial way during his time in Scotland. Fr Fitzgerald said that there was a suggestion of interference with children at that time. That accords with the statement of Fr Bruno Mulvihill[17] to which we refer later. It also is consistent with the admission by Fr Smyth to Fr David Fitzgerald in Stroud in 1994 that "I first began molesting children shortly after my ordination in the mid-1950s",[18] and therefore it is entirely possible that he abused a child or children in Scotland in 1957 or 1958 as was rumoured, although it is not possible to put the matter any more definitely than that.

26 Whatever may have led to his recall from Scotland, almost immediately Fr Smyth was sent to North Wales, which at that time was part of the Diocese of Menevia, but with the creation of a new Diocese of Wrexham in 1987 is now part of the Diocese of Wrexham.[19] He served in that diocese from late February 1958 until June 1963, and from June 1958 until June 1963 he served in Flint.[20] [21] Documents provided to the Inquiry by the Bishop of Wrexham suggest that in January 1962 Fr Smyth was the subject of allegations that he struck a boy, put his hand up the boy's shirt, took the boy on his knee and detained the boy on his own. A brief handwritten note records that Fr Smyth denied the allegations. Presumably his denials were accepted because he continued his ministry in Flint until June 1963.[22]

27 The Bishop of Wrexham also provided the Inquiry with a letter from FBS 55, and a clipping from a newspaper interview in which he described how, as a small boy, he was taken on a trip to Kilnacrott by Fr Smyth during which they stayed in the Gresham Hotel in Dublin. In the letter FBS 55 described how devout his parents were, and in the article he described how Fr Smyth wheedled his way into the affections of children in a manner that echoed the testimony of several victims examined by the Inquiry. Having described how Fr Smyth was friendly with the altar boys:

> "He would tweak our ears and while he was hugging you he would pass you a tube of sweets. As a child of that age brought up in a very Catholic environment I was in awe of him."[23]

28 The documents provided by the Bishop of Wrexham reveal that in 1963 Fr Smyth was sent back to Ireland from Wales because he had sexually abused an altar boy there (probably FBS 55). The Bishop of Menevia wrote to Abbot Colwell at Kilnacrott on 7 June 1963 to say that Fr Smyth had admitted allegations by a boy of ten that Smyth had encouraged the boy "to commit indecent actions", and that in those circumstances he was being sent back to Kilnacrott. Ironically the bishop commented:

> "…evidently this is a weakness in his character which I feel sure must have been completely unknown to you."[24]

Rhode Island 1965 to 1968

29 Whatever denials Fr Smyth may have put forward in the past if he were challenged about the rumours the Inquiry has been told were current before 1963, the letter from the Bishop of Menevia to Abbot Colwell stated that Fr Smyth had admitted contact with a child in circumstances that displayed an unmistakably sexual motivation on his part. Clearly Fr Smyth had been sent back to Kilnacrott in disgrace. However, subject to the evidence about the decree or rescript from the Vatican described by the late Fr Bruno Mulvihill to which we shall refer later, there is nothing to suggest that Abbot Colwell took any steps at that time to restrict Fr Smyth's activities, or to ensure that he would not be in a position where he could exploit his position as a priest to engage in such behaviour again. In particular, nothing appears to have been done to prevent him from having unsupervised access to children, such as hearing confessions, or stopping him being alone with altar boys or children in the Abbey choir. It would also appear that he was able to move around freely inside and away from the Abbey. We consider that the failure of Abbot Colwell to take such steps represents a systemic failing on the part of the Norbertine Order.

30 Given that Bishop Petit of Menevia had referred to the "weakness in his character" it is astonishing that Abbot Colwell felt able to send Fr Smyth to another diocese when Fr Smyth was assigned by Kilnacrott Abbey to the Diocese of Providence, Rhode Island in the United States of America in 1965. There is nothing to suggest that Abbot Colwell gave any warning to the bishop of that diocese about Fr Smyth's behaviour in Flint. Indeed it seems that the bishop was not told. When Abbot Kevin Smith, (no relation to Fr Brendan Smyth), wrote to a journalist[25] on 26 September 1994, he said of both occasions when Fr Smyth was sent on temporary assignment to the USA "on neither occasion was the Bishop of the Diocese to which he was sent notified of his propensity to molest children".[26]

The first such occasion was when Fr Smyth was sent to the Diocese of Providence and, as we shall see, he was sent later to the Diocese of Fargo in North Dakota.

31 By February 1965 at the latest, Abbot Colwell knew enough about Fr Smyth's behaviour for it to be imperative for the abbot:

(1) to warn the Bishop of Providence that Fr Smyth was a danger to children, and not send him to Rhode Island;

(2) to confine him within the Abbey premises at Kilnacrott;

25 Chris Moore, whose book Betrayal of Trust: The Fr Brendan Smyth Affair and the Catholic Church contains much valuable information on Fr Smyth's actions.

26 FBS 976.

(3) to prevent him from having any unsupervised contact with children in Kilnacrott itself;

(4) to report his sexual behaviour to the police and to social services; and

(5) to institute the necessary steps to have him removed from the priesthood.

The failure to warn the bishop of the diocese to which Fr Smyth was being sent of Fr Smyth's behaviour in Flint can only be explained as a deliberate policy on the part of Abbot Colwell to keep this information back from the Bishop of Providence. By doing so he undoubtedly exposed the children of that diocese to the risk of sexual abuse by Fr Smyth. On 15 February 1968 Bishop McVinney wrote to Abbot Colwell, explaining that whilst Fr Smyth's "rapport with the adult parishioners", was not good, "he seemed dedicated to the young people, and in some cases too much".[27] Fr Fitzgerald informed us that the Kilnacrott canonry has since been informed of five cases of child sexual abuse allegedly perpetrated by Fr Smyth during his time in Providence, and that strongly suggests the comment that Fr Smyth was sometimes too dedicated to young people was a careful way of saying that he had transgressed in some way.

The Events of 1968

32 We are satisfied that at the time of Fr Smyth's return to Northern Ireland in 1968 his behaviour in Rhode Island was known by Abbot Colwell. In 1994 Fr Smyth told Fr David Fitzgerald that while he was in East Greenwich in Rhode Island, "there were immodest touches, not real sexual abuse", and that he had been reported to the bishop "for touching an eleven year old altar boy". Fr Smyth went on to say that he: "told my Superior about these incidents in East Greenwich between 1965 and 1968 because I thought the Bishop there would have told my Superior".[28]

33 In addition, there is evidence that Abbot Colwell was not surprised by the news from Rhode Island. In 1995 Fr Mulvihill made a statement to the RUC in which he said that he received a phone call from the Bishop of Providence saying that Fr Smyth had been dismissed because of a sexual misdemeanour and was on his way back to Ireland.[29]

27 FBS 938.
28 FBS 912.
29 FBS 32124.

Fr Mulvihill alleged that when he went to see Abbot Colwell in hospital, accompanied by Prior Nash, the Abbot was:

> "Obviously disappointed but not altogether surprised told us that this had been the third time Fr Brendan had been involved in sexual deviant activities. The first time was in Annan, the Diocese of Galloway, Scotland, the second time being in North Wales in the Diocese of Menevia in the County of Gwynedd".

Although some members of the Norbertine Order take issue with much of what Fr Mulvihill, who died in a car crash in Germany in 2004 aged 59, has to say about events relating to Fr Smyth at Kilnacrott, the account he gives is supported by the account given by Fr Smyth to Fr David Fitzgerald already referred to.

Fr Mulvihill's Allegations

34 In the statement he made to the RUC on 14 March 1995, Fr Mulvihill described how in 1968 he was cleaning a vacant room in Kilnacrott, which had been formerly occupied by Fr Smyth, when he found a copy of a decree (or rescript as it has been described elsewhere)[30] issued by the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes relating to Fr Smyth. As Abbot Colwell died on 24 September 1968 and his successor Abbot Kevin Smith was not elected abbot until 12 June 1969, the senior cleric at Kilnacrott Abbey at the time was the prior. As the prior was out that day Fr Mulvihill said he handed the copy to the sub-prior, who assured him that he had placed the copy on Fr Smyth's file. According to Fr Mulvihill the decree was dated after Fr Smyth's return from Providence Rhode Island, i.e. after January 1968. The decree stipulated that Fr Smyth was only to leave the precincts of Kilnacrott Abbey with permission, and never alone, and that his faculties for confession (that is his authority to hear confessions) were withdrawn for the rest of his life. Fr Mulvihill went on to allege that sometime later when he was serving in Germany but returned to Kilnacrott for visits he saw Fr Smyth behaving as if the decree did not exist; he was hearing confessions and leaving the Abbey in his own car. Fr Mulvihill claimed that he approached Abbot Smith about this:

> "Only to be told that in his opinion Fr Brendan had been penalised sufficiently that there was no possibility of further misdemeanour and in any case the stipulations of the Decree were far too stringent".[31]

30 FBS 987.
31 FBS 32125.

35 These allegations by Fr Mulvihill are significant for at least two reasons. The first is that in 1968 the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes in Rome, (since renamed the Congregation for the Institutes of the Consecrated Life and for Societies of Apostolic Life) was the Vatican body responsible for the discipline of those such as Smyth who were members of Roman Catholic religious orders.[32] If a decree such as that described by Fr Mulvihill was issued concerning Fr Smyth then that implies formal ecclesiastical disciplinary proceedings were instituted against Fr Smyth, and as a result he was placed under strict limitations designed to prevent him being in unsupervised contact with children. As Fr Smyth apparently admitted to his superior, that is Abbot Colwell, what he had done in Rhode Island, and given that the abbot had been told by the Bishop of Menevia of Fr Smyth's admissions to the complaint by the parents of the altar boy in Flint, then it would seem that the obvious person to institute such ecclesiastical proceedings against Fr Smyth would have been Abbot Colwell as Fr Smyth's superior. Not only that, but Fr Mulvihill asserted that such a decree would have been transmitted to Kilnacrott via the Abbot General, meaning that the Norbertine Order as well as the Abbey at Kilnacrott were well aware of the existence and terms of the decree. Fr Mulvihill believed that the decree was issued because of the complaint in America, by which he presumably meant the allegation about Fr Smyth's behaviour in the Diocese of Providence, Rhode Island, that resulted in his being sent back to Ireland at the beginning of 1968.

36 The second reason why the decree would be significant is because the freedom of movement exercised for many years thereafter by Fr Smyth, and his hearing confessions for many years, could only have happened because both he and his superiors in Kilnacrott chose to ignore the decree, or the decree expired, or had been modified or revoked. Fr Mulvihill alleged that when he raised his concerns with Abbot Kevin Smith, the abbot told him, "that in [Abbot Smith's] opinion Fr Brendan had been penalised sufficiently". If Abbot Kevin Smith reacted as Fr Mulvihill described, then the failure of the Norbertine Order and Abbot Kevin Smith to ensure that Smyth was not allowed to leave Kilnacrott Abbey unsupervised, and was allowed to hear confessions, would amount to systemic failings by the Order and Abbot Kevin Smith. Fr Kevin Smith is no longer abbot and was invited to assist the Inquiry. Although he initially declined to do so, he later informed the Inquiry by letter that he had no knowledge of the existence of such a decree, nor did he make such a comment as related above.

37 Efforts have been made by the Norbertine Order to establish whether a decree such as that described by Fr Mulvihill ever existed. Fr William Fitzgerald said that there is no record of such a decree in the files of the Abbot General, and that in 1995 no one in Kilnacrott had any recollection of such a document.[33] In 1995,[34] and again in 2007,[35] the Congregation for the Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life confirmed that there was no trace of such a document in its archives, nor had the Bishop of Kilmore any record of such a document.[36]

38 Fr Mulvihill also alleged to the RUC that he expressed his concerns about what he termed Fr Smyth's "irregularities" to both Bishop McKiernan of Kilmore and to Archbishop Alibrandi, then the papal nuncio (the Vatican ambassador to the Republic of Ireland and liaison between the Irish Bishops Conference and the Vatican) in 1974, but received no satisfaction from either.

39 There is some further evidence that tends to support Fr Mulvihill's recollection of there being a decree or rescript, because Fr William Fitzgerald related an incident recounted to him by a confrere that occurred in 1968. Abbot Colwell died in 1968 after Fr Smyth was sent back from the Diocese of Providence earlier in the year, and the confrere recounted to Fr Fitzgerald how Abbot Colwell said to him:

> "He [Fr Smyth] can't hear confession. He can't say mass. He can't preach. He can't leave the abbey grounds except in the company of another priest and that's because he fiddled about with children in Rome".[37]

Although this is hearsay, and the reference to Rome possibly a mistake for Rhode Island, nevertheless Fr Fitzgerald impressed us as a conscientious and forthright witness. If the confrere's recollection was correct then that would suggest that either Abbot Colwell imposed such sanctions on Fr Smyth on his own authority, or in response to a decision from the Vatican, which may have taken the form of a decree as described by Fr Mulvihill. Another possibility is that Abbot Colwell imposed the sanctions, which were then confirmed by a decree from the Vatican.

40 As the Vatican authorities have stated that no trace of such a document can be found in their archives, and as Fr Mulvihill died in 2004 and Archbishop Alibrandi and Bishop McKiernan have also died, we are unable to reach a firm conclusion on the conflict between the accounts of Fr Mulvihill on the one side and the absence of any documentary evidence, or evidence from any of those to whom Fr Mulvihill referred, other than the evidence of Fr Kevin Smith referred to above.

Treatment at Purdysburn Hospital 1968 to 1969

41 It would appear that after Fr Smyth was sent back to Kilnacrott in January 1968 Abbot Colwell arranged for him to have some form of treatment. In his letter of 26 September 1994 to the Ulster Television journalist Chris Moore, Abbot Kevin Smith said, "In 1968 we sought treatment for Fr Smyth in Purdysburn Hospital in Belfast". It appears that this took the form of outpatient appointments with Dr J. W. Patten, a principal clinical psychologist at Purdysburn Hospital on the outskirts of Belfast. Unfortunately the hospital file relating to Fr Smyth does not contain any summary, reports or notes of the consultation, only some appointment correspondence and three psychometric tests which appear to have been performed in April 1968. The appointment correspondence would suggest that the appointments started in April 1968 and continued on an outpatient basis until at least 29 May 1969. In his letter to Chris Moore Abbot Smith said "aversion techniques were used", but other than a later reference by Fr Smyth to his receiving electric shock treatment,[38] there is no other material that casts any light upon the nature of the treatment.

42 This was the first of several unsuccessful attempts by the Norbertine Order to secure some form of psychological or psychiatric treatment for Fr Smyth. On this occasion there is no record of the Order requiring Fr Smyth to produce a written report to them from Dr Patten on the treatment, or giving his opinion on the success or otherwise of the treatment, and, most importantly of all, what if any precautions should be taken in the future to ensure that Fr Smyth did not continue to pose a danger to children. Notwithstanding the absence of any such information, and despite the by now considerable amount of evidence that Fr Smyth did pose a real danger to children with whom he was able to come in contact, and even though it was the Norbertine Order that had arranged for him to undergo this treatment, it would seem that the Order allowed him to continue to perform his clerical duties throughout the period of his treatment without subjecting him to any restraint or supervision. That would appear to be the case to judge by a request made by Fr Smyth in a letter to Dr Patten of 27 April 1969 to rearrange the date of an appointment because Fr Smyth was going to conduct a school retreat in Co. Longford in early May 1969 lasting from Monday to Friday. We regard the failure of the Order to impose any restraints on Fr Smyth during the time he was receiving treatment, together with the apparent failure of the Order to insist on receiving a diagnosis from Dr Patten as to the safety of permitting Fr Smyth to have any contact with children in the future, as systemic failings on the part of the Order.

Events of 1969 to 1975

43 In the years following the end of Fr Brendan Smyth's attendance with Dr Patten in 1969 we are satisfied that the Norbertine Order at Kilnacrott was aware from further complaints drawn to their attention that Smyth was continuing to sexually abuse children while he was living in Kilnacrott Abbey. Fr William Fitzgerald stated that Abbot Smith received a complaint (which Fr Fitzgerald places around 1971 or 1972) from a mother that Fr Smyth had sexually abused her son. Fr Fitzgerald's evidence was that although Fr Smyth denied the offence Abbot Smith suspended Fr Smyth from the public performance of his priestly duties for two weeks. Fr Fitzgerald described this penalty as "just baffling" saying that "it should have been for life".[39] It is noteworthy that Abbot Smith disbelieved Fr Smyth's denial of the offence. It is not known whether the offence was committed in the Republic of Ireland or in Northern Ireland, yet Abbot Smith failed to report the allegation to the police and to the social services in whichever jurisdiction the offence had occurred. Nor were any steps taken to confine Fr Smyth to Kilnacrott Abbey, or to prevent him having any contact with children while he was living in the Abbey.

44 Abbot Smith's explanation for these failures in the letter to the UTV Journalist Chris Moore, to which we have already referred, was that:

> "In those years frequent reassignment was often the way church authorities handled priest paedophiles and other problem priests. Fr Smyth was reassigned every few years or so in an effort to keep him from forming attachments to families and their children. We now see how inadequate this approach actually was."[40]

39 Day 132, 24 June 2015, p.55.

"We always hoped that a combination of treatment, Fr Smyth's intelligence and the grace of God would enable Fr Smyth to overcome his disorder. We did not adequately understand the compulsive nature of his disorder or the serious and enduring damage which his behaviour could cause."[41]

45 That approach was not one that commended itself to other members of the Order at the time, at least to judge by Fr William Fitzgerald's reference to the refusal in 1973 or thereabouts of the headmaster of the school associated with their priory in Australia to contemplate inviting Fr Smyth to come to teach there because a teacher at the school had been dismissed for interfering with a child. As Fr Fitzgerald put it, "(the headmaster) knew about Brendan's proclivities in 1973".[42]

The 1973 Complaint

46 There is a reference in the Kilnacrott Abbey council minutes for May 1973 to another complaint being made.[43] Whilst no other details are given, it is highly likely that this is a reference to a complaint made to FBS 49 of Kilmore Diocese by a mother from the Co. Cavan area. She told them that Fr Smyth had slept with her fourteen-year-old daughter and had sexual intercourse with her during an overnight trip to Dublin. She and her daughter had recently been bereaved, and we believe that she and her daughter would have been grateful for the concern shown by Fr Smyth in taking her daughter away like this. FBS 49 asked her whether she wanted to report the matter to the Garda Siochana (the Irish police) but the mother did not want to do so. However, he reported the matter to Bishop McKiernan[44] who undertook to him to deal with it. There is no record of what action the bishop took, but from the conjunction of events, it seems highly probable that Bishop McKiernan informed Abbot Smith of the allegation, hence the reference in the council minutes. There is no record of the Norbertine Order taking any action on this complaint to inform the police or social services of this very serious allegation. Nor did Bishop McKiernan do so, a step which we consider that he should have taken, notwithstanding the views of the mother relayed to him by FBS 49, in view of the gravity of the allegations. We consider these failures of the Norbertine Order in the form of Abbot Kevin Smith and of Bishop McKiernan to be systemic failings on their part.

Medical Treatment in 1973 and 1974, and the Finglas Episode

47 During the public hearings of this module, the Inquiry was provided with information and documents by Mason, Hayes and Curran, solicitors for the Norbertine Order. This revealed that Fr Smyth underwent psychiatric evaluation and treatment in St Patrick's Hospital, Dublin, under the care of the late Professor JNP Moore, the medical director of the hospital. It would appear that his attendances at St Patrick's Hospital were arranged by the Norbertine Order because Abbot Smith saw Prof Moore on 25 May 1973, although without Fr Smyth's knowledge.[45] Abbot Smith told Prof Moore that Fr Smyth had seduced a twelve year old girl and had sexual intercourse with her. Prof Moore recorded that:

> "Order are now very concerned and anxious to know if anything can be done to help this man and avoid such incidents in the future".

48 Coming as it did very soon after the complaint to FBS 49, and in view of the reference by Prof Moore in his interview of 25 May 1973 with Fr Smyth that Fr Smyth had become attracted to a little girl of eleven when "some fairly elaborate sexual interference short of intercourse took place repeatedly", we are satisfied that the reaction of Abbot Smith to the allegations conveyed by FBS 49 was to arrange for Fr Smyth to undergo a course of treatment. Although the ages of the child referred to vary in these references, we consider it unlikely that different children were being referred to, and consider it more likely that there was some confusion as to the age of the girl when the ages were recorded by different people.

49 From the documents provided to the Inquiry by the Norbertine Order it appears that Fr Smyth's engagement with Prof Moore lasted until at least late February 1974. During that time Fr Smyth was living in Kilnacrott, and attending appointments with Prof Moore, although at some stage he appears to have undergone a period of inpatient treatment. Fr William

45 FBS 10639.

Fitzgerald told the Inquiry that Fr Smyth was an inpatient for approximately three weeks.[46] Prof Moore wrote to Abbot Smith on 28 May 1973 and made several highly significant comments. The first was that Prof Moore did not think there was "any specific treatment likely to enable [Fr Smyth] to achieve a more adult heterosexual orientation". The second was that it should be possible for Fr Smyth "to continue with his work and to give valuable and reliable service to the community", with more insight and understanding and perhaps some chemotherapy. However, these were subject to a third, extremely important, caveat, namely that "wherever he is stationed his Superior should be aware of his difficulties".

50 When Fr Smyth saw Prof Moore again on 15 June 1973 Fr Smyth told Prof Moore that he "has had homosexual relations with a boy of sixteen years on two occasions since", (that is since he had seen Prof Moore on 28 May 1973).[47] Notwithstanding this, and despite Prof Moore's warning to Abbot Smith that wherever Fr Smyth was stationed, "his superior should be aware of his difficulties", by 4 July 1973 Fr Smyth was directing a retreat at Our Lady's Retreat House at Finglas in Dublin.[48] If Fr Smyth were conducting this retreat with the knowledge, and presumably therefore the approval, of Abbot Smith, were the organisers of the retreat made aware of Fr Smyth's predatory and sexual attitude towards children as recommended by Prof Moore? If Fr Smyth were able to conduct this retreat without the approval of Abbot Smith, why did the Abbot not insist on knowing at all times where Fr Smyth was and what he was doing? After all, by now there had been a significant number of allegations against Fr Smyth from many different quarters over several years, at least some of which Fr Smyth had admitted to his superiors, and the Order had arranged for a previous, and obviously unsuccessful, course of treatment for him at Purdysburn Hospital in Belfast less than four years earlier.

51 The Finglas retreat in July 1973 is also relevant because it would seem likely that at some point during his stay in Dublin Fr Smyth committed another sexual offence involving a child. In his letter to Prof Moore of 30 November 1973 Fr Smyth referred to, "the Garda complication". The information available to the Inquiry did not reveal exactly what occurred, but as An Garda Síochána were involved that suggests to us that a complaint of a criminal offence by Fr Smyth had been made to the local

46 FBS 827.
47 FBS 10641.
48 FBS 10642.

Gardaí in Finglas. This conclusion is strengthened because Prof Moore wrote to Abbot Smith on 1 November 1973 referring to Fr Smyth having, "some further difficulties", and recommending that "a period in hospital for further evaluation and treatment" would be appropriate.[49] That this suggestion that a period of inpatient treatment was related to "the Gardaí complication" may be inferred from a letter sent by Prof Moore on 1 November 1973 to a detective at Finglas Garda Station saying that he had been asked to write to the Garda concerned by Smyth. Prof Moore continued:

> "He has been a patient under my care for some months and I am familiar with the nature of his problems. I am writing to his superior suggesting that he should have a period of inpatient care in St Patrick's Hospital or St Edmondsbury convalescent home, as soon as I have a suitable vacancy. I hope this arrangement will be satisfactory to you and your superiors."[50]

52 In his letter to Prof Moore on 30 November 1973 Fr Smyth made it clear that he had not disclosed "the particular Finglas facts" to his superiors, nor did he intend to do so. He says, "They", made a request to which he agreed:

> "Now [w]hen the Garda complication arose only I myself knew about it and the authorities were very insistent that they would not in any way be responsible for anyone even where I lived learning about the problem. They simply made the request you know of and I agreed without any hesitation whatsoever. I was able, in the circumstances, quite truthfully to approach my superiors [to] say that I was unhappy with the way I was getting along with my problem and that I was going to ask you to arrange for me to spend some time in a suitable hospital or nursing home so that I might be able to gain a bit of confidence in dealing with the situation in the future. My superiors were quite happy with my decision and assured me that I had a completely free hand as far as they were concerned. This being so I fail to see how any disclosure of the particular Finglas facts would make it possible for you to deal with the matter more effectively."[51]

53 While Fr Smyth did not identify who "They" were, the tenor of the passage quoted above infers that it may have been members of An Garda Síochána who made the suggestion that he receive a period of inpatient treatment. If that inference is correct, then that would account for the terms of the letter written by Prof Moore to the Gardaí at Finglas station already referred to. Furthermore, Fr Smyth's account makes clear that he did not reveal to Abbot Smith why it was necessary for him to undergo a period of inpatient treatment. Finally it is clear that Fr Smyth was determined to ensure that the facts relating to whatever the allegation was against him in Finglas would not be disclosed to his superiors. Prof Moore suggested on two occasions to Abbot Smith that they meet in order to discuss the nature of Fr Smyth's condition, but in 1975 Abbot Smith told Bishop McKiernan of Kilmore that when he, Abbot Smith, went to speak to Prof Moore, Prof Moore refused to discuss Fr Smyth's case with him, citing patient confidentiality.[52]

49 FBS 10645.
50 FBS 10644.
51 FBS 10648.

54 As already quoted from an earlier part of the letter, Fr Smyth had decided that he would not permit Prof Moore to disclose these matters to Abbot Smith, pointing out that he was the patient and was paying for the treatment himself.[53] We regard that as significant because it shows that Fr Smyth was able to manipulate the doctor/patient relationship between himself and Prof Moore to his own advantage, and did so to prevent the Order from getting any prognosis about Fr Smyth's future behaviour from Prof Moore. It is noteworthy that on this occasion, as on many other occasions, Fr Smyth had access to funds which enabled him to pay bills, whether for medical care, hotels or other purposes. Given his vow of poverty, we are surprised that his ready access to such funds appears not to have raised any concerns at Kilnacrott. This may not be unconnected with the criticism by Fr Fitzgerald when he described how other Norbertines were surprised at the way in which priests at Kilnacrott had cheque books and cars, things that were not usual for Norbertine Fathers to have.[54]

55 As the letter is addressed from Ward 1, that suggests Fr Smyth appears to have been admitted to St Patrick's Hospital for some weeks for a course of treatment. During that time he underwent psychological testing. He was also treated with Largactil and the final diagnosis made in February 1974 was one of paedophilia,[55] accompanied by the conclusion: "Prognosis: this must remain guarded".[56]

56 The account given two years later by Abbot Smith to Bishop McKiernan suggests that Fr Smyth was able to manipulate the process and keep to himself the nature of the diagnosis and prognosis given to him. Given that Fr Smyth wrote to Prof Moore from Ward 1 of St Patrick's Hospital on 30 November saying that he (Fr Smyth) had decided definitely not to accept Prof Moore's suggestion that he explain the full situation to his superior, we accept that Abbot Smith was deliberately kept in the dark by Fr Smyth about the nature of the diagnosis and treatment that the hospital contemplated at that time.

57 We consider that there are a number of steps that the Norbertine Order should have taken once Bishop McKiernan informed them of the allegation made by the mother of the child early in 1973.

(1) This was a serious allegation, and in view of the previous allegations known to the Order, we consider that there was no justification whatever for the Order, and for Abbot Smith as his religious superior, not reporting the allegation against Fr Smyth to An Garda Síochána and to the social services in the Republic of Ireland.

(2) Fr Smyth had been sent for treatment, which the Order appears to have organised, and the Order should have insisted that Fr Smyth waived the doctor/patient confidentiality in his case and authorised Prof Moore to fully disclose to Abbot Smith the nature of Fr Smyth's treatment and the prognosis for the future. Fr Smyth's failure to do so, conveyed to Abbot Smith in the abortive meeting with Prof Moore, ought to have set alarm bells ringing with the Order, and it should have insisted that Fr Smyth reveal the full medical position to them, and if he failed to do so the inevitable conclusion ought to have been that he was hiding something. In that case we consider that in view of the various offences he had admitted the necessary canonical steps should have been put in train by Abbot Kevin Smith, as Fr Smyth's superior, to seek to have Fr Smyth removed from the priesthood.

(3) Given Fr Smyth's by now well-known propensity to commit sexual offences with children he should have been confined to Kilnacrott Abbey and prevented from having any form of unsupervised contact whatever with children in the future, in particular being left alone in a room with them, as for example when hearing confession. He should also have been deprived of the use of his car and the means that gave him to travel about at will. If it was necessary for him to leave the Abbey at that time for any reason, for example to go to St Patrick's Hospital, he should only have been allowed to do so under the supervision of another member of the Order. We consider that by failing to take these steps the Norbertine Order was guilty of systemic failings in each of these respects.

Diocese of Kilmore

58 We consider that the Diocese of Kilmore was also guilty of systemic failings in the way it dealt with the allegations made to it at that time.

(1) In view of the gravity of the allegations it should have reported the matter to An Garda Síochána and to the social services in the Republic of Ireland, irrespective of the wishes of the mother of the child.

(2) The diocese should not have left the matter in the hands of the abbot and the Norbertine Order, but should itself have instituted canonical proceedings by notifying the congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith (then known as the Holy Office) as it had jurisdiction to do.[57]

59 We should also record that in his written statement to the Inquiry on behalf of the Diocese Fr Donal Kilduff, Chancellor and Diocesan Secretary to the Diocese of Kilmore, said in relation to the events in 1975 that the Diocese:

> "Would accept that the failure of Bishop McKiernan to report the matter to the civil authorities or to ensure that the matter was reported by Abbot Smith to the civil authorities was a failing on the part of the Bishop."

60 Although this concession was made in relation to the events of 1975, we consider that it applies with equal force to the events of 1973, although it is right to record that when Fr Kilduff was asked why things were not taken to the Gardaí at the time he replied:

> "I think that not only in the 70s. I think throughout for a long time the authorities perhaps weren't – weren't trusted and they were – maybe the process would take too long and some people took things into their own hands, but I think there was that culture of not going to the authorities and maybe it would get lost, you know."

57 FBS 50027.

61 We recognise that there may be issues relating to the way Finglas Garda Station dealt with the allegations made against Fr Smyth in 1973. Whether there was some form of collusive action, either instigated or approved by a member or members of An Garda Síochána stationed at Finglas Garda Station, that resulted in a decision not to prosecute Fr Smyth if he sought medical treatment we are unable to say on the limited evidence available to us. Nevertheless there are clearly matters of a criminal or disciplinary nature relating to what occurred that may require to be investigated. Had these matters occurred in Northern Ireland then we would have followed our usual practice of reporting them to the PSNI. As these matters relate to events in the Republic of Ireland we have drawn them to the attention of the Commissioner of An Garda Síochána for whatever action may be necessary.

The Kilmore Investigation of March and April 1975

62 On or shortly before 29 March 1975 Brendan Boland, a fourteen-year-old boy from Dundalk, Co. Louth in the Republic of Ireland, alleged to FBS 48 that he had been subjected to sexual abuse by Fr Smyth. FBS 48, although a Dominican priest, was acting as a parish priest in Dundalk, and whilst the allegations related to events within that part of the Archdiocese of Armagh that is in Co. Louth, FBS 48 alerted Bishop McKieran of Kilmore, because he was the bishop within whose diocese Fr Smyth lived at Kilnacrott Abbey. Bishop McKiernan immediately instigated an ecclesiastical investigation, which involved three priests. One was FBS 50 who was a curate in Dundalk at the time. Although he was a priest of the Armagh Archdiocese, he was a canon lawyer (that is someone trained in church law) and appears to have been asked to take part in his personal capacity rather than as an official representative of the Archdiocese. The second priest was FBS 48 to whom the allegation had been made. The third was the then Fr John Brady, who at that time was a language teacher at St Patrick's College, Cavan, Co. Cavan. He also had a doctorate in canon law, and from time to time acted as secretary to the bishop. Fr Brady is now Cardinal Brady, Archbishop Emeritus of Armagh, following his retirement as Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland in September 2014. Fr Brady was appointed coadjutor Archbishop in 1995.[58] From Cardinal Brady's account it appears that the investigation was carried out on an ad hoc basis following a procedure loosely based on that used at the time in Roman Catholic marriage tribunals. FBS 50 asked the questions, and the questions and answers were recorded by Fr Brady. FBS 48 appears to have been present as an observer.

58 A coadjutor is a person appointed as a co-holder of a post such as a bishopric to act as assistant to the existing bishop or archbishop, with a view to succeeding to the post of bishop or archbishop when the incumbent retires.

63 The 30 questions and answers can be found at FBS 10009 and so it is unnecessary to set them out in this part of the report. Three aspects of what occurred during that meeting merit criticism.

(1) Although Brendan Boland's father brought him to the interview, his father remained outside the room while his son was being questioned. Brendan Boland was a fourteen-year-old boy left alone in a room with three priests. This should not have happened, and his father should have been in the room with him throughout. In the book which Brendan Boland has since published about his experiences he said:

> "In my mind's eye they were old men in black and, if they made any effort to be non-threatening they failed."

In his evidence to the Inquiry Cardinal Brady accepted that the boy's father should have been present and that he could see now that the situation was intimidating for a fourteen-year-old.[59]

(2) Some of the questions the child was asked were unnecessary and completely inappropriate. For example, having asked the boy to describe what Smyth had done he was then asked "you never got to like it", to which he replied, "no". Brendan Boland said:

> "So now they had established that I masturbated, alone. Again, I felt it put blame back on me; the blame and the shame. Because if I was masturbating, well, that was because I enjoyed it. And if I enjoyed that, well then I must have enjoyed being assaulted by Fr Smyth. Follow the logic."[60] [61]

Cardinal Brady agreed that some of the questions now made him cringe in horror.[62]

(3) At the end of the process Brendan Boland was asked to swear that he had told the truth, and "that I will talk to no one about this interview except authorised priests." We consider that an oath of secrecy should not have been imposed on this fourteen-year-old boy without the consent of his father.

60 Sworn to Silence, Brendan Boland, p.83.
61 FBS 70156.
62 Day 133, 25 June 2015, p.28.

64 In his witness statement[63] at paragraph 8 Cardinal Brady explained that:

> "In accordance with canonical procedure, and to protect the integrity of the evidence, an oath of confidentiality was administered to the witness, Brendan Boland, at the end of the hearing of evidence. This oath also protected the person giving the evidence as it allowed them to refuse to speak to the person they complained about and stop them from coming under pressure to change or withdraw their evidence. It also gave solemnity to the proceedings and formalised the evidence. This was important to ensure the evidence was clear and strong".

This may well be so, but it also ensured that this child was effectively silenced at the time, rendering him unable to discuss the events with his parents. As a result he could not receive, and his parents were prevented from giving him, the support that he could have received from them to enable him to try to cope with the abuse he had suffered and the response he received to his disclosure of it.

65 During the questioning, two further significant matters came to light. The first was that three other children, one boy and two girls, had gone on the same trip with Fr Smyth to Cork as Brendan Boland, and he was able to give the Belfast address of the boy, and to say in general terms where the girls came from in Co. Cavan. The second matter was that on another occasion Fr Smyth had taken Brendan Boland and another boy from Co. Cavan on a trip to Dublin where that boy was also abused by Fr Smyth.

66 Fr Brady reported back to Bishop McKiernan that he believed Brendan Boland's account. The bishop decided that to add weight to the evidence, and to corroborate Brendan Boland's account, the other boy from Co. Cavan should also be interviewed. He was interviewed on 4 April 1975, and this second interview took a broadly similar course to the first involving Brendan Boland, although there were some differences. On this occasion there were only two priests present, Fr Brady who asked the questions and the boy's curate Fr Duffy. FBS 39 was fifteen and seven months old at the time, and he was brought to where the interview took place in Co. Cavan by Fr Duffy. His parents were not told either before or afterwards of this interview and consequently were never asked for their consent to his being questioned in this fashion. Whilst several of the more objectionable questions asked in the first interview were not asked by Fr Brady on this occasion, at the end the child was asked to swear that his evidence was true, and that "I will not discuss this interview with anyone except priests who have permission to discuss it." Again Fr Brady recorded both the questions and the answers and afterwards reported back to Bishop McKiernan that he accepted the evidence of this boy as well, and as far as Fr Brady was concerned it was then for the bishop to take the matter forward thereafter.

67 As in the case of the first interview with Brendan Boland there are aspects of the interview of FBS 39 that merit criticism.

(1) The boy's parents were never told what was taking place, nor does it seem that they were ever informed by any clerical authority that their son had been abused by Fr Smyth.

(2) The boy was only accompanied by another priest during interview.

(3) He was also required to sign an oath saying he would not discuss the matter with anyone except priests who had permission to discuss it, and therefore was effectively silenced from telling anyone, and in particular his parents, what had happened to him. As in the case of Brendan Boland, this meant he could not receive, and his parents were prevented from giving him, the support that he could have received from them to enable him to try to cope with the abuse he had suffered and the interview he underwent in relation to it.

68 When asked to explain why oaths of secrecy of this sort were imposed on both children Cardinal Brady explained that this was to ensure that the witness would not be suborned, thereby weakening the effectiveness of the process. Whilst we accept that may have been part of the reason, we are in no doubt that the predominant reason for these oaths was to ensure that the good name of the Catholic Church would be protected by keeping the matters discussed secret. In his evidence to the Inquiry Cardinal Brady recognised that these interviews should never have been conducted in this way. He said:

> "There was a shroud of secrecy and confidentiality with a view to... about not destroying the good name of the church. The scandal that somebody who was ordained to serve people should so abuse the trust as for their own pleasure was appalling and it was...and to offset that scandal it was kept very secret, very, very secret, and everybody involved in it...I mean... were bound to secrecy."[64]

64 Day 133, 25 June 2015, pp.33 and 34.

69 Although we are critical of the manner in which they were conducted we do not consider that the conduct of the two interviews could be said to be relevant to the abuse committed by Fr Smyth, and therefore we do not consider it appropriate to make findings of systemic failings in relation to the conduct of the two interviews. However, as we explain later, we consider that the use to which this information was put amounts to systemic failings on the part of those concerned.

The Reaction of the Bishop of Kilmore

70 By 12 April 1975 Bishop McKiernan had received the results of both interviews, and on that day he went to Kilnacrott and discussed the situation with Abbot Smith.[65] The bishop suggested that the St John of God Brothers should be consulted and they suggested that Fr Smyth should go to Our Lady of Victory in Stroud run by the Paraclete Fathers to which we have already referred. Although Fr Smyth agreed to go to Stroud, he did not go until 13 November 1975.

71 As a priest in the Norbertine Order residing in Kilnacrott, Fr Smyth was outside the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese within which the Abbey was physically located. However, in order to exercise his priestly functions outside the confines of the Abbey, for example when hearing confessions or acting as a substitute for a priest in the diocese, Fr Smyth required the bishop's permission, a process known as the faculty to hear confession when that was the sacrament he was exercising. It appears to be the case from a memorandum compiled of an interview with Bishop McKiernan in 1994[66] that he believed the only course open to him was to withdraw the power to hear confessions from Fr Smyth, although in some circumstances – which he considered did not arise in this case – he could withdraw Fr Smyth's power to celebrate the Eucharist. The bishop also observed that if he felt the abbot was not acting responsibly towards a priest such as Fr Smyth, then he as bishop could refer the matter to the Abbot General of the Order, but again that was something that he considered did not arise in these circumstances.

65 FBS 998.
66 FBS 40626.

72 We are satisfied that Bishop McKiernan was wrong to believe that his responsibilities were limited in this way. In the written submission on behalf of the Diocese of Kilmore and Cardinal Brady to the Inquiry after the public hearings in module 6[67] it was accepted that:

> "it is clear that the necessary and appropriate steps were not taken to stop Brendan Smyth from reoffending and the removing of faculties was a wholly ineffectual way to do this."

73 In his statement on behalf of the Diocese of Kilmore, Fr Kilduff stated at paragraph 19:[68]

> "The diocese would accept that the failure of Bishop McKiernan to report the matter to the civil authorities or to ensure that the matter was reported by Abbot Smith to the civil authorities was a failing on his part. In the light of what is now known about Brendan Smyth and about the compulsive nature of paedophilia, it is clear that the diocese should also have informed the civil authorities in the jurisdictions where those children lived. These children were named in the reports as having also taken part in excursions with Brendan Smyth."

74 By the end of the two interviews Bishop McKiernan was aware that children from his diocese, and from the Diocese of Down and Connor, had been, or very likely had been, sexually abused by Fr Smyth, and that this was the second such serious allegation against Fr Smyth to come to the bishop's attention in two years. The bishop appears to have taken no steps to consult the parents of either boy who was interviewed, nor did he take any steps to contact the parents of the girl from his diocese identified in the interviews to see whether she might have been abused. Nor did the bishop report the matter to An Garda Síochána or to social services in the Republic of Ireland, nor did he report the matter to the police and social services in Northern Ireland in respect of the allegations made relating to the named children who lived in Northern Ireland. There is no evidence that he contacted Bishop Philbin, the Bishop of Down and Connor, in whose diocese one of the boys who was alleged to have been abused lived, and where the other girl on that holiday also lived. Had Bishop McKiernan informed the authorities in the Republic of Ireland and in Northern Ireland then it is possible that steps might have been taken that would have led to the conviction and imprisonment of Fr Smyth at that time, thereby preventing other children who we now know were subsequently abused by him from being abused. Had Bishop McKiernan notified Bishop Philbin then appropriate steps could have been taken by him if he was so inclined. Although, given that no such steps were apparently taken by Bishop Philbin in later years when similar allegations were brought to his attention, we consider it probable that if he had been informed about this matter at the time he too would have failed to alert the authorities in Northern Ireland.

68 FBS 748.

75 A further example of the unwillingness of bishops and others to take decisive action can be seen from the approach taken by Bishop Daly when Bishop of Down and Connor. Bishop Daly wrote to Abbot Smith on 11 February 1991 saying he had received more complaints that Fr Smyth was using visits to Belfast to "continue the practices about which we spoke some years ago". He went on to say:

> "It is not for me to say what action should be taken; but I hope that you will forgive me for saying that experience seems to show that therapy is not being effective and that more drastic steps seem imperative if further harm is not to be done and if the risk of very grave scandal – and indeed, almost certainly, of court proceedings – is to be averted."

Abbot Smith responded on 21 February with a placatory letter stating that Fr Smyth has assured him that there has been no incident of that nature for a couple of years now. It seems that Bishop Daly accepted this, because we have seen nothing to indicate that he pursued the matter any further at that time, despite his saying that he had received more complaints about Fr Smyth's conduct. We consider that Bishop Daly should have pursued this with Abbot Smith in a much more determined fashion.

76 We are also satisfied that it was open to Bishop McKiernan to institute ecclesiastical proceedings in order to have Fr Smyth laicised, that is, removed from the priesthood. The submission on 6 July 2015 from the Archdiocese of Armagh[69] accepted that both Abbot Smith and the bishop could have instituted such proceedings.

77 We are satisfied that the steps taken by Bishop McKiernan in response to the information he received were wholly inadequate. In its submission, the Diocese of Kilmore accepted that Bishop McKiernan's failure to report the matter to the civil authorities was a failing, and the diocese also accepted that the civil authorities in both the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland should have been informed.[70] We agree, and are satisfied that the failures of Bishop McKiernan to:

(1) inform the parents of the children from both his diocese and the Archdiocese of Armagh (i.e. Dundalk) named in the two interviews of what had or may have happened to their children;

(2) inform the Diocese of Down and Connor of what had, or may have, happened to the two children from Belfast;

(3) inform the police and social services in both the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland of the names of the children whom Fr Smyth was believed to have abused;

(4) invoke the appropriate canonical (that is ecclesiastical) procedures against Fr Smyth to have him laicised, together with his suggestion that Fr Smyth should seek further medical treatment when the bishop had reason to believe from what Abbot Smith had told him that earlier treatment of Fr Smyth had been unsuccessful, all amount to systemic failings on his part.

The Response of Abbot Smith, the Kilnacrott Norbertine Community and the Norbertine Order

78 There are few details available about Fr Smyth's stay in Stroud in 1975 because at the time it was policy to destroy records after five years. It appears that when Fr Smyth went to Stroud in November 1975 he stayed there for four weeks, but was told that there was no treatment programme available for his problem. He therefore appears to have treated the four weeks he spent there as a retreat.[71] Apart from the four weeks he spent in Stroud in November and December 1975 Fr Smyth appears to have been based in Kilnacrott Abbey until 1980 or 1981 when he was assigned to the Diocese of Fargo in North Dakota in the USA. He went there to serve as a parish priest and remained there in that capacity until April 1983. During the five years or thereabouts between the events of March – April 1975, which we have considered, and his going to Fargo, extracts from minutes of meetings at Kilnacrott produced to the Inquiry show that Fr Smyth's situation was discussed by Abbot Smith and his council on ten occasions.

71 FBS 828, paragraph 46.

It is noteworthy that there is no reference on any of these occasions to any consideration of the interests of those children who Fr Smyth had already abused, or whom he might abuse in the future, nor to the possibility of reporting him to the police or social services. It is significant that in May 1976 Abbot Smith is recorded as saying that Fr Smyth's case had been going on for "a number of years". In May and June 1978 there were discussions about limiting his use of a car. In May 1978 there was a suggestion made that Fr Smyth might consider laicisation, and in June 1978 it was agreed that the Abbot General and the Prosecutor General of the Order be informed about Fr Smyth. Whatever the Abbot General and other high ranking office holders in the Norbertine Order may or may not have known about Fr Smyth prior to then, it appears that he had now been officially reported to the highest authorities in the Order. In any event, the Constitutions of the Order provided for the regular visitations of each abbey or canonry to be carried out by visitators. We are satisfied that in all probability the highest levels of the Norbertine Order knew of Fr Smyth's behaviour by the late 1970s and probably did so some years before then. Because of this report, or because the visitators inspected the council minutes in Kilnacrott, they must have been aware of the entries in those minutes relating to him. We are satisfied that the highest authorities in the Norbertine Order were aware of Fr Smyth's conduct by this time.

79 We consider that the failure of the Abbot General to take any action to prevent Fr Smyth continuing to abuse children, for example by instituting proceedings to have him laicised, represents a systemic failing by the Order. That failure stands in stark contrast to the expulsion described to us by Fr William Fitzgerald[72] of an abbot by the General Chapter.

80 None of the steps to inhibit his movements that were discussed at any of these meetings appear to have been taken, because, as we shall see, Fr Smyth was able to continue to travel wherever he wished to go, and to do so completely unsupervised. Because of this lack of action Fr Smyth was free to abuse children for almost a further twenty years. By October 1979 the Abbot's Council discussed sending him to the Diocese of Fargo in North Dakota in response to the urgent need for priests in that diocese. Despite all that was known of Fr Smyth's abuse of many children, and the advice of Prof Moore in 1973 that wherever Fr Smyth was stationed his superior should be alerted to his proclivities, it was decided by the Abbot, advised by his council at Kilnacrott, that the Bishop of Fargo should not be told of Fr Smyth's past. Abbot Smith is recorded as saying that he would like Fr Smyth's "going out from the House to have nothing against him", no doubt fortified in this approach by the recollection of one of the council that the Abbot General had sent a message "that Kilnacrott was not so obligated".[73]

72 Day 132, 24 June 2015 at pp.79 and 80.

81 We are satisfied that the failure of the Order, Abbot Smith and his colleagues at Kilnacrott to take any effective steps to restrain Smyth from contact with children, to report him to the police and social services in the Republic of Ireland, and to ensure that he was laicised, constitute systemic failings on their part. Fr Michael Toner, the chancellor of the Archdiocese of Armagh, referred to the "pusillanimity of those responsible in the Church for disciplining" Fr Smyth in the early 1970s.[74] But we consider that the conduct of the Norbertine Order in respect of Fr Smyth by the late 1970s was more than mere pusillanimity. The Order completely ignored the safety of the children with whom they must have known that Fr Smyth was in frequent contact when he was outside the abbey. For example, when Fr William Fitzgerald served as Rector of the Abbey Church at Kilnacrott for two years from 1987 he described how it was notorious at that time that the boot of Fr Smyth's car was filled with sweets.[75] Not only that, but the Order actively placed him in positions of trust, as when he was sent for a period as a hospital chaplain in Cork. The persistent refusal of the Order to take any effective steps whatever to control Fr Smyth was compounded by the decision to send him back into parish ministry in the USA. At all times their behaviour demonstrated they were only concerned with Fr Smyth's interests, and ignored the risk he posed to children. Their failure to take any effective action in relation to Fr Smyth's known and repeated abuse of children represents a systemic failing on the part of the Order.

82 We have examined Fr Smyth's activities and the responses of his colleagues in the Order in Kilnacrott Abbey and elsewhere by the mid to late 1970s in detail because they demonstrate many systemic failings on the part of those concerned. Despite the overwhelming evidence they had that Fr Smyth persistently sexually abused children, the Order allowed him to continue in his privileged position as a priest, a position which he betrayed again and again in Northern Ireland and elsewhere for almost another two decades.

Fr Smyth's Activities in Residential Homes in Northern Ireland

83 It is against this background that we now turn to examine his behaviour in Nazareth House and Nazareth Lodge in Belfast, Rubane near Kircubbin in Co. Down, and St Joseph's Home for Girls in Middletown, Co. Armagh, four of the residential homes in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference.

St Joseph's Training School, Middletown, Co Armagh

84 NHB 8 was in St Joseph's Home in Middletown between May 1973, when she was fourteen, and April 1975, when she left the training school aged sixteen. Her younger sister HIA 195 was also there from September 1977, when she was fifteen, until she left in February 1979 aged sixteen. In 1994 NHB 8 told the police that she had been introduced to Fr Smyth when she was in Nazareth House. She alleged that he sexually abused her there and elsewhere before she was sent to Middletown. She alleges that when she was in Middletown she was visited by Fr Smyth who took her out in his car on trips, including one to a local hotel. She alleged that he had full sexual intercourse with her on at least six occasions. She also alleged that she told her house mother in St Joseph's that Fr Smyth was "doing" things to her, and she wanted someone to accompany her when she went out with him in future. She also alleged that Fr Smyth sent her a Valentine card in extremely coarse terms which she showed to SJM 11 of the Sisters of St Louis, who was director of the training school at Middletown.

85 SJM 11 told the police that diary records kept by the school recorded visits by Fr Smyth on 2 October 1973, 13 November 1973 and 21 March 1974. The entry for the last date read "Smyth called to see [NHB 8] today. He is really very good to her and comes so often to see her – never empty handed". SJM 11 told the police that NHB 8 would not have been allowed to leave the training school with Fr Smyth or anyone else. She did recall one occasion when she was told by a staff member that Fr Smyth had called to see NHB 8, but she did not wish to see him. SJM 11 relayed this to Fr Smyth who left, and, as far as she knew, that was the last time he came to Middletown. She denied that she had ever seen a Valentine card, or that NHB 8 had brought any allegation of sexual abuse to her attention.

86 There is no doubt that Fr Smyth did visit Middletown in 1973 and 1974 to see NHB 8, but in view of the conflict between the accounts given by NHB 8 and SJM 11 to the police in 1995, and in the absence of further evidence, we do not feel able to reach a conclusion as to whether or not NHB 8 was sexually abused by Fr Smyth whilst she was in the care of Sisters of St Louis at St Joseph's Training School in Middletown. Therefore we do not make any finding as to whether or not there were any systemic failings on the part of the Sisters of St Louis in relation to any sexual abuse to which NHB 8 may have been subjected by Fr Smyth whilst she was resident in St Joseph's Training School.

Fr Smyth and the Sisters of Nazareth

87 It is unclear when Fr Smyth first started to abuse children in Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House, the homes run by the Sisters of Nazareth in Belfast which we consider elsewhere in this Report. In December 1994 Fr Smyth told police that he knew one of the sisters before she became a nun, and when she was sent to Nazareth Lodge he renewed their acquaintance by visiting her there occasionally. The sister concerned was FBS 53 who was in Nazareth Lodge between October 1973 and June 1974. He said that his visits to Nazareth Lodge were only to see her, and that it was not until sometime after he conducted a retreat for the Sisters in Nazareth Lodge that he became a regular visitor. There is a record of Fr Smyth conducting such a retreat for a week at the beginning of January 1976.[76] He described to the police how he lived in Nazareth House during the week of that retreat and that that was when he got to know people there.[77]

88 We are satisfied that from January 1976 Fr Smyth's familiarity to the nuns, and the respect in which he was clearly held by them as a result of the favourable impression he made on them by his conduct of the retreat in January 1976, enabled him to establish himself as a regular visitor to Nazareth Lodge, and to a lesser extent to Nazareth House. His position as a priest, his powerful personality, and the interest he showed in children meant that he was very well regarded by the sisters, and so was able to build up acquaintanceships he made with children whom he befriended in the homes, or whom he already knew or knew of through their families before they entered these homes.

89 As a result of a series of extensive and thorough investigations carried out by the RUC in the early 1990s following the publications in newspapers of allegations of sexual abuse by Fr Smyth, a large number of individuals were interviewed by the police. Many of these alleged that they were abused by him in their homes, at school, or on trips and excursions with him, all of which are matters outside the Terms of Reference of this Inquiry. Fifteen of those interviewed at that time were in either Nazareth Lodge or Nazareth House as children. Twelve of those who had been in Nazareth Lodge, and three of those who had been in Nazareth House, made allegations of sexual abuse by Fr Smyth. In due course he pleaded guilty to charges of indecent assault relating to eight children, boys and girls, in both homes. These were part of the larger total of 43 charges relating to offences against 21 children in Northern Ireland.

90 There can be no doubt that children in Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House were abused by Fr Smyth. Given that the details of these offences have been ventilated in the criminal proceedings at Belfast Crown Court in 1994 and 1995, and during the hearings conducted by the Inquiry into Nazareth Lodge, Nazareth House and Rubane, it is unnecessary to set out the details of each offence in this report. We therefore concentrate on those features of Fr Smyth's activities that are relevant to our Terms of Reference. The first question to determine is when the abuse in Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House by Fr Smyth started. A number of those who described being abused by him in Nazareth Lodge said that this happened before 1976, in some cases as early as 1973 or even earlier. Whilst we cannot exclude the possibility that Fr Smyth did abuse children in Nazareth Lodge before 1976, we consider that many of those who were abused by him, and who said to the police or to the Inquiry that he abused them in Nazareth Lodge before January 1976, may be genuinely mistaken about the time when the abuse occurred. We consider that as the nun who was acquainted with Fr Smyth was in Nazareth Lodge between October 1973 and June 1974, and as he admitted that he visited her, we consider it is more likely that the abuse commenced after he conducted the retreat in January 1976, because that appears to have been the start of his frequent visits to Nazareth Lodge. We consider it unlikely that he had the opportunity to show an interest in individual children on any visits he made solely to see the nun with whom he was acquainted. This has to be contrasted with the greater frequency of his visits, and the sisters therefore being more familiar with him, after he conducted the January

1976 retreat. In addition to his visits to see children, he occasionally said Mass for the sisters in Nazareth Lodge.[78]

91 It is clear from the evidence given by witnesses to the Inquiry, and from the many police statements gathered by the RUC during their investigations that led to his convictions in Northern Ireland in 1994 and 1995, that Fr Smyth would strike up an acquaintance with a young child. He would begin by showing an interest in the child, often taking the child in his car for treats. In particular he gave sweets and money to them as inducements to come to him when he called again. He had the ability to display an interest in young children which flattered them. This, together with his position as a priest, meant that he was able to entice them into his company. Two examples will suffice. HIA 41 said of Fr Smyth in his 1995 police statement:

> "he was extremely friendly towards me. I would have described him as a Santa Claus type man, he gave me sweets and money. I saw him on several occasions while I was in Nazareth Lodge. On each occasion he gave me sweets and money."[79]

In his 1995 statement DL 40 described how, when he was an altar boy, he was walking along a dark corridor in Nazareth Lodge with Fr Smyth when:

> "He stopped and started to kiss me right on the lips. He got down and pulled me towards him and he felt my backside on the outside of my trousers. He would have done this for approximately ten minutes. I was young with no mother and father and I thought he was just being kind to me. He did this on a number of occasions whenever he was in Nazareth Lodge saying mass. He was very crafty and this happened on a one to one basis."[80]

Fr Smyth attracted young, vulnerable children because of the interest he showed in them, and the sweets and money he lavishly distributed. He was clearly an alluring figure to many of the children in the home who were initially flattered by the interest of this apparently kindly and generous priest towards them, and then were dominated by him and by his priestly status when he abused them.

92 The next question is whether the Sisters in Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House were at fault in not preventing Fr Smyth from having access to the children in their care. Central to any consideration of Fr Smyth's ability to abuse children, whether in their own homes, in schools, on holiday trips, or in children's homes such as Nazareth Lodge and Nazareth House, was his status as a priest. We are satisfied that unless an individual, or those responsible for children in any such situation, had reason to suspect that Fr Smyth was a serial child abuser, they would never have imagined that a priest could be capable of such behaviour. These events occurred long before the revelations in Northern Ireland, in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere across the world, notably since Fr Smyth's own conviction in the 1990s, that, tragically, priests and clerics of all Christian denominations have taken advantage of their privileged position to engage in sexual and other forms of abuse of children.

78 FBS 713.
79 FBS 30777.
80 FBS 30069.

93 The great respect in which Roman Catholic priests and other religious were held by their flocks in Ireland meant that for many clergy, brothers or nuns, and lay people, it was instinctive to place absolute trust and confidence in priests such as Fr Smyth. That trust, and the deference shown to clergy and religious that was in part a consequence of that trust, meant that fellow clergy, religious such as brothers and nuns, and parents of children, welcomed the interest Fr Smyth showed in children, and had no reason to suspect that his interest was a cloak for his perverted sexual desires. In this instance, unless the Sisters of Nazareth had reason to be concerned about Fr Smyth, it is not surprising that he was welcomed to Nazareth Lodge when he came to say Mass, or when he came to enquire after children whom he knew, or had got to know, in Nazareth Lodge or Nazareth House. In those circumstances, unless there was some reason to be concerned, we do not consider that the Sisters of Nazareth would otherwise be guilty of any systemic failing on their part by allowing Fr Smyth contact with the children in their care.

94 The next question is whether the Sisters of Nazareth in either of these homes had any reason to be concerned about Fr Smyth. Although the Norbertine Order may not have known exactly where he was going, nevertheless it was known to members of the Order that Fr Smyth visited Belfast from time to time. The Order did not inform anyone else, including the Diocese of Down and Connor where these homes were located, about Fr Smyth's behaviour. The Diocese of Kilmore did not alert any other diocese about Fr Smyth, nor, as we shall see, did the Diocese of Down and Connor alert any other diocese when it became aware of allegations regarding Fr Smyth. However, there have been allegations that individual sisters in Nazareth Lodge had reason to be concerned about Fr Smyth's behaviour towards the children in their care. HIA 50, alleged that SR 2 unexpectedly came into a room and surprised Fr Smyth in the act of anal intercourse with him. This was denied by her when she was questioned by the police. We are not persuaded that such an episode occurred, or that SR 2 would have failed to take immediate action in relation to Fr Smyth had she witnessed one of the children in her care being abused in this fashion.

95 HIA 195, one of the children whom Fr Smyth admitted abusing, told the police that she told SR 31 what Fr Smyth had done after the first occasion he abused her, but was not believed and was hit on the head with a bunch of keys. SR 31 denied to the police that she had been told, but we see no reason not to accept HIA 195's account. We consider that SR 31's failure to report the matter to the mother superior was a systemic failing on the part of the Sisters of Nazareth.

96 In any event, SR 46 admitted to police in 1995 that NL 88 did tell her that she did not like Fr Smyth, and that he had rubbed against her breasts. SR 46 said her response to NL 88 was "I said well in future when you see him stay out of his way".[81] She went on to say that she did not doubt NL 88, that Fr Smyth "gave her the creeps", and she wondered why he was writing to NL 88's siblings. Because she was not happy with Fr Smyth being around she said that she kept "extra observation",[82] but did not tell her colleagues what she had been told. We accept that whilst she may have been naive, nevertheless in the light of her own suspicions and what she had been told and did not doubt, we consider that she should have reported this episode to the mother superior. Had she done so then the matter should have been investigated. At the very least, it could have led to Fr Smyth being barred from the premises and further acts of abuse thereby being prevented. We consider that the failures of SR 31 and SR 46 to report the complaints made to them about Fr Smyth to the mother superior were systemic failings on the part of the Sisters of Nazareth.

Fr Smyth's Visits to the Boys Home at Rubane, Kircubbin, Co Down

97 As explained elsewhere in our Report, for many years when boys from Nazareth Lodge reached the age of eleven they moved to the home run by the De La Salle Brothers at Rubane near Kircubbin, Co. Down. As we have seen in respect of NHB 8 at Middletown, Fr Smyth often kept in touch with children he had abused after they moved elsewhere, something he also did with children he had abused in their own homes or elsewhere. In the 1990s DL 59 said to police that he knew Fr Smyth in Nazareth Lodge. Fr Smyth did not abuse him there, but did abuse him when he came to visit DL 59 in Rubane. Masturbation and kissing occurred on a number of occasions, after which Fr Smyth gave him sweets or money. He says he told BR 1 but said nothing more because BR1 also abused him.[83] Another child who was abused by Fr Smyth in Nazareth Lodge, and who was visited by Fr Smyth when he was in Rubane, was HIA 41. In 1995 he described how Fr Smyth visited him in Rubane on a few occasions. During these visits Fr Smyth touched him on his bottom and on his penis inside his trousers. Fr Smyth gave him sweets.[84] The accounts of both describe how they were told that Fr Smyth wanted to see them, and they were then taken to a room in Rubane where they were left alone with him. We are satisfied that Fr Smyth probably visited other boys at Rubane who had been in Nazareth Lodge. Br Francis Manning's statement to the Inquiry of 5 June 2015 records a number of enquiries by Fr Smyth about children in the home, and Br Manning accepted that Fr Smyth visited Rubane on occasions after September 1977.[85] We are satisfied that Fr Smyth did abuse former Nazareth Lodge children in Rubane in the late 1970s before he left Ireland in the middle of 1980 to go to a parish in the Diocese of Fargo in North Dakota, USA, where he served until April 1983.

98 HIA 41 did not allege that he told the brothers at Rubane what Fr Smyth was doing to him, but DL 59 said he told BR 1 who also abused him. DL 40 says he told BR 1 that he had been abused by Fr Smyth, and that letters and visits from Fr Smyth then stopped. We accept that BR 1 was told what Fr Smyth was doing on these visits. Whilst BR 1 may have told Fr Smyth not to visit DL 40 again, nevertheless BR 1 should have reported what he had been told to the police and social services and to the Norbertine Order. As we explain in that part of our Report dealing with Rubane, we are satisfied that BR 1 himself abused children in Rubane. We are satisfied that whilst BR 1 may have prevented Fr Smyth from returning to Rubane to see DL 40, BR 1 did nothing else to prevent further abuse by Fr Smyth of children in the care of the De La Salle Order. We are satisfied BR 1 failed to report the allegations about Fr Smyth to his superiors in the De La Salle Order, and to the police and social services. We consider that these failures constitute systemic failings on the part of the De La Salle Order.

83 FBS 30776.
84 FBS 30778.
85 FBS 645.

The Diocese of Down and Connor and the Whitehead events of 1976

99 In its researches into the materials obtained by the Inquiry, material was found by the Inquiry indicating that in 1976 FBS 51, a priest of the Diocese of Down and Connor, became aware that Fr Smyth had sexually abused children in the parish in Whitehead where FBS 51 served as a curate at the time. The priest was approached by FBS 40 who told him his sister had been sexually abused by Fr Smyth. Whilst the exact sequence of events thereafter is somewhat confused, it is clear that FBS 51 took FBS 40 with him to a meeting with the Prior of Kilnacrott. FBS 51 said the meeting was in the Ballymascanlon Hotel near Dundalk, whereas FBS 40 said the meeting was at a hotel outside Dublin. Be that as it may, we believe that this meeting in 1976 is probably the meeting referred to by Fr William Fitzgerald at paragraph 43[86] of his statement to the Inquiry, a meeting which he understood happened in or around 1974. As Abbot Smith was abroad at the time, it was the Prior of Kilnacrott who met the family. FBS 40 told the prior what had happened to his sister, as well as his suspicions about another member of his family, and members of another family, who he thought might also have been abused by Fr Smyth.

100 Although there is no contemporary record in Kilnacrott of this meeting in 1976, in his statement to the Inquiry FBS 51 confirmed that such a meeting took place. In 1995 he told the police:

> "I felt that bringing Abbot Smith's attention to Fr Brendan Smyth's alleged behaviour was the appropriate course of action open to me. It never entered my mind to go to the police in those days it was always open to the children's parents to go to the police if they felt it was necessary." [87]

FBS 51 did not report this meeting to his bishop at the time. Some years later he heard that Fr Smyth was trying to get work in the Diocese of Down and Connor so he wrote to Bishop Philbin who was the bishop at the time. FBS 51 cannot recall when he wrote to the bishop, but it must have been before 1981 when Bishop Philbin retired. In 1995 FBS 51 said that the bishop acknowledged the letter, and said that he, the bishop, had also heard rumours about Fr Smyth. Given that Fr Smyth went to North Dakota in June 1980[88] this exchange of letters may well have been in 1978 or 1979 because that was the time when the Kilnacrott council minutes record that the Norbertine Order at Kilnacrott were discussing the possibility of priestly work for Fr Smyth.[89]

101 We accept that Bishop Philbin was notified of these allegations, probably in the late 1970s. We consider that he should have reported the matter to the police and to social services at that time, and we consider his failure to do so, and the failure of FBS 51 to do so, were systemic failings on the part of the Diocese of Down and Connor.

102 As the abuse perpetrated by Fr Smyth in the residential homes in Northern Ireland within our Terms of Reference appears to have been committed in the 1970s before Fr Smyth went to the Diocese of Fargo between 1980 and 1983, we can therefore deal with the events of the 1980s that are relevant to our Terms of Reference relatively briefly. It is a telling indication of the effect of Fr Smyth's personality on so many people that a petition was signed by many of the parishioners of his parish in the Diocese of Fargo protesting at his removal less than three years after his arrival. On his return to Ireland Fr Smyth continued to live in Kilnacrott, where it appears he performed his ministry without any apparent concern on the part of his colleagues in Kilnacrott for the safety of the children with whom he might come in contact. Upon Fr William Fitzgerald's arrival at Kilnacrott as rector of the Abbey Church in 1987 he found Fr Smyth in charge of the altar servers and the children's choir.[90] It is to Fr Fitzgerald's credit that he stopped Fr Smyth having any further contact with either group of children.

87 FBS 32151.
88 FBS 899.
89 FBS 839.
90 FBS 823.

103 Fr Fitzgerald explained to the Inquiry[91] that during the period from Fr Smyth's return from North Dakota in 1983 and March 1989 Fr Smyth held no formal ministry or office in the abbey. However, in 1984 the abbey requested Bishop McKiernan to restore Fr Smyth's faculties and this was done. Instead of the normal practice of granting faculties indefinitely they were renewed from time to time. According to the statement of Fr Donal Kilduff of Kilmore Diocese to the Inquiry, Bishop McKiernan consulted Abbot Smith and "was satisfied that there did not appear to have been any further occurrences similar to those previously complained of."[92] If that is correct, we can only assume that Abbot Smith deliberately concealed from Bishop McKiernan that Fr Smyth had been returned from the Diocese of Fargo in disgrace when Bishop McKiernan was requested to renew Fr Smyth's faculties. Fr Kilduff suggested that:

> "The limited nature of the return of the faculties suggested that Bishop McKiernan wanted to monitor Brendan Smyth to ensure he did not come up in any further complaints but that he believed that the treatment discussed had taken place and that it worked."[93]

104 The Norbertine Order continued to request, and were granted, renewals of Fr Smyth's faculties by Bishop McKiernan until October 1993. This was done despite Abbot Smith telling his council that Fr Smyth "had been involved in certain improper and wrong behaviour in regard to a boy in Northern Ireland", and that as a result Fr Smyth then saw Dr Del Monte, a clinical psychologist in Dublin, for several years thereafter. In addition in March 1990, Bishop (later Cardinal) Cahal Daly of Down and Connor had gone to Kilnacrott and discussed Fr Smyth's actions with Abbot Smith. Bishop Daly told the abbot that Fr Smyth had been reported to the police, and that three of his priests had told Bishop Daly that Fr Smyth had been involved "in apparent unlawful behaviour with young persons".[94]

105 We can only conclude that at that time Abbot Smith did not tell Bishop McKiernan of these vital matters because Abbot Smith continued the longstanding policy of doing everything possible to conceal Fr Smyth's activities from any ecclesiastical or civil authority to enable Fr Smyth to continue to exercise his priestly duties wherever possible, despite the overwhelming evidence that Fr Smyth was, and continued to be, a

91 FBS 829.
92 FBS 747.
93 FBS 747.
94 FBS 829.

danger to children. We are satisfied that Abbot Smith's failure to tell Bishop McKiernan that Fr Smyth was the subject of continuing complaints of child sexual abuse represents a further systemic failing on the part of the Norbertine Order. This failure resulted in Fr Smyth's faculties being continued and gave him the opportunity to abuse more children. Fr Smyth took advantage of this opportunity and continued to abuse children in the Republic of Ireland until 1993, offences for which he was later sentenced at Dublin Circuit Court on 22 April 1997.[95]

The Diocese of Down and Connor

106 We have already referred to Bishop Philbin being told about the Whitehead allegations, and to the meeting between Bishop Daly and Abbot Smith in 1990. It is noteworthy that just as Bishop McKiernan of Kilmore failed to inform the Diocese of Down and Connor of allegations relating to children living in that diocese, so both Bishop Philbin and Bishop Daly failed to inform Bishop McKiernan of Kilmore Diocese that a priest living in an abbey located in his diocese had been the subject of allegations of sexual abuse. Had the respective bishops so informed their fellow bishops then there would have been at least some prospect that all concerned would have been spurred into action to take more vigorous steps to ensure that Fr Smyth was unable to travel across the island of Ireland, both North and South, and elsewhere, and so unable to abuse a large number of children. We regard their failures to take any steps to disseminate this information to their fellow bishops as systemic failings on the part of the Dioceses of Kilmore and of Down and Connor.

Conclusions

107 During their evidence to the Inquiry the Diocese of Kilmore, the Diocese of Down and Connor, and the Norbertine Order, have expressed their sorrow and regret to the victims of many of the systemic failings they have accepted and those which we have identified. Perhaps the most eloquent of these apologies are the words of Fr Timothy Bartlett in his statement to the Inquiry of 5 June 2015 on behalf of the Diocese of Down and Connor:

> "No apology can ever make up for the appalling abuse that the victims of Brendan Smyth, and their families, have endured through the repeated failure to deal effectively with his criminal behaviour over a long period of time. On behalf of the Diocese, therefore, I conclude by expressing deep sorrow and the most profound regret that so many people, many of them in positions of trust and responsibility in the Church, failed so many times to respond to the cries of the 'little ones', those whom our fundamental, human and Christian instincts alone should have compelled us to protect and reach out to as a first priority."

The Nature of Fr Smyth's Abuse of Children

108 In the evidence available to us differing accounts have been given of the nature and extent of the manner in which Fr Smyth sexually abused children. Other than in those few instances where we have already commented upon specific allegations we do not consider it necessary to explore what may appear to be inconsistencies in some of these accounts. This is because we are entirely satisfied that, as he admitted, Fr Smyth sexually abused a great many children, some of whom were abused by him when they were resident in those residential homes in Northern Ireland which fall within our Terms of Reference.

The Effect of Fr Smyth's Abuse on his Victims

109 Fr Smyth abused a great many children in different ways. Irrespective of what he may have done to each individual child, the effect on each of them will undoubtedly have been significant in later years. Perhaps the remarks of Fr William Fitzgerald to the Inquiry[96] apply to all those whose lives Fr Smyth blighted by his actions, and who have to live with the effects of their experiences at his hands for many years, if not for the rest of their lives.

> "...the youngest victim of Brendan Smyth that I know of is 28-years-of-age. She is going to be around for another 60 years maybe or longer, and every day of her life the horrible spectre of that man will be in her mind and what he did. How can -- how can anyone return anything to – I mean, like give her €100 million. It would do nothing to repair any damage that has been done to her. It's unspeakable, unspeakable."

110 The evidence which we have reviewed leaves us in no doubt that over many years the Norbertine Order, and others within the Roman Catholic Church, failed to take determined and vigorous steps to ensure that Fr Smyth would never abuse more children. We regard it as particularly significant that the existing Canon Law procedures that could have been invoked to bring his crimes to an end were resorted to on only one occasion, namely during the Kilmore investigation of March and April 1975. Even in that instance steps to have Fr Smyth laicised were not taken. For the Norbertine Order, and for others outside the Order in positions of responsibility in the Church, their overriding priority throughout was to protect the good name of the Church, and at all times to prioritise Fr Smyth's interests, instead of doing what was best for the children abused by him. By doing so they were prepared to ignore their responsibilities under the Canon Law of the Church, and their obligations under the criminal law, as well as their moral responsibilities to the victims of his abuse, thereby allowing him to continue to abuse children far and wide for many decades.

Findings of Systemic Failings

111 In this Chapter we have stated on each occasion when we consider there were systemic failings. Rather than repeat each finding we have summarised those findings below. As these are summaries, it should be appreciated that some headings may encompass several distinct findings of systemic failings of the same type. The Summary is not meant to replace those findings, and the individual findings represent our definitive findings.

The Norbertine Order

(1) Permitting Fr Smyth's ordination despite a clear warning from the Abbot General that Fr Smyth should not be ordained.

(2) Failing to:

(a) properly assess the grave risk Fr Smyth posed to children; and and/or

(b) warn the bishops of the dioceses to which he was sent in later years, namely

- Annan in the Diocese of Galloway
- Providence, Rhode Island, USA
- Fargo, North Dakota, USA.

(3) Taking deliberate decisions to withhold information about Fr Smyth's background when he was sent to other dioceses.

(4) Giving advice from the Abbot General that it was not necessary to send that information to other dioceses.

(5) Failing to act on credible reports of Fr Smyth's sexual abuse of children.

(6) Allowing repeated efforts to be made to 'cure' Fr Smyth by sending him for various forms of medical treatment on several occasions, even though it was clear from continuing complaints that, despite earlier treatments, he was continuing to abuse children.

(7) Failing to insist that he provided adequate information as to the nature and extent of his treatment, and the prognosis, from the various doctors who treated him.

(8) Deciding not to withdraw his access to a car, thereby enabling Fr Smyth to travel freely and abuse children in many homes and locations in both Northern Ireland and the Republic, even after he had been charged by the police in 1991.

(9) Failing to confine Fr Smyth to the Abbey in Kilnacrott and thereby keep him away from children.

(10) Failing to report Fr Smyth to the police and social services in either Northern Ireland or the Republic of Ireland, thereby preventing him from being prosecuted and convicted, and so enabling him to continue his abuse.

(11) Failing to have in place adequate procedures

  (a) to prevent Fr Smyth being ordained;

  (b) to have Fr Smyth reported to higher authority in the Order, and to the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes in Rome when the members of the Order received definite information that he was committing crimes against children.

(12) Failing to notify the bishops of the Diocese of Down and Connor and the Diocese of Kilmore of the dangers Fr Smyth posed to children in their dioceses when he was known, or suspected, to be going to these dioceses.

(13) Failing to vigorously pursue the existing procedures and to notify the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes of Fr Smyth's crimes.

Diocese of Kilmore

(1) Failing to notify the police and social services in the Republic of Ireland when the 1973 complaint was received, and failing to institute ecclesiastical proceedings against Fr Smyth at that time.

(2) Failing to have Brendan Boland's father in the room with the child whilst the child was being questioned; and in the case of FBS 39 failing to notify his parents of the alleged abuse, or to have his parents present during questioning. In both cases there was also a failure to follow up with the parents of each child how the child was reacting to the abuse afterwards.

(3) Failing to take all the steps open to the diocese to thoroughly investigate each allegation relating to Fr Smyth that came to its notice and to report the matter to the proper civil and ecclesiastical authorities on each occasion.

(4) Failing to inform the civil and ecclesiastical authorities in Belfast about what had, or may have happened, to the two named children from Belfast.

(5) Failing to report the allegations relating to Fr Smyth to the Congregation of Religious and for Secular Institutes.

(6) Failing to exercise sufficient pressure on Abbot Smith to take vigorous action against Fr Smyth, such as laicisation or restricting his freedom of movement.

(7) Failing to use the existing process properly by short-circuiting matters and proceeding directly to investigate Fr Smyth instead of referring the matter to the Archdiocese of Armagh.

(8) Failing to ensure that all Fr Smyth's ecclesiastical faculties were permanently withdrawn.

(9) When the faculties were renewed from year to year, failing to take proper steps to ensure that Fr Smyth was not still offending.

(10) Failing to warn other dioceses, and in particular the Diocese of Down and Connor, about the allegations so that they could take steps to protect the children in homes in their diocese from being abused by Fr Smyth.

The Diocese of Down and Connor

(1) The failures of SR 31 and SR 46 to report the complaints made to them about Fr Smyth to the mother superior.

(2) Failing to report the allegations against Fr Smyth to the social services and the police in Northern Ireland when they were received by the Diocese.

(3) Failing to institute a penal investigation or process against Fr Smyth in the Diocese of Down and Connor on the basis of the allegations of his abuse in that Diocese.

(4) Failing to exert greater pressure upon Abbot Smith in 1971, by (1) asking for urgent and immediate information, and for that to be confirmed; (2) threatening to institute the church inquiry process in Down and Connor against Fr Smyth as had been done in Kilmore by Bishop McKiernan.

The Sisters of Nazareth

(1) The failures of SR 31 and SR 46 to report what they had been told to the mother superior.

The De La Salle Order

(1) Failing to notify the police and social services in Northern Ireland of the allegations against Fr Smyth made to BR 1.

Chapter 11:

Module 3 – De La Salle Boys' Home, Rubane House

Introduction

1 The Inquiry devoted Module 3 to the examination of evidence relating to Rubane House (Rubane), a home run by The Institute of the Brothers of Christian Schools, a Roman Catholic male religious order, on behalf of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Down and Connor. The Institute of the Brothers of Christian Schools has always been best known throughout Ireland as the De La Salle Order and it will be referred to as the Order in this chapter of the report.

2 The Inquiry devoted 30 sitting days spread over eight sitting weeks to this module, commencing on 29 September 2014 and finishing on 17 December 2014. Fifty-seven former residents of Rubane applied to give evidence to the Statutory Inquiry and we heard oral evidence from 47 of them. The witness statements of six applicants were read to the Panel during Module 3: four were read because they were unable to attend for medical reasons;[1] and, sadly, two because the applicants died before they could give oral evidence[2].

3 The statements of two witnesses were also read because they had previously given evidence in person in Module 1, which dealt with the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Derry/Londonderry, and had only brief comments to make about their time in Rubane.[3]

4 We also heard evidence in Module 3 from two former residents of Rubane put forward as witnesses by the Order.[4] A statement from another witness[5] put forward by the Order was taken into account but we did not consider it necessary to ask him to give his evidence in person.

5 The statement of one witness[6] was discounted because he failed to attend to give evidence and provided no reason for his lack of attendance.

6 The evidence of four witnesses was heard in Module 4,[7] which dealt with the Sisters of Nazareth homes in Belfast, as these applicants had only brief comments to make about their time in Rubane. Three gave their evidence in person and the statement of the fourth was read because he was unable to attend for medical reasons.

7 Therefore, in total, the Inquiry had the benefit of receiving evidence from 60 former residents of Rubane. Twelve of these former residents were admitted to Rubane in the 1950s, 26 in the 1960s, seventeen in the 1970s and five in the 1980s.

8 The Order provided written responses to each witness statement and we took these responses into account. We also received written statements from nine current and former brothers of the Order[8] who lived and worked in Rubane and received oral evidence from five of these brothers.[9] BR 2 gave evidence on two occasions; on the first he responded to allegations made against him and on the second, as a former brother director of Rubane, he provided more general information about how the home operated and was managed.

9 Brother Pius McCarthy, the Provincial Secretary to the Order in Ireland from 1974 to 1976 and from 1995 until his death in May 2014 provided witness statements and helpful background material to the Inquiry. The current Irish Provincial, Brother Francis Manning, also provided written statements and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Order.

10 Four former members of lay staff who worked at Rubane[10] gave evidence in person to the Inquiry. The Inquiry was only able to locate one former member of lay staff DL 11 towards the end of the module. We accepted there were good reasons why he could not attend in person at short notice and took his written statement into account.

11 The Inquiry also considered statements from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) as the successor department to the Ministry of Home Affairs (MoHA) and the Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS), each of which had statutory responsibility for the registration and regulation of Rubane as a children's home. We heard oral evidence from Dr Hilary Harrison on behalf of the DHSSPS and from a former employee of the Social Work Advisory Group[11] who was involved in the regulation of Rubane.

12 The Health & Social Care Board (HSCB), as the successor to the various local or statutory authorities which had responsibilities for the care of children placed in Rubane, provided written evidence including statements from fifteen current and former social workers who had experience of Rubane and from Valerie Watt, the current Chief Executive of the HSCB. We considered these statements and asked for, and received, oral evidence from five of these individuals.[12]

13 Father Timothy Bartlett, Episcopal Vicar for Education and Director of Public Affairs for the Diocese of Down and Connor, provided statements and gave evidence in person on behalf of the Diocese.

14 We also considered documentation relating to police investigations and civil claims against the Order that identified 158 former residents of Rubane who did not apply to the Inquiry but who alleged similar types of physical and sexual abuse as that alleged by witnesses to the Inquiry. Counsel to the Inquiry brought relevant information from these investigations and civil proceedings to the attention of the Panel during the public hearings. Rubane was considered by the Committee of Inquiry into Children's Homes and Hostels chaired by His Honour Judge William Hughes (The Hughes Inquiry) and we considered the findings of that Inquiry in relation to Rubane.

15 We also considered written and oral closing submissions from the De La Salle Order, the DHSSPS, the HSCB and eight individuals[13] against whom allegations of abuse were made. In total, we considered almost 40,000 pages of documentation in this module, 20,000 pages of which was provided by the police.

16 We are grateful to all the individuals and organisations that provided evidence and we appreciate the full co-operation we received from the Order, which provided detailed statements and copies of relevant documentation in a timely manner. We are particularly grateful to BR 2 for providing personal diaries that he kept from 1968 to 1976[14] while working in Rubane, which helped to confirm the dates of particular events and provided a contemporaneous record of his life in Rubane and some of the challenges he faced working there.

17 Fifty of the 60 former residents of Rubane who gave evidence said that they suffered physical abuse by brothers and lay staff and observed other boys being subject to such abuse. Fifty one said they were sexually abused by staff and/or their peers in Rubane and that they were aware of other boys being subject to such abuse. We also heard evidence from former residents about emotional abuse, neglect and unacceptable practices that they say they experienced in Rubane. We have given careful consideration to the written and oral submissions from former residents, however in accordance with our general approach and our Terms of Reference, we do not propose to refer to each and every detailed allegation that was made, whether against an individual or the institution.

18 The Order has pointed out what it considers to be factual inaccuracies and inconsistencies in aspects of the evidence provided by some witnesses. It has also pointed out that some witnesses have increased the number and/or seriousness of their allegations from the time they were first interviewed about them by the police to what they alleged in subsequent police interviews, evidence for civil claims and evidence provided to this Inquiry. Individuals accused of abuse have queried the detail of allegations and the reliability, credibility and motivation of witnesses and have pointed out that memory can be affected by the lapse of time and the emotional content of memories.

19 We understand it is difficult for some people to recognise and try to come to terms with the abuse they suffered as children and that many find it hard to speak about it to others, particularly where the abuse was of a sexual nature. A number of witnesses in this module told us that it was only when they decided to come forward to give evidence to this Inquiry that they spoke for the first time to their partners and families about their experiences in Rubane.

20 The Inquiry noted inconsistencies in evidence and contrasting recollections and perceptions of the same events. The dates given by some witnesses for their stays in Rubane differed from those in the register. While there may have been occasions when inaccurate entries were made in the register, we are inclined to believe that contemporaneous written records are generally more likely to be correct. We also noted that some witnesses, including former residents, brothers and lay staff, were not able to remember some events or the full details of some situations because of the time that had elapsed since they occurred.

21 However, it is important to emphasise that the purpose of our consideration is to determine whether, and if so to what extent, there were systemic failings in the care provided in Rubane; therefore, it is not necessary for us to make specific findings in respect of every allegation.

22 Before considering the evidence from former residents, we will first set out background information about the establishment and development of Rubane as a children's home, the statutory and regulatory frameworks within which it operated, the governance and management arrangements that pertained and the daily routine that boys experienced in the home.

The De La Salle Order

23 The Order was founded in France in 1680. The founder, John Baptist de La Salle established the community of teaching brothers to provide education for the children of the working classes in France. At first the Order was confined to France, but at the time of the French Revolution the brothers were dispersed and established Provinces throughout the world. The Order opened a novitiate in Ireland in 1880 and in 1891 it established a college in Waterford for the training of brothers and lay teachers. Prior to 1947 there was only one Province covering England, the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. In 1947 the Irish Province became independent and responsible for schools and institutions in Ireland, north and south, including, in due course, Rubane House.

24 The head of the Order is known as the Superior General. The Superior General is based in Rome and is assisted by a group of councillors who together make up the General Council. Each Province has an appointed Provincial Superior (Provincial) who is delegated to run the Province in accordance with the Rules of the Order and each separate community or house has a Brother Superior or Brother Director. Since, in the main, Brother Director was the title used in Rubane for the brother who was the Head of the Community and the Officer in Charge of the Home, that is the title we will use in this report. During the thirty five years that Rubane operated as a children's home eight brothers were appointed as Brother Director and BR 2 held this role for three periods. Each Brother Director of Rubane was responsible to the brother who was Provincial of the Irish Province at the time of his tenure.

25 From October 1950 to September 1973 the Brother Director of Rubane was also the principal of the school in Rubane. On 1 September 1973, BR 4 was appointed principal of the school to enable BR 2 to concentrate on the management of the home and the leadership of the community of brothers. The pattern of appointing separate heads of education and care was adopted widely about this time throughout the United Kingdom in special residential schools and schools for young offenders. This arrangement of a separate brother, and eventually a lay person, being in charge of the school continued until the closure of Rubane.

26 All the brothers who worked in Rubane were governed by rules and regulations set out in two books, namely:

- Rules and Constitutions of the Brothers of the Christian Schools
- Book of Government of the Brothers of the Christian Schools.[15]

27 These rules set out clear and detailed instructions about how brothers should behave towards each other, the boys in their care and the general public. They also set out directions to brothers about self monitoring and correction, disclosure of failings to the community and management of any lack of adherence by themselves or other brothers to the rules. A specific obligation was placed on brothers to report a breach of rules or misconduct by another brother to the Brother Director or, where the Brother Director was the source of concern, to the Provincial.

28 Detailed arrangements were specified for each brother to report and provide feedback to the Provincial about their conduct and life and progress within the community through the submission of individual private letters on an annual basis and through individual interviews during visits of the Provincial or his assistant.

29 The Order informed the Inquiry that the Provincial of the Irish Province, or on some occasions his assistant, visited Rubane at least once a year for a three-day period. It explained that in addition to reviewing the conduct of the brothers and their life as a community the Provincial or his assistant would review the needs of the home in respect of staff and funding, talk with religious and lay staff and interact with the boys.[16]

30 A 'History of the House' was maintained by the brothers in Rubane and between 1952 and 1970 a record of important events, as required by the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952,[17] was also maintained. The Order has confirmed that both of these documents would have been available for inspection by the Provincial.

The establishment of Rubane House

31 St Patrick's Training School (St Patrick's) in Belfast was one of the institutions operated by the Order in Northern Ireland and we consider it in Chapter 12 of this report. It was run by the Order on behalf of the Roman Catholic diocese of Down and Connor and the Brother Director of that school in 1950 was BR 39. A special meeting of the Governing Board of St Patrick's was held on 31 March 1950 chaired by the Most Reverend Dr Mageean, the then Bishop of the Diocese of Down and Connor. The meeting was convened to discuss the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950[18] which was due to come into force on 1 April 1950, and in particular the provision within it for Welfare Authorities to establish and maintain homes for children who were subjects of care orders on a separate basis from those children who were regarded as junior offenders. The Governing Board of St Patrick's decided at this meeting that specific provision ought to be made for children of the Roman Catholic faith who were subjects of care orders.[19]

32 This decision was influenced by the concerns of BR 39 that some children were being placed inappropriately in St. Patrick's because of the lack of suitable alternative residential accommodation for Catholic boys, and because Nazareth Lodge, a residential home for Catholic boys situated in Belfast and run by the Sisters of Nazareth, was overcrowded.[20] The Inquiry's consideration of Nazareth Lodge is set out in Chapter 9 of this report.

33 In April 1950, Bishop Mageean formally asked the Order to send five brothers to run a voluntary home and orphanage in his diocese. On 25 May 1950, the diocese purchased a large Victorian mansion, Rubane House, farm buildings, a coach house and 250 acres of surrounding land for £32,500. The property was situated near the shores of Strangford Lough, near Kircubbin, County Down, approximately 22 miles from Belfast. Although the Order repaid the cost of the purchase with interest, the legal ownership of the House and land remained at all times with the diocese.[21] The diocese and the Order entered into a formal agreement about the operation and management of Rubane House on 3 October 1950.[22]

34 Under the terms of the agreement the diocese remained responsible for the premises, property and buildings while the running of the house and its finances, together with the 250 acre farm, were the responsibility of the Brother Director. The Order was responsible for appointing the Brother Director and the brothers required to assist him. Provision was made for a chaplain to be appointed by the bishop. Apart from the chaplain, the Brother Director had power to appoint and discharge other officials 'with the sanction of the committee'.[23] The agreement required the Brother Director to keep audited accounts, and to submit a financial statement and general report to the committee of management each year. He was subject to a further restriction that the bank account of the home had to be operated by him and one other committee member.

35 Somewhat confusingly, the terminology used in annual reports and other documents thereafter does not precisely mirror the terminology of the agreement. There are references to the 'Governing Board' and not the 'Committee of Management', and later the term 'Board of Governors' was used. Since in the main the term 'Governing Board' was used that is the term we use in this report.

36 On 6 May 1950, BR 39 submitted an application to the MoHA for Rubane to be registered as a voluntary home for up to 70 children. In an accompanying letter BR 39 asked for financial support from the MoHA to make alterations and improvements to the buildings in Rubane to make them suitable for accommodating children.[24]

37 On 22 August 1950, the MoHA wrote to the Ministry of Education to confirm it was approving Rubane House as a children's home initially for 30 children, with the expectation that it would accommodate 60 children once it was fully operational. The MoHA also confirmed that it supported the proposed establishment of a voluntary primary school within the home.[25] The MoHA's decision to approve Rubane with the intention that in time it would accommodate 60 children is surprising, given the policy agenda that was being developed at that time for residential care of children in Northern Ireland. As referred to above, the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) had come into force in 1950 and Voluntary Homes Regulations to support it were being developed and were published in 1952.[26] In September of 1952 Home Office guidance on residential child care was circulated to all voluntary agencies providing such care in Northern Ireland.[27] The policy direction in this guidance, and in the legislation, and its associated regulations was towards giving priority to foster care and placing children in smaller children's homes where residential care was considered necessary. The Home Office guidance clearly disapproved of large homes and even contained an appendix with advice on breaking large homes up into smaller 'family' units.[28]

38 BR 39 had planned to initially accommodate 40 boys in Rubane. However, a note of a meeting that officials from the MoHA had with him in November 1950 records he was told that:

> "…on the basis of present arrangements, the number of boys to be accommodated should be up to a maximum of 30. Later on when further adaptations had been carried out consideration could be given to the question of raising the maximum."[29]

39 The first meeting of the governing board of Rubane House was held on 27 September 1950.[30] It was presided over by Dr.Mageean and attended by two Parish Priests and three priests from the Diocese appointed to the governing board by the Bishop. BR 19 the Irish Provincial at that time, BR 12 who was the first Brother Director of the Rubane community and BR 39 also attended the first meeting.

40 The membership of the governing board changed over the years but the chair was always the current Bishop of Down and Connor and the membership always consisted of De La Salle brothers and members of the clergy of the Diocese appointed by the bishop. When the bishop did not attend a meeting one of the senior clergy members chaired the meeting on his behalf.

41 The governing board met on 31 occasions from 1950 to 1985. The format for the meetings was that an annual general report and a financial statement for the preceding year from the Brother Director of Rubane were presented followed by a discussion of matters arising from these reports, identification of agreed action and approval of any related financial outlay.

42 It is clear from the minutes of the meetings that in line with the formal agreement between the diocese and the Order the focus was on practical matters to do with the establishment and development of the home, such as how the accommodation should be extended, funding applications, the management of the farm and the income achieved from it.

43 The copies of the annual general reports from Brother Directors that we have seen provide information about the occupancy levels in the home, but contain only brief and mostly positive comments about the direct care and condition of the boys. For example, the Annual General Report presented in February 1953 states:

> "...there is an excellent spirit among the boys who are very healthy and apparently very happy and content at Rubane. As the day's routine is well balanced as regards schooling, work and play this happy spirit is only to be expected."[31]

44 There are references in the annual general reports to visits from the MoHA and welfare authorities[32] but again these are brief and positive in tone and record officials expressing satisfaction with the health of the boys and appreciation of the work of the home. Although the Provincial or his assistant inspected the community, including the home, on an annual basis there are no references to the governing board receiving any feedback from these visits.

45 Therefore, it would appear that initially, in accordance with the agreement between the Diocese and the Order, the governing board was content to exercise its governance in relation to financial and practical matters and to leave the management and quality assurance of the care of the boys to the Order. However, as time goes on, it also considered and intervened in matters that had a direct bearing on the care of the children, such as the level of education that should be offered on site and the style of accommodation that should be provided.

46 At its meeting on 30 October 1951,[33] the governing board decided to establish a general purposes committee that would meet monthly to discuss any relevant matters that arose between the annual meetings of the governing board. The minutes of the governing board suggest it did not receive a formal report from the general purposes committee and from the Inquiry's sight of a small number of minutes of meetings of that committee it appears to have focussed on immediate practical matters, such as agreeing repairs to the greenhouses and deciding on the type of livestock to be kept. However, the annual report to the governing board on 13 March 1957 records that three boys resident in Rubane "were sent directly by the General Purposes Committee".[34] The Order was asked if it could explain this entry and it confirmed that it does not believe the general purposes committee had a role in the admission or approval of admission of boys to Rubane. However, it explained that members of the general purposes committee had roles within parishes or organisations, such as the St Vincent de Paul, which may have assisted with admission arrangements and that such involvement may account for the use of this wording in the annual report.

47 The Order informed the Inquiry that the general purposes committee met frequently over a ten-year period but that over the passage of time it became increasingly difficult for it to "render regular and useful assistance and eventually it lapsed as an effective body".[35] We could only find minutes for preliminary meetings in January and February 1952, a meeting in April 1953 which was not quorate and a record of formal letters of appointment to the committee being issued to members of the committee on 11 June 1953.[36] However, there are references in the History of the Home/Important Events Book to meetings of the committee in March, April, May and September of 1955. This suggests that the general purposes committee played only a limited role in the oversight of Rubane for the first few years, and even that limited role appears to have ceased completely by the late 1950s.

48 The first brothers arrived to live and work in Rubane on 1 October 1950, BR 12 was Brother Director and supervisor of the farm and BR 23 was Prefect, the title the Order used for brothers who were responsible for the care of children rather than teaching them.[37] An opening ceremony for the Home was held on 15 December 1950[38] and on 8 January 1951 the MoHA formally issued a certificate registering Rubane House as a voluntary home.[39] This meant that the home could admit boys and could apply for government funding to improve its facilities, as under Section

118 (1) of the Children Act 1950 grants to voluntary homes could only be awarded for the improvement of existing homes, not the establishment of new homes.[40]

Expansion of Rubane House

49 The first group of 16 boys arrived on 17 January 1951.[41] Four were supported by welfare authorities, one by the Ministry of Pensions and one was a voluntary admission. The other ten boys were boarded out from St Patrick's and six of them had previously been resident in Nazareth Lodge.[42] The welfare authorities were, therefore, only responsible for the financial support of a third of the first group of boys placed in Rubane.

50 Because most of the boys had previously been voluntary admissions to Nazareth Lodge, the Order had to look to Catholic organisations to assist in financing their care. The Order depended heavily on contributions from the Diocese of Down and Connor Orphan Society Fund and the St Vincent de Paul Society (SVP); for example, during the years Rubane was in operation, the SVP contributed approximately £54,000 towards the maintenance of boys on voluntary placements. It also depended on the fundraising of the De La Salle Voluntary Workers Committee, formed by BR 39, which over time contributed approximately £49,000 to the maintenance of boys in Rubane.[43] The farm on the site was also a source of income and the Order informed us that up until 1972 approximately £55,000 of proceeds from the farm went towards the home.[44]

51 By October 1951 there were 34 boys in the home, three over the maximum limit set by the MoHA in November 1950. Twenty had been admitted from St Patrick's, three were voluntary admissions and eleven children were placed there by welfare authorities.[45] By December 1952 the number of boys had increased to 40, ranging in age from eight to fifteen years.[46] In 1953 the annual transfer of boys from Nazareth Lodge commenced with 26 boys being transferred[47] and by December 1953 there were 46 boys in residence.

52 Therefore, after almost three years in operation the home had admitted over 50 per cent more boys than the maximum limit originally set by the MoHA. The Inquiry has seen no correspondence or notes of meetings between the MoHA and the Order to indicate this increase in admissions was sanctioned by the Ministry. This willingness of the governing board and the Order to accept more boys than the home was approved to accommodate or had the facilities to deal with established a pattern of overcrowding that continued for the next seventeen years.

53 Part of the pressure to admit boys was due to the pressing need to reduce over-crowding in Nazareth Lodge. Ms Forrest of the MoHA reported in a note of her visit to Nazareth Lodge in November 1955 that children from that home were being sent to Australia because Rubane "can't absorb all their output".[48] It also seems reasonable to assume that the Order would have been reluctant to turn down requests from welfare authorities to accommodate Catholic boys who were the subjects of care orders if the alternative was that they would have to be accommodated in statutory homes.

54 A factor which significantly affected the number of boys admitted to Rubane emerged in January 1954 when the Ministry of Education wrote to the Order to ask whether boys from Rubane would be attending the new secondary school in Portaferry.[49] This school had been built because of recent legislation that required children of eleven years to move from primary schools to receive intermediate level education at secondary schools.

55 Brothers met with the Assistant Secretary of the Ministry of Education in February 1954 to discuss this requirement and its implications for Rubane.[50] In March 1954 the Down County Education Department wrote to the Order to clarify that since the school at Portaferry had no provision for educationally sub-normal (ESN) children, children in Rubane who had been assessed as ESN should continue to be taught there.[51] The Order brought this matter to the attention of the governing board at its meeting on 30 March 1954 and the governing board decided it would be better for all the boys in Rubane to continue to be educated on site and that BR 12 should seek to have the school at Rubane approved for the provision of intermediate level education.[52]

56 Although the provision of education is not a matter for this Inquiry, the decision to seek approval for the provision of Intermediate level education at Rubane is significant because the Ministry of Education stipulated that Rubane would only be considered for the provision of that level of education if it had a roll of 120 pupils. This meant that Rubane would have to be able to accommodate that number of boys, a number far in excess of that contemplated by the MoHA when it registered the home. These decisions to extend the schooling on the premises and admit a larger number of boys also meant that Rubane was being developed as a hybrid type of establishment: part children's home, part ESN boarding school and part training school.

57 While the number of boys admitted to Rubane was steadily increasing, the Order was engaged in negotiations with the MoHA about how the property might be renovated and extended to provide additional and more appropriate accommodation. The MoHA gave its support to an initial proposal from the Order to renovate the steward's house on the farm to accommodate a further 24 boys.[53] However, the governing board at its meeting on 3 February 1953 turned down this proposal because it considered that accommodation for a further 50 boys, not just 24 boys, was needed to address the overcrowding in Nazareth Lodge.[54]

58 On 6 June 1953 BR 12 met with representatives from the MoHA to discuss renovating the outbuildings at Rubane to create new accommodation that would enable up to forty boys to be transferred from Nazareth Lodge. The MoHA's note of this discussion[55] records general agreement that there was no satisfactory alternative to Rubane for the Nazareth Lodge boys and that it was not appropriate for them to be brought up exclusively under feminine influence, as they would be if they remained in Nazareth Lodge. The MoHA accepted that, in order to address the overcrowding in Nazareth Lodge, Rubane would have to be approved to accommodate a total of 80 boys. Although the rationale for this decision is understandable it was completely incompatible with the MoHA's recently stated and circulated policy in favour of smaller children's homes. We consider that the failure of the MoHA to insist from the outset that Rubane be developed on the smaller children's home model was a significant factor in bringing about the understaffing and unsatisfactory accommodation that contributed to the systemic failings we identify later in this chapter.

59 It is recorded that the MoHA representatives at the meeting indicated they were hopeful that some grants would become available for making improvements to voluntary homes, if the homes could show their inability to defray the costs themselves, and that they advised BR 12 to submit plans for the necessary renovations. On 11 June 1953 the governing board discussed options for providing additional accommodation.[56] On 6 July 1953 the MoHA wrote to BR 12 confirming its approval in principle to Rubane accommodating 80 boys, and saying it would consider a grant application towards the costs of the renovations once plans were submitted.[57]

60 BR 12 submitted plans for renovations in September 1953[58] and officials from MOHA visited Rubane on 25 March 1954 to discuss the building of a new wing.[59] However, the governing board decided at its meeting of 30 March 1954 to put the plans on hold in order to explore whether the accommodation should be developed along the lines of a cottage system, which would allow the boys to live in smaller groups.[60] This decision by the governing board was in line with the guidance given by the Home Office about breaking larger homes into smaller units.

61 At its next meeting on 25 April 1955[61] the Governing Board asked BR 12 to inquire into the cost of renovations to provide cottage style accommodation for the boys. At its next meeting in March 1956 the board of management was informed that there were 49 boys in residence and it agreed that a new house could be built for the chaplain in order that the accommodation he was using could be used to accommodate a further sixteen boys.[62]

62 BR 17 was appointed as the Brother Director in September 1956.[63] In his annual report to the governing board at its meeting in March 1957 he confirmed that the number of boys in residence had increased to 63 and that renovations had been completed to provide new accommodation for the chaplain and additional accommodation for "an extra dozen or so children".[64]

63 Although the governing board put the plans for more extensive renovations on hold while the appropriateness of a cottage style system was explored, the Order appeared to take the MoHA's approval in principle that Rubane could accommodate 80 boys, once necessary renovations had been completed, as implicit permission to continue to increase the number of admissions. MoHA officials did not initially object to this increase; Dr Simpson and Ms Wright of MoHA inspected Rubane on 3 October 1957 and recorded that the steward's house was being used to accommodate 27 beds and that with the 44 beds available in the main house this meant Rubane now had a total of 71 beds.[65]

64 On 18 October 1957 BR 39 and BR 13 met with the MoHA officials to discuss possible grants for renovations in Rubane. MoHA officials record in their note of that meeting that without any grant from public funds the number of places available at Rubane had been increased from 30 to 71 places.[66] There is no suggestion of the MoHA approving this increase in admissions and no comment on whether the available accommodation was adequate for the increased number of boys.

65 The MoHA's willingness to give implicit approval to increased occupancy levels at Rubane appears to stem from the fact that the renovations undertaken to provide further accommodation had been paid for without the assistance of public funding. This reasoning, and the feelings behind it, were evident in a memo presumably from a senior civil servant (the signature on the memo is illegible) that was sent to the then Minister of Home Affairs, Walter Topping, to report on the meeting officials had with the Order on 18 October 1957. The author expressed frustration about the Catholic Church's unwillingness to give welfare homes a fair trial and aired his suspicion that the orders wanted to keep their numbers up so that funding for schooling provided alongside homes was maintained. He concluded the memo with the view:

> "I think the remedy lies with the Roman Church. If it is the determined policy of that Church to foster Voluntary Homes to the exclusion of the Welfare Authorities then they must be prepared to do so at their own expense."[67]

66 It was only once officials found 78 boys in residence, when they inspected Rubane in October 1959,[68] that the MoHA intervened about occupancy levels. A terse letter was sent to BR 17 on 12 November 1959 stating that the numbers must be reduced to a limit of 71, the limit the MoHA had implicitly accepted during its inspection of the home in October 1975, and that he should ensure in future that that limit was not exceeded except for periods of a few days in cases of exceptional emergency.[69] Despite this letter, at the next inspection in April 1960 officials found that the number of boys had increased by one to 79.[70]

67 In December 1960, six and a half years after the governing board first discussed introducing a cottage system it agreed that plans should be progressed to introduce such accommodation together with a central dining room and kitchen.[71] This decision was followed by a prolonged series of discussions between the MoHA, the Order and the governing board about what renovations should be undertaken and what element of them might attract public funding in view of the Government's policy that funding would be granted towards the costs of building new accommodation to replace old buildings but would not be granted to increase occupancy levels. In a MoHA note about these discussions officials recorded:

> "...in recent years both we and the Ministry of Education have made many concessions as the need for improvements at Rubane became more urgent and the willingness and ability of managers to proceed with these improvements on their own more uncertain."[72]

68 While these negotiations were ongoing, the number of boys in Rubane continued to increase. In a letter of 7 February 1961 to the Provincial (which is unsigned but we assume is from BR 17) it is reported that 82 boys were residing in accommodation for 70 boys and six urgent cases were seeking admission. BR 17 described the accommodation as "bursting at the seams" and there being "intolerable congestion."[73]

69 By 1 September 1961 there were 86 boys living in Rubane.[74] In a memo to her seniors, Ms Forrest of the MoHA stated that improvements were needed to the facilities in Rubane to make them suitable to accommodate the existing supposed limit of 71 boys:

> "The present accommodation is unsuitable and inadequate for 71 in respect of cooking and dining, inadequate in respect of sleeping and sanitation and non-existent in respect of recreation."[75]

70 She explained in an appendix to her memo that in order to accommodate the 86 boys resident in Rubane:

> "…boys are sleeping in rooms previously used as drying and recreation rooms…the accommodation equates to holiday camp accommodation but is not suitable for permanent occupation."[76]

71 As a result of Ms Forrest's concerns, a further formal letter was sent to BR 17 on 6 September 1961 from Mr McGrath of the MoHA which stated he was directed by the Minister of Home Affairs to say no more admissions must be accepted to Rubane and no vacancies must be filled until the numbers were reduced to 71 boys. A hand-written note on the copy letter indicates that Mr McGrath spoke to BR 17 "to soften the blow" and let him know that Ms Forrest and Ms Wright would visit.[77]

72 In August 1962, there were significant changes in the governance of Rubane following the death of Dr Mageean. The new Bishop of Down and Connor, Dr Philbin, took over as chair of the governing board and BR 6 replaced BR 17 as the Brother Director.[78]

73 Just before he left Rubane, BR 17 wrote to the MoHA on 27 August 1962 to confirm that the governing board wished to build three chalets to house ten boys each, thereby bringing the available beds up to 100, and that the long-term plan was to eventually house all 100 boys in ten chalets.[79]

74 The need for the accommodation plans to be agreed and progressed was further highlighted when Ms Forrest and Ms Hill inspected Rubane on 14 November 1962 and found acute overcrowding in the dormitories. Five rooms contained 52 beds in the main house, and four rooms contained 31 beds in the steward's house: 83 beds in total, 81 of which were occupied.[80]

75 Overcrowding was not the only problem. Just as the accommodation had not been extended adequately to deal with the increased number of boys, neither had the staffing levels. Ms Forrest also recorded in her report of the inspection visit that there were seven brothers caring for 81 children, three of whom worked full-time as teachers and one who worked full-time on the farm plus a part-time matron. She contrasted these staffing levels with the Child Welfare Council's recommended staff child ratio of at least one member of staff to every six children aged over five years.[81] Implementation of that ratio in Rubane would have required the appointment of fourteen care staff, in addition to teachers and ancillary staff.

76 Following this inspection BR 39 and BR 6 were invited to a meeting in the MoHA where the need for improvements in the accommodation and in the staffing levels at Rubane was emphasised to them. The MoHA's note of this meeting records that the brothers expressed grave doubts about their ability to increase the staff ratio because the cost of renovations would stretch their resources.[82]

77 In February 1963, the MoHA responded to the proposals submitted by BR 17 to confirm it would be prepared to contribute to the cost of building three new chalets and to approve an occupancy level of 80 boys. It also indicated that the Department of Education would now be prepared to approve Rubane for the provision of intermediate level education if it achieved a roll of 80 boys.[83]

78 On 20 February 1963 the governing board met under the chairmanship of Bishop Philbin, and a number of grave doubts were aired concerning this proposal, including the excessive outlay, the supervision that could be provided in chalets and whether it would be possible to recruit housemothers. The governing board decided to set up a subcommittee to consider these matters in detail and to report back to it.[84]

79 Representatives from the governing board met with MoHA officials on 26 February 1963 to discuss their concerns, including their view that small bedrooms would provide opportunities for "undesirable practice"' between boys. They also made clear that the Order would not support brothers being replaced by care staff and working only as teachers; and, the diocese would not accept any lessening of the influence of the brothers. They asked the MoHA to consider contributing to the cost of building new large dormitory blocks rather than chalets.[85] The MoHA's note of this meeting recorded officials' surprise, and thinly veiled exasperation, at this proposal. It is recorded that officials pointed out to the representatives of the governing board that for the last eight years the discussions about extension to the accommodation at Rubane had always been on the basis of a chalet approach. Mr Parkes of the MoHA is recorded as saying that it would be unlikely the Ministry would fund developments it considered wrong, and that if the welfare authorities also considered the development of dormitory blocks was the wrong approach they might cease to use Rubane. He is recorded as going on to say that:

> "…it is doubtful if the Ministry would be justified in continuing to include in the Register of Voluntary Homes one which is staffed so inadequately at present."[86]

80 We assume this statement was an attempt to put pressure on the governing board to change its position about the planned accommodation. However, it is an important acknowledgement by the MoHA that it had the power to remove Rubane's registration and thereby its approval to operate as a children's home.

81 By September 1963 the governing board's plan had changed to building two cottages, each housing 20 boys in two dormitories.[87] Mr Parkes of the MoHA likened this proposal to a workhouse or an out-of-date training school.[88] In October 1963 he wrote to BR 6 and informed him that the plans could not be approved as they would not provide homely living arrangements for the boys. He also pointed out that the plans for staff accommodation did not suggest that the greatly-increased proportion of staff to children that the MoHA hoped for was included in the plans.[89]

BR 39 responded to this letter setting out the governing board's rationale for the proposal and although it is recorded in the "History of the Home" for 1963 that a number of meetings were held with MoHA officials to secure a grant for the proposed buildings no agreement was reached.[90]

82 On 14 November 1964 BR 6 wrote to the MoHA asking for the occupancy level in Rubane to be increased to 80 boys so that approval to offer intermediate level education could be achieved. Mr Parkes responded that the increase would be sanctioned, but only if agreement could be reached about plans for additional accommodation and assurances received that staffing levels would be improved.[91]

83 The description that BR 2 gave to the Inquiry about the conditions in Rubane when he arrived there in 1964 provides a good picture of how dire the environment was for the boys and the brothers while these prolonged discussions were going on:

> "Outwardly Rubane House itself gave an impression of stately grandeur but in reality it was rather primitive. Pre 1968 most of the boys were accommodated in the main House. The sleeping facilities consisted of four bedrooms upstairs containing ten beds in each. The five Brothers had a small single room each and one toilet and bathroom was shared by both boys and Brothers. On the ground floor there was another large bedroom used with one toilet for use of the boys and one Brother whose bedroom was close to the boys' room. There was no central heating in the house and heat was provided by a few electric heaters hung on the bedroom walls. The remainder of the boys slept in three rooms in the former farm manager's house at the bottom of the farmyard and were supervised by two Brothers whose bedrooms were located there. The kitchen and boys' dining room was located in the basement of the house as well as a common shower room. The conditions were sub-standard and Dickensian is the only word I can describe them. During meal times, the condensation was so bad that the walls were streaming with water. The laundry and clothing rooms were in an outhouse across the yard from the main house and on Friday/Saturday nights after showers, the boys had to run across the yard in their swim trunks and towels to get fresh clothing for the week. It seemed harsh at the time."[92]

BR 2 also commented:

> "The Home had as far as I am aware been inspected and approved by the Ministry of Home Affairs and they would have been aware of the extent and limitations of our facilities."[93]

84 Finally during 1965 plans for cottage/chalet style accommodation were prepared and submitted to the MoHA followed by a formal funding application. In May 1967 the MoHA agreed to offer a grant of £50,000 towards the costs, subject to the amount being no more than 50% of the cost of the project and to a 40-year undertaking to repay the grant if the home were to close.[94] On 20 August 1968 the boys moved into the first chalets.[95] The second group of chalets was completed in March 1969 and in July 1970 78 boys were accommodated at Rubane.[96] This meant the home was operating within the approved occupancy limit of 80 boys.

85 The opening of the chalets heralded the introduction of lay care staff in Rubane. Although ancillary domestic staff had been employed from 1963, the care of the boys was exclusively provided by brothers until the chalets were opened. In 1968, two married couples, DL 134 and DL 135 and DL 303 and DL 115 and two nuns SR 32 and SR 57 were employed as house parents and SR 33 and DL 1 were employed as part-time care staff.[97] Despite this increase in staffing, BR 2, BR 3 and BR 11 had to continue to carry teaching and care duties; only BR 15 as a prefect was exclusively involved in the provision of care.

86 We consider that the persistent overcrowding, breaching of the approved occupancy numbers, inadequate accommodation and facilities and under-staffing which were allowed to continue in Rubane for seventeen years adversely affected the care and condition of the boys and the ability of the brothers to provide good quality care. Also, as we will consider later in this chapter, these conditions significantly contributed to the creation of an environment and culture that allowed the physical and sexual abuse of boys to occur and go unchecked.

87 We consider that the MoHA, the Diocese as represented by the Governing Board and the Order contributed to a systemic failing to ensure the institution provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while over-crowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels in Rubane became more inadequate and unsatisfactory.

94 RUB 10444-10445.
95 RUB 10114.
96 RUB 10621.
97 RUB 11828.

88 We also consider it a systemic failure in the governance arrangements for Rubane that while these prolonged discussions were ongoing the Governing Board only met annually and left the detailed negotiations to the Order. While it expected the Order to conduct the negotiations with the MoHA it exercised its ultimate say and intervened late in the process to query an approach to the development of the home which had been planned and discussed for almost eight years. We do not accept that a change in personnel justified such a radical attempt to revert to an outdated and discredited view of child care accommodation.

89 We agreed with Father Bartlett's comments about the Diocese's role in these matters when he gave evidence to the Inquiry:

> "...having looked at that debate between the State and the church about the change of the type of care, it does strike me that the church was claiming a competence that it didn't necessarily have. I don't know on what basis the church could have claimed to be an expert on residential care of children other than from its experience of running boarding schools, for example, but that was not the particular environment that we were dealing with here."[98]

90 We also consider that these prolonged discussions highlight a systemic failure by the Diocese, the Order and the MoHA as the registering body to clarify the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care. In its submission to the Inquiry, the DHSSPS accepted that the MoHA did not engage sufficiently with the governing board.[99]

91 Improvements were made to the home from Rubane's own resources during this time, such as the renovation of outhouses in 1962 to provide a laundry and drying room and the decoration of bedrooms.[100] The brothers also built an outdoor swimming pool in 1959 with the help of the boys. However, these improvements were piecemeal in nature. We also noted that while the boys and the brothers were continuing to live in inadequate and overcrowded conditions resources were used to build two new bungalows, which were completed in May 1960 and occupied by a gardener and the woodwork teacher,[101] and that in the summer of 1961 the chapel was extended to provide a new sanctuary, choir wing and sacristy.[102]

92 Although the MoHA wrote to BR 17 on two occasions and met with BR 39 and BR 6 about the need to reduce the numbers it appears to have taken no effective follow-up action when the required reductions were not achieved. While we recognise that it would not have been easy to find accommodation for the large number of Catholic boys in Rubane at short notice we consider officials should and could have made more vigorous and assertive interventions to try and achieve improvements in staffing levels and accommodation than they did. For example, they could have summoned the chairman of the governing board and the Brother Director to Stormont to insist on a reduction in numbers and/or could have instructed the welfare authorities that no further admissions should be arranged until the numbers in Rubane reduced. In the ultimate analysis, the MoHA could have considered whether to withdraw the home's registration.

93 We consider that the MoHA's willingness to allow the numbers in Rubane to more than double from 30 to 71 within six years without requiring the necessary improvements to the facilities or increases in staffing levels to be a systemic failing to ensure the institution provided proper care. We accept that the MoHA was adhering to its policies for the administration of grants and understand why it was questioning the motivation for increasing the occupancy levels at Rubane. However, part of its acceptance of the increased occupancy levels appears to have been because they were achieved without State funding. We consider this attitude amounts to a dereliction of its responsibility to ensure that there were proper facilities for the boys in Rubane, as well as ensuring that conditions in the home were of a similar standard to those provided for children in homes in the statutory sector.

94 The number of placements funded by welfare authorities increased during this period, but we found no evidence of welfare authorities querying the facilities in Rubane or deciding not to send boys there because of the overcrowding. We consider the welfare authorities' apparent willingness to place boys in facilities which were clearly inadequate and poorly staffed to be a systemic failing to ensure proper care.

Inspection of Rubane

95 Another implication of the prolonged wait for improvements to the physical environment and staffing levels in Rubane is that these issues preoccupied MoHA officials when they inspected the home. It is clear from records and documents which the Inquiry has seen that officials from the MoHA maintained regular contact with Rubane House through formal inspections, formal and informal meetings and correspondence. It is also clear that the MoHA's officials' preoccupation with the physical environment in Rubane were grounded in concern for the boys. For example, it is recorded in the inspection report of 1962:

> "It was not an unusually cold day, but the damp chill of the basement wash-room was penetrating. Early morning ablutions in these conditions must be an endurance test."[103] and the inspection report of 1965 recorded that the "premises militate against a warm and homely life for the boys".[104]

96 However, the focus on these practical matters meant that comments about the direct care and condition of the boys were limited and tended to be superficial.

97 In 1955 Ms Wright of MoHA and Dr Simpson of the Ministry of Health reported that all the children in Rubane were happy and responsive and without exception looked healthy and well nourished. They commented on the happy atmosphere in the home and that the relationship between staff and boys was excellent.[105] In the report of her 1956 inspection, Ms Wright reported a happy atmosphere in the home and that the boys she observed at play all appeared healthy and well cared for and enjoyed a good variety of indoor and outdoor activity.[106]

98 In 1957 Ms Wright reported she saw the boys in their classrooms and they all appeared healthy and well cared for and were looking forward to their annual holiday.[107] In 1958 Ms Wright and Dr Simpson recorded that they saw boys playing basket ball at the side of the house and they looked in good health and continued to enjoy a good variety of outdoor play activity.[108]

99 In 1959 Ms Wright and Dr Simpson commented on the educational level of some of the boys and how much the boys had enjoyed the new swimming pool during the previous summer period.[109]

100 There are two references in inspection reports we have seen to the use of corporal punishment. In May 1955 Ms Forrest reported that corporal punishment was only occasionally inflicted and none had so far been recorded in that year. In April 1956 Ms Wright reported that several cases of corporal punishment had been recorded, mainly for absconding.

101 There are some examples of more critical comments about the care and condition of the boys. For example, in 1962 Ms Forrest and Ms Hill reported that although all the boys were in good health and relaxing after school:

> "…many looked pinched and cold; their clothing in many instances was in very bad order, threadbare and torn, and affording little protection against the weather."[110]

102 In the reports of all these inspections, alongside the brief observations about the boys there is much more detail about overcrowding, staffing levels and planned renovations. As we will consider later in this chapter, witnesses who were resident in Rubane during the time of these inspections gave consistent accounts to us of a harsh regime of chastisement and physical and sexual abuse by certain brothers. It may be that if the inspectors had been less preoccupied with the need for physical improvements and had spent more time considering the care the boys were receiving and talking directly to them this abuse could have been uncovered. We recognise that boys may have been too unsure of inspectors who were not regular visitors to confide in them and may have been scared of possible repercussions from the brothers. It may also be the case that the implicit trust placed in faith-based care would have prevented inspectors questioning the work and conduct of the brothers. However, it is our view that the preoccupation with practical matters meant that opportunities for closer inspection of the quality of care provided in Rubane were lost.

Adherence to regulations

103 The Children and Young Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1950 and the Regulations issued to support its implementation, the Children and Young

109 RUB 10213/4.
110 RUB 11869.

Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1952[111] set requirements to be met by the "administering authority" of homes, which was defined in Regulation 3 (1) as "the person or persons carrying on the voluntary home". Regulation 4 (2) was one of the most important of these regulations in relation to the care and welfare of children in voluntary homes. It required:

> "The administering authority shall make arrangements for the home to be visited at least once in every month by a person who shall satisfy himself whether the home is conducted in the interests of the well-being of the children, and shall report to the administering authority upon his visit and shall enter in the record book referred to in the Schedule hereto his name and the date of his visit."[112]

104 This requirement was intended to provide an external presence to monitor and observe the care being provided for children. It was important and not a formality, because as Dr Harrison pointed out in her evidence:

> "…the purpose of those visits was particularly within the regulations to report on the welfare of children. Now you could not do that without seeing children and being aware of their general or physical appearance even if they -- even if they are not engaging with you in conversation, but, you know, you would certainly be aware of the physical appearance of the children."[113]

105 Despite the importance of this regulation and its statutory basis the first attempt at introducing a monthly visitor in Rubane was made in 1978, 26 years after the regulation came into force.

106 We concluded that the primary reason for this lack of adherence was that while the regulations envisaged one administering authority for each home the operational and governance arrangements in Rubane meant that responsibilities were shared between the Diocese and the Order. As previously explained the Diocese asked the Order to run the home on its behalf and the subsequent agreement that it entered into with the Order in 1950 specified that whilst the Diocese remained responsible for the premises, property and buildings, the Order would provide the staff and appoint the Brother Director who would be responsible for the day to day running of the home.

113 Day 77, pages 164 – 165.

107 From the beginning, the Order took the lead in communications and negotiations with the MoHA; it was BR 39 who made the application to the Ministry in May 1950 that the home be registered under the 1950 Act. In the accompanying form it was "The De La Salle Brothers, Milltown" who were described as the "organisation or society in charge", and BR 39 was named as "the person in charge of the home".[114] Almost invariably, it was the Brother Director who dealt directly with the MoHA over the many matters relating to the running of the home, particularly regarding the number of boys in the home and financial support in the form of grants. The Order accepts this and acknowledged in its evidence to the Inquiry that > "…it had day to day control of operations on the ground and was therefore the only organisation who could actually comply with many of the [1952] regulations on a practical level".[115]

108 The regulations placed responsibility on the administering authority to appoint "a person to be in charge of the home" (Regulation 5 (1)) and placed responsibility on the officer in charge to ensure the home was conducted from day to day in such a way as to "further the wellbeing of the children in the home". The Order accepted in its evidence to the Inquiry that "The Director was effectively the 'officer in charge'.[116] Therefore in its appointment of the Brother Director it was fulfilling an important aspect of the role of the administering authority. The order asserted in its evidence to the Inquiry that appointments to the position of Brother Director were subject to the approval of the bishop. However, no evidence to that effect has been produced, and the need for such approval would have been incompatible with the 1950 Agreement.

109 The importance of the position of officer in charge was underlined by Regulation 15, which required the administering authority to notify the Ministry when the person in charge of the home ceased to be in charge of that home and a new appointment was made. Again it was the Order that met this responsibility of the administering authority and informed the MoHA of changes of Brother Director.[117]

110 Although it met these aspects of the responsibilities of the role of the administering authority the Order's position is that it ran the home at the request of, and for the purposes of, the Diocese, and it operated under a degree of supervision of the Diocese through the governing board and in time the management committee. Therefore, the Order asserts since the bishop had overall responsibility for the home he was the "administering authority" and so it was the Diocese that was "carrying on" the home.[118]

111 We agree that, despite the Order fulfilling aspects of the role of the administering authority, the ultimate control over the home remained with the Diocese throughout. The Diocese retained overall responsibility for the governance of the home and the governing board did not reserve its authority to matters to do with the premises, property and buildings as per the agreement. For example, at its fifth meeting it took the decision in principle to admit boys from welfare authorities and to charge a £3 a week maintenance fee for such placements.[119] It had the decisive voice in many areas of the running of the home. A notable example of this was the intervention of the Diocese in February 1963[120] at a very late stage in protracted discussions between the MoHA and the Order in an attempt to prevent the creation of chalet-style accommodation for the boys. Another example was the suspension of the Brother Director, BR 1, by the bishop in 1980 and the ultimate exercise of its authority was the governing board's decision in 1985 that Rubane should cease to operate as a children's home.[121]

112 In its evidence to the Inquiry, the Diocese acknowledged its responsibilities in this regard and accepted that it was the administering authority throughout Rubane's existence. However, Fr Bartlett also referred to the Diocese and the Order being "joint administering authorities" wherein neither the Diocese nor the De La Salle congregation were in a position of sole control.[122] We consider that this is a more accurate description of the actual arrangements.

113 We could find no evidence of the governing board or the Order considering what implications the regulations had for the dual structure in place in Rubane where responsibility and control were jointly exercised by the Diocese and the Order. The first meeting of the governing board after the publication of the regulations took place on 3 February 1953 and there is no reference in the minutes of that meeting to the regulations and therefore no attempt to clarify who was the authorising authority or how the associated responsibilities, including the appointment of the monthly visitor, would be met. We consider that the Diocese and the Order had shared responsibility to pay proper regard to and meet statutory regulations, clarify who was the administering authority for Rubane, and appoint a monthly visitor, and that they both failed to meet that responsibility.

114 This situation could have been rectified if the MoHA, through its inspections of the home, had sought clarity in relation to who was acting as the administering authority and enforced the statutory requirement for appointment of a monthly visitor. However, we have seen no reference to the administering authority in inspection reports of Rubane and only one reference related to monthly visiting. The report of the inspection of Rubane House undertaken by Ms Wright and Dr Simpson in 1955 was presented in a pro forma style with set headings that specified what matters should be reported on.[123] This contrasts with the other reports of the inspections carried out by MoHA officials in Rubane that we have seen which are in the form of internal memos, some of them handwritten. As part of the pro forma used in 1955, inspectors were asked to report on the work of visiting committees.

115 Under this section of the pro forma Ms Wright and Dr Simpson recorded that there was a board of management but no visiting committee.[124] There is no further comment on whether the board of management was undertaking the role of a visiting committee, or whether the lack of such a committee and thereby the failure to appoint a monthly visitor was discussed with the brothers or the governing board. Ms Wright inspected Rubane the following year and there is no indication in her report, which reverted to a free-style format, that she raised the lack of a monthly visitor in that inspection. In later years when SWAG undertook inspections of voluntary children's homes they used a more standardised approach to inspections and reporting on findings. However, although monthly visiting was retained as a requirement when the regulations were revised in 1975, we found no evidence of SWAG inspectors monitoring adherence to it. We consider this lack of enforcement of statutory regulations to be a systemic failing by the MoHA and its successor bodies to properly promote and enforce government policy and to ensure that Rubane provided proper care.

123 RUB 10191/4.

116 In its closing submission to the module the DHSSPS accepted this failing:

> "It has been acknowledged above that the administering authority whatever its identity, did not comply with Regulation 4 of the 1952 Regulations. Equally, it is recognised that there was a duty upon the Department to ensure that there was such compliance and that the Department failed to discharge that duty. Even as late as 1981 when the Social Work Advisory Group undertook an in-depth investigation at Rubane, the failure of the administering authority to carry out its obligations under the 1952 Regulations was not recognised or noted."[125]

117 We agree with Dr Hilary Harrison's acknowledgement in her statement on behalf of the DHSSPS that officials' failure to ensure that statutory requirements were being met and to engage with the governing board were shortcomings that are likely to have "contributed to a system that failed a significant number of children".[126]

118 The failure to appoint a monthly visitor removed a crucial part of the mechanism that was designed to provide regular external monitoring of the standard of child care being provided in the home. We consider that the failure for many years by the MoHA, the Diocese and the Order to make sure that monthly visiting as required by the Regulations was taking place amounts to a systemic failing by each of them to ensure that the home provided proper care.

119 It was not until 1978 and the establishment of a management committee that some attempts were made to establish monthly visiting.

Management committee

120 With the demise of the general purposes committee in approximately 1961 there was a period of approximately seventeen years when the Diocese's contribution to the formal governance of Rubane was limited to its chairing and membership of the governing board. However, this changed significantly when the governing board decided at its meeting in November 1978 to approve the establishment of a management committee.[127]

125 RUB 9312/3.
126 RUB 5964.
127 RUB 5229.

121 The minutes of that meeting recorded that the management committee was to be entirely advisory and "to act as a back up to the Brother Director in any difficulties that might arise." However, in its statement to us the Order indicated that the management committee's role was both executive and advisory and that its primary function was "to supervise the management of the Home and to advise the Officer in Charge in all matters pertaining thereto."[128] We are of the view that whatever the original intention, the minutes of the management committee record a level of involvement in the running of the home that went well beyond the provision of advice and that the committee took on an executive and supervisory role.

122 The first meeting of the management committee was held on 5 February 1979;[129] it was chaired by Very Reverend McCann and the other members were Very Reverend Kevin Donnelly PP, Very Reverend Hugh Starkey PP, Rev John O'Connor, Mrs Mary Nihill, a lay magistrate of long years standing in the juvenile courts of summary jurisdiction in Northern Ireland. At the first meeting Mrs Nihill was appointed vice chairman of the committee and BR 6 was appointed as secretary.

123 The Order told the Inquiry that the management committee was responsible to the governing board and that it met a minimum of six times a year. However, we found no evidence of a formal reporting line between the governing board and the management committee; there was no record of the management committee submitting its minutes or a report of its work to the annual meetings of the governing board.

124 Also, from the Inquiry's review of the minutes of the committee it appears that it only met six times in 1980. It met five times in 1979, 1982 and 1983, four times in 1981 and 1984 and three times in 1985. The final and 32nd meeting of the committee was held on 29 April 1985.

125 In contrast to the governing board and the general purposes committee the management committee did concern itself with the quality of the care being provided to the boys. At its first meeting, Father O'Connor was asked to outline the most important functions of children's homes and he emphasised the need for a child-centred approach and for the quality of care to be analysed and constantly kept under review. He also spoke of the importance of the Catholic voluntary sector being able to offer a service as good if not better that that provided in state institutions.[130]

126 It is clear from the minutes of the meetings of the management committee that its focus on ensuring the quality of care was on supporting and monitoring the performance of lay care staff. The committee was responsible for setting the terms and conditions of service for these staff, assisting in their appointment and deciding whether they had successfully completed their probationary periods. It intervened directly in matters to do with discipline of lay staff and their grievances, however the appointment of brothers and the allocation and management of their work continued to be a matter for the Order. This appears to stem from the dual structure for governance of Rubane created by the agreement between the Diocese and the Order. We are of the view that this was an unsatisfactory arrangement and that the whole of the management of the home should have been in the purview of the management committee, even if the Order allocated the brothers to work in Rubane.

127 It was at its third meeting on 29 May 1979[131] that the committee agreed that between meetings members should make informal visits to the home, speak to staff and inspect various parts of the building. At its next meeting, on 11 September 1979,[132] the vice chairman reported back on her visit to inspect the kitchens and the committee agreed that it would be impressed on staff that they should feel free to approach members of the committee at any time and that any points they wished to raise would be given the greatest sympathy and understanding. We noted that there is no reference at this time to the boys being told that they should feel free to approach the management committee members.

128 The management committee only received three further reports of visits. Mrs Nihill reported in November 1979[133] on her visit to inspect the sleeping accommodation and wash areas and in November 1980[134] about her second visit to the kitchens. Father McCann, Father Donnelly and Mrs Nihill reported to the committee at its meeting on 5 April 1982 on what they described as an inspection they had undertaken of the chalets.[135] Mrs Nihill's reports of her visits indicate that she focused on the adequacy of the facilities while the report of the inspection of the chalets records that the three committee members met with staff in the chalets and discussed their work with them. There is no mention in any of these reports of committee members meeting with or observing the boys. However, during the inspection of the chalets DL 11 raised the issue of his time with his family in his private quarters being disturbed by the level of noise coming from the boys' quarters and the committee subsequently decided that residential staff should be asked to seek outside accommodation in the best interests of the children of the home.

129 A two-year gap followed before any more formal visits were arranged. However, we accept the evidence from the Order that management committee members and in particular the chairman of the committee visited Rubane regularly between committee meetings, although this was primarily to meet with staff. In May 1984 the management committee made a second attempt to introduce regular visits to the home. The minutes of its meeting on 8 May 1984 record that "in the spirit of the Monitoring of Residential Care Service in the Home", a member should be appointed to make regular visitation in a formal and voluntary capacity. This time the committee agreed that the boys as well as the staff should be made aware of the visits and told they would have free access to the visitor and could "make known their wants or air any matter of grievance."[136]

130 The commencement of these visits was delayed because the vice chairman, Mrs Nihill, who was selected to carry out the visits, subsequently resigned from the management committee and it took some time until her replacement, Mrs Keating, joined the committee. Mrs Keating visited the chalets on 26 and 28 February 1985 and reported to the Committee at its meeting in March 1985, that she met with ten boys and told them that:

> "...they should feel free to approach her on anything that might be preying on their minds, any complaints, request or suggestions they would like to make."[137]

The Committee agreed that in order to facilitate the boys' access to Mrs Keating she would visit on the first Tuesday of every month. It is also recorded at that meeting that the parish priest and curate had agreed to pass on to the committee any complaint which the boys might convey to them.

131 These arrangements were being put in place 33 years after the regulation requiring monthly visits was introduced. Mr Bunting, who was an assistant director in the Eastern Health and Social Services Board (EHSSB) in the 1980s, spoke in his evidence to the Inquiry about the value of monthly visiting and how it provided safeguards for the children resident in statutory homes run by the EHSSB.[138] Given that some of the children in Rubane had no families, and a number of witnesses referred to the difficulties their family members faced in visiting Rubane because of its isolated location, it would have been particularly valuable if regular monthly monitoring visits to Rubane focussing on the wellbeing of the children had taken place.

132 We cannot say what difference monthly visits would have made in Rubane or whether the boys would have been willing to engage with a visitor and would have been better protected through doing so. However, there is no doubt that a regulatory measure introduced to promote the wellbeing of children and increase their protection was not implemented in Rubane as it should have been.

Falling intakes to Rubane House

133 Although the management committee focused on the provision of care in Rubane it also had to concentrate from its first meeting on the falling intakes to Rubane and the implications this had for the continued viability of the home.

134 In July 1971 BR 2 had been promoted to the role of Brother Director in Rubane.[139] While previous Brother Directors oversaw steady increases in the number of boys admitted to Rubane, BR 2 had to deal with declining numbers while trying to reduce the debts incurred through the building of the new chalets.

135 Over the years, the number of boys placed in Rubane by welfare authorities had steadily increased and in his new role BR 2 decided to ask relevant welfare authorities to take on the support of the remaining twenty boys who had been placed in Rubane on a voluntary basis. He explained in a letter to a colleague in October 1973 that he took this step because of the burden of repaying the debt incurred through the renovation work and building of the chalets and the increased costs of maintaining the property. He explained that the welfare authorities' agreement to support the children meant that "the financial worries have eased considerably".[140]

138 Day 77, pp. 131-134.
139 RUB 11834.
140 RUB 10591.

136 We noted that Mr Bunting in a memo of 29 December 1971 to the city welfare officer about this matter advised that financial responsibility should be taken on for the boys, but with two important provisos: firstly, that the boys' files would be provided so that contact could be made with any families they might have and the possibility of rehabilitation explored; and, secondly, that it was made clear to the Order that future placements would have to be agreed in advance and that it would not be acceptable for the Order to accept voluntary placements and then expect the welfare authorities to fund them.[141] We consider it good practice that the welfare authorities were keen to prevent unnecessary admissions of children into care and wanted to be able to consider the circumstances of children and their families and whether other interventions might be possible.

137 The contribution of weekly maintenance fees from welfare authorities was very significant for the home's budget. Therefore, when reducing occupancy meant higher per capita costs it was necessary to ask for sharp increases in weekly fees. This meant that following modest increases from 1951 to 1971, the weekly fees were increased considerably in the next four and a half years, rising from £6 to £35.

138 By April 1973 there were only 60 boys in residence, although later that year the figures increased again and peaked at 80. However, by April 1974 the numbers had decreased to 69[142] and by September 1974 they had further decreased to 60 boys.[143]

139 The responsibility for the registration and regulation of voluntary homes for children transferred to the DHSS in January 1974 and it asked homes to review and confirm their occupancy limits. In recognition of the falling admissions, BR 2 responded and advised that the accommodation limit for Rubane should be reduced from 80 to 70.[144]

140 By December 1975 the regular annual transfer of approximately twelve boys from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane had stopped because Nazareth Lodge had developed the service it offered to enable family groups to stay together and children to have a stable placement in one home for as long as they needed residential care. This change had a significant impact on the numbers admitted to Rubane and by December 1976 the numbers had fallen to 46 and, as a result, one of the chalets was closed.

141 RUB 5670.
142 RUB 10635-10636.
143 RUB 10239.
144 RUB 10169.

141 The ending of the transfer of boys from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane also affected the length of time boys were staying in Rubane. Boys admitted from Nazareth Lodge were aged around eleven years and stayed typically four or five years, whereas from around 1975 onwards older boys admitted from the community typically stayed one or two years.

142 In addition to the impact of the changes in Nazareth Lodge there were a number of other policies that contributed to the reduction in admissions to Rubane. These included: an increased preference for fostering and smaller more family orientated homes; a greater emphasis on accommodating and caring for siblings together; and, residential care being increasingly used for brief placements to enable specific difficulties in a child's life to be addressed and to provide brief respite while foster care or return home was planned. NL 191, a social worker who gave evidence in Module 4, was involved in placing and supporting children in Rubane at this time. She confirmed that Rubane was seen as a holding place for short stays, often when an urgent admission was required under a Place of Safety Order and that the aim was to get boys in and out as soon as possible.[145]

143 There was also a marked increase in the number of places available in statutory residential children's homes in Northern Ireland; between 1973 and 1981 these increased from 121 to 527.[146] Welfare authorities began to fill places in statutory homes first to ensure full usage of local provision but also to enable children to be cared for as close to their own homes as possible. The management committee in Rubane commented on these developments at its meeting of 6 October 1980 and recorded its view that voluntary homes were under threat due in part to social workers disregarding the wishes of parents in deciding upon placements:

> "Religion seems to be of minor importance. What appears to be important is the filling of the Statutory Homes."[147]

144 Despite this view we saw evidence of the EHSSB supporting the work in Rubane. For example, on 16 June 1980 Mr Bunting wrote to Fr McCann and told him that the EHSSB was raising the salaries of residential child care workers and was prepared to increase the weekly maintenance fees paid to Rubane in order to enable it to offer a similar increase in salary to its staff.[148]

145 The use of Rubane continued to decrease and by 1980 two of the chalets were closed and there was growing anxiety about the viability of the home. By September 1981 the numbers had reduced to 29 and in 1982 the numbers ranged from 28 to 32.[149]

Regulatory activity in later years

146 In contrast to the regular contact that the MoHA had maintained with Rubane there was much less regulatory activity in the 1970s. The Social Work Advisory Group (SWAG) inspected Rubane in September 1973, August 1974, October/December 1975 and July 1976 and in addition in February 1975 Mr Robert Mills, then Assistant Secretary with child care responsibilities in the DHSS, visited Rubane. However, there was no official inspection of Rubane by SWAG or the Department between 1976 and March 1981. This lack of inspection meant that children in Rubane at that time did not receive the benefit of regulatory measures intended to protect the welfare of children and quality assure the care they received in voluntary children's homes.

147 The Hughes Inquiry found that the absence of formal inspection between 1976 and March 1981 was unsatisfactory and that the inspections carried out in the 1970s as a means of gaining a genuine insight into the standards of care in Rubane were inadequate. The Department did not challenge these findings by the Hughes Inquiry. We agree with the Hughes Inquiry findings and we consider that this lack of inspection activity between 1976 and 1981 and the inadequate nature of the inspections in the 1970s amount to a systemic failing by the Department to ensure the institution was providing proper care.

148 Correspondence in January 1981 from Mr Wilde, the Chief Social Work Adviser in the DHSS, to Mr Gilliland, Director of EHSSB,[150] shows that the management committee of Rubane were proactive in seeking to engage with the DHSS as the regulatory body for the home. Mr Wilde states in this letter that officials from the DHSS would soon be meeting with representatives from the management committee of Rubane at their request:

> "...when issues about the aims, objectives and no doubt child care practices in the Home will arise."

149 RUB 11109.
150 RUB 5758.

149 Before turning to consider the inspection activity that emerges from that meeting, it is worth commenting on the background to the letter referred to above as it illustrates tensions in the relationship between the DHSS and the Health and Social Services Boards about the regulation of voluntary homes. As we have noted in earlier chapters, there were tensions between the MoHA and welfare authorities because the welfare authorities resented having to contribute to the cost of grants to voluntary homes when they were not given the opportunity to influence the admissions policies of these Homes or how they were run, and were given no access to the outcomes of the MoHA's monitoring of the quality of care provided in the homes.

150 In 1981 the tension was no longer about funding but about who was responsible for quality assuring voluntary children's homes and dealing with complaints that emerged about child care practices within such homes. The background to Mr Wilde's letter to Mr Gilliland was that Mr Gilliland had written to Mr Wilde in November 1980 highlighting concerns that a social worker in his Board had raised with her senior managers about general aspects of the care practices in Rubane, including the quality of the clothing provided to the children and the rigid approach to the daily routine. Mr Wilde responded in December 1980 by querying the basis for the social worker's concerns, whether she had discussed them with the Brother Director of Rubane, BR 2, or his deputy and what policies and procedures the Board had for investigating complaints from children in their care.

151 The letter of January 1981 referred to above is a follow-on from this letter and in it Mr Wilde stated that he wanted to make clear that:

> "…the Department's registration and inspectorial functions do not in any way diminish the responsibility of Boards to actively pursue the needs of individual children in their care who are accommodated in voluntary homes with appropriate senior staff, or if need be, with the Management Committee of the Home concerned".[151]

Although, Mr Wilde ended his letter with the request that the DHSS be informed if it did not prove possible for the Board to resolve problems with Rubane we consider that this approach by the DHSS could be seen as a shirking of its responsibilities for regulating the quality of voluntary homes. We consider that investigation of general matters which affected children placed in the home by more than one welfare authority, and which would have entailed questioning of senior staff and reference to the governing body of the home, to be of a different order to a social worker seeking to address specific issues about a particular child.

152 In our view, the Eastern Board was appropriately raising concerns about general practices in Rubane that might affect all the boys resident there, not just those boys for whom it was responsible and the DHSS was attempting to place what amounted to an inspection role on the Board – a role which it did not have the powers to perform. It was the DHSS that had the responsibility to assure itself of the quality of overall care provided to children in Rubane and in other voluntary children's homes in Northern Ireland and it was the only body with the statutory authority and powers to meet that responsibility. We consider the DHSS failed to properly respond to the concerns raised by the Eastern Board in 1981 about the general care being provided to all boys in Rubane and that this amounts to a systemic failure by the DHSS to ensure that the home was providing proper care.

153 The engagement of Rubane Management Committee with the DHSS resulted in an inspection of Rubane carried out by the Child Care Advisory Board of the DHSS in March 1981. The introduction to the report of that inspection states that recent departmental policy provided for a more detailed inspection of children's facilities and that Rubane's management committee had also been asking for an evaluation of the home's performance and of its current functions to facilitate planning for possible changes.

154 The inspection was carried out over a five-day period and involved four inspectors. Three of the inspectors spent an evening with boys in one of the chalets and talked and shared a meal with them.

155 A 31-page report of the inspection[152] was produced and shared with the staff and the management committee of Rubane. Although attention continued to be paid in the inspection report to physical amenities, occupancy levels, staffing and finance issues, there was more comment on the quality of the direct care provided to the boys and suggestions about how it could be improved. For example, it was reported that the inspectors found some staff to be advocates of routine management of the boys, with an emphasis on discipline and sanctions, and that they seemed to concentrate more on activities and to be less responsive to the individual needs of the children. The regimented approach to leisure time, with an emphasis on compulsory and organised activities for boys and use of frequent line up and confinement in the yard at certain times, was also commented on. Inspectors recommended that staff should be encouraged to consider the aims and objectives of their work and how to provide for the needs of individual boys constructively instead of thinking in the negative terms of applying sanctions.

156 Inspectors also commented on the ratio of staff to boys and the range and load of duties staff and, in particular, brothers were expected to carry and how this could have an impact on the care of the boys:

> "Fatigue brought about by long hours of duty can cause staff to become less sensitive to the needs and demands of those in their care. In turn this can lead to less effective work and allegations of unprofessional behaviour."[153]

157 The report concluded by suggesting that the management committee would need to consider its future policy and a possible change in the function of Rubane.[154] This is the first example we have seen of the DHSS beginning to engage with Rubane about the implications of the changing policy context for residential care of children and the reducing place for large homes.

158 We noted that inspectors did not pick up on the lack of monthly visiting and although they identified that Rubane had not submitted a required return about the use of corporal punishment to the Department in 1980 the submission of such returns was not included in the recommendations set out at the end of the inspection report. We consider these oversights to be a further example of a systemic failure by the Department to enforce statutory regulations. We also noted that very significant challenges facing Rubane, which we will consider later in this chapter, including the suspension of staff following allegations of abuse, are given the briefest mention in the report and there is no indication that inspectors had confidential discussions about the implications of them with the management committee or the governing board.

153 RUB 10260.
154 RUB 10277.

159 The report was considered by the management committee on 28 September 1981[155] and the minutes of that meeting record that the committee read passages of the report with almost incredulity, if not dismay, and expressed:

> "…amazement at the paucity of praise given to many positive qualities which the Home undoubtedly possesses".

and noted:

> "Why is a home which down through the years had given the Community efficient and faithful service, and which had earned high commendation from officials of the Home Affairs and Education, should suddenly be considered almost obsolete, was difficult to comprehend."[156]

160 The reactions of the management committee of Rubane and the staff to the inspection report were also recorded in the History of the Home for 1981.

> "They published their report later in the year, and their conclusions in general were far from acceptable to either the staff of the Home or to the Management Committee. Their recommendations were quite acceptable and positive and were easily enough implemented, but various statements in the body of the report were regarded as less than fair or just towards the work being done in the Home, at present, and over the past 30 years."[157]

161 The management committee asked BR 2 to draft a response to the report and this led to a meeting between the committee and officials from the DHSS on 19 November 1981. It is recorded in the "History of the Home" that:

> "The Advisory Board Team tried to point out that they did not in any way try to cast suspicions on the quality of care being provided for the children. They were only trying to pinpoint certain areas, where perhaps some change, or a different attitude could be taken in the interests of all concerned."[158]

162 The minutes of the management committee record that the tone of the meeting with officials had been conciliatory but also note that officials had pointed out that its policy was for children to be reared, as far as possible, within their own community boundaries and that there was an oversupply of residential care provision.[159]

Embargo by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board

163 In the context of falling numbers, and a policy direction which militated against the use of Rubane, the home's position was particularly precarious because its reputation had been damaged from 1980 onwards by allegations of physical and sexual abuse against staff and reports from lay staff about poor child care practice and management in the home, which came to the attention of the welfare authorities, the DHSS and the police. We will consider these matters in detail later in this chapter.

164 In February 1982, concerns about care practices in Rubane led the EHSSB, which at that time was the biggest single user of the home, to place an embargo on boys from its area being placed in Rubane. In the minutes of the management committee meeting held on 12 October 1982[160] there is a reference to committee members meeting with representatives from the EHSSB and officials from DHSS to discuss the Board's embargo and that members came away from the meeting with a certain amount of pessimism. There is also reference to a further meeting on 5 May 1982 between the committee and the representatives of the four Area Boards and it is recorded that members felt "a veiled hostility was in evidence though some of the Boards were supportive of the Home".[161] Although the embargo was lifted in August 1982, confidence in Rubane had clearly been damaged by it.

165 In October 1984 Father John Connor, a member of the management committee and director of the Down and Connor Family Welfare Society provided a very damning report about Rubane,[162] which we assume, given its content, was for Bishop Philbin. He began his report by setting out the changing policy context for care of children, the move away from residential care and the reduction in the use of voluntary homes and increased use of statutory provision. He then made the point that to continue to "exist meaningfully" in the midst of such change a voluntary home would need to be prepared to adapt and that in his view Rubane had neither the capacity

159 RUB 11066.
160 RUB 11074.
161 RUB 11074.
162 RUB 11153.

nor the will to change. He stated that the quality of child care in Rubane was not good enough and that efforts by the management committee and by him and his staff to encourage and support the brothers to improve child care in Rubane had been met with resistance and proved fruitless. He concluded that in the present child care climate it would merely be a matter of time before the home would have to close and that "the Diocese would be best served by cutting its losses and closing the home".[163]

166 It appears this advice was accepted, because a meeting of the board of governors was convened on 30 March 1985 and it decided that Rubane was no longer viable and should close.[164]

167 We note that this meeting of the governing board was the first time it had met since 1982. As referred to previously, the governing body met on 31 occasions from 1950 to 1985. It met on an annual basis from 1950 to 1967; there was an unexplained four-year gap in meetings between 1968 and 1972; and then annual meetings resumed again until 1982, when another unexplained gap in meetings occurred between 1982 and 1985.

168 Although the management committee was established by, and answerable to, the governing board there is no evidence of formal reporting or contact between the committee and the board during the time that the board failed to meet. It may be that Fr McCann, the chair of the management committee, kept Bishop Philbin informed about matters in Rubane. However, we consider the lack of formal meetings, and therefore the lack of formal governance of Rubane, in the periods outlined above when Rubane was experiencing significant difficulties and challenges amounted to a systemic failing by the Diocese to ensure the institution provided proper care.

Daily life for boys in Rubane

169 Before we consider the evidence the Inquiry received about physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse, neglect and unacceptable practices in Rubane, we will first look at what the daily routine was like for boys in Rubane and positive aspect of the facilities available to the boys and the care they received.

163 RUB 11156
164 RUB 5242.

170 As indicated previously, Rubane House was a large Victorian mansion, close to Kircubbin and approximately 22 miles from Belfast. It had 250 acres of land, was surrounded by woodland and was situated in the middle of the Ards Peninsula. It was in sharp contrast to the city centre environment that many of the boys had come from and its location meant that most boys were a significant distance from their own homes. This made it difficult for family members to visit, particularly when they had to use public transport which necessitated a long walk in both directions from the bus stop to the home.

171 The home was open for a period of about thirty-five years, and just as the physical environment improved with the opening of the chalets in 1968/69 the range of facilities available improved significantly during the life of the home. At the start, the community was confined to the main house and the farm, restricting the range of activities possible, but over time farm buildings and coach houses were used for leisure activities such as table tennis, billiards and showing of films. There were also garden areas and surrounding woodland available to the boys, a general play area with swings and a pet area with animals.[165] In due course, grass and all - weather playing fields, basketball and tennis courts, a play hall, sports hall and a swimming pool were added, which enabled the boys to engage in a wider range of sporting activities.

172 In the early years there were short recreation periods in the yard after lunch and tea, supervised access to television and some occasional screening of films. Boys were allowed to walk to Kircubbin and to a local beach, but they were supervised by a brother on such walks. A number recalled these walks warmly, for example HIA 110 who said:

> "[BR 13] used to take us out for a walk and then we would sit on a wall and he would give us biscuits. We always called this wall biscuit corner."[166]

173 A number of witnesses recognised that they had access to a wider range of activities than they would have had if they had remained at home, for example HIA 36, who was resident in Rubane from August 1968 until May 1972, commented:

> "It wasn't all bad, there were a lot of good times. I don't know anyone who had a swimming pool in their house and two tennis courts and > a football pitch and a snooker table. We used to go swimming to Newtownards every Saturday and to pictures nearly every other week. As the years went on it got easier and you got to more places."[167]

174 BR 2 described how sporting and other extra-curricular activities were used to develop the boys:

> "From sports, to fishing, hill walking, historical trips, camping, athletics, gardening, pets, disco and music we did try and facilitate opportunities to mix with different sections of the community and gain a sense of self-worth, discipline and responsibility through their extra - curricular activities."[168]

Witnesses confirmed this approach and spoke of taking part in inter-school and inter-community sporting competitions and in bands, choirs and Irish dancing with children from the locality.

175 The daily routine also changed over the years. In the earlier years the approach adopted by the brothers appears to have been more controlling and institutional; witnesses who were in Rubane in the 1950s and early 1960s described a regime structured around religious observance, schooling and completion of daily chores with more extensive cleaning at the weekend. School was the main focus of the day. In his book "Irish De La Salle Brothers in Christian Education" John Towey described how the education provided in Rubane was utilitarian and cultural in content rather than academic: woodwork, art and design, technical drawing, geography, history and maths.[169]

176 We noted that although school was the focus of week days, a number of witnesses complained about the poor standard of education they received in Rubane and how this has affected them throughout their lives. Evaluation of the quality of education provided in Rubane is not within the remit of this Inquiry but the support provided to the boys to engage and progress with learning is relevant. Some witnesses suggested that the brothers did not feel the boys were worth investing time in and that there was no support for homework or any encouragement to take exams.[170]

177 HIA 256 described being sent to work in the gardens:

> "Instead of going to school I was sent to work as a gardener with a caretaker....I had learning difficulties, and it seemed I was better out doing this kind of work rather than going to school."[171]

Witnesses also told of being taken out of school to help on the farm[172] and DL 11 confirmed in his statement to the Inquiry that he put a stop to boys from his chalet being used in this way.[173]

178 The Order pointed out that many of the boys admitted to Rubane had poor school attendance records and a history of low achievement at primary education level and that the disruptive behaviour of some boys adversely affected the learning experience of other boys. They also indicated that the absence of the natural separation between school and home life may well have been difficult for the boys to see or understand, with consequential impacts on their educational enjoyment and success. While the Order accepted that physical conditions within the home created a poor environment for individual home learning they pointed to the evidence of DL 40 that BR 6 provided additional voluntary classes in the evening and that of HIA 225 and DL 445 who appreciated how their musical talents were encouraged. We noted that there were improvements over time with the appointment of more lay teachers in the 1970s and that in later years some boys were encouraged to attend school in Portaferry and obtain O-Level qualifications.

179 The routine became more relaxed over the years and BR 2 described a daily routine after the chalets opened in 1968/69 which, while still regimented and built around the school day, allowed two hours between 4pm and 6pm and one hour between 7pm and 8pm for extracurricular activities and did not include time for chores apart from the boys tidying their beds and clothes. He also indicated that there was a more relaxed approach at weekends and school holidays.[174] It was also clear from the accounts of witnesses that over time boys were given greater freedom: for example, they described being allowed to walk to Kircubbin unsupervised, to attend local discos and there were references to older boys being able to meet with girlfriends. One of the older boys, HIA 381, who was placed in Rubane in 1982 aged fifteen and stayed there for two years told the Inquiry:

> "I have no complaints about my time in Rubane House. I loved it there. I had a room of my own in chalet one and I was given pocket money and a clothing allowance every month."[175]

180 Witnesses described individual interests being encouraged, for example in growing vegetables and flowers, music,[176] bird watching[177] and keeping pets.[178] A number of witnesses spoke warmly of holidays they had in Glenariff, which was near the sea at the foot of the Antrim glens and the more relaxed regime they were allowed to enjoy there.

181 Many witnesses talked about the value of friendships they forged at Rubane, how they looked out for each other and how the companionship and support of other boys sustained them. It was clear from the accounts of some witnesses that friendships forged in Rubane remain strong today. It was also the case that some witnesses maintained contact over the years with De La Salle brothers and lay staff who worked in Rubane when they were resident there. They told us they were grateful for the care and attention they received from these staff and for the facilities, particularly the sporting facilities that were available to them in the home.

182 We will now consider the evidence the Inquiry received about physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse, neglect and unacceptable practices in Rubane.

Physical abuse

183 Fifty of the 60 former residents who gave evidence to the Inquiry about Rubane alleged they suffered physical abuse by brothers and lay staff and observed other boys being subject to such abuse.

184 These witnesses clearly distinguished between the administration of corporal punishment in a controlled manner, which they accepted as a reasonable response to misbehaviour, physical punishment which was excessive and aggressive, and violent behaviour which was at times random and unprompted. Witnesses who were resident in Rubane across the four decades of its operation described staff losing control and severely beating boys, excessive caning and strapping which was not limited to hands and behinds, and some staff using their fists and feet to hit boys. They described a culture of physical force being used to assert and maintain

175 RUB 722.
176 DL 445.
177 HIA 170.
178 HIA 41.

authority and control and an atmosphere where the risk of physical violence was constantly present and often realised.

185 Corporal punishment was permissible within the Children and Young Persons (Voluntary Homes) Regulations 1952 and as updated in 1975, with the important proviso that:

> "11(1) The person in charge of a home shall ensure that generally order is maintained by his personal influence and understanding and that of his staff, and resort to corporal punishment shall be avoided as far as possible"

The Regulations set down that minor acts of misbehaviour should be dealt with through forfeiture of rewards or privileges or

> "a light tap of the hand may occasionally be applied to the hand of a child with the object of indicating urgent disapproval rather than that of inflicting pain."[179]

The Regulations also set clear guidelines for how corporal punishment should be administered if it were considered necessary, including the type of punishment that should be administered, the extent of it given the age and state of health of the child and who should administer it.

186 Chapter VIII of the Order's rules also addressed the use of corporal punishment:

> "The Brothers shall be careful never to touch or strike any of their scholars and never to repulse or treat them rudely; all such means of correction should never be used by the Brothers, as being very unbecoming and opposed to charity and Christian meekness."[180]

The rules also specified that if Brothers had to punish boys they should be extremely careful to do so with great moderation and self possession and should:

> "never undertake to punish in hastiness, or when they feel excited."[181]

187 It is clear from the evidence we heard that the restrictions set out in the Voluntary Homes Regulations were not consistently adhered to. The Order accepted in its evidence to the Inquiry that its own Rules about the administration of punishment were not always observed and that on occasions the boundary between corporal punishment and physical abuse was definitely crossed.[182] The Order suggested this may have been because there was a blurring by the brothers, many of whom worked in the school in Rubane as well as the home, of the distinctions between how corporal punishment could be administered in school, i.e. with use of a strap, in front of other pupils, and with no requirement to record it and how it should have been applied in the home.[183] If this blurring occurred, it would indicate a failing in the management of staff and in the guidance and oversight provided to them to ensure they understood and met statutory regulations. We consider that the Order's response and explanation appear to ignore or excuse each brother's individual responsibility to meet the Order's rules about the chastisement of children.

179 HIA 290.
180 RUB 1557.
181 RUB 1556/7.

188 Witnesses who were admitted to Rubane in the 1950s described a harsh regime of strict discipline, excessive physical punishment for misdemeanours and random unprompted physical violence from brothers. There was consistent evidence, which we accept, that boys were put over desks and beaten on the bare backside with canes and with straps, were hit in front of other boys and were caned until they bled.

189 BR 12, who was the first Br Director of Rubane, was remembered for his use of excessive force: HIA 97 describes BR 12 as a vicious man who would lash out and kick and thump for no reason and HIA 261 recalled BR 12 hitting him on the head and bouncing him off a wall.[184]

190 BR 12 ceased being Brother Director in September 1956 but he continued to work in Rubane until his death in December 1972. Therefore his approach to discipline spanned sixteen years so that, for example, while HIA 19 who was in Rubane from 1966 to 1970 recalled being caned by BR 6 and BR 3 for minor misdemeanours he remembered BR 12 hitting him with a stick on his backside.[185]

191 BR 17 took over as Brother Director in September 1956 and he featured significantly in the accounts we heard of physical chastisement. To some extent this may be explained because he was the officer in charge and in accordance with the Voluntary Homes Regulations would have been responsible for the administration of corporal punishment. However, it is clear from the evidence we heard that he did not administer corporal punishment in the controlled and proportionate manner required by the regulations.

192 HIA 252 who was admitted to Rubane on 26 November 1954, aged 9 years, because of non-school attendance described BR 17 beating him for crying because he was homesick[186] and beating him with a stick until he bled for running away.[187] HIA 390 described the head brother, who would have been BR 17 for the majority of HIA 390's time at Rubane, regularly strapping boys across the body, head and face.

193 HIA 183 described BR 17 beating him black and blue with his fists: "he flung me over the table; he fisted me" because when BR 17 asked him what he was learning he said he was learning a hymn; he explained the beating only ended when another boy told him to say he was learning Latin.[188]

194 It was clear from the evidence we received that during BR 17's time as Brother Director boys were gathered together to observe punishments and that on occasion boys were beaten on their bare bottoms and bodies in front of other boys. HIA 261 described two boys who had absconded being dressed in swimming trunks and beaten with a stick by BR 17 so forcefully that they "leapt in the air with pain".[189]

195 It was also clear that absconding was a particular trigger for severe chastisement, and that boys were gathered to watch such punishment as a means of deterring them from absconding. In part, the severe response to absconding appears to have been because the brothers felt it was important to maintain confidence in the Order's ability to deal with boys who had been sent to Rubane because they were seen to be in need of firm discipline. It may also have been that the brothers were concerned about how the local community in Kircubbin would perceive and respond to persistent absconding, particularly when boys who absconded engaged in petty crime in the local area. Whatever the motivation, it is clear that in the earlier periods any boy who was returned to Rubane after absconding could expect a harsh response and little if any discussion about why they were running away. BR 2 explained that part of his motivation to stop absconding was the risk of harm boys put themselves in, especially during the Troubles, and he described having to collect boys from potentially dangerous situations. He also told us he talked to boys on the way back to Rubane and asked them why they absconded.

196 HIA 385 recalled a young boy who was caught smoking being stripped to his underpants, bent over a chair and whipped[190] and HIA 252 described being flogged on the bare backside in front of other boys because he was suspected of having stolen cigarettes.[191] In contrast to the measured approach the Voluntary Homes Regulations and the Order's rules set down for the administration of chastisement, HIA 399 described observing BR 17 hitting boys so hard that sweat poured from him and that "he looked like he was enjoying it too much."[192]

197 In addition to the evidence about excessive physical punishment, witnesses told the Inquiry about the unpredictable nature of the physical regime in Rubane and how brothers would administer random slaps. HIA 244 described it as follows:

> "Rubane was just a hell hole; it was a complete nightmare. We were constantly ducking and diving from the Brothers; you never knew when you'd get hit by them."[193]

HIA 247 spoke in particular of how unpredictable BR 17 could be, "smiling and joking one minute and then going into a rage".[194]

198 Witnesses also said that when they received injuries as a result of beatings from brothers or staff they did not receive external medical treatment and often did not receive any assistance from staff:

> "...if we got a bad beating no one would patch us up"[195] HIA 390.

199 Although the regulations stipulated that only the officer in charge or his duly appointed deputy should administer corporal punishment, it was clear from the accounts of witnesses that this was not adhered to. BR 15 who arrived in Rubane in 1956 and BR 14 who arrived in 1957 were particularly remembered for using excessive and at times random physical force against boys.

200 HIA 385 remembered BR 15 as a cruel man who ruled by fear.[196] HIA 183 described BR 15 hitting a boy across the face with a bamboo cane and continuing to hit him across the legs and back with the cane although blood was pouring from the boy's face.[197] HIA 252 and HIA 244 described BR 15 hitting boys in the shower with a strap and a bamboo cane.[198]

201 HIA 390 told the Inquiry that BR 15 would return to Rubane from trips to Belfast in a drunken state and would come to the dormitory and randomly physically abuse boys.[199] The Inquiry particularly noted that HIA 36 said the brothers were fair and that when he got "six of the best" it was for breaking rules but he described BR 15 as bad tempered and recalled him hitting boys with a stick.[200]

202 BR 15 was described as having a vicious temper[201] HIA 183, HIA 252 described BR 14 hitting him around his face with a strap and kicking him in the side with the toe of his shoe "like someone would kick a football."[202]

203 BR 6 was the Brother Director in Rubane from August 1962 to July 1971. He is remembered warmly by his fellow brothers and some residents talked of his kindness - "a smashing fellow".[203] However, it is clear from the evidence we heard that under his leadership harsh physical discipline continued to be a feature of life in Rubane. HIA 110 described BR 6 hitting him with a stick, HIA 16 described him hitting boys for not doing their cleaning chores properly and HIA 225 recalled him hitting a boy across the face with a cane because he had pointed out that BR 6 had spelt a word wrongly. HIA 259 commented about BR 6:

> "...although he could be nice to you at times you did not want to get on the wrong side of him as he had a very bad temper and would really tear into you".[204]

204 The public nature of some punishment also continued, HIA 34 described BR 6 slapping boys in the yard. HIA 36 described boys being assembled to watch two brothers DL 368 and DL 536 being stripped and beaten for running away. HIA 26 who was in Rubane from 1964 to 1970 referred to excessive use of the cane:

> "The cane would leave lumps and welts on your legs and on occasion they would beat you until your bare legs would bleed."[205]

205 BR 2, who worked with BR 6 accepted that he caned boys in front of other boys but insisted that such caning would have been on the boys' hands not their behinds.

206 A number of witnesses described how some brothers asserted their authority when boys arrived in Rubane and warned them about what they could expect if they did not behave. HIA 21 gave an example of this behaviour: he described how on his first night in Rubane BR 3 hit him across the face for no reason and with no warning and told him "You are not in Nazareth Lodge now".'[206] HIA 21 told us that was the only time BR 3 "struck-out" at him.

207 HIA 225 was the only witness who was in Rubane at this time who told us he reported how he was chastised to his social worker; he told her that he had been badly caned by BR 4. He said he was not sure if his social worker did anything about it but that BR 4 did not hit him again. The HSCB provided relevant social work papers which confirmed that HIA 225 told his social worker that he had been "strapped and then hit across his left ear by BR 4, such as to knock him off his chair"[207] and that she advised him to ignore the incident unless BR 4 continued to punish him unjustly whereupon he should discuss the situation with BR 6. The social worker recorded that this plan seemed to satisfy HIA 225.

208 The HSCB accepted in its written submission to the Inquiry that BR 4's behaviour as described by HIA 225 amounted to serious physical abuse and that there is no evidence that she reported the incident to her line manager. They suggested that this could be because the possibility of institutional abuse did not register with her. We accept this may be the case and while we would expect a social worker to refer such a matter to his/her manager we accept that she did not record both HIA 225's complaint and her follow up action to ensure that HIA 225 was not subject to further abuse.

209 We also note that BR 2 recorded in his diary how BR 4 dealt with boys who had stolen altar wine and spirits and got drunk as "BR 4 goes to town on them"[208] and we conclude from this that BR 4's behaviour with HIA 225 was not a one-off incident. Although the social worker could not have been aware of that, it was a significant failing that she did not refer the matter to her manager, as such a referral might have resulted in an investigation into BR 4's behaviour or, at the very least, questions about the incident that might have made him control his behaviour better.

206 RUB 879.
207 RUB 9245.
208 RUB 2630.

210 A number of witnesses recalled brothers enforcing a white boundary line in the play ground (e.g. HIA 152) denoting the area within which they were expected to remain during recreation time. The Order explained that this line was used for a period in Rubane and was a means of enabling supervision of the boys and preventing them from wandering in the outer fields and woods where there was a risk they would engage in sexual activity and bullying behaviour. We accept that a boundary line may have been necessary since the grounds surrounding Rubane were extensive and that the use of a boundary line would enable one brother to supervise a large number of children at recreation time. However, we accept from the evidence of witnesses (e.g. HIA 244) that some brothers and in particular BR 28 were overzealous in their enforcement of the boundary.

211 Some witnesses who were in Rubane in the mid-1960s onwards recalled other forms of punishment, such as pocket money being withheld,[209] and remembered only seeing other boys being punished if they happened to be in the vicinity as opposed to being convened to watch punishments. The introduction of chalets improved the physical environment for the boys and heralded the introduction of more lay and female staff. However, from the evidence we received we accept that physical punishment continued to be the primary means some brothers and lay staff used for asserting their authority and maintaining their control over the boys.

212 To illustrate this, we refer to some of the behaviour of staff that BR 2 had to deal with during two of his periods as Brother Director in Rubane, July 1971 to September 1973 and June 1980 to December 1982, and that BR 1 had to deal with during his period as Brother Director from September 1973 to September 1977.

213 BR 2 confirmed in his evidence to the Inquiry that as the Brother Director he received complaints from boys about staff being physically abusive. The extracts from his diaries, which he helpfully provided to the Inquiry, illustrated well the type of behaviour the boys were complaining about.

214 Before his appointment as Brother Director, while he was working as a teacher and a part-time member of care staff in Rubane, BR 2 was already concerned about the behaviour of a house parent, DL 421. He recorded in his diary on 7 December 1970:

> "Screams from upstairs – went upstairs [DL 421] and [HIA 56] in the toilets [HIA 56] cowering [DL 421] over him 'this can't go on' ...talked to [DL 421]."[210]

215 On 20 Dec 1970 BR 2 recorded in his diary that some boys had complained to the Chaplain, DL 140, about DL 421's behaviour and that DL 140 intended confronting DL 421 but BR 6 intervened and he and DL 140 talked to DL421 together.

216 Following his appointment as Brother Director, BR 2 recorded continued concerns about the behaviour of DL 421. For example, he recorded on 30 January 1973 a boy coming to see him because he was afraid of going to his chalet because he had lost his pullover and would get "the black belt" from DL 421. On another occasion he recorded five boys complaining about DL 421, three of whom were subsequently moved from his chalet because of his aggressive behaviour towards them. He eventually asked DL 421 and his wife to resign on the basis that they had reached retirement age. BR 2 confirmed in his oral evidence that he did not tell the management committee or the governing board about asking DL 421 and his wife to resign or the reasons for their departure.

217 Subsequent to DL 421's resignation the home was searched by security forces and BR 2 was told on a confidential basis that this search was linked to a member of lay staff hiding an escaped IRA prisoner in the home. BR 2 concluded that given DL 421's republican views he was the most likely member of staff to have hidden the escaped prisoner. BR 2 told us that he did not inform the MoHA about the building being searched by the security forces. Dr Harrison on behalf of the Department was critical of this lack of openness but the Order pointed out that BR 2 would have understood that security matters should be kept confidential and would have reasonably expected the police or the security forces to have informed civil servants about the search of Rubane. It is unclear what, if any, information about the search was provided by the security forces to the Department or the HSCB. We consider it a systemic failing that the Order did not inform the Department or the Health and Social Services Boards about the search of Rubane and the reasons for it and therefore did not work with them to identify and manage any continuing risk to the welfare and safety of the boys in Rubane at that time.

218 In 1972 BR 2 had to deal with two brothers whose aggressive behaviour towards boys caused him concern. He recorded their behaviour in his diary, for example:

- "5 February 1972 – BR 29 hits J McNeilly in the dining hall"[211]
- "17 April 1972 – BR 29 clobbers a few boys at the line-up."[212]

219 BR 2 told us that he discussed his concerns about BR 29 with the Provincial and as a result BR 29 was asked to leave Rubane and was not permitted to take his final vows.[215] BR 2 said he was also instrumental in preventing BR 20, who was involved in "beating up [DL 65]", and another brother DL 525 from taking their final vows; he reported to the Provincial that they had poor relationships with the boys and that he did not feel they were able to manage the role properly.[216] The Order pointed out that although BR 2 correctly brought these entries to the attention of the Panel the number of entries in his diary about the misconduct of brothers is relatively few.

220 BR 29 gave evidence to the Inquiry and explained that he entered the Order at age fourteen and although he expected to become a teacher the path that was directed for him was a career in social care. He arrived in Rubane in September 1971 when he was aged nineteen years and stayed less than a year, leaving in July 1972 when his vows were not renewed. BR 29 told us that his understanding at the time was that he was leaving the Order because he did not have the vocation to continue in the religious life or the prayer life to sustain such a vocation. He also informed us as part of the Warning Letter process that BR 20 took his final vows and was still a brother in 1977. We took from this that while BR 2 may have played a part in delaying BR 20 from taking his final vows in 1972 BR 20 was subsequently allowed to take them.

221 BR 29 told us that as a nineteen-year-old man with no experience, and no training or preparation for the work, he was thrown in at the deep end and expected to deal with boys, some of whom were only a few years younger than him, and whose behaviour could be very challenging. He said he had a vague memory of a boy suddenly attacking BR 20 and him in a changing room and of them having to restrain him but could not recall the other incidents involving his interactions with boys recorded by BR 2. He told us that he received no job description, no supervision and limited guidance about doing his job. While not excusing BR 29's behaviour towards boys we accept that he was ill-equipped for his work with the boys and unsupported in carrying it out. We consider that he was not alone in this regard and we will return to the matter of support and supervision of staff later in this chapter.

222 BR 2 issued a verbal warning on two occasions to another member of staff, DL 279. The first warning was for physically assaulting a boy while on duty under the influence of alcohol on 25 March 1975. The second warning related to an incident on 29 January 1976 when DL 279 was again on duty under the influence of alcohol and assaulted another boy and left him with a swollen jaw. BR 2 recorded in his diary that on 21 January 1976 he had a brief chat with DL 279's wife, DL 89, about her husband's aggressiveness and drinking habits but he confirmed in his oral evidence to the Inquiry that he did not refer his concerns about DL 279's behaviour to the provincial or the management committee. It was not until 30 November 1976 that DL 279 was asked to resign and it appears from BR 2's diary that the reason he was asked for his resignation was because he was having an extra-marital relationship with a woman from the locality and was rumoured to be father of her recently born child.

223 In his diary entry of 11 November 1976[217] BR 2 recorded concern about acting in relation to this matter without firm information "Nothing definite - only rumours" and adds at the end of that entry "[DL 279] reported under influence" but gives no indication of his thoughts about that report or any action he took in relation to it. In his oral evidence BR 2 indicated that it was a combination of concerns about DL 279 that prompted him to ask for his resignation, but we noted that his diary entry about his discussion with DL 279 focused on the extra-marital relationship. This left us with the impression that BR 2 was prepared to act more quickly in response to moral failings and perhaps to avoid scandal in the neighbourhood than he was to deal with a member of staff who on at least two occasions had assaulted boys while working under the influence of alcohol. BR 2 accepted in his oral evidence to the Inquiry that he should have taken action earlier about DL 279's behaviour but explained that a misplaced sense of sympathy for DL 89 and her children stopped him from doing so.

224 In contrast to BR 2's handling of DL 421 he did seek the advice about handling the situation with DL 279 from Fr McCann, chair of the management committee, and Ms Forrest of the MoHA, who BR 2 recorded as advising a sympathetic approach.[218]

225 BR 2 also had to speak on two occasions to BR 18 in June 1973 and April 1974 about his physical behaviour towards the boys. A number of witnesses to the Inquiry described being hit by BR 18.[219] HIA 31 described BR 18 "knuckling" him so severely on the head that his face went into his food; he contrasted BR 18 hitting him "for nothing" with BR 3 hitting him for doing something wrong.

226 HIA 18 described being severely beaten by BR 18 in the canteen and his account is supported by HIA 259 and DL 85.[220] HIA 259 recounted that DL 11 who was HIA 18's house-parent remonstrated with BR 18 about this incident. In his statement to the Inquiry DL 11 confirmed he did challenge BR 18 about the incident:

> "I said that if he ever hit one of my boys again he would have me to answer to."

He also recalled reporting the matter to BR 1 or BR 2 and saying:

> "that if anything like this happened again I would inform the authorities and if HIA 18 wanted to take the matter further I would back him one hundred percent."

He said he subsequently checked with HIA 18 but he did not want to take the matter further.[221]

227 In addition to evidence from witnesses who were resident in Rubane about BR 18 we noted that a former member of lay staff DL 81 told the police that BR 18 was notorious for punching boys[222] and said in his evidence to the Inquiry that BR 18 would even have given him a thump. DL 149, who was a teacher of physical education in Rubane, told the Inquiry he remembered that BR 18 had a reputation as:

> "a rough kind of a guy that you didn't mess with sort of thing. That's what the boys would say. You'd jump out of his road sort of thing, you know."[223]

228 When responding in his oral evidence to questions about BR 18's physical punishment of boys BR 2 recalled:

> "…when boys came to me and says [sic], I was hit by BR 18, I would have taken it for granted that he gave them a clout, or a wallop, or a slap or something of that nature, and it was dealt with internally."[224]

229 BR 2 went on to suggest that BR 18's behaviour and his response to it needed to be understood in the context of the time:

> "…but at the time, the times we were in, 60's and 70's, many teachers not so much care workers I guess – but for teachers it would be common practice almost that they would come along and give a warm ear to someone or slapped them – gave them a punch or whatever".[225]

230 It appears that when BR 2 arranged for BR 18 to leave Rubane in 1981 it was not in response to concerns about BR 18's physical aggression towards the boys but was because BR 18 had developed a dependency on alcohol.[226]

231 It is clear that in the 1970s Rubane was increasingly seen by the Health and Social Services Boards as a place to send boys who were in need of firm discipline. BR 2 said in his written statement that by 1974:

> "…the Welfare Authorities valued the closer supervision provided at Rubane as being vital to the upbringing of these boys who were 'out of control' in other institutional settings."[227]

232 We also heard about boys being sent to Rubane from Termonbacca and Nazareth Lodge because the nuns could not control their behaviour and it would appear from the evidence we heard that the brothers took a particularly physical approach to asserting their authority with these boys. For example HIA 94 was transferred from Termonbacca in 1972 because the nuns could not handle his behaviour. He described physical abuse by brothers, including being caned on his bare behind, and the Order has confirmed that records show he was punished for his behaviour and for absconding. HIA 25 and his twin brother HIA 31 were admitted to Rubane in 1974 although they were only aged 7 years because the nuns in Nazareth Lodge could not deal with their behaviour. HIA 25 described how he and his brother HIA 31 ran away soon after arriving in Rubane and when they were brought back they were beaten by a brother. He stated:

> "Now we were only 7 years of age and this was a grown man with a big stick hitting us as hard as he could to try to teach us a lesson not to run away. It wasn't a lesson not to run away. It was a lesson of fear, you know"[228]

As previously stated, the statutory regulations regarding corporal punishment forbade children under eight being punished in this way.

233 In his written statement to the Inquiry BR 2 accepted "there will have been times when punishment was not carried out strictly in accordance with the regulations"[229] and that he himself had "momentary loss of self control'. He referred the Inquiry to his diary entry for the 10 January 1973 where he recorded, "hit [DL 315] across the face for being giddy."[230] This record in BR 2's diary of his spontaneous informal chastisement of a boy is unusual; other entries about physical punishment record his administration of corporal punishment.

234 HIA 222 and his brother DL 385 were admitted to Rubane because following the death of their father they got beyond their mother's control and began to miss school and get into trouble. HIA 222 told us that on his first day in Rubane the head brother, who at that time would have been BR 2, slapped him because he and his brother were "kicking off" as they did not want to be in the home. It was also recorded in the Ledger five days later, on 8 October 1974, that when HIA 222 and DL 385's mother and a social worker were leaving Rubane at the end of a visit the boys had to be restrained because they wanted to leave with them. It was specifically recorded "A few clouts to [DL 385]."[231] BR2 also recorded the incident in his diary and commented "[DL 385] very stubborn – took a lot out of me."

235 This attitude to the physical chastisement of boys contrasts with the oral evidence given to the Inquiry by Mr Bunting, who in reference to BR 2's evidence about brothers' overly physical treatment of boys stated that if the type of incidents which caused BR 2 concern had happened in statutory homes they would have been formally investigated and any behaviour amounting to physical assault would have been referred to the police.[232] While accepting that corporal punishment was still commonplace in schools in the 1970s, in relation to its use in statutory children's homes at that time Mr Bunting stated:

> "it was not our practice in statutory homes for any form of physical chastisement."[233]

236 We appreciated BR 2's frankness about these matters and noted that he regularly recorded in his diary when he chastised boys, how many slaps he gave and for what reason. He explained in his oral evidence that he would have punished boys together if they had offended together, but would have punished boys alone if they offended alone, and that if he saw boys fighting he would intervene to stop the fight and would have slapped both boys. HIA 191 provided an example of this approach when he described BR 2 giving him "six on each hand" for fighting with another boy.

237 We also noted that BR 2 recorded giving other non-physical punishments such as not allowing a boy to go to the swimming pool[234] and giving a boy 50 lines for being down the field after supper.[235]

238 We will now consider the case of BR 77 who is the only brother who worked in Rubane to be convicted for physical abuse of the boys in his care. At the time of the behaviour that led to BR 77's convictions BR 1 was the Brother Director of Rubane, having been appointed to that post in October 1977.

239 BR 77 arrived in Rubane in September 1976, to take up his first teaching post. He explained to us that he lived in St Patrick's while completing his training as a teacher and from what he observed of the work there he felt he would not be suited to working in Rubane. He told us he tried to convince Provincial, Br Columba Gallagher, of this but was unsuccessful and was sent to work in Rubane.

240 He told us that he got no advice about how to deal with the behaviour of the boys beyond being advised to read their files and that the only guidance he got was about the level of academic attainment the boys should be expected to achieve.

241 The first incident that led to his conviction occurred in November 1979 when DL 48 was hit on the eye by BR 77 for "messing around" on the football pitch. The cut required stitching. When DL 48 was interviewed by the police in 1980 about this incident he told them that he did not tell his social worker about it because he was scared of BR 77 but that he did tell BR 1 but thought that he did nothing about it.

242 BR 1 told the police on 1 October 1980 that he told the management Committee about this incident,[236] but this is at odds with the account that Fr McCann, who was the chair of the management committee, gave to the police[237] and to the Hughes Inquiry.[238]

243 Fr McCann said the matter came to his attention because Pauline Richardson, a social worker with the Catholic Welfare Office who was liaising with staff in Rubane in order to help develop their care practices, heard about the incident from boys in Rubane and reported it to her Director, Fr John O Connor, who in turn reported it to Fr McCann. In a statement to police[239] Fr McCann recounted going to meet with BR 1 to discuss the matter and telling him to give BR 77 a warning about his behaviour.

244 It does not appear that Fr McCann asked for confirmation that the warning had been given and in his evidence to the Inquiry, BR 77 stated that he had no memory of receiving such a warning. Neither BR 1 nor Fr McCann referred the matter to the police or to DL 48's social worker and Fr McCann accepted in his evidence to the Hughes Inquiry that his reaction was not sufficient.

245 The second incident occurred around March 1980,[240] when DL 52 was attacked by BR 77 during a basket ball game in the sports hall. In his statement to police DL 52 explained that he had told his friend DL 60 he would hit him if he dropped the ball and that when DL 60 did drop the ball he gave him a playful tap on the head. DL 52 described to the police how

BR 77 responded to this:

> "BR 77 came over to me and punched me on the jaw. I tried to cover myself up and he kept on punching me with both fists until I fell and hit my head on the wall. When I was on the ground he kept on hitting me and cut my upper lip. He also kicked me once when I was on the ground. After he saw that I was bleeding from the lip he tried to make up to me by saying it was an accident. He attended to the cut on my lip himself and I did not have any medical treatment."

246 DL 52 reported what happened to BR 1 and BR 3, who was the principal of the school. In his evidence to the Inquiry, BR 77 said he told BR 3 himself about the incident, explained that he intervened to stop DL 52 hitting DL 60 but knew that he had overstepped the mark. He also told the Inquiry that three weeks after the incident he apologised to the boys in DL 52's class who had observed the beating. In his statement to the police[241] DL 60 stated that he knew DL 52 was only carrying on and confirmed that BR 77 apologised to the class for his behaviour.

247 When answering questions at the Inquiry hearing about this incident BR 77 stated that his conversation with BR 3 did not include discussion of how he might contain and manage himself better in future to avoid the reoccurrence of such behaviour. Despite Fr McCann's intervention in relation to the first incident and the warning he said BR 77 was to receive, BR 1 did not alert Fr McCann to the second incident and did not report it to DL 52's social worker or the police. Therefore, although BR 77 serious assaulted two boys within a five month period he was not disciplined or removed from his post.

248 In February 1980 DL 517, a social worker employed by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, and DL 522 of the Down and Connor Catholic Family Welfare Society started a Leavers Group in Rubane to help boys to prepare for leaving care. At a meeting of this group on 6 March 1980, the boys made clear that they did not want BR 77 to join them on a planned weekend away because he was generally vicious and aggressive, had split a boy's lip, hit boys with mountaineering rope on previous camping trips, and, that if he did not like the way boys behaved on the weekend away he would "get them" when they returned to Rubane.

249 On 10 March 1980 DL 517 visited a boy in Rubane DL 33, who she was the social worker for, and he told her BR 77 had hit him in the laundry for smoking. He asked her not to tell BR 1 about him being hit as it would make things worse. DL 33's father who has accompanied DL 517 on the visit suggested that his son might be exaggerating the severity of the beating.

250 At the next meeting of the leavers group on 13 March 1980 the boys expressed the same concerns about BR 77 and as a result DL 522 met with BR 1 and shared the concerns expressed by the boys and asked that BR 77 should not be chosen to accompany the group on the weekend away. BR 1 gave DL 522 a non-committal response to this request. There is no evidence to suggest that at this point either DL 517 or DL 522 escalated their concerns about BR 77's behaviour to their managers.

251 However, on 27 March 1980, DL 517 and DL 522 decided to discuss the boys' concerns further with BR 1 and DL 517 also raised DL 33's report to her of being hit by BR 77 in the laundry. BR 1 assured the social workers that he knew about the incident of the boy being given a split lip by BR 77 and had dealt with it and that as far as he knew there had been no more incidents since then.[242] On 14 April 1980 DL 517 met with DL 33 who told her he had been hit again by BR 77. DL 517 reported this to BR 6 in BR 1's absence and she subsequently submitted a report to her senior managers about the allegations the boys in the group and DL 33 had made about BR 77.[243] DL 524, District Social Services Officer, referred the report to Mr Gilliland, Director of Social Services, with a memo dated 18 April 1980[244] advising that the matters should be raised with the police, the DHSS and the management committee of Rubane.

252 The police had already been alerted to allegations of sexual misconduct by BR 1, which we will consider later in this chapter. The combination of concerns led the police to decide to interview boys who were in Rubane between 1977 and 1980, a total of 129 boys of whom 124 were traced and interviewed. During these interviews eighteen boys made allegations of physical assault against BR 77 and ten of them described him beating them around the head and face and striking them on the mouth and eye with a closed fist.

242 P. 56, Day 77.

253 Fr McCann was informed by police about these allegations and on the same day asked BR 77 to absent himself from Rubane and not be in communication with it in any way. We noted that despite knowing about the incident with DL 52 Fr McCann explained to the Hughes Inquiry that out of delicacy he asked BR 77 to absent himself from Rubane rather than telling him he was suspended. Despite the serious allegations made against BR 77 the Order moved him to teach in a local school.[245]

254 In the report of the 1981 inspection of the home by the Social Work Advisory Group there is a passing reference to BR 1, and a lay member of staff DL 509 being under suspension from duty at the time of the inspection but there is no reference to BR 77's suspension or the circumstances surrounding it. This suggests that this information may not have been shared with the inspection team.

255 The Police decided to prefer charges in relation to four of the allegations against BR 77 where there was evidence of corroboration. Three assaults of occasioning actual bodily harm against DL 48 in October 1979, DL 52 in March 1980 and DL 53 in early 1980 were proceeded with. BR 77 appeared at Ards Court on 11 May 1981, pleaded guilty and was given a conditional discharge on each of the counts.

256 Five witnesses to the Inquiry described physical abuse by BR 77. HIA 170 recalled BR 77 "busting the nose" of a boy called Shields. HIA 259 described him as terrifying and intimidating and said he beat boys excessively and got a buzz from it. HIA 218 described BR 77 hitting him and his twin brother with a climbing rope, and HIA 18 described BR 77 beating him with a golf club and said BR 6 observed that beating and did not intervene.

257 HIA 41 said BR 77 beat him in a store room in Rubane and that he lifted boys by the hair, tried to make them cry and left DL 53 in a pool of blood. A witness put forward to the Inquiry by the Order, DL 40, said in a police interview that BR 77 hit him with his fists for not paying attention in class and that another boy, DL 46, told him about a beating he got from BR 77.

258 In his evidence to the Inquiry BR 77 accepted that he behaved wrongly on the occasions for which he was convicted and that he did use a rubber tube and a safety line rope used for climbing to hit boys, but he denied the other allegations against him.

Conditions after the return of BR 2 as Brother Director

259 As a result of allegations of a sexual nature against BR 1, Bishop Philbin suspended him and the Order sent BR 2 back to Rubane to take up the post of Brother Director again. At BR 2's insistence he was given the support of a deputy BR 7. BR 7 told the Inquiry that his general impression of Rubane when he arrived was that there was an overemphasis on sanctions and punishment, and that he suggested a more positive approach of rewarding good behaviour. He also introduced reviews of boys, log books, personal records for each boy and an independent living scheme. This period marked a time when the boys were given more freedom, for example to walk into Kircubbin or go to discos, and we heard evidence from witnesses about such privileges being removed as punishments.

260 BR 7 said there was a marked shift towards reducing the use of corporal punishment and reactive informal punishments such as clipping of boys' ears. He also described how arrangements were put in place that only BR 2 and he would administer corporal punishment and that it was not to be administered in the heat of the moment. While we did not accept every allegation about physical abuse by brothers in these later years we concluded from the accounts of witnesses that the restrictions described by BR 7 were not always adhered to and that brothers continued to use their superior physical force to exercise authority over the boys, as did lay staff.

261 To illustrate this we will consider the conduct of a lay member of staff, DL 81 who was the member of staff whose reports to external agencies about poor child care and management practices in Rubane led to the EHSSB placing an embargo on placements in Rubane.

262 DL 81 was 20 years old when he commenced work in Rubane and he worked there until he was 25 years of age. He completed a course leading to the Certificate in Residential Care of Children and Young People at Rupert Stanley College and while he was on the course he worked as a house parent in the evenings in Chalet 3 and he and his wife lived in that Chalet. When he completed his training, he and his wife were moved to Chalet 2 where he worked with DL 514, a psychology graduate, under the management of DL 11 and his wife DL 12.

263 A series of incidents took place where DL 81 got into physical confrontations with boys. In Feb 1981[246] a boy (DL 212) threatened DL 81 with a poker and told staff he did so because DL 81 had hit him. On 10 Dec 1981 another boy, DL 413, complained that DL 81 grabbed him by the throat and left marks on him. BR 2 received advice from Pauline Richardson, social worker with the Catholic Family Welfare Office, about how to investigate and report this second incident. During the investigation DL 81 admitted slapping DL 413 across the face and attempting to restrain him, using a technique developed in America which he had heard about but which he had not been trained to use. BR 2 issued a verbal warning to DL 81[247] for "rough handling", arranged for Father O' Connor a member of the management committee to be informed about the incident,[248] and the Newry and Mourne Social Work Department, which was responsible for DL 413.[249]

264 On 25 Jan 1982 a boy, DL 520, pulled a knife on DL 81 who slapped him across the face. This incident was reported to BR 2's deputy BR 7[250] and the next day, 26 January 1982, DL 81 had a confrontation with another boy, DL 415, and BR 2 was involved in managing the aftermath of that incident.

265 It is clear from documentation we have seen that there were tensions in the working relationships DL 81 and DL 514 had with the house parents in Chalet 2, DL 11 and DL 12, and that there were differing views about how the chalet should be run. The contemporaneous written accounts that DL 81 and DL 514 provided to BR 2 about the incidents outlined above show two immature members of staff trying to deal with challenging behaviour from boys in a manner that escalated rather than diffused situations, and DL 81 in particular trying unsuccessfully to use physical force to assert his authority over boys.

266 Two witnesses to the Inquiry, HIA 41 and DL 73, described DL 81 beating them and a witness put forward by the Order DL 40 remembered DL 81 as having a temper.[251] BR 2 accepted to the Inquiry that maybe DL 81 was too aggressive with the boys.

267 DL 81 gave evidence to the Inquiry and denied the allegations made against him. He said he was known as a softie, but that he did get caught up in incidents when he tried to intervene to stop younger boys being bullied by older boys. Subsequently, as part of the Warning Letter process, DL 81 told us that he had slapped HIA 41 but explained that was in response to a crude and unkind remark that HIA 41 made to him and his wife at a time when they were particularly vulnerable. We considered this was an example of the provocative type of behaviour that staff in Rubane would have had to deal with and that it highlighted how important it was for them to be properly supported in their work and the adverse impact when that support was not available.

268 On 27 January 1982 DL 81 met with Fr O'Connor, a member of the management committee, to share his concerns about recent incidents in Rubane and how they had been managed. Father O'Connor wrote to BR 2 and the DHSS to inform them about this meeting and said that he had told DL 81 a review of the running of the home was imminent and that he could take his concerns to the chair of the management committee, Fr McCann.

269 On 4 February 1982 DL 81, accompanied by his colleague DL 514, brought his concerns to Mr Morris, the principal social worker in the EHSSB,[252] and as a result the EHSSB decided on 6 February 1982 to place an embargo on any more admissions to Rubane until the concerns raised by DL 81 and DL 514 could be investigated further.[253] The EHSSB referred the matter to the DHSS and two inspectors from SWAG went to Rubane to meet with DL 81 and DL 514, BR 2 and other relevant staff.[254]

270 One of the claims made by DL 81 was that BR 18 had a drink problem and was frequently on duty in an intoxicated state. The inspectors raised this with BR 2 who confirmed BR 18's dependence on alcohol but was emphatic he was never allowed to go on duty while under the influence of alcohol and that once the problem became apparent he was moved to another De La Salle community. The inspectors accepted this explanation. We are not convinced that boys would not have come in to contact with BR 18 when he was under the influence of alcohol, given the proximity of the living conditions. This is the third allegation that members of staff who were known for their quick temper and physical abuse of boys were also working under the influence of alcohol (BR 15, DL 279 and BR 18). We consider the Order's tolerance of this behaviour was a failure to properly protect the boys, particularly since we are aware that some boys were received into care because of the problems created by one or both of their parents' dependence on alcohol.

271 The inspectors also accepted reassurances from BR 2 that practices in Chalet 2 that DL 81 had complained about, such as the manner in which boys were required to wash their feet each evening, had been stopped.

272 The management committee was informed about the embargo and how it had come about and decided that DL 81 had brought the home into disrepute and should be offered the opportunity to resign.[255] When DL 81 refused to resign he was dismissed on 8 March 1982 by Fr McCann as chair of the management committee and DL 514 had her probation period extended.[256] We considered this an interesting example of how whistle blowing was dealt with; it appears the management committee decided to get rid of the source of the complaints rather than considering whether there was any substance to them. What is more significant in relation to the remit of this Inquiry is that DL 81 was dismissed for bringing the home into disrepute rather than for his unsafe child care practice and physical aggression towards the boys.

273 In light of the SWAG inspectors' acceptance of BR 2's assurances, Mr PJ Armstrong, Deputy Chief Social Work Adviser, wrote to Mr Gilliland, Director of Social Services Eastern Board, on 6 April 1982:

> "I am sure that you will agree that, while there can be room for improvement in the standards of child care in this Home, as in many others both statutory and voluntary, the practices complained of did not represent a serious threat to either the safety or welfare of the boys. ...In my opinion there is now no reason for your Board to maintain an embargo on the admission of boys to Rubane. Social workers who have responsibility for children whom they consider would benefit from the type of treatment and regime that is offered by the Home should recommence referrals."[257]

274 However, as we will consider later in this chapter, further concerns about Rubane were brought to the attention of senior managers in the EHSSB and the embargo remained in place until 5 August 1982.

Excessive physical force by other lay staff

275 Numerous allegations were made to us that lay teaching staff resorted to hitting boys to enforce discipline in the classroom, during games and on occasion when performing other duties, such as acting as a house parent. These allegations range from throwing wooden items at boys in class to slapping and punching boys.

276 For example, a number of witnesses gave consistent evidence that the woodwork, teacher DL 6 was quick to lose his temper, prone to throwing whatever was near to hand, including tools such as chisels and mallets at boys (HIA 19) and hitting them with lumps of wood (HIA 132). A number of witnesses indicated that if a boy was willing to learn DL 6 was a good teacher and was very skilled at woodwork but even they referred to his quick temper. HIA 64 said about DL 6:

> "He was a brilliant teacher but he was very aggressive. If you got something wrong in class, he would call you a fat head and hit you. Then he'd throw the leg of a chair at you and you would have to make a run for it."[258]

It is clear the brothers knew about DL 6's behaviour. For example, HIA 44 told the Inquiry he was moved from DL 6's class because he reported to BR 2 that DL 6 had hit him with a hammer. In its written closing submission to the Inquiry the Order noted the accounts of DL 6's behaviour but pointed out that the boys would wind him up.[259] HIA 170 confirmed this in his evidence to the Inquiry: 'He (DL 6) was definitely a target for being wound up'.[260] The Order acknowledged that it was not acceptable for DL 6 to respond in the way in which he did. We agree and we consider that the Order's willingness to allow him to behave in this way for a number of years was also not acceptable.

277 DL 149 was another member of lay staff about whom the Inquiry received allegations of physical abuse. Rubane was DL 149's first teaching post; he taught Physical Education and Religious Education and lived on-site during the week.

278 DL 149 denied the allegations that witnesses made to the Inquiry about him hitting them excessively. (HIA 18, HIA 25, HIA 31 and HIA 41). He admitted that he did get into a physical fight with a boy, DL 121 who tried to defy him by leaving his classroom when he had told him not to. When questioned at the Inquiry hearing DL 149 said BR 3 talked to him and the boy about the incident but he was not admonished and he was given no advice about how to manage such situations in the future. We consider this another example of a young and inexperienced member of staff being expected to deal with challenging behaviour from teenagers with limited guidance and support.

279 DL 149 stated that at times during after-school sporting activities he had to intervene between boys to calm down situations such as claims about unfair tackles but denied ever being physically aggressive with boys during games or punishing them for their failure to win games. HIA 31 described how he experienced being taught to play Gaelic by DL 149:

> "..If you didn't get the ball or do what he told you he would kick you in the backside or hit you on the back of the head with his fist or he would put his knee in your back. He used to sweep your feet from under you to make you fall. He did it to all the boys."[261]

280 Although it is clear that witnesses valued the sporting activities in Rubane we consider that some of the behaviour displayed during such activities contributed to reinforcing the overly physical and macho culture in the home. We also accept from the evidence we heard that on occasion some brothers and lay staff who were taking part in matches got involved in the heat of games and in some cases competed with boys to the extent that they were overly physical and used their superior physical power to score points or assert their control.

281 The final example of a lay member of staff about whom we received allegations of physical abuse is DL 1. DL 1 commenced work in Rubane in 1968/9 as a teacher of geography, maths and RE, and went on to be appointed as vice principal and then principal of the school. DL 1 confirmed to the Inquiry that he used corporal punishment in the school, such as slapping boys, but stated that he would also use other punishments such as making boys stand in the corridor. In his statement to the Inquiry he stated "I never punched a pupil in my life".[262] However, five witnesses HIA 104, HIA 18, HIA 41, HIA 170 and HIA 222 gave consistent accounts of DL 1 punching them in the stomach and the lower body.

261 RUB 915.
262 RUB 5529.

282 While we do not accept each and every allegation about physical abuse by lay staff we are satisfied from the consistent evidence we have heard that some members of lay staff resorted to excessive force to maintain discipline. We are satisfied that the brothers were aware of and tolerated this behaviour and in doing so put the boys at risk of harm.

Bullying by other boys

283 It is clear from the evidence of a number of witnesses that a considerable amount of physical fighting and bullying went on between the boys. This is not surprising, given the age and stage of the boys, the experiences some of them had before they were admitted to Rubane and the overly physical approach to discipline displayed by some brothers and lay staff. On one occasion the fighting between boys led to one boy HIA 31, being stabbed in the back by another boy and having to receive hospital treatment.

284 A witness put forward by the Order, DL 244, stated:

> "Bullying was an issue: as a young boy you got bullied, as an older boy you bullied. We just came through the system."[263]

285 HIA 259 described a hierarchy amongst the boys and that the lower down the ranks the more vulnerable a boy was:

> "The more you were down the ranks the more you got bullied. This was the pecking order in the home and there was a code between the boys, you never told on anyone or grassed them up you would have got the life kicked out of you."[264]

NL 122 described in his oral evidence how on his first day in Rubane he got into fights because boys were trying to bully him and other boys that had transferred with him from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane. HIA 64's brothers followed him to Rubane and he said he did his best to look after them: "I carry more scars for them than I do for myself".[265]

286 Some witnesses indicated that the brothers knew about bullying between boys and turned a blind eye to it. HIA 25, who described a system of chalet bullies and admitted he was one of them, suggested that the brothers would tell the bullies to sort things out, for example if the younger boys were fighting.

265 RUB 548.

287 We accept that fighting and bullying behaviour are not uncommon in male residential establishments and accept the accounts from brothers and lay staff about how they intervened to stop fights between boys. However, it is clear, as outlined above, that physical aggression was used by staff as a means of establishing and maintaining control and we consider this approach would have reinforced such behaviour by the boys.

Conclusions about physical abuse

288 The Order accepted in its evidence to the Inquiry that there was evidence of excessive physical punishment in Rubane between 1958 and 1962, the time BR 17 was the Brother Director.[266] It also accepted that BR 18 could be overly physical with the boys,[267] BR 77 may not have been suited to the role required of him,[268] and that there were isolated incidents of the application of an excessive number of strokes or of public chastisement, but that these were exceptional.[269]

289 We recognise that during much of Rubane's operation, the use of informal corporal punishment was typical of many day schools and families; it was an accepted part of the culture, and in this respect it could be said that the staff of Rubane were reflecting accepted ways of dealing with misbehaviour. However, we are satisfied that there was widespread resort to excessive physical punishment by some brothers and lay staff. We are convinced by the evidence we have heard that individual brothers, and in later years lay staff, lost control and physically abused boys and that in some cases this violent behaviour amounted to serious physical assault. We accept that, particularly in the early years, the risk of violence from some brothers was ever present and that in many instances the violence was random and unpredictable. We consider that such behaviour was a consistent feature of life in Rubane up until at least the early 1980s and that it amounts to a systemic failure by the Order to keep children free from abuse. We found the accounts of Brother Directors using excessive violence against boys particularly concerning, since as the officer in charge their behaviour would have set the tone for the home and for other staff and boys. Also, boys treated in a violent manner by Brother Directors would have had no-one more senior to turn to for assistance.

290 Given the evidence we have heard, we are satisfied that the Order consistently failed to observe the statutory regulations and the Order's rules for the administration of corporal punishment and that unacceptable levels of physical chastisement were administered throughout every decade of Rubane's operation. We are satisfied that the administration of corporal punishment was not limited to the Brother Director and his deputy and that boys were punished in front of other boys. We consider the way corporal punishment was administered and the excessive nature of some chastisement amount to systemic failings by the Order to keep children free from abuse and to ensure the institution provided proper care.

291 We acknowledge that BR 2 attempted to manage the behaviour of his staff to reduce inappropriate chastisement of boys, for example intervening to ensure BR 2 did not take his vows[270] but we consider the tolerance that the Order showed to inappropriate physical behaviour by brothers and staff, which in some cases included serious physical assaults amounted to a systemic failing to keep children free from abuse.

292 We consider the Order's failure to report the serious assaults by BR 77 to the police is a reflection of a collusive approach which put the protection of brothers and the reputation of the Order before the protection of vulnerable children. We consider this amounts to a systemic failing by the Order to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse. We also consider Fr McCann's response to the first assault by BR 77 was inadequate and as the diocese's appointment as chair of the management committee we consider this to be a systemic failing by the diocese to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

293 Brothers talked about the lack of preparation and training they had for the work they were required to undertake in Rubane and the excessive hours they had to work teaching, particularly in the early years in the school, organising after school sporting activities and supervising the children in the home. We consider that the excessive hours brothers had to work, particularly in the early years, and the lack of guidance and effective supervision they received amounts to a systemic failing by the Order to ensure the institution provided proper care.

294 We recognise that qualifying training for residential care workers was only beginning to be introduced in the 1970s in Northern Ireland and that it was common before that time for untrained staff to work in children's homes. However, we consider the lack of support and guidance given to lay staff in Rubane, particularly to those who were clearly having difficulties in meeting the challenges of working with adolescent boys, amounts to a systemic failing by the Order to ensure the institution provided proper care.

295 We consider that the overcrowding and poor staffing levels which persisted up until the late 1960s and were condoned by the Order, the diocese, and the MoHA were significant contributory factors in staff using excessive physical force to establish authority and maintain discipline over large groups of boys, many of whom displayed challenging behaviour. As stated previously we consider the willingness of the Order, the Diocese, and the MoHA to allow these inadequate conditions to develop and continue for a number of years amounts to a systemic failure to ensure the home provided proper care.

296 Fr McCann said in a statement to police about the assaults by BR 77 that the management committee's position was that corporal punishment should not be used and that anyone bad-tempered or quick-tempered was unsuitable for work with children. We could find no evidence of the management committee agreeing this position or communicating it to staff. Two chaplains, DL 140 and DL 366, were aware of boys being subject to violence in Rubane and both made attempts to intervene in relation to it. We found no evidence that either of these priests shared their concerns with their bishop in his capacity as chair of the Governing Board. We consider that, if they had reported their concerns, the Governing Board might have intervened and required brothers and staff in Rubane to adhere to statutory regulations for the administration of corporal punishment.

297 As previously mentioned, in the report of her inspection of Rubane in May 1955, Ms Forrest recorded that corporal punishment was only occasionally inflicted and none had so far been recorded in that year. Given the evidence we have heard, we have concluded that records were not being maintained as they should have been and that Ms Forrest was given false information about the administration of corporal punishment. BR 2 accepted in his written statement to the Inquiry that there may have been occasions when the official returns about the administration of corporal punishment "may have been incomplete or inaccurate".[271] We consider these failings to engage properly with processes set down in regulations to ensure the protection of children amount to a systemic failing by the Order to ensure that children were free from abuse.

Sexual abuse

298 Fifty-one of the 60 witnesses we heard from alleged they were sexually abused in Rubane by staff and/or by their peers and they also stated that they were aware of other boys being subject to such abuse. The allegations cover the four decades in which Rubane House operated as a children's home and involve abuse ranging from fondling over clothes to anal rape. The alleged perpetrators of the abuse are De La Salle brothers, lay staff, a chaplain, other boys and people from outside the home including a neighbouring farmer, foster parents, visiting priests and a music teacher.

299 We have carefully considered each allegation and related response statements from the Order. It is not the Inquiry's role to make a finding in relation to each allegation and our analysis of the evidence has focused on determining whether and to what extent systemic sexual abuse occurred in Rubane. The Order has suggested that some allegations are exaggerated, lack credibility because they contain factual inaccuracies or are not corroborated. As we have previously indicated we accept that the memories of all involved may be affected by the passage of time and that the emotional content of traumatic events may affect memories and we have taken that into account in our consideration of evidence.

300 The Order received complaints of alleged sexual abuse by brothers in 1958, 1964, 1970 and 1980 and we will consider each in turn and how the Order responded to them.

BR 17

301 The first investigation of alleged sexual abuse in Rubane occurred in 1958 and was prompted by five boys telling the then chaplain that the Brother Director, BR 17 had sexually interfered with them. The chaplain advised the boys to report this to the brothers; the boys told BR 63 who in turn reported it to BR 13. As the allegations were against the director of the community BR 13 referred the matter to the Provincial BR 19. BR 19

271 RUB 1084.

went to Rubane on 11 September 1958 to investigate the allegations and as part of his investigations he interviewed the 39 boys in residence and the brothers.[272]

302 In the notes of his investigation BR 19 recorded that BR 17 admitted applying ointment for scabies on naked boys in his room and telling the boys he could do this because he was acting in the place of their parents. He also admitted to being alone with boys in a car and giving boys individual instruction on morality in his office.

303 BR 19 noted that of the nine boys that "had made mention of having being wronged by [BR 17]" two had left Rubane and therefore could provide no evidence and six had retracted their allegations during the course of the investigation. There is a suggestion that these six boys may have been put up to making the allegations by DL 439, one of the two boys who had already left Rubane.[273]

304 In relation to the last of the nine boys, a boy called DL 480, who was not involved in making the original allegations, BR 19 recorded that he was adamant that BR 17 had sexually interfered with him in a car and said he was prepared to repeat his allegation in front of BR 17 and a priest. BR 19 recorded in his notes "This cannot easily be ignored!" and in response to BR 17's denials of wrongdoings he recorded, "One is left with a slight doubt".[274]

305 BR 19 made a brief note of his interviews with the other brothers and recorded that BR 15 said he could not credit that BR 17 was guilty and that the boys "enjoyed telling yarns" to BR 13'[275] and that BR 14 said the "more I think it over the more I doubt it".[276]

306 BR 19 wrote to BR 17 to inform him of the outcome of his investigation and he stated in relation to the boy who persisted in his allegation:

> "Don't for one moment think I am accepting his word against yours, but you will readily agree that it is very unfortunate but the charge still stands."[277]

307 He went on to state that it was imprudent of BR 17 to strip boys for the purpose of applying treatment directed by the doctor and wrong of him to take boys to his room for the purposes of applying that treatment. He added that it was very unfortunate that BR 17 told boys he was entitled to touch them because he was taking the place of their parents and commented that "they have been otherwise instructed by the Priest",[278] which suggests that the chaplain's conversation with the boys who made the first allegations was a detailed one and went beyond merely advising them to refer their concerns to the brothers.

308 BR 19 instructed that in future no brother should travel alone in a car with an individual boy on any occasion; a glass panel should be inserted in the office door in the school and under no circumstances should any boy be allowed to enter a brother's bedroom. These instructions for future behaviour were already set down in the Order's rules and we noted that BR 19 gave no written admonishment to BR 17 for his lack of adherence to the Order's rules. It is clear from evidence from witnesses who were in Rubane after this time that some brothers continued to ignore the rules about brothers being alone in a car or in their bedroom with boys.

309 BR 19 finished his letter with "I advise that no reference be made at any time or to anybody regarding this enquiry. It is best forgotten."[279] It appears this advice was accepted as there is no mention made of the investigation or even that BR 19 visited Rubane in the Events of Importance Log for 1958[280] or History of the Home.[281] This meant that if MoHA officials had considered these documents during inspections they would not have been alerted to the investigation. There was also no reference to the investigation or the Provincial's visit in the minutes of the next meeting of the governing board held on 4 February 1959.

310 The matter did not rest there, because on 14 November 1958, BR 19 received a letter from Canon Rice of Portadown stating that DL 439, the former resident of Rubane referred to above, had told his father that BR 17 had sexually abused him. DL 439 informed his solicitor of the allegation, who in turn told Canon Rice, who was also his client, about it. BR 19 travelled to Dundalk on 18 November 1958 to discuss the matter with Cannon Rice and then went to Rubane on 20 and 21 November 1958 to investigate the allegation. He interviewed DL 439 in the presence of his two uncles and a curate and also interviewed the other boys involved in making the original complaint, some of whom he collected from Belfast because they had by then left Rubane. He recorded the outcome of his interview of DL 439 in a letter dated 22 November 1958 to the Br Assistant:

> "After six hours he finally confessed that the charge against [BR 17] was false. I know that we really used 'third degree' in getting the confession from him and only when I told him that I would keep him overnight did he finally confess. This is not too satisfactory and one is left in some doubt."[282]

311 He also added:

> "Unfortunately according to English law a case of this nature is supposed to be investigated by the police. I don't know if English law obtains in the Six Counties. Probably it does. We can only keep praying."[283]

312 Subjecting a boy who has made allegations of sexual abuse to six hours of questioning and threatening to keep him overnight in the premises in which the alleged perpetrator of the abuse was the Brother Director was totally unacceptable. It is clear from BR 19's remarks that he was well aware that what he was doing was unacceptable, but that he felt justified in treating the child as he did and believed he could do so with impunity.

313 There is no record that BR 19 referred the matter to the police, the MoHA or the governing board, and despite recording twice in writing that he was left in some doubt about BR 17's conduct he allowed him to remain as Brother Director of Rubane. There is also no evidence that BR 19 gave BR 17 any further formal warning about his behaviour as a result of the allegations by DL 439 or that he increased his monitoring of BR 17's behaviour and directorship.

314 The Inquiry received evidence from seventeen witnesses who were resident in Rubane at the same time as BR 17 and seven of those told the Inquiry that they had been sexually abused by him. This abuse ranged from putting a boy on his knee and fondling his genitals while watching television in a darkened room,[284] and interfering in a similar manner with a boy while transporting him in a car,[285] to attempted anal and oral rape.

HIA 252 recounted four occasions when he was taken from his bed at night by BR 17 and sexually abused in BR 17's bedroom. He described being made to masturbate BR 17 and how on one occasion when BR 17's attempts at anal penetration were unsuccessful he made HIA 252 lie face down on the bed and he rubbed his penis up and down HIA 252's back until he achieved ejaculation.[286] HIA 252 told the Inquiry:

> "...I was living in fear of being taken out of the room for years; the fear was a form of mental abuse too."[287]

315 In his oral evidence to the Inquiry HIA 252 referred to seeing a boy called DL 439, who was the subject of the 1958 investigation, going into BR 17's room and BR 17 sitting with his arm around DL 439 in the television room. HIA 252 described the latter as "something you would have maybe seen with a fella and a girl in the cinema."[288]

316 HIA 183 told the Inquiry about BR 17 bringing him and three boys into his office, making them strip naked and face the wall and then face him. He also recounted BR 17 taking him to his bedroom on around six occasions, telling him to take his pants down and then on the pretence of examining him, fondling HIA 183's penis until he aroused him.

317 HIA 183 was the only witness who remembered being talked to by a "Head Brother" in 1958, which was the time that BR 19 talked to the boys in Rubane as part of his investigations into the allegations against BR 17. HIA 183 explained that he did not tell this brother about being abused and instead said he was happy at Rubane because he feared that if he told the truth he would be made to leave Rubane and he had nowhere else to live.

318 HIA 247 recounted being fondled and interfered with by BR 17 while watching television and being fondled in his bed in the dark of night but not being able to see which adult was doing this to him. He also stated he was aware of other boys being interfered with in a similar way in their beds. In response to the Order's suggestion that the activity in the bedroom may have been brothers checking on bed wetters HIA 247 responded "I didn't wet the bed, and what they were doing inside the bed wasn't checking the sheets were wet."[289]

319 The Inquiry found the evidence of HIA 399 and that of his brother HIA 261 about the sexual abuse they suffered from BR 17 particularly revealing. The brothers were admitted to Rubane in March 1960, almost sixteen months following BR 19's decision to take no further action in relation to the second complaint of sexual abuse against BR 17.

320 HIA 399 gave a very clear and detailed account about being sexually abused on a regular basis, once or twice a week, by BR 17 in BR 17's bedroom, his office, a car and workman's hut. HIA 399 explained that he had no previous sexual experience, so did not know what was happening and that, although he cried during the abuse,[290] that did not deter BR 17. He explained how on one occasion BR 17 brought him and his brother to visit their grandmother in Dublin for an overnight stay and BR 17 manoeuvred the situation so that he shared a bed with HIA 399 and sexually abused him.[291] He also told the Inquiry that BR 17 arranged for HIA 399 and HIA 261 to stay with his own family in Dundalk; HIA 399 now thinks this may have been an attempt to establish a fostering situation.[292] When the arrangement fell through, the brothers were returned to Rubane and were told by BR 17 to say they had been staying with their father but it had not worked out.

321 HIA 399 explained that BR 17 would give him gifts and tell him to pretend that they came from his father and on occasions gave his father money, including £40, to pay off debts.[293]

322 HIA 399 indicated that he thought some of the brothers might have been aware he was being sexually abused by BR 17 and this is supported by the account of his brother, HIA 261. He told the Inquiry that on one occasion a brother pointed out sarcastically that a parcel for HIA 399, which was supposed to have been sent to him from Canada by an uncle, was not stamped.[294]

323 When BR 17 turned his attentions to HIA 261 and began fondling him, HIA 261 told DL 140 in confession that he was being sexually interfered with by a brother. DL 140 advised him to tell the head brother and HIA 261 said he told him that the head brother knew. He explained when giving oral evidence that he thought the priest would understand from this that it was the head brother who was abusing him. There is no evidence of what action, if any, was taken by DL 140 about this allegation.

291 RUB 866.
292 RUB 866.

294 RUB 702.

324 Father Bartlett explained on behalf of the Diocese of Down and Connor that because DL 140 was absolutely bound by the law of the Church to observe the seal of the confessional he could not tell anyone what HIA 261 told him. HIA 261 did not indicate that he received any further guidance or support from the priest and there is no evidence to suggest that DL 140 alerted the bishop in even a general manner about the possible sexual abuse of boys in Rubane.

325 HIA 399 and HIA 261 left Rubane to return to their family in July 1962 and BR 17 left Rubane in August 1962, but he continued to maintain contact with the family and to provide them with financial support. HIA 261 described how on such a visit to the family home BR 17 stayed overnight and slept with him in a single bed and proceeded to touch HIA 261's genitals and attempted to have oral sex with him.

326 HIA 261 summed up the impact of the abuse on him:

> "It wasn't just the physical aspect of the abuse that affected me; it messed with your mind. I remember thinking I hope when I grow up it isn't compulsory the way mass and prayers were compulsory. I was thinking I hope this isn't something all adults do because it doesn't seem right at all."[295]

327 We are satisfied that BR 17 sexually abused boys in Rubane over a number of years. We consider BR 19's handling of the investigation in 1958 was gravely deficient, in particular his failure, despite his doubts about BR 17's behaviour and honesty, to report the matter to the police, to the governing body, or to the MoHA as he should have done.

328 BR 17 remained in post for almost four more years until he was moved on 1 August 1962 to work in a primary school in Downpatrick. We are aware from documentation provided by the Order that BR 17 sexually abused children while working in Downpatrick. Had BR 19 reported the 1958 allegations to the civil authorities as he should have done, then it may well be the case that BR 17 would have been brought to justice at that time, and so have been unable to abuse more children in Rubane and in Downpatrick. We consider BR 19's decision, as Provincial, not to report the allegations as he should have done was a systemic failure by the Order to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

329 Although the Order provided the Inquiry with handwritten notes that BR 19 made during his investigation of BR 17 and related correspondence, it is clear from the evidence we heard from the Order that Provincials did not as a matter of course leave confidential files to make their successors aware of previous investigations into the conduct of brothers. Br Francis Manning addressed this issue in his oral evidence to the Inquiry:

> "I find it difficult to rationalise why on leaving office a Provincial would not brief his successor on abuse issues so as to build a knowledge base within the Order. There is no doubt that the Order, like many organisations, must have felt a great sense of embarrassment about the complaints, and this led to a certain element of secrecy, which was unhelpful in educating the Order to the risks of such offending."[296]

330 We agree that this element of secrecy was unhelpful to the Order and unsatisfactory in relation to ensuring the protection of children.

331 The second recorded incident of alleged sexual abuse being investigated in Rubane relates to BR 14. A number of witnesses to the Inquiry alleged BR 14 physically abused them but none alleged he sexually abused them. However, HIA 252 described him sitting with boys in his knee and fondling them in the television room and removing boys from their beds at night.[297]

332 HIA 262 recounted being sexually abused by a brother on his first night in the main house in Rubane when he was aged 11 years. He said the brother who abused him told him he was protecting him from older boys and then proceeded to sexually abuse him, including making him administer oral sex. Commenting about this allegation the Order point out that BR 14 was located in the main house at this time.[298] HIA 97 made allegations about a BR 25, including that he pulled his testicles in the shower, but accepted that he was confused about the name of the brother and the Order has suggested, given the details provided by HIA 97, many of which concern behaviour on the hurley pitch that it may be BR 14 he is talking about. HIA 160 told the inquiry that BR 14 was known "as a dirty old man".[299]

333 Although the Inquiry received no direct allegations about sexual abuse by BR 14 it did examine and will now consider how allegations of sexual abuse against BR 14 were dealt with by the Order, because of the significance of how the Order dealt with these allegations and communicated about them with relevant parties.

334 In 1964, DL 13, then aged 13 years, was placed in Rubane by County Down Welfare Authority for non-school attendance. He told his brother on a visit home that he did not want to return to Rubane because he was being sexually abused by BR 14. His family reported this to County Down Welfare Authority who referred the matter to the police and to the MoHA. DL 13 made a statement to the police on 19 August 1964 in which he alleged he had been sexually abused by BR 14 on three occasions.

335 County Down Welfare Authority informed BR 6, the then director of Rubane, about the allegations, and he in turn informed the Provincial BR 19. BR 19 asked BR 6 to meet with BR 14, who was on holiday in the South of Ireland, to discuss the allegations. BR 6 did so and when BR 14 refused to return to Northern Ireland to face the allegations BR 6 told him to go to the Irish headquarters of the Order at Castletown in County Laois to discuss the matter with BR 19. This meeting took place and Br Pius in his statement to the Inquiry on behalf of the Order stated that BR 14 admitted to one incident of 'immoral conduct' with one boy when he had drink taken, and consequently BR 19 advised him to seek a dispensation from his vows which he agreed to do. BR 14 remained in Castletown until his dispensation was granted, which meant that the police in Northern Ireland were unable to prefer charges against him as he was outside their jurisdiction. The dispensation was granted and BR 14 left the Order on 9 October 1964.

336 Miss Forrest of the MoHA had at least two meetings with the police and with the Newtownards District Welfare Officer to discuss the matter prior to meeting with BR 6 in Rubane on 7 September 1964 to discuss it. According to the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) minute dated 9 September 1964, Miss Forrest was at that stage:

> "endeavouring to assist the Ministry to decide whether or not the school at Rubane should continue to be recognised as an approved voluntary school with particular emphasis on ascertaining whether this was an isolated incident or whether more boys might have been involved."[300]

337 Ms Forrest made a note of these discussions and recorded that the police had interviewed boys named by DL 13 who had left Rubane but who he presumably suggested were aware of BR 14's behaviour and that "they denied all knowledge of such a thing".[301]

338 BR 19 went to Rubane on 18 September 1964 to investigate the allegations and in a subsequent written report to the MoHA, dated 19 September 1964,[302] he explained that he told the brothers that a serious charge had been made against a brother and that any information they could give would be appreciated; it appears from his report that no information was provided. He also reported that since the boys were unaware of any untoward incident he decided it would be more discreet to refrain from carrying out an individual investigation:

> "which would serve no useful purpose but which would unquestionably undermine the good relationship between Brothers and boys and result in rousing their curiosity."[303]

339 BR 19 informed MoHA officials that BR 14 admitted to a single incident with one boy only and assured them that in response to that admission the Order took immediate measures to ensure that BR 14 would never again be allowed to have any contact with boys in any school. He also stated that he could personally certify that the remaining staff in Rubane were thoroughly reliable and in every respect suitable to carry out their duties.[304]

340 BR 19 and BR 6 met with Mr Parkes and Ms Forrest in Stormont on 21 September 1964 to discuss the matter and, on the basis of the information provided, the MoHA concluded that no further action was necessary. With reference to this meeting, BR 19 recorded in a file note that it had been agreed that his report about his investigation would be kept confidential and that no further action would be taken.[305] Mr Parkes of MoHA wrote on 30 September 1964 to an RUC Chief Inspector asking for a full report of the police actions and findings in the case so that the Minister could be kept as fully informed as possible, given that the case could lead to repercussions, and assured him that this report would be treated as strictly confidential.[306] There is a note to show that the Minister had sight of these papers on 25 November 1964.[307]

341 Following the meeting with BR 6 on 21 September 1964, Miss Forrest contacted Down Welfare Authority and informed them that the Provincial had informed the Ministry in writing that the incident involving DL 13 was an isolated one and that he would ensure that BR 14 would not be put in a position in the future where similar occurrences could take place. On the basis of this information the official recorded that he told Miss Forrest that in the circumstances no further action appeared necessary.[308]

342 In his report to the MoHA about his investigation of this case and subsequent action BR 19 did not mention his previous investigation into allegations of sexual misconduct against BR 17 and there is nothing to suggest that he raised this in his discussions with officials. We agree with Dr Hilary Harrison's conclusions on behalf of the DHSSPS, in her statement to the Inquiry of 19 September 2014, that if the Provincial had shared that information:

> "…the Ministry and the police might have questioned the conclusions about the isolated nature of the 1964 incident."[309]

343 Dr Harrison accepted that the MoHA was aware of previous allegations about sexual abuse at St Patrick's in 1948 but, since it was judged at the time by an ecclesiastical commission established to investigate them that they were unfounded, it was unlikely that the officials dealing with the case of BR 14 would have been aware of the 1948 case.

344 Dr Harrison concluded:

> "The Department believes that the actions of the Ministry were consistent with both the information they were given and the knowledge about child sexual abuse that existed at the time."[310]

345 We agree with this conclusion and accept that it was reasonable on the basis of the information provided by the Provincial to the Department that it decided the matter had been properly handled by the Order. Dr Harrison also pointed out that this incident prompted the MoHA to be firmer with BR 6 about the need for adequate staffing in Rubane. On 18 November 1964, with reference to proposed new accommodation developments at Rubane, Mr Parker wrote to BR 6 and stressed the need for the home to be properly staffed and made the point:

308 RUB 9321
309 RUB 1895.
310 RUB 1894.

> "Recent events have given added point to our feeling that where such a small staff have so much to do for so many children the development of a satisfactory relationship of trust and confidence between individual children and members of staff is virtually impossible."[311]

346 During the gathering of material for this module the Inquiry asked for a copy of BR 14's letter seeking dispensation from his vows and any related documentation. The Order made arrangements to get copies of these documents and submitted them to the Inquiry and it became clear from this documentation that BR 14 had admitted to more than a one-off incident. In his letter seeking dispensation he admitted to "grave immoral actions with a number of boys".[312] BR 19 countersigned BR 14's letter and described him as "a positive danger to young people". In a separate letter to Brother Vicar General in Rome about the matter BR 19 stated "during the past three years he has interfered with boys, a couple each year."[313] BR 19's letter is dated 12 September 1964, five days before he submitted his report to MoHA officials assuring them that BR 14 had only admitted to a one-off incident with one boy.

347 We are satisfied that BR 19 deliberately mislead the MoHA by withholding information he had about the extent of BR 14's sexual abuse of children and by saying this incident at Rubane was a one-off. He should have revealed the full extent of BR 14's offending to the MoHA and had he done so, it could well have prompted a thorough investigation into Rubane and a reappraisal of the home's suitability to continue as a children's home. We consider that the deliberate suppression by BR 19 of the extent of BR 14's sexual abuse of other young boys was a systemic failure on the part of the Order to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

348 Dr Hilary Harrison provided a supplementary statement to the Inquiry on 3 December 2014 on the basis of this new evidence and concluded:

> "The Department believes that as consequence of vital information having been withheld in relation to 1964 investigation, an opportunity which had the potential to lead to earlier recognition of the vulnerability of children in institutional care was lost."[314]

349 It appears that Down Welfare Authority informed Belfast Welfare Authority about the matter, as its Chief Welfare Officer visited Rubane in early September seeking assurances in relation to it. BR 6 wrote to BR 19 about this visit and commented:

> "As far as I can gather the Welfare is pretty sympathetic towards the case and are looking for a guarantee that the home is a salutary place for boys to be sent to."[315]

350 Although it is positive that the Chief Welfare Officer sought this reassurance it appears that he accepted it to such an extent that he did not share information about the matter with his social work colleagues. Mr Bunting in his evidence explained that he had only heard about the case of BR 14 as part of the information he received in relation to this Inquiry. We consider this lack of communication to be a serious omission and note that the HSCB acknowledged this in its closing written submission to this module.

351 The HSCB also pointed out in its closing written submission that because the full details of the case were not shared with the welfare authorities the possibility of institutional sexual abuse of children was not recognised by social workers in Northern Ireland before 1980.

BR 15

352 The third allegation of sexual abuse in Rubane that is investigated by the Order is a complaint made by HIA 36 that he was sexually abused by BR 15. The details of how this complaint was made are unclear; BR 6 who was the Brother Director at the time of the complaint indicated in a police interview that he thought the complaint might have come from a social worker. However, in his evidence to the Inquiry HIA 36 said he thought he told his mother and that she contacted BR 6 and possibly DL 140 the chaplain. The Order has no records of any investigation of the complaint but informed the Inquiry that the then Provincial, Br Maurice Kirk, visited Rubane between 13 and 15 November 1970 and three days later on 18 November 1970 BR 6 visited HIA 36's mother. On 26 January 1971 BR 6 met Br Maurice in Downpatrick and although there are no records of the content of that meeting, BR 15 was subsequently moved to Finglas on 31 January 1971. The Order told the inquiry that the Provincial was faced with a strenuous denial of any wrongdoing by BR 15 and that HIA 36's mother had indicated that her son's word was not reliable. Br Maurice nonetheless decided to move BR 15 from Rubane as a precautionary measure. There is no record of this alleged abuse being reported to the police, the MoHA or the Board of Governors and we consider this to be a systemic failing by the Order to take necessary action to enable the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving sexual abuse.

353 The Inquiry heard from 34 witnesses who were resident in Rubane during the time BR 15 worked there and ten of these witnesses,[316] including HIA 36, alleged they were sexually abused by BR 15.

354 The alleged abuse ranged from being kissed,[317] fondled and masturbated,[318] being made to engage in simulated sex[319] to anal rape.[320] HIA 36 described how in his first night in Rubane, when he was 11 years old, BR 15 brought him to his bedroom, made him undress and forced him to masturbate him. HIA 36 recalled:

> "I felt dirty and disgusted and wanted to get out of the room. I started to cry and he told me if I didn't stop he would give me something to cry about."[321]

355 HIA 36 also described being abused by BR 15 alongside another boy DL 271, known as "half pint" because he was small in stature. HIA 56 told the Inquiry that on one occasion he went to BR 15's bedroom and interrupted him having sexual activity with DL 271.[322]

356 The Order has accepted that HIA 36 was abused by BR 15 and they have also accepted he sexually abused HIA 147 and have paid HIA 147 compensation for that abuse.

357 HIA 36 was one of the few witnesses who reported the abuse he was experiencing, and although this eventually led to BR 15 being removed from Rubane he told the Inquiry about the inappropriate responses he received when he initially reported the abuse. He recalled the chaplain, DL 140, telling him that BR 15 was unwell and would be moved and DL 115, a house parent advising him to put the abuse behind him and forget it. HIA 36 also described how, when he told his mother about the abuse, she initially refused to believe him but he explained that he understood her reaction because she would have thought the brothers were beyond reproach.

358 In addition to these ten witnesses, HIA 279 recalled a brother fondling him in his bed at night and in the brother's office. He was unsure of the name of the brother but remembered that he was in charge of the clothing store, which was BR 15's responsibility towards the end of HIA 279's time in Rubane. Given that HIA 279's account of the abuse is similar to that described by another witness[323] we are of the view that HIA 279 was abused by BR 15. Since HIA 279 left Rubane on 24 December 1956 this would mean BR 15 commenced sexually abusing boys soon after his arrival in Rubane on 17 November 1956.

359 Five other witnesses[324] gave evidence about observing BR 15 sexually interfering with boys under their clothing while watching television or films in a darkened room and three of them[325] referred to BR 15 interfering with boys at night in the dormitories.

360 We are satisfied that between 1953 when BR 17 arrived in Rubane and 1971 when BR 15 left, 18 years in total, at any one time there was at least one brother sexually abusing boys. We are also satisfied that for a five-year period from 1957 to 1962 when these three brothers were working together in Rubane, as part of a small community of brothers, they were all sexually abusing boys. In its submissions to the Inquiry the Order has accepted that BR 17, BR 14 and BR 15 were sexually abusing boys in Rubane between 1956 and 1962.[326]

361 One of the most concerning aspects of the behaviour of these brothers is that at the same time as they were sexually abusing boys they were also very physically aggressive in the home, including towards boys they were sexually abusing. Exploitation of the power differential between adults and children is a common feature of sexual abuse of children, but this was particularly the case in relation to these three brothers who reinforced that differential with frequent displays of physical violence towards boys.

362 For example, HIA 183, who was sexually abused by BR 17, described receiving a severe beating from him for saying he was learning a hymn rather than Latin and observing BR 15, who also sexually abused him, hitting a boy with a bamboo cane until blood poured from the boy's face.[327]

363 HIA 247 told the Inquiry that he told no one that BR 17 was abusing him because he was frightened of crossing him. HIA 56 said he told no one about being abused by BR 15 because although he had not been hit by him he had seen how he hit other boys. HIA 399, who was sexually abused by BR 17, described him beating boys until the sweat poured from him.

364 Some boys who managed to tell another adult about the abuse they were experiencing received an aggressive or hostile response. For example, HIA 36 said he was caned by BR 6 when he told him he was being abused by BR 15. HIA 252 recalled that when he told DL 411 of the Welfare Authority about being sexually abused by BR 17, DL 411 shouted at him and said he was lying and that the brothers were religious men who wouldn't do such things. HIA 252 explained that as a result of DL 411's reaction: "I did not tell anyone else what had happened to me because I thought that they would not believe me and that it would be a waste of time."[328]

365 Witnesses also described grooming behaviour by the brothers and the confusion that created for them. HIA 399 told the Inquiry of his confused feelings about BR 17's behaviour:

> "I obviously had mixed feelings towards BR 17 as I knew he was buying gifts to keep me sweet but I hated what he was doing to me and did not feel I could talk to anyone about it."[329]

HIA 261 described his feelings when BR 17 bought him a second-hand bike after sexually abusing him; "I remember feeling guilty as if I was playing the game".[330]

366 Another witness who described feeling guilty about abuse he suffered was HIA 152. HIA 152 described to the Inquiry how he was groomed and sexually abused by BR 65 who worked in Rubane for a short time alongside BR 15 and he explained how he was left feeling the abuse was his fault:

> "I always felt it was my fault because I never tried to stop it, or put up a fight but I suppose I was too young to know what to do."[331]

367 A number of witnesses described occasions when they were subjected to sexual assaults by a brother when other brothers were present and also took part in the abuse. We have carefully considered all the evidence relating to these allegations. Given that the evidence we have heard during this Inquiry, as well as the experience of cases heard in criminal courts, suggests that sexual assault is almost invariably perpetrated when the abuser and the victim are alone together, such allegations have to be regarded with considerable circumspection. We have given very careful consideration and we are not persuaded to the requisite standard of proof that brothers sexually assaulted boys in front of other brothers in Rubane.

Did other brothers know that brothers were sexually abusing boys?

368 However, there is the question of how much brothers who were sexually abusing boys knew about the sexual abuse being perpetrated by their fellow brothers. Br Pius in his evidence to the Inquiry explained that the communities of brothers were generally small, of three to ten brothers, and that there was strict timetable which meant "it was almost impossible for a Brother to do anything without the Community knowing about it."[332]

369 We do not know whether the three brothers who were sexually abusing boys in Rubane at the same time were aware of each other's behaviour, discussed it or co-ordinated it. However, given the small number of brothers in the community in Rubane, the close living and working conditions and the talk that went on between the boys about the abuse we consider it probable that the three brothers were aware of each other's activities and took some comfort that their sexual misconduct was unlikely to be challenged by like-minded brothers. We consider that BR 14 and BR 15 could have taken particular comfort from their knowledge that the Br Director, BR 17, was sexually abusing boys and therefore would be likely to overlook their behaviour if it was reported to him.

370 Although the most serious sexual abuse was carried out in secrecy, and usually in the brother's room, it is significant that brothers were prepared to engage in covert sexual activity such as manual stimulation of boys when other boys were present in the television room and at night in the dormitories. This was an era when room lights were commonly turned off when the television was on, so they had the advantage of carrying out their abuse in darkness, as would have been the case when they interfered with boys at night in the dormitories.

371 However covert or discreet this behaviour was, it was being conducted in public places in front of a number of boys and it is clear from witnesses that the boys knew what was going on. The brothers therefore ran a significant risk of their behaviour being discovered. That they were prepared to run that risk suggests that they felt confident their behaviour would not be challenged or reported and that this confidence allowed them to abuse boys on a regular basis. HIA 279 commented in relation to being interfered with by a brother, who we take to be BR 15, at night in the dormitory and in his office:

> "He never threatened or warned me not to tell anyone about these incidents. He acted as if it was normal behaviour."[333]

372 We also consider it reasonable to assume that BR 15 and BR 14 would have taken some comfort from the way the allegations about BR 17 were dealt with and that he was allowed to remain in post. We noted that in BR 19's notes of his investigation into the allegations about BR 17 he recorded that the brothers had initially "seemed to assume the Dtor. [Director] was guilty"[334] which suggests that they may have been aware of BR 17's behaviour with the boys. He also recorded that BR 15 gave BR 17 a hint that there were some serious charges against him, which might indicate some form of collusion between the brothers. As previously referred to during the first investigation into BR 17's behaviour, both BR 15 and BR 14 told the Provincial they could not believe the allegations against him. The Provincial recorded and gave weight to these assurances, so we have the situation of two brothers who were sexually abusing boys supporting a senior brother who was accused of doing so.

373 The other suggestion of collusion is that it was BR 15 who sent HIA 152 to BR 65's room and BR 65 went on to groom and sexually abuse HIA 152.

374 The low level of staffing, particularly in the early days before the introduction of the chalet system, may also have contributed to creating an environment that enabled sexual abuse to go unobserved by other staff, since it meant brothers were often working alone with the boys in the evening. In his evidence to the Inquiry BR 2 said that he would not have been in the television room with another brother because he would be getting on with other work such as preparing lessons in his room while the boys were being supervised.

333 RUB 899.

375 The low staffing level also meant that brothers would often work alone, supervising boys showering and in the dormitories, and even when lay staff were employed the brother attached to each chalet remained responsible for supervising night care.[335] BR 2 accepted in his evidence to the Inquiry that the problem some boys had with enuresis gave BR 15 a reason for being in the dormitories at night without raising suspicion among other staff.[336]

376 The inadequate accommodation in Rubane also meant that the brothers lived in close proximity to the boys' dormitories, which would have enabled ready access to the boys and made it easier for brothers to take boys to their bedrooms. This close proximity may also have meant that brothers who had a propensity towards sexually abusing boys were in the situation where the temptation to do so was high.

BR 1

377 The next time that allegations of sexual abuse were formally investigated in Rubane is in 1980. On 3 April 1980 a social worker, DL 524, employed by the EHSSB had a discussion with former residents of Rubane in the light of reports that were emerging about sexual abuse in Kincora. Kincora was a children's home in Belfast which we consider in Chapters 23 to 27 of this report. The former residents made references to inappropriate sexual behaviour by the then Director of Rubane, BR 1. DL 524 referred this matter to her seniors, who then informed Bishop Philbin as the chairman of the board of governors of Rubane and the police. Bishop Philbin suspended BR 1 on 12 April 1980 and subsequently the then Provincial, Br Columba Gallagher, arranged for BR 1 to move to a secretarial post in Dublin. The Order stated in its evidence to the Inquiry that Br Gallagher interviewed BR 1 at length on a number of occasions about the allegations but he strenuously denied them.[337] BR 1's explanation for the allegations was that in the absence of trained medical staff he undertook "medical examinations" of new entrants to identify any problem with nits, or body lice and to notice any birth marks, tattoos or scars by which they could be readily identified.[338]

378 As mentioned previously, as a result of the allegations against BR 1 the police interviewed 124 boys who were resident in Rubane between 1977 and 1980. Twenty-nine boys made allegations of a sexual nature about BR 1 and the police brought charges against him. However, BR 1 developed a malignant tumour of the spine and the Public Prosecution Service decided not to pursue proceedings against him. BR 1 underwent major surgery and had a remission for a number of years before dying from a malignant tumour of the brain in October 2000. The Order has settled a number of civil claims made against BR 1.

379 The Inquiry heard evidence from eleven witnesses who were resident in Rubane at the same time as BR 1, seven of these told the Inquiry about inappropriate sexual behaviour by BR 1. HIA 362 told us that BR 1 gave him a "medical examination" when he was admitted to Rubane during which BR 1 told him to undress so that he could check for rashes and that once he was undressed BR 1 groped and fondled his genitals. HIA 362 said that on subsequent occasions BR 1 used the pretence of tickling him and playing with him in order to touch him on the backside.[339] DL 40 was interviewed by the police in 1980 and told them that BR 1 rubbed his chest inside his shirt and patted him on the bottom but always over his trousers.[340] HIA 104 described BR 1 trying to put his hand down the front and back of his trousers[341] and HIA 170 described BR 1 standing close to him and touching his behind .[342]

380 HIA 259 told the Inquiry that BR 1 tried to intimidate him into giving him oral sex[343] and HIA 41 told the Inquiry that BR 1 masturbated and raped him in the showers and that he saw him sexually abusing boys at the back of the school.[344] HIA 149 described BR 1 caning him for running away and fondling his genitals as he caned him.

381 The Order pointed out that the allegations made about BR 1 in the 1980 police investigation were about the "medical examinations" he undertook and inappropriate touching. They said that no allegations of masturbation, oral sex or anal rape were made about BR 1 until such allegations were made about him to the police when they were investigating the conduct of Father Brendan Smyth. These allegations resulted in BR 1 being arraigned on a variety of charges including aiding and abetting buggery, which was inaccurately reported in newspapers as buggery. Ultimately the police did not progress the charges in the Bill of Indictment against BR 1; a related civil action against the Order was discontinued. The Order has suggested that the misleading reports in the media that BR 1 had been charged with buggery led to some people, including witnesses to this Inquiry, coming forward with new allegations of more serious sexual abuse by BR 1 than they had previously made.[345]

382 A feature of the allegations against BR 1 was that he observed and touched boys when they were showering. A number of witnesses told the Inquiry about brothers observing boys in the shower and appearing to get sexual gratification from doing so (HIA 390 and HIA 388). The Order has stated that brothers had to supervise boys in the showers to prevent horseplay that could lead to accidents and while we accept that such supervision may have been necessary we consider that the discomfort witnesses remembered and described was genuine and justified.

383 We are satisfied from the evidence we have received that BR 1 used the pretence of medical examinations to sexually abuse boys and that more generally he inappropriately fondled boys. We consider it particularly significant that he acted in this way while he was the Brother Director, given the authority that role gave him and that it meant there was no brother senior to him in Rubane to whom the boys could have expressed their concerns about his behaviour. The Order has accepted in its closing submission to this module that BR 1 conducted medical examinations and put his arms around boys and touched them inappropriately and that this behaviour was "inappropriate, constituted an assault, made the boys feel uncomfortable and was abusive".[346]

Fr Brendan Smyth

384 Two witnesses in Module 3 told the Inquiry that Fr Brendan Smyth sexually abused them in Rubane (HIA 41 and DL 40.) We are dealing with allegations against Fr Smyth in Chapter 10 of this report. However, we note here that DL 40 told the Inquiry that he told BR 1 that Fr Smyth was abusing him and although he did not know what action, if any, BR 1 took, from that point on Father Smyth stopped contacting and visiting him. We have seen no evidence to suggest that BR 1 reported this abuse to the police, the Diocese or Fr Smyth's Order.

385 Two social workers from the EHSSB sat in on the police interviews with the residents and former residents from Rubane and provided a report about them to their senior manager, DL 524. In the report they recommended:

> "Following the investigation we both consider that all the social work staff involved with Kircubbin be made aware of the police action as soon as is practicably possible to minimise potential problems in a very delicate situation."[347]

It would appear from the evidence of DL 503 that this did not happen. DL 524 told us that he acted on the basis of his understanding that since the matter was subject to a criminal investigation with potential prosecutions to follow, he was under a duty to maintain confidentiality so as not to risk prejudicing the police investigation. He explained that he shared information about the police investigations with senior colleagues in EHSSB and that although his direct involvement was limited to the time of the initial police investigation he would have no doubt that social work staff would have been made aware of the situation once it was possible and appropriate to do so. While we accepted DL 524's explanation about his concern not to prejudice the police investigation we considered it would have been preferable to have entrusted social workers responsible for boys in Rubane and for placing boys in the home with the information on the basis of strictest confidentiality. The HSCB accepted in its closing submission to this module that social workers were not informed at the time and that that was a potential failing. We agree and consider this failure to communicate such significant information about matters relevant to the protection and safety of children amounts to a systemic failing.

Allegations of sexual abuse by lay staff

386 During the police investigation of BR 1 allegations emerged about a member of lay staff, DL 509, who was subsequently sentenced for three offences of indecent assault and three offences of gross indecency against two boys for which he was given a twelve-month prison sentence suspended for three years. Although the criminal proceedings related to DL 509's conduct when the two boys were in Nazareth Lodge, one of the boys, DL 56 and his older brother HIA 149, were resident in Rubane while DL 509 worked there and he was allowed to take them out on weekend trips. DL 56 is now dead but his brother HIA 149 told the Inquiry that DL

347 RUB 1666.

509 sexually abused his brother and him during one of these trips. In his evidence to the Inquiry DL 509 denied this allegation but we found HIA 149's account convincing.

387 The Inquiry heard allegations of sexual abuse against other lay members of staff and HIA 25 told us about being sexually abused when he was staying overnight in the home a man DL 417. DL 417 had taught music for a short time in Rubane and had befriended HIA 25. We will consider the case of one member of lay staff as an example of the allegations we have heard. Four witnesses HIA 19, HIA 132, HIA 56, and HIA 21 told the Inquiry they were abused by DL 134. HIA 19 described DL 134 groping him as he discussed the facts of life with him;[348] HIA 132 described being abused by DL 134 when he was alone in the car with him one evening;[349] HIA 56 described being sexually abused by DL 134, including being made to sexually engage with an older boy in the shower, who was also coerced into this activity by DL 134,[350] and HIA 21 recounted DL 134 making unsuccessful attempts to sexually abuse him, and then humiliating and abusing him by making him shower in front of him.[351]

388 HIA 21 explained that one of DL 134's attempts to abuse him was stopped by BR 13, who lived in the chalet with DL 134 and his wife DL 135, coming into DL 134's room to find out why HIA 21 had been in there for so long.[352] HIA 21 said he told BR 13 and BR 3 that something had to be done about DL 134 and DL 135[353] but did not tell them that he was being sexually abused by DL 134.

389 The Order dismissed DL 134 and his wife DL 135 and told the Inquiry that this was because of their poor relationships with the boys and other staff and that the MoHA and Bishop Philbin had become involved because DL 134 and DL 135 tried to challenge their dismissal. In 1995 former residents of Rubane were interviewed as part of Operation Overview, the investigation into physical and sexual abuse in residential homes for children in Northern Ireland. Allegations of sexual abuse by DL 134 emerged during these police investigations. The Order told the Inquiry that was the first time it was aware of any allegations about DL 134 sexually abusing boys.

390 To illustrate a changing approach to the handling of allegations of sexual abuse we will look at the case of BR 33. In August 1983 and August 1984 allegations of a sexual nature were made against BR 33, who was at that time a lay care assistant but had up until 1 August 1982 been a member of the Order. In August 1983 a resident, DL 469, and his mother made an allegation that BR 33 had put his arms around DL 469. DL 469 shortly afterwards withdrew the allegation but his social worker DL 470 undertook an investigation of it on 12 September 1983 and the Order told the Inquiry that it was recorded that DL 470 was satisfied that the allegation had been fabricated.

391 On 2 August 1984 another resident made an allegation that BR 33 fondled him as he was putting him to bed. BR 33 denied the allegations but the matter was referred to the police and Bishop Philbin as the chair of the governing board issued written instructions that BR 33 was to be suspended pending the outcome of the police investigations. During his suspension BR 33 submitted a letter of resignation, saying he wished to return to the South of Ireland and that he had permission from the police to do so. Br Martin, the then Brother Director, checked that was the case before accepting his resignation. The management committee was informed about the investigation into BR 33 and his decision to resign and Fr McCann and Br Martin met with DHSS officials in February 1985 to update them on the decision of the police to recommend no proceedings to the Director of Public Prosecutions.[354]

392 From the evidence we have heard we are satisfied that members of lay staff were engaged in sexual abuse of boys in Rubane. We are also satisfied that, as the case of BR 33 shows, by the 1980s the allegations of sexual abuse against lay staff were being reported to the appropriate authorities.

393 In addition to the allegations about sexual abuse detailed above we have heard allegations that other brothers and members of lay staff sexually abused boys in Rubane. These allegations range from touching boys outside their clothes to anal rape and include allegations that brothers acted together, combined violence with sexual abuse and used sexual abuse as a means of asserting their authority. All the relevant brothers and lay staff have denied these allegations and they and the Order have pointed out what they say are weaknesses and inconsistencies in the evidence of many of the witnesses making the allegations.

394 We have not accepted all the allegations or all the denials we have heard. It is not the purpose of this Inquiry to make findings in relation to every allegation put to it or to set out the detail of every claim and counter claim. We have to determine whether there was sexual abuse of boys in Rubane and, if so, was it systemic? We are satisfied from the evidence we have heard that boys were sexually abused in Rubane by some brothers and some lay staff throughout the four decades the home was in operation and that this abuse was particularly prevalent up until the early 1970s. We consider the extent and frequency of the abuse was such that it was systemic and that the understaffing and lack of oversight of the brothers' interactions with children, particularly in the evenings and at night time, enabled the conditions that allowed the abuse to occur and continue unchecked. We found the Order failed to deal appropriately and adequately with boys who reported sexual abuse.

395 We are of the view that if the Provincial, BR 19, had involved the police in investigating the allegations about BR 17 or had even informed the governing board and/or the MoHA about the investigation there would have been the potential for not only BR 17's behaviour to be dealt with but also for the sexual abuse by BR 15 and BR 14 to be exposed. An independent and full investigation of BR 17's behaviour might have given boys more confidence to speak out about abuse, whereas the way in which the Order handled its investigation was likely to have done the opposite and reinforced for the boys that there was nothing to be gained in challenging the brothers.

396 The case of BR 14 is particularly significant because the Brother Provincial deliberately misled relevant bodies about the extent of BR 14's sexual misconduct in Rubane.

397 We consider the Order's failings to properly investigate allegations of sexual abuse and to properly report them to relevant authorities and its failure to take proper steps to protect children from further sexual abuse amount to a systemic failure to take appropriate steps to ensure the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving abuse.

398 The Order suggested that its responses to allegations of sexual abuse in 1958 and 1964 need to be understood in the context that at that time there was a lack of knowledge about the risk of adults abusing children in residential care. We accept that the sexual abuse of children in institutional care was not well known or discussed in Northern Ireland until the 1980s when concerns emerged about Kincora. However, it is clear from the way the Order's rules were drafted that it was aware of the need to guard against intimacy between brothers and boys. For example, in relation to the conduct expected of brothers the rules state:

> "They shall not touch their pupils through playfulness or familiarity, and they shall never touch them on the face." Rule Page 103 (7)[355]

> "They shall not receive Brothers, students or outsiders in their rooms." Rule Page 13 (3*)[356]

399 The Order also went as far as to set down strict guidelines for the physical layout of buildings in order to ensure that behaviour could be observed at all times, for example how windows should be placed in doors to ensure clear sight of what was going on in rooms:

> "The Brother Director shall be careful that the parlour doors have glazed panels without curtains, in such a manner that the interior may be easily seen."[357]

We consider it reasonable to assume that it was the collective experience of the Order about the risk of sexual misbehaviour that first led to the creation and setting of these very specific rules.

400 Also, we are aware from information provided by the Order that during the six-year period that BR 19 dealt with three allegations of sexual abuse at Rubane he also dealt with similar allegations about brothers working as teachers in Southern Ireland. Therefore, we do not accept, as the Order has suggested, that he would have found it inconceivable that such abuse could occur; we are of the view that he knew only too well that it could and that in the case of Rubane he was determined to conceal the abuse from the civil and diocesan authorities.

401 We consider the failure by brothers in Rubane to adhere to the Order's rules, in particular the rules which BR 19 attempted to reinforce about not having boys in their rooms and not travelling in cars alone with boys, helped to create a climate where sexual abuse occurred on a significant scale and went unchecked. We consider the failure by the brothers to observe their own rules was a systemic failure and that it was particularly significant because it betrayed the implicit trust that other bodies such as the MoHA, the welfare authorities and the Diocese placed in the Order as a faith-based organisation suitable to be entrusted to run a residential home for children entrusted to their care.

356 Ibid.
357 RUB 1819.

402 We consider the Order's failure to properly implement and monitor adherence to its rules, which were designed to keep boys free from sexual abuse, was a systemic failure to ensure that children were kept free from abuse.

403 In his statement to the Inquiry, Br Pius McCarthy stated in relation to sexual abuse by brothers in Rubane:

> "There is no evidence that, at that time, the Brothers or society in general understood the harm and damage that child abuse caused and there was little understanding of the nature of a sexual predator or paedophile and how he could be effectively prevented from engaging in such behaviour."[358]

He pointed out that the dilemma of sex abuse and how to deal with it effectively was not understood by society, the Church, or the Religious Congregations.

> "It was regarded as a moral fault which could be corrected by guidance and repentance. The offender was confronted and the error of his ways pointed out to him. If he was contrite, he was advised to go to confession and make a new start in a new community."[359]

404 We accept that until the late 1970s or early 1980s less was known and understood in Northern Ireland about the sexual abuse of children, but we consider the approach of moving brothers who had confessed to sexual abuse to other communities and not involving the police protected the position of the brother and the reputation of the Order rather than seeking to prevent further harm to children, and we consider it to be a systemic failure by the Order to ensure that children were free from abuse.

405 We acknowledge Bishop Philbin intervened to suspend BR 1 and BR 33 but we consider that up until then there was a systemic failing in the way the Diocese responded to allegations of sexual abuse in Rubane and that its lack of action allowed the abuse to continue. The chaplains in Rubane were appointed by the Diocese and were answerable to the bishop. We understand the seal of confession and that a chaplain could not tell the detail of what was said in confession to a third party. However, we consider that the chaplains should have found a means of alerting the bishop in a more general way to concerns about sexual abuse in Rubane and that as far as we are aware this failure to do so contributed to the continuance of that abuse in Rubane. We consider this to be a systemic failure by the Diocese to ensure that children were kept free from abuse and a systemic failure to ensure the institution provided proper care.

358 RUB 173.

406 The Belfast Welfare Authority recognised the need for social workers to maintain contact with children in care and introduced a policy of monthly visits and a three monthly review form which listed the dates on which social workers visited children. Referring to this policy in his evidence to the Hughes Inquiry Mr Bunting explained that it was implemented by the Belfast Welfare Authority and then the EHSSB despite the lack of statutory compulsion for such visiting. However, he acknowledged that it was not fully implemented because of shortages of social workers and the need for some clarification between the roles of field workers and residential social workers.[360]

407 In its evidence to the Inquiry the HSCB accepted that from the evidence available insufficient emphasis was placed on regular and frequent visits by social workers to children in Rubane in the 1950s and 1960s and/or there was insufficient recording of such visits. It recognised that this lack of visiting amounted to a weakness in this aspect of social work practice at that time[361] but pointed out that it improved in the 1970s.[362] The Order confirmed that social workers visited boys during the 1970s[363] and that although the frequency of visits varied in that period the involvement of social workers, particularly in care reviews, improved dramatically post 1980.[364]

408 We accept that the arrangements established by the Belfast Welfare Authority for social workers to visit children in care were ahead of their time and were not required by statute and we recognise the severe pressures social work departments were operating under during the height of the Troubles. However, we are of the view that more regular visits by social workers to boys they placed in Rubane in the 1950s and 1960s might have enabled boys suffering sexual abuse to disclose it.

409 That said, we consider that the EHSSB acted appropriately in reporting their concerns about Rubane to the police and to the DHSS, continuing its embargo on admissions and providing social workers to support boys while they were being interviewed by the police.

410 It became clear during the Inquiry that the case of sexual abuse by BR 14 in 1964 was not referred to the Hughes Inquiry. In October 2014, the HSCB told us that the Board did not bring this matter to the attention of the Hughes Inquiry despite Down Welfare Authority and Belfast Welfare Authority's involvement in it because records retention protocols meant that relevant records were not retained. Subsequently the HSCB informed us in September 2015 that a relevant file relating to DL 13 had been located amongst files relating to adoptions. The location of the file did not alter the fact that at the time of the Hughes Inquiry this case was not brought to the attention of senior EHSSB managers who had asked Districts to provide them with all relevant cases for the Inquiry. In seeking to address this oversight the Chief Executive of the HSCB explained that during the twenty years between the investigation of the abuse of DL 13 in Rubane and the Hughes Inquiry, the major reorganisation of local government in 1973 resulted in significant staff changes and changes in office and filing arrangements that led to a lack of corporate memory in relation to this case. We consider that there would have been more likelihood of this case being referred to the Hughes Inquiry had DL 13's records been properly filed and that this lapse in records management was poor practice. However, we accept how corporate memory about an investigation into abuse of a boy no longer in care, which could not be concluded because of the lack of co-operation of the alleged abuser, was lost in the aftermath of major organisational change.

411 The Department explained that it did not refer this matter to the Hughes Inquiry as the relevant file had been sent to the Northern Ireland Office because there was a criminal element to the case and the staff in the Department who engaged with the Hughes Inquiry were not aware of the file. Given that the Department had an ongoing responsibility for the regulation of Rubane we consider it should have retained some record of the alleged abuse and the assurances received from the De La Salle Order in relation to it. We consider the Department's failure to maintain intelligence about an investigation into sexual abuse in a children's home in a manner that allowed its existence to be known to relevant staff to be a systemic failure to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse as it meant the Hughes Inquiry was not made aware of the full extent of sexual abuse in Rubane.

Peer sexual abuse

412 Peer sexual activity among adolescent boys in a predominately male residential setting is not uncommon and a number of witnesses, for example, HIA 21, HIA 56, HIA 16 and HIA 225 referred to consensual sexual exploration that was part of growing up. However, the Inquiry heard evidence of non-consensual sexual activity among boys, including occasions of attempted rape, rape and group rape.

413 HIA 225 acknowledged sexual activity between boys and how "it was hard to work out what was right and what was wrong" but he differentiated that behaviour from the attempted rape of him by two older boys, whom he described as being in an open sexual relationship with each other. He described how, days after the attempted rape, the two boys involved were beating him up and BR 2 came across this and caned all three boys for fighting. He explained that he did not tell BR 2 about the abuse or report it to any other member of staff because he was frightened, since one of the boys who had abused him, DL 95, was the best fighter in the school.[365]

414 HIA 21 accepted in his evidence that he was involved in sexual exploration with other boys[366] but told the Inquiry he was raped by HIA 147 and another boy in a derelict building outside the grounds of Rubane.[367] A number of witnesses made allegations about HIA 147, (for example, HIA 19)[368] and we noted that while HIA 147 was being sexually predatory towards other boys he was being sexually abused by BR 15.

415 HIA 64 described having to fight off bigger boys who tried to sexually abuse him[369] and HIA 152 described having to regularly perform oral sex on older boys because if he refused they would beat him.[370] HIA 222 also referred to his fear of older boys and although he was not sexually abused himself he described coming across a group of older boys raping a younger boy in the woods and walking by and not intervening for fear that the same thing would happen to him.[371] In contrast, HIA 225 told the Inquiry how he repelled the sexual advances of HIA 21 and was able to do so because he was not frightened of him.[372]

416 It was clear from the evidence we heard that brothers were aware of the sexual activity amongst the boys. HIA 21, who described being sexually abused by HIA 147, said he was 90% certain that he had told BR 6 about the abuse. HIA 152 recalled brothers on occasion telling him to let them know if certain other boys touched him. He said he told BR 3 about being sexually abused by older boys but he did nothing about it.[373]

417 In contrast, HIA 56 described BR 3 giving him a severe beating because he suspected HIA 56 was sexually interfering with a new boy. He recalled BR 3 saying: "he's only in the place and you're at him".[374]

418 HIA 259 told the Inquiry he was sexually abused by an older boy, DL 58, who also physically abused him and took his pocket money. He said the brothers and staff knew about boys sexually abusing other boys but closed their ears to it:

> "If you reported it you would have got a clip on the ear or a more severe punishment. There was a culture of silence in the home in relation to sexual abuse."[375]

419 HIA 259 also said that BR 10 caught him and other boys beating up a boy to stop him sexually abusing a younger boy and when they explained why they had hit the boy BR 10 responded, "This is a boy's home what do you expect?" and proceeded to punish them for fighting but did not punish the boy they had hit.[376] When questioned about this at the Inquiry BR 10 said he had no memory of the incident but that if he had made such a comment he would have been referring to expecting fighting amongst boys.[377]

420 The police investigation in Rubane following the allegations about BR 1 identified non-consensual sexual activity amongst the boys. The police considered that there was sufficient evidence to convict the boys involved but decided not to because they were of similar ages. The Order told the Inquiry that the brothers were not informed by the police or social services about these police findings about sexual activity between boys. However, Bob Bunting told the Inquiry that the report prepared by the two EHSSB social workers who sat in on the interviews was shared with the management committee of Rubane and he thought it was also shared with Bishop Philbin.[378]

421 BR 2 confirmed that the brothers were aware of the risk of peer sexual activity and that they moved some boys from the chalets to the main house to keep a closer eye on them, limited access to the woods and sent some boys to see psychiatrists.[379] However, the Order accepted that with the benefit of hindsight consensual sexual activity and peer abuse among the boys was a greater problem than they appreciated contemporaneously.[380]

422 Although sexual exploration can be expected and is a normal part of growing up we are convinced from the evidence we heard that some of the sexual activity between boys in Rubane extended to sexual abuse on the grounds that it was not consensual, involved physical force or was inflicted by one or more older boys on a younger boy. We noted that some boys who were identified as being responsible for such behaviour gave convincing accounts of how they were sexually abused as young children prior to arriving in Rubane. While we are not suggesting that there is necessarily a correlation between being sexually abused and then going on to become sexually abusive, it does appear that some boys in Rubane modelled their behaviour on the way they were treated and became abusive once they grew into positions of power over younger boys. It also appears that there was a bullying, and at times violent, aspect to the peer sexual abuse in Rubane and we consider this reflects the more general culture in Rubane of bullying and the use of superior physical power to gain and maintain domination.

423 We consider that the brothers did identify and attempt to stop peer sexual abuse, particularly in the 1970s, and we do not therefore consider their inability to eradicate it to be a systemic failing.

Emotional abuse

424 There was clearly very significant emotional abuse associated with the physical and sexual abuse that boys suffered in Rubane. Witnesses talked of the fear and trepidation they experienced not knowing when they would next be subject to abuse, the confusion that grooming behaviour caused them and the mental impact of sexual and physical abuse. They told us that the brothers' inconsistent behaviour and changeable moods meant they felt they had to be constantly on their guard.

425 We consider the fear and intimidation created by the combination of sexual and physical abuse by some brothers, some of whom were abusing boys at the same time, was so corrosive to the childhoods of the boys who suffered this abuse and to the boys who lived in the shadow of it that it constituted emotional abuse.

426 Witnesses told us about how the abuse they suffered in Rubane affected them throughout their lives and caused them difficulties in establishing and maintaining personal relationships and in parenting. Some witnesses told us about the struggles they have had with alcohol and drug dependency and mental illness, and many referred to men who had been boys with them in Rubane who had died early deaths, some at their own hands, or who were too unwell or vulnerable to engage with the Inquiry. The impact of this emotional abuse has remained with witnesses throughout their lives. This was well illustrated by the testimony of HIA 56:

> "I have gone through life feeling sad and empty. I feel drained. I feel I have no worth, no value. I am lonely. I feel excluded and isolated. I wonder why I am different. I question 'is there something wrong with me?' I am clamped to the past. I have no qualifications, no employment prospects. I feel completely and utterly contaminated by abuse. I am sexually disorientated. I have prostituted my body and my mind - I feel destroyed and worthless. I avoid people where possible. I always try to please and pretend there is nothing wrong. I can't take the risk of letting people get too close. I feel afraid to trust. I am aware of the loneliness and isolation this creates. It is despairing but I feel safer. I have no motivation to make progress in anything. I have never loved or been loved. Simmering beneath the surface I feel dangerously full of unexpressed rage and anger with a dreadful sense of hopelessness."[381]

427 Only a few witnesses spoke of emotional abuse that was separate from that associated with sexual or physical abuse. HIA 385 and HIA 388 described the fear and distress they suffered when BR 15 threw them into the swimming pool even though they could not swim[382] and HIA 261 described observing BR 15 treating a boy aged around 8, and small for his age, in the same way.[383] HIA 244 described BR 15 making older boys throw new boys repeatedly into the swimming pool whether they could swim or not.[384]

428 HIA 19 and HIA 50 said DL 6 called them names and humiliated them.[385] HIA 382 who was generally very positive about his time at Rubane recalled a member of staff telling boys they were a "waste of space" and "useless".[386]

429 We consider the fear and distress caused to some boys in Rubane as a result of the physical and/or sexual abuse they suffered or witnessed others suffering amounts to a systemic failure by the Order to keep the boys free from harm.

Neglect

Medical treatment

430 Six witnesses complained about inadequate medical treatment in Rubane and some of them said they never saw a doctor or dentist while they were in the home,[387] HIA 31 said there was a delay in him being taken to the hospital after he was stabbed in the back by another boy.[388]

431 More witnesses remembered receiving medical treatment from a local doctor, being brought to see a visiting dentist and receiving hospital treatment for illnesses and injuries.

Food

432 Some witnesses[389] said the food in Rubane was basic but all right and HIA 45 said it was better than he would have got outside, but other witnesses complained about poor quality and insufficient food.[390]

HIA 385 stated, "It was the same food every day, and we were never given enough. We were always hungry"[391] and HIA 16 remembered having to compete with other boys for food, '...all the boys would grab the bread because they were so hungry and you had to be quick or you didn't get any."[392] HIA 262 recalled "We were always hungry. If we weren't fit enough or fast enough when we were brought in for breakfast or our evening meal, it was gone. If I didn't dive for food then I went hungry."[393] A few witnesses expressed the view that the brothers, who ate separately from the boys, got better food;[394] the Order denied that was the case.

433 In the main, witnesses appeared to find the food adequate and we accept that particularly in the early years the Order had to feed hungry adolescent boys with limited resources. We consider that on the whole the boys were adequately fed and were not neglected in this respect.

434 However, as stated previously, we consider the cramped, overcrowded sleeping and bathing facilities in Rubane before the chalets were built in 1968/1969 constitute neglect and, as we have stated previously, the length of time the Diocese, the Order and the MoHA allowed them to continue amounts to a systemic failing on all their parts to provide proper care.

Unacceptable practices

Mixture of boys in Rubane

435 A number of witnesses talked about the implications of Rubane accommodating a mixture of boys from Nazareth Lodge, many of whom were in care from infanthood and used to a disciplined institutional life, and boys who had been admitted directly from the community mainly because of failure to attend school and/or involvement in petty crime. The behaviour of these boys in the community was such that they were deemed to be beyond the control of their parents and in some cases beyond the control of the other children's homes. DL 455 commented on this mix:

> "On reflection, this was the biggest problem:- streetwise sexualised boys being placed into care with vulnerable sheltered children."[395]

HIA 97 commented:

> "I assumed we were all orphans or children from single parent families like myself but they would send lads that were due for release from the borstal in Milltown down to Kircubbin and they mixed them all in with us. It was horrific really."[396]

436 BR 2 commented on the mix of boys in his statement:

> "...ironically, the very issue that had driven Br Stephen Kelly in the conception of Rubane the prevention of 'mixing' the 'orphans and criminals' slowly developed in Rubane."[397]

437 We think it is important to recognise in this regard that some of the boys who transferred from Nazareth Lodge to Rubane had experienced physical and sexual abuse in that home and they demonstrated the effects of that abuse in their behaviour. They may have been more used to and acquiescent to the routine and discipline of institutional life but many were troubled children. Equally, some boys coming directly from the community were dealing with the trauma of being received into care for the first time and were vulnerable and distressed about leaving their families and their homes.

438 BR 2 described Rubane becoming a "catch all institution".[398] While not wishing to underestimate the expectations that would have been on the Order to admit boys, particularly in emergency situations, and the financial and other pressures to increase and maintain numbers in Rubane, this seems to suggest a somewhat passive approach to admissions. We consider that the Order, under the governance of the governing board, had a responsibility to manage admissions and to manage the mix of children that it accepted into its care.

Lack of background information about boys admitted to Rubane

439 BR 2 pointed out that often only the "bare bones" of information would transfer with a child coming to Rubane and that:

> "Lack of information ensured that empathy with a new entrant could not be optimised and also meant that the needs and problems of individual boys were not properly assessed or identified at admission. Important aspects of a boy's background were not necessarily passed on."[399]

396 RUB 568.
397 RUB 1041.
398 RUB 1066.
399 RUB 1055.

He explained that this was a particular issue for boys admitted from Nazareth Lodge and that the information received about them was sparse in the extreme:

> "...without names of parent/siblings, where they came from, their medical history, their educational attainments or special needs."[400]

We consider the Sisters of Nazareth's failure to pass relevant information about a child's time in Nazareth Lodge, even if little was known about their lives before coming into care, and the Order's willingness to accept children with this paucity of background information was unacceptable. We consider these practices showed a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well being and that they amount to a systemic failure by the Sisters of Nazareth and the Order to ensure the provision of proper care.

Boxing

440 Some witnesses recalled boxing matches being used by the brothers as a controlled way of allowing boys to settle disputes while others, such as HIA 244 and HIA 24, told us brothers made them fight older boys and did not intervene when they were being badly hurt in unequal matches.[401] For example, HIA 97 described BR 15 making him fight with older boys:

> "he would make us box the bigger boys and let them knock the hell out of us. I was younger and smaller than most of the boys and I think it amused him to see me getting hit by the bigger boys."[402]

441 Although we recognise that boxing as a sport can teach boys self discipline and how to control aggression, we accept that some children were made to engage in boxing matches against older boys and that some were hurt in these matches. We also consider that the use of boxing matches to settle disputes reinforced the general culture in Rubane of dominance being achieved through superior physical force rather than offering the boys other ways and methods for resolving their differences.

Soccer

442 HIA 97 and HIA 390 described being hit for playing soccer as it was an English game. The Order conceded that boys would not have been allowed to play soccer in the 1950s and early 1960s but that from then on soccer would have been allowed.

Potato-picking

443 Some witnesses talked positively of potato picking; HIA 64 said

> "We used to go potato–picking on the farm at Rubane and for outside farmers. It was tough work but I enjoyed it. I don't know if the farmers paid the Brothers but our payment was a trip to Belfast to the pictures once a year as a treat."[403]

Other witnesses remember being paid either daily or weekly for doing this work, DL 244 commented:

> "I remember going potato-picking on local farms in October. I got 2/6 each night. I really enjoyed it, we got out to local farms, got stew for lunch and had a good time."[404]

444 In contrast, HIA 244 described being "dragged out of school"[405] to go potato-picking for local farmers and he suggested that while the brothers got paid £1 per boy for a week's work the boys only received a shilling a week from that money.[406] However, he also remembered the brothers asking the boys how the money from the potato-picking should be spent. He recalled the boys suggested a roof should be added to the swimming pool but that instead new musical instruments were purchased for the band.[407] This suggests the work was lucrative and that the brothers used the earnings for the benefit of the boys.

445 Eight witnesses complained about having to work in neighbouring farms and said that the work went beyond potato-picking to hard physical labour. HIA 26 told us:

> "We were hired out to farmers. I worked on these farms from I entered the home at nine years old until I left Rubane house. I thought it was child labour. We had to pile up large bales of hay in the fields throughout the summer. We would work the entire day."[408]

HIA 244 recounted having to continue to pick potatoes in very cold conditions until his hands were, "cold, red raw cut and bleeding".[409] HIA 385 said he got no treatment when he put a pitch fork through his foot when he was picking potatoes because his hands were so cold[410] and HIA 252 recounted not being properly clothed for the work and not being allowed a shower to clean up after doing it.[411]

446 These witnesses were all admitted to Rubane in the 1950s and 1960s which suggests this heavier labour may only have applied in these years. As we have already pointed out when considering similar complaints made about the Sisters of Nazareth home at Termonbacca, before the advent of potato-picking machines it was very common in farming families at that time for children to help with potato-picking. We consider expecting the boys to help with potato-picking on the farm in Rubane was reasonable but that hiring them out to pick potatoes and undertake other types of labour in neighbouring farms and requiring them to do this work in adverse weather and with inadequate clothing was inappropriate and amounts to a systemic failing to provide proper care.

Clothing

447 As previously referred to in 1962, MoHA inspectors, Ms Forrest and Ms Hill, reported that although all the boys in Rubane appeared in good health:

> "…many looked pinched and cold; their clothing in many instances was in very bad order, threadbare and torn, and affording little protection against the weather."[412]

448 We noted that as late as the mid-1970s and early 1980s social workers were expressing concerns about the appearance of boys in Rubane and their ill-fitting clothes. In her evidence to the Inquiry, DL 517 described a boy being admitted to Rubane in 1980 and being given a pair of trousers from a general store:

> "…which were so wide he needed a belt to hold them up and they were too short for him, although he was relatively small in stature. I was told he would have to wear them and that he may eventually get trousers which fitted him if they came into the store."[413]

409 RUB 652.
410 RUB 734.
411 RUB 666.
412 RUB 11869.
413 RUB 1687.

Referring to the same period, another social worker, DL 516, told the Inquiry that the boys in Rubane "presented like 'orphans' and clothing did not take consideration of their personality or size". The Order did not accept that boys presented as orphans. It accepted that because of resource difficulties there may have been isolated occurrences during this period of boys being dressed inappropriately but pointed to the photographs it supplied to the Inquiry which showed boys from the mid 1970s onwards in a variety of attire in accordance with the style of the era. However, the bulk buying of clothing and distribution of it from a central store did not cease in Rubane until 1981. In the report of the SWAG inspection carried out in March 1981, inspectors noted that from the start of 1981 boys were allowed to purchase their own clothing in shops of their choosing and pay for it with cash. This indicates that the adequacy and suitability of clothing for some children in Rubane continued to be an issue as late as 1980. We consider it a systemic failing that the Order did not ensure initially that all boys in Rubane were adequately clothed and in later years up to 1981 failed to ensure that all boys were appropriately clothed.

Visits to families

449 Where boys had families to whom they could return, arrangements were at times made for them to return home for weekends, or for longer holidays in the summer. For example, HIA 19 stayed with his grandparents for nine weeks one summer.[414] Where boys had no family with whom they could stay, arrangements were sometimes made with families to take them for occasional weekends or for longer periods in the summer.

450 In the main, these opportunities were valued and enjoyed and we heard from witnesses who have maintained contact with families that they were sent to. However, some witnesses complained of having to undertake excessive chores when on placements with families. (e.g. HIA 259)[415] It is not clear how these families were recruited and although BR 2 refers in correspondence in 1973 to the welfare authorities making "a routine visit" to families willing to have boys to stay over the Christmas period[416] it is not clear to what extent vetting of families was carried out in the early days.

Chores

451 Witnesses described having to do daily chores, such as cleaning toilets, sweeping, scrubbing and polishing floors and more extensive cleaning of, for example, the stairwells at the weekend. Although some witnesses complained about having to do chores, we did not get the impression that they were excessive.

Shaving of Heads

452 The Order explained that head shaving was used as a means of controlling the spread of head lice and in the main witnesses referred to it in that way. However, four witnesses referred to having their heads shaved as a punishment.[417]

Treatment of enuresis

453 As the boys in Rubane were older we heard fewer complaints about how enuresis was dealt with than was the case in homes for younger children. However, HIA 97 said he was hit for wetting the bed[418] and HIA 219 said he was made to take cold showers as punishment for wetting the bed.[419] HIA 50 told us that BR 33 threatened to tell the other boys that HIA 50 wet the bed,[420] HIA 385 described boys lying in wet bed clothes for fear of being punished for wetting their beds[421] and HIA 262 described boys being humiliated for bed wetting.[422]

454 HIA 262 and HIA 16 remembered a "wet house" for boys who wet the bed;[423] such segregation of boys who wet their beds from other boys was against the guidance provided about dealing with enuresis in the memorandum by the Home Office on the Conduct of Children's Homes, which was issued in 1952.[424] However there was evidence that the Order attempted to assist boys who suffered from enuresis: BR 2 explained that medical advice was sought and alarm blankets were used to wake the boys.[425] Witnesses told us of a system where boys were paid an allowance to set an alarm clock and wake a number of times during the night to get boys who were in danger of wetting their bed up to go to the toilet.

455 While not discounting the negative experiences of some witnesses it would seem in general that bed-wetting was dealt with in a tolerant manner.

Preparation for leaving care

456 A number of witnesses told the Inquiry about the lack of preparation they received for life after care and how unprepared they were for life outside.[426]

457 HIA 262 stated:

> "There was no preparation for going out into the world. ...One minute I was in Rubane and the next minute I was in Belfast. They would put us into lodgings and boarding houses, and get us a job. The jobs were always menial because we had no education. We had no experience of handling money or even communicating with people."[427]

458 HIA 279 recounted that on the day he was leaving:

> "Someone came into the room at that time and I recall them saying, 'Your two brothers have been picked to go to Australia so you might as well go too'. ... That was the only discussion anyone in the home ever had with me regarding going to Australia. No-one ever asked me if I wanted to go, and the day I left Rubane was the first day I realised that I was going to Australia."[428]

459 Witnesses talked about the suddenness of their departure. HIA 132 said he was given an hour to pack[429]:

> "I was given no preparation for life after care. We were never taught the value of money or how to manage our money. We were never taught social skills or how to look after ourselves. We were just left on our own to get on with it."[430]

460 HIA 183 told the Inquiry:

> "I remember leaving Rubane and walking down the road to get the bus to go to my first job. I had a suitcase with two of everything, two pairs of pants, two pairs of socks and one suit. It was the loneliest day of my life. I had no-one. I had no education and I was worried about how I was going to cope with the outside world.".[431]

461 HIA 25 commented:

> "When I left the care system I was completely unprepared for life. Apart from two weeks in a flat on your own in the grounds of Rubane, there was no preparation. One day they said, 'You're out' and the next I was gone."[432]

462 In later years the Order did try in a limited way to prepare boys for leaving care by giving them the experience of being self-sufficient for a two-week period in one of the chalets. Also, in 1980 the Order agreed that social worker DL 517, and a colleague could work with a group of boys in Rubane to help them prepare for leaving care.

463 The Order, the governing board and the management committee recognised that lack of aftercare was a problem and became particularly concerned when a number of ex-residents got caught up in the civil unrest and some were murdered. HIA 56 referred to the additional challenges the Troubles caused for boys leaving Rubane:

> "They put us in the Falls Road and we didn't even know what Protestants were. They should have prepared us for going out into the world. We were put into the middle of a war and we didn't even know what was going on."[433]

He also recalled sensing that BR 2 was reluctant to leave him and another boy at the lodgings: "he stayed for ages and he gave us two pounds each."[434]

464 The Order explained it engaged with the Nazareth Lodge welfare committee, which was established to support former residents of Nazareth Lodge to obtain accommodation and employment when they left care, and that it linked with a welfare officer, Mr Murphy, and in time his successor, Mr Digney, who had been employed by the committee to undertake this work. In the 1970s a half-way house and youth club, St Augustine's, was set up principally to support former residents of Nazareth Lodge and Rubane. These facilities were seen as particularly essential for boys leaving Rubane who had previously been in Nazareth Lodge because, as BR 2 explained in

432 RUB 856
433 RUB 530
434 Ibid.

his statement, they had few relationships outside Rubane and lacked the social network supports that families could provide.

465 We consider the lack of preparation for leaving care, suddenness of departure from the home and absence of aftercare for boys in the initial years in Rubane amount to a systemic failing by the Diocese and the Order to ensure the home provided proper care. However, we equally recognise that when the Order and the Diocese became increasingly concerned about the lack of aftercare and the risks that created for boys particularly during the Troubles, it made considerable efforts to provide this aspect of continuing care.

Apologies

466 Before setting out our conclusions about Rubane we consider it appropriate to first acknowledge and record the apologies the Order and the Diocese made to former residents of Rubane at part of this Inquiry. At the opening of the Inquiry, the Order made the following apology:

> "First and foremost, the Brothers would wish to say publicly at the outset of this Inquiry that they accept and deeply regret that boys in their care were abused. They wish to offer their sincere and unreserved apology to all those whom they failed to protect. The De La Salle Order has previously acknowledged that innocent victims within its care were abused by some of its members. That some Brothers abused boys in their care was in total contradiction of their vocations as De La Salle Brothers and of their mission as established by their founder, namely to look after the welfare and educational needs of deprived, vulnerable and abandoned children. The Brothers recognise the immense pain and suffering and damage caused to those victims who have been abused. The Brothers recognise the sense of betrayal that the victims have experienced and the violation of trust caused by certain Brothers within the order. They recognise that there have been failures to protect the victims. The De La Salle Order deeply regrets the acts of some of its members which have irreparably damaged the reputation of the Order and undermined the selfless care provided by so many of the Brothers in pursuance of their vocation."

467 The Diocese also expressed its deep sorrow and regret that any child was abused while a resident in Rubane in the statement made on its behalf by Fr Timothy Bartlett:

> "In conclusion, the Diocese wishes to express its deep sorrow and regret that any child was abused while a resident in Rubane House.

> Established with the sole intention of improving the circumstances and opportunities of the children in its care, Rubane House, as with any institution founded on Christian principles, should have been exemplary in the love, dignity and protection it provided. Clearly, for too many, and despite the best efforts of many of the staff, this was far from the case. It is our hope that this Inquiry will go some way to helping those who experienced such abuse to have their voices heard and their painful experiences acknowledged and they will be assisted in advancing towards healing."[435]

Father Bartlett also stated when he gave oral evidence to the Inquiry about Rubane:

> "...I find it quite shocking even at a distance and even having some sense of the culture of the time, both within society and within the church, that the safety of children was not the first priority in everything. In fact it didn't seem to appear anywhere in the priorities of either the Management Board or the Governing Board or the general practice of how the home was run."[436]

Conclusions

468 In the different sections of this chapter we have set out our conclusions about systemic failings to ensure:

- Rubane provided proper care;
- Children in Rubane would be free from abuse;
- All proper steps were taken to prevent, detect and disclose abuse in Rubane; and,
- Appropriate steps were taken to ensure the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving abuse in Rubane.

469 We conclude by setting out below the individual and in some instances shared responsibility that the Northern Ireland Government as represented by the MoHA and its successor Departments, the Diocese, the Order and the Welfare Authorities and their successor bodies must carry for these systemic failings.

435 RUB 5324.
436 Day 78, 11 December 2014, pp.9-10.

We are satisfied that:

The Ministry of Home Affairs:

(a) failed to insist from the outset that Rubane be developed on the smaller children's home model in line with government policy;

(b) contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while over-crowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory;

(c) failed as the registering body to clarify with the Diocese and the Order the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care;

(d) failed to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing the number of boys accommodated to more than double from 30 to 71 within six years without requiring the necessary improvements to the facilities or increases in staffing levels;

(e) failed to seek confirmation of who was the administering authority for Rubane and failed to check that monthly visiting was happening and thereby allowed crucial aspects of the statutory framework designed to promote and protect the welfare of children in voluntary homes to be ignored by the Diocese and the Order.

The Northern Ireland Government, as represented by the DHSS:

(a) failed to inspect the standard of care being provided in Rubane between 1976 and 1981;

(b) failed to ensure that the inspections of Rubane that were carried out in the 1970s gained a genuine insight into the quality of care being provided;

(c) failed to properly respond to the concerns raised by the EHSSB in 1981 about the general care provided to all boys in Rubane and thereby failed to acknowledge and exercise its statutory authority and powers as the registration and inspection body for Rubane; and,

(d) failed to maintain information about an investigation into sexual abuse in a children's home in a manner that allowed its existence to be known to relevant staff and thereby shared with the Hughes Inquiry.

The Diocese:

(a) contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while over-crowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory;

(b) failed to clarify with the Order and the MoHA as the registering body the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care;

(c) failed to meet statutory regulations for voluntary children's home, in particular, failed to confirm the administering authority for Rubane and to appoint a monthly visitor;

(d) failed to take responsibility for negotiations with the MoHA about the development of the home and by only holding annual meetings of the governing board during the Order's negotiations with the MoHA caused delay and late interventions in planning;

(e) failed to hold meetings of the governing board between 1968 and 1972 and between 1982 and 1985 and thereby to assure itself of the quality of care being provided in Rubane;

(f) failed, through the chaplains appointed to Rubane, to find a means that respected the seal of confession but enabled information provided by boys about the physical and sexual abuse they were suffering to be shared with the relevant bishop and acted upon; and

(g) failed through Father McCann's response to the first assault by BR 77 to take all proper steps to prevent, detect and disclose abuse.

The De La Salle Order:

(a) contributed to a systemic failure to ensure Rubane provided proper care by allowing discussions about the type of redevelopment needed and how it should be funded to continue for a decade while over-crowding increased and the facilities and staffing levels became more inadequate and unsatisfactory;

(b) failed to clarify with the Diocese and the MoHA as the registering body the nature and aims of Rubane, the governance and management arrangements and the conditions needed to provide appropriate care;

(c) failed to meet statutory regulations for voluntary children's home, in particular, failed to confirm the administering authority for Rubane and to appoint a monthly visitor;

(d) failed to prevent excessive physical punishment by some brothers and lay staff;

(e) failed to prevent random violence by some brothers and lay staff which in some cases amounted to serious physical assault;

(f) failed to ensure that corporal punishment was administered in line with statutory regulations and the Order's own rules;

(g) failed to accurately record and report the use of corporal punishment as required by statutory regulations;

(h) failed to deal adequately with incidents of physical violence by brothers and lay staff towards boys which were brought to the attention of Brother Directors;

(i) failed to take necessary action to enable the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving physical abuse;

(j) failed to inform the Department or the Health and Social Services Boards about the search of Rubane and the reasons for it and therefore did not work with them to identify and manage any continuing risk to the welfare and safety of the boys in Rubane at that time;

(k) failed to report serious assaults by BR 77 to the police in order to protect the brother and the reputation of the Order rather than protect vulnerable children;

(l) failed to curtail BR 77's contact with children while he was subject to police investigations about physical assaults of boys in Rubane and instead moved him to work in a school;

(m) failed to provide guidance and effective supervision to brothers and to ensure particularly in the earlier years that they had a reasonable workload that avoided excessive contact time with the boys;

(n) failed to provide guidance and effective supervision to lay staff in Rubane, particularly to those who were clearly having difficulties in meeting the challenges of working with adolescent boys;

(o) failed to address understaffing, thereby allowing a lack of oversight of the brothers' interactions with boys, particularly in the evenings and at night time, that enabled sexual abuse to occur and continue unchecked;

(p) failed to properly investigate allegations of sexual abuse;

(q) failed to take necessary action to enable the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences involving sexual abuse;

(r) failed to report its investigation of the allegations of sexual abuse against BR 17 to the governing board, the MoHA or the police;

(s) failed to be truthful about the extent of BR 14's sexual abuse of boys and deliberately misled the MoHA about it;

(t) failed to report its investigation of the allegations of sexual abuse by HIA 36 against BR 15 to the governing board, the MoHA or the police;

(u) failed to implement and monitor adherence to its rules about how brothers should manage their interactions with boys and thereby betrayed the implicit trust that other bodies such as the MoHA, the welfare authorities and the Diocese placed in the Order as a faith-based organisation suitable to be entrusted to run a residential home for children;

(v) failed to curtail the activities of BR 17 or increase monitoring of him despite suspicions that he sexually abused boys in Rubane and then moved him to a school where he would have continued trusted access to children which he ultimately abused;

(w) failed to report brothers who admitted sexual abuse of children to the police and thereby protected the position of such brothers and the reputation of the Order rather than seeking to prevent further harm to children;

(x) failed to keep boys free from the pain, fear and distress caused by the physical and/or sexual abuse they suffered or witnessed others suffering in Rubane;

(y) failed to limit the boys' help with potato-picking to the farm in Rubane and instead required them to pick potatoes and undertake other types of labour in neighbouring farms in adverse weather and with inappropriate clothing;

(z) failed to ensure initially that all boys in Rubane were adequately clothed and in later years up to 1981 failed to ensure that all boys were appropriately clothed; and

(aa) failed to require the Sisters of Nazareth to provide relevant information about at least a child's time in Nazareth Lodge when they were being transferred to Rubane and thereby demonstrated a lack of care and consideration for each child's individuality, development and well being.

The Welfare Authorities:

(a) failed in the period prior to the opening of chalets in 1968 to address the fact that the home they were placing boys in had inadequate facilities and was poorly staffed;

(b) the EHSSB failed to alert social workers to the police investigations in 1980 into physical and sexual abuse in Rubane.

Chapter 12:

Module 7 – St Patrick's Training School

The Module

1 The seventh Module concerned four training schools, the first being St Patrick's, a Roman Catholic school run by the De La Salle Order. The Module commenced on 1 September 2015, Day 134 of the Inquiry, with a general introduction to the training school system by Senior Counsel, followed by an address by Junior Counsel concerning St Patrick's, and it ended on 14 October 2015, Day 150.

2 A total of 27 applicants provided statements which related to St Patrick's. Of these, eleven were read out for various reasons. Two had sadly died, some had given evidence in a previous module about another home, so their observations on St Patrick's had been provided earlier, and some were unwell. One witness who had provided a statement decided not to give oral evidence after consultation with counsel on the day. Four former residents at St Patrick's also gave evidence, while not being applicants. In all, we therefore received oral evidence during the Module from 19 witnesses who had been resident in the training school. A further 39 former residents had given information to the police about allegations or had made civil claims, so that evidence was considered from a total of 70 people who had attended St Patrick's.

3 Seven brothers and seven other members of staff gave oral evidence. One witness who had inspected St Patrick's gave evidence. Mary Madden, who had worked for the Northern Ireland Office in the final years of our remit when the NIO bore responsibility for the training schools, and Karen Pearson, who represented the Department of Justice and the then Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety, gave evidence. The Diocese of Down and Connor, the De La Salle Order and the Health and Social Care Board were also represented as core participants.

4 We are indebted to all these witnesses for providing their accounts of events at St Patrick's. We are aware that recalling difficult times and presenting evidence in a public hearing will have been stressful for many witnesses, but both the written and oral evidence was invaluable in providing a full picture.

The Aims of St Patrick's

5 The draft handbook for Slemish House laid out the overall aims of St Patrick's:

> "As a Christian school, the staff of St Patrick's attempt to establish, maintain and adhere to Christian ethics and values. These values lead us to believe that all persons are children of God and that service to anyone in need is rendered to God himself. Each boy is accepted for who he is and not for what he does or has done. This attitude reflects belief in the basic dignity of the person which leads us to a more caring society and helps us to remain responsive to the special needs of youth by a greater sensitivity of changing times.

6 "Whatever is done in St Patrick's is intended to help each boy grow in awareness of his own goodness and worth. Ultimately, it is this awareness which makes possible a more fulfilled, more responsible and more constructive life.

7 "While respecting individual differences, St Patrick's provides the young person with the secure setting needed for growth towards adulthood. This security is found, primarily within a community of caring, supportive and understanding people. Although the degree of personal involvement varies, no staff member - Caring, Teaching, Medical, Ancillary - is unimportant. Meeting needs, actualising potentials and developing skills are essential elements in the school programme. Dealing with irresponsible behaviour must also be included. Irresponsible behaviour is damaging to the sense of self-worth and the good of others and therefore, must be opposed by all who care. Wisdom, as well as active concern, is needed to turn occasions of irresponsibility into opportunities for personal growth and understanding.

8 "In living this philosophy, our contribution to a young person's life is to enhance his opinion of himself and heighten his regard for others".[1]

9 These aims are clear and straightforward, and appear to be consistent with the ideals of the De La Salle Brothers. Although they were drafted prior to the opening of Slemish House, they probably reflect the values which underpinned St Patrick's from the start.

The History and Role of St Patrick's

10 In 1869, as soon as the Industrial Schools (Ireland) Act 1868 was passed, Bishop Patrick Dorrian, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, established St Patrick's Industrial School in Donegall Street in the centre of Belfast with an initial intake of 20 to 24 boys. In 1870 the Diocese leased Milltown House in the Falls Road area; this site was on the western edge of the city at that time, and it included a five-acre farm. For a short period both sites were in operation, but on 11 January 1873 St Patrick's moved to the Milltown site and it remained there for nearly seventy years.[2]

11 The school was under the management of a Board comprising the Bishop of the Diocese as Chair and five or six parish priests or administrators as well as the Vicar General of the Diocese. At a meeting on 5 March 1917 there was discussion about the De La Salle Order being invited to take charge of the school. There were adjournments of the Committee meeting, and representatives of the Order attended the Committee on 12 March, a final decision being made on 2 April that the Brothers would take charge of the school on 1 May 1917. They continued to be in charge of St Patrick's until 1995, and were therefore responsible for the running of the school throughout the period covered by the Inquiry's terms of reference. They remained accountable, however, to the Diocesan Committee until the 1980s.[3]

12 With the partition of Ireland it became apparent that there were no reformatories for boys in Northern Ireland. Brother Peter Marron was appointed head of the school in 1922 and it was during his time that St Patrick's was designated as a reformatory for Roman Catholic boys as well as an industrial school.[4] As a reformatory it admitted young offenders, and throughout the rest of its history there was an ongoing concern about the differing needs of the boys admitted for 'care' and those sent there for 'justice' reasons. As early as February 1924 the Committee minutes record that:

> "... in the opinion of the Committee [it] is undesirable to have Ref. Boys in the same Estb. with Industrial Boys. We recom. that provision be made for these Ref. Boys elsewhere."[5]

4 RUB 039.
5 SPT 843-844.

Reformatory boys were generally in the minority, but the proposal that they should be moved to separate provision suggests that the Committee wished to revert to their pre-partition remit.

13 During the Second World War, following the air raids on Belfast, premises were acquired at Alexander House, Forkill, in County Armagh, near Dundalk, and 62 members of the junior school transferred there from May 1942 to March 1944.[6] The overall number of places was increased to 225.

14 A photograph of the Milltown building shows a large house with a substantial extension built to house the boys.[7] BR 26, who worked there for the last six years that these premises were in use, described it as "an old ramshackle building". He was sited with thirty boys down the lane in a building formerly used as a mill, but most boys were in the main building. He said that conditions were "grim", but were tolerated as they did not know of anything better.[8]

15 BR 26 described the boys admitted in the 1950s as very different from those who were in St Patrick's in later decades. They often came from broken homes or had been truanting. Some were admitted voluntarily on a charitable basis. The offences which had been committed by boys were generally more trivial.[9]

16 As early as February 1943 it was decided to move to new premises "at the earliest possible date" and on 30 August 1943 a 99-acre site was purchased on Glen Road, about a mile from Milltown, but further out of the city. Plans were submitted to the Ministry of Home Affairs in January 1946 but it was 1 September 1957 before the new buildings were officially opened by Bishop Mageean.[10] It is unclear why there was such a delay in building the new premises.[11]

17 The new buildings were described as a model training school with excellent facilities, and in their early years they attracted a lot of distinguished visitors, such as the Mayor, the High Sherriff and government Ministers. BR 26 said that the new buildings bore no relation to the Milltown site. The buildings were not complete when they moved in; the swimming pool, for example, was finished later, but over the years the site continued to be improved. He described the Glen Road site as "a dream come true".[12]

18 However, in some respects the model was already dated. In its overall size, the school was going against the trend towards smaller units, and in having dormitories for 20 boys, St Patrick's was running counter to the Home Office guidance issued in 1952, in which it was recommended that large institutions should be broken down into smaller family-sized groups. The school remained on this site until its closure, and almost all the evidence of witnesses relates to the Glen Road site.

19 The Committee's view that St Patrick's should revert to its industrial school model and cease to admit reformatory boys appears to have changed over time. Under the influence of BR 39, then the head of St Patrick's, when Rubane House at Kircubbin was purchased by the Diocese in March 1950, it was decided that Rubane should be registered as a voluntary home for boys,[13] that is, admitting boys in need of care rather than young offenders, and a group of boys was transferred from St Patrick's to the new home, leaving St Patrick's with its mixture of reformatory and industrial elements unchanged.

20 Under the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1950, reformatories and industrial schools were all renamed training schools, blurring the distinction between the care and justice elements. St Patrick's became a training school (though like the other training schools it was also registered as a remand home), but the debate about the distinction between the two groups continued, both professionally and politically. There were, for example, those who argued that there was no clear division between the two groups, that those in need of care often presented more disturbed behaviour than the offenders, and that some children fell into both groups.[14] In England and Wales it was decided to abandon the distinction and under the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 all children in need of any form of care were outside their homes committed under Care Orders. It was common practice for English legislation concerning children to be replicated in Northern Ireland, but in this instance, by contrast, in 1979 the Black Report recommended that the two groups should be treated separately, and following the Prior Compromise in November 1986, St Patrick's was reorganised into a Justice Unit and a Care Unit, which were run separately on the one site.

14 Day 164, pp.7 and 8.

21 From 1969 onwards the justice side of the school was placed under additional stress during the Troubles, as a number of boys were admitted because of their involvement in civil disorder. Lisnevin, which was secure and non-denominational, was opened in 1973, and presumably eased the workload for St Patrick's. However, the Troubles created tensions between the 'care' boys and the 'justice' boys, and is dealt with further below.

22 In addition to the division between care and justice, the other main distinction in the overall structure of St Patrick's was that it was divided into a senior side and a junior side. Indeed they were listed as St Patrick's Senior School and St Patrick's Junior School. Although they were on the same campus under the control of a single Brother Director, the two sides functioned as totally separate schools, sharing only a few resources in common, such as the chapel, the sports hall, the office and the central kitchen. One witness said that, as a junior, he only saw senior boys through the hatch when they served food in the canteen. There appear to have been a few joint activities, such as the weekly mass and football competitions at Christmas time, but in effect the two schools were distinct. It would appear that twenty of the 24 applicants who have come forward to the Inquiry were probably resident in the Junior School, whereas two of the witnesses put forward by the Order were in the Senior School.

23 The junior side focused mainly on schooling, though it also had workshops to offer trade training to boys who reached school leaving age. The senior side focused primarily on preparation for work through trade training. Boys were allocated to one side or the other depending primarily upon their age on admission, with a cut-off point of about fifteen and a half to sixteen. The allocation of boys also depended in some cases on other factors as well as age, such as the maturity of the boy, his behaviour and the type of offences in which he had been involved. With occasional exceptions boys did not move from one side to the other, unless they were discharged and were made subject to a second Training School Order when of senior age.

24 It appears that in general there were more boys admitted to the junior school than the senior and more on the care side than the justice side.

25 It will be noted that in both columns relatively few boys aged 12 and under or aged 16 were admitted, and that the peak age for admission was 13. Typically, the majority of boys were admitted to the junior or care side for a couple of years at the end of their schooling. The older boys were placed in the senior school and were more often on the justice side. In the later years there was a move from a senior/junior split to a care/justice split, but this was gradual and seemed to reflect the intake, rather than being policy-driven by the Black Report.

26 The buildings at Glen Road came to be seen as institutional, and chalets were built to house smaller groups of boys. Although it had been heralded as a model institution when it was opened and had been in use for only forty years, the main building fell into disrepair and was demolished in 1996.[15] The Department planned to close St Patrick's, but its proposals met with a sharp reaction, and, perhaps recognising the concerns expressed by the Catholic Church, in 1995 the government agreed to fund additional new buildings.

27 Over time there were reductions in the number of boys admitted to St Patrick's. Its closure coincided with a number of major changes, which took place around the end of the Inquiry's remit. The Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 wound up the training school system in 1996, and St Patrick's became Glenmona Resource Centre, which was no longer specifically for Roman Catholic children. With the appointment of increasing numbers of lay staff, the De La Salle Brothers had become a smaller proportion of the overall staff team and they ceased their formal involvement in 1995, though one of the brothers who gave evidence remained on the staff of the new centre until 1997. The Resource Centre finally closed in January 2001.[16]

28 Throughout its existence, therefore, St Patrick's had a demanding role in being expected to contain, control, care for, educate and train large numbers of boys who had histories of offending and disturbed behaviour. Some of them came directly from the courts, either as offenders or in need of care, but in some cases they were transferred from other establishments as the staff of children's homes could no longer cope with their behaviour. In the early days there were also 'voluntary' admissions when parents approached the school to seek a place for their son.

29 For much of its history, St Patrick's had notional figures of 80 juniors and 80 seniors, totalling 160 boys, but the numbers fluctuated considerably. They ranged from 167 in 1917 to 87 in 1931, with a peak in 1943 of 235. In 1965 there were 147 boys present.[17] At an inspection in December 1993, there were 98 on the roll.

30 In view of its size, it will be appreciated that St Patrick's played a major role in meeting the needs of Roman Catholic boys from the whole of Northern Ireland throughout its existence. In total 4,537 boys were admitted.[18] We have received evidence from 31 former residents; we have records of a further 39 who gave evidence to the police or have made civil claims against the Order. We have therefore only received evidence from 70 people in all, or just under one and a half per cent of the total number of boys who passed through St Patrick's.

31 Clearly, we cannot be certain why more witnesses have not come forward, but we have to make the assumption that fewer people were discontented with the quality of care which they received than in some of the other large homes we have examined where higher percentages of former residents have come forward. This assumption is supported by the fact that, although there are some serious allegations about sexual and physical abuse, very few complaints were made about other aspects of the care, education and training offered by St Patrick's.

Governance

32 The school was registered by and accountable to the Ministry of Home Affairs until the end of 1972, when the Northern Ireland Office took over on foot of direct rule.

33 There was a Board of Management in accordance with the Training School Rules. The Board was chaired by the current Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor and it was made up of local clergy. On 2 February 1954 the Board considered a letter from the Ministry of Home Affairs, drawing to their attention the Rule that at least two members of the Board had to be women. By way of response:

> "The Manager was instructed to write to the Ministry informing them that the Board did not consider it advisable to change its present constitution."[19]

There is no evidence that any action was taken to modify the Board membership for over thirty years.[20] Following the critical inspection in 1988 the number of priests on the Board was reduced and the number of lay people increased.[21]

34 The Board was required by the Training School Rules to meet at the school on a monthly basis. During the Troubles they met only every six months, and while this was understandable as travelling was at times difficult, it was also unfortunate as the staff needed additional support at that time. They did not meet, for example, for five months after the death of Bernard Teggart, which is considered in more detail below.

35 The Board had two main subcommittees. One was the Licensing Committee, whose membership included people from the wider community, and it met once a month. It received reports from housemasters, reviewed the progress of boys and recommended their discharge under licence when it felt they were ready to move on.[22] Boys could attend the Committee if they wished. Typically boys had to remain at St Patrick's for at least a year before they could be discharged, but exceptionally the Committee could seek special dispensation for discharge at an earlier date from the Secretary of State.

36 The second subcommittee was a General Purposes Committee which oversaw the daily life and management of the school.[23] There were also occasional subcommittees set up for specific time-limited purposes, such as the development of the West Side Project.[24]

37 SPT 2 said that the staff had very little contact with the Management Committee.[25]

Finance

38 Unlike the large children's homes with which the Inquiry has had to deal, finance was not generally a major problem at St Patrick's, possibly because it was fulfilling a statutory role as an industrial school, and from 1950 as a training school. In its earlier years as an industrial school, St Patrick's was funded in equal measures by capitation grants from central and local government (£1 per week in 1942), with parents contributing when they placed their children voluntarily, though the income was minimal.[26] The School also received at least one legacy, amounting to £2,000.[27] The over-riding principle under the 1950 Act was that the funding of training schools was seen as a central government responsibility, and training schools were therefore funded directly. Although there was a point in the 1940s when there were discussions involving the Minister, the funding was generally sufficient to provide acceptable living conditions and the level of staffing deemed necessary at the time. Furthermore, when requests were made for increases in expenditure, St Patrick's received positive responses.

39 While the Diocese of Down and Connor purchased the Glen Road site, it was the government which provided capital for the new building. The Trustees took out a mortgage with the Minister of Finance, and repaid it in annual instalments from the Department's grant. Further developments were financed in the same way in 1954, 1957, 1968 and 1971, to provide a gate lodge, classrooms, a pre-licence hostel, playing fields and other facilities, as the site was developed.[28] Some difficulties were encountered when the Evangelical Protestant Society objected to the government financing the chapel, but a compromise was reached whereby a gymnasium was financed, which was capable of doubling as a chapel.[29]

40 Br Lawrence O'Toole, Assistant General of the Order, was quoted in 1957 as describing the Ministry of Home Affairs as "liberal and benevolent", a "fairy godmother."[30] In oral evidence, BR 26 underlined this point, saying that St Patrick's obtained whatever it needed.

41 However, during the 1980s some of the buildings became very run down, and it was only after a critical review in 1990 and some tense negotiations that funding was provided by the government to update the premises in 1992-5, provided £1.9 million to build two extra house units and refurbish two existing ones.[31]

The Glen Road Buildings and Site

42 Prior to the building of St Patrick's, the Glen Road site had been farmland, and the farm, which was on the northern edge of the premises, remained a working farm. The site as a whole covered 100 acres, which gave considerable scope for development and redevelopment to meet changing needs.

43 The approach was by way of a set of gates off Glen Road. There was a gatekeeper's house, and it was the role of the gatekeeper to check incoming vehicles. There was then a longish drive leading up to the main campus. The main building had two long wings - one for the Senior School and one for the Junior School - separated by a corridor.[32] There were classrooms and other shared facilities on the ground floor, and there were two upper floors of dormitories. On each side there was a pair of dormitories on each floor. The pairs of dormitories were grouped at right angles to each other, forming an L-shape, and at the corner of the L a brother had a bedroom, with internal windows so that he could observe the two dormitories, though later these rooms were used as bases for the nightwatchman or as offices.[33]

44 Over time about two dozen other buildings were constructed, scattered around the central campus, providing offices, a house for the brothers, a chapel, a sports hall, a swimming pool, chalets as living quarters for the boys in the later years, schoolrooms and trade training workshops. There were playing fields, and beyond them the fields still used for agriculture. Black Mountain rose up beyond the farm, providing a backdrop for the site as a whole.

30 SPT 653.
31 SPT 10002.
32 Day 143, pp.29 and 30.
33 Day 140, p.38.

45 Clearly the use of buildings changed in the course of time. In the early decades, as described in the history above, the main building housed the two schools and some of the shared facilities, but several chalets were built to provide a more homely setting for the boys. Two of the chalets in particular figure in the history of allegations of abuse at St Patrick's - Aisling House, which was used for reception and assessment, and Slemish House, which was initially designated to prepare senior boys for discharge but was later used by the junior school as a small secure unit to offer intensive care. They are described more fully below. The chalets included staff accommodation, and more staff housing was provided nearer the road. The availability of staff accommodation helped to ensure that, in addition to the resident brothers, there were people around to assist in emergencies. However, SPT 2 said that most staff returned to their homes in Belfast, and unlike many similar institutions, St Patrick's did not become a closed community. Indeed, there was little interaction between the staff of the two schools.[34]

46 With such a large site there were a number of ways to enter and leave other than the main drive, and during the Troubles one of these paths became known as the Ho Chi Minh trail because of its clandestine use by soldiers and others at night time. The path led directly across the Monagh Bypass to the Turf Lodge estate, which was nearby, and it was a quick way for absconders to reach the city while avoiding the main drive.[35]

47 Towards the end of St Patrick's existence, as the number of boys was reduced, less was spent on the maintenance of buildings and facilities such as the swimming pool and play hall fell into disuse, reducing the opportunities for activities for the remaining boys, and the main building was demolished in 1996.[36]

Daily Life

Admission

48 When he was admitted to St Patrick's in 1957, HIA 314 was shown up to his dormitory and given clothes to change in to:

> "I was given a number and I had to sew that number onto all my clothes. I was given washing and dental gear as well. The clothes were of reasonable quality, I'll say that much. We had to do our own private washing - our underwear and socks but the big washing like sheets was sent away. Every Friday night we were issued with a linen bag with our clothes in it for the next week and we put our old clothes in the bag to be sent away to be washed."[37]

The Daily Round

49 HIA 314 also provided a clear picture of the daily round for the boys:

"The daily routine in the home was we were woken at 5.30 a.m. by a hurley stick being banged along the ends of our beds or a whistle being blown by a civilian worker. We washed and dressed, and then we were sent back to the dorm to clean and tidy and make our beds. We had breakfast after that. We had all our meals in a large dining room. There were four boys at a table and there was always a mad scramble for food, especially on Tuesdays and Thursdays when we got baps. You would have to run to your table, grab your bap and put it down your shirt. We were always hungry in the home.

50 "After breakfast we were put out into the yard, no matter what the weather was like. Then after a period of time we either went to school or to technical workshops. These were both on site. I went to the woodwork shop. Other boys went to the craft workshop where they learned how to weld, and others worked on the farm. I remember I made a statue of the Pope once and a dressing table for one of the Brothers. I used to make racks and things for people on the outside as well who I didn't know. At school, we were given the strap on our bottoms for any minor offence such as looking at each other in class.

51 "After our workshops, we would be given more work to do like cleaning the corridors, showers, toilets or changing rooms until supper time. After supper we went outside and waited until the civilian workers let us inside to watch television. They had the keys and we would have to stand outside until they decided to let us in. ... If it was raining there was only one place to shelter and we used to fight for that spot but then the Brothers would punish you for fighting.

52 "We were sent to bed very early while it was still daylight outside. We could hear people still playing outside but we had to go to bed. At bedtime the Brothers helped the younger boys into their pyjamas. We had to sleep in pyjamas only and they checked you weren't wearing your underwear underneath. One of the civilian staff patrolled the dorms regularly during the night. The lights were never put out; there was always a light in the form of a statue in the centre of the floor on a pedestal."[38]

HIA 314 had sadly died before giving evidence, and so it was not possible to obtain his oral evidence, but we noted the Order's comment that he maintained contact with St Patrick's, and in particular Br Stephen, after he had left.

53 HIA 282, in explaining his fear of the brothers, described bedtime:

"Christian Brothers would come round to turn the lights out ... Once we knew a Brother was coming you could have heard a pin drop in that dormitory and before he turned to go into that dormitory everybody was in bed and ninety per cent of the boys were lying on their side with their eyes closed pretending to be asleep, that's how terrified they were of the Brothers. We would have been sitting on somebody's bed talking away and we were like rockets getting into bed. If you were not in bed he would have used the strap to slap your leg."[39]

Food

54 There were witnesses who said that they always felt hungry or that the quantity of food was insufficient, but these did not seem to be their main complaints and did not amount to neglect.

Clothing

55 SPT 2 said that the nuns used to keep a stockpile of clothing from which the boys were kitted out, but that after he had observed child care practice in children's homes on his qualifying course he introduced supervised shopping for clothes in shops in Belfast. He said that changes of this sort were introduced through staff meetings, and that the younger brothers were more prepared to change.[40]

Religious Observance

56 In the earlier years Mass was said daily, with the Angelus in the evening.[41] In later years compulsory Mass was limited to Wednesday evenings and Saturdays. On these occasions all the boys attended from both senior and junior sides, or later the care and justice units.[42] Unlike the evidence concerning some other children's establishments, there were no complaints from former St Patrick's boys about the level or type of religious observance required of them.

Schooling and Vocational Training

57 Although they spent much of their week time in classrooms, the witnesses did not make much mention of schooling. According to HIA 272 the school was "massive":

> "There were around thirty boys in each class and in my time there the boys moved from class to class for different subjects rather than staying in the same classroom".

The teachers included both brothers and lay staff. He did not recall ever having any homework in the evenings, and at times he was given domestic chores to do instead of schooling.[43] Some witnesses alleged that they were diverted from the classroom onto work around the school, such as cleaning or laundry.[44]

Classes in the junior school were reported to have been divided by ability. HIA 227 described the quality of education as "basic" and noted the absence of homework.[45]

58 SPT 125 said that on admission to St Patrick's he had not been considering higher education as an option, but influenced by the advice of BR 26 he stayed on to do A Levels, attending a day school run by the De La Salle Order in Andersonstown. He also read a lot, and thinks he was seen by the other boys as an oddity. Having done clerical work in a temporary summer job, he stayed in post rather than go to university, and went on to have a successful career in the Health Service. Indeed, SPT 125 felt he achieved more than if he had not attended St Patrick's.[46]

59 When the new school was planned, vocational training was to be offered in woodwork, metal work, French-polishing, shoe-making and tailoring.[47] Among the trades taught in the senior school were brick-laying, painting, farming and joinery.[48] HIA 314 was taught cabinet-making and he was doing well, so they decided to keep him on.[49] Indeed the quality of the training received by St Patrick's boys was such that employers sought them.

Activities

60 BR 26 said that there was a considerable emphasis on sport and recreation, and that St Patrick's achieved a good reputation. Teams were invited in to play St Patrick's, and "the home boys were the team to beat."[50] There were weekly trips to the cinema and to swimming baths. BR 43 taught swimming and BR 94 said that the School was barred from competitions for winning too much.[51] There were summer holidays at Glenariff in a house leased from Senator Joseph Maguire, where the boys stayed in groups of forty for a month at a time.[52] In 1946 a band was set up by SPT 90, with up to fifty members, and they travelled widely to give performances.

Medical Care

61 We have received no significant complaints about the medical and nursing care provided by St Patrick's. From 1945 there were two nuns of the Bon Secours Order who acted as nurses, but they were withdrawn in 1975 because of a shortage of nuns and their place was taken by members of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, who assisted in housemothering.[53] As described below, HIA 314 alleged that the nuns did not pass on his complaint about abuse. A doctor visited weekly.

62 When necessary, hospital care was arranged. HIA 219 had longstanding problems with soiling. He was referred to the Royal Victoria Hospital, and it is clear that the staff were persistent in helping him overcome this problem.[54] In an inspection report dated 29 November 1950 the introduction of the bell and pad system to deal with enuresis was recommended as it was then being trialled by the Ministry.[55]

Overview of Daily Life

63 Clearly, the daily round changed over time, in particular with the opening of the chalets, but the picture provided by other witnesses was broadly consistent with HIA 314's account. Staffing was thin at that time and the school's finances would have been stretched, but HIA 314's only criticism of living standards was that he was always hungry. The daily round was organised to ensure that necessary tasks were all fulfilled, that the boys had a range of activities (household tasks, class work, trade training, time out of doors and leisure), and that supervision was maintained. The picture presented by HIA 314 and others is of a well organised institution, set up to deal with boys who could present difficult behaviour, which functioned in accordance with the standards of the time, and it seems that it ran smoothly.

Case Management

64 Rule 46 of the Training School Rules placed a long-standing obligation on the Managers to review boys' progress and provide aftercare. As social services were developed and the number of social workers grew, they took on the responsibility of family case work and care planning in children's homes, but in training schools the responsibility remained with the Board of Management and the staff. When a boy was admitted to St Patrick's the welfare authority closed the case. This meant that contact with the boys' families was maintained by the staff of St Patrick's. They called on families in their homes, they got to know the sorts of places where boys socialised or congregated when in the community, they escorted boys to and from court, and they collected absconders. SPT 2 said that he maintained contact either when families visited the school or on home visits. He spent Wednesdays regularly in Derry, visiting boys' homes there.[56]

65 Within St Patrick's there were three systems for assessing the progress of boys. The first was the Licensing Committee, a subcommittee of the Board of Management, which had the responsibility of complying with the Rules by reviewing the progress of the boys at intervals and determining whether they were ready to be discharged under licence. Reports were prepared by the staff of the boys' units. Once they were discharged, while the boys' licences were extant they could be recalled to complete the period granted by their Training School Order at St Patrick's. HIA 314, for example, was released on licence to the care of his father on 11 May 1961.[57]

56 Day 143, pp.101 and 102.

66 Secondly, there appears to have been a review system run by the staff which was similar to that organised by field social workers for children living in children's homes. It appears to have considered boys' progress in more detail, including day-to-day problems and needs. It does not seem to have had any powers to decide on issues such as discharge, and it is not clear whether it had any links at all with the Licensing Committee.

67 Thirdly, within Slemish House, which provided short-term intensive care, there was a separate system to review progress with a view to returning boys to the units from which they had been referred. Again, this system was run by the staff, and included not only the staff from Slemish House but also the boys' keyworkers.

Family Contact

68 On 20 September 1994 BR 90 wrote:

> "We believe that weekend leave is a vitally important part of a child's care programme. In situations where contact with the home have broken down priority is given to the restoration of these. Experience has taught us that where home leave is not possible children become highly institutionalised and inadequate."[58]

He stressed the care that was taken to check families out, to explain expectations to them, to ensure that boys would be safe and to support the family, especially if things went wrong.

69 BR 90 was right to stress the importance of maintaining home contact, as it is one of the main predictors of successful outcomes for children in residential care. As many of the boys at St Patrick's came from Belfast, going home presented few logistical problems for them and they spent their pocket money on bus fares home. This was treated as a privilege, which encouraged boys to earn sufficient points to be allowed home, but it was a privilege which was widely granted, such that there were sometimes only a few boys left in units at St Patrick's at weekends, mainly those who had no home to go to or who were from more distant parts of the province.

70 While the boys visited their homes at weekends, many were also visited mid-week by their families, and there was said to be a trail of visitors walking up the road from the bus every Wednesday evening, often bringing extra food for the boys.[59]

58 SPT 12895.
59 Day 139, p.105

71 The contact with families was a positive feature of the care of the boys at St Patrick's, and was the other side of the coin from their absconding, which is discussed below. The use of a points system to earn the privilege was a way of controlling the boys' movements by regulating their home contact. This practice contrasted sharply with that at Rubane, where the home's siting in the countryside reduced the likelihood of absconding but also made contact with families much more difficult, whether it was a matter of the boys travelling to Belfast or their families using public transport to get to Rubane. St Patrick's boys' frequent contact with their families may also have had an impact on the likelihood of boys being abused, either physically or sexually, in view of their frequent opportunities to disclose to their parents.

Management of Behaviour and Punishments

Points System

72 There was a points system to regulate behaviour and encourage good conduct. Every Thursday there was a meeting attended by all the staff at which points were awarded for the boys' behaviour in different areas of activity such as the classroom and their house unit. Points were lost for fighting or disruptive behaviour. The boys then queued in the gym and they were paid pocket money and allowed to go home, depending upon the points they had accrued.[60] HIA 100 said that he never remembered getting the full amount of pay, which in the mid 1960s was three shillings and threepence, and there were weeks when he had no pay. He got home most weekends, but there were occasions when he was "stewed", that is, grounded.[61]

Detention Rooms

73 There appear to have been rooms in which boys could be held securely throughout the history of St Patrick's and they were subject to the Training School Rules issued in 1952.[62] Rule 39 (d) stated that separation should be exceptional and was subject to a number of conditions:

I. "No boy or girl under the age of twelve shall be kept in separation.

II. The room used for the purpose shall be light and airy and kept lighted after dark.

60 Day 143, pp.34 to 36.
61 SPT 052.
62 SPT 1611.

III. Some form of occupation shall be given.

IV. Means of communication with a member of staff shall be provided.

V. If the separation is to be continued for more than 24 hours, the written consent of the Board of Management shall be obtained and the circumstances shall be reported immediately to the Ministry."

74 We have no information about any secure rooms at the Milltown site, but there were cells sited near the kitchen when the school moved to Glen Road. From the descriptions given by witnesses these rooms did not meet the requirements laid down in Regulation 39(d) of the 1952 Training School Rules.[63] The light was said to have filtered through frosted glass bricks, and the rooms were not "light and airy". According to HIA 162 he was not given "some form of occupation" while in secure accommodation, nor were there any means to communicate with staff. There was a hard bed with half a mattress, no food and no call system. He added that he was held in the secure accommodation for three or four days, which the Brothers denied.[64] HIA 58 said that this room was known as the "sick bay".[65] "That room was part of my life for two years."[66] HIA 58 was at St Patrick's in the late 1960s; by the early 1970s, according to HIA 272 these rooms were no longer in use. They were abandoned because, being near the boiler house, they were subject to fumes.[67] Because of the absence of inspection reports for this period we have found no information to indicate that the Inspectors were concerned about the failure of St Patrick's to adhere to the Training School Rules in this respect. However, these secure rooms must have been in use for some years, and as the inspectors were regular visitors to St Patrick's they must have been aware of the conditions in the rooms, and therefore must have condoned their continuing use.

75 We consider that the failure of St Patrick's to conform to the Training School Rules in respect of secure accommodation at this time, and of the Inspectorate to note the breaches and take action, constituted systemic abuse.

76 Detention rooms were then set aside on an upper floor near the dormitories, but according to SPT 3 these were used less, as it was difficult to get a truculent boy up several flights of stairs, and a member of staff had to be designated to oversee the detention, reducing the staff team on duty. Boys were only detained in the cells for a few hours, till they had settled down.[68] SPT 2 said that the rooms were used only half a dozen times during his time at St Patrick's,[69] which contrasts with the accounts of witnesses who say that they were often placed in the cells, as they were used for absconders.[70] HIA 94 absconded frequently and was placed in one of these isolation rooms[71] where he said he was beaten by two housemasters.[72] SPT 3 said that the use of cells ceased in the late 1970s.[73] Although witnesses differed in their accounts of the frequency with which these rooms were used, there is no evidence that the School failed to comply with the Training School Rules.

77 Slemish House, which was opened in 1984 and is discussed in more detail below, had a secure perimeter; the whole house therefore constituted secure accommodation. The report by the Inspectors following SPT 81's death in 1994 noted the lack of guidelines for secure accommodation and recommended that the Northern Ireland Office should issue guidance for the boards of management of training schools to incorporate into their procedures.[74] They failed to mention the requirements of Rule 39 or that SPT 81, then aged eleven, should not have been placed "in separation", ie in secure accommodation at all. This matter is dealt with more fully below.

Corporal Punishment

78 Under the Training School Rules there was clear guidance on the way corporal punishment should be administered, which included the canes which could be used, who could administer canings, and how they should be witnessed and recorded. In the classroom, the Education Rules were applied, which differed from the Training School Rules. The De La Salle Order's guidelines said that corporal punishment should not be used at all. In Northern Ireland the strap appears to have been substituted for the cane. SPT 2 said that he saw the cane used in the late 1960s and the strap was in use in 1971 and that its use was recorded in the punishment book. Although authorised to use it, he rarely did so.

79 Witnesses reported that there were times when they were sent to the Brother Director for punishment. HIA 227, for example, was sent two or three times to the headmaster and was punished with the strap on the hand.[75] Formal punishments were recorded and the records were checked by Inspectors; Kathleen Forrest, for example, was reported to have checked the "statutory books" on 29 November 1950.[76] SPT 52 said he witnessed the Principal administering six strokes on the buttocks in the office, and found the experience distressing.[77]

80 It should be noted that the Rules specified the use of a light cane, but the De La Salle Brothers used a leather strap. While the Regulations were based on the Approved School Rules relating to England and Wales, where caning was standard practice, in Scotland the tawse was widely used. It is possible therefore, that the strap was generally deemed an acceptable alternative to the cane in Northern Ireland, although this was not made explicit through a formal change in the Regulations. SPT 2 said that he was authorised to use the strap, but rarely did so, and never after 1973 to 1974.[78] SPT 3 said that only senior managers used the strap, in accordance with Training School Rules, and when he was promoted to be a senior member of staff he only used the strap once or twice.[79] The Order accepted that straps were used by teachers and other staff, and that some punishments were not recorded, but it argued that this only occurred as punishment for misdemeanours and was never excessive.[80] HIA 229 said that brothers carried straps in their pockets, between 18 and 24 inches in length, some being rigid and some flexible.[81] However, BR 94 stated that straps were kept in the tuckshop, and that staff were authorised to give boys a slap to check disputes or for bad language.[82]

81 It seems that formal corporal punishment went out of fashion and was abandoned around the mid-1970s, although BR 50 said that he witnessed a boy being strapped as late as 1977.[83] BR 26 said that he was personally opposed to corporal punishment as the boys had had "Enough of violence in their lives already".[84] Corporal punishment in the classroom was not permitted following its abolition under the Education (Corporal Punishment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. Corporal punishment was still permitted by the Training School Rules up to the point of St Patrick's closure in 1996.[85]

82 The majority of the corporal punishment described by the witnesses, however, appears to have been informal. BR 94 accepted that he used the strap "sparingly" in this way.[86] It was an instantaneous response to a situation by both brothers and lay housemasters, sometimes accepted by the boys as a just punishment for misbehaviour but sometimes appearing to be unjustified and gratuitous, which was resented. HIA 282, for example, said that he was smacked and kicked for no reason.[87] HIA 314 said brothers hit the boys with keys, sticks and leather straps, often for no reason.[88]

83 During much of St Patrick's history, the use of informal corporal punishment was typical of many day schools and families; it was an accepted part of the culture, and in this respect it could be said that the staff of St Patrick's were reflecting accepted ways of dealing with misbehaviour. However, during the period covered by the bulk of the allegations, such punishment breached the Training School Rules, it was contrary to the Order's guidelines, and it was unacceptable as professional child care practice.

84 We consider the use of informal corporal punishment was systemic abuse.

Supervision of Dormitories

85 HIA 100 said that boys were put in charge of the dormitory and if there was misbehaviour a boy might be made to kneel in front of a statue of St Patrick in the middle of the dormitory and pray with his back "bolt upright". If a boy then slouched he was made to kneel on the tiles in the corridor "all night". Kneeling for long periods was most unpleasant for the boys affected and although schools often designated older boys as prefects it was unacceptable practice to delegate authority to punish other boys in this way. The brothers whose rooms were attached to the dormitories had a small window with a venetian blind so that they could observe the boys' behaviour, and they therefore should have been aware of this practice.[89]

86 HIA 272 spoke of being made to kneel on the floor for two hours in the event of misbehaviour at night, and added:

> "In other cases if anyone misbehaved they waited until about three or four in the morning and they brought everyone down and put us through cold showers. ...it could have happened maybe three or four times in six months."[90]

This type of punishment was unacceptable both because of the inhumanity of depriving boys of sleep in this way and because a whole group should not be punished for the misbehaviour of individuals. The Order is of the opinion that this recollection is inaccurate, partly because every dormitory would have been visited by the night supervisors every thirty minutes, and partly because no other witness recalled this type of punishment.

87 As variants on this account were provided by other witnesses, it appears to have been standard practice and it could therefore be termed systemic. Furthermore, under Rule 45 of the Training School Rules, it was stated:

> "No pupil shall be allowed to administer any form of punishment to any other pupil."[91]

88 We consider that permitting older boys to punish others when supervising them in the dormitory was a breach of the Training School Rules and was systemic abuse.

Other Informal Punishments

89 HIA 229, for instance, resented the action of 'Br Philip' when he had been given permission to return late after a concert:

> "'Br Philip' removed my mattress and my bedding and I was forced to sleep on the springs. ...This was the type of punishment for no reason which some Brothers really enjoyed."[92]

The Order have told us that there was no Br Philip at St Patrick's. HIA 229's account suggests that, whichever brother was involved, this action was an inappropriate and spiteful misuse of authority, and so clearly constituted unacceptable practice, but there is no other evidence to confirm that it was more than a one-off incident and we do not regard it as systemic abuse.

90 HIA 275 said that towards the end of the 1980s:

> "I was stripped naked and forced to stand in the corner of the common room for hours on end. I was told it was to stop me running away so much. …This type of punishment happened on at least seven or eight occasions". The member of staff responsible was HIA 275's keyworker, and HIA 275 considered him a bully.[93]

91 Frequent absconding must have been exasperating to staff, and they may have been at their wits' end to know how to help HIA 275 settle. However, his keyworker should have been the person to whom HIA 275 could turn for support and care, rather than his main tormentor. The punishment applied was humiliating, cruel and counter-productive as well. The humiliation of stripping a boy naked to stand in full view on a number of occasions constituted systemic abuse. Other examples of informal punishments are dealt with below under the heading of physical abuse.

The Impact of the Troubles on St Patrick's

92 The Troubles commenced in 1969 and continued with varying levels of unrest and violence throughout the remainder of the existence of St Patrick's. They had a direct impact on the school in a number of ways. As noted above, St Patrick's was sited on the south-west edge of the city of Belfast and some of the most dangerous areas during the Troubles were within walking distance of the school. Indeed, there was an army base sited next to St Patrick's, and the School was hit once by crossfire, and damage was done to the brickwork.[94] As the staff were aware, the families of some of the boys were seriously affected: some were threatened and told to leave their homes. In other cases, houses, and indeed streets, were burnt out, so that in Belfast a great many families had to be rehoused.[95] In some cases the fathers and brothers of boys at St Patrick's were arrested. Boys were understandably worried about their families' safety, and this was said to be one cause of absconding.[96]

93 There were reports that gangs of men infiltrated the premises at St Patrick's, and this frightened the boys. HIA 162 wrote:

> "The major problem I had during that time was with the IRA. I know that on one occasion the night watchman allowed masked men into the dormitory where I slept in order to give me a punishment beating. There were a number of other boys around when these masked men arrived and there was a mass fight. The masked men then made off because of the commotion. There were never any Brothers around when this was happening. The nightwatchman later told me they would say I was found wandering outside the dormitory."[97]

In oral evidence HIA 162 said that the masked men got in through a door which was normally locked, and the brothers were all absent at the time.[98]

94 BR 26 recalled a time when two paramilitaries called and requested two boys to help with an assignment. He told them that he would need to seek parental permission first and "luckily" they left.[99] The army would not permit them to shut the gates, and so people visited St Patrick's in stolen cars. The army also made a hole in St Patrick's perimeter fence. In the circumstances BR 26 felt that there was "only so much that they could do."[100]

> "The Training School had a number of boys who had been remanded there due to suspected involvement with paramilitaries. There was a lot of Republican involvement in the school at the time and the Brothers seemed to let them do what they wanted and seemed to support them. I had the impression that they were treated a lot better than people such as myself who were not involved in that type of activity. ...The Brothers became very anti-IRA after a while."[101]

96 This was echoed by HIA 54, who saw St Patrick's as:

> "a recruiting ground for Fianna Eireann, the junior wing of the Provisional IRA".

He was approached by another boy with recruiting material, but rejected the approach. Like HIA 162 he considered the brothers to be sympathetic to boys who were in St Patrick's for paramilitary crimes and they "seemed to get an easier time."[102]

97 In oral evidence BR 26 said that at one point a group of senior boys planned to set up an IRA unit in the school and abduct staff. BR 52, who was then the Principal, went to the Northern Ireland Office where a civil servant gave BR 52 Máire Drumm's phone number. They met in Andersonstown and she then met the head of the group, telling him to forget the idea.[103] BR 26 observed that the Brothers had no preparation for dealing with such things.[104]

98 In the wider community, the republican movement was split into the Provisional IRA, the Official IRA and other factions, and a bitter internecine war was being fought. This was at times replicated within St Patrick's. HIA 162 again:

> "There were gangs at St Patrick's and there was a lot of bullying. The brothers knew what was going on and they watched from the sidelines. They only intervened if things got very serious."[105]

BR 26 acknowledged this problem, and spoke of factions within the boys' group, with different allegiances making the situation very volatile.[106]

99 When absconding, there was always the risk that boys would become involved in further offending or behaviour which put them at risk. Joy-riding became popular; cars were frequently stolen, ridden around at speed and then burnt out. Indeed, it became necessary to carry a passenger to mind one's car when shopping or going on errands to prevent it being stolen. It was illegal to leave unattended parked cars in the city centre, and drivers could be fined or their cars might be destroyed by the army. At St Patrick's brothers took boys with them to mind the school's car or to undertake the errands while they remained with the vehicle.

100 In addition to the men who infiltrated the school, there were army patrols, and the boys, some of whom had been involved in rioting before admission to St Patrick's, at times threw stones at them. The Brother Director spoke to the army officer responsible, who was very courteous, to persuade him to reduce patrols, but the immediate effect was that patrols were increased in size.

101 For some boys, the school acted as a refuge from the Troubles. HIA 272, for example returned from absconding as the "Fianna boys" were going to give him a hiding. SPT 125 said that, but for the advice of BR 26 to keep his head down, he might well have been sucked into involvement in civil disorder.[107] For others, such as HIA 162, the Troubles provided cover when they absconded and were running wild, as they were able to stay in areas where the police would not come.[108]

102 BR 26 said that the introduction of the Diplock courts caused St Patrick's considerable difficulties. First of all, the school was faced with additional demand for places. At one time they had eight boys in their care on murder charges. On another occasion, after civil disturbance they were required to admit 23 boys. Furthermore, boys on remand were meant to be kept on the premises and not allowed home leave. This was contrary to the St Patrick's practice of maintaining close home contact and added to tension when remanded boys could see others visiting their families. In some cases remands were extended repeatedly, and BR 26 raised the matter with the Director of Public Prosecutions.[109] The regulations were not changed, but BR 26 did admit that occasionally they overlooked a boy's remand status in permitting him to leave the premises, for example as a member of a football team.[110]

103 BR 26 described the situation as "hugely difficult"; they just hoped that tomorrow would not be as bad as yesterday. He felt that they had been very successful; for example, when they had the 26 boys on remand, they managed to get 24 of them to court despite the open nature of the school.[111] The brothers were in an extremely difficult predicament. They were clearly part of the Catholic community, and as such, no doubt had sympathies with the plight of the Catholics who were rendered homeless or who were victims of shootings. On the other hand St Patrick's played an important role in the justice system; the school needed to co-operate with the courts, the police and in some instances the prison system. They have pointed out that on two occasions soldiers accidentally left weapons on the premises and that both times the guns were handed in.[112]

104 BR 94 said that he thought the staff deserved credit for "keeping a lid" on the factions among the boys during the Troubles. Fr Timothy Bartlett wrote on behalf of the Diocese of Down and Connor that they were:

> "acutely aware of the outstanding efforts that were made by the staff and Managing Board of St Patrick's during those uniquely turbulent and dangerous years to maintain a professional and stable environment for the residents there in the midst of the most challenging circumstances, including a prevailing culture of armed intimidation and threat by paramilitary organisations."[113]

We concur with their views.

105 Individual members of staff faced similar difficulties. They lived in the community and had to travel to St Patrick's to work, and no doubt had concerns for their own safety and that of their families.

106 All of these factors would have been elements in the backdrop at the time of the most serious incident during the Troubles, the abduction and murder of Bernard Teggart.

The Death of Bernard Brendan Teggart

107 Gerard and Bernard Teggart were twin brothers, and members of a family of thirteen children living in a socially deprived area. Their father was shot dead by the Army on 9 August 1971. The two brothers both had learning difficulties and were functioning at the level of much younger children. They were involved in petty offending and were first admitted to St Patrick's on 17 April 1968. They spent some time also at Rubane and were returned home, but were readmitted to St Patrick's on 22 April 1970 under Training School Orders.[114]

108 On Sunday 11 November 1973 a teacher, SPT 151 found three Provisional IRA men questioning Gerard in the woodwork room and they demanded that he should accompany them for an hour for questioning. SPT 151 told the men that Gerard had learning difficulties and was vulnerable, but despite his attempts to stall, they were insistent and he reluctantly agreed that Gerard should accompany them. Gerard was returned to the school an hour later as promised. SPT 151 informed BR 52, then the Principal of St Patrick's, and no further action was taken.[115]

113 SPT 3018.
114 SPT 2119.
115 SPT 2124.

109 The next day, 12 November, two different men came to the school and initially asked to take Bernard away for questioning, but then confirmed that it was Gerard who was wanted for questioning. On this occasion the Principal, BR 52, was involved, and he attempted to dissuade them, but the men appeared to be threatening and possibly armed, and reluctantly he agreed. BR 52 then left the school and went to a pre-arranged meeting in Newtownards. While he was away other men came to the school and took Bernard away for questioning. SPT 151 explained to the police that he allowed this to happen on the basis that BR 52 had previously agreed that the men could take Gerard out of the school.[116] SPT 151 explained that he became concerned when two hours had passed and the boys had not been returned and he consulted with brothers in the main office about contacting BR 52 and/or informing the police but was told to do neither thing in the meantime. BR 52 returned to the school around 5 pm, but the police were not informed about the abductions.

110 The two boys were moved around the city from house to house and were questioned. Eventually, Gerard was taken to a main road, given three shillings and an anorak; as he left, he could hear Bernard crying and screaming. He made his way home and told his mother what happened.[117]

111 When the twins were not returned by 6 pm that evening, BR 52 made enquiries, visiting the boys' home and other possible haunts.[118] Gerard was found asleep at home, but Bernard was not to be found. It was later that his body was discovered in Bellevue Park, with a label "tout" (meaning an informer) placed beside him. Bernard had been shot in the head at about 10 pm but was still alive; he was taken to the Royal Victoria Hospital by ambulance, where he died in the early hours of next morning, 13 November 1973.[119] His body was identified by the St Patrick's laundry mark, 106, on his clothes.[120] Dr Carson, the Deputy State Pathologist, conducted a post mortem and recorded death by "a gunshot wound to the head."[121] BR 52 informed the Bishop, but not the police. It was at first thought by the police that the twins had absconded from St Patrick's and they were described by the police as "escapees"; the fact that they had been abducted only came to light later when the boys' sister told the police.[122]

112 The reason for the abductions, questioning and murder is not clear, but it is assumed that Bernard was seen by the Provisional IRA as an informer.[123]

113 This tragic event had considerable consequences. There were 263 murders that year in the Troubles, nine of which took place in Belfast that month, but Bernard's case was different and there was major public outcry. On 17 November 1973 a group of priests (Fr Denis Faul of Dungannon and Frs Aodh Bennett and Alexander Reid of Clonard Monastery) wrote to the Belfast Telegraph, posing four questions:

> "(1) What kind of an organisation would feel threatened by a boy with the mental age of eight?
>
> (2) What kind of 'justice' did this boy receive who was ill-treated and murdered without trial?
>
> (3) What kind of moral standards operate in people who are responsible for this child murder?
> (4) What kind of Irishman would condone, support or be associated with the people who did this deed?"[124]

114 The Historical Enquiries Team, which was set up to investigate unsolved cases from the Troubles, was critical of St Patrick's when it reviewed the case sometime after 2009:

> "The school had a duty of care to the boys. …That duty of care was not exercised when the school allowed the abductions, although [SPT 151] gave context to the difficulties the school was facing. His description of suspected terrorists entering the school on a regular basis demonstrates very intimidating and uncomfortable times. He also pointed out that co-operation with these groups in the past had never resulted in such tragedy."

115 "The RUC [Royal Ulster Constabulary] investigation team were very concerned at the time about the conduct of the school, its failure to give the true circumstances of the abductions and its lack of co-operation after the murder."[125]

116 It was reported in the press that the Ministry of Home Affairs undertook an inquiry into Bernard's death, but the Historical Enquiries Team could not find a copy of their report, and concluded that the school "failed

123 SPT 2149.
124 SPT 2157.
125 SPT 2151.

lamentably" in its duty of care to Bernard.[126] It was 10 May 1974 before the Board of Management met, and their discussion then focused on a claim for compensation. At that time nine boys in the school were there because of charges of murder or attempted murder and eight were on firearm charges; Board members expressed concern that such boys were in the school.[127]

117 Bernard's murderer has never been identified, but in October 2004 the IRA issued an apology, saying that "the killing should not have happened."[128] About 2009 the Historical Enquiry Team investigated Bernard's murder; despite the preparation of a full report they were unable to add to the known facts.[129]

118 In his evidence to the Inquiry BR 52, who left the Order in 1979 to become a teacher, expressed profound regret for having let Bernard down, saying that his memories tormented him.[130] That he permitted the abduction of Bernard and failed to report the three abductions to the police is clear, but his predicament when faced with the abductors was not something for which he could have been prepared. Nor was he well supported; he said that between Board meetings (which at that time took place twice a year) he had no contact with the Bishop or the Board members.[131] Whatever BR 52 had decided to do, St Patrick's was in a situation of exceptionally high risk at that time, and any judgement of his conduct now has the benefit of over forty years' hindsight. We acknowledge that BR 52's predicament was unenviable.

119 The failure to report the abductions to the Police, however, was clearly a systemic failure on the part of the Brother Director. The failure of the Board of Management to meet immediately after the boy's death, constituted a systemic failure to investigate the incident, and to ensure that the training school provided proper care and support for both staff and boys at such a critical time.

120 There is nothing to suggest that the NIO took any steps to investigate whether any policies or procedures needed to be changed to protect boys from suffering a similar fate, and their failure to do so represents a systemic failing on their part.

Absconding

121 Absconding appears to have been the biggest behavioural problem for St Patrick's, and the school's failure to address the problem is probably its most significant shortcoming. BR 26 said that absconding was not a problem during the 1950s when the school was at Milltown, as the boys liked to be there, since there was little for them at home.[132] Absconding appears to have been persistent at the Glen Road site, however, throughout the period covered by the evidence of witnesses. BR 26 said that from the 1960s and 1970s onwards the boys had a 'devil may care' attitude and were fairly wild and untamed, being used to freedom.[133]

122 Several witnesses absconded on multiple occasions while at St Patrick's. A random selection of records showed that HIA 26 absconded 11 times, HIA 272 19 times, HIA 282 9 times and HIA 384 a total of 17 times.[134] At times, boys ran away in groups of eight or ten, with 12 on 8 October 1979,[135] and some frequent absconders were said to be absent more often than they were present. Again, a random selection of months indicates 38 abscondings in February 1974, 33 in April 1976 and 40 in October 1979.[136] In total, 353 abscondings were reported in the first six months of 1994, and 28 in the two months prior to SPT 81's death.[137] The problem appears to have been persistent.

123 This pattern of behaviour is important for seven reasons:

(a) The courts had committed the boys to the care of St Patrick's, and the court orders were being breached when they were absent.

(b) Absence from St Patrick's meant that the boys were at risk; no responsible adult knew where they were and they were vulnerable to exploitation or violence, especially during the Troubles.

(c) The boys' programmes of care, education and trade training were disrupted by abscondings, often at a time when they needed a period of stability in their personal lives and in their education and technical training if they were to achieve success in obtaining employment and living independently on leaving St Patrick's.

137 SPT 12641.

(d) Absconding often signifies problems from which children are running. Several of the witnesses attributed the start of their absconding to sexual or physical abuse.[138]

(e) Well publicised research in the late 1970s showed that boys who absconded frequently committed offences, especially if they were living rough and needed money or food to survive. Some boys without previous criminal records started to offend when absconding. Offending of this sort was correlated with persistent offending as an adult, with the consequence of prison sentences. Indeed, several of the witnesses to the Inquiry had lengthy records of offending through much of their adult lives. It was therefore of real importance that any tendency to abscond should be countered as early and as effectively as possible if a lifetime of crime were to be avoided.[139]

(f) Absconding could be contagious; boys who had been progressing well could become unsettled and, if invited or pressured to abscond, they were at risk of accompanying those for whom it was already an established pattern. There was the risk that absconding in St Patrick's would be perpetuated in this way.

(g) Further offending inevitably left additional victims of the offences, affecting the reputation of the school in the eyes of the public and the services on whose co-operation St Patrick's relied; returning boys to St Patrick's must at times have seemed pointless to the police, when the boys absconded again immediately after the police had left.

124 St Patrick's faced three major problems in coping with absconding. The first is that, in being sited on Glen Road, it was on the south-western edge of the city of Belfast, a relatively short walk from the homes and haunts of many of the boys. Absconding must therefore have been tempting to any boy who was homesick or who resented curtailment to the freedom he had enjoyed prior to admission.

125 Secondly, the school was an open establishment. There were some locked doors, but it was relatively easy for boys to find a way out and a point in the daily round when they could slip away. Aisling House, for example, had five external doors from which boys could leave. In the early days,[140] according to SPT 3 because of the low staff numbers, boys were "shepherded" in groups from one activity to another by staff, thus reducing their opportunities to abscond,[141] but as supervision became more relaxed such measures were dropped and it became easier for boys to run away.

138 HIA 253, Day 142, p.8.
139 SPT 19777.
140 SPT 12637.

126 Thirdly, from 1969 onwards Belfast was often in turmoil because of the Troubles, and this impacted on absconding in various ways. As noted above, some of the boys were directly involved in the Troubles themselves, having played minor roles in political organisations and been involved in rioting, and they were sent to St Patrick's for that reason. They attempted to recruit other boys to join them. They were presumably tempted to leave the school in order to participate in civil disorder or other activities. Indeed the problem was such that General Leng, the Commander Land Forces in the Army in Northern Ireland, later recalled the absconding of "young terrorists" from a remand institution (which we believe was St Patrick's) as a problem in the 1970s. Other boys may have absconded because they were concerned for the welfare of their families.

127 If boys absconded during the Troubles it was more difficult for the staff to travel in some areas of the city in order to search for absconders, and the police too were reluctant to enter some parts without army support, so that absconders were not followed up promptly. The Troubles were themselves unsettling and as noted above there were reports of groups of men from organisations entering the premises at St Patrick's. Their presence would have left the boys feeling insecure and would have diminished the control exerted by the staff.

128 Even allowing for these serious difficulties, the level of absconding at St Patrick's was unduly high for many years, and it does not seem to have caused sufficient concern to lead to a concerted plan of action to counter it.

129 Research has indicated that what are termed 'institutional controls' are one of the key factors in reducing absconding. However, they needed to be linked with strong 'expressive controls', "to mould and influence children's moral behaviour, beliefs and interpersonal relationships" in order to be effective.[142] In other words, in addition to physical measures such as locked doors, fences and tight supervision, staff needed to talk to boys, to ensure that they were settled and to find out what could be done if they were unsettled, in order to help them deal with their problems, and in the process to reduce their motivation to abscond.

141 Day 144, p.9.
142 SPT 19778.

130 Some action was taken. Shepherding has been mentioned before, and this was typical of the approach taken in the earlier years in training schools, so that there were fewer opportunities for boys to be unsupervised.

131 In attempting to find positive solutions to deal with absconding, the main development in the junior side of St Patrick's was the opening of Slemish House in 1984, described below. There was concern that frequent absconders were sometimes moving on to the closed establishments of Lisnevin and Hydebank primarily because of their absconding pattern and not because those establishments were more suited to meet the boys' needs in other ways. Slemish House was secure, but it only had eight beds. It was therefore only able to meet the needs of a small number of boys who were going through a disturbed phase, and its presence may have acted as a deterrent to others. It was not large enough, though, to meet the scale of absconding at St Patrick's and in the process to break the pattern. The provision of a secure unit was an 'institutional control' but it offered the chance for staff to spend time with boys in the unit to discuss their predicament, thus offering 'expressive controls' as well.

132 There were also informal attempts to punish absconders. HIA 314 said that during his time in the early 1960s absconders' heads were shaved and one shoe was removed so that the boys could not run.[143] Other witnesses reported that they had to wear shorts after absconding.[144] HIA 162 said that older boys were allowed to beat up absconders.[145]

133 Research showed that patterns of absconding varied enormously from one institution to another, sometimes being five or six times higher in one school than other establishments with similar intakes, and there were few factors which appear to be predictors. Two positive factors were that where boys were happy and contented levels of absconding were much lower, and where absconders were welcomed back absconding levels dropped. By corollary, where absconders were moved on, levels were higher.[146] We have insufficient information to judge how happy the boys were at St Patrick's or to tell what proportion of absconders were passed on to Lisnevin and Hydebank.

134 SPT 26 thought that absconders were fewer as the occupancy of the school reduced.[147] However, the Inspectors in 1994 concluded that absconding levels were "very high" - a problem which staff found "very difficult to control", but which should not have been "treated as inevitable", but was requiring "a more strategic approach."[148]

135 In the Inspectors' report on SPT 81's death, it was stated that the SSI had been involved in working with another training school (Rathgael) on the subject of absconding, and a fifteen point strategy had been established which had had some success.[149] This was based on research which had been undertaken by the Adolescent Psychological Research Unit (APRU), which supported training schools in various ways. It was recommended that the strategy should be made available to St Patrick's as it had been successful in reducing absconding.[150] It is our view that this report should not have been kept confidential, when its findings were clearly of relevance to St Patrick's, and maybe other training schools and homes. It could have been shared at meetings of the principals of the schools, and a digest of recommended action could have been circulated more widely. In June 1995 the Chief Inspector, Dr Kevin McCoy, sent a minute to Sir John Wheeler, the then Northern Ireland Office Minister, about the report on the death of SPT 81, in which he observed that the "NIO was, of course, already well aware of the high levels of absconding at St Patrick's."[151] Unlike Rathgael, however, this awareness had not led to a concerted plan of action to address the problem at St Patrick's.

136 Statistical returns concerning absconding were provided by St Patrick's to the NIO and these records would have been open to Inspectors when they visited. Prior to the concern raised by the death of SPT 81 neither the NIO nor the SSI had raised absconding as a major issue with St Patrick's and we consider this a systemic failure on their part.

137 The failure to circulate the APRU report's findings more widely and assist St Patrick's in finding ways of dealing with persistent absconding was a systemic failure on the part of the NIO.

138 Furthermore, the APRU, which had been set up as a combined unit to support all the training schools and which had undertaken the research on absconding, also failed to share their findings with St Patrick's, when they must have known that it had a similar problem.

139 In the end, as the numbers of staff increased and the number of boys was reduced, they presumably received closer individual attention, thus providing better 'expressive controls', and it has been suggested that the level of absconding diminished when the chalets were opened,[152] though information gathered following the death of SPT 81 does not support this view.

140 The level of absconding was seen in professional residential childcare practice as a key indicator for the effectiveness of a home or school, and research suggested that schools with high absconding levels were often failing in other ways as well. In this respect St Patrick's failed, both because of the scale of absconding and because insufficient countermeasures were developed, which suggests that the problem was not taken seriously enough.

141 It is our conclusion that the failure to take adequate measures to counter absconding constituted systemic abuse, in that it left boys vulnerable in terms of the risks they faced when absconding, in the patterns of criminality which were fostered while absconding, and in the effect of their absconding pattern on their later lives.

The Death of SPT 81

142 The most tragic instance of absconding led to the death of SPT 81 in 1994. SPT 81 was a boy from Derry and although he was only aged eleven and a half, he was admitted to Aisling House, the assessment unit at St Patrick's, on 22 July 1994 for assessment following some serious behavioural problems at Harberton House.[153]

143 He was encouraged by four other boys to abscond on the afternoon of Sunday 14 August 1994 and they made their way through various parts of Belfast. The absconding had been planned, as SPT 81 had hidden a bag of food and clothes in advance.[154] A member of staff went looking for them, which was good practice, but failed to find them. In the early hours of Monday 15 August in the Falls Road area the boys stole and started up a car, but SPT 81 was left at the roadside, which upset him. When his companions made a circuit of the streets he jumped out in front of the car and then jumped back. The driver swerved and missed him, but on the third time that this happened, SPT 81 jumped in the direction in which the car swerved, and he was knocked down and killed.[155]

144 This tragedy demonstrated the influence of regular absconders on impressionable newcomers and underlined the vulnerability of absconders to serious harm.

145 Three inquiries were conducted into the circumstances leading to SPT 81's death. The first was internal to St Patrick's, carried out at the request of the Board Chairman by two Board members to consider the role of the school in events. The report essentially described what had happened, and only made one recommendation - that when staff went to get the minibus they should take the boys with them, to maximise supervision.[156]

146 The second was undertaken by Bob Bunting, Assistant Director in the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, and Mr T. Haverty, Chief Social Work Adviser with the Western Board for the Western Health and Social Services Board, to examine the lead up to SPT 81's placement at St Patrick's, and so its contents have little bearing on this chapter.[157]

147 The third report was prepared at the joint request of the Criminal Justice Services Division of the Northern Ireland Office and the Department of Health and Social Services by the Inspectorate to deal with "a number of matters not fully covered" by the first two reports.[158] It was undertaken by Victor McElfatrick and Chris Walker of the Social Services Inspectorate and Robert Mitchell of the Northern Ireland Office. They were highly critical of St Patrick's, pointing out that SPT 81's vulnerability as a new boy to the influence of older established absconders had been underestimated,[159] that records suggested that the seriousness of absconding was not recognised, and that there was little indication that the reasons for a boy absconding were followed up on his return.[160] This was contrary to oral evidence from brothers who said that there was discussion with absconders on their return to understand why they had run away.

148 The Inspectors made a total of 23 recommendations, which covered issues as diverse as information leaflets, door alarms, policy matters, staffing and management. They recommended the introduction of an information system "to monitor absconding and develop a strategic approach to tackling the problem", the sharing of the Rathgael report on absconding, and a "fundamental review of the care arrangements" to identify ways of reducing absconding.[161]

149 The incident appears to have led to some tension between the Inspectorate and the NIO, who had expected the report to be more critical of the quality of management at St Patrick's and appeared to feel that the inspectors themselves had fallen short.[162] Victor McElfatrick responded to these criticisms with a memorandum to the Chief Inspector Dr Kevin McCoy.[163]

150 We have already mentioned that St Patrick's failed to develop a strategic approach to absconding by comparison with Rathgael's initiative, which had led to an immediate initial reduction in absconding, and we have observed that neither the Inspectorate nor the NIO gave a lead in urging St Patrick's to address the problem. SPT 81's death sadly underlines our earlier findings of systemic failure. Until the Inspectors' report identified the action needed in its 23 recommendations, no comment had been made about the extent of absconding and the risks it posed, either in inspection reports or on receipt of the regular statistical returns.

Slemish House

151 As St Patrick's was redeveloped, smaller units on a more domestic scale were built with specific purposes in mind. Slemish House was originally used to prepare senior boys for discharge. SPT 2 worked in Slemish House for ten years.[164] He said that it was his idea to use the unit to provide intensive care and security, as there was concern about the number of boys absconding and about the consequent need to transfer some of them to secure establishments such as Lisnevin and Hydebank. This was particularly unfortunate when boys with no history of offending began to offend while absconding and left St Patrick's with a criminal record, and SPT 2 felt that such transfers were unhelpful and unnecessary. Having been promoted to the post of Deputy Head, he took a demotion to establish Slemish House's new role.[165]

152 It was therefore decided (in the late 1980s, though the date is unclear) to open Slemish House as an eight-place unit to hold and contain boys while their futures were planned. This meant:

> "... not just physical containment of a body but, perhaps as important, emotional containment, i.e. making the boy feel safe and secure in the knowledge that adults (staff) are capable of exercising control over aspects of his life which, invariably, the boy will not have been coping with either in the community or in previous placements."[166]

It was felt to be:

> "...both damaging and frightening for the child who has not acquired self control to feel out of control."[167]

It was argued that:

> "external control of the boys should primarily be exercised by staff and not the building."[168]

153 A draft of the Slemish House Staff Handbook and Guidelines appears to have been written prior to the opening of the unit. It laid out the philosophy of the House, its role, guidelines for admission, the staffing, specialist support, the quality of life in the unit, security and physical controls, the management of children, meetings, education, medical provision, record-keeping, visits, daily routines and rules for the boys. It demonstrated comprehensive planning of the way the unit would be run, and indicated a consistent and coherent approach to the management of difficult behaviour at critical times.[169] The guidelines were intended for a wide range of readerships - primarily the staff working in the unit, but also the boys themselves, their parents and other agencies, and some sections, such as the rules for boys, were directed at particular audiences.

154 SPT 2 said that he had been unimpressed by the secure units he had visited in England and Scotland, as they offered no comfort.[170] Although admissions to Slemish House were made at a time of crisis and were short-term, SPT

2 wanted boys to be able to settle down.[171] Placement in Slemish House was not intended to be punitive and was to be used only if there were no alternative.[172] Boys could not be admitted direct to Slemish House and those placed there had to have a history of absconding and to be at risk of injuring themselves or others if they were not admitted.[173] An impressive Admissions Panel of nine people was to decide all admissions other than emergencies, including members of the Board of Management, the Social Work Inspectorate and the Adolescent Psychology Research Unit.[174] In an emergency the Director or his Deputy were authorised to approve admissions, but such admissions had to be reviewed every 24 hours.[175] It seems that in practice these guidelines were not always followed.

155 In their report on the death of SPT 81 the Inspectorate were critical of the use of Slemish House as a response to misbehaviour. On his first night in Aisling House SPT 81, who was then aged 11, was playing up and using "spicy language" to the Night Supervisor, and he was placed in Slemish House. The Inspectors recommended that the use of secure accommodation in this way should be reviewed[176] and went on to recommend to the Northern Ireland Office that it should issue guidance on the use of secure accommodation in view of the lack of any regulations or guidance.[177] They appear to have overlooked the facts that SPT 81's placement in Slemish House had breached the school's own guidance and was contrary to the Training School Rules, 39 (d) (i) which stated that "No boy or girl under the age of twelve shall be kept in separation."[178]

156 Slemish House was seen as part of a continuum of care, with boys returning to open units as soon as it was feasible. Links were to be maintained, therefore, with the boys' keyworkers from the houses in which they had previously lived.[179] It was anticipated that placement in Slemish House would be short-term, with:

> "a gradual decrease of external controls as part of the boy's growth process and a staged return to greater freedom…".[180]

157 A straightforward points system was devised, different from that in the main school, and it essentially rewarded good behaviour and penalised misbehaviour. In practice, four levels were identified - green for boys doing well, amber for those with moderate problem behaviour, red for those presenting serious difficulties, and black for the most serious. Boys achieving green were returned to the units from which they had been admitted, though HIA 253 complained that he was continually knocked back.[181] The levels were decided at meetings of the full staff team held on Thursdays, and the boys were informed of the results soon afterwards.[182]

158 Boys faced with this system would have known where they stood, and for some boys going through unsettled phases this would have provided security. For those who were going through a seriously disturbed phase, however, points systems could have been irrelevant and the primary task would have been to use professional judgement to match the approach to the individual boy's needs. While the overall aims of Slemish House indicated an understanding of this type of need, the proposed working methods described in the handbook impress as being at times somewhat inflexible and mechanistic.[183]

159 Stringent requirements were laid down to limit the containment of boys in single locked rooms.[184] While arguing that physical restraint should only be used in crises, the guidelines made it clear that:

> "Staff who show fear of this physical restraint may be regarded by the boys as 'fair game'."[185]

Confrontation was seen as "not always avoidable" and confronting boys with their behaviour, describing their actions calmly, was advocated as it helped boys realise that they were not being blindly picked on or criticised.[186]

160 Detailed guidance was provided on visits, searching for contraband, the management of keys, the opening of mail in the presence of staff, the use of phones, smoking, the checking of cutlery and prohibited articles.[187] Advice on behaviour management encouraged lining up, calling the group together, phase completion, setting expectations, individual instruction, tone setting, diversionary tactics, counselling, isolating boys, observation and the use of humour.[188] Fifteen types of records were to be maintained on boys' clothing and personal property, daily occurrences, medical provision, visiting, absconding, untoward incidents, the use of lock-up rooms, rewards and cash, searches, fire drills, cutlery checks, occurrences at night, the issue of keys, staff attendance and weekly meetings. Each boy was also to have a daily occurrence clipboard.[189] The daily routine was laid out in detail,[190] and the guidance ended with two pages of rules for boys[191] and a list of twenty-one rights of boys to food, clothing, comfortable accommodation, reviews, education, medical care, safety, access to legal representation, uncensored mail, access to a phone, privacy, access to a social worker, use of a complaints procedure, protection from solitary confinement, access to family and friends when appropriate, diet, companionship, exercise and fresh air, smoking (if over 16), personal possessions, reasons and explanations for plans and decisions, access to personal information and retaining identity and religious beliefs.[192]

161 The advice constituted a blend of common sense and acceptable professional practice, intended to maintain a calm atmosphere in a unit designed to cope with crises and challenging behaviour. One value of such guidelines is that they provide a template for good practice, against which events could be evaluated. How the guidelines were interpreted and implemented in practice could well have been different from the model laid out, as the evidence of witnesses demonstrated.

162 The handbook quoted Professor Masud Hoghughi:

> "In the Secure Unit the staff are the fulcrum around which everything rotates for the child."[193]

When Slemish House was opened, the staff team was drawn from the existing staff at St Patrick's and three of them gave evidence to the Inquiry. They faced allegations, which are dealt with elsewhere in this chapter, but overall they impressed as competent professionals who remained in post at St Patrick's for many years and delivered an acceptable quality of service in a very demanding field of work.

Aisling House

163 This house was opened in May 1994 as a reception and assessment unit to accommodate 11 'care' boys. It was described by Inspectors as having "a fairly domestic atmosphere" and included offices, a recreation room, dining room, kitchen and single bedrooms for the boys. It had five external doors, and the Inspectors who investigated the death of SPT 81 were concerned that consideration should be given to fitting the doors with alarms so that staff were aware when they were opened. Some doors were locked, but this was more "to prevent the boys gaining access to some rooms rather than to stop them leaving the buildings."[194]

164 Boys admitted to the unit were initially subject to Place of Safety Orders, which lasted a maximum of 35 days. If it was felt necessary to hold a boy longer, an Interim Order for Detention was sought; this too lasted 35 days and one further consecutive Interim Order could be sought. A boy could therefore be held for a maximum of 15 weeks. By that time a decision should have been made on a long-term care plan, and if a longer period at St Patrick's was deemed to be in his best interests a Training School Order had to be sought.[195] This system resulted in a considerable amount of movement between St Patrick's and the courts. In the earlier years the police transported the boys to and fro, but during the Troubles the police were unable to undertake the work without excessive safety precautions, and so the staff conveyed the boys to court.

165 A boy admitted to Aisling House for assessment was allocated a keyworker. The Inspectors observed:

> "The keyworker takes a particular interest in the boy during his stay. These responsibilities include the basic tasks such as checking that he had adequate clothing and ensuring that he has an adult in whom he can confide. ...The keyworker role also entails taking the lead in the assessment process. The keyworker attempts to get to know the child both as a member of the group and during one to one sessions which are held once a week. ...Brief reports are written on these sessions..."[196]

Typically residential social workers were keyworkers for three or four boys.

195 SPT 12637.
196 SPT 12638.

166 The Inspectors examining SPT 81's death recommended that there should be "a more structured approach" to the assessment process, for example by using a Problem Profile Analysis. Although there were recordings of events which had occurred, "Few conclusions were drawn from them."[197]

167 Aisling House had two secure lockable rooms, known as "quiet rooms", furnished only with a mattress and a soft upholstered cube. In 1994 the Inspectors noted that the rooms had been used 92 times in the twelve month period from May 1994 to May 1995, but they expressed concern, as confinement in these rooms had been "on occasions as a response to quite minor misbehaviour", involving "disturbed children ... as young as ten years of age", though no ten-year-olds had been admitted to St Patrick's in 1994. They recommended that children should be removed to their bedrooms, accompanied by staff, who should remain with them.[198] In their review of the circumstances surrounding SPT 81's death, the Inspectorate described some of the practices concerning the separation of children as "unacceptable" and recommended a review of the use of secure accommodation.[199] They failed to observe that under the Training School Rules no child under twelve should have been confined in locked accommodation.

168 We consider that the frequency with which the secure rooms were used and their use for young children, contrary to the Training School Rules, amounted to systemic abuse on the part of St Patrick's and by the SSI in failing to address this breach of the Rules.

Discharge and Aftercare

169 Under Rule 47 of the Training School Rules the Board of Management was required to make "every effort" to obtain suitable employment and, where their homes were unsatisfactory, accommodation for young people on leaving. Rule 48 required Boards of Management to provide "a sufficient outfit" and "a reasonable sum for travelling and subsistence". Rule 49 required Boards to make arrangements for aftercare until the statutory period of supervision expired and to appoint aftercare officers. St Patrick's appears to have fulfilled these requirements, although, as in other homes we have considered, discharge came as something of a sudden shock to some boys. HIA 100, for example, considered the aftercare he experienced in 1966 as 'risible'.[200] At any one time, therefore, St Patrick's was responsible for its resident population and a substantial number of boys on after care; at one time, for example, this amounted to 160 residents and 40 on aftercare, making 200 in all.

197 SPT 12639.
198 SPT 12640.
199 SPT 12640.

170 As in other homes, about half of the witnesses had problems in adult life with alcohol and/or drug-taking, about half suffered depression or other forms of mental ill-health, and about a third had problems concerning relationships with partners and children. About two-thirds had had lengthy prison records as adults. These figures are inevitably imprecise as they are based on self-reporting, and we are unable to tell whether they represent St Patrick's clientele as a whole. Since the boys admitted for 'justice' reasons often already had substantial offending records, and since for some these were augmented because of involvement in the Troubles, it might be considered unsurprising that they continued in adult life with patterns of behaviour established when they were juveniles. It is significant, though, that for such people St Patrick's may have contained their behaviour while they were resident but it failed to break their patterns of offending and to help them to adopt and internalise less antisocial values as adults.

171 This failure was, however, shared with other similar schools in the United Kingdom. In England and Wales, 'success' was judged by the number of children found guilty of offences in the two years following discharge, and the so-called 'success rate' was just over 30%. Dissatisfaction with this statistic was one of the factors which led to the closure of most of these schools in England and Wales during the 1970s; by contrast, St Patrick's remained active, though serving dwindling numbers, till the end of the training school system in 1996.

Staffing

172 Over the period covered by the Inquiry the pattern of staffing changed considerably in four main ways:

(a) In the early years staffing levels were low. The Castle Priory Report guidelines, which were published in 1968, were adopted and applied to St Patrick's, and they formed the basis for the staffing establishment until the 1990s.[201] Though the internal inquiry undertaken by two members of the St Patrick's Board felt that staffing levels were adequate,[202]

200 Day 138, p.125.
201 SPT 12826.
202 SPT 12902

these levels were criticised by the Social Services Inspectorate as being insufficient when they examined the circumstances surrounding SPT 81's death in 1994, and they recommended an increase.[203]

(b) The balance between brothers and lay staff also changed. St Patrick's may have been staffed entirely by brothers in its early history, but HIA 314, who was admitted to St Patrick's in 1959, mentions lay staff, and they appear to have been appointed increasingly from about 1970 onwards, as demonstrated in the people who were witnesses. According to SPT 52, more lay staff were appointed during the Troubles, and the staffing establishment was doubled.[204] By the end of the Inquiry's remit very few of the staff were brothers.

(c) In the 1980s there was a concerted effort to improve the level of training, both at qualifying level and in-service, at St Patrick's. A work-based qualifying programme was established in conjunction with Rupert Stanley College (later Belfast Metropolitan College) and a total of 29 staff obtained social care qualifications. A staff team which was largely unqualified in the 1970s was converted into a mainly qualified team by the early 1990s, which was commendable.[205]

(d) Although there were two nuns providing health care, the staff was predominantly male until the mid-1970s when women began to be appointed. This was in accordance with standard practice at that time, as it was felt that staff teams in residential child care should include both men and women, both as role models and to provide complementary types of care.

173 One remarkable feature of the staff at St Patrick's – both brothers and lay staff – was the length of time that they remained in post. BR 26 commenced work at the Milltown site on 1 September 1951 and worked there for six years before the school moved to Glen Road, where he remained until 1995, a total of 44 years' work at St Patrick's. BR 94 was in post from 1961 to 1997, amounting to 36 years and BR 50 was there from 1977 to 1996, or 19 years. The longest serving member of lay staff was SPT 2 who worked at St Patrick's for 30 years from 1966 to 1996. SPT 53 was probably in post for 28 years from 1966 to 1994. SPT 3 was there for 26 years from 1973 to 1999. SPT 52 (worked at St Patrick's for 29 years from 1967 to 1996.[206] SPT 40 was there for 22 years from 1975 to 1997. SPT 26 joined the staff in 1972 and 43 years later he is still working on the site as the Principal of Glenmona. These eight staff, who all gave evidence, contributed over 270 years' service between them.

174 Clearly, as the numbers of staff increased in later years, there were many who must have served for shorter periods, but this core of long-serving staff will have provided valuable continuity, stability and consistency of practice. Consistent teamwork is a key feature of good residential care practice, and if staff work together over a long period they get to know each others' ways of working. The fact that they remained together suggests that they were at least content to continue in post at St Patrick's and at best that there was good teamwork. With consistent standards, boys would have been secure in knowing where they stood and what was expected of them, and staff would have known that they were being supported by their colleagues. BR 26 stated that the reason why they stayed was that they were totally committed to the work and some said that their time working at the school had been the happiest years of their working lives.[207] BR 26 himself said that he would choose to work there all over again.[208]

175 SPT 2 joined the staff part-time in 1966 to assist with activities. He became a full-time worker in 1970, undertook the Certificate in the Residential Care of Children and Young People in 1972-3 and retired in 1996 after 26 years' service. When he started, there was only one member of staff on duty at any one time in the senior school and one in the junior school, each supervising four dormitories with up to 80 boys in all.[209]

176 Staffing levels were progressively improved. When investigating the death of SPT 81 in 1994, the Inspectors considered the levels of staffing at St Patrick's. They found a ratio of 1:2 in Slemish House, 1:3.5 in Aisling and 1:4 in the other units. The Northern Ireland Office grant to St Patrick's had allowed for 7.5 staff in Aisling House but only 6 were appointed, and they recommended that Aisling House should be:

> "at least staffed to the levels allowed for in the funding provided by the Northern Ireland Office."[210]

177 However, the Inspectors also considered the additional demands made on staff by the nature of the work in Aisling House; they concluded that more than eleven staff were needed, and recommended that the funding supplied by the NIO should be reviewed.[211] The Inspectors went on to consider the staffing of other units, the availability of the Team Managers and the need to have a senior member of staff on site at all times.[212] It is clear from the Inspectors' conclusions that if requests had been made for additional staff, the Order would have been pushing on an open door. In practice they had not even filled all the posts on the establishment for which they were receiving funding, and staff were stretched, to judge by the overtime worked and the allocation of staff from other units to fill gaps. Indeed, staffing was particularly thin at the time of the absconding, as explained in the SSI review, and eight of the SSI's 23 recommendations for action related to staffing.[213] As the absconders were unsupervised at the time of their departure, it could be argued that the shortage of staff on duty may have contributed to the failure to prevent the absconding in which SPT 81 was killed.[214]

178 The failure to appoint sufficient staff amounts to poor management, and we consider it to be a systemic failure.

179 Brother Stephen joined St Patrick's on 1 October 1940 as a Prefect (the Order's term for a residential child care worker) and was Brother Director from 1942 up to his death on 22 December 1969. From 1942 to 1960 he was also the school Principal. His contribution was outstanding: he oversaw the redevelopment of the school on the Glen Road site and was the leading influence in the development of Rubane. He not only oversaw the management of the school for 27 years, but he also demonstrated a capacity for working with church leaders, civil servants and politicians, and he played a role in the planning of child care services throughout the province as a member of the Child Welfare Council. He was invested with the OBE on 3 March 1966.[215]

180 The lay staff mostly commuted to St Patrick's from various parts of Belfast, though some staff housing was provided on Glen Road and attached to the chalets. The brothers, however, lived on site in a community house. There they were accountable to a brother who acted as Community Director who oversaw their devotional life, managed the community's budget and supervised them as brothers.[216]

181 For much of its existence, St Patrick's had a full-time Chaplain, but in later years this post became part-time.[217]

Inspections

182 It appears that inspections were carried out annually by the Ministry of Home Affairs while St Patrick's was an industrial school and reformatory, though there are no surviving records of inspections prior to 1950. When it was redesignated a training school, following the 1950 Act, inspections were still undertaken by the Inspectorate of the Ministry of Home Affairs.

183 An inspection report by Miss Kathleen Forrest and Dr Simpson on 29 November 1950 made reference to earlier inspections. There was mention of the introduction of standardised medical records and the trialling of the bell and pad system for treating enuresis. There was also reference to trade training. Overall, the inspection approved of St Patrick's work and it was described as "an excellent institution with a cheerful homely atmosphere."[218]

184 A further approving report recorded an inspection on 18 November 1951.[219] Throughout the 1950s there are references in the home's diary to annual visits of inspection, and these entries are countersigned by the inspectors, but no reports have survived. Most of the visits were conducted in one day by two people, but in 1960 the inspection took a week and in 1971 it took two days.[220] During the 1950s and 1960s the log indicates that a number of distinguished visitors called on St Patrick's, including successive Lord Mayors of Belfast, Lord Wakehurst, Rt Hon Brian Faulkner, Lord Erskine, the Attorney General, the Lord Chief Justice, the Permanent Secretary of MOHA and a number of MPs.[221] [222]

185 There is a reference in the St Patrick's diary to an inspection on 15 June 1971, but none thereafter until 1988. There is also a major gap in the inspection records. This may in part be due to the systematic destruction of records, as no reports are available between 1951 and 1988, but it may also reflect a reduction in the number of inspections and the style of inspecting. The Social Work Advisory Group was made responsible for inspections from 1972 onwards, and, as for children's homes, their visits were not regular and tended to be supportive, advisory and informal, rather than inspectorial. We noted Mr Donnell's evidence that he visited the training schools about once a month, and sometimes more frequently, and was used by the principals as a sounding board to discuss practice and procedures.[223] We accept that this contact provided some degree of external scrutiny to the school.

186 We have noted in other modules the failure of the Social Work Advisory Group to conduct regular formal inspections from the early 1970s to the late 1980s, when they were increased in response to the Kincora scandal prior to the publication of the Hughes Report. St Patrick's was not inspected between 1971 and 1988, and we consider the lack of formal inspections a systemic failing.

187 However, following the publication of the Hughes Report in December 1985 it was decided to inspect all residential child care facilities. Between May 1987 and April 1988 all four training schools were inspected. The inspection of St Patrick's took place in February 1988.[224] There were at that time 91 boys on roll, but only 61 in residence; there were 73 staff, including 35 care staff, 7 night care staff and 16 teachers.[225] The school was therefore sufficiently staffed for boys to receive individual attention; indeed, there were very few allegations relating to St Patrick's last decade as a training school. The main report was 69 pages long and contained 52 recommendations, though there were no suggestions as to which should be treated as priorities. The overall conclusion was that the quality of care at St Patrick's was good.

188 In October 1989 the reports on the training schools were issued as a compendium.[226] There was, however, a sequel to this inspection, described in the next paragraph. At this time it was the policy that major inspections should take place every four years, with annual 'regulatory' inspections carried out by individual inspectors to check on progress in the implementation of recommendations made in the main inspections. In these inspections Inspectors toured the school and then spent time with the Principal.[227]

189 Relations between the School and the Inspectorate were for the most part cordial, but there was one such follow-up inspection on 24 January 1990 which caused considerable tension. On 12 March 1990 A.D. Shannon, newly arrived in the Northern Ireland Office to take over the division which included responsibility for the training schools, wrote a terse letter to the Bishop as Chairman of the Management Committee, expressing concern at the school's failure to implement the recommendations of the 1988 report, citing poor morale, low standards of care and poor physical standards. He said that he would have to advise the social services boards not to send children to St Patrick's if emergency action were not taken.[228]

190 This letter caused considerable alarm, as it was the first time that an inspection had led to such severe criticism, and there had been no forewarning that there was such concern. At meetings of the Board of Management on 23 March and 27 April 1990 concern was expressed at the change of language between the Inspectorate's reports and Mr Shannon's letter. Mr W.P.M. O'Driscoll, a Solicitor and Board member, responded in detail, essentially stating that action was being taken on all twenty of the recommendations within the control of the school, but that other issues, such as the physical condition of the buildings, were dependent upon capital funding from the government.[229] Eventually £1.9 million was provided to update the units. No allegations of abuse have been made concerning this period, but the contretemps was significant in that St Patrick's had till then always maintained good relations with the government and had come out of inspections well.

191 In December 1993 there was a further regulatory inspection. At that time there were 98 boys on the roll but only 43 were present. Fourteen of the boys present under Training School Orders were there because of truancy. There were 61 staff on the establishment. New units were being built. The Inspector's report contained only two recommendations.[230]

192 Finally, there were unannounced inspections, designed to check that the standards established in the formal inspections were being maintained at other times, and for this purpose Inspectors called at weekends and in evenings. Indeed, BR 26 described one Inspector as part of the furniture, as he visited frequently.[231] The visits of Inspectors were welcomed for the most part, as their advice was "invariably helpful".[232]

Allegations of Abuse

Overview

193 A total of 27 witnesses made allegations of sexual or physical abuse against 26 brothers, 1 priest and 11 lay staff, or 38 adults in total. The periods to which these allegations relate were:

Year	Number of Applicants	Boys on Roll
1950s	1	150-200
1960s	6	200-250
1970s	12	160-190
1980s	6	60-95
1990s	2	43

194 Of these 27, eleven made allegations of both physical and sexual abuse, eleven alleged sexual abuse only and five alleged physical abuse only. One allegation specifying emotional abuse was made. There were no substantial allegations of neglect. It will be noted that the peak of the allegations was in the 1970s, and that the numbers fell away thereafter. The majority of the allegations were made against the De La Salle brothers, rather than the lay staff. There were two or three years when a high number of allegations were made, but there were other periods when no allegations were made for some years. In particular, there were very few allegations made concerning the last decade of St Patrick's role as a training school; the occupancy of the school also reduced at this time.

195 There were two brothers and one lay member of staff who were the subject of eight or more allegations, and they accounted for about a third of the allegations. By contrast, 29 of the 38 adults were subject to three or fewer allegations, and there were many more staff who were not subject to any allegations.

196 The number of allegations relating to St Patrick's period as a training school has to be set in the context of a 45-year period when for much of the time there were up to 160 boys in the school and some thousands of boys will have passed through St Patrick's. It should be noted that while the De La Salle Order offered a general apology to all victims of abuse in St Patrick's, with minor exceptions individual witnesses accused of abuse and the Order collectively denied every allegation of abuse other than those perpetrated by DL 137.

197 In this section of the chapter, allegations of sexual abuse are considered first and are listed by the decade in which it was said to have taken place, except that the two brothers and one member of lay staff who were subject to the most allegations are then considered in turn. Peer sexual abuse is then considered. Allegations of physical abuse are divided into those concerning staff and those relating to peers. Finally, allegations concerning other types of abuse and unacceptable practices (other than punishments, which have been described above) are addressed.

Allegations of Sexual Abuse: 1940s

198 In 2004 SPT 101 alleged through a solicitor that in late 1943 and early 1944 he had been seriously sexually and physically abused by BR 97 while based at Forkill, when St Patrick's leased additional premises there between 1941 and 1944. He believed that at least two other residents had been abused by the same brother, and the matter was investigated at the time by BR 39.[233] BR 97 was transferred to another school in 1945, and left the Order in 1947.[234] SPT 101 was also seriously upset by absconders having their heads shaved and by the death of a boy who fell off a tractor on his way to work in the potato fields.[235]

199 At the request of the Minister of Home Affairs, Rt. Hon. Edmond Warnock KC, on 9 April 1948 there was an inquiry presided over by the Bishop of Down and Connor, Dr Mageean, into abuse in 1946 and 1948.[236] BR 39, then the Superior, described some of the boys as "sex maniacs" and dismissed their allegations of sexual abuse by brothers, including BR 69, who was accused by three boys. They had said to him that they had been put up to make the allegations by an older boy who, on being questioned, said that he found BR 69 too strict and wanted him moved. Allegations had also been made against BR 86, BR 83 and BR 70. SPT 32 also made allegations against BR 70, but again BR 39 dismissed his evidence as that of a sex maniac. It was also alleged that SPT 33, a lay woodwork teacher, had painted five boys' privates, but BR 39 had not wanted "to go into it with this man" and so dismissed him.[237] Bishop Mageean wrote to the Minister of Home Affairs on 29 April 1948 to say that there was no foundation to the allegations against the brothers, but that SPT 33 had been dismissed.[238] In oral evidence to the Inquiry, HIA 272 reported that SPT 43 said that he had had sex with BR 86. He taught at St Patrick's for 49 years up to 1992.[239]

Allegations of Sexual Abuse: 1950s

200 SPT 131 alleged indecent assault by BR 43 during the 1950s. At this time St Patrick's was sited at Milltown. No other allegations of sexual abuse were made against BR 43, but there was one allegation of physical abuse. The police investigated SPT 131's allegation in 1993 and again in 2005 but decided to take no action.[240] SPT 131 did not come forward as an applicant. We conclude that sexual abuse was not a systemic problem during the 1950s.

Allegations of Sexual Abuse: 1960s

201 The School moved to Glen Road in 1957, and further allegations relate to the period soon afterwards. HIA 314 stated that he was admitted to Milltown, but was one of the boys moved to Glen Road when it opened, though the records suggest that he was in fact only admitted on 10 June 1959, and would never have been at Milltown. He made a number of allegations of both sexual and physical abuse, and named four brothers who he said abused him – BR 1, BR 39, BR 42 and BR 47.[241] These brothers are all deceased except for BR 42, who denied all of HIA 314's allegations.

202 HIA 314 stated that brothers checked them under their arms and between their legs in the showers and, as noted above, helped the "younger" boys into their pyjamas. There were very few boys who were not teenagers, and there were no very young children who might have required such help. BR 42 and BR 47 put their hands under his sheets and fondled him, and he was:

> "often woken in the middle of the night to perform sexual acts on the Brother who was on duty that night".[242]

BR 39 took a "special interest" in him, and took him out to restaurants and hotels for meals.

> "Looking back now, it is obvious they were grooming us and that [BR 39's] touching was not accidental but sexual in nature".

He caressed HIA 314's penis, legs and bottom and forced him to engage in mutual masturbation. The boys wore shorts and brothers put their hands up the boys' legs to fondle them. At the holiday home in Cushendall, there was woodland, and:

> "... you would often see [BR 47 and BR 26] disappearing with the boys but nothing was ever said about it".[243]

203 HIA 100 said that BR 94 used to pull him against his penis, but he did not see this as sexual abuse.[244] He said the brothers abused him at the swimming pool, in the store and in the brothers' house, where he was taken by a brother, as it was out of bounds to boys.[245]

204 HIA 314 described a pattern of sexual abuse also reported by witnesses who were resident in Rubane, which was also run by the De La Salle Brothers:

> "[BR 47 and BR 42] sexually abused me regularly. They would make me sit next to them in the back row of the television room and fondle me. They would open their cassocks and make me masturbate them and then they would masturbate me. [BR 1] was doing this too. There would be a number of Brothers sitting in the back row with a number of boys beside them. I saw other boys being abused in the television room. [BR 48] used to sit at the back watching television with younger boys. He always had their hands in the pocket of his cassock. He had a certain group he always chose. Nobody was allowed to sit in the back row unless the Brothers said they could. They all had their favourites."[246]

205 A significant feature of this allegation is that, if it is true that a number of brothers were involved, it is hard to imagine that they were not well aware of each others' misconduct. If so, this suggests that there was a general culture among some brothers that sexual abuse of boys was acceptable, and it is reasonable to suppose that they could have felt that this gave them licence for more serious sexual offending in private.

206 SPT 40 was a member of the care staff throughout the 1960s, and in oral evidence he expressed concern that the brothers sat with their arms round boys in the TV room. He felt it was wrong and it made him feel "very, very uncomfortable", and he would "glare" at the brothers, but while the lay staff were aware of this practice, they felt unable to do anything about it.[247]

207 HIA 314 also alleged that brothers were involved in abusing boys in the changing room for the swimming pool, involving mutual masturbation, and in the dormitories and the brothers' cells. He said he never let it get as far as intercourse, but he knew other boys who did.[248] BR 42 denied the possibility of abuse in the dormitories, as there was a night supervisor.[249]

208 HIA 272 said that he distinctly remembered brothers holding the hands of younger boys and letting them have treats and cigarettes.[250] The Order denied any collective memory of brothers holding boys' hands, though they would have comforted children who were upset. They sometimes bought sweets or cigarettes for boys as acts of kindness.[251] [252] In view of the age at which boys were typically admitted, 'younger boys' would presumably have been twelve-year-olds.

209 HIA 262 was only in St Patrick's briefly in 1964, before being moved to Rubane. He alleges that he was abused in the classroom by BR 24, who first made as if to comfort him, but then put his hand down HIA 262's trousers and fondled him, before making HIA 262 fondle him in turn. HIA 262 told us that when he tried to escape, he was apprehended, beaten, slapped across the face, put in a windowless store room for some time by BR 24, and then told to tell no one.[253]

210 Five other former boys at St Patrick's approached the police with allegations against BR 24, although none of them applied to give evidence to the Inquiry. Their allegations included stroking, reciprocal fondling, masturbation and rape. BR 24 died in 1976 and was therefore unable to respond to these allegations.[254] The Order has pointed out that the police "dismissed as fabrication the allegations of two of the complainants".

211 HIA 100 alleged that BR 47 sexually abused him in the brother's room off the dormitory, making him perform oral sex or masturbation, or having penetrative sex.

Allegations of Sexual Abuse: 1970s

212 HIA 58 said that on two occasions when he was placed in a sick room on the second floor, where there was no light except from a frosted window and the furnishings consisted of a mattress and an army blanket, he was physically and sexually assaulted. On each occasion two brothers held him down, as he was kicking out, and a third raped him anally; on the first time the abuser was alleged to be BR 1 and on the second possibly BR 94. HIA 58 said that this lasted about ten minutes, and that the brothers then left him:

> "You would get a glass of milk and a jam sandwich next morning".[256]

213 HIA 272 alleges that he had been sexually abused by BR 5 at primary school before admission to St Patrick's.[257] HIA 272 was admitted to St Patrick's about 1970, by which time BR 5 had been appointed head of the school, and HIA 272 alleges that, on the pretext of counting the money in the charity boxes or to punish him, BR 5 used to take him into his office, lock the mahogany door, close the blinds and sexually abuse him. HIA 272 described the way that sweat poured down BR 5's face when he had abused him; the abuse was said to be fairly regular over a period of about a year.[258] HIA 272 said that when he objected, BR 5 threatened to send him to a home where he would be raped.[259]

214 HIA 272 noted that the "country boys" did not get visitors or home visits (as the buses had been hijacked and burnt out during the Troubles), and the brothers befriended them, giving them treats and cigarettes, walking around holding their hands, and receiving sexual favours in return.[260] Furthermore, HIA 26 said that he kept seeing brothers from Rubane, where he had been sexually abused, and he was afraid of them.[261]

215 HIA 162 was admitted to St Patrick's in 1973. He made minor allegations of sexual abuse concerning the staff:

> "[The] woodwork teacher used to push up behind us as we bent over the lathe, and then laugh it off".[262]

The brothers would also rub themselves against boys, he said, but he was not himself molested.

216 HIA 374 stayed at St Patrick's briefly in the mid-1970s, and alleges that he was sexually abused once by BR 89 who was at first very nice to him, stroking his hair and face but then forced HIA 374 to masturbate him over his clothing, which left HIA 374 "totally shocked" as he had "never experienced anything like that before".[263] This is the only allegation concerning BR 89.

217 HIA 227 said that BR 4:

> "frequently felt my backside through my trousers and he did this no matter where you met him or whether people were there as well. I saw him do this on numerous occasions to other boys."[264]

218 HIA 218 and his brother HIA 219 made serious allegations of sexual abuse by staff both at Rubane, where they had been prior to transfer to St Patrick's, and at St Patrick's itself. HIA 218 told us he woke to find another resident performing oral sex on him, he described a brother lying on his bed and masturbating, himself, and said he was touched in a sexual manner by the cook (presumably DL 137). Without providing substantiating evidence, he summarised:

> "We were sexually abused as frequently as every other night at St Patrick's. You had to perform oral and anal sex and masturbation on the Brothers".[265]

219 HIA 219 gave accounts of systematic grooming and escalating abuse by two brothers, to the point that:

> "...both brothers were coming in and buggering me on different nights".[266]

He also alleged abuse by another brother who was responsible for clothing, and by a civilian worker when they were on the home's annual holiday.[267] The allegations of HIA 218 and HIA 219 are among the most serious made against staff at St Patrick's, going well beyond the more typical complaints of fondling and masturbation. It should be noted that we have taken account of the credibility of witnesses and of the Order's observations in this respect, and in general we found the more extreme allegations less convincing.

220 HIA 96, who said that a woman touched him while hanging curtains. He told the head of Aisling House (SPT 13) who was disinclined to believe his allegation.[268] HIA 96 added that the same woman also touched other boys sexually, and he said that he saw another female member of staff in a boy's bed under the duvet.[269] These incidents were presumably among the few allegations relating to the 1980s.

221 The allegations listed above cover four decades, a period in which over a thousand boys will have passed through St Patrick's. The question facing the Inquiry is whether the allegations constitute systemic abuse, rather than a scatter of individual instances. In so far as some of the incidents described appear to be one-off and the only allegation against a specific brother or lay member of staff, it is not possible to describe all the alleged abuse as systemic.

222 We are satisfied that there was a pattern of sexual activity in the television room on the part of some brothers which amounted to systemic abuse. It was not only reported by witnesses, but a former member of staff expressed concern in his oral evidence about brothers' behaviour in the TV room. It also replicated practice described at Rubane, which was also run by the De La Salle Brothers. Some brothers must have been aware of each others' misconduct, and the evidence suggests that the sexual misconduct in the television room was only the most obvious symptom of a wider pattern of sexual abuse, particularly during the 1970s, some of which was relatively minor, but some of which was serious.

223 We therefore consider the sexual abuse perpetrated by some Brothers, particularly as reported in the television room, to have been systemic.

BR 1

224 BR 1 was at St Patrick's from 1958 to 1971, and from 1972 to 1977. At first he had the role of clerk, but in 1965 he became a housemaster. In 1977 he was moved to Rubane to act as Brother Director. At Rubane he was subject to a large number of allegations of sexual abuse, which appear to have consisted of stroking, rubbing and fondling, with no suggestion of any penetrative abuse. Bishop Philbin, as the Chairman of the Board responsible for Rubane, learnt of the allegations and suspended him in 1980. The police investigated the allegations and BR 1 was to be prosecuted but he escaped court action on grounds of serious ill-health, retiring to the south of Ireland, where he lived for a further twenty years, dying in 2000. These matters are dealt with more fully in the chapter on Rubane House.

268 Day 142, p.149

225 At St Patrick's BR 1 at first worked in the office as an administrator, and he was said to have had very little direct access to boys, other than the few specifically allocated to work in the office. Some witnesses said that they rarely saw him or that they saw him only during Mass. However, according to HIA 100, BR 1 was involved in boxing and did not confine himself to the office, being around the school a lot.[270] It was said, for example, that brothers passed through the junior school on the way from the offices to their house. His abuse of boys at St Patrick's was said to have started in 1957 and continued to 1971, covering most of his time in the school, but the number of boys alleging abuse is fewer than at Rubane, perhaps because of the limits on his access to boys. Allegations by HIA 314 and HIA 58 have already been quoted.

226 HIA 100 made allegations against BR 1:

> "[BR 1] was always touching you up and pulling you in towards him. He made me put my hand inside his long robe and masturbate him. This happened soon after I arrived at St Patrick's and it happened on at least a monthly basis. It often took place in the store outside the dormitory or near the swimming pool area or at the brother's house, as he would take you there on occasion".[271]

This statement is unusual in its reference to the brothers' house. Unless BR 1 chose times when all the other brothers were otherwise engaged, they would have been aware of this. HIA 100 alleged that the abuse took place three or four times a week, as BR 1 decided.

227 HIA 229 was at St Patrick's about the same time as HIA 314. He states that he was sexually abused by a number of brothers, but mainly by BR 1.[272] He repeated HIA 314's account of sexual abuse while watching television and in the cinema; BR 1 used to give him sweets then fondle him, though he tried to sit further away.

> "At the time I did not realise it was wrong because I was young and impressionable although now I can see how wrong it was. At the time I was just having a hard time and felt very lonely".[273]

271 SPT 049.
272 SPT 010.

228 HIA 229 went on to allege that he was buggered by BR 1 on three occasions in an area known as the pigeon holes where boys used to hang up their suits and where they could not be seen from the dormitory. He also mentioned other times when BR 1 forced him to perform oral sex and masturbate him, when he sexually assaulted HIA 229 in the clothing store and when he was ill in bed, alone in the dormitory.[274] HIA 229 also alleged that when taken by car to help locate absconders, BR 46 drove and HIA 229 was in the back with BR 1 who made him masturbate him. Again, at Kilmore House in Glenariff, when preparing the house for the school's holidays, BR 1 buggered him, and a visiting brother from Dublin forced him to perform oral sex. HIA 229 believes he was targeted, selected to do the work at the holiday home so that he could be abused.[275] This pattern of abuse is different from that reported in Rubane and by other witnesses at St Patrick's, in that HIA 229 is the only witness to allege penetrative abuse by BR 1. The Order noted that three witnesses who alleged abuse by BR 1 were not at Rubane with him (though one was at St Patrick's at the same time as BR 1), and that during the 1993-4 police enquiries no complaints were made against BR 1 about his time at St Patrick's, but that the majority emerged after allegations had been made against him about his time in Rubane.

229 Although the Order has stated that they do not see the allegations as well founded, it is our view that BR 1 sexually abused boys while he was at St Patrick's and that this constituted systemic abuse; if he had been apprehended and had not been promoted to be Brother Director of Rubane House, the boys whom he abused there would not have been abused by him.

230 Br 26 had a remarkable career at St Patrick's, having joined the staff at the age of 21 on 1 September 1951 when the school was based at the Milltown site and left in 1995 when he was appointed Brother Provincial of the De La Salle Order for the whole of Ireland. During the course of his career he was first a Housemaster, and later Head of the Senior School,

Director of the Community and finally Principal, holding all these roles for several years. He therefore made a major contribution to the management and development of St Patrick's, and the insights he offered in his oral evidence to the Inquiry and his impressive recall of events despite having attained the age of 85 indicated some of his qualities as a professional. SPT 26, who worked at St Patrick's for many years and was Director of Glenmona Resource Centre, considered BR 26 "a very decent, caring considerate person".[276]

231 It is hard to square his evidence and BR 26's distinguished career record, therefore, with the fact that sixteen former residents at St Patrick's made allegations of physical and/or sexual abuse against him. Of these, six gave evidence to the Inquiry, whereas others had spoken to the police. These allegations related to events spread over many years from May 1963 to August 1995, and there is no obvious reason why BR 26 should have been selected as a target for allegations if they were false. All the allegations were denied by BR 26, who provided denials or rebuttals in each case.[277]

232 SPT 145 said that BR 26 was well liked and "hard but fair". He knew BR 26 from 1963 to 1965 and alleged that when he was first admitted to the school BR 26 punched him in the stomach, just to let him know who was boss and that he was not taking any nonsense.[278]

233 HIA 17 alleged that in the late 1960s he observed BR 26 having sex with a boy and that, when he told other boys, BR 26 maltreated him, attempting sexual abuse. He added that he told BR 83 who confronted BR 26.[279] BR 26 said that HIA 17 was in the junior school, whereas BR 26 was in the senior school and was not involved in the activities where the alleged abuse took place. HIA 58 alleged that BR 26 threw him in the swimming pool for absconding, beat him and hit him with a bunch of keys.[280] BR 26 said that he had a master key, not a bunch, and that HIA 58 was in the junior school.[281]

234 HIA 26 was admitted to St Patrick's in 1970. He states that when he was in a punishment cell BR 26 "felt all around me and tried to sexually assault me there and I kicked the legs off him".[282] He was fifteen and a half by this time. HIA 137 described being punished by BR 26, whom he described as "the enforcer", belting him on a number of occasions, in order to break him, once after insisting on a prolonged cold shower first.[283] HIA 374 alleged sexual abuse, but it is unclear whether his description referred to BR 26.[284]

235 HIA 54 was in St Patrick's on two occasions but made an unusual allegation of sexual abuse, stating that he was under the influence of tranquillisers on his first admission in 1978, and that he was held down by two brothers while BR 26 raped him.[285] SPT 130 alleged repeated sexual abuse by three brothers in consort, including BR 26, in the dormitory under the pretence of delivering comics.[286] BR 26 said this was a total fabrication.[287] HIA 51 also alleged sexual abuse by BR 26 while delivering comics to his bedroom late at night.[288] While denying the allegation of abuse, BR 26 acknowledged that he delivered comics to boys twice a week to help them settle down.[289]

236 SPT 154 alleged that BR 26 took him out in his car and made advances. BR 26 said he did not recall him[290] but that he would not have taken this boy out because of his unreliability, though he did on occasions take boys out.[291] SPT 136 alleged that during the mid-1980s BR 26 abused him sexually while providing comics, involving oral sex.[292] SPT 136 was later convicted of perjury, having made a false allegation which resulted in a man being convicted.[293]

237 HIA 253 said that BR 26 groomed him by putting his arm round him, touching him non-sexually and suggesting that he might be able to make things easier for HIA 253, perhaps shortening the length of his stay at St Patrick's. Then BR 26 touched him, took him to a room, and tried to persuade HIA 253 to masturbate him, exposing himself on three or four occasions. HIA 253 resisted and from then onwards he attempted to abscond at every opportunity, which led to his transfer to Lisnevin.[294]

238 SPT 119 alleged that in the late 1980s BR 26 and two other brothers anally raped him while they were under the influence of drink when he was on his own in his unit, having been kept back while his unit was on holiday.[295] BR 26 said that he was a life-long teetotaller and that one boy would not be left on his own in a chalet.[296] HIA 384 alleged that SPT 54 was BR 26's "golden boy" and that BR 26 had paid SPT 54 to abuse him sexually while placed in Slemish House. BR 26 considered this allegation "totally ridiculous".[297]

239 The allegations made by SPT 96 led to a major inquiry. BR 26 described him as "troublesome", which led to him being transferred from the junior to the senior school.[298] Following the publication of an article in the News of the World on 22 August 1993 quoting allegations by SPT 134, SPT 96 wrote to the Chief Constable and made allegations of sexual abuse, naming BR 26 and three other brothers.[299] SPT 96 quoted other boys as witnesses and the police made thorough enquiries, attempting to contact all 318 boys who had been at St Patrick's during that period. Of the 155 with whom they made contact, only six made allegations, three of which concerned DL 137. When questioned by the police there was virtually no corroboration of SPT 96's allegations.[300] No action was taken.[301] HIA 51 persisted with his allegations, and was finally given detailed reasons by the Director of Public Prosecutions as to why they had not prosecuted BR 26.[302]

240 On deciding to investigate, the police informed the Northern Ireland Office of their enquiries. The NIO informed the Inspectorate, and they decided to tell the Bishop, with a view to the suspension of BR 26, who was at this time the Principal of the school. The NIO and the Inspectorate met Bishop Farquhar and Father McCann, the Chair and Secretary of the Board of Management, who then considered the situation.[303] They said that they consulted BR 26, who had denied the truth of the allegations. They believed BR 26, who was held in high regard, as both men had been

Chaplains at St Patrick's,[304] and the Bishop decided not to suspend him, as this would have had a major (and in his view unwarranted) impact on BR 26's career and the running of the school. In the light of the Bishop's decision, the NIO decided to adopt a watching brief.[305] BR 26 said in oral evidence that the allegations had not been put to him by the Bishop, and he learnt of the concerns when contacted by the police.[306]

241 The allegations related to 1960, and were therefore 35 years old, and the police concluded that there were insufficient grounds for them to take action. BR 26 co-operated voluntarily with their inquiries as he wished to ensure that his name was cleared. The Diocese concluded that their action had been correct in deciding not to suspend BR 26. The matter was not mentioned in the minutes of the following Board of Management meeting. It should be noted that neither the NIO nor the Inspectorate had the power to suspend BR 26, though they could have exerted pressure on the Board of Management, at the risk of upsetting the Catholic Church.

242 It is our view that, taking account of current practice in the mid-1990s, Bishop Farquhar was at fault in failing to suspend BR 26 during the police enquiries and in undertaking their own limited investigation, and that these failures were systemic, potentially putting the boys then and subsequently at St Patrick's at risk.

243 The police felt that the evidence against BR 26 was insufficient to take action. In all they interviewed him seven times, and on every occasion concluded that the evidence would not support action. The conclusions reached by the police have to be interpreted in the context of developments at that time. There was still mistrust of the police in some sections of the population, which could have dissuaded some former residents from disclosing abuse. The police were, of course, seeking reliable evidence for prosecutions where the verdict would be beyond reasonable doubt. Furthermore, less credence was placed then in the evidence of the victims of alleged abuse, particularly in view of their histories as offenders.

244 We heard evidence from witnesses who spoke highly of BR 26 and who found the allegations of abuse unbelievable. SPT 125, for example, said that he found the allegations of abuse against BR 26 incredible. BR 26 could have groomed him, he said in oral evidence, as they spent time together walking round the campus and talking, but he never sensed anything but concern on BR 26's part, and the description of BR 26 as an abuser was "not the man I knew".[307]

245 There can be no doubt that BR 26 devoted his life to St Patrick's, and made a major professional contribution to it and the boys who were in its care over more than four decades. Those who worked with him and gave evidence to the Inquiry hold him in the highest regard, and do not believe that he could have behaved in the manner alleged.

246 It has to be acknowledged, however, that the history of residential child care contains many examples of eminent people who have had excellent reputations as qualified professionals, who have helped many children in their care, and who have often been intelligent, cultured, charming and even charismatic, but who have nonetheless abused some of the children for whom they were responsible.

247 A significant number of former residents of St Patrick's have made allegations of sexual and physical abuse by BR 26 over many years, although when we examined their accounts in detail we considered that many of the allegations were not persuasive for various reasons. Some of the allegations suggest that the abuser may have been misidentified, and some allegations do not meet the necessary standard of proof on the balance of probability. Having considered all of the evidence we are not persuaded to the necessary standard of proof that BR 26 sexually abused boys in his care, although his practice of delivering comics to boys at night left him open to allegations of grooming. However, we are satisfied to the necessary standard that BR 26 did beat boys on occasion, and used physical force to maintain control, in accordance with St Patrick's traditional training school way of working.

248 DL 137 was born on 10 May 1955; between the ages of 13 and 15 he lived at Rubane and he alleged that while he was there he was sexually abused. He was taken on as an Assistant Chef at St Patrick's on 22 February 1975 when he was nearly twenty years old, presumably as an example of the brothers fulfilling their responsibility to find jobs for boys leaving their homes.

249 It was in 1978, when he had been working at St Patrick's for more than three years, that two boys reported that DL 137 had offered them money in return for sexual favours. On 9 July 1978 he was questioned by the

307 Day 140, p.103.

Brother Director, then BR 95, who gave him a "severe warning" and forbade him to mix with the boys.[308] There is no reference to this episode in the Board of Management minutes, which suggests that BR 95 decided not to report the matter. No further problem was identified prior to the events that led to DL 137's departure from St Patrick's.

250 Two years later further complaints were made that DL 137 had sexually abused boys. SPT 53 found SPT 140 crying, as DL 137 had offered him cigarettes to put his hand down his underpants. This was the first time that SPT 53 had encountered this problem and he informed BR 95, who called DL 137 in. On 12 March 1980 BR 95 suspended DL 137 and considered the options open to him. The outcome was that DL 137 signed a letter of resignation and left St Patrick's.[309] SPT 53 witnessed DL 137's resignation, but he was not sure whether DL 137 had committed an offence.[310] BR 26 also witnessed the resignation, and recalled in evidence that this was the first he had heard of DL 137's misconduct, other than rumours.[311] SPT 40 said that he had heard no more than gossip and rumours within the school community, but he made sure that DL 137 had no contact with the boys in his chalet.[312]

251 BR 95 decided that no further action was required, and therefore did not report the allegations to the police or to the Brother Provincial.[313] Again, there is no reference to the matter in the minutes of the following Board of Management meeting, other than that DL 137 had resigned.[314] It is possible that the Brother Director informed the Board confidentially and that they decided that discretion was necessary for the good name of the school, but there is no mention in subsequent documentation that this was the case; it seems more likely that BR 95 felt that 'least said, soonest mended' and kept the matter to himself.

252 Six months later BR 95 gave DL 137 a positive job reference, making no mention of the reason for his resignation from St Patrick's and describing him as diligent, conscientious and punctual.[315] DL 137 went on to commit further sexual abuse, and eight years after he left St Patrick's, on 27 September 1988, he was convicted of sex offences and sentenced to four years in prison. Men who had been resident as boys at St Patrick's during DL 137's employment then came forward to make allegations of abuse. He was prosecuted for offences committed between 1977 and 1980, and he pleaded guilty to gross indecency but not buggery. He was convicted on 4 December 1995 fifteen years after he had left St Patrick's.

253 DL 137 died on 24 December 2004. There were further complaints about his abuse of boys after his death, and three civil cases for damages.[316] Consideration was given to the prosecution of BR 95 for concealing DL 137's offences, but it was concluded that the case could not be proved and so the Director of Public Prosecutions directed that he should not be prosecuted.[317]

254 Five of the witnesses to the Inquiry alleged sexual assault by DL 137, including two who gave evidence at his criminal trial: HIA 218, HIA 219, HIA 347, HIA 320 and HIA 227. The following examples indicate DL 137's ways of grooming boys and encouraging them to join him in sexual activity, in some cases despite the Brother Director's warning that he was not to mix with the boys.

255 HIA 320 was at the school in the mid 1970s, and he encountered DL 137. He stated that DL 137 was at that time one of the two chefs, but he also looked after the boys in the evenings and he took them to the swimming pool. HIA 320 recounts that DL 137:

> "... kept putting his hand down my swimming pants and I really didn't understand what was going on because I was so young".

DL 137 also offered him cigarettes to go into the swimming pool to have sex with him, but HIA 320 refused:

> "He was always at me and he would corner me sometimes and let on to jokingly wrestle but I was uncomfortable with this and I was afraid of him."[318]

256 HIA 227 said that DL 137 abused him once, and that when he reported this to the police in 1997 it was one of the cases they used to prosecute him. DL 137 was playing table tennis with HIA 227, when he asked him to go into a room facing the staff canteen; there he started by feeling HIA 227's penis through his trousers and went on to make the boy masturbate him. DL 137 gave him fifty pence and told him not to tell anyone what had happened; he also invited HIA 227 to go back to the room on a few further occasions, but HIA 227 refused.

257 HIA 347 provided detailed information about five occasions when DL 137 abused him sexually. The first time was soon after his admission to St Patrick's in 1979. On three occasions this was in a store room near the kitchen, where DL 137 encouraged HIA 347 to masturbate him or they mutually masturbated each other. On another occasion HIA 347 happened to meet DL 137 in a swimming pool in Belfast and the abuse took place in a cubicle, where oral sex was attempted. On the final occasion anal penetration was attempted unsuccessfully. HIA 347 asked DL 137 for money, so that he could get a train home, and he felt disgusted with himself when DL 137 gave him £5.[319]

258 In summary, if decisive action had been taken by BR 95 in 1978, when boys first complained about his conduct, the boys whom DL 137 subsequently abused at St Patrick's would have avoided his attentions and those whom he later abused after leaving the school might also have avoided becoming his victims. BR 95 failed to inform either the police or his Board of Management, both in 1978 and in 1980, with the result that many more boys were abused. He compounded his negligent management of DL 137 by giving him a clear reference for further employment. The De La Salle Order has recognised that through the line of action taken by BR 95 as Brother Director they failed to deal with DL 137's offending properly.

259 We consider the failure of the Brother Director

(a) to inform both the police and his Committee of the allegations of abuse by DL 137 in 1978 and again in 1980,

(b) to dismiss DL 137, permitting him to resign,

(c) to protect potential victims of sexual abuse in providing DL 137 with a positive job reference which omitted the reason for his departure from St Patrick's to be systemic failures.

Peer Sexual Abuse

260 There are only three references to peer sexual abuse prior to the mid-1980s. HIA 100 said he was aware of peer sexual abuse in the mid-1960s, and that two boys abused him. He said that BR 47 turned a blind eye to boys' sexual behaviour and that no one was ever punished for peer sexual abuse.[320]

261 HIA 314 alleged that sexual activity took place during the boys' Saturday trips to the cinema as there was only one person in charge of them:

> "Everybody knew what was going on but nobody said anything. Masturbation was normal among the inmates and certain groups of older inmates would abuse the younger ones who were brought into their cliques."[321]
>
> "Sexual intercourse was not discouraged between the boys".[322]

262 HIA 162, who was in St Patrick's from 1973-1974, was "small and looked very feminine at that time" and he had "terrible experiences" when he shared a dormitory with the older boys on holiday in Cushendall. For the first week they made him give them oral sex and masturbate them; he then ran away, and believes that the staff must have known what was happening.[323]

263 BR 26 said that he came across sexual activity among boys occasionally, and dealt with it by talking to the boys and explaining that such behaviour was unacceptable. The boys involved were sometimes moved to other dormitories. There was informal discussion about the problem at housemasters' meetings, but there seems to have been no formal policy adopted or concern expressed to or by the Board of Management.[324] In treating sexual activity as a behaviour which needed to be dealt with in the normal run of school life, it is possible that it was thought unnecessary to record such incidents.

264 Possibly following the publication of the Hughes Report in 1985, the practice changed, in that sexual activities among boys were reported to the police, as will be seen in the instances reported below. The focus of the Hughes Report had been on allegations of the homosexual abuse of boys by staff, and all homosexual relations had been against the law in Northern Ireland until 1982. No action was taken by the police concerning peer abuse among boys at St Patrick's, however, but BR 26 said that the fact that cases were referred perhaps led to a diminution in the number of occasions on which boys were involved.[325]

265 On 15 February 1986 BR 42 found two boys in their bedroom engaged in consensual buggery. He moved one of the boys into a different bedroom and reported the matter to the police. Their enquiries uncovered homosexual contacts with men in the community involving three other boys as well. The police took no action against any of the boys as their sexual activity was seen as experimentation, but one of the adults was given a suspended prison sentence.[326]

266 On 19 October 1987 a boy, SPT 104, told his housemaster SPT 52 that he and another boy SPT 103 had been engaging for four months in consensual mutual buggery, but that he wanted to stop because of the risk of AIDS. SPT 52 informed BR 26, who contacted the police. The boys were questioned by the police. Further sexual activity with two other boys in the community was disclosed, but the other boys were not identified.[327]

267 On 4 February 1988 a 12 year old boy SPT 106 complained that a 15 year old boy, SPT 105, had sexually assaulted him while they were absconding from St Patrick's. Police interviews revealed consensual mutual buggery over a longer period.[328] No action was taken despite their difference in age.

268 On 18 May 1994 a 14 year old boy, HIA 384, made allegations of sexual assault against a 15 year old, SPT 54, who was questioned by the police, but denied all the allegations. The 15 year old was, however, charged with buggery, gross indecency and indecent assault and placed in Lisnevin, later returning to the secure unit at St Patrick's. Following further investigations the police concluded that "both parties were, to a certain extent, willing participants", despite an element of bullying. The 14 year old withdrew his allegations. The situation was complicated by allegations and counter-allegations involving two other boys other boys, SPT 61 and SPT 63. The police concluded that the evidence was too unreliable for them to take action.[329]

269 In a large residential establishment for boys sexual behaviour of the type reported above can be expected from time to time. Although some coercive bullying was involved, the activities appear to have been largely consensual. When the staff of St Patrick's received allegations they took appropriate action, whether dealing with the matter themselves prior to 1985 or reporting allegations to the police thereafter. There is no indication that the allegations were more than a series of isolated incidents or that there was a culture of peer sexual abuse which staff were neglecting. There is therefore insufficient evidence to suggest systemic abuse.

Physical Abuse by Staff

270 In the early years, the regime at St Patrick's was clearly fairly harsh. A small number of staff had the responsibility for maintaining control of a large number of boys, some of whom had long histories of offending and some of whom were seriously disturbed. Corporal punishment was used to keep order, sometimes according to the Training School Rules, with beatings witnessed and recorded, and sometimes informally, with cuffing and slapping with straps. When boys had misbehaved they accepted that such punishments were fair, but they resented what they saw as unwarranted punishments or excessive levels of violence. In 1948 there was an ecclesiastical inquiry into an allegation of physical assault, and as a result BR 70 was suspended, but following an investigation by the Ministry he was re-instated, as the boy making the allegations, SPT 30, was deemed an unreliable nuisance, and a hundred boys had petitioned for the brother to be allowed to stay on.[330]

271 HIA 229 wrote:

> "The regime at St Patrick's was very violent because a number of the brothers were very violent. I was terrified of them. I received a beating with a leather strap and was punched and kicked. It went far beyond any chastisement for misbehaving. [BR 4] slapped me frequently and he used a strap most of the time. I remember one occasion that I was standing in the corridor and he was carrying a bunch of keys in his hand. For no reason at all, he hit me on the side of the head with the keys. I could not hear properly for about a week but I did not receive any medical attention. I was too afraid to ask for help."[331]

272 HIA 282 wrote that when he was admitted in 1964 he was well treated at first:
