Assembly Business

Ministerial Appointment: Mrs Pengelly

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to today's business, I have an announcement to make. I have to advise the House that I was notified by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister on Wednesday 28 October that they had appointed Mrs Emma Pengelly as a junior Minister in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

It is appropriate to acknowledge that that brings representation of women on the Executive Committee up to 40%, which is at least a step in the right direction. Mrs Pengelly affirmed the terms of the Pledge of Office in the presence of the Principal Deputy Speaker and the Clerk/Chief Executive and has now taken up office as a junior Minister.

Public Petition: Larne Line Timetable

Mr Speaker: Mr Stewart Dickson has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes in which to speak.

Mr Dickson: It gives me pleasure to present this petition to you today, Mr Speaker. Before I begin, I place on record my thanks to the Larne Line Passenger Group for its hard work in collecting signatures and in holding Translink to account. I also thank Members from the East Antrim constituency, who have supported the petition.

As you will be aware, we had a debate on the matter in the Chamber last month, albeit a brief and rather poorly attended one. I thank the Members who attended that debate. It is perhaps a sign of slow progress in the area that we now have a Regional Development Minister in place, and hopefully a permanent one. I trust that she will work with us and the Larne Line Passenger Group to resolve the issues.

Since the beginning of September, the people of east Antrim have been dealing with a downgraded railway service as the result of timetable changes. Trains run less frequently and service fewer stations, which, ultimately, makes it downright awkward to use the train in east Antrim. In recent weeks, in an attempt to assess the scale of the impact on my constituents, I have been running a survey on my website. The results make for sobering reading. Of those who responded, 75% said that the changes have impacted on them negatively, making their journeys less convenient. Of those, 62% have had to seek alternative means of transport. Unsurprisingly, the chief alternative means is that of a car. Therefore, we have the ludicrous situation in which Translink is pushing more traffic on to the roads, clogging Belfast city centre in the mornings and in the evening rush hour, because, ultimately, travelling by car is faster, cheaper and more convenient than using Translink.

It is far from surprising that, in my survey, only 16% rated the service as good, but, further to that, a massive 75% believe that the service is getting worse. As may be expected, 82% identified frequency as an issue, 44% identified crowding and 41% cost, with others expressing concerns about punctuality, station amenities and park-and-ride facilities.

It is impossible to reach Belfast city centre from Larne or Carrickfergus before 7.00 am via public transport. That is simply unacceptable. However, residents on the other side of the lough on the Bangor line, a town two miles further from Belfast Central than Carrickfergus, can reach the centre of Belfast by 6.37 am. Larne harbour is in a similar situation and is served by a two-hourly service after 7.20 pm. We need a sensible approach to connections rather than salami-slicing services. Translink should be looking for areas of development, not dragging the timetable backwards. I hope that the petition presented to you today will enable us to move things forward. The Larne Line Passenger Group looks forward to meeting the Minister later today, and I trust that she will be listening in a constructive manner to us all.

Mr Dickson moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: Thank you, Mr Dickson. I will forward the petition to the Minister for Regional Development and send a copy to the Committee.

Executive Committee Business

Shared Education Bill: First Stage

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I beg to introduce the Shared Education Bill [NIA 66/11-16], which is a Bill to make provision in relation to shared education.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Private Members' Business

Marriage Equality

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. As a valid petition of concern was presented on Friday 23 October in relation to this motion, the vote will be on a cross-community basis. I understand that judicial proceedings in relation to same-sex marriage are ongoing in the High Court at the moment, and I therefore caution Members to be particularly careful that they say nothing in their contributions to today's debate that might prejudice those proceedings.

Mr Eastwood: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Executive to table legislation to allow for same-sex marriage.

We are back again. It is unfortunate that we have to keep putting a motion like this to the House, but it is important to point out that we will keep doing it and keep trying to persuade people of what I think is the proper position.

The motion itself is a very simple one. I know that there has been some criticism that it is quite a simple motion that just calls on the Executive to table legislation to enable same-sex marriage. I think that that is as simple as it needs to be; it does not need to be much more complicated than that. We have a very strong position that there should be protections for Churches and that this is about civil marriage, not religious marriage. We assume that the Executive would take that into account when producing any legislation.

It is unfortunate that, once again, we are faced with a petition of concern on this issue. The petition of concern was originally created and put into statute as a way of protecting minorities. It was not to give the largest party in this House a veto, and it was not to give the largest party in this House a veto to the detriment of minorities. I think that that is what has been happening with the abuse of the petition of concern.

So, as an aside, given the example that we have today, I think that we need to deal with the issue of petitions of concern, because they have been abused. They were there to protect minorities, but they are now there to stop minorities gaining protections in law that they have in other parts of this island and across these islands.

We are very clear in our position on this. We have been clear in this House and in other Houses, and we have put down amendments to legislation going through Westminster. I want to go back to the point that we very much see the need for protections for Churches. We do not want to impose our view of the world on anybody else. I recognise that this country is on a journey, and many Members in the House are on journeys, which, I think, we will find out as this debate progresses today. The SDLP's position is that this is about civil marriage. It is about two people being allowed the opportunity to take part in an institution that I and many other people are allowed to take part in. It should not be the case that we have a barrier to civil marriage just because of people's sexual orientation. If we really want to promote marriage as a positive thing for people to be involved in, we should open it up to all people who wish to make that commitment because of the love that they have for their partner.

The motion is a simple one, but we are very clear in our position that there needs to be protections for Churches. I will never be heard criticising people for having a different point of view from the one that I have. What I want to do is to try to persuade people of the particular point of view that I hold. If we look at what happened just across the border in the South, we see that an enormous campaign was undertaken to persuade the people of the South — and that is what they did. They understood very clearly that you will not be able to browbeat people into supporting civil marriage. They also understood very clearly that the country is on a journey. I think that we were all — many of us, anyway — delighted to see that that journey culminated in the legislation passing through the Houses of the Oireachtas very recently. Think of the positive image that that sent around the world to people about Ireland being an open, all-embracing, positive, progressive country that embraces all its citizens, no matter where they come from and no matter what their political persuasion or sexual orientation is. That sent a message across the world that Ireland had moved on and moved forward, and I think that we should all be very proud of that.

The difficulty that we have, as Irish citizens on this side of the border, is that we do not have the same rights as people across the island. Equally, people who see themselves as British subjects or citizens do not have the same rights as people in Britain, because, of course, they have taken that step not through a referendum but through the parliamentary process. This is not about being unionist or nationalist, Catholic or Protestant. It is about people understanding that, whatever our political or religious background, we should embrace all the people in our society who want to be embraced and to play their full part in civic life in this part of the world.

So, I am coming at this from a pro-marriage perspective — I am married myself — and not as somebody who wants to undermine anybody else's marriage. I think that we enhance all the marriages that we are involved in in this part of the world by allowing others to take part. Why do we put up barriers to people who want to embrace the idea and the institution of marriage? Surely we should be much more open than that. Surely we should break down the barriers to that.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Eastwood: Yes.

Mr Allister: I just want to test whether the Member puts up any barriers to what he calls admission to the institution of marriage. He said earlier in his speech that, if two people love each other, why should they not be admitted to the institution of marriage. How far does he take that? If some man says, "I love two women. Therefore, I want to marry two women.", does the Member's embracing of equality and their rights cause him to say, "Well, then, let's have polygamy"? That is the same logic that involves this redefinition of marriage. Why not have a further redefinition of marriage? Is that not the road that the Member is taking us down? If it is not, is that because he is drawing some moral line somewhere? If he is drawing a moral line somewhere, why not draw it here?

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Member for his intervention, I think. You always know that you are winning an argument when points like that are brought into the debate. He has done this a number of times. The idea that we are saying that two people who are in love and who want to make a commitment to each other through the institution of marriage is the same as polygamy is ridiculous and is offensive to all those people — [Interruption.] It is offensive to all the people in the Public Gallery, outside the Chamber and in this country — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Through the Chair.

Mr Eastwood: — who believe that they should be entitled to the equal rights that everybody else in this country is entitled to. The idea that you can equate polygamy to two people loving each other in a same-sex marriage is absolutely ridiculous and is offensive to say the least.

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr Eastwood: I will, yes.

Ms Ruane: Do you agree with me that polygamy is illegal and that nobody is calling for polygamy?

Mr Eastwood: The Member is absolutely right. Thank God that homosexuality is no longer illegal, and thank God that this society has moved on and moved forward and that the communities that we come from have moved on and moved forward through experience in people's families and in people's communities. People have been able to move forward. I come from a different generation from many of the people in the House. I recognise that people are on a journey, and I am prepared to accept that. I am prepared to try to persuade and convince people of the rights of this argument. I wish that the Member would have the same openness and have the ability —

Mr Campbell: Will the Member give way?

Mr Eastwood: Go ahead.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way, even if he did it in a rather resigned fashion. He has used the term "on a journey" twice in his contribution. Normally, when most people set out on a journey, they know their ultimate destination. Can he explain the ultimate destination of the journey that he and, he says, we are on?

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am not sure that some people in this House are always sure of where their journey will take them, but, in my view, the journey is about ensuring that all citizens on these islands who love each other and want to get married can get married and can feel that they are properly and fully embraced by society and by government. That is the journey. That is the destination. I think that we will get there. We might not get there today, because a petition of concern has been put down to try to stop equality. That is not what it was supposed to be about.

Look at the people across the border and the way that people from same-sex relationships have been embraced by the community. That was the change that was made. People were embraced by the community, the society and their country. That has changed the image of Ireland. That has changed the prospects of attracting investment to Ireland. That has changed how we look at young people who are homosexual, who have been faced with bullying that was, over the years, supported and enabled by a society and a Government that allowed it and turned their head away when it was happening.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Eastwood: OK. I will leave it at that. Thanks.

Lord Morrow: The slogan "equal marriage" is a great piece of sloganeering. We hear it relentlessly repeated on the TV and radio and in other media outlets. However, it is ultimately completely vacuous. It does not actually say what marriage is. Only once a decision is made about what marriage is can you debate whether or not our policy on marriage violates marriage equality. In truth, the reasoning behind the appeal to equal marriage is faulty. We all know that every law makes distinctions. Equality before the law protects people from irrational distinctions from laws that treat them differently without reason. However, to know whether or not a law makes the right distinctions, you have to know what the public purpose of the law is. We as an Assembly and our society as a whole have to decide what marriage is.

Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito, in his dissenting opinion in the 2013 Windsor case, articulated very well the decision that we have to make. He pointed to two contrasting views of marriage: one that he called the consent-based view and one that he called the conjugal view. The consent-based view is the one put forward by proponents and supporters of this motion. It views marriage as being primarily an intense emotional union between consenting adults. Marriage sets out who the most important person is in your life. The core of this vision is emotional commitment. This view was only given legal standing for the first time in the Netherlands in 2001 and has been adopted by around 20 countries worldwide since then.

The comprehensive or traditional view, on the other hand, sees marriage as being, as Justice Alito put it, the:

That vision of marriage has been held for millennia by virtually every human culture. It continues to be the vision of marriage affirmed by the vast majority of countries around the world. It would be a mistake to walk away from the traditional comprehensive view of marriage. Introducing in policy the consent-based view of marriage would not be a positive thing for our society. The consent-based view put forward by proponents of this motion sees marriage collapse into companionship in general. It does not see marriage as being a different kind of relationship. If the consent-based notion of marriage is primarily about deep emotional attachments, why should it be permanent? Love can wax and wane. If it dies, should it not just end, and why should it be exclusive? Having extramarital affairs may actually, for some people, be viewed as enhancing their marriage and increasing their emotional attachment to one another.

It is apparent to many of us who believe in the traditional view of marriage that maintaining it has many benefits for our society. I will not labour that point, due to lack of time, but maintaining the current definition of marriage is good for children by helping to ensure that both parents stay together to raise the child. In particular, marriage helps to ensure that fathers stay involved in the lives of their children. Ideally, children should be raised both by mothers and fathers, who bring different skills and attributes to the parenting enterprise. I appreciate that many heterosexual parents can be terrible parents and that adoption and fostering are necessary in every society, but I remain of the view that our public policy should, as far as possible, promote children being raised by their two biological parents.

Finally, there is considerable evidence to show that marriage benefits men and women who are part of it, and wider families and communities as a whole. We all know that marital breakdown can have serious consequences. I do not believe that adopting the consent-based view of marriage will help in seeking to prevent such breakdown.

In closing, I would like to make a comment about whether opponents of this motion are on the wrong side of history. In November last year, on an edition of 'University Challenge' — a show that, I have no doubt, many in the House watch with interest — this question was asked: who said, in 1956, that history is on our side and we will bury you? The answer was, of course, Nikita Khrushchev. As we all know, he could not have been more wrong in his assertion. Of course, in reality, history does not have a side. It depends on your perspective as to whether or not you are on the right side. Stating that you are on the wrong side of history is merely a rhetorical smokescreen. Rather than lazy sloganeering, it would be better if this debate focused on the core question of having to decide what marriage is.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I stand up to speak in favour of the motion and will continue to stand up and bring these motions to the Floor until this unjust situation is dealt with. It is absolutely absurd, given the fact that public opinion is quite firmly, in my view, in favour of marriage equality here in the North. I am sure that all Members received many emails over recent days, not only from members of the gay community but from the community as a whole, saying that this needs to be corrected. The latest opinion poll on this matter showed that 68% of the public were in favour of marriage equality. Look at the part of Ulster that has already voted for marriage equality: those three counties — Donegal, Monaghan and Cavan — said yes to marriage equality.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. He said that a public opinion poll showed that about 68% were in favour. Does he agree that that is just a little bit lower than the figure that traditional opinion polls throughout the UK have given for those in favour of the return of capital punishment? Would he go there?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McKay: We are getting some very silly arguments today. That is the second one that we have had on the Floor. It goes to show that the Members opposite are losing the argument. There is no rational debate coming from across the Floor. The fact is that this has already been introduced in the South, across the water and the United States of America. You can hold back the tide only for so long.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKay: No, I will not give way for any more ridiculous assertions from the Member for North Antrim.

Marriage equality is already the law in Donegal and Dundalk, 50 miles from this Building. Gay couples can get married in a hotel in Dundalk but not in Newry. This is being introduced throughout the rest of the island on 16 November 2015, yet we still have not seen any legislation or legislative proposals for the North. We had an interesting debate the week before last about the hospitality sector and rates for sports clubs. Here is an opportunity for the hospitality sector in the North to avail itself of gay marriages. A lot of gay couples will go to Dundalk or Donegal instead of Ballycastle or Belfast, which is trade lost to the North, so there is also an economic argument that we should not forget.

The marriage equality that we seek protects religious freedom. As the proposer said, the proposal is for civil marriage. If a gay couple wants a civil marriage and sees that as being aligned with their religious beliefs, what about their religious freedom? This goes both ways. The Members opposite have their religious views, and they are absolutely entitled to them. However, members of the gay community have their religious views, and being married may be part of their belief system as well. That argument should not be forgotten either.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKay: No, I will not.

I hope that history will be made today. I hope that Members will be on the right side of history. I genuinely welcome any moves from any of the parties that will help to secure a majority in favour of equal marriage for the first time.

When the South voted for marriage equality, a huge weight was lifted off the shoulders of men and women from the LGBT community. For many people who grew up with stigma, bullying, discrimination and fear of physical and verbal attack, here was a message that they were as equal as anybody else and as entitled to their rights as anybody else. That was a great moment. This affects not just members of the gay community but their mothers, fathers, sons and daughters and everybody in the community. The reason why the vote was carried so convincingly in the South was that the entire community and families of these people rallied around them to say that it was not good enough to have this sort of prejudice in our society in this day and age. I believe that the people in the North will say, and are saying, exactly the same.

We can send out a very clear message here today that, regardless of the petition of concern, a simple majority of MLAs, representing the majority of our constituents and the public in the North, support the LGBT community having the same rights and entitlements as everybody else.

Mr Allen: I am proud that the Ulster Unionist Party has made this issue a matter of conscience for Members, allowing all Members to vote in line with their religious belief, conscience and values. Let me say from the outset that I do not wish or intend to tread on anyone's religious beliefs, values or traditions. I will simply speak for myself.

12.30 pm

I recall vividly, whilst growing up, the all-too-common passive acceptance of taunting and poking fun at gay and lesbian issues. If I am being honest, I really had not given my position on the matter much thought until relatively recently. In the past few years, I have watched, listened to and heard many different viewpoints on the topic. On hearing that the issue was coming before the Assembly again, I made a point of speaking to many people on both sides of the issue to better understand their positions, viewpoints and experience. I fully respect that people have a range of views on the issue. In particular, I understand and respect that many people, including members of my party, have deeply held religious views. I have spoken to many pro-LGBT individuals and campaigners over the past number of weeks as well, and my conversations with them have caused me to question the motivation of placing this motion before the Assembly at this point in time. What results do people really expect this time? It is a fact that the make-up of the Assembly has not dramatically changed since the previous four debates, so I cannot help but wonder whether the issue is being used as electoral opportunism. We, as public representatives, have a duty of care to our constituents, many of whom will be concerned that this emotive issue is being used as a political football. The famous quote from Albert Einstein —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allen: No, I will not.

The famous quote from Albert Einstein unfortunately comes to mind about the definition of insanity being when you do the same thing over and over again and expect different results.

I fully respect people's right to oppose equal marriage, but we really need to take the time to understand the effect that this — the fifth time that the Assembly has debated such a motion — will have on the LGBT community, who have been getting all the wrong kinds of messages from elements of the Assembly. I certainly will not stand in moral judgement of anyone; my belief is live and let live. I want to see a society where no one is discriminated against and everyone is allowed to practise their religious and cultural beliefs freely and without fear. I want to see a society in Northern Ireland where no one is made to feel like a second-class citizen to any extent. I believe in fairness and natural justice.

Growing up, I always believed that marriage should be between one man and one woman, but now, as someone who is married and lives happily with my wife and two children, I would not feel comfortable — it would not be right — with denying lesbian, gay, bisexual and/or transgender people the opportunity to live happily with the person they love and whom they wish to marry if they choose. I believe in equality and that love is love, whether between a man and a woman, two men or two women. In life, I have always tried to do what I believe to be right. In the case of same-sex marriage, the LGBT community deserves equal recognition under the law, provided, of course, that religious independence is assured and that Churches are not compelled to conduct ceremonies with which they cannot agree. That is the position in the rest of the United Kingdom and in the Republic of Ireland. It is about fairness and natural justice.

Mr Lunn: The first thing I want to do is congratulate Mr Allen on that speech. It was excellent.

I welcome the motion. It is not because I want to see the same thing being brought back to the Assembly time after time. It is a simple and very straightforward motion that calls on the Assembly to bring forward legislation. If you think about it, the only time that we will effectively decide this matter is when legislation is brought forward. Anything prior to that, while important, is shadow boxing. Today, we have a short motion that will provide at least a test of opinion as to what the House feels about this matter. My feeling is that, this time, the House will vote in favour of the motion.

I heard Mr Campbell on 'The Stephen Nolan Show' recently complaining that the motion suffered from a lack of detail. That made me laugh. You could almost infer from that that, had there been sufficient detail, the DUP might have considered it, but that, clearly, is ridiculous. The time to scrutinise this would be when legislation is brought forward. The fact that we have a petition of concern today is equally ridiculous. A petition of concern on a private Members' motion does not change a single vote in what the outcome will be today.

I wish that we could get to the point at which parties rely on a three-line whip and forget about petitions of concern.

This is an equality issue for the Alliance Party —

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. Given that this is a motion and therefore does not carry any weight, why do the Members who tabled it not bring forward a private Member's Bill? They are asking the Executive to bring forward legislation, and, for as long as our party has the ability to control things on the Executive, there will not be legislation. Why do Members not bring forward a Bill with detail rather than constantly use a motion to debate the issue?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lunn: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I thank the Member for his intervention. He makes a fair point. He is perhaps asking the wrong Member, because, as everybody knows, I am a fairly recent convert to this point of view. It may well be that somebody, following today's vote — if it is in favour — will think it worthwhile to bring forward a Bill, and I hope that that is done.

As I was about to say, this is an equality issue for the Alliance Party, and it is an equality issue for me. However, in fairness to those who I know oppose this, I can hardly criticise them too roundly, because they are in the position that I was in at four previous votes. Therefore, I have a lot of respect for their view. I do not agree with it any more, but I have to respect the fact that, in Mr Campbell's terms, a journey is a journey and that some people take longer to get there than others. I do not agree that a journey has to have a final destination. We are all on a journey through life.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: I am a wee bit pressed here.

As I said, it is an equality issue, but you cannot divorce it from conscience. It is clearly also a matter of personal conscience. We all come under pressure from our instincts, our upbringing and our Church, if you belong to one, and all those pressures come to bear. Some of the pressure that has been applied on this occasion, through Twitter and other websites, on a particular Member from my party — not me — has been absolutely disgraceful and out of order. That is all that I want to say about that.

Mr Nesbitt has been often quoted for his wrong side of history point and his comment that the younger generation will not understand what the Assembly is about. The Assembly has the opportunity today to get on the right side of history and recognise the strength of feeling out there among the population.

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: No.

Lord Morrow: I did not think that you would.

Mr Lunn: Then you are not disappointed.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Lunn: As I said, I am under pressure with time.

I believe in equality and in equality under the law. For me, that equality extends to everybody in our society, including the minority groups that we all know about under section 75. In this particular context, it extends to gay people — the LGBT community.

I took a while to come to terms with civil partnerships away back when. The journey has been long for me, but I now am where I am, and I am satisfied and comfortable with the position that I am taking. I believe in civil partnerships, I believe that gay couples should be able to adopt and I have no problem whatsoever with blood donations from anybody. I cannot see how I can continue to hold a position against civil marriage for gay people if I believe in equality under civil law. That is where I stand.

Lord Morrow asked what a marriage is, and Mr Allister made silly points about polygamy. Marriage is the union of two people who love each other. That is it. The only question is whether we extend that beyond it being between a man and a woman to include two people of the same sex. It is time that we take that challenge in hand and deal with it. I support the motion.

Mr Speaker: There is much too much background noise. This is a very important debate, and we should all be given the opportunity to hear the contributions.

I call Mr Peter Weir.

Mr Weir: Thank you, Mr Speaker, for silencing the Chamber for my benefit.

Mr Speaker: Most of the noise was behind you. [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: I appreciate that.

Mr Speaker, you are correct to say that this is a very serious debate. I hope that the serious tone of the debate can be maintained, because it is a very serious issue for people on both sides of the argument. I stand against the motion. Obviously, we have had this debate in different forms on four previous occasions. In many ways, the fundamental reasons why I oppose this motion have not changed. There are three main reasons for that.

I will pick up where Mr Lunn left off. He talked about the definition of marriage. I do not make any judgement about any other form of relationship, but my belief is that marriage should be between one man and one woman. That is by nature. If people want to say that that is an exclusive definition or that it is not inclusive, they are completely correct. Marriage, by definition, excludes on a range of grounds, including gender and the number of people involved. That is not just an academic debating point; a couple of countries are already looking at the issue of polygamy. Marriage is also defined by the age of the people taking part and by the blood links between those getting married. The reality is that, once you move away from those fundamentals, as opposed to simply tinkering at the edges, you actually destroy the definition of marriage; you render the idea of marriage meaningless.

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way briefly.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Member for his comments. Does he agree with me, just for the record, that it is perfectly possible for two people of the same sex to love each other and want to commit to each other in a way that no form other than marriage can possibly be contemplated?

Mr Weir: And that is why we have civil partnerships, which very neatly brings me to my second point. If this issue is about substantive rights, I believe that provision has already been made for those in terms of civil partnerships, inheritance, taxation and all proprietary rights. Those were part of a wide range of things that were brought in by the Labour Government some time ago. So, if the issue is about substantive rights, that is already sorted out. I stand to be corrected, but I think that we may well have been unique in the world in having that form of civil partnership. There may be others —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: No, I have a limited amount of time. I know that, later on, the Member will give the winding-up speech.

From that point of view, I believe that that issue is already covered. That leaves one key —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: No. I am sure that I will be able to listen to the wise words of Mr McCrea at a later stage in the debate, but I have a limited amount of time.

That, then, leaves the real issue of equality. The motion and speeches have been peppered with mention of equality. If you are a true believer in equality and if that, above substantive rights, is the driver, the motion proposed does not render equality either. It is neither equal, nor is it the endgame.

A number of years ago, the Labour Government brought in civil partnerships, which were meant to sort out the problem of how we recognise relationships between people of the same sex. That was supposed to be the endgame of the proposal. Now, a number of years down the line, we see that the issue has been pushed into a position where it is recognition of civil marriage. The reality is that that will simply be a stepping stone to the next demand, which will clearly be that religious ceremonies are recognised and that there is total equality. If you are part of a gay or lesbian couple and you have the offer on the table of civil marriage but are denied any opportunity of religious ceremony or the opportunity for a Church to conduct that wedding, or, indeed, of a particular faith, you are not, according to your own definition, being treated equally. So, it will only be a matter of time before that is the case.

Although there is no direct reference to it in this motion, we are told that the proposers of the motion are very much in favour of protections for Churches. Is that the same as the protection of conscience in the provision of goods, as we saw, for instance, in the Ashers case? In that case, on a matter of conscience, the bakery said, "No, we are not going to produce a particular item. We want the right to dissent." Yet, the bakery was taken to court. If civil marriage is brought into place, how long will it be, either directly or indirectly, before the Churches —

A Member: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: No, I have only a minute or so to go. How long will it be before the Churches are pressurised and, if not compelled by way of law, put into a situation where, for example, requirements for funding or other forms of assistance, will require that? I think it is naive to believe otherwise. I am sure that many of the people who have put this forward are well intended, but it is naive to believe that what is proposed today is going to be the endgame solution. This is, inevitably, part of a process in which the Churches and their rights will be put under threat. For all those reasons, I urge this House to do as it has done before and reject this motion.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I call Mr Phil Flanagan.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. In deference to your authority, I propose that we close the debate and move to the vote now. I do not think that the House will hear anything new, except previous well-aired arguments. This is repetitive; it is the fifth time that the issue has been debated, and, as we all know, we have a petition of concern. There is no point to the debate continuing, and I move that we take the vote now.

Mr Flanagan: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. I think that the Standing Order that the Member references, and I am sure you are going to quote it, highlights that the Speaker can make such a determination if he feels that the views of all Members have been heard. I am sure that the Assembly is keen to hear the views of all representatives here and not just the views of those in the largest parties. I am particularly keen to hear the views of the naughty corner, as Mr McNarry likes to call it. Is he now saying that he does not want the people in that corner to be heard? I think that it is worthwhile to hear from all individuals in the House.

Mr Speaker: Thank you for the point of order. The Standing Order is Standing Order 25, which requires that, before a motion to close the debate is moved, the Speaker is satisfied that all parties present have had a reasonable opportunity to contribute to the debate. In fact, I have a substantial list, and I have some anxiety about the number of interventions, which are perfectly acceptable, but they eat into the time that is allocated by the Business Committee, and I am bound by the amount of time that has been set aside by the Business Committee.

I think that the debate should continue. For my part, I will endeavour to ensure that everyone who has taken the trouble to put their names down will be called to make a contribution, but it is already proving to be a challenge. The debate should continue, and I call Mr Phil Flanagan.

Mr McNarry: On a further point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Yes, and I am sure that you are not going to challenge the Chair's ruling on this matter.

Mr McNarry: I am absolutely not going to challenge it. Would you accept that I would put that proposition to you again in 15 minutes?

Mr Speaker: You can attempt to do so, and I will judge it in 15 minutes.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an rún seo.

I fully support the rights of all our citizens to avail themselves of all of the same rights and services as everyone in our society. Their gender, race, religion or sexual orientation should not be a factor in the determination of such a matter. I believe that that right extends to marriage.

Some in our society, and some in the House, may well have argued that mixed race or mixed religious marriages should not be legal. Those people were on the wrong side of history, to quote one of the Members of the House recently.

We all recognise that, for some in our society, marriage is often a religious sacrament. I was married in a religious ceremony in a Catholic church. In fact, my wife and I went to Rome just to make sure. [Laughter.] However, marriage is also a civil matter; it is not just a religious matter. When you get married in a religious institution, you get handed paperwork on behalf of the Church, but the person carrying out the ceremony also hands you a civil certificate to say that you are married. Even though there is only one ceremony, there are two key aspects to it; there is the civil aspect, and there is the aspect of the marriage where the couple believe that they are married in the eyes of God.

I would like to see civil marriage being extended to allow citizens of the same sexual orientation or from the transgender community to marry. I do not think that that is a huge risk for all of us to take. In my view, such a move does not threaten the institution of my marriage, and I certainly do not think that anybody else who is married should feel threatened by it in any way at all. It does not demean the existing marriage of any couple.

This is not a religious matter. Protections should be afforded to religious institutions to ensure that, as Members have said, they are not forced into carrying out religious ceremonies that go against their own teaching. However, there are two aspects to the celebrant's role: there is the religious aspect and the civil aspect. We want to see that those individuals who carry out marriages are allowed to carry out a civil marriage between two individuals from the LGBT community.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for giving way. I want to follow up on the point he made in his intervention earlier to say that this part of the naughty corner would really like to have a say on the matter, and I thank the Member for bringing it to the attention of the Speaker who will, no doubt, look at that in 15 minutes' time.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. I was concerned that Mr McNarry raised his point of order because I was to speak next; but I will not take it personally if he does so again in 15 minutes.

Many more couples are choosing to marry outside the Church. The number of marriages in non-religious, civil institutions, such as town halls, hotels and other facilities, is increasing. In a recent opinion poll, 68% of people indicated that they support the extension of the right to marry to people in the LGBT community. That shows widespread public support for this change. We as MLAs have a duty to listen to and represent the views of a growing number of people in our society.

People who engage in debate, whether in this House, on radio or TV talk shows, or from the audience of TV shows, should not use offensive and degrading terms to refer to people who are merely crying out for equality. Do we really want to send out the message that, in this state, the love between two citizens who happen to be in the LGBT community is a lesser love than that of any other couple? That is a very dangerous message to put out. The prejudices and the stigma behind that message are exactly why we have such poor figures for mental health problems, self-harm and suicide in the LGBT community. People in this House really need to wise up and realise the message that they are sending out. Some have said that, by bringing back this motion every six months, we send out a very poor message. The message that is being sent out is that we do not treat the love between two citizens the same as the love between two other citizens. I do not agree with that. The love between any two citizens may be as strong and as valid as the love between any other two citizens.

Once again, we see the shameful use and abuse of the petition of concern by the DUP. They are using a mechanism that was established to protect minorities to force their own narrow, outdated, religious dogma on all our citizens, regardless of the beliefs of those citizens. Despite the petition of concern, I am hopeful that, on this occasion, a majority of MLAs will deliver a moral victory by supporting this motion for marriage equality. Of course, the party opposite would, I believe, oppose once again the decriminalisation of homosexuality and the introduction of civil partnerships, if they were debated today.

The referendum in the South was a joyous occasion. It was an excellent demonstration in public debate of how citizens can engage in a debate and bring round their politicians, some of whom were very reluctant to champion this issue. We now see senior figures in the Government in the South acting as cheerleaders for equal marriage, despite their personal concerns at the start.

The campaign needs to continue. The campaign in the South was won not just by members of the LGBT community but by their families and friends. Am I seriously to believe that no Members of this House who will oppose this motion have sons or daughters who are members of the LGBT community and who feel shunned by society as a result of the attitudes of what I hope will be a minority of MLAs opposing equal marriage? Those Members will not only be on the wrong side of history but on the wrong side of the present.

Mr Lyons: I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. It is clear that this debate has gathered considerable interest, if the emails, phone calls and text messages that I have received are anything to go by. It is also clear that it is a deeply emotive issue, and, as such, it is right that we are careful with the words we speak and the tone we use. Mindful of that, I want to set out why I will oppose the motion.

My first reason relates to the wording of the motion itself. I think that it would be wrong for the House to go down this route at this stage simply because we are coming towards the end of a mandate, and I think that we do not have the necessary time to debate the issue properly and give it the scrutiny it needs. In addition, it is obvious that it is not the will of the Executive at this time to progress this. That is my first reason for concluding that we are right to oppose this motion.

When we get down to the core issue, I believe that we are right to oppose this motion.

When we legislate for same-sex marriage, we will not be dealing with a rights issue as has been claimed: instead, we will be redefining what marriage is. Those who support changing the law are quick to talk about this being a rights issue — understandably, from their point of view, because it is very easy to argue on the basis that you are trying to extend rights to other people. However, civil partnerships provide rights and protections for same-sex couples. The European Court of Human Rights has ruled that same-sex marriage is not a human right, so this is not a rights issue.

The legislation being proposed to the Executive would actually redefine what marriage is. Marriage is currently defined in Northern Ireland as:

“the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others”

To change that in order to allow for same-sex marriage would not simply tinker at the edges of what marriage is: it would completely transform it. In fact, it would turn it on its head.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: I will give way on that point.

Mr Givan: The Member cited the European Court of Human Rights. Does he also recognise that the United Nations Human Rights Committee has also said that the current definition of marriage in Northern Ireland is not a violation of international human rights law?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for his intervention on very a good point and for giving me an extra minute.

So we have this definition, and we have heard evidence that this is not a rights issue. Why has that definition held for so long? It is because marriage in its current form is good for society, and it is not something that we should want to change.

We have already learned here that legislation on this issue, first, would fundamentally change what marriage is; and secondly, it would not change the fact that same-sex couples already have rights through civil partnership. However, it would have an effect on the rights of many hundreds and thousands of people across Northern Ireland: those who believe and those who want to express their belief that marriage can only ever be between one man and one woman. Sadly, we have had numerous examples from the rest of the UK that have shown how teachers, adoption agencies, businesses and public servants have been negatively affected as a result of their beliefs on this issue. I have no doubt that the same would happen if this were to become law in Northern Ireland.

Finally, I want to express my concern at the way in which some people have denigrated others who hold to the traditional view of marriage as a result of their faith. They should not be excluded from this debate simply because it is their faith that informs them on these issues. They should not be belittled for the views that they hold. I make no apology for the fact that my faith influences my thinking on all matters —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: No; I am running out of time.

I know that that will frustrate some people here who think that, when I enter this Chamber, I should flick a switch and turn that off. I cannot do that, and nor would I want to. We are all shaped by our lives, by our experiences and by our beliefs. These beliefs may be formed in different ways, but people should be entitled to hold and express those beliefs, no matter what the issue is. I am not here today to speak only for myself: I am representing the views of those across my constituency and across Northern Ireland who believe that marriage should be between one man and one woman; who believe that the rights of people are protected through civil partnerships; who believe that freedom of expression and liberty is at risk; and who believe that the motion should be rejected.

Ms Hanna: I support the motion and those who will be most affected by the outcome. Like many people, I watched the referendum in the South just before the summer. I actually campaigned in it, and, I have to say, as someone who has been involved in elections for going on for 15 years, that I do not remember one being as life-affirming and positive since the referendum that we had here in 1998. It was so moving to hear the impact and testimony from people who would be directly affected by the change and those who would not, particularly those who lived through a time when homosexuality was still illegal, which, unbelievably, was the case in the Republic until 1993. We have to remember, of course, that there were politicians who argued against the change then.

1.00 pm

I suspect that some of the most important testimony in moving votes, changing polling and the result in the South came from a former president, Mary McAleese, and from Tom Curran, the general secretary of Fine Gael. Both spoke about their experiences as parents and as families, their feelings when their children told them that they were gay and their worries and concerns. It was not because they loved their children any less or felt that they were different in any way, but it was their fears for their children and their prospects, how they would be mistreated or treated differently and the things that they would be excluded from in their lives. The result in May, by the simple act of people standing with gay members of our community, going into a polling booth and voting in solidarity for them, slightly changed the outcomes of such conversations. The conversation that many young people will have with their parents will be that little bit easier on the basis that their country has stood with them and said that they are equal and validated and that their relationships are cherished.

That is what the Assembly can and should do today: send the message to everybody, but particularly to LGBT young people, who are disproportionately affected by mental health issues, saying that they are free and equal and can fall in love and plan their lives like everybody in the Chamber is allowed to do.

Since marriage equality was approved across the water, we can see that the world has not fallen in. Those of us who believe that marriage is an important building block in society should be encouraged that more people want to buy into that institution. We should also be very careful about spurious claims about unintended consequences. Families with same-sex couples exist, and those children are raised in happy, loving, healthy homes. What will damage them most is continuing to stigmatise their households and families and not allowing them legal status.

The issue has also given a complete lie to the notion that young people are not interested in politics. I had over 700 emails on the issue, and I know, from the messages, names and addresses, that it is not just a young person's issue; it is not a unionist or nationalist issue; it is not a religious or non-religious issue; and it is not a left/right issue. Opinions across the board believe that we should change our view.

Northern Ireland is now the only part of these islands in which your marriage is invalid if you are gay. We have to clear that up. If somebody is married in Dublin or London, at what point when they enter Northern Ireland do we think that their marriage ceases to exist?

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. Does she agree that it is another example of the people being ahead of the politicians and that the politicians should listen to the people?

Ms Hanna: I think that it is. Polling shows that over two thirds of people support marriage equality, with a smaller number who have not made up their mind but are not opposed yet.

The separate but equal argument is that people should be happy with civil partnership. I ask Members who are married whether they would be happy to downgrade their marriage to a civil partnership if they think that it is fundamentally acceptable and that it gives people the same expression of their relationship.

I want to be very clear that I do not want any Member to feel coerced into voting for this. I believe very strongly in persuasion and not persecution. God knows, unless you are a clone — I am not suggesting that anybody in the Chamber is — at some point, we will all have an issue on which we will be at odds with our party. I do not want to be in a party or a society that does not allow such dissent in people's views.

I commend the people in my party who have a different view. While I fundamentally disagree with it, particularly when they have set out their case, I respect their right to do so.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Ms Hanna: Yes, I will.

Mr D Bradley: Does the Member agree that the motion does not and will not affect marriages that take place in churches and that it is not a redefinition of marriage but an expansion of the understanding of marriage that makes it more inclusive?

Ms Hanna: Yes, it will. The faith that I belong to, for example, does not allow people who are divorced to be married, and it has not been forced into doing that.

I want all Members to engage on the issue. They should engage with the testimony that they have no doubt received from people. I understand that people are struggling with their faith, but I hope that they will, in time, realise that many others have seen that it is entirely compatible with Christian values of love and compassion.

Mr Kennedy: At the outset, I want to say that I oppose the motion. This is yet another debate on the issue within a very short time — I think that it is debate number five. I say again to the proposers of the motion that they are guilty of engaging in a highly cynical political exercise, undoubtedly an electoral exercise, which will be of absolutely no benefit to any section of our community, least of all the LGBT community, which I think is being deliberately used by some parties in the House for perceived political advantage.

The House will know that my party believes that issues of this nature are matters of personal conscience; therefore, although I have been called as an Ulster Unionist, I speak in a personal capacity. It is a matter of regret to me that members of all political parties are not allowed the liberty to speak freely to their consciences on the issue.

In previous debates on the matter, I made clear my opposition to any change in the current legislation to allow for same-sex marriage. That remains my position. It is a position based on my religious beliefs, and it is consistent with the teaching of my Church, the Presbyterian Church, and with the publicly expressed views of other Churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of Ireland and the main denominations in Northern Ireland and Ireland generally. Most important, it is a position that I believe is fundamentally consistent with the teaching of holy scripture. What is of importance to me in this debate is not the teaching of any Church, but the teaching of scripture itself. It is clear to me, from my understanding of scripture, that there should be no change in the current situation.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: I will give way briefly.

Mr B McCrea: Given that the Member has talked about scripture, does he think that marriage is a wholly Christian concept?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. It is clearly not exclusively so, but many of its main foundations are found in the teaching of scripture.

Redefining marriage would have far-reaching consequences for our entire society, and I do not believe that there is widespread public support in Northern Ireland for such a proposal. In holding that view, I do not believe that I should be regarded as homophobic. Indeed, any such suggestion would offend and appal me. I do not disparage the LGBT community; neither is it my role or practice to be judgemental.

Like most Members, I have received much correspondence in the run-up to the debate from those on both sides of the argument. One such piece of correspondence, which outlined clear opposition to any change in the law in Northern Ireland, came from Professor Dr Stephen Williams, professor of systematic theology at Union Theological College, Belfast, which is part of Queen's University, Belfast and where students are prepared for the Presbyterian ministry. Part of his submission addressed the equality argument, on which proponents of the debate wax lyrical. With the permission of Dr Williams, I will share a short section of his thinking on this aspect of the debate. I am grateful to him for his interest and insight. He wrote:

"The equality argument is not at all compelling. Actually, same-sex marriage will reveal, not abolish, differences between heterosexual and homosexual couples. Marriage is not all about children and many heterosexual households are, sadly, unfit places for children to be raised.

However, one difference stands out between heterosexual and homosexual couples: if the former cannot have their own children, it is not because they belong to different sexes; if the latter cannot have their own children, it is precisely because they belong to different sexes.

This makes the two types of marriage ... unequal, quite apart from any re-definition of marriage involved."

Dr Williams concluded:

"Same-sex marriage is the wrong way to tackle any discrimination against gay people."

Therefore, for the reasons that I have set out — personal and deeply held convictions, reasons that I believe are clearly supported and shared by a great many people and that I cannot and will not set aside — I remain opposed to the proposal.

Mr Speaker: Before I call Mr Jim Allister, I advise him that, because of time constraints — I know that you are always generous about taking interventions — I will not be able to allocate the extra minute, as I have to call the Minister to respond.

Mr Allister: Thank you. For me, this is not a matter of popularism but a matter of principle. It is not about being on the right or wrong side of history. For me, it is unapologetically about being on the side of that which is right, informed by my conscience and my religious belief, which quite properly can and should inform these matters.

This is the fifth attempt in the House to redefine marriage, and that is what it is, despite what some have said. It is an attempt to redefine marriage, to replace the time-honoured, purposeful definition of "marriage" as being between one man and one woman with the perverse definition that demeans traditional marriage by equating it to same-sex marriage, to which there is no procreational purpose. There is only the purpose of pandering to the pretence that there is some right that is being denied. This is not a rights issue. As has been pointed out, there is no human right recognised by the European Convention on Human Rights or the European Court of Human Rights to same-sex marriage. It therefore cannot be and is not a rights issue, nor is it an issue of equality. Rather, there is a worked-up, phoney demand for rights where none does or should exist. There is no equality issue here.

Of course, the demand is based on the fatuous suggestion that same-sex marriage is really the same as regular man-to-woman marriage and that there is no difference between the two. I would like to quote a source that I am maybe not given to quoting, but it is very apt on this occasion. I quote from a letter from the Catholic bishops to Members of the House. The letter dealt appropriately with that point when it stated:

"The proposed ... motion before the assembly effectively says to parents, children and society that the state should not, and will not, promote any normative or ideal family environment for raising children. It therefore implies that the biological bond and natural ties between a child and its mother and father have no intrinsic value for the child or for society."

That is what the motion comes down to. It comes down to saying that the normative, natural environment of raising children with a father and a mother and their biological link is of no intrinsic value whatsoever and that you just equate the "unequatable" and simply roll together same-sex marriage, where procreation is impossible, with the traditional concept of regular marriage, where procreation is often but not on every occasion the natural process and the natural God-given environment in which to raise children to the best possible effect. So this is an issue that tries to equate two irreconcilable concepts: that of traditional marriage between a man and a woman and that of the phoney suggestion that, for no purpose other than to pander to what has been built up as a right when it is not a right, you give to others some equivalence to something that there is no equivalence within; namely, same-sex marriage.

So, for the fifth time in the House, I will, robustly and with conviction, whatever the popularism might be, defend with my vote the right of traditional marriage, believing that that is a bedrock for the success of society, and believing that the more we tinker, tamper, demean and diminish that, the more we will take this society spiralling downwards. I think that we have done enough of that already.

1.15 pm

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

I note that the call to act in the motion is directed at the Executive. However, as the subject matter falls within the remit of my Department, I have agreed to respond.

Apart from a few notable exceptions, the debate, which we have heard for the fifth time in this place, has taken place in a spirit of generosity. When my predecessor responded to the most recent motion on the subject, on 27 April this year, he referred to his feeling of déjà vu. Having listened to, essentially, the exact same arguments on this occasion, I have a similar feeling. I wonder whether the debate on this motion represents the best use of the Assembly's time. We have heard various opinions as to why the debate has come before us again, and I must say that I tend to agree with them.

For my part, I think that it is unhelpful, to say the least, to have to go over the same ground just six months down the line. I spoke as a Back-Bench politician in the previous debate on this issue. I said that every time this debate comes before the Assembly, it causes distress; it causes distress to the faith communities and it causes distress to the LGBT community as well. The more it comes up, again and again, without any prospect of resolution, it causes distress to everyone involved. However, I am content to reiterate the arguments in support of the policy position on same-sex marriage because I believe that those arguments are principled and persuasive and cannot easily be set aside.

This is not an equality issue. I think a number of commentators have attempted to make it so. Those opposite and, indeed, some in the UUP, would like to say that this is an equality issue for their own political reasons, but just because you keep saying that it is an equality issue does not make it an equality issue. We have heard from the ECHR and the United Nations that it is not an equality issue. Those of us on this side of the House recall well what the president of Sinn Féin had to say about equality when he spoke in Enniskillen some time ago.

Contrary to what has been suggested, the law in Northern Ireland does not disparage or denigrate same-sex relationships, and same-sex couples are not precluded from having a loving, secure, stable and permanent relationship. Specific provision has been made to ensure legal recognition for same-sex relationships, and nothing — nothing — turns on the fact that same-sex couples are referred to as "partners" rather than "spouses". Let me assure Ms Hanna, who made the point that some of us on this side are probably struggling with our faith in relation to this issue, that I am not struggling with my faith in relation to any of the issues raised here today.

Put simply, the current law regarding same-sex relationships is operating perfectly well, and the usual drivers for legislative reform do not exist. Other jurisdictions are free to determine their own legislative path and to laud their own approach. We have heard the approach of the Republic of Ireland and, indeed, Great Britain being lauded. That is entirely a matter for people if they want to do that, but we are not bound to follow suit. That is what devolution is all about.

Mr Hazzard: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: No, I will not. I do not for one minute accept the suggestion that, because Northern Ireland has not followed suit and has not followed along as if we do not have our own mind on these matters, we are less enlightened than those jurisdictions that have "extended" marriage to same-sex couples. I place "extended" in inverted commas because, in reality, some of those jurisdictions have essentially repackaged their law on civil partnerships and, consequently, the rights and responsibilities of same-sex spouses are essentially the same as the rights and responsibilities of civil partners. I expect that that is why those jurisdictions offer the option of a simple conversion process. Some jurisdictions may claim to have extended marriage to same-sex couples, but closer scrutiny reveals significant qualifications, particularly in relation to assisted conception.

As you know, Mr Speaker, resources are extremely limited at present and I see little merit in a repackaging exercise for Northern Ireland. By the way, on Mr McKay's point about public opinion, it might interest him to know that, during the consultation on the Civil Partnership Bill, 86% of correspondents opposed civil partnership at that point. He may want to reflect on arguing that point. At the point of introduction, the Civil Partnership Bill was assessed as being compliant with international law and standards and the law on civil partnership remains so today. We should be proud of the fact that our law strikes an appropriate balance between the interests of same-sex couples and the interests of people of faith. Those who are truly committed to diversity will see the intrinsic merit in protecting a diverse range of values and beliefs. They will not seek to elevate their own interests above all others, nor will they seek to silence those who may have different views.

Like many others in this House, I have received many emails from those who support "same-sex marriage" and more, in fact, from those who support the institution of marriage as it is. All the emails that I received in support of the motion were, essentially, drafted by Amnesty International. When I responded, only a handful came back a second time. Of those who did, only one was gracious enough to acknowledge my right to hold a different view. All others engaged in abusive emails. We had an initial facade and then the abusive follow-up. I regret that people in our society use abuse to push their own views forward. As I said to one of the correspondents who came back to me, when one engages in personal abuse, one has essentially lost the argument.

Those who support same-sex marriage are quick to suggest that any change to the law could be carefully managed to ensure that there are appropriate protections for people of faith. We have heard that here again today, but we have heard the contrary view as well. Given recent developments at home and abroad, as Mr Weir pointed out, I think that it is right to adopt a cautious approach and to leave things as they are. Ultimately, I see no need for legislative change. I invite Members to join me in rejecting the motion.

Sinn Féin wants to see this island be part of a progressive world where all citizens can be married regardless of their sexual orientation. We want to join the nations that have supported marriage equality: Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, England, Scotland, Wales, Uruguay, the United States of America and the South of Ireland.

This is the fifth time that we have played our role in bringing this motion forward. We are very proud of that. The suffragettes had to bring many motions forward before people listened to the right of women to have a vote. People, many of whom were on the opposite Benches, opposed interracial marriage or supported apartheid. People also had to fight for their rights and change civil marriage so that there could be marriage between different races.

Today's motion is a joint one with the SDLP. Previously, it was with the Green Party. I am honoured to make the winding-up speech on the motion. I would like to thank everyone who contributed to the debate. I genuinely welcome the tone of the debate. I am now calling on everyone in the Assembly to join us and make history. If a majority of the Assembly votes yes to equality, notwithstanding the knee-jerk reaction of the petition of concern, it will send a powerful message around the world; the same powerful message that reverberated around the globe when the South of Ireland voted yes a few short months ago.

The DUP is saying its usual no. It is citing civil partnerships, saying that there are only a few little differences, but it was opposed to civil partnership, and it has never said that it supports civil partnership. There are fundamental differences between civil partnership and civil marriage. It is using a petition of concern to discriminate against an entire community. Let us call it as it is. It is very disappointing to see a Government Minister, who has taken a Pledge of Office, urging people to vote no for equality.

I welcome Andy Allen's contribution today, but what is the leader of the UUP doing? Mike Nesbitt, the leader of the party, feels the hand of history on his shoulder and warns the party that it should not be on the wrong side of history, yet he tells us that he is going to vote no. For me, that is very strange leadership. I am sorry; I do not want to be dismissive, but it is poor leadership. It is a bizarre and contradictory position, and it does a grave disservice to the LGBT community. The question is this: is the leader of the UUP playing to the media gallery, talking out of both sides of his mouth?

I would like to thank the SDLP for this joint motion. I welcome Colum and Claire's contributions, and I agree with many of the comments that they made. I hope that all the other SDLP Members will join with them today in voting. The last time, we lost by two votes, and five Members of that party did not vote, but I hope that those days are over. That is all that I will say about that, and I welcome the fact that we are presenting a joint motion today. I would say the same to my colleagues in the Alliance Party, but I want to pay tribute to Trevor Lunn's leadership. He has shown huge leadership. I hope that everyone in the Alliance Party will abide by their party policy and vote a resounding yes.

The tone of the debate is a far cry from the first debate in which I participated in the Assembly, when the fires of hell were visited on the LGBT community and some very choice and disgusting language was used. Thankfully, we are now having the debate in a much better environment. The arguments against have changed slightly as they realise that they are so out of step with society and particularly with young people. We have heard them say, "They have civil partnership, why do they want marriage?" or "It is a lifestyle choice". They say, "Let's not redefine marriage", but if you look at civil marriage over the years, of course it has been redefined as society evolves. None of us would have wanted the civil marriage that existed in the past; times are changing.

The other debate we get is, "My conscience won't allow me; what about religious belief?" To be honest, with the greatest of respect, they are mixing up their religious belief and their job as politicians. We can have a debate about that; I heard different people speaking. All parties in this Assembly that vote yes to this motion support freedom of religion; Claire Hanna said it. The Catholic Church does not support divorce, but it supports civil marriage. Let us be honest about this. As legislators, we are not here to legislate according to our consciences; we are here to legislate on the basis of equality. Nobody is saying that the Churches must practise equal marriage. That is a matter for the Churches now and in the future. Let us also be clear that there are many people who have religious beliefs who believe in equality and equal marriage. Let us not pretend that this is between Christians and non-Christians or people who practise various religions.

Mr Givan: I thank the Member for giving way. If legislation was brought forward from the Executive in terms of people's religious beliefs, there are those in the LGBT community who would articulate that they have a faith. Should they be able to have a religious marriage or should they be restricted to civil marriage?

Ms Ruane: What we are calling for today is marriage equality in civil marriage. That debate is one for people in the various Churches. Let us not be diverted; let us not have a red-herring debate. That is a debate for the Churches. Every party in the Assembly that votes yes is absolutely clear that yes voters support freedom of religion by allowing religious institutions to define, observe and practise marriage according to their beliefs.

1.30 pm

The other arguments that we have heard are the family values arguments. My message to those people is: do not insult families. Families come in all shapes and sizes. We have one-parent and two-parent families. We have gay and straight families. We have extended families. We have children who are fostered and adopted. We have families who have come from countries throughout the world. Yes, I am a huge believer in family values, but it depends on how you define "family". I was reared in a good family, and I am lucky to have a wonderful family myself, with children and a grandchild. The glue that holds my family together is the traditional family value of love, commitment and deep respect. Do people from the LGBT community not deserve love, commitment and respect? Why would I, who can get married, try to say to someone in another community that they cannot but I can?

See the argument about children? I do not buy that, folks, and I will tell you why. Many of our children might be gay or lesbian or bisexual or transgendered. Are we going to say to our children that they are less equal than straight young people? I am not going to say that. That is not good family values. Equality, love, respect and commitment, for me, are important family values.

I am calling on everyone here today to vote yes. Let us get a majority and let us make a bit of history. For those who feel that they cannot vote yes, please abstain. Please abstain and play your part.

Mr Speaker: Before I put the question, I remind Members that the vote on the motion will be on a cross-community basis.

Mr Speaker: Order, please. If Members are leaving the Chamber, I ask them to do so quietly.

Mental Health

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. [Interruption.] Order. One amendment has been selected and is published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Apologies, but I tried to catch your eye before we started this debate. Standing Order 17(4) states:

Given that the business is scheduled to finish today by 4.40 pm, I wonder whether you can set out at some time — you may not be in a position to do it now — the relationship between the Speaker and the Business Committee in establishing the total time for debate available. I was disappointed not to be able to speak in the previous debate, as I know was Mr Agnew from the Green Party.

Mr Speaker: I understand the point of order and speak from a position of some sympathy for individuals in that corner of the Chamber. The Business Committee makes allowance for the proposers and seconders of motions and for winding-up speeches. It also makes provision for the Minister to speak.

In the previous debate, we had a high level of intervention. My last count was eight interventions, which took a further eight minutes out of the time allocated. I did alert Members to the fact that it was challenging to include all who put down their name to speak. In the event, two Members, one of whom got two interventions, were not called to make their full contributions. The Minister did not take all the time that was allocated to her, but she was perfectly entitled to do so.

I hope that that responds to the Member’s substantive point. In working with the Business Committee, we have to try to accommodate all possible combinations of circumstances. Sometimes interventions, which are perfectly valid and which enliven and enrich our debate, eat into the time allocated for fuller participation.

I would like to move on. Have you finished?

Mr B McCrea: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker, I am, of course, absolutely happy with the way in which you conducted the debate. There are two key points to make, however, if I can put them to you to consider and come back to me on.

One concerns the relationship, because Standing Order 17(4) states:

I have no input to the Business Committee but I do have input to you. You said you were sympathetic, so I wonder whether you might use your good offices to say that there are debates in which it is known that people will want to speak. You can deal with that, Mr Speaker, in your own good time.

I would like you to consider a second point and respond in writing, or whatever is the right form. Standing Order 17(5) says that the Speaker shall have:

“regard to the balance of opinion ... the party strengths ... and the number of members who ... desire to speak.”

There was a cross-community vote on the last motion. There are parties that did not get to speak at all. Mr Speaker, perhaps you would look at this to see if there is some way, whatever the time constraints you put on it, that every party in the Assembly gets the chance to speak at least once. I will leave it to you, Mr Speaker, to consider the best way forward.

Mr Speaker: OK. That is where we will leave the matter for now. I chair the Business Committee, so I do consult on and discuss each and every decision. In the course of any term, there will be changes. Indeed, there have been changes to the composition of the numbers of Members attached to particular parties. All of those are variables that affect our ability to anticipate every circumstance, but I will reflect on the point that you made. I doubt very much that we have much room to accommodate every Member and the membership of every group on the basis of a guarantee, but we will do our best as we always do.

Fearghal, I am now down to nine minutes. If you like, I am prepared to put this matter off until after Question Time, or perhaps you can manage it in nine minutes.

Mr McKinney: Perhaps I will try nine minutes.

Mr Speaker: OK, that will be good. That will be interesting.

Mr McKinney: Thank you, Mr Speaker.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way? Only joking. [Laughter.]

Mr McKinney: If I do not manage, my colleagues can bring any other necessary points to the table.

I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises that mental ill health affects one in four people every year; further recognises the importance of having quality services that are fairly resourced, trained staff to afford early access and support, and a focus on prevention, resilience and mental well-being; recognises the importance of rehabilitation, with clear objectives established for accessing mental health professionals, within 28 days and close to home; further recognises the importance of raising awareness, reducing stigma and discrimination in relation to mental ill health; and calls for the Executive to work in collaboration to make dealing with mental ill health a top Programme for Government priority.

At the outset, I welcome the Health Minister back into his post after a period of great uncertainty. I hope that, in the context of today’s debate, the Minister can clarify the importance of him being in post to make strategic decisions on the future delivery of mental health services here.

As SDLP health spokesperson, I welcome the opportunity to bring the very important issue of mental health to the Chamber. As many of you know, the prevalence of mental health problems has historically been and continues to be a major concern for us all. In that regard, I note the amendment, which the SDLP is happy to support. In our view, it neither adds substantially nor takes away anything from the original motion. However, it does give the proposers extra time to speak, which I hope will be used to further elaborate on these urgent plans and to express the genuine concerns of the many people impacted on by mental ill health across Northern Ireland, and the many others, such as health staff, carers and families, who share the concerns reflected here today. Therefore, the amendment cannot be a gesture. I welcome the intention to establish a mental health trauma network, but I have severe doubts that it will be followed by the robust and strategic action plan that is so desperately needed.

It is widely recognised that the North has higher levels of mental ill health than any other region of these islands. It is estimated that one in four adults will suffer from a mental health problem at some stage of their life. Long-term social and economic deprivation and the Troubles have had a massive impact on the health and well-being of our population. A project carried out by the Commission for Victims and Survivors and the Ulster University indicated that 213,000 people here suffer from some sort of mental illness and that almost half of these illnesses are directly related to the Troubles. It is a startling figure.

Tribute must be paid to the many staff in our hospitals and community who continue to play an important role in delivering high-quality care. Much great work has also been undertaken by various organisations. I applaud the action that they have taken and the campaigns that they have been involved in. An example is the Change Your Mind campaign by the Association for Mental Health (NIAMH) and the Public Health Agency, which is aimed at reducing levels of stigma, discrimination and negative attitudes towards people with mental ill health.

However, severe challenges still exist and are of great concern. We have recently seen damaging headlines around the care provided to suicide and self-harm patients in our emergency departments and the inadequacy of children's mental health services. In this context, it is important to look again at some of the recent policy developments on the provision of mental health services here in the past eight years. One of the seminal reports dictating the nature of mental health services was the Bamford review of 2007. It made a number of key recommendations including the development of a comprehensive range of mental health services that would support people in the community, supplemented by the 2011 Transforming Your Care plan to bolster mental health treatment at home.

Again, in 2011, despite mental health ultimately taking a minor role, the Programme for Government set key milestones to strengthen the drive on improving health and well-being and in tackling disadvantage.

In theory, therefore, those developments should have resulted in massive strides forward in affording mental health provision the recognition and parity of esteem that it truly deserves, but — and you could hear the “but” coming — unfortunately, the progression has been tainted by lack of implementation and systemic failure to fund and measure.

The key challenges that the Executive have faced in the delivery of mental healthcare have been the role of Transforming Your Care, budgetary cuts and the cumulative effect that they have had on the Bamford action plan. In 2009, when the first action plan was embarked on, the total amount of additional funding that the Department anticipated was £44 million. However, due to the CSR, £29.5 million was spent. To delve even deeper, let us look at trust spend. Between 2008 and 2014, trusts spent something in the order of 25% less on mental healthcare. Those cuts have dramatically affected the Bamford action plan's ability to improve mental health services here. I have serious concerns about the future ability to carry out each initiative set out. There are very genuine concerns that, if more cuts are forced on the mental health budget, it could not be done without severely hampering existing services.

At this stage, we are well aware of the current status of the Transforming Your Care plan. If we look closely at it, we do not see any concrete evidence that the plans concerning mental health have been implemented to an appropriate degree. Most concerning is proposal 62, which stated the intention to close long-stay institutions and complete resettlement by 2015. As part of that, £11 million has been spent on the resettlement; that was basically closing Muckamore and Holywell and relocating patients. A recent report conducted by Queen's University and Action Mental Health lays bare the current status of community mental health provision across the North. In particular, the report expresses concerns about the range of inadequacies in community care services. One user stated:

Health professionals stated:

“Community mental health teams are stretched to the limit, too little staff and too many demands. Not enough voluntary resources are available”.

Those are damning in themselves. They lead to very serious questions that must be asked as a result, of not just the Minister but of successive DUP Ministers. The current situation can be attributable only to systemic political failure to properly implement and fund a strategy to deal with the current and future demand for services.

There are other areas of concern. The issue of rural mental health has to figure. It is a major problem. The rehabilitation of patients has proven that to be the case. Asking people to travel big distances for treatment cannot be acceptable. Added to that is the fact that many farmers — and we have seen it in the headlines recently — are under extreme financial pressure, with livelihoods at risk. There is the attendant suicidal risk as well. It is important to mention the impact that suicides are having on families here. In the past 10 years, we have seen them increase by a staggering 84% despite the Protect Life strategy being introduced back in 2006. I understand that the Department is consulting on a new mental health and suicide prevention strategy, but it is paramount that vulnerable groups such as those in rural communities, young men, the LGBT community and those from areas of multiple social deprivation are targeted and given the appropriate level of support and service provision that they need.

There is now a massive risk that the current direction of travel in policy and in budgetary cuts will severely hamper services. In all of this, it is important to remember that a strategic approach and properly investing in mental health provision, especially earlier intervention and preventative services, is paramount in not only dramatically improving the quality of life for an individual and families but in reducing the economic costs associated with mental ill health. In that context, today's motion argues that the next Executive need to take mental health seriously and they need to set out an ambitious agenda; not a tokenistic one, as seen in the current Programme for Government. It should be a genuine, cross-governmental, mental health and well-being strategy that embraces issues such as employment, welfare, policing, criminal justice, housing and education, and the Public Health Agency should lead the way in championing preventive action and early intervention.

I have met the deadline, Mr Speaker. I am thankful that there were no interventions, and I look forward to the rest of the debate.

Oral Answers to Questions

Social Development

Disabled Facilities Grants

1. Mr Dallat asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on the number of applications for disabled facilities grants. (AQO 8954/11-16)

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): The Housing Executive administers the disabled facilities grant, which has a significant impact on the lives of those who live with a disability in private sector housing, helping them to make adaptations to their homes.

In 2014-15, the Housing Executive approved over 1,200 disabled facilities grants and expended over £12 million in grant assistance. This year to date, 537 applications have been received, and almost 500 disabled facilities grant applications have been approved. Those grant applications address issues such as access to premises, downstairs bathrooms and wet rooms and downstairs bedrooms.

Mr Dallat: I have listened very carefully to the Minister, and I congratulate the Housing Executive on the work that it has done. Does the Minister agree, however, that very often time is not on the side of the people who need the disability facilities grants, many of whom may be bed-blocking in hospitals? How does the Minister propose to clear the waiting list so that those people are not in long queues that they cannot afford to be in?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. Obviously, this is an issue not only of the budget allocated but of the process that is used. I am well aware of the issue, not only as a Minister with responsibility, which is important, but as an MLA. Like yourself, I am well aware of constituents who are affected because the process can be somewhat protracted, particularly if you are dependent on a report from occupational therapy and are waiting for all of the particular elements to be in a row.

I assure the Member that under reviews, as you are well aware, Departments review the practice and the process. That is an element that I am more than happy to give further consideration to. We are often criticised in this House for what we have not done, but for those who I referred to in my substantive reply, we have approved over 1,200 disabled facilities grants and expended well over £12 million in grant assistance. That has made an invaluable contribution to the well-being, livelihood and day-to-day experience of those people who suffer with a disability.

I will certainly give further consideration to the comments of the Member, particularly with our colleagues in occupational therapy and the other component parts that make up the decision-making process.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for his answer.

Following on from Mr Dallat's supplementary question, when a family with a newborn child with disabilities needs a new home — due, maybe, to needing an additional bedroom to supply a wet room or changing facilities, or to keep medical equipment in — has the Minister any way in which that process can be worked with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, so that there is a parallel process of allocating a new house and processing the disability grant?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. Obviously, there is sometimes an element of this where, unfortunately, we have to look beyond the confines of the Housing Executive to provision by a housing association. I can think of one particular case at the moment which has been protracted for far too long and which, as Minister, I have tried to expedite. A very large family, with children who have particular disabilities, has been unable to get appropriate housing. A number of locations have been looked at, but that case has gone on too long and I had a meeting just last week with the chief executive of a housing association in relation to it. It sometimes ends up going to housing associations, as much as to the Housing Executive.

It is just as I said to Mr Dallat: none of us know what will face us in the weeks and months ahead or what difficulties we may face as families. At the moment, I have a particular personal issue in relation to my father, who has just come out of hospital after a protracted length of time there. Additional resources are needed, and we will have to look at how his needs are going to be met. How much more is that the case when there are children with disabilities. That is an issue, and I am quite happy to include the issue of children with disabilities and how they are provided for in a new build situation, in the consideration that we give to how we make progress on this issue.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I call Mrs Dolores Kelly, I inform the House that question 5 has been withdrawn.

Social Housing: Regulatory Framework

2. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development whether he will publish the findings of the consultation on the proposal for a new regulatory framework for social housing. (AQO 8955/11-16)

Mr Storey: The response to the public consultation on a new regulatory framework for social housing was published on the Department for Social Development's website on 30 September 2015. It is planned to issue the final framework document early in the new year. Implementation will commence during 2016-17.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his response. Can he give us some indicators as to how he will take forward the implementation? What are the key emerging trends that he wants to act on?

Mr Storey: I will set this in context. The Department regulates the work of all social housing providers in Northern Ireland, and uses a regulatory framework to do so. In the light of the changes in the housing sector in the last few years, and the reviews of regulatory frameworks in other jurisdictions, it was decided to look again at this framework. The consultation document outlined proposals for a new regulatory framework, and the regulations will be carried out against three standards: the consumer, governance and finance. Obviously, that will bring us into the area of looking at risk-based processes. An element of flexibility will be built in to accommodate variations in organisations, such as size, development plans, previous history and business complexity. That gives us an indication of the breadth of what we are seeking to achieve, although I have to say — I know that the Member takes a particular interest in this issue — it is a challenging process that we set ourselves, because of the vastness of the sector and the particular challenges that we face.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. How did the Department decide what to include in this framework?

Mr Storey: The Department looked at best practice. Sometimes, that is good. It is maybe not always good to look at practice in other jurisdictions, because there is an underlying assumption that everybody else gets it right somewhere else, but that might not always be the case. When it comes to look at best practice, Northern Ireland leads the way in many of these things and in the way that we approach issues. We looked at best practice in other jurisdictions and compared those with our current controls in Northern Ireland. Many representatives from the housing association movement were also involved, and there were workshops under the social housing reform programme before the consultation was published. That contribution was key in the development of the new framework. As we move forward, we have tried to incorporate the issues that were raised.

Urban Villages

3. Mr F McCann asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the measures his Department will take to support the urban villages initiative. (AQO 8956/11-16)

Mr Storey: As the Member will appreciate, the urban villages initiative is being led by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. DSD has been supporting the urban villages initiative through submitting, in early May, a bid for funding at the June monitoring round for a number of projects in Belfast and Londonderry totalling £2.1 million. The projects were identified along with estimated costs by the Strategic Investment Board (SIB). My Department is also supporting the urban villages initiative by assisting the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and the Strategic Investment Board when possible in the delivery of a number of those projects within the current financial year, and that work is ongoing.

Mr F McCann: I thank the Minister for his answer. Many areas throughout the North are eagerly awaiting urban villages. Will you outline whether some are closer to taking off than others? Has any time frame been set that will give people confidence that they will take place?

Mr Storey: The process has been fraught with challenges. In some communities, it has been a challenge to try to get an understanding of what needs to be achieved with the urban villages concept. Under the OFMDFM urban villages initiative, there could be opportunities to bid for funding through future government monitoring rounds, and we are looking at that to see how to progress it. I want progress to be made on the ones that we originally identified. If we do that, we will be more successful in how we use this as a means in the future.

Through the June monitoring round, £500,000 was allocated to Londonderry, £400,000 was allocated to EastSide, and £1.2 million was allocated to the Colin town centre urban village to complete a number of projects. My Department will continue to progress the work within its control to maximise the spend in this financial year.

Mr McCausland: Will the Minister describe the projects that are being taken forward in urban village areas across the Province?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. As I said in answer to the original question, DSD staff are working in partnership with OFMDFM and the Strategic Investment Board on a number of schemes that are at various stages of design and procurement. In the Newtownards Road area, seven schemes are ongoing, including pocket parks, artworks, domestic frontages and other public realm and environmental improvements. In the Colin area, there is a plan for a large-scale play park, with an overall cost, as I said, of £1.2 million. In Ballysillan — I have no doubt that the Member will be interested in that location — Ardoyne, Sandy Row, Donegall Pass and the Markets urban village areas, engagement with the local communities is being taken forward by the SIB to identify potential project proposals. Six projects are being taken forward in the Bogside and Fountain urban village area in 2015-16, including two public realm schemes, shop frontage improvements, a play park, the renovation of a community centre and traffic safety initiatives. In addition, a number of longer-term proposals are being developed.

I trust that that gives the Member and other Members some sense of the diversity of what can be included and delivered under the concept of urban villages. Those who have engaged in those areas have found it to be challenging but rewarding when they see progress and an outcome that enhances their community.

2.15 pm

Mr Cree: The Minister mentioned the costs of the initiative. Does he agree that the lack of clarity on how much funding would be available has led to a very low uptake of projects outside the two cities, as he demonstrated quite clearly?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. It would be nice to have additional resource for many projects. There is always a sense when delivering, and even when planning for, projects such as this that there is not enough money in the fund. I am very conscious of the perception that this can become a very city-based initiative and that areas outside the confines of Belfast and Londonderry do not benefit. That is something that we need to take cognisance of. I, like other Ministers, am constrained by my budget. We have had that debate in the House on numerous occasions, but I do not think that any Minister is ever satisfied with the total amount that they receive. If additional funding was made available, serious consideration would be given to addressing the point that the Member raised.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for the Urban Villages support for a cross-community youth project in inner east Belfast that led to the reinstallation of the Teenage Dreams public artwork, a good example of the project in action. Given that Urban Villages is a headline project of the Northern Ireland good relations strategy, Together: Building a United Community, what key good relations outcomes will it achieve for our community?

Mr Storey: I think that the Member has almost answered his own question. If we can make engagement and involvement possible for a community that is disengaged and feels that it does not have the infrastructure, or the environment, even to build relationships in its own area, let alone the strength and capacity to go beyond it, that is to be welcomed. During my time in office, I have visited a variety of projects that are making an invaluable contribution, first and foremost to their local area. We need to instil in our communities a sense of pride; it is sad that in some areas of Northern Ireland a sense of pride in your local community is not the priority that it should be. However, initiatives such as Urban Villages — it does not have all the answers — bring progress in the form of tangible outcomes. It enhances opportunities for communities to move forward and to have confidence that their area is a place where they want to live and bring up their children and where others can interact with them in a very positive way.

Northside Project

4. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on his Department's involvement in the Northside project for the regeneration of Belfast city centre. (AQO 8957/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for the question. The Department's preferred developer for the proposed Northside regeneration scheme, Northside Regeneration Limited, submitted an outline planning application for a comprehensive mixed-use scheme, comprising 10 sites, at the end of June 2015. Applications for the approval of reserved matters for the individual sites are to be submitted in due course. A full planning application has already been submitted in relation to site 3.

Once the applications have been determined, and after consultation with Belfast City Council, the Department will need to be satisfied that there are sufficient financial resources behind the developer to ensure the completion of the scheme and that the regeneration benefits of the development merit the adoption of a statutory development scheme.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answers. He will be aware that this is a substantial scheme. Does he plan to meet some of the many traders and residents who will be affected? They want the regeneration of the area, but they have considerable concerns.

Mr Storey: I trust that the Member knows, because I know that other Members are aware, that I endeavour to meet whomever wants to have a conversation when particular issues and concerns are raised with us. I have a concern, and it is that the focus needs to be clearly on the huge benefits of investment to that particular part of the city.

The Member will be aware that I have had discussions with Executive colleagues, because, based on the plans for that particular part of the city, it is estimated that there will be somewhere in the region of £1 billion of investment. I want, as do my Executive colleagues and Members for the area, to see a concerted, planned and coordinated approach, not just to what is happening with Northside but to what is being planned by other elements of the Executive. Whether that is through DRD or through the work on the relocation of the university and other projects, we want to make sure that we maximise investment to the benefit of the people in the area and of organisations.

I cannot recall whether I have met traders specifically, but, if there are particular traders whom I have not met and who have issues, I am more than happy to meet them and listen to any concerns that they want to raise.

Ms P Bradley: In his answer to Mr Kelly, the Minister mentioned consultation with Belfast City Council. Does he know what its position on the Northside development is at this stage?

Mr Storey: The issue of Belfast City Council's involvement is an important one, and, for a number of reasons, I thank the Member for raising it. First, Belfast City Council officers have worked with my Department on the issue from the outset, beginning with the selection of Northside Regeneration Limited. Officials have suggested to council officers that a view of the process from elected members would be helpful at this stage, and that request is currently being considered.

I have said on a number of occasions that the scheme cannot be something that is imposed by my Department. It has to be done in consultation with the council, the local community and public representatives, because we all have a vested interest in ensuring that we get the best outcome. I have given that assurance repeatedly in the House, but I sound a warning. It is not a warning with a threat, and I am not trying to undermine the process in any way, but we need to make decisions about where this is going. I am concerned that those who would be behind this project financially may feel that the processes are taking too long and are too protracted, and, as such, they may decide to place their investment in somewhere other than this great city.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his detailed answers. Clearly, everyone, including local residents and business folk, is supportive of him trying to get investment into the area, but the problem is this: as far as the businesspeople are concerned, the plan as it exists does not attract investment into the area. In fact, they believe that it is doing the opposite and is deterring investment. There must therefore be a speedy outcome to all of this so that there can be a clear idea of what will happen in the area in the near future.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary comment, which I will take on board. It follows on from the comment made by another Member for North Belfast. The business community and, in particular, the local community will have to live with the consequences of all that is going on, because, let us remember that there is a considerable amount of activity already going on.

One point that I have made is that, using Northside and the various statutory instruments that are at our disposal, we will either have a controlled process or an uncontrolled situation in which, as I said in the substantive reply that I gave, we have a number of applications that are already approved.

We know the concerns and I have listened to those that people have expressed about student accommodation and all of that, but we need an overarching process and some degree of control; not control for the sake of it to satisfy the bureaucracy of the Civil Service but that manages the process and gives us an outcome in the best possible interests of traders, residents and the people of that particular part of Belfast.

Social Housing: Upper Bann

6. Mr Moutray asked the Minister for Social Development how his Department is addressing the need for social housing in Upper Bann. (AQO 8959/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his question. In order to help address identified housing need in Upper Bann, there are currently 50 new housing units under construction in the Lurgan and Portadown area, which will be completed during this financial year. A further 52 units are programmed to start on site this year, with an additional 80 units programmed to start in 2016-17. The remaining housing need is expected to be addressed either through the reletting of existing stock or the refurbishment of void properties in the area.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response. What sites in Upper Bann are currently under construction?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. Before I give the detail, I would like to say that I have come to the House on many occasions, given the responsibility that I have for housing, and I would love to be in a position where we were doing more in Northern Ireland. One thing that has become an interest and a passion for me is that we could really do something with housing in Northern Ireland. Look at the specifics in relation to the area that the Member represents. There are 38 social housing units currently under construction in the Lurgan area, with 12 in the Portadown area. For those who will be the beneficiaries of those particular units, that is welcome, but there is a huge issue of demand and other areas where we would like to do more. I trust that, in the days and weeks ahead, we can really focus on moving the debate on to a housing agenda that gives good quality homes to the people of Northern Ireland, as, I have no doubt, those that have already been developed in Upper Bann are and those that are currently on site will.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge that the number of houses being built is just the tip of the iceberg of those that are required. Minister, you will be familiar with Mount Zion and the demand in the north Lurgan area in particular for units for older people. Will you agree to meet a delegation from Mount Zion on an exciting proposal they have to transform the current arrangement they have with Choice Housing from young person's dwellings to those for older people?

Mr Storey: Yes, I have already met representatives from Mount Zion, which was facilitated through my colleague Mr Moutray, but I have no difficulty in meeting a further delegation. The Northern Ireland Housing Executive has not approved a proposed Supporting People scheme at Mount Zion, as you know. The Department has engaged with Shankill (Lurgan) Community Projects and Choice Housing Ireland Ltd to consider alternative housing options at Mount Zion. I am encouraged that, in recent correspondence that I have received from them, they have taken what can only be seen as a very proactive approach. Let me place on record our appreciation — I know that Members from the Upper Bann constituency will endorse this — of the work that is carried out by Mount Zion.

There is a question that I have repeatedly asked through this process and in others. If they were not there delivering the service that they have delivered, the statutory system could not pick up that provision. I want to be of help. I welcome the fact that they have had some interesting outcomes with Habitat for Humanity. That is good progress, but that should not be so that some other organisation provides for the need and we abdicate our responsibility. I am happy to have a further meeting in relation to the issue.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I have an indication from two other Members that they wish to question the Minister. Before I call Mr Ian Milne, I remind the Member that the question is on need for social housing in Upper Bann, so it should be a specific question on the constituency of Upper Bann.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as na freagraí a thug sé go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. The question is about Upper Bann. How many new social homes are required to be built in Upper Bann between now and 2020 to address the current housing need?

2.30 pm

Mr Storey: It always amazes me how Members can be so inventive and move from one constituency to another, but there you are. The Housing Executive has identified a total projected housing need for 228 units in Upper Bann over the period 2014 to 2019.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind Mr Ross Hussey of the same point.

Mr Hussey: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Will the Minister advise how many properties have been transferred from the ownership of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to housing associations in Upper Bann?

Mr Storey: I do not have that information with me. I assure the Member that I will write to him to give it to him. I will also copy it to his colleague from Upper Bann who is absent.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That brings us to the end of listed questions. We now move on to topical questions. I call Mr Roy Beggs.

Mr Beggs: The Minister —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: My apologies. I turned too many sheets at the one time. I call Mrs Dolores Kelly.

Dingwell Flats: Demolition

T1. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development, given that he will be aware of the dreadful murder of Mr Seeley in the Dingwell Park area of Taghnevan and the clamour for those flats to be demolished, whether he and the Housing Executive would be sympathetic to that demand, given that that area has been a breeding ground for antisocial behaviour for many years. (AQT 3041/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for her question. First, I pass on my condolences to the family of Marcell Seeley following his tragic death and murder in that place. It was extremely sad, and we know that someone has been arrested in relation to that issue.

I am also aware of residents' concerns, including those expressed by the Member, who raised the issue with me, about the antisocial behaviour in the Dingwell flats. I have been assured by the Housing Executive of its continued commitment to dealing robustly with the issues in the estate. I also recently met Minister O'Dowd and the Deputy Mayor of Armagh City, Banbridge and Craigavon District Council, Catherine Seeley, to discuss these matters. I gave an undertaking, as I will give to the Member, to discuss these issues with the Housing Executive to see what more can be done.

Unfortunately, the issue in Dingwell flats is not uncommon. We have identified a particular issue, which is of concern to me as the Minister responsible for housing, and it is the placing of people in locations without any of the appropriate and necessary supports. We then see the consequences of what happens. I have heard particularly harrowing stories from the Member and from others about what it can be like for the neighbouring area, which is a settled community, and the difficulty that that creates.

I have had a brief discussion with the chief executive of the Housing Executive about the issue. I plan to have a further meeting with the Housing Executive, particularly in relation to that location.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the Minister's insight and acknowledgment that what happened in Dingwell Park was horrific, but was not an isolated incident as far as antisocial behaviour and vulnerable people being placed in settled communities is concerned. Are there any lessons to be learned from the recently conducted review into supporting people, or could any amendments be made to assist and direct resources to those types of situations in which people need a bit of extra help?

Mr Storey: The Member is right to identify that a key element of the way in which we address these issues — it is one element — is the review that we have carried out into supporting people.

When I came into ministerial office, I gave a public commitment, not only in word but in deed, that the Supporting People budget would be protected. Although it was a huge challenge to deliver on that, we did so. We have now had a review of Supporting People. I am continuing to look at that document to see how we have covered all the areas, and if there are lessons to be learned, which undoubtedly and regrettably there are, we will see how we can assure public representatives and communities that, when we talk about Supporting People, that is really what we do. I know the real value of Supporting People; I have seen it played out in practice to many families. However, there may be, as there always are in these situations, elements of it that could be delivered better. That was why we initiated the review. I have given the undertaking that the review was not about trying to fundamentally change the delivery of Supporting People; it was to enhance its delivery and make it more beneficial to the people that it is there to support.

Public Realm Schemes: North Down

T2. Mr Weir asked the Minister for Social Development what he and his Department are doing to prepare for the arrival of the first groups of Syrian refugees in Northern Ireland. (AQT 3042/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his question in relation to north Down. I am sure that he will be delighted to know that, over the past five years, there has been investment of almost £18.3 million in a number of major capital regeneration schemes in the north Down area, including public realm enhancement in Bangor, Holywood, Comber, Donaghadee and Newtownards. There have also been almost £21 million-worth of schemes, in which Ards and North Down Borough Council has invested £10 million, which represents the largest commitment by any council to the public realm investment and improvement scheme.

The schemes will upgrade the commercial core of town centres to encourage greater public use and stimulate investment. I have witnessed at first hand the positive impact that such initiatives have had in restoring life to town centres and city centres. Works in each of the town centres will include the installation of new footpaths in natural stone paving, new street lighting and furniture, landscaping and associated works. The Holywood scheme was recently completed, and those in Comber and Donaghadee are due to complete within the next few weeks. I know that that will please my colleague from the constituency as well.

Mr Weir: Can the Minister firm up the information on the Bangor scheme? I welcome the completions that have taken place, but is the Bangor scheme due for completion, and is its timescale on track?

Mr Storey: It seems that all politics is local, even when it comes to constituencies, when it gets very parochial. I assure the Member that the Bangor and Newtownards schemes are on target to complete in the summer of 2016.

I will say something that can be easily provided in a response to a question for written answer: I ask you to look at the amount of money that was contributed by the local council. At somewhere in the region of almost £11 million, it is the largest contribution of any of our local councils. That is not only a commitment by central government but a commitment and focus of attention by local government. When you put those two together, you get a good outcome. I think that other councils should look at what has been achieved — I had better get it right — by Ards and North Down Borough Council. In this age of new councils, you have to make sure that your terminology is correct.

Syrian Refugees: DSD Preparation

T3. Lord Morrow asked the Minister for Social Development what he and his Department are doing to prepare for the arrival of the first groups of Syrian refugees in Northern Ireland. (AQT 3043/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his question. Regrettably, this issue is obviously very topical. We would prefer not to be in the situation that we are in. I will preface what I say by trying to bring the House and our community in Northern Ireland to a place of reality. We are dealing here with real people, real families and real issues. Yes, we can raise a myriad of particular issues, but I think that we need to preface what we say with the fact that we are dealing with real people here.

My Department is leading the operational planning group that is putting in place the arrangements to manage the arrival of Syrian refugees into Northern Ireland. The two main areas where the work of my Department will be affected by the arrival of Syrian refugees in Northern Ireland are the processing of benefits by the Social Security Agency and the provision of housing for those who come. Refugees who come to Northern Ireland under the Syrian vulnerable persons relocation scheme will be entitled to welfare benefits on the same basis as UK citizens. The Social Security Agency is committed to providing whatever support it can for those being resettled here and is well advanced in the planning to ensure that those cases proceed as smoothly as possible.

My Department has also engaged with Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs to make arrangements for the processing of tax credits and child benefit, alongside the benefits administered by the Social Security Agency. The Department, along with the Housing Executive, has started work to identify locations that may be considered to be suitable when taking into account the availability of suitable housing and the capacity in key public services, such as education and health. Given the pressures on the social housing waiting lists, it is expected that the housing solution will mainly make use of the private rented sector.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Minister of the two-minute rule.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister for that very comprehensive response. The Minister spoke about an operational planning group. I suspect that your Department is leading on that. Who else is involved in it?

Mr Storey: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I appreciate your warning. However, given the seriousness of the issue, it was important that I place it on record in the House, because this is the first opportunity when I have been able to do so during Question Time. Recently, in the local press, I have seen criticisms of the process from some local councils. I can give them an assurance, as I can the House, that we will continue to process the issue as speedily as we can. The Member asked about the operational planning group. It has a wide membership, including all public agencies that may be required to provide services to refugees; local government; and organisations in the voluntary sector who have expertise in this field. If you bring those groups together, it gives us the core of the operational planning group. That is where the focus is currently.

Antisocial Behaviour Information Sharing

T4. Mr Rogers asked the Minister for Social Development, on the back of a serious incident in Newcastle at the weekend, what steps DSD is taking to ensure the full sharing of antisocial behaviour information between the PSNI and housing associations. (AQT 3044/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his question. Obviously, there is always a concern when particular incidents take place. Since November 2004, an information-sharing protocol with the PSNI has been in place, and it is being used successfully across a range of housing services. It includes the gathering of information and the development of cases where it is the intention of the executive to take legal action, the gathering of information and the development of cases where it is the intention of the executive to take legal action to secure injunctions or antisocial behaviour orders against an individual, and when considering an applicant's eligibility and entitlement to homelessness assistance or housing accommodation. The purpose of the protocol is to facilitate the sharing of data, where appropriate, between the Housing Executive and the PSNI in order to prevent crime. The protocol introduces and formalises service level delivery standards between the executive and the police, and the sharing of such information allows the agencies to work collaboratively and to consider the appropriate remedies to address antisocial behaviour.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for that. Minister, there is a frustration among the good people who live in that estate that the protocols are not nearly as robust as they were when it was the Housing Executive and the PSNI. What lessons have been learned from the previous protocols? How can it be tightened?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his question. In the light of the issue and the particular incident that the Member raises, I will give him an assurance. Again, it goes back to the point I made earlier. It is relatively easy to read an answer to a specific question in this House, but sometimes it does not get to the bottom of the specifics.

In the light of the incident that the Member referred to, I will refer the issue to the Housing Executive, the PSNI and the housing association so that we can revisit the protocols. I will write to the Member.

2.45 pm

St Patrick's Barracks, Ballymena

T5. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on the St Patrick's Barracks site in Ballymena. (AQT 3045/11-16)

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his topical question. Following the proposal that I made to the First Minister and deputy First Minister for the development of the former military barracks for mixed public-sector use, it was agreed that the site should be acquired by my Department. A business case for the purchase of the site and its development, using a housing-led regeneration scheme, was approved. The site was subsequently bought by the Department for Social Development on 30 September, just a few days ago. My Department has appointed consultants to prepare a development plan setting out the potential areas on the site that could be used by public stakeholders. The development plan is expected to be completed by the end of the month if not sooner, and a programme of work to prepare the site for development is now being considered.

I have also given an assurance that I will take the local council into account. Indeed, it is my intention to meet the council because, as I said about the public realm works that we have undertaken in other jurisdictions and council areas, it is vital that we have buy-in from councils. I had preliminary discussions with the council this week. I look forward to developing one of the most prestigious sites in our constituency — I speak not only as Minister but, along with my colleague, as a representative of the North Antrim constituency — which has a huge history that we want to protect in an area that I have no doubt will make an invaluable contribution to the livelihood and well-being of our constituents.

Agriculture and Rural Development

River Pollution

1. Lord Morrow asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development whether she plans to introduce a more joined-up approach with her Executive colleagues to address effectively the problem of river pollution. (AQO 8969/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. River pollution can be caused by a range of sources including farms, sewage, industry and domestic. My remit covers farm source pollution, and my Department works with other Departments and agencies on a range of measures to prevent pollution and to improve water quality.

DARD and the DOE are jointly responsible for the implementation of the EU nitrates directive. The directive is implemented across the North by an action programme of measures that was first introduced in 2007. The purpose is to prevent water pollution from agricultural sources and to ensure that manures and chemical fertilisers are used efficiently. The current nitrates action programme for 2015-18 was agreed by the Executive in November 2014.

My Department also works in close partnership with the DOE, other Departments and stakeholders on the implementation of the water framework directive. This EU directive aims to deliver long-term sustainability for the water environment and covers all sectors that have an impact on water. Implementation is through river basin management plans, which have been agreed by the Executive.

My Department has also worked with a number of Departments on a long-term water strategy for the North of Ireland. The strategy is cross-cutting, and I expect it to come to the Executive for agreement in the coming months.

River pollution requires ongoing action. My Department has demonstrated that it is working in a joined-up way to address farm source pollution and to improve water quality.

Lord Morrow: It is obvious that no one area or sector of industry is the culprit here. The Minister said that her Department is doing things to ensure that the matter is tackled. Does she agree that it is time for new initiatives to ensure collective responsibility and for the matter to be tackled in a very direct way, which does not seem to be the case at present?

Mrs O'Neill: I agree that partnership working is key for all the sources from which pollution may occur. I have set out clearly my Department's responsibility. We have worked collectively and cooperatively with other Departments, particularly on the nitrates programme and the water framework directive. The Rivers Agency obviously works in a joined-up way with a range of Departments and councils. Where there is room to improve, I am always open to that. If the Member has any ideas that he wants to bring forward or has other initiatives that we are not actively involved with, I am very happy to take those suggestions on board. As I said, a range of activity is ongoing with Departments, councils and Rivers Agency staff. Collectively, we can continue to work together to make sure that we target people who are deliberately polluting water courses and causing all sorts of problems. However, as I said, we need to have a cross-departmental approach to the issue.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her answers. What action has been taken to assist farmers' compliance with the regulations?

Mrs O'Neill: A range of guidance documents to assist farmers to comply with the nitrates action programme and other EU environmental regulations has been produced by DARD and DOE and has been distributed to farmers.

The College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE) provides an ongoing programme of training workshops for farmers, including coverage of the nitrates action programme and farm waste. The workshops are open to all farmers. In addition, a series of online support tools are available to help farmers to comply with the requirements of the nitrates action plan regulations. These cover nitrogen loading, nutrient management and manure storage calculators.

DARD also provides a code of good agricultural practice for the prevention of water, air and soil pollution. The code gives practical guidance to farmers on pollution control and serves as a reference document for those involved in providing pollution control advice to farmers. The DARD farm advisory service newsletter is published biannually and is issued to all farmers. It includes key advisory messages relating to the nitrates action programme and the water framework directive. My Department also regularly issues advisory press articles on manure management and water quality.

Mr McCarthy: I welcome the Minister's response. River pollution, or any pollution of our environment, must never be tolerated. Will the Minister join with the Alliance Party, which has been calling for years for an independent environmental agency, so that that can be introduced and we can overcome these problems once and for all?

Mrs O'Neill: The Environment Agency comes under the remit of the Department of the Environment, and it is about to go out to consultation on that matter. There will be an opportunity for us all to consider the best way forward on the basis of the information provided as part of that consultation process.

Rural Proofing Bill

2. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the rural proofing Bill. (AQO 8970/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I am pleased to advise that I propose to introduce the Rural Needs Bill, which was previously referred to as the Rural Proofing Bill, to the Assembly on 9 November 2015. The Bill is designed to promote a fair and inclusive rural society by introducing a duty on government and local councils to consider the needs of our rural dwellers when developing policies and delivering public services. I will be working hard to ensure that this new legislation can complete its passage in the current Assembly mandate.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. What powers and provisions will the Rural Needs Bill contain?

Mrs O'Neill: The Bill is aimed at ensuring the fair and equitable treatment of rural communities in the policymaking process. It will build on the existing arrangements, for example, through placing the Executive's existing commitment on a statutory footing and by improving the promotion and monitoring of rural proofing.

It is proposed that the Bill will contain the following provisions in line with the final policy proposals agreed by the Executive: the introduction of a statutory duty on Departments and councils to consider the needs of people living in rural areas when developing new policies, strategies and plans or revising existing ones and when designing and delivering public services or making changes to the way in which they are delivered; the power to make regulations to extend the Bill to non-departmental public bodies as may be specified in such regulations; the power for DARD to support rural proofing and the implementation of the Bill through the provision of training, advice and guidance; a requirement for DARD to produce regular monitoring reports to be laid before the Assembly whereby DARD would seek and collate information from all Departments on how they have considered the social and economic needs of people who live in rural areas; and the provision for Departments and councils to make arrangements for cooperation and collaboration to help to ensure a more consistent and cohesive approach to addressing the needs of rural dwellers.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for that update. What is her assessment of the legislative proposals from the Department of the Environment with regard to newly qualified young drivers and the restriction of carrying passengers and the assertion that the proposal did not need to be rural proofed? What is her position on that?

Mrs O'Neill: I am bringing the legislation forward because I believe that all proposals, strategies, policies and decisions taken at central and local government level need to be rural proofed. Like me, the Member represents a rural constituency, and we know the challenges that there are, particularly for young people who, perhaps, are employed and could be working until 11.00 pm and who are trying to get home with public transport not being readily available. There are particular challenges posed as a result of the DOE legislation that has been put on the table.

I am bringing forward legislation in order to protect against those decisions being taken in future without due consideration being given to the needs of rural people.

Mr Rogers: Minister, what discussions have you had with other members of the Executive to improve decision-making in other Departments on rural proofing? I am thinking particularly about residential homes. When I look at the consultation, I see little emphasis placed on the rural-proofing aspect.

Mrs O'Neill: Again, that is why we need to have legislation. Rural dwellers need to be confident that, when policy decisions are being taken by decision makers in government, their needs are being reflected. I am concerned that, although rural proofing has been in place for quite a number of years, it has not been consistent to date. It has not been applied across the board, and some Departments are better than others at making sure that it happens. I think that the legislation will strengthen that and, when I lay a report each year before the Assembly, it will clearly put that on record. We will be able to see at first hand how Departments have actively engaged and how they have actively rural-proofed policy decisions. I believe that that will lead to improvements in the longer term for rural dwellers.

Rural Development Programme

3. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what steps will she take to ensure that Northern Ireland rural development programme 2014-2020 funding is equitably distributed between the Protestant and Catholic communities. (AQO 8971/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: A full equality impact assessment (EQIA) of the rural development programme (RDP) 2014-2020 was carried out in 2013. That included a 16-week public consultation period. The equality assessment was finalised as part of the submission of the rural development programme and associated documents to the European Commission on 14 October 2014 and is available on the DARD website.

Our aim is to ensure equality of opportunity for all applicants to the RDP. The distribution of funds will depend on the number and quality of eligible applications and how best they fit the objectives of their respective schemes. For land-based schemes such as the areas of natural constraint (ANC) scheme, funding will depend on the nature and type of land. The EQIA set out a number of mitigating actions to ensure equality of opportunity for potential beneficiaries. Those were structured around each of the section 75 groups examined as part of the EQIA. An equality action plan has been drafted, and it has aligned the EQIA mitigating recommendations against key areas of programme implementation. The action plan will be updated biannually in advance of the programme monitoring committee on the actions taken for each process. That should help ensure that the mitigating actions recommended in the EQIA are considered during further programme development and implementation.

Mr Campbell: The Minister has outlined the EQIA process, but is she aware that, in the Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council area, for example, where the local action group (LAG) delivers rural development programme funding, the councillor make-up is broadly reflective of the political and religious breakdown but the social partners are not, given that 80% of the social partners are from the nationalist community in an area that is probably 75% unionist? Will she ensure that consideration is given to community background when ascertaining in future the composition of local action groups, because delivery of funding flows from those groups?

Mrs O'Neill: I am sure that the Member will be aware of the LEADER approach, which is very much a bottom-up approach. The people who came forward for the LAGs on the ground came from the grassroots and the community. They are made up of people who came forward. Obviously, we want things to be reflective, but, for me, what is most important in the rural development programme is that we get that funding out and deliver projects for rural people as a whole. It does not matter what background you have.

I cannot comment specifically on the make-up of the LAG that you referred to, but I can say that I know that every effort was made to make sure that the groups were inclusive as possible and that we looked to groups that were under-represented. I am delighted that, this time around, we have more women and more young people. That was something that we did not have in the previous programme, so there has been very much a positive sea change in the membership of the groups. As I said, it is very much a grassroots-up approach. The people came from the community and were chosen for the local action groups, and I think that they are reflective of the people who came forward. Obviously, we want all our groups to be inclusive, and we want to make sure that the people who are making the decisions are reflective of the community. I think that that is the case with all the LAGs that have been appointed to date.

Mr Dallat: I pay tribute to the rural development programme for the work that has been done. Will the Minister agree that the needs and aspirations of the rural community are far greater than to be described in sectarian headcount terms? Will she outline how the business communities, Protestant and Catholic, if we have to use those terms, will benefit from the rural development programme between now and 2020?

3.00 pm

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I very much concur with what the Member said. I think that what is most important is that we spend every single penny of this European funding to the best effect for rural communities as a whole. I look forward to being able to open a number of the schemes over the next number of months. This is the largest ever rural development programme that we have had in the North of Ireland. There is up to £623 million of funding, £250 million of which is for our farm business improvement scheme. We have the rural business investment scheme, which will be opened very shortly. We also have tourism measures and basic services for communities. There is such a range of fantastic schemes coming online over the next number of months. My priority is to work with the LAGs to make sure that they sign off on the strategies, which we hope to have completed by the end of the year so that we can very quickly see the spend. I absolutely agree with you. What is most important in this programme is that we get the spend out there and help rural communities in their entirety, regardless of what their background may be.

Mr Dickson: Minister, do you agree with me that the most important aspect of the programme is ensuring that those entitled to receive the funds do so and that there is not some form of sectarian headcount, as has been produced in the question? In fact, do you not find the question offensive and counter to any Building a United Community strategy of the Executive?

Mrs O'Neill: I do agree with you. As I said, I think that what is most important here is that we spend every single penny to best effect to enhance rural communities and businesses and to look after our environment and our farmers.

Mr Allister: Under the previous programme, it turns out that several million pounds were siphoned off to sporting bodies, most particularly and most generously to the GAA, with Tyrone GAA, said to be one of richest, getting almost £1 million. Given the crisis in front-line farming, what assurances are there this time that rural funding will actually go to meet those front-line and essential needs, rather than being squandered, as happened previously?

Mrs O'Neill: I think that the Member should be careful with his language. There was no siphoning off from any funds from the rural development programme. Anybody who received funding through the rural development programme did so because a panel assessed their application and decided that they were eligible. All funds were spent to the best effect for rural communities right across all the measures that I have already set out. A number of sporting organisations were also able to benefit from the programme, which is right and proper. The GAA, like any other organisation, is at the heart of a rural community. Why should it not be able to benefit if the project that it is providing is for wider community benefit? In the cases that have been assisted with finance, the local action groups, which are made up of political representatives and community sector individuals who have come forward, have taken decisions and used to best effect the funding that they have been allocated. They have decided, within the rules of the programme, that those funding applications were eligible and have funded them accordingly.

Animal Cruelty: Tougher Sentences

4. Mr Clarke asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline any representations she has made to introduce tougher sentences for people convicted of animal cruelty. (AQO 8972/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: Following considerable public interest in the enforcement of the Welfare of Animals Act 2011, the Assembly agreed a private Members' motion in March 2014 that called for a review of the implementation of the 2011 Act, particularly sentencing guidelines and practices. The purpose of the review is to ensure that animal welfare enforcement is dealt with effectively.

The Department published an interim report of the review in February 2015, which recommended increasing the maximum sentence and fine on conviction for the more serious summary offences and increasing the maximum prison term in the case of indictable offences. That will mean that the penalties for animal welfare offences here are as tough as or tougher than any that are available in the Twenty-six Counties or in Britain. There was substantial support for the recommendation during the consultation on the interim report.

Primary legislation is needed to amend the 2011 Act to implement that recommendation. DARD does not have any suitable primary legislation available within this mandate. However, given the high level of public support for the recommendation, I wanted to implement it quickly. I therefore wrote to the Justice Minister in July to request that he consider amending the maximum sentences in the 2011 Act through the Justice (No. 2) Bill. The Bill deals with, among other things, fine collection and prison services. The Justice Minister is content to include the necessary provisions in the Justice (No. 2) Bill, and my officials are working with officials in his Department to progress the Bill. It is anticipated that the Bill will be scrutinised by the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee and the Justice Committee in November, and I trust that you will support the amendments to increase the sentences and fines in the Welfare of Animals Act when the Justice (No. 2) Bill comes before the Assembly.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for her answer to my question. Indeed, I welcome her comments. I am sure that she will be all too familiar with the case in my constituency where a member of the public was given a very lenient sentence despite letting her dog hang to death on the ropes of her curtains. I think that the public have got behind this because of that case. In your response, you talked about that the fact that we are coming towards the end of the mandate. Is there a possibility that this can be expedited and brought in as quickly as possible? There is a fear among the community about other people who have treated animals in the appalling way that that lady in Antrim did.

Mrs O'Neill: Obviously, I condemn all acts of animal cruelty, and I think that that was very much reflected in comments we received in response to the public consultation on the interim report. In terms of timescale, the Justice Minister is committed to taking his Justice (No. 2) Bill through the Assembly in this mandate, and my officials are working with him to make sure that the proposed changes to sentencing are included in that Bill.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her response to the Member's question. Can she further clarify, at this point, what the proposed changes to sentencing will entail?

Mrs O'Neill: The interim report of the review of the Welfare of Animals Act recommended that DARD consider increasing the maximum sentences as follows. It was recommended to increase the maximum prison sentence available for those found guilty of the more serious summary offences from six months to 12 months and for the maximum fine to go from £5,000 to £20,000. For indictable offences, the recommendation was to increase the maximum prison sentence for those found guilty on indictment from two years to five years. The maximum unlimited fine would remain unchanged. I propose to amend certain offences, including breaching a disqualification order, selling or parting with an animal pending the outcome of an appeal to a deprivation order and offences relating to images of animal fighting, so that they become a hybrid offence. In the case of unnecessary suffering and animal fighting, which are already hybrid offences, I propose to increase the current penalties on summary conviction to 12 months and/or a fine of £20,000. That will give effect to the recommendations from the review, as those represent the most serious offences under the 2011 Act, and it is appropriate that the penalties available to the Magistrates' Court reflect that.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the announcement today. Does the Minister agree that this is at least one example of two Executive Ministers — her and the Minister of Justice — working together to respond to an issue of serious public concern in increasing the maximum sentence for serious offences to five years? What other provisions might the review of the Welfare of Animals Act bring forward?

Mrs O'Neill: I very much welcome the partnership approach that we have taken. The Justice Minister was in a position to bring forward a Bill that could encompass the changes that we wanted to make. It has worked out very well for us in being able to respond to the public concern and public angst that was there. We will respond to it in a very speedy manner.

In the wider review, we have consulted on the interim report, and the group that was set up to initiate the review is working its way through the final report. We hope to have that over the next number of months. There are practical things that we can be doing on an ongoing basis, and officials are working their way through that.

Rural Development Programme: Capital Grants

5. Mr Eastwood asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline when farmers will be able to apply for capital schemes as part of the rural development programme 2014-2020. (AQO 8973/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: The 2014-2020 rural development programme (RDP) will make a range of capital support measures available to farmers. Those include the business investment scheme, the European innovation partnership operational groups and innovation demonstration scheme, which are all part of the farm business improvement scheme, as well as farm diversification support under the LEADER programme and capital support for agri-environment agreement holders. With the rural development programme now approved by the European Commission, my officials are continuing to work hard to secure the relevant business case approvals and to make the necessary arrangements to open the schemes in a phased way.

The farm business improvement scheme will be a cornerstone of the new RDP and will be a package of measures aimed at knowledge transfer, cooperation and innovation, as well as capital investment, which will help to support sustainable growth in the sector. The first phase of the farm business improvement scheme, which comprises the knowledge transfer schemes, will start with the launch of the business development groups for farmers. The first phase is intended to help farmers to clearly identify their needs ahead of any capital investment and to make informed decisions about developing their businesses. The other farm business improvement schemes will follow in a coordinated manner, including the proposed capital programme that is planned for next year. The knowledge transfer element of the farm business improvement scheme will open in November in preparation for the majority of capital schemes to open in 2016.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does her Department have a preliminary plan in place to deal with those moneys?

Mrs O'Neill: The main plan is that we will get the programmes opened as quickly as possible. The first programme that we will see opened will be the farm business improvement scheme and the development groups. That will open very shortly. That allows us to work with farmers on helping them identify their business plan and their practical needs. Alongside that, as I said, we expect all the capital programmes to come on stream next year, and those include the farm business improvement scheme, the rural business investment scheme and the spend with the local action groups. It is quite an exciting time for rural development in being able to get all those schemes opened. Officials have been working very hard to make sure that we do that as quickly as possible.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as na freagraí a thug sí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. Has her Department engaged in any preparatory work with farmers, as the previous Member asked, in anticipation of opening other schemes or any schemes?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said, the plan is to roll out the farm business scheme in a phased way. The early focus is going to be on making advice and support available to farmers through the knowledge transfer measures. That first phase will open next Monday, with business development groups for farmers to come along to discuss with officials and get help to work through their business needs and discuss the opportunities for capital grants when they come online in the first quarter of next year.

I encourage all farmers to get involved with the business development groups because they will help farmers to improve their knowledge of business management and to look at new technologies and innovative ways of working. DARD is also planning to deliver farm-family key skills training schemes, which will include safety and business planning. These early measures will help farmers to think carefully about their business plans before they make any decisions about capital investment.

The other farm business improvement schemes will follow in a coordinated manner, including the business investment scheme capital programme planned for next year. Any farmer considering making a capital investment may wish to start thinking now about what they might need to do in advance, such as considering the implications of planning and health and safety legislation.

Farmers who are considering construction work should be familiarising themselves with legislation that applies to farm businesses, including the Construction (Design and Management) Regulations 2007. They may also want to check the performance of their business through benchmarking. They can contact CAFRE, which will help them.

Mrs Dobson: Given the interest from farmers, I was concerned about the lack of detail forthcoming from officials who presented to the Agriculture Committee recently. There can be little doubt that the capital grants scheme will be of most interest to the sector. Can the Minister detail some specific points identified in this year's whole farm needs assessment?

Mrs O'Neill: Officials were in front of the Committee last week. There was a detailed engagement in terms of going forward. We have a high number of schemes that we are trying to develop and get business plans passed for. We have been working our way through that.

The farm business improvement scheme and capital grants scheme are what most farmers are looking to, as capital investment will help them to invest in being more efficient and productive. That will not come on stream until next year, which is why there is no scheme detail out there. However, that will be forthcoming in an appropriate and timely manner.

I am now encouraging farmers to get involved with the business development groups because we have set this out in a phased approach. First, it is a matter of working with farmers on a practical basis to identify their needs to develop business plans. Then it will be about knowledge transfer and exchange, working with CAFRE advisers. The third phase will be the capital grants scheme.

As information becomes available, we will certainly be providing it. We are not going to leave anyone in the dark. I want to make sure that farmers avail themselves of the scheme when it becomes available in the early part of next year.

The Department carried out the farm needs assessment to improve the design of the farm business improvement scheme. We received over 2,500 responses, so that was positive in terms of farmers wanting to be part of the process. That was important for us to be able to design the scheme.

There is no attempt to hold back information. Farmers will have it as soon as I have it to give them. As I said in answer to Ian Milne, the first phase — the business development scheme — will open next Monday. That is positive, and I encourage all farmers to get involved with that first tranche.

Omagh Veterinary Laboratory

6. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, following the implementation of the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute's strategic review, to outline the future of the Omagh veterinary laboratory. (AQO 8974/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: There are no plans to close the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute's (AFBI) Omagh site. However, a number of efficiency measures will be implemented.

AFBI's 2020 strategy proposed the centralisation of ancillary veterinary laboratory testing at its Stoney Road site, just outside the Stormont Estate. This proposal would enable a modest reduction in staffing requirements at AFBI's laboratory facilities in Omagh, while maintaining the existing range and geographic coverage of disease diagnostic services to the livestock industry.

AFBI proposes to move the preparation of microscopic slides of animal tissues to Stoney Road and return them to Omagh for examination and reporting. It will also centralise all parasitological examination work at Stoney Road. That will produce savings while continuing to provide laboratory services from the Omagh facility to livestock owners and vets.

As these are internal AFBI efficiency measures, I had no reason to raise any concerns. As such, I accepted AFBI's proposals for how it manages the services it delivers from the Omagh site.

3.15 pm

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does the Minister recognise that it is very important for the farming community in the counties of Derry, Tyrone and Fermanagh that we have post-mortems carried out on animals, be they cattle, sheep, pigs or hens? Does she recognise that it is important that enough investment is retained to make sure that we have a viable service going forward?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. As I said, while AFBI will make some modest savings at the Omagh plant, I am glad that, as part of its decisions on the way forward, it has decided to continue to provide the laboratory services there, which will assist livestock owners and vets from all the areas that you have referred to.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. Can the Minister outline her vision for the future of the AFBI estate?

Mrs O'Neill: Work is ongoing with AFBI to establish the future of the AFBI estate based on its strategic vision and scientific priorities. AFBI's 2020 strategy contains its costed proposals to address its budget pressures for the year ahead and the rest of the decade, including proposals that are relevant to the future consolidation and rationalisation of AFBI's estate. An initial outline business case for the capital investment required to relocate AFBI's headquarters facilities from Newforge and to consider the future of the Loughgall facilities has been prepared and is being refined further to incorporate feedback from DFP in the context of AFBI's 2020 strategy. A master plan for the farm buildings at the AFBI Hillsborough estate is being developed. It is envisaged that there will be a consolidation, replacement and modernisation programme.

Suffice to say that AFBI has taken a look at how it conducts its work. It has developed very much a shrink-to-grow strategy. We can work collectively with AFBI to make sure that we have a very strong scientific base going into the future that will assist and work with the industry to identify its needs, including research needs.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Time is up. That brings us to the end of listed questions. We now move to topical questions.

Supply Chain: Large Retailers

T1. Mr Buchanan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what discussions she has had with the large retailers, given the unfairness that still exists within the supply chain, with farmers being squeezed. (AQT 3051/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I totally agree with you about the supply chain. There is a need for fairness in the supply chain. The Member will know that I have consistently raised that point. At the centre of the Going For Growth strategy from its inception has been the fact that there needs to be recognition of that one supply chain and that everybody along that supply chain needs to enjoy the risks and the benefits that come from that more joined-up approach. I hosted the first supply chain forum in the last number of weeks. That saw representatives from right across the industry, including the major retailers, discussing how we can start to build trust and repair relationships that have absolutely broken down and how we can collectively work together. I am going to continue to drive forward that piece of work, because I think that it is absolutely key. I regularly meet the major retailers and make the point that, if they want to have the fantastic, first-class product that our farmers produce into the future, they need to make sure that our farmers receive a fair price for the product that they receive.

Mr Buchanan: I welcome the actions that the Minister has been taking but, to date, we have not really seen much on the ground for the supplier at the farm gate. Can the Minister advise what comfort we can give to the farming community that action is being taken that will see their price at the farm gate reach a proper level that makes it sustainable for them?

Mrs O'Neill: The Member is very aware that pricing is something that is outside the control of government. However, within government, we can take forward the initiatives that we are actively involved with, which I have already set out. Farmers can be in no doubt about my role. My role is to champion the needs of the farmer, and that is what I bring to any conversation that I have with retailers. However, if we do not correct the supply chain problem, farmers are going to be the ones that are continually pushed on the price that they receive. That is why we need to have this sea change in attitudes right across the supply chain. If we can look afresh at how the supply chain works and how the ongoing communication works right across the supply chain, perhaps we will see changes for the farming industry further down the line. I certainly make sure that I raise that point. I am very passionate about raising that point. I believe that Going For Growth as a strategy is only successful if there is that fairness in the supply chain.

River Lagan: Gravel Removal

T2. Ms Hanna asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to advise whether DARD and the Rivers Agency have restored the river bed at the Sir Thomas and Lady Dixon Park or reimbursed the Lagan Canal Trust, given that she will be aware of the removal last month of a lot of gravel from the bed of the River Lagan at that location in south Belfast and the impact that that has had on salmon spawning there and the risk of increased winter flooding. (AQT 3052/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I do not believe that the Rivers Agency needs to reimburse. I do not have all the details of that scenario, but I had a conversation with the Rivers Agency about it last week. There was very much a partnership approach. The council and others were involved in the project. The Rivers Agency did not feel that it was at fault, but I am happy to write to the Member with more details on the next steps. We do not want to interfere with the spawning of salmon and want to make sure that that process is ongoing.

Ms Hanna: On the back of that, the angling clubs are concerned that there is miscommunication between DARD, DCAL and them. Has the Minister any suggestions on what mechanisms might be put in place to address that communications imbalance?

Mrs O'Neill: Inland fisheries are DCAL's responsibility. However, in this instance, the Rivers Agency was involved in the work on the banks of the Lagan, so I am very open to a conversation with the CAL Minister if there is a need for that. We took action last week on the back of what happened. I was approached by local media, who raised the issue with me. We will not be found wanting in working together if that is what is needed to make sure that we correct the problem.

Farming: Cross-border Collaborative Work

T3. Mr McCartney asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, while mindful of other questions that have been asked, particularly on issues that affect the farming community, to outline the extent of the collaborative work that takes place between and among farmers across the island of Ireland. (AQT 3053/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: We work collectively on a range of areas. We deal with a lot of issues at North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meetings. Even outside those, we continually address a number of issues, particularly CAP, mapping exercises and areas of natural constraint (ANC) designation. We have been working together on the development of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy; the plant health strategy; the Loughs Agency; country-of-origin labelling; fish diseases; fisheries; research and development cooperation; the equine industry; pillar 2 knowledge transfer groups; the all-island rural innovation awards; the Forest Service; veterinary medicines; agricultural emissions; and multi-agency livestock crime liaison and legislation enforcement issues. A range of issues are taken forward on an ongoing and daily basis not only at official level but between Minister Coveney and me.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answer, including the comprehensive range of issues that have been of benefit to farming and rural communities. Will she take this opportunity to give us an update, particularly on labelling and how that has helped farmers across the island?

Mrs O'Neill: I am pretty concerned about labelling, and have been for some time. I continually raise the issue at European level and with Minister Coveney. When I last met him on 2 July, he indicated that he would also liaise with the commissioner regarding terms on labels that would be deemed acceptable, explore the use of an "island of Ireland" label and subsequently issue guidelines to the industry. I have since written to the Minister seeking an update on progress and additional voluntary labelling for meat packaging. I will keep the Member informed of any progress. It is important that we resolve the issue. It affected the lamb sector this year and beef last year. It will have a trickle-down effect on all sectors, so, if we are able to address the issue of voluntary labels with wording that might say, "A product of the island of Ireland", it would allow us to continue traditional trade on the island and look towards new markets collectively.

Basic Farm Payment Cross-compliance Land Inspections

T4. Mr Irwin asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline her Department's time frame for the assessment of basic farm payment cross-compliance land inspections by local offices. (AQT 3054/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have any specific time frame with me, but, suffice it to say, we are trying to meet our targets and get the maximum number of farmers paid in December. We are working towards that, and inspections are ongoing. As soon as inspection findings are received, the intention is to turn them around as quickly as possible. As I said, I want to make sure that we pay the maximum number of people in the first payment batch, which goes out in the first week in December.

Mr Irwin: I received information today that land inspections that took place in June have, five months later, still not been assessed. Does the Minister believe that that is timely?

Mrs O'Neill: I have no information to suggest that that is the case. If you want to pick up the matter with me outside of Question Time, that is not a problem.

Rural Development Programme: Cross-border Opportunities

T5. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline what cross-border opportunities will be developed through the roll-out of the new rural development programme. (AQT 3055/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: The LEADER scheme of the new rural development programme, which will be delivered by the newly formed local action groups (LAGs), contains a 7% focus on cross-border cooperation. My Department will be working closely with the new LAGs to develop cross-border projects that may focus on tourism, recreation and the development of social enterprises.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Will each LAG be compelled to develop cross-border projects? Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, it is mandatory for each LAG to develop at least two cross-border projects. A joint North/South conference is proposed for January to assist LAGs in establishing partnerships so that they can share ideas, look at best practice and, hopefully, identify worthy and worthwhile projects that they can take forward in each of their respective areas.

Basic Farm Payment Cross-compliance Land Inspections

T6. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development how many basic farm payment land inspections her Department has carried out by classic and remote sensing this year. (AQT 3056/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have the figures on me, but I am happy to provide the Member with them. He will know that we have been ramping up the number of remote sensing inspections each year. We may have had up to 2,500 this year, but I will confirm that with you in writing.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for her answer. She indicated that she wants to increase the number of inspections carried out by remote sensing. What methods are you using to do that?

Mrs O'Neill: Going out and doing our inspections by remote sensing is an internal measure for the Department. Obviously, it is important that we get the photography — there is a word for it — and all such things right. The benefit of us being able to increase the number year on year is that we can get more people paid in the first batch in December. This year we hope to repeat that experience. We should eventually get to the stage where all inspections are done by remote sensing, which will speed everything up.

Areas of Natural Constraint Scheme

T7. Mr Lynch asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline her future intentions for the areas of natural constraint (ANC) scheme. (AQT 3057/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: As part of the decisions on CAP reform in June 2014, I announced that a payment would be made to farmers in severely disadvantaged areas (SDAs) from the rural development programme Pillar II under an ANC scheme. That would operate for two years — 2016 and 2017 — and be reviewed thereafter.

Work has just commenced on looking at the future options for supporting those areas, and my intention is to advance the consultation by 31 March to enable any potential changes to the architecture of the CAP regime in the 2016-17 period to be notified to the EU Commission before its deadline of 1 August 2016.

Mr Lynch: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answer. What was the value of ANC payments this year?

Mrs O'Neill: The most recent payments, which were made in March of this year, equated to £23·81 per hectare for disadvantaged areas and common land, and £47·62 per hectare for severely disadvantaged areas.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Chris Hazzard and Mr Paul Givan are not in their places.

Horse Mussel Beds: Strangford Lough

T10. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the good health or otherwise of the horse mussel beds in Strangford lough. (AQT 3060/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: The Member will know that my officials met the Commission and informally accepted a number of actions that it felt were necessary to deal with our responsibilities under the habitats directive. He will also know that the Commission was content with the scheme that we put forward and that things have been running very smoothly. Obviously, the situation is continually reviewed, but the Commission has formally advised us that, as a result of the progress that has been made, it is content.

The Strangford lough fishing licences are reviewed and awarded annually, with the aim of establishing an environmentally and economically sustainable fishery in the lough. Obviously, the health of the horse mussel is key to that, so it is a very positive picture.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for that answer. She is attributing a great deal of knowledge to me that I do not have, because I am not on the Agriculture Committee.

The last time I asked about this, we were talking about horse mussel beds being the size of a table-tennis table when they should have been the size of a football pitch. When you talk about progress — as you say, the Commission appears to be moderately satisfied — are we still at risk of infraction proceedings if that progress does not continue?

Mrs O'Neill: We are not at risk in that the Commission is content with the proposals that we have put forward. When I say “the picture is positive”, it is more positive than it was. We have a revised restoration plan in place that is all about protecting the horse mussel. We have fishery restrictions, which, as you may remember, were in place in Strangford lough.

All the initiatives that are being taken are to protect the horse mussel and to make sure that we live up to our obligations and are not fined. We do not believe that the Commission has any intention of fining us at this time.

Mental Health

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly recognises that mental ill health affects one in four people every year; further recognises the importance of having quality services that are fairly resourced, trained staff to afford early access and support, and a focus on prevention, resilience and mental well-being; recognises the importance of rehabilitation, with clear objectives established for accessing mental health professionals, within 28 days and close to home; further recognises the importance of raising awareness, reducing stigma and discrimination in relation to mental ill health; and calls for the Executive to work in collaboration to make dealing with mental ill health a top Programme for Government priority. — [Mr McKinney.]

Mr Easton: I beg to move the following amendment:

Insert after third “health;”

“urges broad support for the urgent implementation of the world-class mental trauma service announced by the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in September;”.

I thank the proposer of the motion for bringing it to the House for debate.

It is widely recognised that Northern Ireland has higher levels of mental ill health than any other region of the United Kingdom. It is estimated that one in four adults across Northern Ireland suffers from a form of mental ill health at some stage of their life. Mental illness does not discriminate, as it affects many people from all walks of life. Despite better outcomes from treatment for mental illness, there is still a stigma attached to it that prevents people from coming forward for help. More needs to be done to do away with that stigma and to encourage people to come forward, as well as to find and deliver the best services that we can to tackle mental ill health.

The Bamford review set in motion some of the most significant changes ever seen in mental health services. Those changes have transformed how we care for people with a mental illness and have significantly improved outcomes for many. The Bamford vision is to treat people in the community, close to their friends and family, and for inpatient care to be provided only for acute cases in which someone needs to be detained for their own safety and well-being. At the time of the Bamford review, we were spending 60% of the mental health budget on hospital services and 40% on community services; we now spend 44% on hospital services and 56% on community services. That is what Transforming Your Care is all about: care in the community.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

As Bamford has been rolled out, we have seen improvements in how we treat, handle and help those with mental ill health. In 2014, the Department launched the regional mental healthcare pathway, You in Mind, to commit the health service to delivering care that is more personalised and improves the experience of people with mental health problems. The trusts provide a range of services — including psychology, psychotherapy, cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) and trauma therapy — that promote mental health and well-being. As we deliver services that are recovery-orientated and move away from reliance on drugs towards providing people with access to psychological and cognitive behavioural or talking therapies, we see that the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and the Public Health Agency (PHA) are delivering joined-up services on how mental health services, GPs and other primary care providers and hospitals can get better at making earlier interventions and moving people from long-stay hospital wards to community-based arrangements.

The Department published a stepped-care service model for child and adolescent mental health services (CAMHS) that promotes a more consistent, person-centred approach to mental health service delivery for children and young people. To reduce stigma, the Public Health Agency is working in partnership with the Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health (NIAMH) to deliver a future wide-ranging, three-year anti-stigma programme. There is also cooperation at cross-departmental level, with the ministerial coordination group on suicide prevention. The Department is working with DARD and DCAL on a joint initiative on awareness and help-seeking behaviour through rural networks and sporting organisations. That is Departments working together. We also have the Mental Capacity Bill, currently at Committee Stage, which sees the Justice and Health Departments working together in partnership.

That brings me, finally, to my amendment, which urges broad support for the urgent implementation of the world-class mental trauma service announced by the Health Minister in September. What will it do? It started with discussions in the Stormont House Agreement implementation group, which considered proposals to implement the agreement's commitment to establish a comprehensive mental trauma service in the health service. That was discussed by all the political parties that were in the Executive at that time. If agreed fully, it will lead to a better joined-up service that will provide opportunities for Departments, organisations and groups across sectors to share expertise and resources, ultimately benefiting service users.

I urge the House not to divide on the issue. I believe that we want the same things and the same outcomes. Let us show that we can unite on this very important issue. The amendment, I believe, strengthens the motion.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important topic, and I welcome the Minister back to his desk. I hope that we will see some direct action coming from today's debate and the many others that are coming in front of it and behind it. It is important that we move mental health further up the political agenda with a clear strategic investment. It goes without saying that that is long overdue. Two recent reports — one from Queen's University and the other from the University of Ulster — have painted that in stark terms. The report from Queen's does not make easy reading in some regards. It highlights key issues of underfunding, a deeply fragmented system and concerns regarding children and young people's services. As a society, we must take note of that and act on it.

In recent years, there has been an increasing recognition of mental ill health, and it is becoming a major public health issue. It is now regarded as one of the four most significant causes of ill health and disability. It is estimated that one in four people in the North has a mental health problem. There is evidence that mental health problems are 25% higher here than in England. Despite that, between 2008 and 2014, the actual spend on mental health services by trusts was around 25% less than was previously proposed, while spending in areas like primary care increased.

There are key messages in both reports about how we treat people as people. There are concerns, particularly in the Queen's report, about how service users are perceived by the system. The report highlights fragmentation across the system and poor communication between parts of the system, and it states that services have become very separate from each other and are very much working in silos. Care respondents frequently mentioned poor communication between different professionals, specialisms and facilities and often:

"had to fight to receive the appropriate level of services".

We must also respond to concerns about young people. I quote the Queen's research:

"When a 14 year old won't open up, or talk, there is nothing for them. They are completely abandoned and left to their own devices, even when parents are begging for help".

I want to make specific reference to the impact on mental health for those who have suffered sexual abuse. In 2012-13, there were 1,948 sexual offences in the North. If the core problem of psychological trauma is addressed at an earlier age, the victim is less likely to suffer the wider health implications that can arise from sexual trauma — another area of work that it would be wise for us to take note of.

The Children's Law Centre pointed to research that shows that there has been a significant increase in the number of children and young people with mental health needs. It is estimated that 10% of children between five and 15 years old have a significant mental health issue. In the last 25 years, there has been a 70% increase in the number of teenagers with depression and anxiety. As far back as 1999, the Chief Medical Officer recognised that children and young people in the North would suffer significant mental health problems before their eighteenth birthday.

A number of recommendations flow from the reports, one of which calls for the mental health budget to be ring-fenced. Another one calls for a mental health champion. I also acknowledge the recent work by Professor Siobhan O'Neill examining the link —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Will the Member bring her remarks to a close?

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: — between suicide and mental health. There are clear lessons for all of us in both reports, and I appeal to the Minister, in his response today —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is up.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: — to commit to taking action on a proper mental health strategy with decent and fitting investment.

Mr Nesbitt: I begin with early apologies: I have a meeting at 4.00 pm elsewhere on the estate that, I think, will cause me to leave the Chamber earlier than I would have wished. I support the motion as amended, and, if time permits, I will return to the amendment.

My interest in mental health and well-being started at home, 21 years ago, when my wife suffered a serious mental health and well-being issue. It has not made me an expert by any stretch of the imagination — I do not claim that — but it has made me very aware of certain issues, not least the stigma that still surrounds mental health and well-being. If one of the 108 MLAs arrived in the Building with a broken arm, the other 107 would approach to ask, “What happened?” and “How can I help?”. With mental health, the exact opposite happens: the instinct is not to mention it and to stay clear. There is no logical reason for that sort of stigma in 2015.

I hugely admire my wife for her public contribution to this debate, not least in tackling the stigma and saying to others that it is OK to speak publicly about poor mental health and well-being issues. It encourages me to ask the other parties in the Chamber whether they will support the Ulster Unionists in calling for a mental health champion. Victims and survivors have a champion; older people have a champion; and children and young people have a champion: why not those suffering from poor mental health and well-being? I am not calling for a big commission or £1 million per annum. This can be done with a negligible impact on the public purse, but it would send out a hugely positive message to all those suffering from poor mental health and well-being.

The Chair of the Health Committee has already referred to the huge scale of the problem in Northern Ireland. I believe that globally, on a per capita basis, Northern Ireland may have the worst mental health and well-being on the planet. We are certainly up there with the likes of Israel and Lebanon, and nobody can be in any doubt that it is one of the most toxic legacies of the Troubles. Take a map of the Troubles hotspots measured in shootings, murders, bombings and the rest, as The Cost of the Troubles Study did in 1999, and you have a very clear picture. Then, take a contemporaneous map of poor mental health in Northern Ireland in terms of alcohol abuse, drug addiction and attempted and completed suicides: effectively, you have a match. There is no doubt — the evidence is there that this is a legacy issue for us.

I support the motion, not least because it recognises the need to make help available as close to home as possible. As a victims' commissioner, I spent time with a man from Fermanagh who used to come up to Maryfield for cognitive behavioural therapy. His daughter, who drove him there, said that, as they left to head back to Fermanagh, he was in great form, but, by the time they got off the motorway, she could sense him slipping back. When they hit Augher, Clogher and Fivemiletown, he was nearly as bad as when they had left. This kind of medicalised help — that sort of intervention — needs to be as close to the front room as possible.

I mentioned the amendment, and, because it urges us to offer broad support to the Minister of Health's initiative, I can support it. I cannot give it any further support because as yet we lack the detail. The Minister would acknowledge that all he did was task senior officials to look at what might constitute a world-class mental trauma service. I am glad that he is looking at that. It is, of course, a commitment in the Stormont House Agreement of 23 December last year. I will certainly support him if he puts forward solid proposals for a world-class mental trauma service.

To my mind, if we are to tackle this as we should, the solution is not purely a medicalised one.

We need to look at the societal interventions out there that can be copied so that the tens of thousands of people who woke up this morning feeling no real purpose in their lives can find that purpose —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Nesbitt: — can start living fulfilled lives and go to bed with a sense of achievement. That is the prize.

3.45 pm

Mr McCarthy: I am happy to support the motion and the amendment on behalf of the Alliance Party. The motion is not dissimilar to one that I brought to the House on 28 April 2014, which we got full support for. I welcome our Health Minister to the Chamber and hope that he can give us a positive response at the end of this debate.

It is recognised that around one in four people have mental health conditions or problems. Unfortunately, that is more prevalent in Northern Ireland, and the legacy of the Troubles is a particular factor. At the same time, Northern Ireland spends less per head of the population on mental health than other jurisdictions. I acknowledge that some positive changes have occurred in the quality of and access to services, and that there has been some rebalancing of mental health expenditure from acute inpatient services towards the delivery of services in the community. Nevertheless, we are still investing a lower share of health spending on mental health in general compared with other regions. Pressure remains on some areas in particular, such as psychological therapies and child and adolescent mental health services.

Mental health services remain the Cinderella of the health service, which is a shame. They remain underfunded in comparison with services for physical illness, and there is considerable underfunding here in comparison with the rest of the UK. This systemic under-resourcing of mental health services is perhaps the clearest example of the reality that we do not have the balance of funding in our health service correct at this time. We urgently need to reassess our priorities and reach out to people like Margaret Gibson, who recently wrote to a morning newspaper to plead with MLAs — that is us; all of us — to listen and to provide her and her family with a proper mental health service.

Addressing mental health issues is more than just an issue for the Department of Health but for the Executive as a whole. The Bamford review of mental health and learning disabilities, as has been mentioned, provides the overarching framework for addressing mental health issues in our society. I welcome the Executive-wide Bamford action plan 2012-15 and support its full implementation. However, I remember that, when the Bamford report was launched, no extra funding was provided. Perhaps that is why we are suffering today.

One key component of Bamford is the Mental Capacity Bill, as has been mentioned. That legislation is now moving through its Committee Stage. It offers the prospect of Northern Ireland becoming a world leader through having a single statutory framework for decision-making and care for physical and mental health conditions. Our Department of Justice is jointly working with the Health Department, and we all wish to see a speedy end and a good result. Time is tight in which to get that legislation through before this Assembly term ends. Unfortunately, the process has been held up due, I maintain, to the absence of a Minister, which prevented the Department from responding to requests from the Committee. Any further delays would result in a real missed opportunity, not least as this legislation has been under development for almost a decade. I would be grateful if the Minister would give the Assembly an assurance that all efforts will be made to ensure that the legislation can pass through all its stages before the Assembly winds up next year.

Concern has been expressed at the potential cost of implementing the mental capacity legislation. It is important that we also understand the implications of not proceeding. Notwithstanding the Executive's financial difficulties, I think that the Minister should also give an assurance that the legislation will proceed and, at the very least, that the Bill or aspects of it will be commenced as circumstances allow.

I also welcome some of the initiatives that have been taken in recent years, including the Executive's economic inactivity strategy and the consultation on a disability employment strategy that was recently published by my colleague the Minister for Employment and Learning, Dr Stephen Farry. If we can help people to stay in work or to access and sustain employment, it would improve their self-esteem and help our economy. We must be clear in our message that many people can continue to lead meaningful lives despite mental health conditions. Addressing discrimination and stigma, as already mentioned, is therefore particularly important.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is up.

Mr McCarthy: It is also important to acknowledge —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is up, please.

Mr McCarthy: — the crucial role played by the voluntary organisations. I commend FASA for its recent opening of the Nightingale project on the Newtownards Road.

Mr G Robinson: In speaking in favour of the amendment, I have to commence from the beginning and say that I hope that the proposers of the motion will agree a budget and allow forward planning by the Minister and all Departments.

As someone who had a close family member suffering from mental health problems a few years ago, I fully appreciate the trauma that the patient and family go through. For whatever reasons, there is a high level of mental health issues every year — about 400,000 in Northern Ireland — and it is a challenge to ensure services that are capable of dealing with that level of need.

The Minister has outlined the world-class mental trauma service in September. I believe that that is the way forward. I would like to pay tribute to the first-class staff who maintain our mental health services. While they deal with the problems of others, it is rarely recognised that they need our support.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Member for giving way. He will know that I have the full support of the current Health Minister on armed forces issues. We are aware of the devastating impact that PTSD has on sufferers and their families but, sadly, many healthcare professionals do not recognise the symptoms, instead using guidelines for schizophrenia and bipolar, resulting in sufferers being turned away, as a Belfast hospital did recently. Does my colleague agree that we must recognise and acknowledge that PTSD as a mental health issue may stand alone, that it disproportionately affects members of our security and armed forces and that the implementation of a mental trauma service would be welcomed by the families as well as by all service users?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member has an additional minute.

Mr G Robinson: I fully agree with Mrs Hale and acknowledge that all pathways to mental health services must be available to serving and ex-serving members of our armed forces. I believe that the Minister will address that particular issue later in the debate.

I ask Members to support mental health today. The best way to do that is to vote for the amended motion. That will give staff and patients a world-class service, which will have clear, strategic goals that will benefit those in need of, and those manning, the service. I welcome an emphasis on prevention, as a preventative model is always better than a curative one.

I would like to say a few words about the stigma attached to mental health. As chair of the all-party group on epilepsy, I have learned how damaging stigma can be for individuals and families. I understand that the same applies in cases where mental illness occurs. The best way to address that is to educate our population as to the need to be proactive with mental illness. Bearing a condition only leads to suspicion and stigma. The sooner a problem is identified, the sooner that work can begin to address the situation and put support in place.

I urge all Members to support the amended motion, as I see it as the best way to provide and continually develop the services required for those with mental health issues.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Today's debate gives clear focus to the issue of mental illness within our society, and I commend the proposers for bringing it forward. It brings home to us the very real truth that probably one in four people are grappling with mental ill health at any given time.

We know that there is a connection between mental ill health and suicide. That can sometimes lead to a person taking the tragic decision to end their own life. Some 280 people per year feel that they have no other choice. Some of those tragic deaths could be avoided if the right services and supports were in place. Early intervention is key to addressing the needs of people who feel isolated, depressed and hopeless.

In that context, it is a matter of grave concern that the services that are offered by Lifeline are under threat, and we have all received lobbying from that organisation to urge us to support its funding being continued. Lifeline is a 24/7 suicide crisis prevention helpline and counselling service. The situation must be addressed to ensure that the lives of people who desperately need that important service are not placed at risk.

On that note, a recent study by Action Mental Health and Queen's University, Belfast has alerted us to the fact that sufferers of mental health conditions are being let down on an ongoing basis due to major reductions in funding to psychiatric support services in the North. Following the research launch a few weeks ago, David Babington, the chief executive of Action Mental Health, flagged up some very salient points. He told us that mental health services here are already underfunded and that further funding cuts mean that people who rely on those services have to wait far longer for the help that they so badly need. While the funding for primary care services has been increased by 136% over the last six years, facilities for mental health provision have suffered a 26% underspend. That is a matter of huge concern.

Officials in the statutory, community and voluntary sectors know only too well that people who use mental health services experience increased social isolation, stigmatisation and total frustration with the lack of provision for their needs. We need to do something about that to ensure that people do not continue to suffer needlessly. The situation is as dire as it could possibly be, and it is clear that there is a real need for the Executive to give a positive reaction to the needs of the sector to address the lack of understanding and investment in resources, education and professional training.

A number of recommendations arose from the study, and it is timely and worthwhile for those to be given genuine consideration. They include: a more secure funding basis for mental health services; the establishment of a regional working group to examine the extent and impact of mental health service fragmentation, including variations in provision between urban and rural settings; the establishment of a mental health champion to renew the Bamford vision; and the need for attention to be given to the role of carers. Other important recommendations include the need for a recovery ethos to be more firmly embedded in the practices of users and carers, for a person-centred approach to be in place and for a relationship-building approach to be central to service delivery. One other very important recommendation is for action to be taken to reduce the stigma that surrounds mental ill health. People have talked at length about that.

The study found that statutory and voluntary sector organisations identified the need for better partnership working between different sectors and service providers. There must be a genuine review of mental health service provision so that a coherent strategy can be produced that will use resources in a way that serves the real needs of sufferers. The role of the community and voluntary sector is crucial in that provision, and the future lies in an effective collaboration between that sector and the statutory agencies so that the widest possible range of providers and approaches are made available for those who need those services.

Several weeks ago, the Health Minister made a very welcome announcement about the setting up of a world-leading mental health service to provide high-quality and effective treatment for people who are experiencing trauma-related mental health problems. He stated that mental ill health is the greatest cause of disability here and much of that relates directly to the conflict. In that regard, a special case has to be made for the North of Ireland so that there is a real recognition of the impact of the conflict and how it has contributed to the high levels —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Ms McCorley: — of mental ill health here.

I urge people to support the motion and that proper strategies are put in place to address mental health issues.

Mr Buchanan: I support the motion and the amendment. While mental health issues have always been branded the Cinderella of the health service, through a lot of good work by charities, and since the Bamford review, things are slowly beginning to change. However, that said, much work is yet to be done.

It is alarming that we are still in a situation in which one in four of the population in Northern Ireland suffer from mental ill health each year. There is no doubt that that will increase, because, unfortunately, more and more young people require those services. I see this trend through my constituency office, as I help families on a regular basis to access services, perhaps for one of their younger family members. It is always a stressful time for the family. They always relax, if you like, when they get somewhere where they know that their child or an older member can go to be treated and well looked after and where they know that is being provided for them. In rural areas, that can sometimes create further difficulties of travelling times and distances. It is therefore vital that appropriate services are in place to provide proper care and support to patients, carers and families affected by mental illnesses, and that such services are readily available and consistent across all trust areas.

4.00 pm

The motion speaks of all the important things that we fully agree with — for instance:

“the importance of having quality services that are fairly resourced, trained staff to afford early access and support, and a focus on prevention, resilience and mental well-being”, and it goes right on to raising awareness and reducing stigma and discrimination in relation to mental health issues. However, one thing that it left out was the implementation of the world-class mental trauma service announced by the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in September. That is the reason why we brought forward the amendment to the motion. The Minister has outlined his vision for Northern Ireland to become a world leader in treating psychological trauma and mental ill health.

As a Member who spoke previously said, there is no doubt that it is a legacy issue. As they grow older, problems and difficulties are created for those who were involved or were victims of the Troubles over the years. They get more and more depressed. Therefore, any service that is provided must be all-inclusive. It must not only be for the citizens of Northern Ireland but include all those who served in the army or other services here.

The key message that we must get out from the House today is that mental illness can be overcome and defeated. There is a stigma out there around mental health and illness which has to be overcome, and that is the clear message that must be sent out from the House. Of course, there are challenges to the mental health sector in rural areas and communities. We can see, and fully understand why, a lot of services are based in urban areas, where the populations tend to be. However, let us look at the more isolated rural communities, such as farming communities, which have suffered over the past years. There has been a lot of pressure on them. We have seen a lot of farmers in despair and at breaking point. Again, it is important that we do not forget those areas but continue to ensure that proper services are provided for them.

Being from west Tyrone, I cannot close my remarks without saying to the Minister that I look forward to him soon making a decision on the second phase for the new acute mental health hospital in Omagh. That acute mental health hospital, to be provided as the second phase of the new building in Omagh, will be a great help to people in the rural west of Northern Ireland.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I speak in favour of the motion and the amendment. In the North, of course, we have significant mental health problems in comparison to other jurisdictions, as has already been said. We have higher rates of suicide. We have, arguably, a higher rate of stigmatisation in areas as well. Stigma increases isolation and makes it much harder for people to come forward to receive treatment and help. Mental health problems face all of us — ourselves as much as anybody else. Much more needs to be done. People need to speak out about their own experiences to help tackle the stigma that hangs over those with such health problems.

Prevention, of course, is much better than cure, which is why it is important to have services not only in the Department of Health but in other Departments. In DE, for example, there is the independent counselling service for schools. It is also important to make the link between mental health problems and physical health and well-being. Ensuring that people live in a safe and healthy environment in terms of their housing and that they have choice in active travel and sports are important health factors. Mental health does not just go into a box but is connected to all those issues, which all have an impact.

I am a rural MLA, and it is concerning that people living in rural areas have significantly less access to vital mental health services than those living in urban areas, so it is important that funding to key groups in rural areas continues. I can think of many such groups in my North Antrim constituency. The Hope Centre in Ballymena helps people recovering from drug addiction and their families, and Solas in Ballycastle was set up in reaction to the rising suicide rate in the Moyle area. It is a community-led mental health and well-being group. Such groups are located in very isolated areas, and any reduction in funding often results in their going to the wall. That always needs to be taken into consideration.

Earlier today, we had a debate about marriage equality and the LGB and T community. That community faces huge mental health and well-being problems because of bullying and intimidation. The rates of self-harm and suicide attempts are absolutely shocking. We can do something about that. It is important to comment on that, because the more that we can change attitudes and views that are based on people's sexual orientation, the greater impact there will be on that community. The earlier debate about marriage equality is very much connected to mental health when it comes to the LGB and T community, and it is worth bearing that in mind.

As others said, strategies need to be put in place to deal with this huge issue. As the Member who has just spoken said, there has been an increase in the number of people accessing these services. That could be for a number of reasons, but I hope that people who previously did not want to be seen accessing these services are doing so now. Stigma is a big issue when it comes to mental health. The more that people such as us — people in leadership positions — talk about their mental health difficulties — we all have issues — the more chance there is of helping to de-stigmatise what is essentially a massive health issue. Somebody in the sector once asked me, "Why do you always talk about having a mental health problem? If you break your leg, you don't go about saying you have a physical health problem". It is a health issue and problem, regardless of whether it is to do with the state of your mind or something physical. All those things are interconnected.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that services need to be rural proofed now more than ever to ensure that the right facilities go into rural areas?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member has an additional minute.

Mr McKay: I absolutely agree with the Member. As a Member for North Antrim, I know how isolated communities can feel. In rural areas, you find that the community steps up to the plate. It happens in urban areas as well, but, when you are a considerable distance from certain health services, you find that the community steps up to the plate. It is vital that those community groups and organisations in places such as Ballycastle, the glens and Ballymena continue to have our full support, because they carry out an important role in preventing greater mental health problems. Often, I do not think that their role in prevention is recognised by a number of Departments.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mr McKay: I urge Members to support the motion and the amendment.

Mrs D Kelly: I begin by paying tribute to the men and women who have forged careers in caring for people with mental ill health and also the carers and families of sufferers. It is no easy task at all and one that largely goes unacknowledged.

Recently, I met some of my former colleagues in the Southern Health and Social Care Trust to discuss mental health services in my constituency, and I was very impressed by the ways of working smarter. Many people are thinking of new and innovative partnerships to try to better meet the needs of sufferers and their families and also, in a very financially constrained climate, to try to do things differently. I understand that there is now a new group of nurses called "nurse prescribers", which is a wonderful initiative. I understand, too, that the Justice Minister is about to sign off on the elements of the domestic and sexual violence strategy for which he is responsible. I urge you also to make that a priority amongst your commitments and priorities over the next few days. I do not think that any of us could not acknowledge the impact that domestic violence has on the lives of children and families with regard to mental ill health. That should be a key priority amongst many, I am sure, that face the Minister.

I also want to touch on workforce planning because I understand that, under mental health terms and conditions, many staff, particularly in the nursing professions, can leave at age 55. Therefore, there needs to be some element of planning to fill those gaps. Having spoken to many of my former colleagues, some of whom have recently retired and some who are planning to do so, I know that we are losing the huge experience and dedication of those staff. They will be difficult to replace. There is also the opportunity to work alongside the Open University with regard to the employment-based route for some support workers and nursing auxiliary-type staff. I urge the Minister to give that consideration as a Programme for Government initiative by himself and the Minister for Employment and Learning.

I want to focus my remarks on looking at dementia services, which are also part of the Minister's very broad portfolio. In 2014-15, in Upper Bann, which is in the Southern Trust area, there were 2,995 referrals. The demand for dementia services rose by 36% in the Southern Trust area alone. I am aware of the Public Health Agency's work to develop a framework strategy for dementia services for Northern Ireland, which is partly funded, I understand, by Atlantic Philanthropies. I hope that, in looking at all those holistic needs, we also look at the need for short breaks and respite services for carers and that particular attention is also paid to the needs of dementia sufferers who are under 65 years of age because, currently, there is no specific specialist provision for that type of service. As we all acknowledge, many people with learning disabilities are living longer. We also see many of them suffering from dementia, maybe from their late forties onwards, so very niche services are needed in the dementia strategy.

As regards young people, adolescents and CAMHS provision, Bamford made specific recommendations on their needs. I do not believe that those have yet been fulfilled. I worked for 22 years in mental health services, and I still have sisters working in the specialties. They tell me about the younger age of chronic alcoholics who are presenting in long-stay hospitals; people in their twenties displaying symptoms that you would have expected to see in someone who had been a chronic alcoholic for 40 or 50 years. That is mind-blowing with regard to needs. We face a number of time bombs across mental ill health.

I acknowledge the post-traumatic stress needs of the security and armed forces, but I think that, tonight, we will learn more about some of the nurses who were at the front line during the years of the conflict. I met an old colleague who broke down after 30 years. She was a nurse who had attended the scene of the Abercorn bomb; another horrific example of our troubled past.

In looking at the issue of post-traumatic stress disorder, I urge the party on the opposite Benches to look not just at the needs of the armed services —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mrs D Kelly: — but at those of all our emergency services.

4.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety —

My apologies: I call Mrs Jo-Anne Dobson.

Mrs Dobson: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. You are forgiven.

I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion. In recent weeks, the Assembly has debated major issues such as patient waiting times, autism and delays in key cancer services. Another issue, however, arguably just as pressing, is our endemic rates of poor mental health and how we, as an Assembly and a society, respond to that.

One in four people in Northern Ireland will experience a form of mental ill health in their life. Let us think about that for a moment: if we think of our family and our friends, one in four is a perturbing figure. Although the issue affects all regions and communities across the UK, we know that there is a 25% higher incidence of mental health problems in Northern Ireland compared with England and Scotland. The total financial cost of mental illness in Northern Ireland is estimated to be in the region of £3 billion annually, with the majority of costs not healthcare-related. Instead, the costs are to reduced economic output, owing to factors such as sickness absence and non-employment. Human costs, however, entail by far the biggest financial loss, in the form of premature death and institutional problems.

Anyone, no matter what age, gender, socio-economic status, life experience or profession can develop mental health problems, and it is often an invisible condition. As constituency MLAs, I am sure that we all know of people who are facing serious mental health issues but who mask their condition, often bottling it up until it becomes just too much to handle. Quite simply, far too many people are being lost to suicide, particularly young people in relatively confined geographic areas.

I pay tribute to the local charities, including MindWise, that do fantastic work, often with very limited resources, with the most vulnerable in our society. Given that suicide remains one of the largest killers in Northern Ireland after cancer and heart disease, it is clear that there is so much more that we need to do. Northern Ireland's suicide rate has almost doubled since 1998, putting us in the top quarter of the global league table of suicide rates. Worryingly, there is a growing body of evidence that suggests that the trend is associated with the Troubles. For instance, the young people who experienced the worst of the violence in the 1970s are the cohort with the highest and most rapidly increasing suicide rates in the decade after 1998.

The Ulster Unionist Party has serious concerns about the Public Health Agency consultation on the future of the Lifeline crisis intervention service. The most well-known feature is, of course, the crisis response helpline, and I am in no doubt whatsoever that it has been a salvation for people experiencing great distress or despair. I ask the Minister directly today to throw that service an urgent lifeline. As the figures for service users prove, it is simply not true to say that the current service is Belfastcentric. In fact, from April 2012 until September this year, there were 1,184 referrals in my constituency of Upper Bann alone. The facts speak for themselves on that important and life-saving issue.

The Appleby report found that Northern Ireland required almost 44% higher per capita funding than England, yet actual spending at the time was between 10% and 30% lower than per capita spending on mental health in England. Michael McGimpsey identified mental health as an area that required additional funding and used the remainder of his time in office to begin delivering just that.

Later, the Bamford review clearly identified the need for improved access to services and for a more coordinated framework for provision to be developed. Frustratingly, however, few of the recommendations have been followed through to completion. It is about time that the Executive and the Department step up to the mark and start giving our local mental health provision the support that it deserves.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Now it is time for the Minister to respond.

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I welcome the debate and the opportunity to participate in it. I welcome the opportunity to focus on mental health, which, as many Members have acknowledged during the debate, has historically been a poor relation in health and social care. As Mr Buchanan mentioned in his contribution, thankfully, things are starting to change. A lot of high-quality, essential work is carried out in our communities and in our hospitals by talented and dedicated people. They very much deserve our respect and our thanks.

We face significant challenges in the arena of mental health: the legacy of the Troubles; an ageing population; areas of deprivation; unemployment; and stress at work. There is barely an element of modern life that does not have the potential to adversely impact upon someone's mental health. As an Executive, we face the challenge of prioritising how we spend finite amounts of public money. One in four adults in Northern Ireland will suffer from a mental health problem at some stage in their life. Northern Ireland has higher levels of mental ill health than any other region in the United Kingdom. The Public Health Agency's 'Making Life Better' strategy, published in 2014, established that Northern Ireland has a 25% higher overall prevalence of mental illness than England.

In the past decade, significant reform and modernisation of mental health services has taken place, although I acknowledge that more needs to be done. The Bamford review, which was referenced by many contributors, set in motion some of the most significant changes ever seen in mental health services here. Those changes have transformed how we care for people with a mental illness and have significantly improved the achievable outcomes. The Bamford vision is that people with a mental illness should be treated in the community, close to their families and friends, unless there is a clinical reason for not doing so. The focus in the last number of years in service development has been on early intervention, home treatment services and the development of psychological therapy services. Transforming Your Care endorses this approach. Since Bamford reported in 2008, investment in mental health services has increased to £247 million a year. That is an increase from £200 million a year. More importantly, the balance of funding has shifted. At the time of the Bamford review, we were spending 60% of the mental health budget on hospital services and only 40% on community services. Now we spend 44% on hospital services and 56% on community services. We are working towards closing old, inappropriate institutions that are no longer fit for purpose, and we are steadily opening new, more appropriate community-based accommodation around Northern Ireland.

In October 2014, the Department launched a regional mental healthcare pathway called You in Mind. The focus of the pathway is to commit Health and Social Care to delivering care that is more personalised and improves the experience of people with mental health problems by adopting a more evidence-based and recovery-orientated approach. One of the key elements was the publication in 2010 of 'A Strategy for the Development of Psychological Therapy Services', which has largely been implemented. A range of services are provided, including psychology, psychotherapy, cognitive behavioural therapy and trauma therapy. The HSC Board estimates that between 75,000 and 80,000 sessions are provided annually. Recent investment has focused on the training of existing staff in psychological therapies and the establishment of primary care talking therapy hubs. The HSC Board is into the second year of a five-year plan to establish these hubs across each trust area. The hubs focus on providing a range of psychological therapies for people who are experiencing common mental health problems. They are developed around general practice and will improve access to earlier support and care.

There is even an economic argument to support excellence in the provision of psychological therapies and mental health services generally. DSD has since 2008 provided funding to my Department to support the welfare-to-work agenda. A Queen's University/Health and Social Care Board report in 2014, published to support the continuation of this funding, found that 44% to 46% of people claiming illness-related out-of-work benefits do so because of mental ill health. However, for every £1 invested in psychological therapy services, there is a saving of £1.75 to the public sector. The report estimates that, within two years of recovery following successful treatment, the employment rate for those with moderate to severe mental health problems is increased by 11.4% and by 4.3% for those with mild mental health problems. I argue that we need to continue investment in this area.

I turn to the issue of CAMHS, which Dolores Kelly mentioned in her contribution. The Bamford review set out the strategic direction for children's mental health services, which are mainly delivered through community-based teams. There is also a 33-bed children and adolescent mental health inpatient unit at Beechcroft. In July 2012, the Department published a stepped-care service model for CAMHS, and this promotes a more consistent, person-centred approach to mental health service delivery for children and young people. Improvements include an increased focus on early intervention, better multidisciplinary working and collaboration with the community and voluntary, education and youth justice sectors.

I want to turn to an issue that was not raised but which is an important mental health issue nonetheless, and that is eating disorder services. Those are currently provided through a stepped-care approach that ranges from early detection and intervention, to community-based treatment, to specialist inpatient provision. However, I am aware that there is considerable support for a local specialist eating disorders unit. We need to be sure that any such service would be sustainable in the long term. I therefore asked my officials in October to start considering all the various options available to us.

Members will recall my announcement in September that I want Northern Ireland to become a world leader in treating people with psychological trauma and that I have tasked officials to create an innovative service that will meet the needs of those suffering from mental trauma. I welcome the amendment before us today. My announcement followed on from exploratory discussions in the Stormont House Agreement implementation group, which considered proposals to implement the agreement's commitment to establish a comprehensive mental trauma service in the health service. The full details continue to be developed, but the intention is that the final model will support the voluntary and community sector to create an integrated approach with the Health and Social Care system to address mental health need.

The service would allow for a range of interventions, meeting the spectrum of need across our community, irrespective of where that is. It would involve leading-edge, evidence-based treatments in line with NICE guidelines and be based on the authoritative and internationally recognised stepped-care model that focuses on the recovery of the individual from psychological trauma. The model recognises that, for people to recover, they may often need a combination of evidence-based social, family, psychological and psychiatric interventions; in short, a collaborative partnership across community, voluntary and statutory services.

In establishing the service, I intend to achieve four main aims: to address comprehensively the legacy of the Troubles and unmet mental health needs; to improve individual, family and community experience of mental health trauma care; to improve the psychological and social outcomes for individuals, their families and communities who have been traumatised as a result of the Troubles in Northern Ireland; and to improve governance and accountability.

The last of those is very often overlooked, but I believe that it is important that we provide care either in the statutory sector or in the voluntary and community sector and that services are joined up, involve less duplication and enable more timely responses to psychological problems that are effective from the outset. A joined-up service will provide opportunities for organisations and groups across sectors to share expertise and resources, ultimately benefiting service users.

My Department, together with the Health and Social Care Board, has been concentrating on designing the medium- to high-impact, high-intensity support that, in the model, would be provided within Health and Social Care and involve treatment for people with diagnosable and complex mental health problems. Care at that level must be provided by registered mental health professionals. The current model estimates that we would need to recruit over 40 additional whole-time equivalent specialists to accommodate the volume of patients and levels of need. That gives a further indication of the scale of the challenge that we face. Finalising the design of the model and financing such a service are significant challenges that we need to overcome. I urge all Members, including Executive colleagues, to work together to agree those arrangements as soon as possible. Just as the Royal Victoria Hospital is world class in dealing with physical trauma, I hope that we can agree that a mental trauma service would be a fitting legacy to those who continue to suffer as a result of the Troubles.

In respect of the point raised by my colleague Brenda Hale about post-traumatic stress disorder and unrecognised symptoms among armed forces personnel, I am happy to contact her about the issues that she raised and, hopefully, provide her with an adequate response. She will be aware that the Department is involved in working with the armed forces across a range of health issues and chairs a forum that meets regularly and which involves representatives from the charity Combat Stress. For serving members of the armed forces, mental health services are provided by the Ministry of Defence, and services for veterans and dependants are provided within Health and Social Care. She raises a very important issue, and I am very happy to contact her about any specific concerns that she may have.

It is vital that we speak openly about mental health and encourage people who are experiencing emotional difficulties to seek help. Health and Social Care is working across a number of levels to reduce the stigma associated with mental ill health. The PHA and the Northern Ireland Association for Mental Health are working in partnership to deliver a future wide-ranging three-year anti-stigma programme entitled Change Your Mind. The cross-departmental ministerial coordination group on suicide prevention has expanded its remit to cover a broader range of activities to promote positive mental health. My Department is working with DARD and DCAL on a joint initiative to promote mental health awareness and help-seeking behaviour through rural networks and sporting organisations.

Another progressive development is the Mental Capacity Bill, which is currently at Committee Stage. If passed, it will be an international first in establishing a fused approach for mental health and mental capacity law. I am very grateful to Members from all sides who are considering the Bill so assiduously, and I urge colleagues to continue to work together to ensure that we pass Final Stage before the end of this mandate.

In her remarks, Jo-Anne Dobson mentioned the Lifeline service, and I want to use this opportunity to provide an update to the House. The current Lifeline contract ends on 31 December this year, with the possibility of extension until 30 September next year. I understand that an extension has twice been offered to the current provider of Lifeline services but has been refused on both occasions. The Lifeline crisis response service is a key component of the Protect Life suicide prevention strategy. The PHA is keen to engage with the relevant stakeholders to ensure that the future service specification is appropriately informed, and the agency has already undertaken a Lifeline pre-engagement public consultation, the findings of which have assisted in identifying the most effective and efficient model to obtain the best outcomes for taking the service beyond 2015.

The proposals for the future delivery of the Lifeline service retain four essential core components of the current service. Those are a free-to-call crisis telephone helpline that will be accessible 24 hours a day; skilled helpline staff trained in crisis de-escalation and in assessing suicide risk; signposting callers to the most appropriate service for their needs; and referral to follow-on support where necessary. By splitting the provision of immediate helpline support from follow-up support, the proposals avoid a potential perverse incentive whereby the helpline provider would gain financially from referring a client to follow-up support that it also delivers. By ensuring that follow-up support is locally based, access to that service should be improved, particularly for rural dwellers.

The point is that the plans that are out for consultation at this time are looking at better integration with elsewhere in the service, particularly with the Ambulance Service, and better coverage across Northern Ireland. That recognises a criticism that the service has not been up to standard outside Belfast. There should also be improved governance. The important point for Members to remember is that, at the end of this consultation and at the end of this work, the Lifeline service will be retained, and we are seeking to improve the service that people receive.

In conclusion, improving people's mental health is vital for their well-being and that of their families. It is as important as their physical health. People with a mental illness must be supported to take control of their lives and live purposefully in their communities. While our mental health services have come a long way since Bamford, we have much more to do. I am committed to further reform and innovation. That will require funding. Some of that can be found by reprioritising existing resources, but new money will also be needed. That will be difficult to find, but we all have a responsibility to ensure that we have sufficient means to meet the mental health challenges that we face as a community.

Mrs Cameron: I rise as a DUP member of the Health Committee and as a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Mental Capacity Bill, which is currently going through. I welcome the opportunity to contribute on this important matter. As we are all aware and as many Members have highlighted, during our lifetime, one in four of us will be affected by some degree of mental health difficulty. Many of us in the Chamber, including me, will be well aware of what it is like to suffer from poor mental health at some stage in our lives. In my case, after childbirth, I did not recognise that I was suffering from postnatal depression. Unfortunately for me, I was not diagnosed. In fact, I was not even aware that I should be seeking help at that time of my life. Twenty-three years on, I trust that mothers today are more aware and that the stigma that has always been there has lessened over time.

In the eight years since the publication of the Bamford report, we have made significant improvements in how we deal with patients presenting with mental health issues.

That is a trend that we must continue and build on, in keeping with Transforming Your Care.

At the core of any strategy, we must focus on ensuring that stigma surrounding mental ill health is removed. Sadly, many misconceptions, inaccuracies and misnomers surround the issue, meaning that many people, particularly men, are reluctant to ask for help.

With the Bamford vision to be able to treat as many people as possible within a community setting, our efforts must centre on normalising the reality of mental ill health and ensuring that we work towards community-based support systems, such as within the family, friendship circles or local help networks. Coupled with recognising the parity between mental and physical health, that would provide a strong foundation on which to provide early intervention and improve outcomes for those suffering from poor mental health.

In September, the Health Minister announced plans for a world-leading mental trauma service. At the time of the announcement, he recognised that mental ill health was the biggest cause of disability in Northern Ireland. He also acknowledged that over 213,000 people were suffering from mental health difficulties that could be attributed directly to the Troubles. That figure is likely to be much higher due to the ripple effects on families, causing a worrying precedent for future generations.

It is clear that this service is much-needed and will be possible only with inter-departmental working. I cannot think of one Department that does not have a part to play in shaping the service, whether it be the Department of Education looking at early coping mechanisms such as one I witnessed on a recent visit to Ballycraigy Primary School in my constituency, which provides a fantastic nurture facility to help children to cope with emotional and social difficulties; the Department of Agriculture in reaching out to the increasing number of members of the farming community who are experiencing depression; or the Department for Social Development in tackling drug and alcohol abuse through funding charities such as FASA, to name but a few.

There is no silver bullet and these are not changes that will happen overnight. However, working with the community and voluntary sector, we can make a real societal change.

I want to turn to some comments from the Floor in relation to our party's amendment. I welcome the support given to the amendment. Fearghal McKinney, the proposer of the motion, said that it neither added to nor took away from the motion. He welcomed the intention to develop a mental trauma service.

Alex Easton, the proposer of the amendment, said that a mental trauma service has been discussed by all political parties and that it would lead to a better, joined-up service, allowing opportunity to share expertise and resources to the benefit of service users. Maeve McLaughlin spoke of the huge scale of the mental health problem in Northern Ireland.

Mike Nesbitt, supporting the motion as amended, spoke of his awareness, in particular, of the stigma in relation to mental health, given his own wife's experiences. He talked about a mental health champion and the commitment in the Stormont House Agreement to have that trauma service.

Kieran McCarthy spoke to the motion and amendment. He said that Northern Ireland spent less per head than the rest of the UK on mental health. He also spoke of how the Mental Capacity Bill was moving through Committee Stage.

George Robinson said that he believed that a world-class mental health trauma centre —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up —

Mrs Cameron: — was the way forward. There were other contributions as well.

Whilst the motion transcends politics, it is obvious that none of this will be possible without agreement to welfare reform. We all understand the severe cost that is being imposed. I thank the Members across the Floor for supporting the amendment.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, as deis cainte a thabhairt domh ar cheist ríthábhachtach seo na sláinte intinne. Éirím ar an ócáid seo le hachoiriú a dhéanamh ar an rún, ach caithfidh mé a rá go bhfuil muidinne ar an taobh seo an-sásta tacaíocht a thabhairt don leasú fosta. Tá súil agam go mbeidh mé in inmhe cothrom na Féinne a thabhairt do oiread Comhaltar a ghlac páirt sa díospóireacht agus is féidir liom.

I welcome the opportunity to wind up what has been a very positive debate on the motion. While Members may disagree slightly on the nuances of the implementation of mental health services, they all agree on the scale of mental health issues and that it cannot be ignored. The provision of mental health services is one of our society's greatest challenges. In Northern Ireland, this has only been amplified by the conflict, which has left many people with lasting mental scars.

Mrs Dobson and Mr McKinney mentioned the figures. One in four people in Northern Ireland has a mental health problem, with the region having a 25% higher risk of problems than England, for example. A significant portion is directly related to trauma experienced during the conflict, with over 213,000 people dealing with mental health issues. As Ms McLaughlin mentioned, further figures note that, between 2008 and 2014, actual spending on mental health services was 25% less than it was in the previous period. Certain figures quoted in today's debate continue to paint a grim picture of our current position regarding mental health aid.

As Mr McKinney and others said, the 2007 Bamford review heralded a new understanding that mental ill health was not only widespread across the region but, further, that it needed serious planning and funding obligations to meet the demand and create new positivity. Bamford held that:

“people with a mental illness should be treated in the community, close to their families and friends, unless there is a clinical reason for not doing so.”

This goal was later reflected in Transforming Your Care. The Minister outlined the move towards treatment in the community when he mentioned the hubs. He said that these were based around general practice and involved cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) and trauma therapy and evidence-based, recovery-orientated approaches.

Mr McCarthy mentioned Transforming Your Care and said that we need to reassess our priorities. Ms McLaughlin mentioned the fact that funding for mental health is now 25% less in real terms, a point that I have already covered. It is frustrating for those involved in the mental health sector and those who rely on it to find that a lack of funding and continued cutbacks continue to stall progress on the Bamford principles. The scale of need recognised in the Bamford report and Northern Ireland's own unfortunate position was further recognised by the Heenan-Anderson Commission, which rightly identified that the legacy of trauma from the conflict could only be dealt with through a world-class, universal mental health system.

Dolores Kelly praised the professional staff involved in mental healthcare and the work of family carers and friends. She mentioned the need for smarter ways of working and referred to nurse prescribers, who she said are making an excellent contribution. Mrs Kelly also outlined the close connection between domestic violence and the mental health of women and children and emphasised the need to bring forward the sexual violence strategy. She also mentioned the experience of CAMHS in dealing with chronic alcoholism in people who are much younger than the past norm.

She said that that was a problem that needed to be addressed urgently. She also mentioned that the dementia services in her constituency last year had almost 3,000 referrals, which was a 36% increase on the previous year. That is obviously a problem that needs to be tackled.

The proper provision of a quality mental health service is not simply to address the needs of those affected by the conflict; it is for the common good of everyone in Northern Ireland, young and old. Access to properly funded services delivering the best care possible is critical to helping people to identify their own struggle and grants them the tools to manage their mental health. It is critical that the Assembly recognises the scale of mental health issues in Northern Ireland and that we do everything in our power to raise awareness and banish all the stigma that has been erroneously attached to mental illness in our society.

Mr Buchanan referred to stigma. He said that mental health services were often the Cinderella services of the health system, so it would be good if the Minister were to prove to be their Prince Charming. The truth is that we can talk easily of physical illnesses, even cancer, but there is still unwillingness to speak openly about mental health and well-being. As Mr Nesbitt said, it is time to take it out into the open and champion it in public to remove the stigma and make it OK to talk. Talking is often the first step towards mental well-being. I praise the work of the race against suicide, an island-wide voluntary strategy that seeks to emphasise that it is OK to talk. Recently, in my constituency, starting in Crossmaglen, we had the Slieve Gullion spin-off cycle, which made a tremendous contribution locally to highlighting mental health issues and suicide and urging people experiencing mental health difficulties to talk about them.

Mr McCarthy urged that the Mental Capacity Bill be expedited and resourced to the greatest extent possible. The Minister referred to it also and urged Members to bring the Bill forward and make it the best it can be. George Robinson emphasised the need for prevention and, where there is mental ill health, the need for early intervention. That was reflected by other Members. Jo-Anne Dobson and Rosie McCorley mentioned the importance of retaining the Lifeline service intact. We in the SDLP support them in that regard. The Minister responded to that and outlined his plans. Many Members referred to the world-leading mental health trauma service. The Minister responded to that: he said that he would take a collaborative approach based on those who suffer because of the Troubles, including individual victims. He also said that there would be emphasis on governance and accountability and that the approach would be cross-sectoral in nature. Daithí McKay mentioned the high rates of suicide. He referred to the LGBT community and the trauma that members of that community suffer through bullying, self-harm and suicide. He referred to today's debate on equal marriage. The vote on that —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr D Bradley: — is a positive outcome, even though there was a petition of concern. It will give the LGBT community an uplift.

Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to contribute. I support the motion and the amendment.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 3 November 2015

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Dickson: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. You will be aware that, in recent days, there have been media reports about the DUP Tippexing a standard petition of concern form to you on various matters. This follows a similar accusation with regard to Sinn Féin earlier this year. There is a clear inference that individual Members are not using their personal discretion when it comes to completing such forms. May I ask you to investigate the efficacy of doing that and whether it meets the appropriate Standing Orders?

Mr Speaker: In fact, I was aware of that situation. Standing Orders and procedure are very clear. In the Speaker's office, we have to be satisfied that the signatures are genuine and that the petition of concern specifies the issue. That is as far as I am able to take this matter forward. Tippex on a sheet does not indicate anything that I can do anything about, so long as the signature that is visible is the genuine signature of a Member.

Lord Morrow: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker, you say that you have looked at these signatures. Have you found any discrepancies or any reason for you not to accept them as anything but genuine and authentic signatures on the petitions concerned?

Mr Speaker: I understand why you have asked the question but, clearly, if I announced that it was a valid petition of concern, I was entirely satisfied.

Ministerial Statement

Access to Justice Review: Part II

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): With permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the access to justice review, part II.

Members will recall that, in 2011, I published the first access to justice review, which led to a comprehensive programme of work, with three strategic objectives for reform: improving access to justice; bringing legal aid within budget; and improving governance.

Much has been achieved in these areas in the intervening period. Reforms have been introduced that have helped to manage the cost of legal aid, including new fee arrangements in criminal courts and more appropriate levels of representation in the civil and criminal courts. Legal aid spend remains stubbornly high, but, without these changes, the costs would have been even higher.

Pilot projects have been run with the third sector, helping to shape how partnerships might operate to meet specific needs in the future. The Legal Services Agency has been created, complete with new appeal arrangements; and responsibility for exceptional grant funding has passed to the director of legal aid casework, removing the Justice Minister from any involvement in individual decisions.

More recently, attention has turned to the potential for reducing the scope of civil legal aid in areas where alternative provision is available or where public funding should be prioritised to the areas of most need. The introduction of standard fees for family cases is also at an advanced stage.

A pilot project to minimise unnecessary delay in care proceedings is now getting under way and should commence in January in Newtownards and Londonderry courts. Separately, under the banner of "speeding up justice", an innovative approach has been piloted in the Ards Crown Court division to progress indictable cases more swiftly. Early engagement between defence and prosecution practitioners, as well as the police and the prosecution service, has delivered real improvement. Of the cases concluded to date, the average number of days from incident report to sentencing was 97, compared to 175 in the same period last year.

However, access to justice is a complex issue and more needs to be done to maintain momentum. Over time, the wider environment has changed, and that is why I commissioned this follow-up review. The overall purpose of the review was threefold: first, to identify and prioritise services where publicly funded advice and/or representation should be provided to meet human rights obligations, safeguard the interests of vulnerable people and meet the wider public interest; secondly, to consider the delivery models that might be best suited to the provision of publicly funded legal services through mechanisms other than legal aid; and, thirdly, to consider whether there are aspects of the justice system where efficiencies might contribute towards reducing the cost of publicly funded legal services while sustaining the quality of service provision.

I have now received a very comprehensive and detailed report. Today, I am pleased to publish that report and begin a period of public consultation on its findings and recommendations. I am very grateful to Jim Daniell and Colin Stutt for their time, effort and research over many months, and for their commitment to delivering a thought-provoking report. I also thank those who made contributions and offered views to the review. It is important now that all those who wish to comment let us have their views on the recommendations.

As I have said before in the House, fair and effective means of securing access to justice are essential elements of any civilised society. We currently have a comprehensive legal aid scheme — the report refers to it as world class — and we need to get the balance right to ensure that it is sustainable and that people who are most vulnerable are able to access the support that they need. There is a need to balance difficult decisions over the allocation of resources with new or more efficient and effective ways of delivering access and ensure that those who have the necessary means contribute to, or meet, their own legal costs.

The report provides a comprehensive analysis and makes some 150 wide-ranging recommendations. It starts by acknowledging that access to justice is a fundamental human right and that legal aid is an indispensable part of the system. I completely agree. It identifies the legally irreducible minimum for a legal aid scheme, but goes on to argue why it would be inappropriate to reduce legal aid in Northern Ireland to that level. It suggests a range of priorities for access to justice, but argues that those are not the same as priorities for legal aid. Against that backdrop, the report recognises the pressures caused by the demand for legal aid and the consequential need to identify measures to control expenditure, while minimising the impact on access to justice. It also recognises the potential for steps to be taken to improve the way in which justice is delivered. Some of the proposals could result in fundamental change and deliver improved efficiency and effectiveness.

I will consider very carefully the comments made by those who respond to this consultation. However, we cannot afford to let the period of consultation hold up the reforms that are already in progress. I will continue to take forward the development of a new standard fee approach for civil legal services, where the development of arrangements for family cases is at an advanced stage. In the longer term, I will wish to reflect on the views that might be expressed in the consultation on the proposal for a wider remuneration strategy.

I have already announced that I will remove most money damages cases from scope. I plan to progress this, but, in doing so, will consult separately on the alternative funding arrangements recommended in the report. They have the potential to maintain, if not enhance, access to justice.

The report recommends some modest changes to the scope of legal aid. I have already consulted on some of these areas, and I will reflect on the specific comments in the report as I take this work forward. However, in one key area, it suggests that private family law should largely remain within scope, unlike the situation in England and Wales. I welcome this recommendation.

The report addresses issues such as eligibility for legal aid support; the opportunities to reduce or recoup costs through, for example, increased contributions; and changes in the statutory charge that will increase its effectiveness. I will consider each of these areas. However, as the recommendations in these areas concern ensuring that those who can afford to contribute to the cost of legal representation do so, they must be right in principle.

The report makes a number of recommendations on the structure and operation of the court system. It suggests a move towards a more inquisitorial system, and I will reflect on the responses to the consultation and consult the Lord Chief Justice on these suggestions.

The report also suggests ways of improving family justice procedures and practice, and this will feed into the work that the Lord Chief Justice has recently commissioned Lord Justice Gillen to take forward in respect of the civil and family courts.

Similarly, I will wish to discuss with the Lord Chief Justice the proposal for a working group to deliver efficiency measures in the criminal courts. The pilot project in the Crown Court, which I mentioned earlier, is clear evidence that positive change can be delivered in this area.

The report recommends that legal aid funding be retained for judicial review proceedings, and I welcome this. It is important that the actions of government bodies are properly held to account. However, I also welcome the recommendations for tightening up access to this intervention to ensure that it is accessed when appropriate, as well as the measures proposed to resolve disputes through alternative approaches.

The report makes a number of recommendations that impact the responsibilities of other Departments. There are, for example, recommendations in respect of public family law and mediation where DHSSPS has a role to play. In divorce and issues relating to the legal profession, the Department of Finance and Personnel has a role to play. I will wish to engage with the respective Ministers in addressing these issues.

This is a very comprehensive report, and I cannot do it justice in a brief statement. It is thought-provoking and, in parts, challenging. However, it has the potential to inform an agenda for change that will speed up the justice system, reduce costs and improve the experience of those who come into contact with the system. I encourage Members and the wider public to read it and engage with the consultation process.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): Access to justice is fundamental to any democratic society that values the rule of law, but there is little doubt that the current financial pressures mean that there are challenges to such access. It is therefore incumbent upon us to look at innovative approaches to protect access to justice while reducing cost. That is precisely why I initiated the seminars on innovation in the criminal justice system earlier this year.

To that end, I particularly welcome the modest acknowledgement in the report that online dispute resolution systems could offer a potential solution. This is an area that I have personally promoted and that the Committee is keen to explore further. Does the Minister agree that such systems have significant potential to speed up the system; support through their justice journey citizens who cannot access legal aid or afford legal representation; and have the added advantage of reducing cost to the public purse? Will he give a commitment to take forward work in this area, including any recommendations prioritised by the Committee?

I also ask the Minister whether he intends to prioritise any of the areas covered in the report, particularly in the 150 recommendations. Will he seek views on what areas should be given priority during the consultation process? I further ask the Minister to provide an assurance that the consultation exercise will not be used to slow down and frustrate justice reforms that are absolutely necessary, and to outline the areas to which he believes this statement in the report refers:

Finally, will the Minister tell us what level of contact Colin Stutt had with the judiciary, the Law Society and the Bar Council prior to publishing the report?

10.45 am

Mr Ford: I will try to respond to all those points, although my writing is perhaps not as fast as Mr Ross's questioning. I welcome the point that he highlighted about the justice innovation seminars that the Committee ran. I frequently talk about cooperation between the Department and the Committee, and I certainly welcome the Committee's work through those seminars. Unfortunately, I did not get to the most recent one, which looked at developing online systems and digital justice in certain ways, although I have had extremely positive reports on the seminar from officials who were present, as, indeed, I have had from the official who accompanied the Chair and the Deputy Chair to the Netherlands to look at its work earlier this year. I have no doubt that, as systems develop in different parts of the world, we can learn lessons in this area. If a system from the Netherlands is adaptable in parts of Canada, we may need to look at whether it is adaptable in Northern Ireland as well.

Mr Ross referred to prioritisation. When Members read the report, they will recognise that, of the 150 recommendations, some are overarching and strategic and others are relatively low-key and operational, not all of which fall to the DOJ. It is not possible for me to give a specific commitment as to how, for example, recommendations to the judiciary will be carried forward. As I said, I will discuss them with the Lord Chief Justice in the hope that the good work that he and Lord Justice Gillen have done in this area will inform the work of their colleagues to ensure that we continue to join up the system as far as we can.

I agree entirely with the Member that it is important that we get the consultation right and that it does not slow down the work that is under way. I give a commitment that my officials will continue to work through that.

It is not for me to comment on who Colin Stutt believes may have been resistant to change in the past. All I can say is that, over the past five and a half years, there has been a lot of change. Things have speeded up significantly. It has been a partnership that has involved the Department, including the Minister, the Committee and a number of other stakeholders, but, as we look at things, it is clear that we do not have unanimity across the justice system. I continue to hope that my officials, by engaging constructively with all our partners, will see that work enhanced. However, the reality is quite clearly spelled out in the report: we must make progress and see things moving forward, and we need to ensure that that is the case. My understanding is that, for Jim Daniell and Colin Stutt, that engagement started with a wide range of stakeholders. As the report was being done, there was an opportunity for people to comment at various stages. That will show that we are moving forward, but I now want to see the public response to the consultation.

Mr Speaker: As we move on, I make it clear that the Chairperson of the Committee gets a certain amount of leeway that is not available to other Members.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas agus cuirim fáilte roimh an athbheithniú seo. I welcome the fact that the Minister made this statement and that the report is now in place. I also welcome the Minister's very strident comment that he sees access to justice as a fundamental human right.

There is a notion in the report about resistance to change. Does the Minister envisage that the recommendations will turn into an implementation plan that we can all see and track to ensure that any resistance can be easily identified?

Mr Ford: As usual, it is a pleasure to welcome a comment from the Committee's Deputy Chair as well as from the Chair. I thank him for his welcome for the outline of the statement.

The report is out for consultation, but work is well under way on developing an implementation plan on the basis that we can move on some issues relatively speedily. I will see that that work is advanced as fast as possible. The consultation period will be slightly longer than usual because it will include the Christmas holidays. The intention is that the Department will report back to the Committee with full details after the consultation period is over and well in advance of the election in order to set the tone, frankly, for the next Assembly mandate should legislation be required and to put administrative change in place as fast as possible.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Minister for his report. My colleague Alban Maginness is unavailable. Will you give us an assessment of the impact that you suspect the cutbacks might have on the advice sector?

Mr Ford: I thank Ms Hanna for being an able deputy for Alban Maginness. At least we did not get the barrister's view at that point. The key issue is to ensure that we make the best use of available resources, including the voluntary advice sector. That is part of looking at alternative ways of resolving issues. I do not think that we need to look with great fear at what the potential will be there. There are certainly recommendations to reduce levels of higher representation — as, indeed, have some of the changes that have been made — for example in family cases, but we will still see the benefits of the lower-level work that is done by solicitors or advice centres, without necessarily having the same number of QCs on every case.

The important issue, as I said earlier, is to ensure that there is access to justice and that individuals benefit from early access, but that we do not necessarily fund adversarial court cases if they are not what really produce justice for the individuals.

Mr Somerville: I welcome the statement that the Minister has brought forward. Can he provide an update on the pilot project to speed up the family court system, including when he expects the initial findings to be known?

Mr Ford: I cannot give the full detail of that at this stage. There are a number of issues that relate to the way in which the family justice system operates and there are other Departments that are involved in that, but, certainly, as we look at the details of it, I am quite happy to say that I will write to Mr Somerville as soon as possible to give him the details he has asked for.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for your statement. It is clearly part of your reforming Minister profile. Concern has been expressed about change to date and the potential changes in the future with regard to the number of people who may feel that they have to represent themselves in court — those known as litigants in person. Is there any evidence of that happening? How is the justice system going to cope with that, should it be a problem?

Mr Ford: I am happy to confirm that the last statistics I saw showed a reduction of something like 25% or 30% in the number of litigants in person appearing in court over the last four or five years, so they do not suggest that there has been any increase in litigants in person as a result of the changes that have been made in legal aid, a point that has been made at times but does not seem to have any substance at this stage.

I noted that there was a reference, although I do not think I could turn it up amongst the 270 pages at this point, to greater capacity for the use of the so-called McKenzie friends, who would assist individuals in court. I think that, if we are looking at fewer litigants in person and a greater ability for McKenzie friends to assist, we need have no fears.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for his statement to the House this morning. I note the comments by Colin Stutt at page 71 of the report:

“the remarkable thing about the cost of legal aid in Northern Ireland is not that it exceeds its budget, but that it has remained stubbornly high throughout the current period of austerity, almost as if it was protected to the same extent as health.”

Does the Minister accept that there has been a failure to properly set realistic legal aid budgets and ensure that spend is as close to the budget as possible? What does the Minister intend to do to rectify the situation prior to the setting of the 2016-17 budget?

Mr Ford: It is quite clear, as Mr Douglas said, that the cost of legal aid has remained stubbornly high and has not significantly changed over the five years since devolution. I could say that what would have happened if we had not implemented some of the reforms, particularly some of the criminal reforms that we went through at an early stage, is that we would be looking at a further £20 million or more on legal aid costs at present. Of course, it can go up and down. As part of an initiative to reduce waiting lists, particularly in the Belfast area, the Lord Chief Justice assigned an additional Crown Court judge to Laganside Court a couple of years ago, with the result that the criminal backlog decreased very significantly and the cost of legal defence went up significantly because those cases were dealt with.

Those are the kind of things that happen. It is the law of unintended consequences. When we did something good to benefit victims and, indeed, defendants, by getting cases heard more quickly, there was a rush to put those legal aid payments through.

The reality is that we had the budget that we had when justice was devolved, and we have sought to work within that budget given all the other pressures across the justice system. I know that my officials, whom I will be having discussions with later today, are looking at the budgeting process for next year and at the balance between different aspects of the justice system. The figures that applied on the basis of the budget and the application of cuts by the Executive are inadequate to meet current legal aid costs, but legal aid cannot be protected for ever when other aspects of the justice system are seeing their budgets going down.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. Can he elaborate on the research carried out to determine best international practice in the provision of legal aid in other comparable jurisdictions?

Mr Ford: I cannot give Ms McGahan the sort of blow-by-blow account of all the research that was done by Jim Daniell and Colin Stutt, but I know that they took every opportunity to look at other jurisdictions and see how matters were applied to legal aid there. The point is that it was not simply a matter of looking at legal aid; it was a matter of looking at access to justice and the best ways of ensuring access to justice for citizens, not just the best ways of managing legal aid.

Mr Frew: The report deals with a wide spectrum of access to justice. Is it not short-sighted and, indeed, short-termism to go through with the proposed potential courthouse closures, given the fact that our justice system has not been modernised and reformed to the extent that people will be able to benefit from technology and other means of quicker access to justice?

Mr Ford: I am slightly baffled by Mr Frew's question on two grounds. The first is that courthouse closures have absolutely nothing to do with the access to justice report, and the other is that the points that he highlighted about different ways of doing justice, particularly as we look at the smaller number of cases coming into courts, would reinforce the point that we do not need as many courthouses as we have currently.

I hope to report to the Assembly on the proposals for the court estate within a few weeks. When Members look at the number of cases going through the courts compared to the numbers that went through five or 10 years ago, they will recognise that there is a very serious issue, which is that we cannot fund justice for our citizens if we are keeping roofs on buildings that are not needed.

Lord Morrow: In the Minister's statement, he welcomed the retention of legal aid for judicial reviews and further welcomed the recommendations for tightening up access to that intervention when legal aid is expended. Apart from the options suggested for resolving disputes through alternative approaches, will he advise whether the process of tightening up includes intended judicial reviews being more rigorously assessed at leave stage to ensure that the grounds, evidence and potential of a successful outcome are fully scrutinised in order to merit the spending of legal aid?

Mr Ford: The simple answer to Lord Morrow is that this is an issue on which I will be looking for responses in the consultation, but I can certainly sympathise with his general point.

As the recipient of a very significant number of judicial review applications, either personally or slightly at second hand, which, in many cases, revolve around the Prison Service, it seems to me that, at times, there are real questions as to whether matters should not be better assessed elsewhere and that leave might not be granted for a judicial review until all available means have been covered. I can think of one or two particular cases, which I will not go into the details of. It took considerable staff time and ministerial time to seek to resolve those cases when they might have been resolved just as easily in a slightly different and more informal way. There is an issue about getting the balance right with judicial reviews to ensure that decisions can be covered, but also to ensure that all appropriate means are exhausted first.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for his statement. Is it fair to say that the review report effectively endorses his strategy of introducing standard fee arrangements, which ensure that legal representatives receive payments that are appropriate for the amount of work done? Does the Minister intend to stick to that strategy in civil cases?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr McCarthy for the question. I believe that significant benefits have come through the introduction of much greater dependence on standard fees in criminal cases in the past. Members may recall my complaining in the past about the assessment of too many criminal cases as very-high-cost cases. That was one of the key reforms in Crown Courts that reduced expenditure and brought them down to a more manageable level on that side.

The report refers to standard fees being applicable on the civil side as well, and I believe that to be a much better way for individuals to know what they will be paid; for the Legal Services Agency to know what it will be paying out; and to ensure, as far as possible and allowing for the fact that there will always be exceptionality, that we depend upon standard fees for simplification and assurance as to what expenditure will be.

Mr Allister: The report seems to refer to our present legal aid scheme as "world class" and:

"an indispensable part of our justice system".

It states that it would be wholly inappropriate to reduce it to a minimum. That is not language that we are used to hearing from the Minister. However, he asked the reviewer to consider models to deliver publicly funded legal services through mechanisms other than legal aid. What mechanisms of that nature have been recommended? Is he still flirting with the idea of a public defender office?

Mr Ford: Had Mr Allister listened slightly more carefully, he would have heard that, whilst the report refers to us having a "world class" system of legal aid, I did not say that I believed it necessary to maintain the current system. I made the point that a decent legal aid system is a fundamental human right, but not everything within the current system will be. I also made the point that I welcome the fact that the report specifically says that we should not be going to the irreducible minimum. It is a fundamental human right that people should have a decent system. We need to look, as I highlighted and the report highlights, at a range of alternative dispute resolution.

I am not quite sure when I was "flirting" with a public defender system. The report makes it clear, and I accept the recommendation at present, that we should seek to maintain the current system for criminal defence. However, the reality is that adjacent jurisdictions have looked, at least in part, at a public defender system, and there are issues around management of costs that may well make that a necessary way in which this jurisdiction may have to look at some point in the future. If we can manage things under the current arrangements in a way that is affordable and sustainable, it is clearly the wish of many clients that they should have their full choice of a lawyer — and that is clearly the choice of those in legal practice, including Mr Allister himself in the past. We cannot guarantee that these things will continue in perpetuity, but there is a clear recommendation that there will be no change in that direction in the immediate future.

Children's Services Co-operation Bill: Final Stage

Mr Agnew: I beg to move

That the Children's Services Co-operation Bill [NIA 44/11/16] do now pass.

The Bill will place a statutory duty on children's authorities to cooperate with each other to better integrate the planning and delivery of children's services. The aim is to make the provision of services effective and efficient by ending the waste of silo working. The Bill will make good practice common practice, leading to better outcomes for children and young people.

It is four years since I had my first meeting with the Bill Office in relation to bringing forward this piece of work. It has been almost a year since I submitted the Bill to the Assembly at First Stage.

Undoubtedly, the Bill has evolved considerably since that original draft, and many changes have been made to the Bill since it was introduced at First Stage. That has been a result of consultation and, indeed, cooperative working with, among others, the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, the children's sector and my team. The one thing that has not changed is the key intention of the Bill. That has remained consistent throughout. I have been delighted by the fact that those who engaged cooperatively in bringing the Bill forward and in amending it have done so in a way that has built on those original aims and improved the Bill and its effectiveness. As I acknowledged at previous stages, there was a fear that Departments, which, at one stage, may have been resistant to the Bill, would seek to water it down and undermine it. I am delighted that that has not been the case. Again, I place on record my thanks to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, in particular, for its work in relation to the Bill.

As far back as 2007, Eamon McTernan and Ann Godfrey published a paper on the need for an integrated children's system in Northern Ireland. My involvement with this policy proposal began when, as a researcher for Brian Wilson MLA, I represented him on the all-party group on children and young people. I am proud to say that, today, I am chair of that group. Back then, it was highlighted at a number of meetings that, whilst the 10-year strategy for children and young people was ambitious in its intent, there had been a poor record of delivery. Time and time again, reports were produced that said that a statutory duty to cooperate was required. That was included in reports by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child; Queen's University; the Children's Commissioner, in a report commissioned by the commissioner on barriers to effective working for children and young people; the Criminal Justice Inspection, in its 2012 report on early youth interventions; and the OFMDFM Committee, in its report during the 2007-2011 mandate. A number of solutions were tried to improve delivery. They included the introduction of children's champions within each of the Departments and the ministerial subgroup for children and young people. More recently, it has included Delivering Social Change. Each was assessed as falling short of the fundamental culture shift that was needed in the inter-working between the Departments.

The point at which the penny dropped for me as to why a statutory duty to cooperate was needed was when I was sitting on the all-party group for children and young people and we received a presentation from the Department of Education on the draft early years strategy. It was to be a fundamental strategy on provision for children aged nought to six. I asked what, at that time, I felt was a perfectly innocent question: what work is being done on the strategy with the Department of Health? I was told that it was a Department of Education strategy. When I realised that the Department of Education did not engage with children until they were three, at the very earliest, I realised that I was being presented with a strategy for children from nought to six, which started at age three. That was unacceptable; indeed, it was a draft strategy that was widely criticised and which never came to fruition because of its deeply flawed nature. The purpose of the Bill is to ensure that such strategies are prepared between Departments, with cooperation and engagement, where relevant, by each and every Department.

That very much outlines the policy issues, but, of course, the key question for many people will be this: what difference will the legislation actually make? Through my work on the Bill, I came across a number of case studies. I wish to highlight two that were brought to me. The first is from the Children's Law Centre, which stated:

"we were asked to provide advice, assistance and representation for a child with excellent academic ability who has cerebral palsy and who attends a mainstream school. She uses a wheelchair and is able to walk with assistance. She requires regular daily physiotherapy in order to maintain her mobility and to access the wider curriculum. Due to the lack of cooperation between health and education and the resource implications for the ELB of conceding that physiotherapy was an educational need ... as well as a failure by the HSCT to provide for the child, this child was denied physiotherapy in a mainstream school, which she would have been able to access in a special school. She was expected to remain seated for 8 hours per day. This caused great distress and discomfort with the result that the child became acutely aware of her disability and her grades dropped considerably. The dispute carried on for over two years. The CLC commissioned a private physiotherapy report as part of ongoing legal proceedings in which we provided legal representation. Ultimately, after several hearings and lengthy negotiation, the matter was settled and arrangements made for therapy input. The child is doing very well at school, achieving excellent grades and engaging with all aspects of the curriculum. The unwillingness/inability of the health trusts to recommend and provide direct therapeutic support (in mainstream schools and increasingly also in special schools) and the concomitant reluctance of the ELBs to specify therapies as educational needs on the statement or to make provision at the school-based stages requires to be addressed. In our view, from a children's rights perspective there is no valid argument that can be made against a statutory duty to cooperate between health and education."

In that example, we can see how something that may appear simple, such as physiotherapy for a child at school, can get bogged down in wrangling between two Departments in an effort, it would appear, to avoid having to provide the resources. Indeed, one of the key elements, which I will speak more about later, is the ability of Departments to pool budgets. In such a case, a single pool could be drawn down from, either from the Department of Health or the Department of Education, whichever is in the position to provide the service. That would avoid the wrangling that comes with Departments seeking to avoid costs when clearly they have a duty of care to a child or young person.

The next example comes from my constituency and is from a family in Bangor. It was highlighted in the media at the time, locally and regionally. The child, named Josh, has type-1 diabetes and is currently in primary school. His mum, Helen, had been totally frustrated at the time that it took to have adequate resources put in place to support him. The education board did not have the resources to get a report collated for his statement in a timely manner. In the end, it took nine months to complete the statement. In the meantime, there was no one to administer insulin to Josh, a type-1 diabetic child. In the end, staff volunteered to undergo training until a classroom assistant could be recruited. Recruitment took six months, and the training took a further three months. Helen believes that the Children's Services Co-operation Bill would have helped, as it would have required that her child be at the centre, with decisions made in his best interests. She thinks that there needs to be something in place so that schools have a duty of care to the child, with cooperation between the education and health sectors required.

That caused significant distress to the family. Again, the processes between the Department of Health and the Department of Education were not as efficient as they could be. It was well known to the Health Department that the child had diabetes. The school was informed. The education board was made aware well in advance of him starting school, yet, when September came, the provision was not in place, and much anguish and stress was caused to that family unnecessarily.

So, what does the Bill do to improve the systems that are in place when it comes to these cases? The key element of the Bill is a statutory duty to cooperate on all children's authorities to improve the well-being of children. The children's authorities include the Northern Ireland Departments, councils, the health and social care trusts, the Health and Social Care Board, the Public Health Agency, the Education Authority, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, the PSNI and the Probation Board for Northern Ireland. It is, effectively, the Northern Ireland Departments and the membership of the children and young people's strategic partnership.

While a lot of work was being done to have the good practice of the children and young people's strategic partnership enshrined as a statutory agency, that was not able to be achieved as part of the Bill. The final amendment could not be agreed on, but I am pleased that the Department of Health is considering bringing forward, as part of its own legislative framework, proposals to do just that. While it may not be achieved by this Bill, I hope that the work that has gone into producing this Bill will see it achieved some time in the future. I know that the children's sector will be lobbying hard to make sure that that becomes a reality.

In the Bill, well-being has been defined by the six high-level outcomes that were in the 10-year strategy for children and young people and which had been agreed between government and the statutory sector. To provide clarity, the six outcomes became seven in the redrafting of the Bill and a further outcome was introduced in an amendment by Chris Lyttle to include equality of opportunity, and good relations. The other outcomes include physical and mental health; the enjoyment of play and leisure; learning and achievement; living in safety with stability; economic and environmental well-being; the making by them, ie the children, of a positive contribution to society; and living in a society which respects their rights.

In the spirit of the Bill, those outcomes were agreed cooperatively and have widespread support throughout the children's voluntary sector and, indeed, from the Children's Commissioner. One aspect of the Bill is that it allows amendments to be made to change those aspects of well-being. However, importantly, it also includes a requirement that consultation would be required before such changes could be made. That was important in order to give comfort to the sector that the aims and objectives that it works to will not be changed without its input.

The Bill also requires the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to produce a children's strategy. The aspect of consultation is key to that. Any such strategy should be outcomes-based, and children and parents must be consulted in its preparation. Again, it is important that we have enshrined in the Bill, in effect, article 12 of the UNCRC; the right of children to have a say in decisions that directly affect their lives. I pay tribute to OFMDFM because this is an additional clause to the original draft of the Bill and it came forward from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister at their suggestion. I welcome its inclusion in the Bill.

All along, I have been keen to highlight the importance in the Bill of the pooling of resources. If we are to make the delivery of children's services efficient, this is a necessary outworking. While the provision in the Bill is an enabling power to allow Departments to pool resources, I believe that a key check as to whether the Bill is implemented in the spirit in which it is intended is when Departments begin to pool resources where there are common objectives in relation to children.

I welcome the amendment from the Minister of Finance and Personnel, who stated at Further Consideration Stage that it would ensure:

The evidence is there that integrated working can improve the efficient running of government. I ask that, in producing the procedures, the Department of Finance and anybody else interested in gaining a better understanding of pooled budgets and the difference between pooled and aligned budgets look to the guidance from the Department for Communities and Local Government, which I have found very informative in helping my understanding of how this can and should work. I will give an example of where it has worked well in England: Brighton and Hove City Council made savings of a quarter of a million pounds in one year in its children's budget as a result of integrated working. The cost of foster care was reduced from £561 a week to £487 a week. This is not something that just sounds good in theory; in practice, when implemented, it produces results.

The Bill also requires reports on the operation of the Act: the first will be 18 months after the adoption of the children's strategy, and there will be further reports every three years thereafter. One of the questions consistently asked was this: if Departments do not cooperate, what will be the sanction? The reporting is a key aspect of holding Departments and Ministers to account, making them accountable to the Assembly and the wider public. There was debate about whether this should be an independent report, but the feedback was that self-assessment was an important part of ensuring the operation of the Bill. Indeed, the Children's Commissioner has the power to issue her own report if she feels that that is necessary. She has certainly indicated that it is likely that the commission will produce a report alongside that of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

A key requirement of the report is reporting not only on what has been done but on where greater cooperation could be achieved and what other opportunities have been identified to improve cooperation. Megan Fearon's amendment added further accountability by requiring the Executive to take account of the report in their preparation of the Programme for Government. I welcome the amendment, which adds an extra layer to the Bill through its impact on changing the workings of government in Northern Ireland.

In January, over 40 organisations involved with children attended the launch in support of the Bill. They included Children in Northern Ireland, the umbrella group for many NGOs in the children's sector, and many of its members were in attendance; the Children's Law Centre, which today provided an example of how it sees that the Bill could impact on and improve children's lives; and the Children's Commissioner. It was the commission's research, along with other research, that helped to inform the Bill and produce the evidence that a statutory duty to cooperate was needed. All along, from when I first joined the all-party group for children and young people, I very much felt that this Bill was the children's sector's Bill. It is a Bill for children, but it is a Bill whose genesis rests in the children's sector. Its work, lobbying and research are what drove me to introduce it. I feel privileged to present the Bill to the Assembly today on the sector's behalf. I thank every organisation that has contributed to the Bill, whether through my initial consultation or the consultation by the Committee for OFMDFM. I thank them for promoting the Bill and lobbying the Departments.

I highlighted that, for me, the genesis of the Bill was four years ago. Whilst it has been a long and challenging process, that time has allowed those who at the outset may have been resistant to the provisions of the Bill to come on board and to better understand how it can improve their working and the outcomes for children in Northern Ireland.

I again thank the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, which has worked consistently to improve the Bill to make sure that it is as effective as possible. I am delighted that both junior Ministers are here today and that one of them will respond to the debate on behalf of the Department. I also thank the Department of Health and the Health and Social Care Board; a considerable amount of the Bill will have a direct impact on them. Again, they have worked constructively with me to get amendments to ensure that, from their point of view, the Bill is effective. I thank the Department of Finance and Personnel, particularly for its input on the pooling of budgets.

Furthermore, I thank the Committee for OFMDFM. I think that I presented to it on five occasions in total; indeed, before the legislation was produced in its original draft, it has engaged on the Bill from an early stage. The questions and scrutiny have been constructive and instructive. At all times, the Committee has challenged but also supported me through the process. The Bill is better for its input and, indeed, for the report that it produced and the evidence that it took as part of its sessions. I also thank the Assembly Bill Office. Going back four years, it was clear that this would be complex legislation, and I have received excellent guidance through the process. We have faced frustrations with drafting and, if it had not been for their continued support, the Bill would not have seen the light of day. Finally, I thank my former researcher Ross Brown, now an elected rep in his own right, for the considerable research that he did in pulling together the evidence to show that, where a statutory duty has been implemented elsewhere, it has achieved results.

The intention behind the Bill is to improve services in a number of areas, including special educational needs and children in care. A final "Thank you" goes to VOYPIC, which has been constructive in its input on and support for the Bill. I hope that the Bill will improve early years provision by making the delivery of services more timely and allowing for the early intervention that is so key in children's lives. I hope that it will help to build on the work of the Children's Commissioner in highlighting the parallel processes between health and education in the transition to adult services for children with various support needs and, indeed, the youth justice system, where, on release, support with housing and education is required with the Department of Justice. I hope that it will improve those interdepartmental workings.

The Bill is about making government work effectively for children. It is about making good practice common practice and ensuring that resources for children are spent on children. I commend the Children's Services Co-operation Bill to the House.

11.30 am

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I thank Mr Agnew for his opening remarks and welcome the Final Stage of the Children's Services Co-operation Bill. As I said at an earlier stage, with the OFMDFM Committee's experience of bringing forward the Public Services Ombudsman Bill, we all have some appreciation of the time and effort required to bring a Bill through the House.

Committee members heard support for the aims of the Children's Services Co-operation Bill from a range of stakeholders during its examination at Committee Stage. However, concerns were expressed at an early stage by officials from the Department that the Bill as introduced to the Assembly would not meet its own objectives. The Committee is aware that, throughout Committee Stage, significant work was undertaken by departmental officials, who engaged with the Bill's sponsor and stakeholders to consider how the Bill could be improved.

Unfortunately, a final set of amendments was not available by the time the Committee undertook its clause-by-clause scrutiny, although the Department had provided a revised draft of what the Bill could look like. While supportive of the principles, the Committee opposed the clauses of the Bill as drafted. Members were supportive of the direction of travel outlined by OFMDFM in relation to a number of issues, but that support was, of course, subject to sight of any final amendments. The Bill before us today at Final Stage has been amended significantly from that which was introduced on 8 December 2014, and, indeed, it reflects some of the changes that had been considered by the Committee in its engagement with departmental officials.

I commend Mr Agnew's willingness to listen to others and to bring forward changes that should, ultimately, strengthen the legislation and deliver better services for our children and young people.

I will now make some remarks in a personal capacity, beginning by noting that the official papers that accompany the legislation remind us that the background and policy objectives go back 15 years to the tragic death in London of Victoria Climbié, a nine-year-old who was tortured and murdered by her guardians in 2000, and the shocking revelations at the time that many people had noted that she had signs of abuse. Local churches knew of her and knew of the signs of abuse; the health service knew of her and knew of signs of abuse; the police knew of her and knew of signs of abuse. Equally, the NSPCC and no fewer than four local authorities knew, and none acted. Victoria's case led to the public inquiry by Lord Laming, and, from that, the introduction at Westminster of the Children's Act 2004.

Here in Northern Ireland, I remember well one of the first cases that I dealt with as a journalist at Ulster Television. It was of a man who had been released from jail having served time for child sex abuse offences and yet had managed to get himself a job that included taking charge of a residential home in the Mourne where vulnerable young people went for respite care. It happened because the statutory agencies and the community and voluntary sector agencies that were aware of him at that time had no legal obligation to share information. Sharing and cooperation is at the heart of Mr Agnew's Bill, covering much more than child protection and, hopefully, tackling poverty. We are aware in the House of the high and increasing levels of child poverty and, indeed, of the recent case brought by the Committee on the Administration of Justice against OFMDFM for its failure to bring forward an anti-poverty strategy.

The intent of the Bill is consistent with my thinking and the Ulster Unionists' thinking on the best way for government to deliver positive outcomes, breaking away from the traditional delivery through vertical silos, where you have a Minister of Education, a Minister of housing and a Minister of health services operating in isolation, and remembering that it is not about education but about educational opportunities for people, social housing for people, health services for people, people who need us to cut through the vertical and start delivering horizontally through all the layers, Departments and silos of government to offer a holistic and individual package that meets their needs. That is why we are so pleased that the Stormont House Agreement recognised the advantages of, after the next election, setting aside time to discuss and, hopefully, agree a Programme for Government ahead of running d'Hondt, at which point the parties and the Ministers retreat into those vertical silos.

I believe that, if we create space for a fortnight's talks, we can make the space and time to agree a Programme for Government that will look horizontally at the issues. For example, if we consider that we want to tackle educational underachievement, we will agree that it is not just a matter for the Minister of Education. We know that healthier children will do better at school, and so there is a role for the Department of Health. We know that children need good housing, and so there is a role there for the Minister for Social Development. And so on and so forth. The Bill is consistent with our view of how you deliver the best positive outcomes from this devolved Government for the people of Northern Ireland, and I will be most interested therefore in seeing how Mr Agnew's Bill, in the sharing of resources and the pooling of funds, makes a positive difference for our young people as we go forward.

Mr Agnew made it clear in his remarks that the Bill is not perfect in his eyes. That is not actually the point. The point is that it is moving in the right direction. It is not just me, the Committee or the Department saying that; the practitioners and stakeholders believe that the Bill broadly pushes in the right direction for better results.

Towards the end of the last mandate, I heard an Executive Minister being pressed as to why they had not made a decision on a particular issue, and they defended their position by saying, "This is a very important issue and, therefore, we must take the time to make the right decision". I think that, in life, there is very often not a right decision. I think that, in life, there are very often a number of options, all of which may advance matters but all of which also have downsides that need to be managed. Therefore, it becomes a judgement call. I think that that is the case with the Bill, and my judgement call is that it moves matters in the right direction. It quite possibly has downsides that will need addressed. The Bill has reporting mechanisms, so we can look at continuous improvement. This is not an end but a beginning of a new process, and I very much believe and hope that it will deliver better outcomes through forcing, demanding and expecting cooperation from Departments and agencies for the benefit of our children and young people. On that basis, I support Mr Agnew's Bill.

Mr Moutray: I rise on behalf of the DUP to support the Final Stage of the Children's Services Co-operation Bill as introduced and brought to the House by Mr Steven Agnew and the subsequent changes at each stage throughout the process. At the outset, I commend the Member for his work, and I am happy to say that the DUP supports the policy intention behind the Bill.

We all want our children and young people to be involved in decision-making and want there to be a statutory duty on government and its Departments and agencies to cooperate in the planning, commissioning and delivery of children's services. There is a duty on Departments to cooperate with each other in the planning, commissioning and delivery of the children's services, and it will enhance the ability of pooled budgets, which ultimately allow for a resource-efficient way of delivering shared aims and outcomes.

I spoke on the Bill some time ago in the House and highlighted the Scottish model, Getting it Right for Every Child, which was aimed at promoting and coordinating across organisational and departmental boundaries to put children and young people at the heart of decision-making and give them the best start in life. I believe that, with the amendments and the reworking of the Bill since its initial form, we have been able to ensure that we, too, in Northern Ireland are able, like our Scottish counterparts, to connect sector providers with government so that people work collaboratively to deliver. Our aim, as a Government, should be to help children and young people reach their full potential. Some will travel through life with little or no issues; others will experience challenges; and, indeed, some will experience very complex issues. We must not be found wanting in our attempts to assist them come what may. I want every child and young person, as it says in the Bill, to be healthy; to enjoy learning and achieving; to be able to live in a society with stability; to experience economic and environmental well-being; to contribute positively to a community and society; and to live in a society that respects their rights. I support the Bill.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this Bill. I start by congratulating Steven Agnew for all his hard work in bringing this important piece of legislation forward. It has been a long road and a lot of hard work by a lot of people, as he said. He mentioned that it was four years since the beginning of the Bill. It is a win for him and for the children's sector today. I regret that I was not able to be here for Further Consideration Stage. I thank my colleagues for moving my amendment about the Programme for Government. I am pleased that it was passed.

This is a good Bill. It will have a great impact on society and the lives of our families and children. I am sure that we all received a letter from CiNI outlining its support for the Bill and giving a real-life example of how this Bill could have helped a girl many years ago. That shows us the importance of putting the interests of our children first. I welcome the fact that the Bill will make existing good practice in cooperation normal practice — or common practice, as Steven Agnew put it. We achieve our best results when working together. In a political sense, yesterday's result shows that.

A lot more work has to be done on this Bill, because a few issues could not be resolved in time for each stage. I am more than happy to continue to work with Mr Agnew and whoever within the children's sector or the House to progress those issues and make this the best Bill possible in the future. I am looking forward to the report on the operation and results of the Bill in less than two years' time, and to see how we can learn from and improve on that. We have all been frustrated at one point by the silo mentality of government. I am hoping that this Bill will change mindsets in that regard. I would like to see the roll-out of this collaborative approach to other important areas of government such as job creation, economic growth and tackling poverty, as others mentioned.

I am happy to support the Bill and glad to have played a part. Again, I congratulate Steven. It is a good day for our families and children, and a well-deserved win for the children's sector. I also welcome the new junior Minister to the Chamber.

Mr Attwood: In his opening remarks, Mr Agnew referred to the fact that in 2007 there was a policy proposal in relation to that which is before the House today. It has taken eight years to get from there to here, which is far too long. However, in a society that clings to the past and resists change, it might not have been so long after all.

Like everybody else, I acknowledge Mr Agnew's particular and personal contribution to creating the space and working the ground in relation to what will be known as Agnew's children's Bill, which is about not just his children but all our children across Northern Ireland. As he also rightly pointed out, more importantly than that, it is the children's sector children's Bill. For the 40 organisations that gathered with him when he launched his consultation on the content of the Bill, it is a measure of their work that another good private Member's Bill will pass through the House today.

Mr Agnew asked what difference it will make. He said that there needed to be a culture shift, and that is what is going to be required. In order to bring about a culture shift — as we know in relation to other embedded issues in our society, both current and historical — you need good law, robust process, strong leadership, clear accountability and strong performance. If any of those pillars are missing in how this legislation is now taken forward, there will be gaps in measuring up to the needs of children and young people.

For that reason, in acknowledging the presence of the new junior Minister in the Chamber, I will also ask her a number of questions.

There will be two in particular. This Bill will receive Royal Assent, probably before Christmas, and will become a statutory duty of government into next year, the next mandate and beyond. So, I have two questions for her.

11.45 am

First, at Consideration Stage — when the Alliance Party tabled an amendment in relation to, I think, clause 2, which referred to equality and good relations — I, and I think maybe others were thinking it, expressed a little bit of caution. We now have a situation where the principles that govern practice cover a wide range of children's needs and welfare informed by international instruments. We also have a reference to good relations and equality. Given that this has been introduced and is the will of the Assembly, and given the nature of those concepts, can she confirm that she and OFMDFM are satisfied that there will not be any unnecessary tensions within those principles arising from the good sentiment that informed the Alliance Party amendment in respect of equality and good relations? These are very big concepts. At times, the balance between, or the hierarchy of, equality and good relations has been a matter of some discussion if not dispute. I would like to hear from the junior Minister how she anticipates the principles being worked through in a way whereby there are no inherent tensions. I think that that can be dealt with, but I would like to hear from the junior Minister in that regard.

I come to my second question. This will all be measured in practice. The paint is not yet dry on the content of the Bill. However, given that a body of officials have been working on this, thinking about this and working with Ministers in relation to all of it, can the junior Minister indicate if there is now some further thinking about how this will be mainstreamed into the life of OFMDFM and, thereafter, mainstreamed into the life of government? In that regard, given that there is ongoing work, as I understand it, in respect of the Programme for Government and that we are a short number of months from the next Assembly election, if it is not earlier, how does the junior Minister anticipate this Bill and the obligations placed on government being mainstreamed into the next Programme for Government? If the Bill is passed today and receives Royal Assent by Christmas, it will be tested in real time and very quickly, given that there is about to be a new mandate and there will be agreement in relation to the content of the Programme for Government.

In conclusion, I acknowledge the work of the Bill Office. If you look at the Assembly's programme of work for the next number of weeks, you will see that there is less and less private Member's business, if any, and more and more business of legislation. The responsibilities that fall to the Bill Office, especially at the end of a mandate, are very substantial. The fact that this has progressed from Mr Agnew's opening meeting in January to a Bill being passed in early November is a measure of the good authority of all those involved, not least the Bill Office.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the opportunity to respond. The Alliance Party has had an Assembly manifesto commitment to support legislation that would introduce a statutory duty for all Departments to cooperate and collaborate. That is needed across a wide range of issues, but perhaps most notably in relation to children and young people's issues. It is for that reason that I am glad to welcome the Final Stage of the Children's Services Co-operation Bill and, like others, commend its proposer, Mr Agnew. It has been a pleasure to work closely with Mr Agnew on children and young people's issues, most particularly as members of the all-party group on children and young people. All-party groups sometimes get a hard time in the Assembly, but the all-party group on children and young people has shown itself to bring together elected representatives across parties, organisations and Departments on key issues affecting children and young people, and it is achieving outcomes as a result. I also acknowledge the work conducted by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and its officials in relation to enhancing the provisions of the Bill; the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, of which I am Deputy Chair; and the hard work of the officials at Committee Stage.

I acknowledge the contributions of all elected representatives who have contributed to making the Bill a strong mechanism to ensure more effective government delivery for children and young people across Northern Ireland. I also welcome the presence of the junior Ministers to respond to this stage of the Bill today. I congratulate Emma Pengelly on her appointment as junior Minister in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. I am glad that I have the opportunity of knowing Emma beyond the Assembly. I have a good working relationship with her. She has received scrutiny further to her appointment that, at times, has spilt over into unfair and inappropriate criticism, but no doubt she and I will continue to have robust exchange and scrutiny opportunities beyond today's debate.

There have been problems related to the coordination of the planning, commissioning and delivering of children's services. The Bill will make a significant contribution towards addressing those, and to the development and implementation of strong policy and legislation for children and young people. The centre for children's rights at Queen's University and the Children's Commissioner conducted work to investigate barriers to effective government delivery for children. They identified the need for stronger working together and joined-up government in relation to those issues.

There are significant ongoing inequalities and challenges to address for our children and young people in terms of child poverty, health and educational achievement in order to ensure that they have the opportunity to live in a safe and shared society. It is my hope that the Bill will make a significant contribution to meeting those challenges. The UN, as I have mentioned at other stages of the Bill, has warned that the failure to achieve positive outcomes for children is one of the most costly mistakes that a society can make. The Alliance Party will continue to work collaboratively with all elected representatives and political parties, and in government, to ensure that we do not make that mistake in Northern Ireland and that we work to deliver for our children and young people. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mrs Overend: It is my pleasure, as the Ulster Unionist spokesperson for children and young people, to support the Children's Services Co-operation Bill in its Final Stage today. I congratulate Mr Agnew on bringing it forward and pursuing such good aims and objectives.

The lack of cooperation and joined-up government has shown to be of detriment to the people of Northern Ireland time and again. With issues relating to children, failings in their early years have the potential to have an effect on the rest of their lives. I am sure that no MLA, in their work for constituents and in dealing with various and numerous issues, has failed to see the gaps and the failures of Departments in not working together. Most memorable to me are the many delays that children experience in relation to statementing for special educational needs. In those instances, it is essential that the Department of Education and the Health Department work effectively and efficiently together in a timely manner. Often, that is not the case; delays are experienced, and the result is that the child does not receive the help and support they need at the time in their development when they need it most.

I understand that various children's representative bodies support the legislation, not only in the implementation of policy but, importantly, in the making of policy and strategies. Indeed, the chief executive of Children in Northern Ireland, an umbrella group that has already been mentioned, has written to me and, I am sure, many other Members. She said:

"In recent years in Northern Ireland, critical chances for better outcomes for children and young people have been missed as key strategies have been insufficiently developed, implemented or integrated across government departments. So much more could be achieved for children and their families if there were greater levels of co-operation in policy design and implementation across government departments."

It is my hope that, when Departments finally get round to pulling together a cross-departmental strategy for Internet safety, the Bill will make such policy streamlined and effective and there will be natural cooperation on all these matters. The issue of Internet safety is cross-cutting. The Department of Education is responsible for children in schools and youth services; the Department of Health is responsible for safeguarding children and young people; and the Department of Justice needs to sing from the same hymn sheet in relation to laws, sentencing and deterrence.

It seems to me that, so far, the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister is not taking responsibility for overseeing such a cross-cutting strategy. It is my hope that this legislation will impose proper checks and balances in that regard. At this stage, I welcome the new junior Minister to her post; it is good to see her in the Chamber this morning.

I am content with the reporting responsibilities contained in the Bill. Good results should be prevalent in the report, and it is necessary that children's authorities work with the Executive Departments in its preparation and, furthermore, that it should include recommendations and opportunities for future cooperation. I am pleased that it will be live legislation, so to speak, with potential for improvements as time progresses. I support the Bill: it is an opportunity to set aside the silo mentality of Departments and work together for the benefit of children's services in Northern Ireland. I hope that such work will be catching and will spread across other sectors in the Assembly.

Mr Speaker: I welcome and congratulate Emma Pengelly on her recent appointment and call on her to respond to the debate.

Mrs Pengelly (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Thank you, Mr Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important matter. First, I commend Mr Agnew for the work he has undertaken to bring the Bill to Final Stage. He has acknowledged that there were some serious initial concerns about the Bill, but we appreciate that it has been significantly revised since it was introduced in December and that many of the amendments were a result of Mr Agnew's constructive collaboration with the sector, with Departments and particularly with the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. There is no doubt that the Bill has been improved by the amendments, and many of the concerns that were raised by Members at Second Stage have now been addressed. The Bill before the House today is now clearly focused on ensuring that all relevant bodies work together to improve the well-being of our children and young people. We understand that the Office of the Legislative Counsel has supported the work on the amendments and informed the thinking of officials and the Member as the Bill has been revised. As always, the expertise and knowledge of counsel is greatly appreciated, and the Bill is better for its valued contribution.

OFMDFM, the Executive and, I am sure, everyone in the Assembly want to see our children and young people achieve their potential. We want them to be healthy, achieve in education, have time and space to play, experience economic well-being and contribute positively to society. Those goals transcend normal departmental boundaries, and, in fact, I believe that they transcend normal party political boundaries.

No Department, agency or organisation can on its own improve the well-being of our children and young people. The issues facing our children and young people are so vast and varied that an holistic approach is required, and cooperation and collaboration are key. Of course, there are already examples of good practice in government. The Delivering Social Change framework driven forward by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister has encouraged Departments to work closely on the delivery of schemes such as the family support hubs, the numeracy and literacy scheme and the nurture units, delivering over £36 million worth of anti-poverty programmes in the last four to five years. The early intervention and transformation programme has also involved a number of Departments working on the co-funded delivery of better outcomes for children. It is now important that we work together to turn that good practice into common practice.

12.00 noon

It is clear that the Bill's intention is to ensure that organisations work better to deliver better outcomes to support better lives. The definition of well-being in clause 1 is welcome, given that it aligns closely with the current children and young persons strategy. It also provides a clear purpose to the duty to cooperate prescribed at clause 2. The issue of well-being in our policy work is something that we are actively exploring for further application.

The Bill places a number of duties on the Executive. They will be expected to introduce arrangements to promote cooperation, to develop a new strategy for children and young people and to report on progress in the achievement of key outcomes. In each of those duties, it is important that the focus remains on the well-being of the child or young person. The strategy and progress reports must focus on continually improving well-being. That is all the more welcome as the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister has been at the forefront of some exciting and innovative work in driving forward outcomes-based monitoring and outcomes-focused policy development.

The Bill provides potential opportunities for authorities to pool budgets in order to carry out activities that improve well-being. In a time of reduced budgets, it is important that Departments consider innovative ways of achieving outcomes with less funding. We welcome the amendment tabled by the Finance Minister that will allow DFP to produce further regulations on the issue. That should provide greater clarity for bodies wishing to pool budgets and ensure that the practice is not undermined by poor procedures.

I turn briefly to the points raised by Mr Attwood. On the good relations and equality duty, the relationship between section 75(1) and (2) is well established, and I know that the Member is well aware of that. I am confident that there will be no difficulty. Section 75(2) is, of course, without prejudice to section 75(1). However, the good relations duty is a severable duty on all public authorities. Sometimes, that can be overlooked, but I believe that the perceived tension between section 75(1) and section 75(2) can easily be addressed.

Mr Attwood asked about mainstreaming. In my view, the Bill is entirely in line with the work that we have been doing in OFMDFM on collaborative design or co-design, as it is known, and on collaboration on a cross-departmental and cross-agency basis. It is in that context that the Bill is, if I may use the term, pushing at an open door. I am confident that it can be mainstreamed in the next Programme for Government because that is the context in which we are developing a range of new initiatives.

Mr Attwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Attwood: For the first time; not for the last time.

I hear what the Minister says about pushing at an open door, but I think that the sense of the Bill, in many places, is that it should be a game changer and that that should be manifest in a qualitative change in the relationships between government and agencies in respect of the statutory duties and a qualitative change in how the Programme for Government is shaped around those duties. Do you acknowledge that that might be the ambition that people have, whilst noting the work of OFMDFM in that regard to date?

Mrs Pengelly: As the Member is aware from many long hours of negotiation, I am not somebody who gives way very easily.

I do not think that we really want there to have to be a statutory duty for people to cooperate, and I suppose that that is what I am trying to get at. A statutory duty in that sense is the last resort. We want agencies and Departments to want to work together to reach better outcomes for our young people. I believe that, in the work that we have carried on through the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, we see that change starting to permeate across Departments and agencies. I think that it is a change of culture, as opposed to one necessarily of statute. I absolutely welcome the Bill — it is a useful contribution to that — but we will continue to work our hardest to ensure that there is willingness at all levels to cooperate and collaborate fully on these important issues.

If the Bill is supported by the House today — I understand that it will be — that will be only a first step. Consideration will be required of how cooperation can be promoted and integrated working supported. A key element of that will be getting the next children and young people's strategy right. Work is already under way in the Department on the next strategy, given that the existing one concludes in 2016. It is therefore timely that this legislation has come into play. The new strategy will be expected to consider the key issues facing children and young people and outline how government will work collaboratively to improve the well-being of our children and young people. OFMDFM wishes to develop the new strategy through co-design and engaging with Departments, external stakeholders and children and young people throughout the process to gather views, test assumptions and develop an agreed approach.

The Bill has highlighted the need for better cooperation in this vital policy area. The range of outcomes that we wish to achieve for our children and young people can be realised only if we all work together. Mr Speaker, I support the Bill.

Mr Agnew: I thank the House for its consideration of the Bill from the preliminary stages, when the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister took an early interest in the Bill, until today, when there appears to be unanimous support for it.

In his contribution, the Chair of the Committee brought our attention back to the horrific case of Victoria Climbié, which caused a culture shift in England and led, ultimately, to the Children Act 2004 on the back of Lord Laming's report. It was to that legislation that I looked originally when seeking to produce this Bill. We do not want such horrific cases to happen again — I will not go back over the details, as they are considerably upsetting — and preventing that type of atrocity through better joined-up working by our services is certainly one of the key aims of the Bill. Mr Nesbitt highlighted that it is not about Ministers, Departments or institutions; ultimately, it is about the people whom they are set up to serve. The Bill is about ensuring that the child is at the centre of the work that Departments do.

Mr Nesbitt highlighted the benefit of agreeing the Programme for Government before d'Hondt is run — it was part of the Stormont House Agreement — and of how agreeing how each Department will work before we know which party will take each post could improve governance in Northern Ireland. I do not think that is in doubt or that any of us here would deny that we can improve how we do governance in this part of the world. This Bill, along with that proposal, should it be implemented, the work on John McCallister's private Member's Bill and, indeed, when it comes forward, the Bill to reform the number of Departments, can be another significant step in the evolution of the Assembly and in how we deliver for the people of Northern Ireland. Change is needed, and, collectively, those proposals can improve the effectiveness of these institutions. There is a public perception — I think it is an accurate one — that the institutions are not as effective as they could be. We only need to look at Scotland to see how much more their devolved institutions have been able to achieve for their people to recognise that we can and should do more in Northern Ireland. I hope and believe that this legislation will play its part in that.

I will reflect on some other Members' contributions. Mr Moutray — I thank him for indicating his support — talked about the Bill as a resource-efficient way of delivering shared aims and outcomes among the Departments. Indeed, he mentioned the good work in Scotland. I took time to meet the children's Minister there. She happens to be an old friend, but, on this occasion, it was purely a business meeting to see the work that they have done on their Children and Young People Act. Again, that was government legislation, and there is much in it that we can look to in how we deliver for children, not least one proposal that I was impressed by, which was having a named person for all children. That is something that we should look to in this Assembly to ensure that every child has a named adult to whom they can go for support in navigating the statutory services.

Megan Fearon recast my phrase about making good practice common practice by saying that we should make good practice normal practice. I like that phraseology: we should make the good normal. Delivering for children should be what we do. She also said that it was a good day for children and families. Again, I welcome her support.

Mr Attwood said that this was Agnew's children's Bill, and he said that it should be about more than my children. I absolutely agree: as a father of young children, I see the challenges for parents in navigating statutory services, and I understand the frustrations. He is right in saying that this is about all children in Northern Ireland. We often talk about vulnerable children, but let me be clear that this is about all children. It is to ensure that there are no gaps through which vulnerable children can fall. When we provide the net for all, we catch all, including vulnerable children. It will ensure that those who need the support get it, because, often, we spend too much time trying to identify who the vulnerable are and not enough time providing the services required.

Chris Lyttle spoke of the work of the all-party group on children and young people. That is an important point. The group is not a formal mechanism of the Assembly, but it provides vital input into the work that we do. I hope that, on this occasion, it provides an example of politicians listening, because it was through that forum that the idea of having a private Member's Bill came forward. It shows that, through civic engagement, the Assembly can deliver more. Undoubtedly, politicians do not have a monopoly on good ideas. We should listen and engage, and legislative change such as this can come about as a result.

I welcome Sandra Overend's support, and I commend her because she highlighted the work that she is doing and the important need to improve Internet safety and how the aim of protecting and safeguarding children can be achieved only if Departments such as Health, Education and Justice work together in common cause.

Excuse me, Mr Speaker, I have too many notes. Finally, I welcome Ms Pengelly to her role as junior Minister. I welcome her contribution to the debate today and, indeed, any work that she did on the Bill in her previous role, when I was working with the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. There was a collective effort in that office to improve the Bill. I welcome the commitment that this is pushing an open door and this is the direction of travel for the Department.

She said that it is really just the start, and that is key. The passing of the legislation is not an end in itself. The end is the effective delivery of services to children.

12.15 pm

It is incumbent on this Assembly in the mandate's remaining time and particularly on the next Assembly to scrutinise the work of the various Departments to ensure that the Bill's potential and vision are realised. I hope to be in that Assembly to scrutinise the work myself, but there is the small matter of an election to fight before then, so I take none of those things for granted. However, I have no doubt that, whatever Members are elected to the next Assembly, in conjunction with the children's sector, there will be a great deal of scrutiny of the delivery of the next children's strategy and the next Programme for Government, particularly its provisions for children.

I will finish by repeating a quotation that I came across when I was doing my research for the Bill. A parent was asked what integrated working meant to her, and she replied:

"Integrated working is not having to repeat myself 30 different times to 30 different officials."

If the legislation can achieve that objective, it will be well worthwhile and will ensure that families do not face the frustrations of silo working and the lack of joined-up government that we have seen in the past.

I thank Members for their contributions and their support. I thank all those who contributed to bringing the Bill this far. I look forward to it receiving the support of the House today and Royal Assent in the near future.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

Post-primary Transfer Process

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mrs Overend: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes that a solution to the post-primary transfer process has not been found; further notes that a one-size-fits-all educational system will not work; believes that it is becoming increasingly unacceptable that, every year, thousands of young people are sitting unregulated transfer tests and that primary schools are placed in the difficult position of mediating between parental demand and Department of Education policies; further believes that the ongoing politicking of the issue does not address the seriousness of the matter; and calls on the Minister of Education to convene talks with all the major stakeholders in order to build consensus and agree a way forward on the issue.

As the Ulster Unionists' education spokesperson, I commend this afternoon's motion on the post-primary transfer process to Members.

On Saturday morning coming, thousands of 10- and 11-year olds will go into 35 grammar schools all over Northern Ireland to sit the first of three common entrance assessment exams, organised not by the Department of Education but by the Association of Quality Education (AQE). The fee is £46. In two weeks' time, on 14 November, the Granada Learning (GL) assessment, sponsored by the Post Primary Transfer Consortium (PPTC) will take place in 35 schools. Some schools are using both the GL and AQE tests, so some 10- and 11-year-olds face four weeks of tests from now until the end of November. Results will be released at the end of January, and those will determine whether the entrants gain places at the grammar school of their choice.

I understand that, last year, 7,285 children were entered for the AQE assessments and 7,255 for the GL assessments. Early indications are that even more have applied this year. How did that state of affairs come about, and why does it seem that so many in this place are quite prepared to accept the status quo?

Politics, like nature, abhors a vacuum. A vacuum in the process to transfer children from primary schools to secondary schools was created when, following the last official 11-plus exam in 2008, nothing was put in its place. The vacuum that was left when the 11-plus was scrapped has been filled by two non-state exam systems. It was inevitable that, in the absence of an ordered and thought-out method of transferring pupils, tests unregulated by the Department of Education would be devised.

The AQE and PPTC deserve credit for the professional way in which they have gone about organising their transfer tests, and I am not aware of many complaints about the fairness of the system. However, it is perhaps typical of this place that there are two rival testing regimes. Whilst the AQE and GL tests are professionally organised and are a response to parental demand for the continuance of academically selective grammar education, what we have now is not what we, as legislators, should want for our children. In the past, the old 11-plus exam received heavy criticism for putting 10- and 11-year-olds under undue pressure, but just look at the situation that we find ourselves in now. Today, in 2015, a system that is much more akin to social selection is being entrenched, whereby better-off families are paying for tuition and coaching for the AQE or GL tests. A common complaint about the 11-plus was that children with better-off parents were coached for the test. If there was an element of truth in that 10 years ago, it is even more true today. It looks like private tuition is becoming a major growth sector in the local economy, and whose fault is that?

Our motion refers to and criticises party politicking, and I do not want to add to that unnecessarily. However, some things need to be said. In general, it is the fault of the Executive for failing to find a solution since 2007. More specifically, it is the fault of successive Sinn Féin Education Ministers for polarising the debate and creating the current stand-off. Sinn Féin, the so-called socialist party, has actually succeeded in privatising the transfer test. Well done, McGuinness, Ruane and O'Dowd.

Leaving politics aside, I ask all Members to ask themselves a simple question. If you went to a grammar school, think of those pupils — you may have been one yourself — who came from less affluent backgrounds and sat and passed the 11-plus, went to a grammar school and excelled academically. Do you think that they would have sat one of the current non-departmental tests? Would they even have had an opportunity to go to the local grammar? Whatever you think about the old 11-plus, everyone had the chance to take it. There are plenty of examples of the social mobility that it provided. The Ulster Unionist Party recognised the limitation of the 11-plus a long time ago. Equally, we recognise the limitations of the new, unofficial 11-pluses. However, at the same time, we recognise that selection is a natural part of life.

Back in 2004, Martin McGuinness said:

"A system which designates any 11-year-old child a failure is fundamentally flawed and must be replaced."

Yet, I do not see any child who does not go to a grammar school as a failure. That is similar to the designation of our children as failures if they do not study A levels or do not go to university. It is a real bugbear of mine every August when we hear on the radio and from advisers after the A-level results have been released. They say, "Don't worry if you didn't do well enough in your A-level exams to get into university. There are other options for you such as studying at an FE college." It is not about saying that one option is better than another. Rather, it is about finding the most suitable form of education for each individual to enable each to find their full potential. The question is how we assess individuals.

Universities select students on the basis of their A-level exam results, sixth-form colleges select their A-level students on the basis of their GCSE results and most, if not all, secondary schools stream their pupils on the basis of objective academic criteria. It is entirely possible to be 100% against the P7 test but 100% for academic selection. The problem at age 18 and 16 is the same as at age 11. We need to look at each individual and decide not how clever they are but how they are clever, and which type of educational system suits their learning style.

The pressure that the new transfer test system puts on primary schools, especially year 6 and 7 teachers, is not fair. It is also not fair for the Minister to authorise warning letters to be sent to some primary schools accusing them of, horror of horrors, helping to prepare their pupils for the tests. Those primary schools and their principals and teachers are under enough pressure from the expectations of parents at the school gate. Again, it is a situation not of their own making; it is one born of political failure.

In our motion, the Ulster Unionist Party is not prescriptive about how the 11-plus impasse will be ended. We believe that academic selection should be part of post-primary transfer, but we also believe that we do not want to see the current situation set in stone. We want a solution based on teacher guidance and continuous assessment at primary level.

There are other aspects to the debate, and questions that demand answers. How do we deal with the attainment gap and persistent underachievement? Is 14 a more appropriate age at which to choose between a more academic or a more technical and vocational route? The point of the debate is that those important issues have effectively been set aside and ignored since the unofficial tests have taken root. It seems to me that the transfer test has become the elephant in the room. It is a difficult issue, but ignoring it will not make it go away. The only conclusion that I can come to is that, at some point after the restoration of devolution in 2007, Sinn Féin and the DUP came to a truce on the issue. Sinn Féin could say that it had abolished the official 11-plus, but the DUP could say that it had salvaged it through the unofficial tests. I say that because the post-primary transfer issue seems to have disappeared off the radar, which cannot be right.

The Minister and his Department need to convene talks with all major stakeholders to build consensus and agree a way forward on the issue. There was an opportunity to do that, and it was happening before 2002. In February 2010, Sir Reg Empey — now Lord Empey — said:

“Education is the most glaring failure of the executive so far ... There is one way to prove that this executive is not dysfunctional and that is to reach a consensus on education.”

How right he was, four and a half years ago. The issue has not gone away and will not go away. It must be revisited and resolved. The future of our children demands it.

Mr Weir: I would describe what we are faced with in the motion as a little bit of a mixed bag. Elements of it are very good and others less so. If the main thrust of this is that it would be preferable to have a regulated system, I certainly agree with that. I have no problem with discussions taking place on how that can be best achieved. Similarly, one area that I also find agreement with is the focus of those discussions. Any discussions have to be on a realistic basis that recognises the legal position. I think that, if we are able to reach a single system of testing by way of academic selection, that will be welcomed. However, while regulation is desirable if we can reach consensus on it, which I suspect is where the difficulty may lie, it is wrong to portray the current system of unregulated tests as some form of disaster out there.

When this party helped negotiate the right for academic selection to be put in legislation in 2007, we were told by the then Education Minister, Caitríona Ruane, that a system that was not regulated would be some form of disaster, it would be overwhelmed with court challenges and the whole system would collapse very quickly. However, as has been indicated, since that date, tens of thousands of pupils have gone through the tests; indeed, the indications are, as I think even the proposer indicated, that they are becoming more popular. This year, I think, the AQE figures will go up, and a projected 7,760 will take the tests. So, if we are having discussions, they must be based on the realities of the legal position. That is an important factor.

Secondly, although politics has played a role in this and different approaches have been taken, it is naive to believe that politicking is barring a solution and this could be sorted out quickly if the politicians simply disappeared. The reality is that we have the current system because there is widespread disagreement not just among politicians but among schools, parents and, indeed, the different desires that are there. As a party, we back parental choice, which is why, as a party, we were four-square behind the Dickson plan, which worked very well in that area. We certainly accept the rights of a lot of parents who want to opt out of any form of selection and to send their children to non-selective schools, but we stand four-square behind the rights of schools and parents to have academic selection.

We agree with the sentiment in the motion that one size does not fit all; we have to recognise that diversity. I caution against the suggestion, however well intended, that progress is simply done by way of some form of teacher guidance. Having teachers effectively selecting who goes to a particular school would put teachers in an impossible situation. That was tried out for one year at the beginning of the 1980s but was immediately abandoned by the Government, because it could have led to teachers being pressured, questions of favouritism and parents lobbying for their children to get in. We need a single system of tests.

We support academic selection. Mention has been made of social mobility, which is very important. One of my concerns about the discussion of the transfer process is that, sometimes, it has tended to distract from where the real issues of underachievement and social mobility tend to take place, which are very much in the early years. That is where the main focus has got to lie. If academic selection were made illegal overnight, we would be left with an exacerbation of the problems with social mobility. We would have a situation such as has developed in England, with schools based purely on the ability to pay — a system of public schools where any opportunity for a child from a lower socio-economic background to progress well in their education would effectively be removed. We would exacerbate the problems of social mobility. That is not to say that there are not problems with social mobility that we need to tackle, but we have to make sure that we do not produce solutions that are counterproductive.

I am in favour of any form of discussions that can take place, but they have got to be grounded on reality. From that point of view, solutions that are designed to effectively phase out academic selection or, indeed, to simply persuade those who are in favour of academic selection of the error of their ways will not be productive. I suspect that, with the best will in the world, we are unlikely to reach consensus, but it has got to be grounded on recognition of the legal right to academic selection. From that point of view, therefore, I conclude my remarks.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank my colleague on the Education Committee Sandra Overend for moving the motion, although I think it is, to use a phrase, a dog's dinner of a motion. It is contradictory in every sentence, but I think, to be fair and respectful, that that has, at times, signalled a lot of Ulster Unionist policy on education reform over the last number of years. I think you are, as your leader said yesterday about marriage equality, on the wrong side of history when it comes to academic selection. The USA, the South, Britain, Canada — all the countries around the world — are lining up to pass legislation for marriage equality; they also made academic selection obsolete many years ago. Why does this part of the world end up being a backwater when it comes to getting on with the times? When it comes to academic selection and the refusal of a rump of schools and boards of governors to move with the times, that is certainly the case.

The motion talks about needing to find a solution: a solution has been found. More than two thirds of our schools no longer work with academic selection; less than a third of our schools do that. A solution has been found. The Member talked about a vacuum being created, because nothing was put in place. That is the whole point: nothing needs to be put in place. The motion also talks about the need to remove politicking and politics from the debate, yet the proposer went on to blame Sinn Féin for the failures in this regard. Again, I repeat: DE does not set admissions criteria; boards of governors set admissions criteria. The proposer said that selection at 11 and 10 is, somehow, the same as selection at 18: that is absolute nonsense. We select at 18 because you are going on to university to do a specific course, so you need specific skills. A one-size-fits-all test at age 10 is not the same. That takes me on to my next point about the motion. The motion talks about a one-size-fits-all model not working, so why would we apply a one-size-fits-all test to our children? It will not work, and it does not work.

Probably the one part of the motion that I do agree with is that it is entirely unacceptable: children should not be put through the mire of having to do this. My thoughts are with the families and children who will have to do that this weekend. It is totally unnecessary. The proposer talked about parental demand. Again, parental demand is not for the test; it is for access to the good school. I enjoyed a very good education at an elite Catholic grammar school. I do not want to get rid of grammar schools; I want everybody in society to be able to access those schools. If we have academic selection, that is not open to everybody in our community.

The motion talks about talks, but this question must be put to those on the opposite Benches: would you listen? Would you listen to the Churches that are opposed to academic selection? Would you listen to the teaching unions that are opposed to academic selection? Would you listen to the vast majority of political parties that are opposed to academic selection?

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: I am sorry; I just want to get through this particular point.

Would they listen to the United Nations, which is opposed to academic selection? Would they listen to the Equality Commission, which is opposed to academic selection? Most importantly, would they listen to children? I have no doubt that if we actually asked our children whether they wanted to do this, they would also want to find a better way. I will give way at that point.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. He is very exercised about listening to the Churches. Does he pick and choose when he listens to the Church? I am very sure that he received correspondence from the Roman Catholic Church yesterday, in relation to a vote that took place in this House, and his party completely and absolutely ignored it. Do not introduce red herrings on this issue when your Minister has failed to convince the Roman Catholic system that it is time to move away from academic selection. Let us be honest; let us have a discussion; and let us stop the red herrings because it will not work.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for his interjection. I must see different Catholic schools and boards of governors moving away from academic selection than those that the Member sees. I think that he must be reading a different letter than I am. He talks about red herrings. Let us talk about red herrings. Many of those schools — for example, at least four last year — had more places available than there were applicants, yet they made them sit the test anyway. Why was that? That test was a complete red herring. I think that that gets to the very crux of this: it has become a modelling and marketing campaign for those schools who want to say that they are good schools and that, without this test, you are somehow not a good school.

Let us look at the international evidence. As shown by the latest PISA figures, education systems in Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Australia and Poland are outperforming our schools in terms of 15-year-olds reaching the very top grades in maths, literacy and science. Not a single one of those systems is selective, so they must be doing something right. Evidence that academic selection at age 11 benefits children is totally non-existent. Nobody in this Chamber will be able to point to an academic-selection system anywhere in the world that benefits the children or the system. Again, I challenge anybody here to name one single educational benefit to children of academic selection. I challenge anybody to do that today. All the international evidence and OECD report after report tell us that the best systems worldwide are non-selective and that a school environment with a good social and academic mix benefits all children. This is an evidence-based approach; it is not an ideology. That takes the politics out of it. It is an evidence-based approach. Selection has been made entirely obsolete throughout the world.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Hazzard: Our primary schools, nursery units, FE colleges, universities and workplaces are of mixed ability. Why should we not make post-primary schools this way, too? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Rogers: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate as the SDLP's spokesperson on education. It is a very important debate that concerns many families each year as their children prepare for educational life beyond primary school. The motion rightly refers to the fact that we have not yet found solutions to the post-primary transfer problem. Currently, an unregulated system operates that, in some cases, is much more arduous than the previous system. We need to do something about it.

The SDLP, alongside others in this House, attempted to achieve resolution of the problem in 2009-2010, but an agreed solution could not be found. The origins of the chaos and the resultant failure to deal with the issue have led to a "plague on all our houses" attitude and approach to the issue in this House. Leadership and political maturity are required to solve the post-primary transfer issue and prevent worsening outcomes for children here.

Let us look at some of the problems with unregulated tests. Academic selection at age 11 is still in place here and lacks uniformity. As a result, children, parents and teachers are forced to endure months of uncertainty about the future. Testing has become privatised in schools and parents have to pay. Those who can afford it are having their children coached for the exams privately. Who do we blame? They are trying to make the best out of the current system for their children, and it is the system that is the problem. We, as parents, always want to do the best for our children.

In 2015, the Department of Education issued guidance in which unregulated transfer exams were mentioned. While the Department urges a robust test and a move away from academic selection, this amounts to a nagging approach rather than real authority to deal with the problem. The legislative power to provide such an approach does not exist as we have not agreed the way forward.

We know the great strides that can be made if consensus is achieved. We can look to Finland as a sterling example of this. In 1963, they decided to reform their education process and began a period of transition and structural reform, backed up by political will. This meant that, by 2009, they led the world's educational attainment tables. We, too, can strive to make changes for the better but we must agree a way forward to end the current system of unregulated transfer tests.

The current system, including private tests, fees and coaching, puts additional pressure on children and families from socially deprived backgrounds. Many children now have to sit two or more tests, often comprising multiple papers. This also affects our primary schools. We know that parents, when considering which primary school to send their children to, will often look to see whether tutoring is provided for the local school transfer test. Teachers, too, have been placed under contradictory pressures from the Department, which does not want them teaching to a test, and from some parents who want their children to be prepared for and to pass a test because they have the best interests of the child at heart.

Many of the problems in the current education system do not stem from the 11-plus alone. Inequalities are produced at the early stages of the education system and children who fall behind in early years rarely recover the lost ground. In dealing with the post-primary transfer system, we must make sure that our education system is adequately funded and we must support early years education in order to address educational underachievement and prevent the widening inequalities that are aided by the current education system. We must deal with the heavy bureaucracy in the education system, where less than 60% of the education budget actually gets to the classrooms.

The SDLP envisages a system that is focused not just on exams but on a rounded education for our children and on parental choice of integrated, Irish-medium, state or faith-based education through the provision of appropriate access for all pupils. We are committed to achieving social equity in education through excellence. It remains the case that academic selection at age 11 is educationally unsound and socially unjust. A reassessment of patterns of investment in education is required to remove the high levels of inequality in the education system. This is of crucial importance for the development of our economy too, as a well-educated workforce underpins any thriving economy. The stagnation on this issue has gone on far too long and is preventing higher education outcomes, equality of opportunity and our economy from flourishing.

Mr Lunn: I rise without knowing whether we are going to support the motion or not, frankly, because it has been colourfully described as a "mishmash" and a "dog's dinner" —

Lord Morrow: You are used to that.

Mr Lunn: They were not my descriptions; they came from your colleagues and from the Benches on this side as well. If I can think of something equally colourful, I will try to bring it in before I finish.

The Alliance Party, quite obviously, opposes selection at age 10 — effectively, it is at age 10. Our debates on education always end up as the same debate. We always come back to this issue and I really do not know what the solution is. The motion:

"calls on the Minister of Education to convene talks with all the major stakeholders in order to build consensus and agree a way forward".

Frankly, you can already see how much consensus there is here today; it just does not exist. We have two sides to the argument that are just poles apart and are liable to remain so.

Members have referred to the tests as they currently stand. Even people who support the tests acknowledge the pressure that they put on children at a young age but they do not appear to be able to query the necessity for them.

12.45 pm

The Dickson plan was referred to. It still involves a level of selection, but it is later, at age 14, which would at least be a step in the right direction. Other Members said that, at some stage, there has to be some weeding out, selection or streaming and a final exam that you stand or fall by, and I accept that. However, the notion of testing children, particularly in the present mishmash of a system that has the potential to involve so many tests and two different systems, is absolutely indefensible, yet people continue to defend it as the best way forward.

The motion:

"further notes that a one-size-fits-all educational system will not work".

Mrs Overend's predecessor was Danny Kinahan, who has since been elevated to higher things. I remember the Ulster Unionists tabling a motion to establish a single education system, and Danny frequently tried to explain to us exactly what that meant, but without success because we were all slightly baffled. This one-size-fits-all system will not work — well, OK.

The motion notes that sitting these tests is becoming “increasingly unacceptable” for “thousands of young people” and mentions the pressure, the “unregulated” nature of the tests and the pressure put on schools. That is Alliance thinking, so I will not disagree with that.

The motion continues:

“further believes that the ongoing politicking of the issue does not address the seriousness of the matter”.

The ongoing politicking is between the two opposite poles. Those at one pole think that selection tests are essential, and those at the other pole agree with me, as I agree with them, if I may put it that way, that they are unjustifiable. I have to say to the Ulster Unionists that, down the years, they have consistently supported the DUP on whether selection tests should continue. If the motion is a small step in the right direction, and there is some realisation among the Ulster Unionists that — here we go again — they might be on the wrong side of history, I would welcome that, but I am not so sure.

Mr Rogers referred to a previous attempt to find a solution. He may have been referring to the committee that was set up, dare I say it, by me some years ago. It tried to find a way forward, and several MLAs met to discuss the issue. We set up a committee of leading educationalists, who did most of the work for us, but they could not find a solution. At the time, Sinn Féin would not join that project. The current Minister was then the party's education spokesperson, and I think that he had been inclined to join until the party told him the actual way of it.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I don't think so.

Mr Kennedy: Answer.

Lord Morrow: Did a big whip come out?

Mr Lunn: I think that he may have had his knuckles rapped on that occasion.

Mr O'Dowd: I think you might be on the wrong side of history there. [Laughter.]

Mr Speaker: Watch the time.

Mr Lunn: I am finished. I imagine that we will support the motion on the basis of the last couple of lines. The rest of it is, I totally agree, a dog's dinner and mishmash.

Mr Craig: Like others, I find the motion a little confusing. I did not describe it as a mishmash, baffling, bewildering or a dog's dinner, but I find aspects of it extremely confusing. It was good to hear the proposer admit to the fact that it was the DUP that salvaged the transfer principle, and, through the years, whether others believe us to be on the wrong side of history or not is not something that has ever bothered us. It was often said that our founding father was always on the wrong side of history. That never held him back, and I am sure that it will not hold us back either.

Would it be nice to have a regulated testing system? Yes, it probably would. I say that with some scepticism because I am one of those who went through the regulated system, and my daughter went through what is now described as the unregulated system. I have to be fundamentally honest with the House that my experience is that the unregulated system is a thousand times better than the regulated system was. I make no apology for saying that, because I have experienced both, and I know which is the much better experience for the pupil.

Am I content with the unregulated system that we have? I am not content that there are two unregulated systems out there. I have always appealed to those involved in the debate to come up with a single unregulated system. Is it wrong to have an unregulated system? No, I do not believe that it is. I am not one who thinks that government must do everything. I think that a remarkable job has been done in a very stressful situation, and I make no apology for saying that. Is it a disaster? No, it has not turned out to be a disaster. Has the unregulated system gradually been going away, as others said? Are people running away from it? Well, I have bad news for all of you: the numbers taking the unregulated tests have not gone down, and they are not going down. Parental choice is a wonderful thing. As others said, it is parents who make the choice to send their children to the best schools for their educational achievement. If children are academically inclined, that is the right road to send them down.

Mr Lunn: I thank Jonathan for giving way. When he says that it is a matter of parental choice, does he not realise that parents feel that they have no choice but to put their children under that pressure in order for them to get into what he terms the “best schools”? It is parental choice turned on its head.

Mr Craig: I thank the Member for his comments, and I will come to address them. That hits on a fundamental issue with the whole selection process. There are parents out there who think that the only means of getting their children into the best school is to put them through the test. Some other parents make the choice not to put their children through that system and to send them to other extremely good schools, and I have no difficulty with that.

Let us take a look at the alternative, which nobody seems to want to talk about. What is proposed there? It is called the postcode lottery. People living near some of the grammar schools would, I think, be delighted with the postcode lottery, because, automatically, the value of their property would double, treble or whatever. However, the reality is that the only people who would get to those extremely good schools in our society are the economically well-off. The deprived children whom we are talking about, many of whom have passed the academic tests and got into those schools, would no longer have access to them. I have never heard that issue addressed anywhere, and no one has tackled it. We talk about Every School a Good School, and that is a good principle, a good start and a way forward. However, we will still see the postcode lottery, with only the well-heeled getting into what are grammar schools today.

Are there other fundamental issues with the transfer process? Yes, I believe that there are, and they have nothing to do with the selection process. How do secondary schools in general find out what the achievement levels of children are? There is an issue that has not gone away, Minister.

Mr Hazzard: Will the Member give way?

Mr Craig: Sorry, but my time is up.

The issue is around how we measure the achievement levels of children going from primary to post-primary.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I could go through the motion and pick out the bits that I agree with and the bits that I disagree with, and we could argue back and forth about the rights and wrongs of various parts of it, but, really, where would that get us? To cut through the chaff, it seems to me that the debate has degenerated, certainly among those on the opposite Benches, into one about the rights and wrongs of the regulated test that previously existed versus the new, unregulated test. Let me nail my colours to the mast: both of them are wrong. Academic selection at 10 years of age is wrong. We can rehearse all the arguments that we have debated on many occasions in the Chamber, but let us cut to the chase. As legislators and public representatives, we have a responsibility to ensure that every child and young person is given the best opportunity starting out in life. Imagine if we were to stand up here today and say that there are certain categories of children who should not get the same opportunity as others, or that children of alcohol or drug-addicted parents should not get the same advantages as children who have good parents and are from stable backgrounds. Similarly, if we were to say that children from deprived backgrounds should not get the same opportunities as other children, we would be rightly castigated, but that is, effectively, what is being said here today.

I am not an expert. Look at the figures. Only 12% of children in grammar schools are on free school meals, which is the indicator of deprivation. What do I know about education systems? Like most other people in here, I have worked at various jobs. I am not an expert. I have not done any academic research. I do not have a PhD in comparative analysis of education systems; but, having been on the Education Committee, I have got bits and pieces of research, and people have come in to give evidence, and you absorb whatever you can and you make your assessment. Like everyone else in the Chamber, I will make an assessment on the basis of the evidence that is presented to me. So, what are the experts in the field saying? What does the research say? Let us look at the organisations that oppose academic selection: the Human Rights Commission; the Equality Commission; the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child; the Catholic bishops; the Children's Commissioner; and Professor Tony Gallagher, who is an adviser to the Education Committee and pro-vice-chancellor in Queen's University. We could go on and on, and we could look at the evidence presented in the PISA research that my colleague Chris Hazzard mentioned. The fact is that, if we are serious about educating all our children, academic selection has to go.

We already know what works. Look at St Patrick's High School in Keady. It pioneered and still operates a system of transfer that does not involve academic selection. Last year, 86% of its pupils achieved five GCSEs. In 2015, St Patrick's was voted the best non-selective post-primary school in the UK in the 2015 TES school awards. The judges said that the:

"innovative work and move away from banding, the amazing results achieved and rate of acceleration"

made St Patrick's stand out. St Patrick's fits into the category of Every School a Good School, and there is no reason why that cannot happen in every school. There is no reason why we should not take a holistic approach to education, from early intervention right through to continual professional development of teachers, so that teachers are taught and they learn how to teach children of all abilities. All the best systems of education in the world do that. If you go to Finland, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, you will see that they all operate non-selective systems. I oppose the motion.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to meet at 1.00 pm. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Oral Answers to Questions

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Windsor Park: Redevelopment Update

1. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the redevelopment of Windsor Park stadium. (AQO 8984/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): I thank the Member for his question. Windsor Park is currently under construction and is progressing well. After receiving approval from the IFA's insurer, the old west stand was demolished and the details of the next steps are being developed between the IFA, its insurer and the project team. To date, it is unknown how much the redevelopment of the entire west stand will impact on the project timeline. However, it is envisaged that, from the point of approval, construction of the new west stand will be completed within 12 months. Excluding the west stand, the remainder of the project is scheduled to be completed by January 2016, and I can confirm to the Member that the cost associated with rectifying the issues with the west stand will be a matter for the insurers and that no additional funds will be required by the Department.

A number of qualifiers have been hosted successfully at Windsor Park during the project time, and I am delighted that the team has been able to qualify for next summer's European Championship in France. I hope that the redevelopment of the stadium can continue to facilitate the team's training and preparation for competitions, and I wish them every success.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for her answer. I note that the Minister said that, when work on the west stand starts, it will take about a year. Is there a rough idea of when that project could start?

Ms Ní Chuilín: As I outlined in the primary answer — I am sure that the Member already knows this — the demolition process is well under way. The IFA, to its credit, has done everything that it possibly could, given the circumstances that it was in, which were beyond its and everybody else's control. It is working very closely with Belfast City Council, its insurers and, indeed, with the Department. The main project should be completed by January 2016, and I do not anticipate too many delays thereafter.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Whilst we are on the subject of sports grounds, could the Minister indicate if she would be supportive of clubs and grounds benefiting from rates relief, which is a measure that the IFA was supportive of?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The short answer is yes. The Member brought forward a private Member's Bill on rates relief for amateur sports clubs, and it is regrettable that that did not realise full support. However, I remain supportive of the extension of rates relief to sports clubs, particularly where the application of financial savings by clubs can benefit from release and particularly when it is targeted at the development of the sport and, indeed, the people who participate in the sport, particularly when we are all trying to achieve full inclusion. The continued absence of the rates relief is regrettable, but I will certainly do my best to work with the clubs to make sure that they have full advantage.

Mr Swann: I add my support to the Member for North Antrim for his attempt to get relief for sports clubs, especially as it would have brought in the pigeon clubs as well. The Minister mentioned the status of the insurance claim for Windsor. Can she give us an update as to where that stands?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Belfast City Council and the IFA are working through those issues. As I said to Alex Easton, I am confident that they are all taking a very pragmatic can-do approach to getting the issue resolved. I have no further details other than that. From what I am led to believe, the insurers are accepting full responsibility. The full redevelopment of Windsor Park should be completed by January 2016, and I anticipate that work should properly commence on the west stand very soon. Following the Member's query, I will ask for an update, and I am happy to furnish him with those details in writing.

Waterways Ireland: Staffing

2. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on staffing levels and redundancies at Waterways Ireland headquarters in Enniskillen. (AQO 8985/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Waterways Ireland employs 69 staff at its headquarters in Enniskillen: 60 permanent employees, two fixed-term contracts, two agency staff, four student placements, and one graduate internship. Waterways Ireland has not made any redundancies at its headquarters.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht an fhreagra sin. Is Waterways Ireland considering redundancies due to fluctuations in the value of the euro and pensions pressures?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have not received any indication that Waterways Ireland — or, for that matter, Foras na Gaeilge — is considering redundancies, although, hopefully, we will have a sectoral meeting on Friday.

There have been concerns about what impact fluctuations in the euro will have on pensions and pressures. All pension liabilities are covered 100% by the sponsoring bodies. Waterways Ireland has prioritised work so that urgent repairs and maintenance always take priority, particularly to ensure accessibility of navigations.

If there are any other details, I will happily furnish the Member with them in writing.

European Championships 2016

3. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what support her Department will provide to the Northern Ireland football team following their qualification for the European Championships 2016. (AQO 8986/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I congratulate the Northern Ireland team, staff and IFA on securing its place at the 2016 European Championship finals in France. For the team to qualify automatically is a fantastic achievement but also to top the group is testament to the incredible commitment of the manager Michael O'Neill and the whole squad.

Preparation for the finals is, as the Member will know, primarily the responsibility of the IFA, which has the knowledge and expertise required to ensure that the team has the right support. The Sports Institute, funded by DCAL and Sport NI, has and will continue to provide support to the team, manager and staff as they prepare for competitions.

My Department will continue to support the IFA through funding the project and the redevelopment of Windsor Park. That involves investment of approximately £28 million for the redevelopment of Windsor and a further investment of approximately £2.7 million towards the redevelopment of the Olympia Leisure Centre. The stadium will provide a world-class facility for the team as part of its preparations for the tournament.

The Minister will probably not be aware that I was three years old when Northern Ireland last qualified for a major tournament. I am sure that she would agree with me that the place that Northern Ireland football now finds itself is of epic proportions. Does the Minister feel, though, as we move into this new dispensation of football success that there is a real opportunity for us to grasp the beauty of true Northern Ireland identity? Will the Minister's Department be encouraging all our community to rally around the identity of being uniquely and wonderfully from Northern Ireland?

Ms Ní Chuilín: It will come as no surprise to the Member that while I wish the Northern Ireland team, and, indeed, the IFA, all success — and I do genuinely — I do not identify myself as Northern Irish in the same way as the Member does. However, the IFA has done brilliant and exemplary work in trying to make sure that football is accessible to all. It will continue to do that.

I do not believe that we should shoehorn people into supporting teams because some people support certain teams and others support other teams. We need to create the conditions whereby people can, of their own will, give support to whomever they want. For those who decide not to, that is their choice as well.

Even from when you were a mere boy in 1986, things have changed considerably. The atmosphere has changed considerably since then, but, despite all the work that they have done, and they have done great work, we have still some way to go.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagra. What assistance has the Minister's Department given the IFA to develop soccer at grass-roots level?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am still working very closely with the IFA and, indeed, the other two biggest governing bodies, the Ulster Council and Ulster Rugby. My Department has provided £4.5 million of funding for the three governing bodies and is particularly looking at accessibility for grass-roots groups and grass-roots sports and at enabling the three bodies to look not only at the whole area of sport but at healthy lifestyles, mental health, breaking down barriers, increasing access and increasing employment. When the work is completed by the three governing bodies next year, it will set them in good stead to compete for additional funding for the years ahead. The work that they have done at grass-roots level has been exemplary.

Budget Cuts

4. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what assessment has been made of the impact on employment of funding cuts by her Department. (AQO 8987/11-16)

6. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what evaluation was given to the impact of recent in-year budget cuts to the Arts Council. (AQO 8989/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will take questions 4 and 6 together. I thank the Members for their questions.

This has been a difficult Budget, with pressures directly resulting from cuts to our block grant by the British Government. I have had to redeploy a budget in DCAL to deal with the inescapable pressures that have emerged through the year and to focus on departmental priorities. That has meant reductions in some areas but increased budgets in others. The British Government have cut our block grant and have signalled that they are going to do so again in the future. As such, the budget allocations are going to become more regressive over the years.

We are halfway through the year, and many of our arm's-length bodies' (ALBs) costs, such as salaries and buildings costs, are fully committed for the year. In the case of the Arts Council, it is helpful to point out that it received the same percentage of pressure in its reductions as other bodies in DCAL did. Legacy work now planned for the north-west will continue and have a strong artistic and cultural component. I hope that I will have the opportunity to try to offset some of the worst costs through future monitoring rounds.

Mr McKinney: The Minister will be aware of the spirited protest outside the Assembly today. That spirit perhaps belies the deep anger that is felt by those protesters, many of whom are in the Chamber this afternoon. They have expressed themselves and are alarmed and disturbed at the in-year cuts, resulting as they have in loss of employment, insecurity and the taking away from vital programmes that are instrumental in the community. Will the Minister now reaffirm her commitment to the arts and reaffirm that she will restore those moneys to the Arts Council?

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, it is good to see the arts and the artists in the Public Gallery. It is also good to see from the badges being worn that there is now cross-party support for the arts, because, prior to that, there was not. It is also good to see that pressure is now being brought to bear about how valuable the arts are. In the absence of any financial security coming from our Executive, and in the absence of the security that we, as an Executive, need around the moneys that we have had taken from our block grant in July 2011, with more of the same having been earmarked in July of this year, I cannot and will not give a guarantee — I believe that to do so would be reckless — that I will be able to restore the budget that I desperately want to restore. I will certainly be a champion of the arts. I will argue for additional money for the arts, and I look forward to full party support for that argument on the Executive.

Mr B McCrea: Minister, you will be aware that there are hundreds of people outside who want to talk to you about the arts. I listened carefully to your answer. Would it be possible for you to meet those representatives of the arts after Question Time? They promise that it will not be in any way contentious. They do not want it to be a political football, but they would like to present you with their open letter to explain their situation. Of course, you could then explain the situation to them directly.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Thank you, Basil, for your question and your appeal. I am happy to meet them. I will never avoid any groups or any protest. I fully support people's right to protest. In fact, many of us came here through protest movements of one sort or other. I am happy to meet a small group of representatives. Straight after Question Time, I am meeting a group of BBC people who are lobbying me about the renewal of the BBC charter, but I will take five minutes to take the letter and hear what people have to say. I have already accepted invitations from arts and creative companies to go to Derry, particularly around receiving a delegation. I am happy to do that. I thank the Member for the tone with which he raised the issue.

2.15 pm

Mr McCausland: How can the Minister justify imposing in-year cuts on funding that has been committed to arts organisations and then siphon off the money to projects with no open application process and no transparency? Is that good practice?

Ms Ní Chuilín: You have a brass neck, given your history around Red Sky and others. You have an absolute brass neck. First of all — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Ms Ní Chuilín: First of all, on transparency, I did not meet anybody in rooms and conjure up dirty deals. The whole process was done in an open and transparent way, with a business case. It was not siphoning off. All other ALBs received a reduction as a result of Tory cuts, but you have a complete brass neck. I am glad to see that you are taking a reddener.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask everyone to refer their questions and answers through the Speaker's Chair, please.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answers to date. Will she outline some of the inescapable pressures in her Department?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There are many inescapable pressures; I am sure that the Member will appreciate that I cannot go through them all. However, as with other Members who have asked for details, I am happy to complete what I do not cover here in writing. There is over £430,000 to meet health and safety requirements to comply with statutory obligations. There is £300,000 towards our Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC) programme, which is required to ensure that the positive outcomes from the pilot scheme are maximised. Also, looking at our City of Culture legacy, there is £100,000 towards commitments made for the creative industries. In addition, there is £150,000 for time-bound Executive funding, which has now expired, to the IFA, the GAA and rugby. I have also looked at strengthening the stadia team's programme to ensure that the Programme for Government commitments to regional stadiums are met.

Mrs Overend: Has the Minister requested that her arm's-length bodies prepare revised corporate plans as a result of the funding cuts to their budgets? If so, when will they become available?

Ms Ní Chuilín: We have entered into a discussion with all the ALBs. The revisions to not so much their corporate plans but their financial plans and projections are being revised as we speak. I am still hopeful that we may have a monitoring round, so I imagine what the fluctuation will be between the projections if it happens or if it does not. Those discussions are certainly being had, and preparations are being made for the same.

Ms Lo: Does the Minister use a scoring matrix or any other methodology when determining the spending cuts or increases for arts organisations? If so, will she publish it?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The processes of the scoring matrix and the allocations for the Arts Council are done by the Arts Council. When I make priorities and interventions in my Department, the criteria that I use are around promoting equality, tackling poverty and promoting social inclusion, and particularly looking at people who live and work in deprived in areas and are the furthest removed from services. That has been open and transparent. It is in my business plan and the revised business plan. I have made that a priority for every aspect of all my ALBs and my work in the Department.

Football Stadia

5. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the funding for the subregional development of football stadia. (AQO 8988/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. My Department is currently in the process of developing the subregional programme for soccer. Plans for a formal public consultation with key stakeholders are well under way, with a 12-week consultation to commence at the end of November. The forthcoming consultation will give all the stakeholders the opportunity to shape the final programme. Once the stakeholder consultation exercise is completed and the final programme has been agreed, my officials will be in a position to offer advice to all potential applicants. It is envisaged that, following the 12-week consultation, the subregional programme will be formally launched and open for applications in early 2016, but the long-awaited consultation will happen at the end of this month.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for her answer. It is good to hear that the consultation will take place soon. There are an awful lot of clubs, right across Northern Ireland, that are very anxious to hear information about this and it has not been forthcoming until now, so I thank the Minister for her clarification. Perhaps she can give an indication of when, she thinks, the first pots of money will be made available to clubs. Some clubs are very advanced in their plans and in seeking planning permission. They are eager to get going. When can the money be drawn down?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly, clubs should be able to access and draw down money in spring; I am talking about March or April. The consultation will last for 12 weeks, and there will be feedback on how to prepare and respond to the applications. I appreciate that some clubs have been preparing for this opportunity for years. I also appreciate that some of the smaller clubs have not had the same advantage as some of the bigger ones, and it is important that we try to make sure that everybody has a fair opportunity of getting access to the funds. I anticipate that even the remainder of the money for the subregional soccer programme will not cover all the needs. I am looking at how, in the next mandate and the next CSR, those other needs can be met, not just for soccer but for Gaelic, rugby and other governing bodies.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a cuid freagraí go dtí seo. An dtig liom iarraidh ar an Aire, an dtig léi cur síos a thabhairt ar cé atá ag glacadh an phríomhfhreagracht as an chlár fhoréigiúnach le haghaidh sacair? Will the Minister comment or give an outline on who is taking the lead responsibility for the subregional programme for soccer?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. I am taking lead responsibility for the development and delivery of the subregional programme, and that includes the allocation of funding. I am working closely and in conjunction with the IFA, but I am taking lead responsibility.

Casement Park: Planning Application

7. Mr Allen asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when she expects to see a completed planning application for a new Casement Park stadium. (AQO 8990/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. The GAA is continuing to develop the design, ensuring that the recommendations of the judicial review are wholly incorporated into the planning application. A key aspect of the process is ensuring that the GAA involves the community throughout the process to ensure a high level of engagement with all stakeholders. It will be for the GAA to decide on when it is in a position to submit its planning application. I am optimistic that that will be done very early next year. The Department will continue to offer support to the GAA with the process, ensuring that the recommendations of the recent project assessment review (PAR) report are fully implemented. I am delighted to announce the appointment of Danny McSorley as the newly appointed chair of the safety technical group (STG). The input of the STG will be pivotal in the progression of the project, and I look forward to the group providing the specialist advice required to bring the project to a successful conclusion and make Casement Park a reality.

Mr Allen: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. In the light of the footprint of Casement Park being totally unsuitable for a modern 38,000-seat stadium and bearing in mind that a smaller stadium would cost considerably less, is there an opportunity for the savings to be redeployed to the arts sector, which is under such severe financial pressure at this time due to in-year cuts?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. One is a capital programme; the other is resource. I really hope that the Member is not suggesting that Ravenhill and Windsor Park can be redeveloped but the money for Gaelic games can be given away. That will not happen, certainly not on my watch. I fully support the need for additional money for the arts sector and will argue for it, but I do not think that anybody from the arts sector or anywhere else would even hint or suggest that money should be taken from Gaelic games and given somewhere else.

The judicial review did not rule on the 38,000 capacity. Some residents have said that they believe that the capacity needs to be sorted out; I believe that that will be dealt with. It should be discussed between the Ulster Council of the GAA and those residents. Certainly, as to any notion, hint or suggestion that money for Casement Park or Gaelic games will be given elsewhere, it is not going to happen.

Mr Dunne: In relation to Casement Park, does the Minister recognise that the management of the project has been a disaster and that the capacity of 38,000 is totally unsuitable for the area in which it is proposed? Will she assure us that there will be open consultation with the local residents on this application? That did not happen last time, and the matter ended up in court.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has asked his question. I call the Minister.

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, I am aware that you are working with some of the residents, particularly the Mooreland and Owenvarragh Residents Association (MORA) in west Belfast.

Mr Dunne: I am a democrat.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely. That is what residents do. It is an open and democratic process, and I believe that the next consultation will also be an open and democratic process. You have heard hours and hours of evidence. Previously, at Championships, there have been more than 38,000. There have been up to 33,000 and, prior to that, there have been far more people than that at games. It is up to the Ulster Council to provide its strategic vision for Casement Park. If residents truly believe that there needs to be a reduction, that has to be done in consultation with the Ulster Council. I believe that those discussions have already started and that there will be a good resolution. Any notion that the project will be scaled back so that it is not viable is a bit ridiculous. I hope that the Member is not suggesting that.

Ms Boyle: How will the Minister ensure that the 20 PAR recommendations are fully implemented in the project?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. I am determined to ensure the implementation of the recommendations, and some have already been implemented. The PAR implementation plan allocates each of the recommendations to a specific owner. In my case, I have a new SRO in the Department working on that full-time. As the Member may have heard in my response to the main question, I have announced that we have a new independent chair of the safety technical group. The Ulster Council has fully accepted the implementation and recommendations of the PAR report. We can all use that report to help us to work towards the future, particularly in delivering Casement Park.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Declan McAleer is not in his place.

Creative Industries

9. Mr Ramsey asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how her Department encourages growth in the creative industries sector. (AQO 8992/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. DCAL has the lead in government for the development of the creative industries and has achieved a great deal to aid this fast-growing sector across the North. The creative industries innovation fund operated from 2009 to 2015, supporting 359 projects with a total investment exceeding £5.6 million. As part of a three-year contract to June 2016, DCAL has agreed to provide £330,000 of funding to Generator NI, which is responsible for delivering the music strategy's target of increasing employment in the industry by 72 new jobs and increasing the gross value added (GVA) by a £1.2 million annual contribution to the economy by June 2016. DCAL is also providing an additional £100,000 resource in 2015-16 for creative industries development.

Mr Ramsey: I thank the Minister for her response. Clearly, many people across Northern Ireland look to the creative industries and what they can provide for the future. I know that the Committee has had a huge interest in that. Will the Minister outline the investment made by the Department or the Executive in the creative industries over the past four years?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do not have those figures to hand, but I am happy to write to the Member. The group that we convened recently has representatives of many of the Departments, and all the Ministers came. Minister Farry was there, and there were representatives from DETI and the Department of Education. Ministers and senior officials have been working on this, and it is important that there is a cross-departmental approach. The Member can see the value of creative industries investment in his city and what that has done. We need to have that right across and, indeed, try to link up opportunities right across the island. I am not being political, but, when looking at investment, particularly in this economy, we should try to do so to the advantage of everybody. We have provided good investment thus far, but I hope to increase that or at least leave a good footprint for the CSR in the next mandate.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is the end of listed questions. We move on to topical questions.

Northern Ireland Events Company: Lessons Learned

T1. Mr McNarry asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what lessons she has learned from the bad practices exposed in the recent report on the Northern Ireland Events Company and whether she can assure the House that no such practices are evident today anywhere else in her Department. (AQT 3061/11-16)

2.30 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He was a longstanding member of the CAL Committee so he is probably far more familiar with this than I am. I came into this mandate when the Events Company was transferred from DCAL to DETI. There are certainly many lessons to be learned, but I want to assure the Member as fully as possible that our Department has learned lessons from what happened at the Events Company. Indeed, I would expect all Departments to read the report and learn the lessons from it.

Mr McNarry: I thank the Minister for her frank answer. I accept her assurances and am gratified by them. Rather than cause her any anxieties, has she been made aware of any events funded directly or indirectly by her Department at which admittance money has not been fully accounted for due to the methodology in taking cash on entry?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am certainly not aware of any events or detail in the Member's question. Just to be sure — to be sure, to be sure — I will take the Member's question back to my officials and I will furnish him with those details in writing. I will assure the Member as much as I possibly can. The nonsense that occurred at the Events Company was in blazing lights, but I believe that all senior officials in most Departments will have read the report and gone back to do a quick checklist in their Department.

Arts and Culture Strategy: Consultation

T2. Mr Hazzard asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when the consultation on the arts and culture strategy that she intends to introduce will happen. (AQT 3062/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I anticipate launching the formal consultation on a strategy for culture and arts within three weeks. There has never been such a strategy in the Department before. We have the Sport Matters strategy, which is interdepartmental, has been funded and is for 10 years. It amazed me that there has not been an arts and culture strategy in the Department before. I will launch it no later than three weeks from now.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answer. How will she ensure that the strategy is properly resourced and that there is widespread political, if not public, support for the initiatives?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Going by some of the supportive comments today from Members in most parties, I hope that all-party support will flourish and is sustained for this very important strategy. It is vital that we have a robust, resourced strategy for arts and culture for at least 10 years because we need to ensure that there is full-party support, right across the Executive, for the future of culture and arts. It is really important that, going into the next mandate, we have a robust and well-resourced strategy not only to help whoever the new Minister is but to give some security to the sector.

City of Culture: Legacy

T3. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how she believes the legacy of Londonderry being the 2013 UK City of Culture has filtered down to the grass-roots communities in East Londonderry. (AQT 3063/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have been in the Member's constituency. We were able to make a capital investment there in partnership with Coleraine. There is also the Stendhal Festival in Limavady. I have met many groups from right across the city of Derry and the neighbouring counties, towns and villages, even from some areas that are now classified as part of Mid-Ulster, although they are still part of the natural east and south Derry hinterland. It is important that support for the grass-roots continues. I make no apologies for supporting not only the City of Culture but the legacy programme.

Mr McQuillan: I do not want the Minister to apologise for supporting the grass-roots and legacy programme. I encourage more but what I want to see is the support filtering down to the lowest level of the grass-roots community. I am not really seeing that happen at the minute, Minister.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am happy to meet the Member and get some views on how he thinks that could happen. The groups that I have dealt with right across different sectors in Belfast tell me that they are targeting support to people who are most deprived, marginalised and excluded, and most of them are. For some, there was a gap. We need to hear what those gaps are and see how we can try to fill them. I am open to hearing what the Member has to suggest.

Féile an Phobail: World Police and Fire Games

T4. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to comment on the rationale for appointing Féile an Phobail as lead partner in the cultural programme for the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQT 3064/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Féile an Phobail lobbied me, as it did the Tourist Board, DETI and Belfast City Council. It also made a presentation to the World Police and Fire Games board on the need for a cultural programme, given that we had a very successful programme in the run-up to the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games. The Olympics were primarily an arts spectacle with sports added in. Féile an Phobail was the lead partner, as designated by the groups, and remains the lead partner in that cultural programme. That is set to continue. Those are the origins of the lobby.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Will the Minister comment on the importance of the cross-community aspect to the roll-out of the programme of events for the 2013 games?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There is a cross-community element to it. I do not underestimate how difficult it has been for people to sustain that over the years, particularly for groups working in communities that need support, including political support, to do so. Groups in the Shankill and in east and south Belfast have worked well with Féile an Phobail and with other members of the cultural partnership, and I imagine that that will and should endure well beyond the lifetime of this mandate.

Musical Instruments for Bands: Funding Cuts

T5. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to explain her rationale for cutting the musical instruments for bands funding programme and to outline how that decision is affecting the community. (AQT 3065/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The rationale is purely financial. I anticipate that, if the financial situation changed, we could reinstate that programme. That is not the fault of the Executive at all, as these cuts came from the Tory Government. There are programmes that the Arts Council simply did not have the money to continue, and that is one of them.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for her answer. She will be aware that we have in and around 600 bands, which are made up of around 20,000 people who are learning to play musical instruments. Some of those are in our area, some are in deprived areas and some are in the rural community. It has been a great resource for progression: some of those people make professional careers from music. Will the Minister reinforce once again that this will be looked at in future? These are not just marching bands: these are future musicians from Northern Ireland.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am happy to support everything that the Minister — not yet, Paula — the Member has said. I have met the bands' forum and I have met bands' forums from across all political backgrounds and none. I have met people who are involved in bands and I have met groups who use musical instruments as a method for therapeutic development to help people to cope with trauma and mental health problems. I have even met people who are returning from illnesses — for example, viruses, strokes and the rest — who are recovering through the arts and through musical instruments. I appreciate the value that music brings. That is one programme, and the Arts Council has had to make difficult decisions on a few of them, given the budget that it has been handed and given the cuts that we face from the British Government.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): David McIlveen is not in his place.

Monitoring Round Bids: DCAL

T7. Ms Sugden asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in anticipation of a resolution from the current talks, to state her intended bids in a possible monitoring round. (AQT 3067/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I love the Member's optimism and hope that we can all share it. The monitoring round that I had in June still stands; if anything, aspects have been added to it. I will be proactive in convincing all colleagues that we need to try to plug the gaps that others have created in our Budget. If we had a monitoring round, I would hope not only to pursue the bids that I was bringing forward in June but to address the new and emerging pressures that have come to me since then.

Ms Sugden: For the benefit of the House, will the Minister reiterate her priorities from the June monitoring round and tell us about any that have come up since?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member may have heard some of the priorities, particularly my statutory obligations around health and safety for some of the ALBs. I have to meet those health and safety requirements to make sure that I fulfil my statutory duty. There are gaps there for the Arts Council, the Sports Council and Libraries. There are also gaps for Museums, as well as in commitments that I have made to the three sports governing bodies on the work that they have been doing with grass-roots groups. The governing bodies have taken groups, particularly from communities that face difficult challenges, and supported them. It is important that they have some sort of financial security in order to continue that work.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member listed to ask question 8 has withdrawn his name. Raymond McCartney is not in his place. Alastair Ross is not in his place. The next period for questions does not begin until 2.45 pm, so I suggest that the House take its ease until then.

2.45 pm

Education

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Listed questions 9 and 13 have been withdrawn.

Delivering Social Change: Literacy and Numeracy

1. Mr Ramsey asked the Minister of Education whether shortfalls in funding have impacted on the Delivering Social Change improving literacy and numeracy signature programme. (AQO 8999/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): The Delivering Social Change (DSC) programme was announced by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister in October 2012. The programme was only made possible by central funding provided by OFMDFM. In the absence of central funding, I had to end the OFMDFM programme and the DE expansion programme at the end of August 2015. In addition, some participating schools have not had the benefit of the additional teaching resource for a full two years or until March 2016, whichever was sooner.

The expenditure for the programme was incurred by the Education Authority in respect of the payment of teachers' salaries and administration costs up to the end of August 2015, which is when their employment ceased. Work is ongoing to finalise the accounts for the programme up to the end of August 2015. The funding already provided by OFMDFM and my Department appears to be sufficient to cover the costs incurred. My commitment to the programme is such that I have set aside an additional £200,000 to ensure that the best practice and learning developed and identified during the programme can be disseminated across all schools and create a lasting legacy for the Delivering Social Change programme.

Mr Ramsey: I thank the Minister for his response. I have heard you in the media on the issue, but it still concerns many parents that in the early years their children are not getting the appropriate, holistic and individually tailored plans that are necessary for a child's progression. Can you outline the steps the Department is taking to bring forward a more strategic approach to ensure that a child's development at an early stage is being progressed consistently?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not necessarily accept that many children are not getting the appropriate interventions at early years. In any system as expansive as the Department of Education's, there will be different degrees of provision within the schools. My job as Minister, and the role of the Department of Education, is to ensure that all provision is brought up to the highest level possible. We have tailored interventions in place. Our curriculum is tailored to ensure that education is delivered at early years — age-appropriate and individual-appropriate — to pupils to ensure and support them through their development of education from the earliest years possible.

The Delivering Social Change programme was targeted at our primary schools and post-primary schools, and, over its two years, it was very effective, but, when budgets are reduced, you have decisions to make. OFMDFM had its to make, and I had mine to make. I could have diverted funds away from schools to continue the Delivering Social Change programme, but I would have been paying off teachers to bring in other teachers, and I did not think that that made sense at this time. The lessons from the DSC programme are being learned and disseminated, and they will be shared across our education establishment to ensure that everyone learns the best practice from them.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer. I note that he referred to the lessons learned from Delivering Social Change. Will he outline what the Department is going to do to harness that learning to benefit schools across the North?

Mr O'Dowd: As I outlined, I have set aside £200,000 to carry out that work this year. In the most successful schools, that learning has been shared across the curriculum, and many principals are trying to mainstream the approaches learned under the DSC programme. The legacy programme will be delivered during the 2015-16 academic year. That programme aims to prepare and collate resources and best classroom practice identified by Education Authority officers during the programme; provide information for school principals on successful approaches to tackling underachievement; provide continuous professional development (CPD) sessions on English and/or numeracy interventions for our English and maths coordinators and teachers in every school; and prepare and present case studies of best practice identified by ETI and the evaluation process, along with a number of other measures. The lessons learned from DSC will definitely not be lost to our system. They will be built-in and tailored to our schools as we move forward.

Mrs Dobson: What assessment has been made of the worth of the signature projects with regard to literacy and numeracy? How can the Minister address underachievement when the first thing to be cut is that programme?

Mr O'Dowd: We have to recognise that our education system is there to address underachievement. It should not be an add-on, and it most certainly should not be a separate programme or scheme that you come up with. The core purpose of education is to educate to the individual; to meet the needs of the individual child and to nurture the child's development and learning at every stage of their education. That is the core principle. Once you get into a philosophy, idea or mindset that you need yet another programme to tackle underachievement, you are going down the wrong road and in the wrong direction. It has to be the very core of education.

The Education and Training Inspectorate (ETI) is evaluating the numeracy and literacy programme and will continue to evaluate and disseminate best practice throughout our schools, along with the Education Authority.

Lord Morrow: Does the Minister accept that there is some evidence — in my opinion, it is substantial evidence — that there is underachievement among young Protestant boys? Does he have any measures or has he taken cognisance of that? How does he intend to address that?

Mr O'Dowd: Of course there is evidence that proves — it does not suggest; it proves — that there is educational underachievement in young Protestant boys. As I said in response to the previous questioner, our education system has to be targeted at the needs of the individual and to be set in a way that nurtures and develops the educational well-being and development of every individual child.

Do we need a separate strategy for Protestant working-class boys, solely for education? No. We need a combined strategy for working-class communities, Protestant and Catholic. The figures in the Catholic community are not impressive either. Somewhere in the region of 457 working-class Protestant boys left school without proper qualifications in 2014-15. In the same year, 909 Catholic working-class boys left education without proper qualifications.

We need to target resources to schools in socially deprived areas. I have done that, and that was opposed by the Members opposite. We need to ensure that the Executive, as a whole, are targeting resources to socially deprived areas to build up community confidence and infrastructure, and they are doing that. As is the case with health, you will find that social deprivation breeds educational inequalities. We need to remove inequalities in society to ensure that education prospers.

I believe that we have the policies in place to tackle educational underachievement, because that is at the very heart of our education system.

Post-primary Transfer Arrangements

2. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of transfer arrangements for year 7 pupils to post-primary schools. (AQO 9000/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: For the September 2015 entry, over 21,000 pupils transferred from primary to post-primary schools. By the end of the process in May, 99.4% of pupils were placed in a school of their choice, with 86.7% being admitted to their first-preference school.

The Department has published guidance setting out a framework for the transfer process. That guidance has been in place since 2010, which was the first year that children were not subjected to a state-sponsored transfer test. The guidance strongly recommends that schools do not use criteria related to academic ability. It goes on to recommend a menu of non-academic admissions criteria from which boards of governors of post-primary schools should draw in deciding their admissions criteria. That includes giving priority to children in receipt of free school meals, those with a sibling currently attending the school, and applicants who are the eldest child. It also includes geographic criteria relating to feeder primary schools, a named parish or catchment area, which are all to be used in conjunction with the criterion of the nearest suitable school to ensure that rural children are not disadvantaged.

It is my belief that the transfer process, as experienced by parents and children, would be much fairer if all schools followed the Department's guidance and ceased the use of academic selection and rejection for admission into schools.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for his answer. Minister, do you not agree that you have effectively privatised the transfer system?

Mr O'Dowd: No. Boards of governors make a conscious decision every year. Every year at a board of governors meeting, a board of governors should set its entrance criteria. Every board of governors that sits down and decides not to use academic selection follows a pathway that does not reject any child on the basis of a dodgy dossier. Schools that decide, at a board of governors meeting, to follow the pathway of academic selection decide to use dodgy dossiers to admit children to their school. There is no educational reason for doing it; there is a social reason for doing it. If it is for social selection, those who support it should stand up and say so. This is for social selection, not for educational selection. Those who defend and make excuses for those schools are responsible for what you term the "privatisation" of admissions criteria. I, for one, campaign daily to bring that process to an end.

Mr Dunne: I must say that I find it unacceptable that the Minister uses a phrase such as "dodgy dossiers" in relation to the selection procedure. Does the Minister agree that, in the main, the system works extremely well because we do not have education authorities or boards involved in it? The fact that they are kept out of it means that the system works extremely well, and, in the main, Protestant and Catholic parents are happy with it.

Mr O'Dowd: The Member stands in an elected Assembly as an elected representative who is charged with holding to account the use of public funds, and he makes the statement that the system works better because the education authorities and boards etc keep out of it. That is probably one of the most undemocratic statements I have ever heard in the Chamber. What, then, is the purpose of the Chamber? What is the purpose of elected representatives? What is the purpose of the ballot box if we do not elect politicians to govern? That is what we are all about and what the Chamber is about.

Does the system work well? No, it does not. Evidence of that is in the draft Equality Commission report published only a fortnight ago. The evidence is in the report published by the OECD two years ago. The evidence comes from the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child and the Human Rights Commission. The evidence has been presented by the trade union movement and can be found in the trail of underachievement in working-class communities. We ignore the international evidence, not for educational purposes but for social selection purposes. There is no educational evidence that backs up academic selection — none whatsoever — but there is plenty to back up its use for social selection. Parties such as yours, which opposed academic selection in the mid-1980s on the basis of social selection, need to go back to your previous position.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Minister, bearing in mind that more than two thirds of schools have moved away from selection and do not have any academic selection at age 10, what progress has been made in moving away from selection the final rump of schools that insist on that process?

Mr O'Dowd: I believe that there has been a change in attitudes to academic selection, particularly in the Catholic sector. That has been driven, in fairness, by the position taken up by a number of groups — the Catholic Bishops and the Catholic Principals Association. They have been driving forward the agenda and reminding people in their sector that academic selection is not only educationally wrong but, in the words of the Catholic Bishops, "morally wrong". There is a shift away from so-called academic selection, which is, in fact, social selection. On the basis of equality and the foundations — Mr Deputy Speaker, it is very difficult to talk when others are having a full-blown conversation.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I will judge when I think it appropriate to intervene. Minister, do you wish to continue or have you finished?

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, Mr Deputy Speaker, I was just making you aware that it was very difficult to hear. I was not asking you to intervene.

We ask that further schools move away from academic selection in the time ahead. An example of how public opinion changes matters is that a vote in the Chamber yesterday was, a year ago, unachievable. It was made achievable because activists who believe in equality made it so. Therefore, there is a responsibility on the trade union movement, on political parties in the Chamber that oppose academic selection and on civic society to campaign against it.

Teachers: Health and Well-being

3. Mr McGlone asked the Minister of Education what steps his Department is taking to address the health and well-being of teachers in schools. (AQO 9001/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I am aware of the health and well-being issues that are faced by teachers in our schools and the importance of addressing them if we are to retain a committed, motivated and healthy teaching workforce. The responsibility for the health and well-being of teachers rests with their employers, their board of governors, in conjunction with the employing authority, where relevant. The employing authorities and the teachers' unions work together through the teachers' negotiating committee (TNC) to tackle issues that impact on teachers' health and well-being. My Department is also part of the TNC.

Over recent years, a number of measures have been introduced to support teachers' health and well-being. They include the development of a strategy for teachers' health and well-being; a policy statement on tackling violence and abuse against teachers; a workload agreement; a teachers' attendance procedure, which includes a new provision for the recording of incidences of work-related stress; an independent 24-hour confidential telephone counselling service for all teachers provided by Carecall; a flexible working scheme; a job-share scheme; a career break scheme; temporary variations of contracts; and a policy statement on planning, preparation and assessment time.

Notwithstanding all of that, I assure Members that this is a matter of the utmost importance to me. Most recently, I personally endorsed the reinvigoration of the teachers' health and well-being working group of the TNC. I expect to see a clear, agreed action plan, outlining specific activities for my Department, employers, employing authorities and the unions to take on, in partnership, to tackle this critical issue.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Aire as an fhreagra sin. Thanks very much to the Minister for that response. What steps are being taken by the Education and Training Inspectorate (ETI) to minimise the occurrence or impact of stress during school inspections?

Mr O'Dowd: There has been engagement between the ETI and the unions, which has seen a change even in how we report on our inspections. I understand that inspections are stressful for teachers and schools. We often hear of the negative side of inspections. Every year, I host an event in the Long Gallery upstairs at which maybe 100 or 150 schools are presented with certificates for outstanding and good inspections. The pride in that room is unbelievable among the teaching staff, the principals and the boards of governors, and rightly so, but neither the media nor anyone else reports on it.

Inspections are good for schools, in my opinion; they are good for the education system. Yes, they should be carried out in a respectful manner and in a manner that does not cause undue stress to the schools or the teachers etc, but they are there for the benefit of our education system. We learn from the best practice, we share best practice and we want to see all our young people being taught in schools that live under the heading of Every School a Good School.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What action is the Minister's Department taking to address the health and well-being needs of the non-teaching staff in our schools?

Mr O'Dowd: There is a suite of HR policies and procedures in place to support the health and well-being of our non-teaching staff. A number of family-friendly agreements, which recognise the competing pressures on staff, have been negotiated with the trade unions. For example, all staff have 24-hour counselling support and individual counselling services provided by Carecall on behalf of the Education Authority. In addition, the authority employs welfare officers who are available to support staff and to signpost them to specialist services that can provide further support for individuals. Grievance procedures and harassment and bullying policies are in place, as are whistle-blowing policies for circumstances in which staff require formal mechanisms for having any grievance or concern addressed.

Mr Lunn: Mr McGlone asked the question that I wanted to ask, but I will develop it slightly. Anecdotally, we hear that school inspections are, obviously, very stressful and that, when the inspection is concluded, the school is left with an impression of a result that is not finally recorded when the final report comes through. Is the Minister aware that hopes are raised and then dashed, effectively?

Mr O'Dowd: I receive varying commentary from schools around inspections. I cannot verify every report I receive, but the majority of reports around inspections that I receive from schools are good. Yes, there is a period of worry leading up to the inspection and, yes, there is a concern while the inspection is taking place, but, once the inspection is complete, schools report back that they are satisfied or happy with the way in which procedures were carried out. A number of individual schools have different commentaries around that. They would question what they have been told and what ends up in the final report etc.

I come back to the point that I believe that inspections are good for the education system at this time. The inspectors are professionals who carry out their duties in a professional manner, and their reports, whether good or bad, need to be taken on board by schools and lessons learned from them.

School Principals: Budget Management

4. Mr Newton asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of the qualifications, skills and knowledge required by a school principal to manage their budget. (AQO 9002/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: The board of governors of each school funded under the common funding scheme is responsible in law for the management of a school's financial allocation. A board of governors is expected to manage a school in accordance with the memoranda and guidance issued by the relevant funding authority and may delegate certain activities to the principal in accordance with a school's financial memorandum. While employers do not have to specify any particular qualifications on budget management for prospective or serving principals, it is not unusual for essential criteria relating to principals' posts to include a management qualification at postgraduate level. Outside formal qualifications, there is an expectation that those who seek to undertake the role of principal or those who are already in a principal's post will have skills and knowledge in budget management. Those skills will have been gained in undertaking leadership roles at middle and senior levels in schools and/or through training, including the professional qualification for headship for those who aspire to be principals or as part of an induction provision for newly appointed principals.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for his answer. Given what he has outlined with regard to a principal's role, which is separate from a principal's role in a special school, can he explain why the principal of a special school cannot achieve the same standard of management of his or her whole budget in the school from the commencement of the academic year?

Mr O'Dowd: Special schools are funded in a different manner from grant-funded schools under the common funding scheme. That is why. We have a number of funding schemes set out in the education system. We have funding schemes for voluntary grammar and voluntary integrated schools. We have funding schemes under the common funding scheme and we have funding schemes for special schools. It is a different process.

Mr Rogers: I agree that the professional qualification for headship is an important qualification. What practical help is there for newly appointed principals in developing their budget skills; in particular, things like mentoring or coaching by experienced principals?

Mr O'Dowd: The important aspect of my answer was that the budget management of a school is the responsibility of its board of governors; it is there to work with, support and manage the school. Powers may be delegated to principals, but let me repeat: the board of governors of each school funded under the common funding scheme is responsible in law for the management of a school's financial allocation. It is the responsibility of the board of governors, not simply that of the principal.

In response to the other part of your question, yes, newly qualified principals do receive support through mentoring programmes etc but they should also receive support from their board of governors.

Hollywood Multi-schools Project

5. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Education for an update on the Hollywood multi-schools project. (AQO 9003/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: Due to a number of factors, including sustainability and area-planning considerations, the Hollywood multi-schools project has not been included in any of my announcements to date for new capital builds. In order for the project to be taken forward, it would need to be included in a future capital announcement. Any such announcement will be dependent on the capital budget available to the Department of Education in the next Budget cycle for April 2016 onwards.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he fully recognise the need for new-build schools in Hollywood? I appreciate that, some time ago, he visited Priory Integrated College, Hollywood Nursery School and Hollywood Primary School. Once again, I reiterate that the five schools in the town are all over 50 years of age. Does he recognise the need for investment to address how they have been under-resourced for many years?

Mr O'Dowd: I recognise the need for a new-build programme in Hollywood; there is no argument about that. The point is that we need sufficient funds to carry the projects forward.

There are numerous schools awaiting new builds, and I would welcome Members' support in lobbying for an increase in the capital budget for education, even for the next term, when I will not be Minister. Education deserves an uplift in its capital budget. The investment benefits not only the school and the school community but the local economy. Yes, schools require new builds, but, to achieve those, we require more capital.

Mr Lyttle: In addition to support for investment across the Hollywood multi-schools project, will the Minister acknowledge that Priory Integrated College is in need of planning and capital funding assistance, and does he agree that there is oversubscription for integrated education in neighbouring education areas? On those grounds, will he assure the House that he will stand and deliver for integrated post-primary provision in the area?

Mr O'Dowd: I have already said to Mr Dunne that the schools in Hollywood require new builds, and that includes Priory. I am not going to get into whether there is oversubscription or underprovision for schools in the wider area. I have visited the school and have met the principal on more than one occasion and the board of governors on more than one occasion. Yes, we need to build a new Priory College, but, to do that, I require money. There are many, many schools in the system that require new builds, but it is about getting around to them all.

Key Stage 3

6. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Education how he plans to resolve the dispute over the return of Key Stage 3, which has resulted in 12 partnerships not receiving funding under the shared education signature project. (AQO 9004/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I am currently engaged in discussions with teacher trade union representatives in an effort to resolve the current action of non-participation in the statutory assessment process.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for giving a succinct answer. Given that one of the major problem areas here is the lack of confidence among teachers in the assessment process, what consideration is being given to having greater direct input from teachers in the future design of Key Stage assessments?

Mr O'Dowd: I acknowledge the brevity of my answer, but sometimes it is "Less said, easiest mended" in these circumstances. We are involved in detailed negotiations with the unions, and both sides have approached the negotiations with a mindset of resolving this. I hope that that mindset remains in place and we will be able to resolve it. Central to our discussions have been the work and the professional judgement of teachers on levels of progression, as well as reassuring teachers and putting in place mechanisms that put that judgement at the centre of levels of progression. The judgement of the teacher is central, and working in conjunction with his or her colleagues in the school is how we would moderate them. It is also about how we moderate them in conjunction with the professional judgement of neighbouring schools. That is what is at the centre of our discussions. I am attempting to offer reassurances to the unions on how that will be achieved.

Mrs Overend: I feel that I should inform the Minister that different Education Authority areas have made differing recommendations to schools that have applied for the projects. Some are proceeding with their projects in good faith that the funding will be forthcoming, whereas others are not. Will he seek not only to find a resolution but to ensure that there is a uniform message to all schools and all tranches throughout the system?

Mr O'Dowd: I would certainly expect one message to come out from the Education Authority, regardless of the location of a school or the location of the office where the advice is coming from. I will follow that up to make sure that singular advice and recommendations come from the Education Authority. As I have assured Mr Weir or attempted to assure him, I am doing my utmost to bring the matter to a resolution.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That ends the time for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

Education: Parental Choice

T1. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Education what weight should be put on parental choice when deciding that a child should be sent to a particular school. (AQT 3071/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: "Choice" has entered the common terminology around these matters, but the legislation actually refers to "parental preference". I am supportive of parental preference. Against that, however, you have to bear in mind that, when evidence points you in a direction that suggests that a type of education or a type of admissions criterion in education is damaging the education system, there is a responsibility on legislators and decision-makers to rectify that.

3.15 pm

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his answer. The Minister may be relieved to know that I am not going down the road of academic selection with this question. In my constituency, which includes Ballymena, parental preference, as he puts it, was that fewer places would be required for Cambridge House Grammar School, which I know the Minister approved. However, that has not been the case with Slemish College, which has consistently found itself oversubscribed. There clearly is an appetite amongst parents to move towards that.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Can we have a question, please?

Mr D McIlveen: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. Does the Minister have any intention to mitigate the reduction in places at Cambridge House to the advantage of Slemish College, where there is a huge demand and parental preference is very clear?

Mr O'Dowd: I have asked the Education Authority in that context to bring forward a plan for post-primary provision in the Ballymena area and the wider area of Ballymena. While we have made decisions in and around Cambridge House and Ballymena Academy, that is not the finished plan, nor should it be. We need to ensure that there is sustainable post-primary provision in that area. With regard to Slemish College, the only way to increase numbers substantially at a school is through a development proposal. That is brought forward by the Education Authority and is then brought under my consideration under a two-month public consultation process. I cannot make any predetermined decision on that, but I have asked the Education Authority to look at post-primary provision in that area.

Controlled Schools Sectoral Support Body: Timescale

T2. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Education for an update on the creation of the controlled schools sectoral support body, particularly the timescale for departmental funding of that body. (AQT 3072/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: As the Member will be aware, work is progressing to establish a controlled schools support body, as agreed by the Executive in 2014 and then through legislation in the House. A business case to support the establishment and funding of the council has been completed. A contract for the funding is being prepared and will shortly be issued to enable the controlled schools sectoral support body to be formally established.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for his answer. What impact does he believe the creation of the controlled schools sectoral support body will have on the teaching appointments scheme for controlled schools?

Mr O'Dowd: A positive impact. The Education Authority has put in place measures ahead of the creation of the controlled schools sectoral support body regarding the formal process that has to be in place for the teacher appointments committee. I do not see any difficulties moving forward in the teacher appointments committee and the setting up of the controlled schools sectoral support body. I jest when I say "positive", but I am serious that it will have a positive impact.

Kilronan Special School: Accommodation

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Go raibh maith agat, a Aire as an fhreagra sin.

T3. Mr McGlone asked the Minister of Education for an update on the provision of accommodation for Kilronan Special School in Magherafelt. (AQT 3073/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I have recently signed off correspondence to the Member on the matter. I am happy to provide him with a further update, but he will understand that a considerable amount of correspondence comes through my Department. I am aware that I signed off correspondence to you yesterday, but I do not have the full detail in front of me.

Mr McGlone: That is good to hear; I hope that it is positive. Is the Minister aware of the pressing and urgent need for accommodation at that school? Can he give me some idea of when moneys will be released from his Department for the provision of that accommodation?

Mr O'Dowd: I have been lobbied by a number of MLAs in relation to the specific school and the accommodation needs around it. I do not wish to sound like a broken record — it is not an easy reply to give or a dismissive reply to give — but the reality is that I do not have sufficient funds in the capital budget in my Department to deal with the outstanding, urgent needs of our schools across the estate. We have had to put in place measures and policies to meet health and safety and disability access requirements in a number of schools. I have said to the Member that I have outlined to him in correspondence the current position, and I am more than happy to give him a further update when it is available.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): John McCallister is not in his place.

Educational Underachievement: Protestant Working-class Children

T5. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Education for an update on what his Department is doing to tackle educational underachievement among Protestant working-class children. (AQT 3075/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I believe that the policies that my Department has in place are tackling and will tackle educational underachievement. The issues surrounding Protestant working-class boys go beyond education — though education has a role to play — and beyond the school gates. I acknowledge and recognise a number of measures being taken by community groups in working-class Protestant areas to tackle educational underachievement. I think that there rests the additional work that will assist us in breaking down educational underachievement among Protestant working-class boys.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response. To some extent, I agree with him. However, the recent Equality Commission report was quite damning. It said that standards are worse now than they were in 2007. Will he work with the other Departments and bring it to the Executive to ensure that the issue is addressed with a sense with urgency?

Mr O'Dowd: The Equality Commission report is a draft report. I have met the commission on the report and have discussed some of the language used by and attributed to it. Standards are not worse now than they were in 2007. That is a fact. Educational underachievement is decreasing, but not at the rate at which any of us would like. I give you the example of free school meal entitlement, by which we measure these matters. Last year, 5% more young people in that category received five good GCSEs than was the case in the previous year, and in the year previous to that, there was an increase on the previous year, so matters cannot be worse in that area than they were in 2007.

There are areas of inequality where there are concerns that it is going in the wrong direction rather than the right direction. However, we are beginning to see an improvement, with an upward trend, in educational underachievement, whether it be among Protestant working-class boys, Protestant working-class communities or other working-class communities. I emphasise the fact that I believe that the education policies and the steps that I have taken will help to tackle the matter. However, the answer lies in the work being carried out by a number of community groups in Protestant working-class communities, and that is where we need to show support.

Edenderry Nursery School

T6. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of Education to assure him that the issues at Edenderry Nursery School in the greater Shankill, which is part of the estate of Glenwood Primary School, will be resolved as soon as possible, with construction starting in the new year, given that he will be aware that the contractor was meant to be on-site in September 2015 but was not and there have been issues between his officials and officials from the Belfast region of the Education Authority. (AQT 3076/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I can assure you that, if my officials have concerns about capital projects, they will move very quickly to resolve them, as the record will show. I am not aware exactly of what the issues are, but as in any dispute — I use that word advisedly — it will take both sides to resolve it.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for his answer. He will be aware that, in my first question, I raised the issue of Glenwood Primary School, and he will know that I have raised the issue before. I, along with my colleague Nigel Dodds MP, recently met the principal and the chair of the board of governors on the issue. We as a party are very keen, as are the principal and the governors, to see a new school put in place for Glenwood in the very near future. Can the Minister assure the House that there will be no impediments to that and that a new school will come to fruition for the benefit of young people in the greater Shankill and their education?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes. The Member will be aware that, during our discussions about Malvern Street, we were always conscious of the perceived knock-on impact on Glenwood. I can assure the Member that I remain committed to building a new primary school for Glenwood and to ensuring that we invest in the education of the young people in that area.

Transgender Pupils: Guidance for Schools

T7. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of Education, following a response to a question for written answer that he received last week about the potential for issuing guidance to schools on how to meet the needs of transgender students with regard to uniforms, changing rooms and toilet facilities, whether he accepts that the issuing of guidance to schools would be a welcome step forward to help them to meet the needs of their students. (AQT 3077/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I think that it will be a welcome step forward. I want to be in a position to send out informed guidance, so I have commissioned a survey across our schools to ensure that I meet the needs of LGBT young people in our schools. A survey has been commissioned and will be distributed, and the information will be brought back to me. Once that information is back with me, I will issue guidance that reflects the needs of transgender pupils in our schools.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he indicate whether he is willing to engage with his counterpart in the South, Jan O'Sullivan, who has also commenced the process of trying to develop guidance for transgender students? Does he accept that there is merit in not only surveying students here but taking the view of the maximum number of people across the island of Ireland in order to develop the best possible practice?

Mr O'Dowd: I am due to meet Minister O'Sullivan as part of an North/South Ministerial Council meeting later this month and am more than happy to raise that issue with her to see what information she can give or assistance she can be to my Department.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Nelson McCausland is not in his place.

Youth Council of Northern Ireland: Review

T9. Ms Sugden asked the Minister of Education when he thinks a review of the Youth Council of Northern Ireland will be presented. (AQT 3079/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I still require some details and have asked my officials for further information, but I hope to be in a position within a number of weeks to make further announcements.

Ms Sugden: Is the Minister able to clarify the administrative costs for the Youth Council that he presented to the Committee? I submitted a freedom of information request, and there seems to be a discrepancy.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not sure whether the Member flagged up to me the apparent discrepancy previously. Standing at the Dispatch Box, it is very difficult for me to know what exactly she is referring to. If the Member wishes to follow up that matter with me, I am more than happy to engage with her on the apparent discrepancy.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member listed at question 10 has withdrawn their name, so that is the end of the period for questions to the Minister of Education. I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments.

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Mr Jim Allister has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I remind Members that, if they wish to ask a supplementary, they should rise continually in their place. The Member who tabled the question will be called automatically to ask a supplementary.

Michelin Plant, Ballymena

Mr Allister asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline the steps being taken to protect jobs and secure the future of the Michelin plant in Ballymena.

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Over the past number of years, Invest Northern Ireland has assisted Michelin Tyre plc with a number of financial interventions totalling £4,754,297. The objective of those interventions was to secure Michelin's competitive position within the Michelin Group. The recent announcement is due to issues relating to an overcapacity of circa five million truck tyres in Europe and a substantial increase in imports of truck tyres from the Far East, particularly China.

Invest Northern Ireland has been in regular contact with senior Michelin personnel and was engaged in ongoing discussions related to further investments. Clearly, therefore, today's announcement is extremely disappointing. My Department and Invest Northern Ireland will, of course, engage with the company to fully understand its decision to close the plant, and we appreciate the company's commitment to support its employees in finding alternative employment with its £5 million development fund. Invest Northern Ireland will work with the company and all the relevant partners, including Mid and East Antrim Borough Council and the Department for Employment and Learning, which has been extremely helpful throughout this process, to help staff to consider all the alternative employment options.

3.30 pm

Mr Allister: This has been a catastrophic blow for Ballymena on the back of the equally devastating loss of JTI. What my constituents and I want to know is whether the Department, the Executive and Invest NI did all they could and should have done to avert this situation. We note that many of the jobs are going on foot of a £52 million investment in the Dundee plant: what did Scotland offer that Invest NI did not offer? Has the contact been towards increasing the productivity and capacity in Ballymena? On the critical issue of energy —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has asked his question.

Mr Allister: The Unite union says that it met the Minister in July on this very issue —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr Allister: — and, three months later, is waiting to hear from him.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order, please.

Mr Allister: Were the Minister and Invest NI asleep at the wheel?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. Members are allowed to ask the question and are then called to ask a supplementary question. I allowed the Member to ask two supplementary questions, and he intended to persist further. I ask the Member to respect the Chair.

Mr Bell: Invest Northern Ireland was meeting the company almost if not actually on a monthly basis. There were reports as recently as September that did not indicate to us this announcement. I got news of the announcement at about 11.00 am today. At 10.00 am, no information was being given out.

The Member raised some questions about Invest Northern Ireland. Invest Northern Ireland has an excellent track record in attracting foreign direct investment to the mid- and east Antrim area. I appreciate that the Member is from North Antrim, and I appreciate the work that Ian Paisley Jnr, the Member of Parliament, has already done around the generous redundancy arrangements that are there and on the £5 million development fund that is there to assist and support people who are devastatingly affected by the situation.

I grew up as a child in Belfast in the 1980s in a working-class community. I know from friends and family exactly how devastating unemployment can be. However, I want to put it on the record that, in 2013-14, in terms of foreign direct investment in the mid- and east Antrim area, 4,760 jobs were created and, over the four-year period from 2010 —

Mr Allister: Not one visit to North Antrim. Not one.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr Bell: Mr Deputy Speaker, can I resume the statement? Thank you.

In 2013-14, 4,760 jobs were created through the excellent track record of Invest Northern Ireland. From 2009-2010 to 2013-14, there were 23 inward visits. Invest Northern Ireland —

Mr Allister: Not to North Antrim.

Mr Bell: Mr Deputy Speaker, those were to the mid- and east Antrim area. I am sure that the Member will be aware that, according to the last census, some 40% of people in Northern Ireland work outside their parliamentary constituency. We are looking at the mid- and east Antrim area, the 4,760 jobs that were created and the 23 inward investments. Invest Northern Ireland has made 83 offers to support inward investment projects that have led to over £84 million of investment. Since we got the news, my officials have been in contact with Michelin, and I understand that it has no complaints about the support that Invest Northern Ireland gave.

I say to the Member, who seems to think that shouting will help somebody's constituency, that I understand the difficulties that Michelin faced. There was a downturn of five million tyres in the market, which is difficult to deal with. Our responsibility now is to see what we can do to create real employment and training opportunities. I have just finished a detailed meeting with the Minister for Employment and Learning on what we can do about putting the colleges to work to ensure that people who need accreditation for skills that they already possess can have it. We need to see what the Social Security Agency and all the relevant agencies can do. Working alongside Minister Farry, we will put together individual and group programmes. The Northern Regional College is available and will work constructively to respond.

There is a good skill set. While some people may wish to talk down Invest Northern Ireland and the skills of people in North Antrim and in the mid- and east Antrim area, they should remember that, with Wrightbus, Schrader, Radox and Moy Park, we have some of the world's leading companies in this area. I understand that Schrader and others are advertising jobs today. We will do all in our power to ensure that the families who have had devastating news coming up to Christmas are given every opportunity to achieve new employment.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I remind Members and the Minister that there is much interest in the subject, so I ask them to be concise in their questions and answers.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his intervention in the issue.

It would be helpful if the Minister could give us an indication of how many meetings have taken place directly with him on the matter. This issue has cropped up time and again. I realise that Ballymena and north Antrim have been brutalised over this last wee while with Patton, what some of us know as Gallaher's and now Michelin. The European globalisation adjustment fund, which has been ignored for whatever reason, is used in other parts of the EU to help and support people at this drastic, awful time for them and their families.

Mr Bell: I thank the Member for his question. As for Invest Northern Ireland's support for Michelin Tyre plc, there were quarterly reports and, I understand, monthly visits. I understand that some people are saying that they predicted the closure: I understand that the Member of Parliament was even in recent discussions with the local management of the company and others and we were unaware that the plant was to close. Even though I was getting texts and emails as early as 10.00 am today, the official information that we were given as a Department was around 11.00 am and was embargoed until 12.00 noon.

The company was nearing completion of an investment programme of £11.7 million that commenced in 2008. It was extended to enable expenditure up to 2015 to be eligible. Over the last five years, the company was also offered £1.226 million for training and development. In 2014, Invest Northern Ireland offered a £750,000 capital grant in support of the installation of an in-house plant to generate a percentage of Michelin's electricity requirements. That project was to have commenced in 2017. The Invest Northern Ireland team has worked closely with Michelin management to improve the Ballymena plant's competitiveness in relation to other Michelin plants.

Progress had been made in many areas with inter-group efficiencies, but there has been an oversupply. I understand that cheap imports have forced Michelin's senior management to take this decision. There were other competitive pressures that are outside Invest Northern Ireland's control or influence such as energy costs, distribution costs and, particularly, currency fluctuations.

Mr Frew: I have just left the Michelin plant where I met John Milstead, the plant manager on the site, and I spoke to many employees who are absolutely devastated at today's news. Can I ask the Minister and other Executive Ministers to do everything in their power to enable the proper training and support to be placed in Michelin and, indeed, Ballymena, given the job losses at JTI, B&Q, Patton and other businesses in that area of late? Can I ask the Minister to ensure that people in his Department and other Departments who are at the coalface of this will support those employees as much as they can? Can I also ask the Minister —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has asked his question.

Mr Bell: I understand the position that people are in, having experienced it in my own family and seen how devastating news of unemployment can be. I also understand that this is going to be a phased process over two and a half years. The First Minister and deputy First Minister have already spoken on this situation today. I want to assure the Member that everything will be done by the Executive and right though leadership level. I have already had a meeting with the Employment and Learning Minister, which, although very difficult in its content, was very robust and healthy as we look to see what we can do in a collaborative exercise.

I welcome the fact that there is a generous redundancy package. I welcome the fact that there is a £5 million community development fund. I have also been speaking to the Member of Parliament for the area, Ian Paisley Jnr. While others have shouted, he has been responsible for our bringing in a number of potential investors and orders from Singapore, Taiwan and Gibraltar. He hopes to see some success coming from those visits in the not too distant future. This shows that it is important to actually do something about the circumstances, as opposed to shouting from a sedentary position.

We will do all in our power with the Social Security Agency. We will do all in our power to help people, who may have come in at 16 or 18 years of age and have skills that they can transfer. The Employment and Learning and Minister and I, along with the colleges, will ensure that we get those people on to short courses or whatever is needed. I understand from the Minister that the Northern Regional College is ready to act to get those people accredited.

While there has been the difficult news, and you have also outlined correctly some of the big difficulties that there have been in the area with JTI and others, it is important to emphasise that there are some world class facilities in the area. I mentioned some of them earlier: Wrightbus, Schrader, Radox and Moy Park. They are recruiting. They are looking for skill sets. We will do all in our power to support those who are losing their jobs and tailor their skills towards quality alternative employment.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I remind Members that this is not an opportunity to make a statement. It is an opportunity to ask a question.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I have been speaking today to many employees and their families who have been left utterly devastated in the mouth of Christmas. We need to do all that we can for those families in the weeks and months ahead. Does the Minister now recognise that there is a crisis in manufacturing? We have a growing list of manufacturers that, because of a number of factors already alluded to, are looking elsewhere. What can be done to prevent this drip feed, where they are increasingly looking towards the east, but also to Britain, because of cheap imports and energy costs? These issues have not been addressed. I am concerned about the fact that the Unite union has said that it has raised issues with you that have not been acted on. Will the Minister explain what the situation is in regard to the Unite union and what strategy he will now put in place to prevent this happening again and to prevent it happening to the families who are left devastated in north Antrim this evening?

3.45 pm

Mr Bell: First — if you do not listen to anything else that I say — the thing that will transform and game-change heavy manufacturing in Northern Ireland is a reduction in our corporation tax. I know that the parties are working very hard, and I hope to see a positive response, with a date and a rate set to reduce corporation tax. The information that I am getting from the Economic Policy Centre is that, if we set a date and a rate of 12.5% in 2017, we could create 30,000 to 40,000 new jobs in Northern Ireland and grow our economy from 2017 to 2033 by 10%. If there is to be a game changer, it is for all the parties to assist me in getting that date and rate of corporation tax set and lowered. I cannot go into the confidential details of the companies that I am dealing with, but I assure the House that there is significant investment in terms of jobs and our economy if we can set that date and rate. Even if we were to set it later — most companies work on a three- to five-year plan — I am informed that a lot of that investment will occur immediately.

There are challenges that we have with energy costs. I had a general meeting with Unite in July and we did discuss energy costs. I have to deal with energy costs, but I also have to deal with the security of supply and the burden that there would be on the domestic householder. There are things that we have to manage, but there are other things on which we can produce a game changer. I say to the House again that a prize of over 30,000 new jobs for Northern Ireland will be the game changer that will transform our economy if we set a reduction of our corporation tax and the date for when that is to be done. Friends, that really is a prize that we cannot afford to miss.

Mr Swann: Minister, I have listened to your platitudes for Invest NI, but I assure you that they will be of little solace to the 860 families in and around north Antrim tonight who are looking at a future without a job or a major breadwinner. The redundancy packages may be generous, but they do not put a salary into those houses.

You have referenced the great training opportunities that will be coming forward and the opportunities in the future from you and the Employment and Learning Minister. Those are the same opportunities that have been offered to the 1,200 employees from JTI, the 200 from B&Q and the 500 from Patton. Now, 860 have been added to that —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member come to his question?

Mr Swann: — from Michelin. Where are the job opportunities to come from? I do not see them. Corporation tax would not have kept JTI, Patton, Gallaher or Michelin.

Mr Bell: It is important to talk up the skills that exist in the constituency to potential investors. The Member, foolishly, refers to “platitudes” to Invest Northern Ireland, but, as I said, the track record of creating 4,760 jobs for families is not platitudes; the offer of supporting inward investment with over £84 million is not a platitude; and the 23 inward investment visits are not a platitude. The legislation has been passed, and we have a chance in the House to set our date and rate of corporation tax.

The Member, foolishly, may think that he knows more than the likes of Professor Neil Gibson and others from the Economic Policy Centre, which provides independent advice. If I may, I will take the advice of the top three economists in Northern Ireland instead of his foolishness. We are told that we have an opportunity of 30,000 to 40,000 new jobs coming from one of the top three economists in Northern Ireland —

Mr Swann: [Interruption.]

Mr Bell: The Member may want to shout down 30,000 to 40,000 new jobs. In that case, he would be failing not only north Antrim but Northern Ireland.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for the information that you have brought to us this afternoon. Minister, you are now back in office, and although I accept that this news came to you out of the blue today, maybe there were other opportunities that you missed by not being here.

Energy supply seems to be key to maintaining large manufacturing industry in Northern Ireland. What action will be taken to ensure that the North/South and Moyle interconnectors will be up and running and delivering electricity at competitive European rates? What actions will you take beyond that taken by the Minister for Employment and Learning and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to contact counterparts in Europe to ensure that the matter is resolved?

Mr Bell: The Member started with some sniping before coming to a very constructive question. There was nothing indicated in the monthly visits to Invest Northern Ireland. Without going into the contents of a private meeting, I can say that, when the Member of Parliament Ian Paisley visited the local management, nothing was raised with us to indicate that there were any difficulties. The most recent quarterly report, from September, I think, indicated that output was up. Therefore, the first part of your question — the sniping — does not really count.

As to energy costs, the Executive are putting £30 million into expanding our gas infrastructure to give consumers more choice. We have faced a difficult choice in balancing continued support for renewables against consumer bills. I have put forward proposals that avoid putting that additional cost on to Northern Ireland consumers. The Utility Regulator is working to reform the single wholesale electricity market on the island of Ireland, because wholesale costs make up two thirds of our electricity bill. A review of the competitiveness of our energy markets has been undertaken by the Utility Regulator, and that has recently concluded that competition is effective. Although it is a big difficulty, it should be noted that most businesses have energy costs around the EU average. I appreciate, however, that large-scale users have comparatively higher costs than their competitors. We do not get exact figures, because they negotiate their contracts separately. We have to do something, but there are things that we cannot do. There is a triangle: costs are there, yes, but there is also security of supply and emissions. You cannot just take costs without looking at security of supply and emissions. You must take a balanced approach.

For this House, the game changer — I will repeat this until I am blue in the face — is setting the date and rate of corporation tax. If we look back in 16 years' time at up to 40,000 jobs lost and an economy underperforming by 10%, the salience of what I am saying will be considerable. Let us set the date and rate, and let us give back to our manufacturing a competitive advantage.

Mr D McIlveen: The Minister will be aware that, even in the darkest days of this Province, Ballymena was recognised as a private sector powerhouse owing to its high level of private industry. There is a real, genuine fear in the area that that reputation is slowly but surely starting to slip away. Does the Minister agree with me that a task force should be set up as soon as possible, with all the relevant stakeholders, to ensure that Ballymena's reputation as an economic powerhouse for the private sector is not further damaged?

Mr Bell: I assure you that anything that I can do in a task force capacity, as an Executive Minister or through working most directly and currently with the Minister for Employment and Learning, will be done for the people involved. It is important that we take a whole view of the mid- and east Antrim area.

It is also important that we take a look at foreign direct investment in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland has outperformed the rest of the United Kingdom. Up until August 2014, we talked about outperforming every other part of the United Kingdom with the exception of London, and people said that we could not compete against London. However, from August 2014, we overtook it. We have more foreign direct investment coming to Northern Ireland. Do not take my word for it: take the word of 80% of the foreign direct investment that has come to Northern Ireland. Those businesses have subsequently reinvested. Eighty per cent of everybody who has sucked it and seen has put more investment into Northern Ireland. The area still has companies such as Wrightbus, Schrader, Randox and Moy Park. It is still a world leader, and we will do all in our power to ensure that it stays that way.

Mr Agnew: The Minister said that no concerns were raised during the monthly meetings with Invest NI, but, as has been said by a number of Members, UNITE raised concerns in July and was told that it had nothing to worry about. Why did the Minister not listen to UNITE, and why did he not act on its concerns?

Mr Bell: I had a very positive meeting. I am not sure that the summary that the Member has given is accurate; it is certainly not an accurate account of my recollection or of the people who were with me at that meeting. I understand that press releases have gone out. I understand also that when UNITE requested that meeting with me, we asked whether it had anything specific, and it said that there was no specific area that it wanted to speak about. It was talking about general issues that affected UNITE and general issues that affected our manufacturing strategy. We had a very constructive and healthy meeting with UNITE. I was a trade union member for over two decades. I had a very constructive and healthy meeting with members of UNITE in July. It should be said that there was no indication at that stage, either from Michelin, the local management of the company or anybody else, that there were any difficulties leading to today's announcement. As I said, as recently as a couple of weeks ago, the Member of Parliament met local management, and we did not have any indication that this was going to happen. We discussed then what we would do with energy costs. I said, and I always will say, that the best way to create quality jobs and employment for our people in Northern Ireland — we cannot use the state aid as we did before; the European rules forbid that. We can debate whether they are right or wrong, but they are there, and I have to observe the law — is to set a date and rate of corporation tax that could create 30,000 to 40,000 new jobs and grow our economy by 10%. Creating employment and quality employment is everything that any sensible trade union would want to take forward.

Mr McNarry: Will the Minister report back to us on this despairing situation and tell us what Michelin's intention is? Is there a future beyond 2018, and are there production challenges that it is willing to entertain? If not, where are those jobs in Ballymena to take on the skilled workers between now and 2018?

Mr Bell: The information that I got from the company this morning was that it was going to close the complete site. For what it is worth, I have every empathy with the 860 people who have been told that they have lost their jobs. There are 70 contractors as well. My information is that it will be a phased rundown over two and a half years. I hope that we can learn some lessons from the good practice that there was with JTI in retraining and generous redundancy support for families.

I understand that Michelin faced a major challenge. In addition to energy and logistics, it faced a major challenge because there was a £5 million downturn in the truck tyre market and real challenges from the Asian market. I understand that it regarded each of its five European sites as inefficient. There are logistical issues, but we have to look at what we can do, which is to use that £5 million from the community development fund constructively. We can ask the people who are working there and whose employment is going to be phased out over the two and a half year period what skills they have that could be utilised by other companies in the area — Wrightbus, Shrader, Radox and Moy Park. The advertisements are out there. What do we need to do either to accredit their training or to upskill them to put them in a position where they can take advantage of the jobs that are being advertised?

4.00 pm

What we can do — the Employment and Learning Minister has put the Northern Regional College on notice with its full agreement — is put courses in place for people who have the skills but do not necessarily have the certification of those skills, so that they can get the necessary certification, to go on their CV, to render them eligible for those jobs. We will look at their skill sets, make one-to-one and group appointments and bring to people's attention the advertisements that, I understand, exist for jobs in the area. However, it is not just about the jobs that exist in the area: we can bring jobs in. I am in a privileged position as Enterprise Minister: I know that significant global companies are looking at Northern Ireland. They intend to bring investment and jobs, if this House gets its act together and sets a date and a rate for corporation tax: 30,000 to 40,000 jobs are a massive opportunity that we cannot afford to miss.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is the end of the period available for the urgent oral question. Unfortunately, not everyone who had indicated was able to question the Minister.

Private Members' Business

Post-primary Transfer Process

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly notes that a solution to the post-primary transfer process has not been found; further notes that a one-size-fits-all educational system will not work; believes that it is becoming increasingly unacceptable that, every year, thousands of young people are sitting unregulated transfer tests and that primary schools are placed in the difficult position of mediating between parental demand and Department of Education policies; further believes that the ongoing politicking of the issue does not address the seriousness of the matter; and calls on the Minister of Education to convene talks with all the major stakeholders in order to build consensus and agree a way forward on the issue. — [Mrs Overend.]

Mr Newton: I rise to support the motion, but not with a lot of enthusiasm. I do not see the need to divide the Chamber, but I think that the motion might be described as being somewhat unskilled and sloppy in its construction. I refuse to believe that Danny Kennedy was happy with the construction of the motion, given his ministerial experience, his usually forensic mind on political matters and his long-term political experience. Given all that, I cannot see him being happy with the motion as it stands.

It is a great pity that the DUP amendment was not accepted, because it would have done three things —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. I remind the Member that it is not in order to speak about an amendment that was not selected.

Mr Newton: I apologise, Mr Deputy Speaker. The motion would have benefited from rewording to confirm that schools have the right to use selection and that there is no community consensus on the way forward. Indeed, the motion should have taken up the clarion call from parents and others for cooperation between those who provide the selection tests, to work together to the benefit of children, parents and, indeed, the schools.

Despite the words that have been used earlier about the selection process, parents still want to get their children into grammar schools, as is their right. The mover of the motion indicated as much when she said that there was a growing number — 14,000 plus this year — who will sit the selection tests for grammar schools. Parents are generally supportive of grammar schools, and they are supportive of them because they are ambitious for their children. Grammar schools, however, should not be seen as a reason for underachievement in other sectors.

I welcome the fact that the Assembly today decided to form an all-party group to address underachievement. It has the perhaps more ambitious title of promoting educational excellence, but its intent is to address underachievement. It is, I think, an excellent initiative by Assembly Members to pick up the gauntlet.

Addressing underachievement is necessary. We need further initiatives, from various Departments, to address and tackle it. I welcome the initiative taken by OFMDFM under its signature project: having additional teachers to tackle numeracy and literacy problems proved successful.

While the motion does not do any overall harm, I think that it could have been constructed in a much more purposeful and meaningful way to take the subject forward.

Mr McCausland: Like the previous Member who spoke, I support the motion, but I concur with his view that it could have been better had it been more pointed and productive.

We are living with the legacy of the flawed decision of a previous Sinn Féin Minister to abolish the transfer test. The fact is that Sinn Féin set out to do something and found itself unable to do it. It wanted to abolish, to completely remove, any form of academic selection. That proved impossible. That was a case of Sinn Féin setting out to do something that it did not manage to do, and, in the process, it made the situation more problematic for everyone. It was an ill-thought-out, ill-conceived and ill-considered development.

The fact remains that reports on educational underachievement are frequently misused and abused to justify a political stance against academic selection. That is a flawed analysis that does a disservice to children, schools and parents. It hones in on one issue that is not the real issue, thereby diverting attention from all of the real issues that contribute to educational underachievement and which need to be addressed if we are to achieve the academic excellence that we all desire.

I am afraid that, during today's questions for oral answer, the Minister reiterated that view. I was disappointed that his colleague Mr Hazzard, in the context of asking a question on the subject, referred to a "final rump" of schools. That is a somewhat disparaging term to apply to schools striving to do the best for the children who attend them. It was, I think, inappropriate.

The fact is that many factors lead to underachievement, and there has to be a multifaceted approach if we are to address it. That is why a member of my party proposed the establishment of an all-party group designed to advance educational excellence and address educational underachievement.

We have seen interventions to address underachievement. They need to be made at a very early stage, not at the later stage of transfer from primary to secondary education. The real problems emerge at a very early stage, which is why we have had early years interventions, and I know that the Minister supported a number of those initiatives. There have been early years interventions in the Colin area of west Belfast and in integrated services in the greater Shankill area. If we are to achieve the outcome that we want, we should focus on those areas a great deal more. Nurture units in primary schools are another example of early intervention.

To get back to the core issue of the transfer test and process, the fact is that there is no consensus. That has been clear for a long time. I think there is little sign or, indeed, evidence that a consensus can be reached. Among schools, parents and all stakeholders, there is a range of views and opinions, and I am not sure that a consensus can be reached. The motion calls for striving toward an effort to reach a consensus. I am just not sure that it is necessarily there. What we should be doing is affirming the right of schools to academic selection. It is one that is now recognised and established. It is there, and it is something that very many parents want. Many parents value it and want their children to have a grammar school education. In that case, let us focus on the real problems, which are around the issue of underachievement.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr McCausland: As for the transfer test itself, it would be ideal if we had it regulated again. Sadly, I think that the Minister and his party are going to oppose that.

Lord Morrow: I, too, have great problems with the motion. If I were to support it, it would be under duress, because I believe that the motion fails to tell us what it is trying to do and trying to say. As a matter of fact, when I read it, and read it again, I handed it on to someone else without speaking and they said, "I am not sure what that motion is trying to say."

I think that Mr McCausland has hit the nail on the head. No one on this side of the House will stand up today, tomorrow or any other day and say that we have a perfect education system here in Northern Ireland, but I think many of us are prepared to stand up and say that we have a good education system in Northern Ireland. Of course, as Mr McCausland said, our problems go back some time to when Martin McGuinness took over as Education Minister. In a fit of pique, when the Assembly was going out of business, he ran into this House with an ill-thought-out plan and abolished the 11-plus. In saying that, I am not for a moment saying that the 11-plus was a perfect test or a good system. However, you would not take something away until you had something else to put in its place; that is, except if you were totally irresponsible. As we now know, that is exactly what happened.

I am sure that Mr Kennedy will do it when he speaks, but I cannot draw from the motion whether it compliments the new exam or is critical of it. It does not make that clear. I believe that the system that is now in place is as good as the 11-plus. Indeed, my opinion is that it is better. That is a personal opinion, and I will allow everybody else to have their personal opinion on it, too, but I do know for sure that having nothing in its place just left a vacuum.

I listened to Chris Hazzard. He was critical of grammar schools but then he went on to say — now he is shaking his head; he is not so sure, you see — that the grammar schools have a place. Maybe sometime, not today, he could come to the House and explain what role he sees for grammar schools. He tells us that he is a product of one and that he got a good education from it. Is he going to deprive his offspring and everybody else's of the good system that he benefited from? Is it solely for him? Now that he has got his day out of schooling, he thinks that it is time for all change.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for giving way. He is looking for a bit of clarity. I think that I went to great lengths to say that I have absolutely nothing against grammar schools except their system of admissions. I want everybody to be afforded the chance of going to some of our best schools. I went to a grammar school, but not everybody in my family nor all my friends were afforded that chance, and we have all ended up in different walks of life. We want to be able to give every child the possibility of attending our very best schools.

4.15 pm

Lord Morrow: I listened carefully to what Mr Hazzard said. He said that not all his family and not all his friends went to a grammar school. Were they deprived of going, or did you go because you were such a brainy boy? Is that what you are trying to tell us? You cannot have it both ways. I know many people who did not go to a grammar school and made magnificent achievements. Equally, I know that many who went to grammar schools were quite spectacular students and achieved much in their day. I accept that one size does not fit all. The motion tries to —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Yes, I will.

Mr Weir: I do not know whether Mr Hazzard is putting down a marker that, if you go to a grammar school, you might end up as an MLA. If so, that may be the strongest argument against academic selection that has been offered in the debate.

Lord Morrow: You were going to give me another minute, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Yes.

Lord Morrow: I listened carefully to what Mr Weir said. Some MLAs did not go to a grammar school, and some of them perform quite well as constituency representatives. I see that even the Minister agrees with me; it is not often that I get him to agree with me on anything, but he is agreeing with me on that.

We are not for one minute saying that grammar schools are the be-all and end-all. All children have different abilities and skills, and there are great achievers, whether they go through the grammar school stream or in a different direction. Many people achieve later in life, and some such people are in the Chamber. Mr Weir mentioned that they ended up here, and they are living proof of a wonderful achievement.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Lord Morrow: I agree with the motion that one size does not fit all. I apologise because I will probably not be here to hear what Mr Kennedy says, but I will read his contribution with great interest.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member's time is up.

Lord Morrow: I have to rush to another appointment. When Mr Kennedy speaks, will he clarify whether the motion is criticising the new test?

Mr Allister: It certainly betokens the abject failure of devolution to handle education matters that, all these years into this experiment, the relatively straightforward and essential matter of transferring children from primary education to secondary education continues to be bogged down in dispute and be deficient in any properly controlled or regulated system. I have no difficulty in recognising that that is all part of the belligerent agenda of Sinn Féin to bring anarchy to the education system that it so abhors. That betokens the failure of devolution.

To transfer kids from primary school to secondary school, we have to have a system outside the primary school structure and unregulated from within the primary school structure, whereby kids sit exams that are set by the grammar schools to see whether they are eligible to attend those schools. At the same time, every bully-boy tactic available is used by the Department to threaten the primary schools that dare to do what parents expect them to do: prepare their children for the next step in their educational journey. If that step includes undertaking an AQE test or something else, the full weight of threat and authority from the Department is brought down on the heads of those schools. How dare they try to do what parents expect and equip their children to make the transition from primary school to grammar or secondary school?

That bully-boy tactic is a very negative influence.

Of course, we require some form of selection; I am quite clear on that. Whether we like it or not, it is a fact that not all children are bestowed with the same talents, aptitudes and capabilities. Some are marvellously bestowed in mechanical matters and others are marvellously bestowed with academic talents; but we kid ourselves if we think that all children, with the right tuition, will be produced at the same level of talent in every possible discipline. It is, of itself, absolute nonsense.

The system refuses to recognise that reality. It refuses to recognise that, for some children, the most that can be taken out of them and the most that can be given to them is by encouraging and allowing their academic talents to flourish; and that, for others, the most that can be taken out of them and the most given to them is by encouraging their non-academic talents to flourish. To deny the opportunity to allow both to flourish by simply seeking a great conglomeration, where you settle for the lowest common denominator, seems to me to be absolute folly.

That, of course, is the philosophy that drives the Minister. He wants to bring everyone down to the same level, so that you can say that there is equality across the board in talent, instead of wanting to exploit, build and grow the talent and aptitude of whatever nature. Therefore, the one-size-fits-all approach that the motion refers to is an absurdity; it is an absurdity that is being perpetuated by those decisions.

The AQE test, for example, is very well calibrated and very well tested and proofed. It is an excellent test of children's ability.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Allister: It is not the only test, but it is excellent in all those regards. I only wish that something of that nature and order was permitted to operate properly within the education system. We could then see the talents grow in this Province.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education):: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to respond to today's debate, which relates to the system of transfer from primary to post-primary education. However, at the heart of the system, are our young people of 10 and 11 years of age. This Saturday, many of those children will sit a test that will determine the school that they will transfer to next year. Setting aside my views on the necessity of those tests for a moment, I would like to acknowledge that this is a very stressful time for those children. I would like to wish them well and remind them that, however they perform in those unnecessary tests, they will get the chance to fulfil their potential at whatever or whichever school they intend to move to.

I also commend the parents who have decided that their children will not sit those unnecessary tests. The vast majority of our parents are caring and nurturing and want the best for their children. Too often in our education debates, we concentrate on those who rush to sit a selection test, who have to sit a selection test or who allow their children to sit a selection test because their peers are doing so. I am on record today and on many other occasions as saying that I understand why parents are placed in that position, but I also commend the parents who make the conscious decision to refuse to allow their children to be used in that manner.

Throughout the debate — and Hansard can be checked, double-checked and triple-checked — no one has put forward an educational argument for academic selection. No one has put forward an educational argument for academic selection in 2015. Mr Allister was the last Member who spoke, so his argument is freshest in my mind. When I hear the argument that all children are not created the same, that all children have different skill sets and that some children may be mechanically minded and others academically minded, he may find it surprising that I do not disagree with him.

I agree with you. What we disagree on is this: why do you need to separate those children at age 11 or 14 and send them to a different school.

Mr Allister: To bring the best out of them.

Mr O'Dowd: Why do you need to separate them? We can ignore what all the international evidence shows. Many of you may wish to ignore me and the Department of Education on this matter, and that is OK. However, there is a lengthy list of international bodies that all point to the fact that academic selection does not work educationally and that it has a detrimental impact on your education system. My colleague Mr Hazzard read out a list of such bodies, which has been dismissed by some.

Can you dismiss the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child? Can you dismiss the Equality Commission? Can you dismiss the Human Rights Commission? Can you dismiss the OECD experts in education? Can you dismiss those high-performing educational systems internationally that are not only outperforming our education system but are also outperforming our academically selective schools? Our academically selective schools are not competing at the level of other non-selective education systems globally.

We ignore all that evidence and set up a wee Committee to look at educational underachievement so we can go to the doors next year and say, "Oh, we do care about educational underachievement; we have set up an all-party working group on it". However, if your all-party working group is serious, it will have to look at the international evidence. When you examine the international evidence, you either follow it or disband your all-party working group, because you are going nowhere if you ignore the evidence.

Let us go back to why we separate these children, the academically gifted, at age 11, because you cannot tell whether they are academically gifted at 11. I do not care how good the AQE test or the GL test are or if they come together in an unholy alliance and produce a new test, you do not have evidence before you of the abilities of a child at age 10 or 11. You have a moment in time that can be, and is, coerced by a number of factors, which is damaging not only to the individual but to our education system. It is coerced because evidence shows us that if you come from a socially mobile background, you will do OK in the AQE, GL, 11-plus or whatever you want to call it. If you come from a socially deprived background, you will not.

The evidence also shows us that, whether it is a state-sponsored or a non-state-sponsored test, coaching will get you through it. So, you are coached for the test and you get through it and you go off to a selective school. What is the first thing that you will find? You will find that this school, which you have been coached to attend, teaches the exact same curriculum as the school down the road that your friends were not coached to attend. They will go through the same curriculum, they will go through the same teaching, and will be assessed in the same way. Educational pathways are open to them, whether academically, vocationally or otherwise; and, come the age of 14, decisions will be made about their future educational pathways, the best direction of travel for each individual pupil. Decisions will be made in conversations with the parents, the pupil, the teacher, and they will move along a pathway that suits their needs. That pathway can adjust —

Lord Morrow: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will in a moment. However, in the academically selective world, when you reach the age of doing your mock GCSEs or your GCSEs and you do not do so well, there is a wee quiet conversation in the office where they say, "I don't think you suit here", and you are left behind.

Is that what education is about? Is that what everybody here adheres to? Individually, pupils are disadvantaged, but the evidence shows us a more disturbing thing. Academic selection damages your education system, and here is why: international and local evidence shows us — many fine non-selective schools in our society prove it to be true — that when children of different abilities and from different socio-economic backgrounds are taught together they all do better than they would if separated: all of them do better than if they were separated.

Therefore, why are we separating our children at 11 or at 14? It is not for educational reasons but for social reasons.

4.30 pm

There is a wee battle going on between the unionist parties over the middle-class unionist vote. The DUP changed its position on academic selection somewhere in the mid 1980s, but it still went into the St Andrews peace negotiations — they were peace negotiations — and insisted that academic selection be retained on the statute books unless the Assembly said otherwise. The DUP has never explained adequately why it went into peace negotiations and insisted that a system that has been proved to be detrimental to Protestant working-class communities be retained. Never has it explained that. I have no doubt that the Protestant working-class communities will go out and vote for the party again, and the DUP will produce its wee graphs and say, "We do care about Protestant educational underachievement". However, when it supports a system that embeds educational underachievement, it cannot stand by that claim. Perhaps, at some stage, the DUP will explain why it went into peace negotiations to uphold a system that was detrimental to the Protestant working-class community.

The Ulster Unionist Party has been an advocate of academic selection. There have been many criticisms of the motion. I have read it several times, back and forth, but I am pretty sure that it means, "You need to do something, but academic selection stays". That is basically what it says. If you do not deal with the core problem of the system, however, what is the point? We could produce a state-sponsored test. It would be very easy to produce a state-sponsored test, but it would not solve the problem in the system. You would still be dividing young people on the basis of social class, not educational ability. You would still have the same consequences for your education system by way of educational outcomes for those on the tail of underachievement and for our highest-performing pupils. International evidence tells us that even our highest-performing pupils should be doing better. Our grammar schools — the selective schools — are not competing against the best in Europe or the best in the world. Why is that the case? The all-party group on tackling educational underachievement will spend several months discussing that. It will look for every reason and excuse for why that is the case, but the reason will always come back to this: when you look —

Lord Morrow: It will blame you.

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, it will blame me.

It will always come back to this: the international evidence shows that the highest-performing education systems are non-selective. Why do they benefit from being non-selective? It goes back to the point that I made earlier. Children from different socio-economic backgrounds and with educational abilities learn from one another. Therefore, why do we divide them? If they learn from one another, and all boats rise in the high tide, why do we separate them? Somebody needs to explain to me the educational purposes of dividing children, if the evidence shows that they do better when they are educated together. No one has done that thus far.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Allister: Does the Minister believe in and support streaming in secondary schools? Streaming is a soft type of selection.

Mr O'Dowd: I have no objections to streaming, but there is an interesting debate in education at the moment around it. Again, we have good local evidence of that. Streaming is selection within the school, but it shows that all young people can be educated together in the one school. You can move between streams, friendships can be retained from primary school into post-primary school, and there is no social division. All of the evidence suggests that, yes, young people can do better that way.

Look at St Patrick's in Keady, which is no longer streaming. It is educating all abilities in the one class. Look at the results that are coming out of that school. They are very impressive and informative. As has been mentioned, the school recently received a Times Educational Supplement award for its innovative work in and around education.

I am the Education Minister, and I am a parent. I have high ambitions for my children. I hear the like of Mr Allister saying that my motive is to destroy our education system and to bring everybody down. My motive is more scary for him. My motive is to bring everybody up. My motive and my belief in equality is this: everybody should have the same chance in life, regardless of creed or need. That scares Mr Allister more than his belief that I am here to wreck the education system, because nothing could be further from the truth. My children are in the education system. I want my children to succeed. I want the education system to succeed. I want the economy to succeed. The previous debate was about job losses in Ballymena. That shows us, if we need to know something, that educating simply along the old model will not benefit the modern economy.

Lord Morrow: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will in a moment. I think that this is the second time.

Mr Weir: You did not give way the first time.

Mr O'Dowd: Did I not? Sorry.

Our economy is changing. The old certainties of the past are gone. Whether it be heavy manufacturing or some of the old academic pathways, they are all changing, and we have to have an education system to suit them.

I will give way to the Member.

Lord Morrow: Thank you. At least I made it on the second attempt. I ask the Minister directly: if what he says is right, why is it that the numbers who are taking the transfer test are increasing year on year? I think that, at the last count, they were up by some 400 or 500. Are you saying that all those who are taking this test are under duress?

Mr O'Dowd: I am happy to be wrong. The difficulty for those on the other side of the argument is that internationally respected bodies are saying that academic selection damages the education system. I do not know whether the figures that are quoted every year showing a rise in the numbers who are taking the test are right, because we have one organisation saying that they have 6,000 taking the test and another organisation saying that they have 8,000 taking it, but I am also commonly told that many children sit both tests. How do we know whether there is a rise in the numbers taking it?

What is also quite clear from commentary and debates in the media around this matter is that there are parents whose children sit the test because they support academic selection, and there are parents whose children sit the test because the local school has put a barrier in the way and they have to get over it. Other children sit the test because their peers are sitting the test and they are never going near a selective school anyway, because their parents put them through it. In this equation, numbers do not mean that there is overwhelming support for academic selection.

I will say, as I said earlier, that yesterday proved that there can be changes in public opinion and there can be change in this House. All those who are opposed to academic selection in society, and all those who are in favour of equality in society, need to get out and campaign for change, because the marriage equality movement proved yesterday that you can change people's minds. Trade unions, civic society and equality organisations need to follow the lead that has been given by the Catholic bishops and the Catholic Principals Association on this matter. They need to get out and campaign for change.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful for the opportunity to wind up this debate on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party. First, I want to make some general remarks about the context of the debate.

In recent weeks, I have rejoined the Education Committee after a 13-year hiatus. In the first flush of devolution in this House, between 1998 and 2002, I chaired the Committee. What happy memories! I remind Members that it was a time when the education debate was particularly dominated by the thorny issue of post-primary transfer. It was a time when we had the Burns report, the Gallagher report and major consultation exercises which involved a household survey. It was a period of great public debate; sometimes heated, but mostly serious and quite focused. Looking back now, I think that there was an opportunity then to create broad agreement about replacing the 11-plus with something better which would have commanded widespread public support.

It is worth remembering that there was widespread agreement in some areas: the need to replace the 11-plus test, the concept of a new form of assessment through a pupil profile, and some of the proposed admissions criteria. In addition, the suggestion that 14 was a more appropriate age for a pupil to decide upon an academic or a more vocational route was gaining traction. Certainly, I have been a strong admirer and supporter of the Dickson plan system, which operates very successfully in the Craigavon area despite the obvious and continued attempts by the Minister of Education to dismantle and abolish it.

The household survey was quite interesting at the time because it said that 30% of respondents were in favour of abolishing academic selection but 64% were in favour of retaining it and 7% were undecided. Fifty seven per cent of respondents in the household survey wanted an end to the then 11-plus examination. Fundamentally, I am not sure that those percentages have significantly altered over the years.

At the time, the Ulster Unionist Party said that the transfer test in the form of the 11-plus was unsustainable and that a replacement selection process should be developed. We favoured a transfer system based on a pupil profile developed in the primary system, accommodating parental input but with a final decision resting with the school on the basis of approved criteria. Our goal then was, and remains, that all schools should come to be viewed as equivalent in the value of the education that they provide.

Of course, the debate ended abruptly on 11 October 2002, when Martin McGuinness, in his last act as Education Minister, in an act of political malice and educational destruction, declared the end of transfer tests. That act was described by a distinguished figure in education at the time, Monsignor Denis Faul, now deceased, as:

"dictatorial, made without reference to the Northern Ireland Assembly or the education committee of the assembly. It was a one-man decision that can be classed as anti-democratic."

Therefore, it killed off any emerging consensus and polarised the debate, and, 13 years on, we are not much further on. The last 11-plus examination was in November 2008, and we now have non-departmental, non-state, independent tests.

I want to assure Lord Morrow before he ushers himself away to other business. Had he listened to the proposer of the motion, my colleague, Mrs Overend, he would have heard her say that the AQE and the PPTC deserved credit for the professional way in which they have gone about organising their entrance tests and that we were not aware of any complaints about the fairness of the system. Our complaint is that they are independent and, therefore, unregulated and they ought to be regulated by the Department of Education. Perhaps there is more than a hint that they operate on a polarised and almost sectarian basis, which is not their intention and is not their proper use.

We do want to see change and, unfortunately, as Sandra in proposing the motion has described, the issue of post-primary transfer is really another elephant in the room. There are so many elephants gathering in that room and there are more elephants in this Chamber than in Bellevue zoo, but that seems to be the way of it. It seems that, in this mandate, the big two parties of Sinn Féin and the DUP have come to a truce, and they seem to be content to let AQE and GL continue with their tests for grammar entrance, while the Minister can pose as being ideologically pure and can occasionally send threatening letters to primary schools for daring to prepare pupils for those transfer tests. It is a thoroughly unsatisfactory state of affairs, and that is what the motion seeks to address and make progress on.

I want to deal with some of the contributions made by Members. Mr Weir and other DUP colleagues, including Lord Morrow, Nelson McCausland and Robin Newton, had nothing good to say about the motion, but they had not produced any motion themselves, and one felt that that was the major criticism; that, short of bringing forward a DUP motion, anything else would be unsatisfactory. I think that we can deal with that. There was common agreement from DUP Members that the current situation is unsatisfactory and needs to be addressed, and that we should take steps at least to insist on some urgent discussion. I suppose that the action point from the motion is that the Minister of Education, rather than sitting on his political theory of Marxism and old-style socialism that makes Jeremy Corbyn look like a moderate —

4.45 pm

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: I am happy to give way.

Mr O'Dowd: There is another well-known Marxist revolutionary who is opposed to academic selection. You might have heard of him: Michael Gove. He hardly falls into the category of being a Marxist. This debate transcends political ideology. It is an education debate, and many people from different political ideologies have come to the conclusion that academic selection damages your education system.

Mr Kennedy: I have listened carefully to Michael Gove, and you are no Michael Gove — I am happy to confirm that. [Laughter.] I am afraid that what we have left are the politics of envy, not only educational envy, it seems, but social envy from the Minister and his party. That is very regrettable indeed, and it is not the basis on which to proceed on education for the future of all of our children. I am not the product of a grammar school education, and neither are my children, but I want all children to succeed and be encouraged to achieve their best.

A school mentioned by some in the debate, St Patrick's in Keady, is in my constituency. It is an excellent school, but it is unthinkable that no degree of assessment takes place there. That, in its own form, is selection. This play on words to satisfy —

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: No, I do not have time.

There is a play on words to satisfy old-style Marxist ideology that allows people to pretend that selection does not exist and is not practised —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Kennedy: — in almost every form. I commend the motion to the House.

Adjournment

Impact of Rates on Small Businesses in South Belfast

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes, and all other Members who speak will have approximately six minutes.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Minister, in particular, for her presence in the Chamber, and I acknowledge the publication last week, post my tabling of this debate, of her Department's review of the non-domestic rating system and the useful information contained in it. This is definitely the graveyard shift and I feel that I should possibly just email you and let everybody get away, but we will go through the motions anyway. I apologise on behalf of my colleague Fearghal McKinney; he has had to travel to Ballymena.

It is important that we, in the Assembly, get to grips with the form of taxation over which we already have control, namely domestic and non-domestic rates, which, between them, raise £1.17 billion annually. With the proposals that I am making, I acknowledge that we cannot propose to recommend rates relief unless we can balance it with some compensating revenue-raising measures. All the parties in the Assembly, including my own, have been united in demanding that Westminster devolve the power to reduce corporation tax in order to be competitive with the Republic and to attract foreign direct investment. It is my personal belief, and it is on the record, that the ship of foreign direct investment has probably sailed and that we are too late for that party. We have the absurd position that parties are lobbying for the right to give a preferential rate of tax on businesses, which may or may not come to Northern Ireland, while government is perceived to be ignoring the businesses in our town centres and on our high streets that have been here for decades, are creating a substantial number of local jobs, and are owned by local people.

I do not want to rehearse too much the complaints that have been often made in the Assembly about the decline of the retail sector and traditional high street shopping. I have lived in south Belfast since the age of three. I grew up about 30 metres from the Lisburn Road and had my first taste of the working world in a newsagent and restaurant there, neither of which, unfortunately, survived the downturn.

In south Belfast, we reputedly have the most sought-after retail location outside the city centre, namely the Lisburn Road, which is followed, not too far behind, by the Ormeau Road. Like all retail outlets in every city and town in these islands, the Lisburn Road, Ormeau Road, as well as Finaghy, Carryduff, Saintfield Road, Botanic and all other clusters of businesses are under unprecedented economic pressure and face substantial decline.

We know the reasons for that: changes in shopping patterns, the growth of online and out-of-town shopping, and various parking and traffic issues. All those factors have put traditional high street shopping under stress. However, the biggest single factor over which we have control and can do something about is unaffordable business rates. The situation with business rates, as I am sure you have heard from constituents, significantly worsened for many post-revaluation in 2015, implemented from this April. We were told that it was to be a revenue-neutral exercise, but it has thrown up incredible anomalies in rate collection.

The Northern Ireland Independent Retail Trade Association (NIIRTA) claims that 45% of its members saw their rate bills increase from between 20% and 200%, which, I think everyone would agree, is an absurd and unjustifiable variation. The net asset values (NAVs) for many properties have been set so high that businesses in south Belfast cannot benefit from the small business rates relief designed to help them.

Depending on which of the 11 council areas a business is located, rates vary from 51·66p to 59·5p in the pound compared with 48·2p in England. That means that in Northern Ireland, some businesses are dealing with 20% higher rates than a comparable business in comparable premises across the water. That is in addition to the other costs of doing business in Northern Ireland.

Land and Property Services (LPS) now typically demands anywhere from £5,000 to £10,000 in rates to trade in an average-size shop or office in any town centre or on any main street in Northern Ireland, regardless of the trade or profitability of the business being undertaken, or indeed of the office or charity. Anybody who has attempted to open a constituency office will know that. That is an absolutely unsustainable burden for many and has contributed directly to the proliferation of boarded-up shop fronts and of charity shops, which are, of course, tax exempt.

Northern Ireland has one of the lowest numbers of businesses per 10,000 of the population and has experienced a 2% fall in the number of businesses since 2010, compared with a 10% increase in, for example, the south of England. We are not helping to foster an entrepreneurial culture because it is immensely difficult for a start-up business to locate in any of our towns or local shopping stretches because of business rates and the fact that, quite simply, many banks will just not lend to a business start-up that hopes to trade on a high street.

On Saturday past, I walked the length of the Lisburn Road, which is less than two miles from the King's Hall to Bradbury Place. I counted seven charity shops in operation, and no fewer than 42 business properties, retail and office accommodation, that were for sale or rent. They were vacant in one way or another, including substantial properties, such as the former Majestic cinema and the Malone Exchange, probably in excess of 2,000 square metres.

I want to give a few examples of the effects of rate and rent issues, and some of the anomalies that have been raised with me in south Belfast and further afield.

In my constituency, a fairly upmarket furniture shop opened about 10 years ago and closed this year. I was told — I have been trying to confirm this — that, in the shop's last year of trading, its combined rent and rates bill was £240,000 a year, or £4,600 a week. I am advised that a small, family-owned food business elsewhere in my constituency has the same rates bill as quite a large, metro-style chain supermarket less than half a mile up the same road. In a city outside of Belfast, the owners of a hotel — a family business — pay business rates of £255,692 per annum, which is just short of £5,000 a week. I was given a direct comparison between that hotel, which has 110 bedrooms, and a 100-bedroom hotel in a town in the midlands down South that has full conference facilities, a nightclub, a pub and a leisure centre. Its business rates are €120,000, which equates to roughly £90,000. The difference is a massive £165,000. In Scotland, a business located in a premises with an annual NAV of £10,000 will not pay any rates. A comparable business here will pay between £4,100 and £4,760, depending on which council area it is located in.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that that is a heavy financial burden for any business. It goes some way to explaining not only the proliferation of vacant shops but the low level of business start-ups when compared with our neighbours across the water and down South. We now have the situation that, in Britain and the Republic, central and local government are proactively trying to implement innovative ways to attract business start-ups into town centres to regenerate and revitalise neighbourhoods. At the same time, we appear to be ignoring the fact that our policies are driving people out of town centres. Put simply, the annual NAV — more precisely, the antecedent valuation date (AVD) of the rental valuation of property as at 1 April — has been set far too high by LPS.

I want to touch briefly on the collateral and wider damage that occurs when a business shuts. It is not just the jobs that are lost when the shutters come down. There is a stifling of investment and destruction of the value of assets. Owning commercial property is now looked on almost as a financial liability by most banks and as impaired security for lending. More broadly, however, the nearby communities suffer the ill effects. Councils have to pick up the tab for dereliction, vandalism and related antisocial behaviour, and street renovation. I know from growing up in south Belfast that the coffee shops and ice-cream parlours provide the vital shared space that the Assembly insists that it wants to provide, but businesses are thwarted from doing so. Ultimately, dereliction is also providing us with a lower rates income than we would have if those empty premises were trading.

Many councils have drawn down funds from OFMDFM to regenerate their town centre streetscapes — that has happened in Belfast too — to try to encourage footfall to return to the shops. I support their efforts. They are trying to use what powers they have to do what they can. However, the problem is that, in many cases, we just have attractive streets with empty shops instead of unattractive streets with empty shops. It is a Northern Ireland version of the Potemkin village. Regardless of what councils try to do, what I am hearing from businesses is that they feel that the Assembly is ignoring the reality of what is happening and sidestepping the decisions that we need to take to bring entrepreneurs and vibrancy back to our high streets.

What can be done? I am sympathetic to a lot of the case that NIIRTA and other representative bodies have made that small businesses are facing a perfect storm of high costs of running their businesses and all the consumer spending pressures that we know exist. I support a lot of their proposals. I also have some of my own, which I will run through now. In the first instance, rates have to be fair and reasonable and, in some way, linked as far as possible to the profitability of the business. NAV or affordable market value (AMV) is supposed to be linked to the rents obtained, but LPS is judge, jury and executioner in its own cause, with very limited grounds for appeal. That cannot be right. I am sure that all representatives have had concerns raised with them by local traders about the opaque and, at times, fairly arbitrary processes that LPS seems to have in its decision-making.

5.15 pm

Second, there needs to be a ministerial policy change in relation to the actions of LPS to make it less aggressive in its NAV assessments and revise the majority of NAVs to the rents actually payable on the property, rather than selectively choosing rental deals that were struck possibly at the top of the property boom as supporting evidence. That will need LPS to be considerably more transparent and more open-book with the information that it makes available. It should also be said — we have limited control of market value — that many landlords, frankly, are continuing to charge boom-time rents in order not to reduce the perceived value of their property.

Third — this is a simple enough one — the rates poundage set by the various councils across the 11 council areas mean that we have 11 different rates for some 6,000 square miles. That is silly. It should be capped and consistent across Northern Ireland. It should possibly be capped at a similar rate to GB.

Fourth, there needs to be a hard and probably quite uncomfortable look at some of the rating exemptions that are currently in place. Of 73,000 business premises subject to rates, 10,000 are fully exempt from rates. While I accept that there are probably very good reasons for those exemptions to be in place and that you do not want to withdraw them from the businesses that have them, the bottom line is that, when the system has become so onerous that it requires so many exemptions, the slack is obviously being picked up by other businesses and the system is becoming so inconsistent and increasingly illegitimate.

Fifth, vacant premises, particularly in town centres, are no good for anybody. I touched on some of the issues around antisocial behaviour that result. One of the attractive features that people will see when they are in mainland Europe is people living above the shop. I hope that we can try to find new ways to incentivise people to do that, which would give vibrancy to our high streets and town centres after 6.00 pm when, traditionally, business owners currently all go back to the suburbs.

Sixth, if it is not possible to consider rates reductions, can we give consideration to finding an alternative use for long-term vacant property, and perhaps remove the requirement to go through planning to have a change of use to residential? I believe that that is a policy that is in operation in GB and is helping to remove blighted vacant buildings from high streets. The occupancy level of all high streets for actual ratepayers could be measured for every town, village and area in south Belfast, and any streets that have occupancy levels of below 50% could perhaps be considered for a rates exemption for new businesses in those streets for the next year or two or three, and a rebate could potentially be given to other ratepayers already located in those streets. Mechanisms should be put in place to give demonstrably loss-making businesses a rates holiday if that could help to save the business. Perhaps that is a realistic proposal. Business rates for empty premises could be waived or reduced if somebody has made the effort to let it out at a reduced level.

I will finish up by saying that business rates reform is overdue. As I said, I welcome the Minister's paper on it and the consultation, but it is the single greatest lever that the Assembly has. Banks are not lending, due to high rates. Employment is not being created. Entrepreneurship is being stifled. Business rates are perceived as being a form of austerity, the same as public-sector cuts are. We are genuinely stifling economic growth. Obsessing on the value that we might get from a reduction in corporation tax is building castles in the air if we do not change policies to support businesses that are here now.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As this is Mrs Pengelly's first opportunity to speak as a private Member, I remind the House that it is the convention that a maiden speech is made without interruption, unless the Member becomes rather controversial.

Mrs Pengelly: It gives me great pleasure to speak today on the issue of small business rates in my beautiful and diverse constituency of South Belfast. I am humbled to have the privilege to carry on the mandate of my predecessor, Mr Jimmy Spratt, who retired due to serious ill health. Jimmy spent most of his career in selfless service in the RUC before entering the world of politics, where he proved to be a robust representative for the people of South Belfast.

I pay tribute to his work. I wish him a long and happy retirement and trust he will spend many happy times with his wife Lynda and children and grandchildren from whom he gets such joy. I hope to do his legacy proud, to be a strong advocate for all in South Belfast, to work tirelessly to make a positive difference across the constituency, and to help bring about a better and brighter future in Northern Ireland.

In Northern Ireland, we are a people of strong and oft-times opposing views, not just on constitutional issues but on many others across the spectrum of political ideology. Through my previous role, I had the great privilege to meet many thousands of people from right across the political and community spectrum, and, to me, one thing is clear: whatever divides us from time to time is so much less than that which we have in common, and that which separates us is nothing when compared with the strong bonds that hold us together. So, what is this common thread? Hope, hard work, compassion and a mutual aspiration to build, from the ashes of our past, a strong and better future.

Last night, I watched the very moving 'Nurses on the Frontline' documentary. What a testament to strength, resilience and the power of endurance over adversity. There were many who lived and worked in my constituency in hospitals and on the front line, as paramedics and as firemen and women, and in the army and the police, who dealt with some absolutely horrific things, and did so with the utmost care and compassion, regardless of background, creed or faith. What a debt we owe those public servants. And I know, absolutely for sure, that I do not want anyone to live through such a thing again.

One of my favourite poets said that the past:

"despite its wrenching pain, Cannot be un-lived, but if faced With courage, need not be lived again."

That is my hope and aspiration for the present and future of our beautiful land, but to achieve it requires focus and attention. I will strive tirelessly to make Northern Ireland work, to move Northern Ireland forward and make a better future for all, regardless of faith, politics, sexuality, race or gender.

Today's Adjournment debate is on rates in south Belfast. Northern Ireland is a country of small business. It is a country that, through the worst of the Troubles, was supported and lifted up by the many thousands of family businesses that built our economy when others would not or could not invest. Small business was a strong foundation that, through our darkest days, lifted us up, and that remains so today.

The DUP is proud of its record on supporting small business. We have worked closely with great organisations such as the Northern Ireland Independent Retail Trade Association (NIIRTA) to develop policy to support small business. We were, for example, the first region across the UK to introduce the innovative scheme of small business rate relief. We are also conscious that much more can be done to support small business as we emerge from the difficult economic downturn that devastated so many. That is why we are looking closely at a range of further proposals to help further and support growth in the sector.

South Belfast is a diverse constituency, where the best and highest quality can be celebrated, but where challenges and poor outcomes can so often overshadow. I want to work with DFP to look at innovative ways, including examining the rates system, to encourage and incentivise investment in those areas so desperately in need. One example is across our urban village areas in south Belfast. There are high levels of poverty, dereliction and vacancy. I am looking forward to working further with areas such as the Lisburn Road in developing the business improvement district and helping our urban villages and centres such as Finaghy and Stranmillis.

I know from speaking to my ministerial colleagues that there is a commitment to building a robust economic future for Northern Ireland. Small business is a key part of that. Government alone cannot solve the big challenges that we face, but, working in partnership across parties, Departments and agencies with communities, individuals, families and the private sector, I know that we can make Northern Ireland great. Let us have a vision that we all can share: support our small businesses while growing the economy and attracting foreign direct investment, protecting people and tackling educational underachievement and social deprivation.

I have a passion for people and a passion for positive change. I hope that you will accept the hand that I extend to you today and work with me in pushing forward a positive agenda for bringing hope and a better future to South Belfast and Northern Ireland.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome junior Minister Pengelly's comments. I thank another South Belfast colleague Claire Hanna for securing the debate at 5.00 pm on a Tuesday.

When I think of the contribution of small businesses in South Belfast, small retail businesses in particular, it is clear that what we are discussing today is not only about trying to foster those businesses but trying to foster and build community. So many of those entrepreneurs, the business owners, are wedded to the area, rooted to the area and have great commitment to the area. I have a special word of praise for the traders' associations across the constituency — the Lisburn Road in particular — the Ormeau Road and other areas where traders have come together to try to make common cause and provide a common voice — one voice — with which to speak to those in government about their needs. In particular, our friends in NIIRTA have done that and asked for a fair, efficient and fit-for-purpose rates system.

I welcome the Minister's contribution, and that of her predecessor, in announcing a rate review. I hope to study the paper. Now that the Ministers are back, I do not have as much time to read documents. We had a little more free time before that. I have printed it off, and I want to study it. I know that there will be some bold proposals for the time ahead.

It is my view that we need to take inspiration from businesses such as those on the Lisburn Road that are committed to our communities: the Arcadia deli, which has been there for 80 years, and Michael Deane of Deane and Decano. They have shown great commitment through the great recession and through tough times in the city. They have shouldered the burden of rates unfairly placed on start-ups in particular and on new businesses.

It is time, in the rate review, to find ways to give additional support and encouragement to small businesses. It is not beyond us to find ways to encourage and induce businesses to go into empty premises on main arterial routes. When a main road is busy, bustling and thriving, it tells you that there is a vibrant community. I will not name them, but there are roads in the city where that is not the case and where empty premises after empty premises send a different message — they send out a message to investors that there is a chill factor in the area. We want to encourage a review of rates, if that, in turn, will increase the number of businesses.

I want to finish by mentioning the entrepreneurs. Claire Hanna also mentioned them. For me, they are the heart and soul of our business community. Today is a black day for Ballymena: a multinational company that served us well for 46 years announced that it is upping sticks and leaving, and that is a devastating blow. However, other companies were mentioned during that discussion today, such as Radox, which was built up by indigenous entrepreneurs. It is my conviction that, if we can help young people to start businesses — every business started small — and make it easier for them to access premises on thriving arterial routes, we will be sowing the seeds of a more robust business sector in the future. Hopefully, when we review rates, there will be a way in which we can encourage start-ups, which are not necessarily taking business away from their neighbours, to come in to empty premises and start the business growth that we are crying out for.

5.30 pm

Mr McGimpsey: I begin by thanking Ms Hanna for bringing forward this debate on business rates in south Belfast. I also acknowledge and welcome the comments of Mrs Pengelly.

First, as far as local businesses are concerned, we must remember that south Belfast includes a large portion of the city centre. When you talk to small businesses, particularly retailers, they all tell you the same thing: they hate paying rates. They do not understand what they are getting for them. City Hall does not even empty their bins. They see it as taxation for which they gain no benefit. That might be unfair but it is the general viewpoint.

Look at the plight of small businesses, particularly in retail. The rate of dereliction in retail areas is about double the national rate. Look at the footfall on the streets where small businesses are found, which is much lower than the weighted average. That gives you an indication of the plight of small businesses. Remember that small businesses, by and large, are owned by local people; local families employing local people. Any profits that they make are retained in our economy. Any money that they spend is spent within our economy. Therefore, they provide real and genuine benefit for all in our society. They are, as has been said, seriously challenged not just by Internet shopping but by the growth of huge out-of-town shopping centres, which provide one thing that local businesses cannot, namely limitless free car parking. They are faced with an uncompetitive situation and are disadvantaged by huge shopping centres. Indeed, at City Hall, where I was for many years, we found out through an exercise — the Deputy Speaker may well remember it — that for every job created in a big shopping centre outside Belfast, we were losing two inside Belfast. There was a decision at that stage — this is going back 15 years — that those big shopping centres should be capped. Of course, they were not, and the challenge goes on.

What can we do about this? We were hit with the recession, which winds on in Northern Ireland — that combination of national and bank debt that sent the Western economies into a tailspin, and from which we suffer grievously. All of these are challenges. Look throughout south Belfast. Lisburn Road is just one street. My office is in Sandy Row; once a thriving retail area, now a shadow of its former self. That is repeated throughout south Belfast and, indeed, other parts of Belfast, whether east Belfast, north Belfast or west Belfast.

We need to look at the measures that we can take. For example, small business rate relief is due to end next year, I think in March 2016. That should be extended. It is a good scheme; it has provided some help to small retailers, and there is no reason why it cannot be extended. It was put in place for five years and extended for a year. Let us see it extended for another five years. Let us also look at expanding the bands to increase those reliefs. Poundage is another issue, which was raised by Claire Hanna. I see little prospect of City Hall managing to do anything about poundage, bearing in mind the very low rate increases this year. There does not seem to me to be a huge opportunity there.

Banding is one important area. Another important area is empty business rate relief. We charge empty premises rates. They get an exemption for a short period and then, after six months or a year, the owners, who maybe had to close their business because it was not profitable, are hit by rates, which is a tax. They get nothing for those rates, and their businesses just sit there, which is a huge disincentive. We could look at that area to see how we might support and help small retailers. If we do not do that, areas of dereliction will grow, and we will all face the challenge of what to do about empty premises. You only have to look at some of the streets in south Belfast, where areas of dereliction have lain that way year after year. No one is picking them up and taking them up.

We clearly need a holistic approach, as the phrase goes. Planning offices play a key role, as they give planning permission for huge out-of-town retail developments with free car parking. The provision of that unfair competition is strangling retail in Belfast. One only has to look at the sort of economic driver that Belfast is in Northern Ireland to see how precious it is. It must be preserved.

Ms Lo: I welcome Mrs Pengelly to the House and congratulate her on her role as junior Minister and on being our fellow MLA in the South Belfast constituency. I also want to thank Claire Hanna for securing the debate today and setting out a comprehensive overview of the situation in south Belfast. It is a very timely discussion, given the Finance Minister's recent announcement of a consultation on a review of the non-domestic rating system.

As we all know, rates are essential. We depend on them to raise a certain amount of revenue for public services each year, but, through talking to business owners in south Belfast, as we all have done, we know that many of them are very unhappy with our current non-domestic rating system. Mr McGimpsey and I are probably the longest-serving MLAs in the constituency, and we have seen a number of shops closed over the years. Ona Jewellers on the Lisburn Road is closing this month; it has been there for 10 years. That follows the closure in the summer of a long-standing jewellers on Shaftsbury Square, which had been there for many years. Like other Members, I am very sympathetic to shopkeepers and small businesses that are struggling to keep their businesses afloat. They work extremely hard and, all too often, find the level of rates to be a big burden.

If we look at the situation across the water, we can understand why some resentment exists here. A constituent who owns a furniture shop in Belfast told me that, during a recent visit to England, she met two shop owners, one who, like her, dealt in furniture and one who dealt in antiques. Both advised her that they pay no rates whatsoever. At present, the UK Government have doubled the relief rate for small businesses to 100% on properties that have a rateable value of £6,000 or less. That has resulted in many small firms in England not having to pay business rates at all.

I was at the #CutTheBizCost event organised by NIIRTA on 17 September. Many there expressed concerns that rates are far too high, and that charity shops, of which there are many on the streets, get rate exemptions. Charities benefit from £87 million in rate relief. DFP has revealed that it is considering whether it would be fair for larger charities to make some contribution to their rates. As Mr McGimpsey mentioned, some shopkeepers have also said that they wonder what they get for their rates contribution.

There is a wider issue of people's perception of how the rates they contribute are used to fund public services. That also needs to be addressed in the review. There needs to be more transparency to make it clear to ratepayers how their money is being spent.

The rateable value of a business property is worked out using its net annual value (NAV). For independent retailers and small business owners, the business rate is a significant issue for their business. Former 'Dragons' Den' investor Theo Paphitis, who opened a shop in Victoria Square, described Northern Ireland as a horrendous place to do business. He blamed high rates and rent. We need to be mindful that high business rates can have a negative impact on investment, career opportunities and innovation.

At the NIIRTA meeting, they launched a 15-point plan as a solution. Among the points made, they outlined the need to extend the small business rate relief scheme, which is currently set at £15,000 NAV to £18,000 NAV. They advocate reforming rates to give greater flexibility with economic circles and carrying out rate revaluations every three years. NIIRTA also suggests introducing a rural retail rate relief scheme and providing exemptions for small traders investing in expansion, allowing them to offset capital investment against their rates bill.

The Federation of Small Businesses in Northern Ireland believes that there needs to be a wholesale rethink, not only about who pays what and how much is paid but about non-domestic rates as a concept. I understand that, in simple terms, any changes that are made to reduce what some pay will result in others paying more. There is no reform that will please everyone.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to bring her remarks to a close.

Ms Lo: However, we need to make sure that the rates system is as good as it can be.

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I am pleased to be able to come and answer some of the points made this afternoon and set out the facts in relation to the recent revaluation that took place and how it has impacted generally in south Belfast, but particularly in some of the areas mentioned today.

As Members have said, only last week, I launched a 12-week consultation exercise on a zero-based business rates review to try to look at business rates in a new and innovative way. It actually came about as a result of an innovation lab that we held in the Department, working with a lot of stakeholders and across government to engage in new thinking about what we needed to do in the business rates system. I am now looking forward to hearing from the wider public and, indeed, from many stakeholders, to try to give me their wisdom in relation to the direction they want to see business rates going in Northern Ireland. The review also seeks views on alternative forms of taxation, either as complete replacements or as supplements to the existing rates system.

It is not that we raise more money from businesses. I want to put that on the record this evening. Indeed, the recent revaluation has been revenue-neutral. I know that a lot of people do not accept that, but it is the reality. It is revenue-neutral. I want to look at ways to keep rates as low and as acceptable as we can, bearing in mind what some colleagues have said about the fact that nobody wants to pay rates. I accept that and you accept that, but we have to find a way to have a fair system for south Belfast and across Northern Ireland, because every penny raised through the regional rate in Northern Ireland helps to fund Northern Ireland Departments, which, as we all know, are under extreme pressure in relation to the block grant and the fact that it looks as if, moving forward into the next spending review, we are going to have flat cash in what we are granted by the Treasury. Therefore, we need to make sure that the revenue raising that we do in Northern Ireland is effective. The review is something that the business community and other ratepayers have been asking for for some time, and I hope that it will be a good engagement with all stakeholders.

5.45 pm

The recent rates revaluation has, if you look at the facts, been relatively good for small businesses in south Belfast. I will come back to that at the end of my comments, but the figures show that that is the case. Now that the revaluation is out of the way, we can look at reforming the system. Today has been a good scene-setter, but I need opinions, I need evidence — not anecdotal but factual — and I need realistic ideas from organisations and individuals on changing the system for the better so that we can present options to the Executive and the Assembly.

I recognise that I probably do not have enough time in this mandate to do anything too radical, but I am determined to get the process up and running so that, when the next mandate comes in, the information is there and that the next Assembly and the next Finance Minister, whoever that may be, will be able to take the issue forward. It is important that the process be completed early in the next Assembly term, as there are no easy answers or choices. As Ms Lo said in her closing remarks, giving particular groups of ratepayers a tax break has, as a natural consequence, a direct impact on somebody else. Either someone else ends up paying more or we cut back even further on public services.

The situation for south Belfast ratepayers is certainly not all bad. The revaluation resulted in shops in south Belfast doing well, with a 20% reduction common on many parts of the Lisburn Road and Stranmillis Road. On the other hand, some shops on the Ormeau Road have seen increases of up to 25%, while the figures for retail warehouses in the Boucher area are up by more than 50% in some cases. That reflects changes in shopping patterns. Mr McGimpsey mentioned out-of-town shopping and its impact on areas like the Lisburn Road, but he should understand that, since the revaluation, the rates that those shopping centres pay have been on an upward trajectory. The revaluation means that they are paying a lot more than they were a couple of years ago.

The reason why some of the changes are so big is that our last revaluation was in 2003. The revaluation has been generally welcomed, even by NIIRTA, and it has been accepted that we definitely needed to have it, although I bear in mind that NIIRTA is a representative organisation and therefore reflects the pain that some of its members are feeling. I totally understand that, but some of its figures are a little out of kilter with what is actually the case.

That means that locations and sectors of the retail market that have fared well pay correspondingly more in rates and that those that have fared less well pay less. That is exactly what a rates revaluation is supposed to do. It is also worth noting that only 35 ratepayers in south Belfast have challenged their new assessment, which I am a wee bit surprised at. I am not sure where Ms Hanna was coming from when she talks about the opaque nature of the LPS. If she has a particular issue that she wants to raise with me in relation to that after today, I am happy to speak to her about it.

Ms Hanna: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am happy to take an intervention.

Ms Hanna: I have dealt with a number of cases, including one that nearly closed a small business due to a £20,000 overvaluation. I went through the LPS appeal system and your predecessor, and, in the end, it was the ombudsman who reversed the decision and stopped that small business closing. It is not an open-book system: people do not feel that they can accurately calculate what their rates bill will be. From the perspective of a city councillor, from year to year we were unclear of what we were and were not going to get in from LPS and we were presented with substantial overspends and underspends from what we were anticipating from LPS.

Perhaps if you are an accountant or someone trained in those issues, you will not, but most small businesses find its processes opaque.

Mrs Foster: I do not accept that they are opaque, because they are evidence-based. The revaluation was evidence-based, and LPS did not just pick a figure and decide that that figure applied to an area. If there is more that we can do to make the system transparent, I will certainly want to do that in the reforms that we are looking at. As far as I am concerned, the system is there if you want to challenge. It does not cost you anything to challenge — in other words, to appeal — and, as I said, I am somewhat surprised that only 35 ratepayers have taken up that option to date.

I want to touch on rates support for a little while. It is worth mentioning that we have the small business rate relief scheme, and that has been spoken about. That has had a big impact in areas such as south Belfast. Some £4 million was allocated in small business rate relief in Belfast as a whole this year. Some £1.3 million of that funding will go to 1,600 businesses in the South Belfast electoral area, which is in addition to around £850,000 that is being paid out to the 66 manufacturing firms in south Belfast. As you know, we have industrial derating here that is specific to Northern Ireland. In that respect, Mr Ó Muilleoir mentioned Ballymena, and I join him in marking just what a sad day this is for Ballymena. During my time as Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister, I made many visits to Ballymena and to JTI and Michelin, and the work that went on there was tremendous. We have to recognise the causes of what is happening up in Ballymena, and, no doubt, there will be a lot of looking over that over the next few days and at whether it was the result of overproduction, product coming in from the Far East or, indeed, energy costs. Michelin has been the beneficiary of £700,000 of rate relief through industrial derating. That is something that the Assembly should be very proud of. It is unique to Northern Ireland, and it plays its part in south Belfast.

To go back to talking about south Belfast, for the past two years, Belfast City Council has implemented successive freezes in the district rate. Of course, that is entirely a matter for it, but a rates freeze such as that has an impact, and, given that 33,000 new properties came into the Belfast City Council area as a result of RPA, you could ask whether it could have done more, such as having a rates reduction. The Executive have also set real-term freezes on the regional rate for the past two years, and both poundages were lowered to take account of the effects of non-domestic revaluation.

The Department has looked at ways in which to help. Much has been made of the issue of empty shops, and we are doing all that we can on that. We have the empty shops rate concession, which gives a 50% rates discount to new ventures that set up in long-term empty shops. As you know, empty shops pay only 50% of their rates here, whereas they pay 100% in England and Wales. I want to allow empty shops to avoid full rates if window displays are used by adjoining businesses to display their goods, and I hope to take that to the Finance and Personnel Committee in the very near future.

I want to close by referring to some comments that were made by Paul McConaghie of the Lisburn Road Business Association in the 'Belfast Telegraph' this year. The article pointed out that we had a "helpful correction", as he called it, of revaluation. He commented that, alongside the revaluation, the road has seen an upturn in trading over the past year, that there are fewer empty units and that there is a bit more buoyancy among some traders in the area, who have witnessed an increase in footfall.

The outlook is better than it was, and I have had the opportunity to visit the Lisburn Road on a number of occasions with Mr Jimmy Spratt and to talk to the traders there. In that regard, I concur with Mrs Pengelly, who referred to Mr Spratt. We will miss him in the House. I will certainly miss him as a colleague. He brought a lot to the House, particularly concerning the Lisburn Road. I met him and the traders there on a number of occasions when they had issues, so I concur with all that Mrs Pengelly had to say, and I very much welcome her to the House as a representative for South Belfast.

The outlook is better than it was. I am not saying that we should be complacent about recovery anywhere in Northern Ireland. Clearly, it is fragile; it is vulnerable. Nor should we be complacent about the rating system. As politicians, we need to watch what is happening in the real world when we set our local taxes and decide on our policies, so that we do not kill the golden goose and hurt our businesses. It is a delicate balancing act that we are all involved in. The contributions from the Floor have been useful in starting, I think, the wider debate that we need to have during this review.

Assembly Business

Public Petition: Autism Services

Mr Speaker: Mr Fearghal McKinney has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes in which to speak.

Mr McKinney: It gives me great pleasure to bring today's petition on autism services to the Assembly. Autism services for children have been a major area of concern for me, my party and the constituents I represent. Indeed, the prevalence of autism, including Asperger's syndrome, in school-age children in Northern Ireland in 2015, tells us that the rate of autism has increased by 67%, with one in 54 pupils attending school being diagnosed with autistic spectrum disorder (ASD). The prevalence of autism increased by nearly 1% between 2009-2010 to 2014-15 — from 1.3% to 2.2%. In 2009-2010, there were nearly 3,700 children with ASD out of a school-age population of 270,000. In 2014-15, that figure rose to just over 6,000 out of a school population that had not increased very much. It is, therefore, very clear that autism prevalence is increasing in society, but, unfortunately, it is not being accompanied by the necessary funding increase to bolster services to be better able to deal with waiting times for diagnosis. There is no doubt that, without earlier and speedier diagnosis, children with ASD and special educational needs will not get the support they require in school or through the health service.

The current target for assessment is 13 weeks. At the end of April, nearly 1,500 children were waiting for assessment; more than 900 had been waiting longer than the recommended time. Of those, 476 had been waiting for more than 26 weeks, and more than 78 children had been waiting for over a year. Those are children who will have been found to have ASD and who will not have got the support that they required, inside and outside school.

The delays in the statementing process are wreaking havoc among families.

Many of these families are being forced to send their children to mainstream schools that do not have specialised staff or facilities to cater for their educational and developmental needs. That is why, when this petition was launched, so many people signed it.

In that context, I would like to praise all those from the Belvoir Autism Group who are present here today in the public gallery for the amazing work that they do in helping parents and children to get the best possible support and care that they need. If I could single out one individual, it would be Alison Breaden, who runs the group along with her colleagues. She is one of our community champions and deserves recognition for all the hard work that she and others do daily. Her compassion, desire and commitment to help families who are struggling to cope deserve the highest level of recognition. Her work in compiling today's petition is testimony to that.

The petition calls on the Northern Ireland Assembly to start delivering for some of the most vulnerable children. I hope that the Minister takes heed of the petition and that it goes some way to alleviating the struggles of families not only in South Belfast but all across Northern Ireland.

Mr McKinney moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: Thank you very much. I will forward the petition to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and send a copy to the Committee.

Committee Membership

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion regarding Committee membership. As with other similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion and there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Gary Middleton replace Mrs Emma Pengelly as a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel; that Mr Gary Middleton replace Mr George Robinson as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety; and that Mr George Robinson replace Mr Gary Middleton as a member of the Committee for the Environment. — [Mr Weir.]

Ministerial Statement

Maghaberry Prison: CJINI Inspection Report

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement to update the House on Maghaberry prison.

Last Thursday, Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland (CJINI) published its report following an unannounced inspection at Maghaberry prison in May. I would like to thank the Chief Inspector, Brendan McGuigan, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, Nick Hardwick, and their teams for their work and the comprehensive report that they have published.

The inspection that was carried out in May provided a deeply worrying analysis of how the prison was performing at that time. The inspectors found significant concerns around staffing, resourcing, outcomes for prisoners and the provision of healthcare. The standard four areas that are considered and assessed in the healthy prison test are safety, respect, purposeful activity and resettlement. Against the first three of these, inspectors scored Maghaberry 1 out of a possible 4, described as delivering "poor outcomes for prisoners". Against the fourth, the inspectors scored Maghaberry 3, described as delivering "reasonably good outcomes for prisoners".

I want to set out for Members the context in which the inspection took place, the key conclusions and recommendations that were made by the inspectors and the steps that have been taken and are being taken to ensure that, when the inspectors return in the new year, they will see significant improvement.

Early in my tenure as Justice Minister, I made clear my determination to reform our prison system to ensure that it plays its part in making our society safer. For too long, its focus had been solely on keeping people locked up. It was time to broaden that focus, to ensure that society is kept safe by detaining those whom the courts send to prison and by doing all that we can to ensure that, on release, prisoners play a positive role in their families and communities.

I am proud that, in the years since, we have made great strides towards that objective. Based on the advice of Criminal Justice Inspection and the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority (RQIA), 33 of the strategic recommendations for change that were set out in the fundamental review of the prison system led by Dame Anne Owers have been implemented or signed off. These were reforms that many believed were not achievable.

Last week's report confirms what we knew when we set out on the path of reform: that it would not be easy or straightforward; that not everyone, nor every part of the service, would move forward at the same pace; and that, as well as successes, there would be real setbacks and disappointments along the way. What Criminal Justice Inspection and Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons found when they visited Maghaberry in May is the biggest of those setbacks that we have encountered. CJINI's previous inspection of Maghaberry in March 2012 found signs of improvement in several aspects of the running of the prison, including the introduction of free-flow movement; an improvement in the quality of teaching, training and learning; and the provision of offending behaviour programmes. Encouraged by that report, but not complacent, the local leadership in Maghaberry continued to pursue improvements. The leadership team should be commended for the progress made during that period, in line with progress that was also beginning to be made at Magilligan and Hydebank Wood.

In 2014, however, due to planned departures from the Prison Service, a new leadership team was appointed in Maghaberry. A key aspect of the reform programme has been to develop new leadership from within the Prison Service. That has involved giving senior staff in the service opportunities to demonstrate their ability to deliver change in line with the service's new focus. In many cases, senior staff have risen to that challenge and have shown real ability. Unfortunately, in the case of the team appointed at Maghaberry in June 2014 that was not the case. Increasingly concerned about the weakness of that leadership, in the spring of this year, Prison Service management took steps to challenge their performance.

Last week's report references the difficult relationship that evolved between the local leadership at Maghaberry and Prison Service headquarters at that time. Frequently, when independent inspection reports identify failings, public bodies encounter criticism for inaction. In this case, immediately upon receiving the initial feedback from the unannounced inspection of Maghaberry, Prison Service management, with support from me and the DOJ permanent secretary, took steps to remove the governor and deputy governor from their posts and to replace them with a new senior team.

While I do not believe that it is appropriate to go further into what are ongoing personnel management matters, I will say that neither of the two personnel removed from their positions in Maghaberry was redeployed in the Prison Service. These actions are a reflection of the seriousness with which the Prison Service and I took the findings of the inspection and of the determination of the director general and her team to keep our reform programme on track.

The Prison Service has accepted all nine recommendations made by the inspectors and has put in place an action plan to achieve them. I am encouraged that the chief inspector of Criminal Justice Inspection has indicated that he believes that the action plan, if delivered, has the potential to address his concerns.

Of all the recommendations, I believe that the most fundamental is that urgent and decisive action be taken to strengthen Maghaberry's leadership. The appointment of Phil Wragg as the new governor has been key to this. Phil is an experienced governor, with over 25 years' service in some of the most challenging prisons in England, including Belmarsh. The challenges facing Maghaberry are serious and the level of improvement that we want to see will take time to deliver, but I have seen first-hand how the new governor's decisive and dynamic leadership has already brought significant improvements in the areas of greatest concern to the inspectors.

One of the key challenges highlighted in the report was staffing at the prison. As Members know, our Prison Service has undergone significant changes in its workforce in recent years, with a large-scale early retirement scheme in addition to the changes that happen in any large group of employees over time. While reform programmes of this scale are usually supported by additional funding, the budget available to run our prisons has been significantly reduced. These factors, combined with the need to retrain existing staff for the new roles that we now expect them to play, have all combined to put staff under additional stress. While it is important to acknowledge that over three quarters of staff at Maghaberry did not take time off for sickness, the inspectors found an unsustainable level of staff absence that was having a detrimental effect across all areas of the prison. This is being addressed as a priority by the governor and his team. Since the arrival of the new governor, the level of daily sickness absence has dropped by over a third and continues to fall month by month. That is testament to his leadership and indicative of how things that could have been addressed by the previous team were not given appropriate attention.

While this is still work in progress, it is a critical part of getting the performance of the prison back to where it needs to be. Other steps to strengthen and support the staff at Maghaberry have included permanent and temporary transfers of staff from other prisons. An external recruitment programme recently commenced to target key replacements for custody officers, night custody officers and prison custody officers. That is an important step to ensure that the workforce can be reinforced and refreshed.

The report also identified low morale among staff, and the refreshed senior team is now more visible and accessible.

This is helping to build resilience and morale among the staff. Work is also being taken forward to improve the overall condition of the prison environment through cleaning and painting programmes in accommodation and communal areas. A cafe and restroom has recently been opened for staff and visitors, which not only provides staff with time and space to rest during their breaks but enables prisoners to work and achieve qualifications in preparation for release and potential future employment.

12.15 pm

Regarding outcomes for prisoners, I am encouraged that the report reaffirms the four overarching strategic themes identified by the Prison Service as those on which it will focus as it continues along the path of reform. These are leadership, about which I have spoken already; purposeful activity; partnership with healthcare; and a fit-for-purpose prison estate. In relation to purposeful activity, the inspectors found that the regime was curtailed and that prisoners were often locked for long periods of time. Actions being taken by the new senior team are focused on delivering a safe, decent and secure environment for everyone at the prison. Key to that is having a regime that meets prisoners' needs and matches the resources available to the prison. With the full complement of staff available, the prison will be able to operate with a full regime and a core day. That is what the management team is working towards. Purposeful activity is key to ensuring prisons can be a place of positive, constructive change for people in custody.

The inspectors recommended that the prison should complete a robust needs analysis to ensure that the resettlement services provided meet the needs of the prison population. I can confirm that, under plans that were already being developed, within days of their arrival at Maghaberry, prisoners are now assessed on their risks, needs and strengths, and a personal development plan is devised for the duration of their sentence.

The inspectors recommended that the leadership and management of learning and skills should be strengthened. The partnership that was announced after the inspection between the Prison Service and Belfast Met and North West Regional College was a significant step for all three prisons. The outsourcing of learning and skills means that a wider curriculum will be offered, including areas such as essential skills in literacy, numeracy and ICT as well as vocational courses.

Turning to healthcare, the report recorded a range of concerns. The provision of healthcare in prisons is a complex issue. While this is the responsibility of the South Eastern Trust, the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS) is committed to continuing to work with the trust and DHSSPS to develop the joint justice and healthcare strategy, which is key to delivering an effective service at Maghaberry and the other prisons. In specific relation to Maghaberry, NIPS and the trust will produce and implement the action plan recommended by the inspectors within the month specified by them, and I intend to meet the Minister of Health to discuss its implementation when they do so.

The final overarching theme on which the report makes recommendation is the development of the prison estate. Following years of underinvestment, NIPS continues to progress plans for all three prisons, including the redevelopment of Magilligan and the construction of a new custodial facility for women. In particular, the changes and investment at Maghaberry will allow NIPS to build a focused regime that will be resourced in a more effective and efficient way. The first phase of this is the new 360-cell accommodation that is expected to be completed during 2018-19. This will give the prison greater flexibility across the regime. Plans are also in place to build a high-security facility and a new visits area at the prison. This will enable the redevelopment of the site into three mini prisons, with dedicated units for short-sentenced and remand prisoners; long and life-sentenced prisoners; and category-A and separated prisoners. The plans are clearly dependent upon finance. However, it is critical that this is delivered to ensure an effective, modern and fit-for-purpose estate.

The inspectors also found that Catholic prisoners experienced poorer outcomes and acknowledged that the reasons for this were likely to be complex. They recommended that the prison needed to understand the underlying reasons for this. Senior management at Maghaberry has now written to the Equality Commission seeking advice and guidance on how this can be achieved.

I know that, in some of the commentary around last week's report, I was accused of trying to spin or downplay the seriousness of its findings. I have no intention to do any such thing, and I hope that this statement will give Members a sense of the seriousness with which it is being treated by me, by NIPS senior management and by the new leadership team at Maghaberry. What I will do, however, in closing, is say that I believe it would be wrong to ignore or lose sight of the scale of what has been achieved and what continues to be delivered, not just at Maghaberry but across the entire prison system through the wider reform programme.

It would also be wrong to conclude that the problems identified at Maghaberry earlier this year are because of, rather than in contrast to, the progress being made against the recommendations made by Dame Anne Owers and her team. That progress has been about embedding long-term change in the prison system. I am confident that the Prison Service, under the leadership of its director general, Sue McAllister, will continue to progress along the difficult path of reform. Indeed, I am convinced that had we not embarked on that journey, and had we not benefited from the leadership that Sue McAllister and her senior team have shown, we would have seen a greater number of reports like last week's.

NIPS has taken swift and decisive action to ensure that Maghaberry has the right leadership and resources in place to deliver an effective regime. That work is well under way, but it will take time to deliver. I welcome the announcement by the inspectors that they will return to the prison in January, and I am confident that when they do, they will see real progress and a prison well on the road to recovery.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. Before I call the first questioner, I inform the House that a large number of Members have put their name down to ask a question, and I am sure that Members agree with me that as many as possible should be facilitated. For that reason, I ask Members to ensure that their question is brief and relates to the ministerial statement. While I will, as is the custom, give some latitude to the Committee Chairperson, that does not extend to an alternative statement or multiple questions that are beyond the scope of this occasion.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): Thank you, Mr Speaker, for your confirmation of the latitude given to the Chair. I will do my utmost to make the most of that latitude.

The CJINI report is a damning verdict on the state of Maghaberry Prison, highlighting failures of leadership and a regime in which prisoners are not engaging in purposeful activity. Most worrying of all, it cites a failure to keep prison officers and prisoners safe within the prison walls. It is alarming on an unprecedented scale when we hear inspectors describing the prison as being in "crisis", as "unsafe" and "unstable", and as the "most dangerous prison" in Europe. Despite the Minister's best efforts, there is no gloss or positive spin that can be put on this report.

Let me specifically deal with a few issues raised in the report. First of all, over the last few years, colleagues and I have repeatedly raised our concerns about prison officers' safety in Maghaberry. As well as describing the prison as "unsafe" and "unstable", the report details sustained, serious and credible threats against staff, a significant rise in assaults on staff since the last report and describes circumstances in which staff did not receive sufficient support to carry out their duties. Did the Minister take the concerns of the House seriously enough? What did he do when those concerns were raised? Why has there not been an improvement over the last number of years?

Secondly, on the issue of drugs, the Minister said, on 28 June 2012, that he was assured by the Prison Service that robust measures were in place to tackle the problem of illegal substances. He again said that on 26 September 2014, when he issued a statement titled 'Ford highlights progress on drugs at Maghaberry'. Given that the report talks about the prevalence of illegal drugs — it states that they are more widely available than had been the case at the last report and, indeed, that prisoners have said that it is easy to get hold of illegal drugs — will he acknowledge that his previous statements were wrong?

In relation to segregated prisoners, the report advocates radical thinking because that part of the prison is sucking resources away from other elements. Will the Minister inform the House what his radical thinking is on that?

Finally, the report talks about significant failures in leadership, ineffective relationships between senior management and staff and a worsening in conditions since they last reported on Maghaberry in 2012. The report makes it abundantly clear that, during the three years that the current director general has been in post, Maghaberry has got significantly worse, rather than better. Given that that is the case, how can the Minister assure the public that they can have confidence in the leadership at the top of the Prison Service and, indeed, at the top of the Department of Justice?

Mr Ford: I will endeavour to refer to those points. In the Chair's enthusiasm to ensure that he gets in as many questions as possible, he does tend to speak slightly fast, so I apologise if I do not cover all the points that he made.

He started off by highlighting the suggestion that Maghaberry is the — I think that he said this — “most dangerous prison in Europe”. I am indebted to Newton Emerson for reminding me in his column in 'The Irish News' on Saturday of an article that I saw in the national media two or three months ago, pointing out a significant increase in deaths in custody in England and Wales, which were already at a higher level than in Northern Ireland. Whilst we should be cautious about applying too much of the statistics of small numbers, to suggest that that implies that Maghaberry is the most dangerous prison in Europe is perhaps a bit of hyperbole and hype in some of the reporting, rather than the content of the report itself.

Clearly, there are issues that relate to the safety of prison officers which cause us all concern. Again, unlike the situation in other parts of these islands, that threat to the safety of prison officers also comes outside the prisons, regardless of anything that may happen inside the prisons. That is a point that I was only too well reminded of on Friday when I attended the annual memorial service for the Prison Service, which remembered 31 colleagues who have lost their lives in the recent past. We need to acknowledge that the issue of safety is significantly different here from other regions and is an issue outside. In terms of the things like number of assaults, I noticed in the statistics that I was given most recently that those are down in recent months, and the number of occasions on which force has to be used is down in recent months, so there are clearly positive changes happening there.

Mr Ross also referred to the concern about drugs, and there is no doubt that there is a problem with illicit drugs in this society, and, as he did not highlight, there is also a problem of prescribed drugs being misused in prisons. Again, that is something on which there has been action taken. In recent months, we have seen a significant decrease in the numbers of those who either have positive drug tests or refuse to take drug tests. Whilst it is clearly an issue that needs to be addressed, the clear implication is that the current leadership team in Maghaberry is addressing that.

The Member also refers to the effect of having two groups of segregated prisoners on the regime for the great majority of prisoners in Maghaberry, and I share that concern. It is not my decision that segregation exists, and it is not my decision that individuals are admitted to segregation. Those were decisions that were taken respectively by the Northern Ireland Office in the past and on behalf of the Secretary of State at the present time. Members may recall that, in the report by Dame Anne Owers and her colleagues, there was a recommendation, which I referred to in my statement, for three mini prisons in which there would be one high-security area that would include separated prisoners. That would give a way of ensuring that the maintenance of the necessity of a higher standard there did not impact on the regime for others, but, as was made perfectly clear, that is dependent on capital funding, which we have not yet seen.

The final comment that the Committee Chair made about the failure of the leadership of the director general was an unfair comment that I reject entirely. What we saw was a snapshot that showed how things were earlier this year, and a report that commented on failings of local leadership in Maghaberry and the breakdown of relationships at a point when they were being challenged from prison headquarters. It is not an issue of three years of decline since the previous report. We have highlighted the fact that progress was being made previously in Maghaberry. It was a snapshot showing a very difficult situation earlier this year, which is being addressed robustly by the director general and her senior team with full support from the Department.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I want to come back to the last point that you mentioned, Minister, which was the failure of leadership. Do you have a clear definition from the Criminal Justice Inspection of what it means by failure of leadership and ineffective relations in Maghaberry and the Maghaberry administration? In my opinion, over a long time, there has been a resistance to prison reform within the prison.

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Lynch for his question about that. I am not sure that it is for me to define what was referred to in the report as failure of leadership, but there are a number of instances cited in it: issues like the failure to have robust management of sickness absence, which is a clear issue. That is one of the points that was made most clearly as impacting on the entire way that the prison runs because of the lack of staff, therefore creating an unpredictability of things like lockdowns and general regime. I notice, for example, that, in May, just after the report was done, the average number of staff sick every day in Maghaberry was 101.

Today, 48 staff are absent. That, to me, is a demonstration of leadership at the present time. I think that you can take it that a failure of leadership is what was happening at the previous stage, and that was a key challenge that is being addressed by Phil Wragg and his senior team, from which we are already seeing very positive benefits for staff and prisoners.

12.30 pm

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his statement. I fully support the reform programme that he has quite properly directed, but the report is also a serious disappointment to me, because it is damning, as the Chair rightly said. I am sure that the Minister will agree. Central to that is the failure of industrial relations in the prison.

Does the Minister agree that the central issue of industrial relations in the prison is affecting all aspects of the reform programme? When will the industrial relations issue be settled?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Maginness for his support for the reform programme. He is absolutely correct that the reform programme is vital to having things move forward, and it is extremely disappointing to see the quality of the report.

Clearly, there has been an industrial relations problem. It is not entirely unique to Maghaberry, as we can see if we look at prisons across different parts of these islands, and there is no doubt that confronting the changes that were required to be made has created difficulties for management and not contributed terribly well to industrial relations. I do think that we have seen some good progress made. I notice, for example, that, in some of his comments, the chair of the Prison Officers' Association referred more to issues such as capital funding to ensure that we have proper arrangements than to anything else. There is no doubt that many of the prison officers who continue to work in the Prison Service and who experienced very difficult times in the 1970s and 1980s will view the proposed changes with a certain amount of misapprehension. What is important is to see the good work that is now being done, under a leadership team that is making itself more visible on the landings and engaging better with staff on a day-to-day basis. That will helpfully change the situation, but there are wider issues that affect the higher-level industrial relations as well as relationships as they happen hour by hour in the prison, and, indeed, in each part of the prison. That is part of the challenge that the management team is taking on, and we will look to see how it succeeds over the next couple of months.

Mr Swann: Minister, in your statement, you refer to an external recruitment programme. Do you believe that the salaries and the terms and conditions for new, incoming prison officers are adequate to retain and recruit prison officers to the standard that is needed in the current prison system?

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

Mr Ford: Mr Swann makes a reasonable point. Changes have recently been made to the terms and conditions of newly appointed officers, and my understanding, at this stage, is that, with the current scheme looking to appoint up to 100 prison officers, we have already received in excess of 1,000 applications, with time still to run. That suggests that the terms and conditions that are being offered, and the modest improvement to them recently, makes them acceptable to those who would consider a career in the Prison Service.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for your statement. Mr Somerville from the Ulster Unionist Party and I recently visited the prison. We were the only two members of the Justice Committee who took up the invitation, and we met Mr Wragg, the new governor at the prison. I beg your pardon: Mr Sammy Douglas was there too. My apologies. We met Mr Wragg and noted the extensive changes that he had made in the prison, which, in my view, were starting to gain respect from staff and prisoners alike.

You referenced the reduction in sickness absence levels, and the drive to continue to do that is important, but can you point out other areas of significant change that will provide reassurance to the public?

Mr Ford: I am glad that I am not going to annoy Mr Douglas by suggesting that he was not there. By what I heard from the Prison Service side, I believe that the visit by the three members was very positive. It was unfortunate that only three members of the Committee were available that day.

That question has highlighted the positive change that has come about since Phil Wragg's appointment. He is clearly grasping the nettle of some of the difficult issues that need to be done, supported by a refreshed senior management team in the prison that is being seen as more active.

I am not sure that I can provide reassurance today, but I know that there is significant attention being directed at a range of issues. The Justice Committee has seen the action plan that has been prepared. It is on the Web, but I will see that a copy is placed in the Assembly Library as well. The key issue is looking at a range of issues and showing that robust action is being taken, whether it is how we deal with management of separation or the wider issue of developing a strategy with the South Eastern Trust looking at healthcare provision and self-harm. Those are key issues that affect the welfare of prisoners and, ultimately, the good of society.

There are actions under way and actions in place that, I believe, we will see the results of when the inspectors return in January. We will see a positive response from that.

Mr Douglas: The Minister mentioned the Dame Anne Owers report. However, Nick Hardwick, the Chief Inspector of Prisons in England and Wales, highlighted in the CJINI report that only 16 of the 93 recommendations in the 2012 report had been achieved in full. How can the Minister claim that progress has been made over the past three years when it is clear that things have got markedly worse?

Mr Ford: Mr Douglas highlights the difference between the wider strategic view following up on the report by the prison review team led by Dame Anne Owers and the immediate snapshot of the inspection of an individual institution. It is also the case that we have had reports in the past that have had a significantly large number of, in effect, fairly small recommendations, whereas the premise under which the PRT operated was of a strategic view with 40 strategic recommendations covering a range of areas. It was felt appropriate to concentrate on those, whilst not ignoring the individual recommendations. The Prison Service staff will be looking at the individual recommendations. The recommendations on this occasion are more of a high-level strategic objective than reporting on relatively small items and simply listing them. The key issue of dealing with things like sickness absence matters much more than some of the individual 93 recommendations did three years ago. The important thing is that we do not lose sight of those smaller points being what drives the overall reforms. The team now in place in Maghaberry will be taking account of both levels of recommendation.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. Would the Minister accept that the failure to implement the recommendations of the Owers prisons review team specific to Maghaberry led to this damning report on Maghaberry, and that if this failure continues, we will continue back to the same place at Maghaberry jail?

Mr Ford: I am not sure that it is reasonable to say, as Ms McGahan says, that there was a failure to implement the Owers recommendations in Maghaberry. The Owers recommendations are wide-ranging and far-reaching. What we saw in the inspection report was a failure in Maghaberry at that time — significant failings that led to a critical report.

That is in no sense undermining the concept of the Owers report and its wider, far-reaching recommendations, which, as I said, has seen a significant number of its recommendations signed off and others are work in progress.

We need to ensure that we do not understate the seriousness of the poor inspection report from May this year but nor do we need to suggest that that somehow invalidates the reform programme generally, because the reform programme generally is making progress and seeing positive responses in different areas, including, in some respects, in Maghaberry and very much in the other two prisons as well.

Mr Frew: The Minister will do well, given this damning report, not to gloss over or deflect away from the problems in Maghaberry prison. That is clearly what his statement is designed to do. Minister, you may want to talk about the future — and we would all like to see a better future for our prisons — but I want to talk about the here and now, when prison officers are working with low morale in an unsafe and unstable environment. Minister, how many action plans do we need before those actions become reality and our prison officers, and indeed the prisoners, are working and living in safer conditions?

Mr Ford: If Mr Frew is suggesting that today's statement is glossing over the problems at Maghaberry, I am not quite sure why I am standing here taking time to explain what has happened, acknowledge the issues in the report and point out the changes that have happened since then. That is anything but glossing over: it is recognising the extremely worrying contents of the report, as it related to last May, and explaining the action that is being taken. It is not about glossy action plans but about real work on the ground, on the landings and in other areas of the prison, to ensure that we move forward and have a better report in January.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an ráiteas go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for both his statement and his answers to questions thus far. When any Minister comes to the Assembly and accepts that there is a failure of leadership, ineffective relationships between people in management and a resistance to change, that Minister knows that he has a problem. As we go forward, the Minister has to reassure the House on the question I ask him today: is he now certain that leadership will be allowed to prevail, that ineffective relationships will not be tolerated, and that the Anne Owers prison reforms will be implemented, and implemented in full?

Mr Ford: I thank the Deputy Chair for his question and, indeed, for his support for the reform programme and his positive comments on aspects of it over the last day or two. If he is right that this report highlighted a failure of leadership, which is what it cites, then I am confident that the leadership that is currently in Maghaberry is significantly stronger than the leadership that was there in the month of May. I am confident that the leadership in prison headquarters is aware of the problems and, working with Maghaberry leadership, is taking robust action to deal with them. I am confident that the poor relationships that existed in May no longer exist and that the Department is backing the Prison Service management in carrying out its essential work. If we could get a bit of Executive joined-up leadership around a capital programme, we would be in an even better position.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhúochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his comments up to now. I will focus on one part of the statement:

"The inspectors also found that Catholic prisoners experienced poorer outcomes and acknowledged that the reasons for this were likely to be complex. They recommended that the prison needed to understand the underlying reasons for this. Senior management at Maghaberry has now written to the Equality Commission seeking advice and guidance on how this can be achieved."

While I presume that the Equality Commission can advise on those aspects that refer or relate to them, has any other specialist advice been sought from other sectors, such as education, health or skills, on why this is the case?

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr McGlone's question. It is indeed a significant issue, and one that has not just arisen recently. That is why the advice has been sought from the Equality Commission. As far as I am aware, no other advice has been sought from other agencies at this point. The important issue will be to take the advice of the Equality Commission and see how it applies across all the aspects of the Prison Service, including the work being done around learning and skills and health, to ensure that we get proper outcomes for all prisoners.

A monitoring group is looking at those issues in Maghaberry, alongside the request for assistance from the Equality Commission. The group meets on a monthly basis. We will need to see just how that works to ensure that things like adjudications do not have a detrimental effect on people from one particular background. At this stage, the answers are not clear and that has been acknowledged, by Brendan McGuigan in particular, as an issue which needs further action but on which there are no easy answers.

Mr Poots: I am delighted that the Minister can stay for more than two questions today. In terms of this particular report and statement; the Minister has been in position, in charge of prisons, for over six years now and he has appointed the leadership team. Do you not accept that the leadership team, which has been a revolving door of Englishmen coming over to run the prisons, has been totally detached from the prison itself and that it is wholly disingenuous of you to scapegoat two people who were in position for less than a year for this damning report on Maghaberry prison?

Mr Ford: I have been in position for over five years, not over six. I do not appoint civil servants; there are procedures by which they are appointed which do not involve Ministers. Sue McAllister may be many things, but she is certainly not an Englishman. The leadership team is not detached;

the leadership that I see being given by Phil Wragg and his senior colleagues is absolutely attached to what is going on in the prison. There is no issue of scapegoating. The issue is of reflecting the appropriate need to ensure that leadership is provided to deal with the problems of Maghaberry, which was not being provided. That is why we have seen the improvement that I have already highlighted in a number of areas, such as sickness absence.

Mr Lunn: The strength of inspections lies in the independence of the organisations that carry them out. The Minister's statement referred to the oversight group implementing the prison reform programme as having signed off 33 out of 40 recommendations as implemented. I ask the Minister: what confidence should we have in the independence of the oversight group?

Mr Ford: The answer to my colleague is that we can have considerable confidence in the oversight group, in particular in the presence of three independent members. Patricia Gordon and Monica McWilliams are not known for giving Ministers or their teams an easy ride if they do not believe it is deserved. Brendan McGuigan, head of CJINI is also a member of the oversight group.

I should perhaps explain the procedure of the oversight group. It meets quarterly and receives reports from the Prison Service, or from the South Eastern Trust, as appropriate, relating to the healthcare recommendations of the prison review team (PRT). It determines whether those reports are good enough to be passed on for validation by either CJINI or RQIA, and then their report comes to a future meeting to decide whether something can be signed off. At the most recent meeting of the oversight group that I had, I was certainly impressed by the fact that the two independent members, with no formal role otherwise, were robustly questioning both CJINI and RQIA, particularly RQIA, as to the quality of some of the reporting that was done to ensure that matters were properly in place before they were signed off. It is not a matter of a ministerial-led group signing off; it is a matter that is very much in the hands of the independent members who are there, giving a robust challenge function, recognising progress where it happens, but also clearly stating where they believe that adequate progress has not happened. Members can be assured that that oversight group has worked extremely well and is close to completing its task in a way which provides the guarantee which can be provided for us and for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Givan: It was said that Dickens could have written the inspection report, but I think it is clear that Dickens has taken the pen for the Minister's statement today. This statement is a denial of his failure, and the failure of the director general, to manage Maghaberry prison. He has done it in a textbook example of how to dump on local management, scapegoating them in order to protect him at the top and the director general.

The director general heralded the appointments of the governor and deputy governor, who have since, unprecedentedly, been transferred out of the Prison Service, and I question the legality of that. Yet the Minister says in his statement that he has absolute confidence in the director general as she takes forward the reform programme. How can this be, following the litany of failures in the Prison Service since her appointment and during his time as Justice Minister?

Finally, will the Minister comment on Roe House, which has been a demonstrable drain on resources at Maghaberry? He, as Minister, has continued to appease republican prisoners. Will he stop this appeasement of dissident republicans in Maghaberry?

Mr Ford: I am not sure which of those several questions I am expected to respond to. I made it quite clear in my response to Mr Poots, when he used terms such as "scapegoat", that I was not scapegoating. I will make one very specific point. If Mr Givan is suggesting that transferring senior civil servants from one post to another is somehow illegal, he may wish to take legal advice, which is something that he does not seem to have had.

Moreover, by using the phrase "litany of failures", he fails to recognise the good work that is being done across the Prison Service in response to the PRT report, as part of a huge transformation project. It is clear that he is much more concerned about flying his kite by raising concerns about Maghaberry than recognising the reality of what is happening generally.

Mr Craig: We are right to highlight our concerns about Maghaberry, Minister. The Chief Constable confirmed only last week that there are five live cases of intimidation of prison officers in the prison and that several cases of intimidation of private contractors have reached the PPS. It has been pointed out to you that there has been serious intimidation of the staff and those who work in the prison. As the Minister, what have you done to stop that intimidation, other than appease those carrying it out?

Mr Ford: The suggestion that anybody in the Prison Service or Department of Justice is appeasing such people is utter nonsense and unworthy of a response.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his statement. Of course, he will not have been entirely surprised by this damning report, as I wrote to him on several occasions, asking him to hear the account of an officer who could have written the report single-handedly. Will he now agree to hear at first hand the account of an individual who was bullied, beaten up and left a broken man because he wanted to do his job honestly and fairly and refused to be part of the regime that brought about in a big way this awful report?

Mr Ford: I appreciate the point that Mr Dallat has been making about the concerns of one individual. I need to be careful as to what exactly is the appropriate role of a Minister, as opposed to the formal structures, in HR management. Nonetheless, I take extremely seriously the suggestions that he has made and will ensure that they are followed up at an appropriate level.

Mr Anderson: It is very appropriate that the Minister is in the Chamber to answer questions on this damning inspection report. It might be beyond belief, were it not that the finding that Maghaberry is in a state of crisis comes as no surprise to me, or to other Members of this House, having talked to people on the ground, including former and serving prison officers and their families. It gives me no satisfaction, Minister, to stand before you today and say, "We told you so" over many months. Yet nothing has been done to rectify the situation. I have brought issues to this House relating to staff morale, staff sickness levels and the "small" fire at Maghaberry, as it was described, costing £400,000. All we received were palmed-off responses.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his question.

Mr Anderson: In light of all the recommendations in the report, it is fundamental that urgent and decisive action is taken to strengthen the leadership at Maghaberry. Minister, you are at the top. Action needs to be taken. What confidence can anyone have if we still get palmed-off responses every time we bring the issues to the Chamber?

Mr Ford: I do not bring palmed-off responses. I have already said that an action plan has been prepared. It has been publicised, and there are opportunities for the Justice Committee in particular to follow through on it. Some people want instant, easy answers to the extremely complex problems that have beset the Prison Service for many years, even when we are seeing significant reforms and have seen significant improvements, even in the past few months. It is not a realistic way of looking at things.

Mr Allister: Leaving aside the self-serving efforts made by the Minister to give the report as soft a landing as possible, it includes words such as “unsafe”, “unstable” and “dangerous”. It could not be any more damning. What does it take for a Minister in this House to take responsibility for systematic and catastrophic failure and resign?

Mr Ford: I note that Mr Allister has adopted his customary positive and constructive attitude to these things. The simple question is this: on what basis should a Minister resign when action is being taken to redress failings highlighted in a report by people running a particular service? That action is being taken at the appropriate level, with full support from the Minister.

Lord Morrow: Now that we know, from the report, that it is the most dangerous prison in the United Kingdom, will the Minister tell us what is happening in that prison right now, as we speak, as a result of what we have read in the report? Is it his intention to declare an emergency at Maghaberry?

Mr Ford: Actually, we do not know that it is the most dangerous prison in the United Kingdom. Unfortunately, Lord Morrow was not in the Chamber for the early part of my statement. It is quite clear that, although some of the media coverage has attracted hyperbole, there are prisons elsewhere in the United Kingdom that have suffered greater numbers of, for example, deaths in custody than Maghaberry has.

What we do know is that Maghaberry is the most complex prison in the United Kingdom. We know that, in Northern Ireland, difficult category A prisoners cannot be dispersed but are all concentrated in one prison. We know that other prisons in the United Kingdom do not have to manage two sets of separated prisoners.

We also know that action is being taken in Maghaberry prison by the senior leadership team to address the points made and to carry through the action plan that was published last week to ensure that Maghaberry becomes safer; has more purposeful activity; has proper staffing numbers providing a proper regime for prisoners; and has that kind of regularity available so that staff are less concerned. All of that is work that is currently under way and is being carried out by a leadership team that is out there, walking the landings, engaging with staff and providing the support that they need.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions on the Minister’s statement.

Executive Committee Business

Rural Needs Bill: First Stage

Mrs O’Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): I beg to introduce the Rural Needs Bill [NIA 67/11-16], which is a Bill to impose a duty on public authorities to consider rural needs; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Housing (Amendment) Bill: Second Stage

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Housing (Amendment) Bill [NIA 58/11-16] be agreed.

In December 2013, my predecessor, Nelson McCausland, published proposals for new housing legislation to make new provision for dealing with antisocial behaviour.

1.00 pm

In recognition of the limited time available to pass the legislation within the current mandate, I have decided not to proceed with the proposals relating to short tenancies, eligibility for homelessness assistance and injunctions against antisocial behaviour. I took that decision so that a more concise Bill could be drafted and achieve Assembly passage within the remaining time available to the Assembly.

The Bill is a short but potentially very effective and enabling piece of legislation. The provisions in the Bill are necessary to support the strategies and initiatives for dealing with empty homes, antisocial behaviour and disrepair in the private housing sector.

The first clause in the Bill makes provision for information sharing relating to empty homes. I am determined to maximise all opportunities to meet housing need, reduce blight and tackle antisocial behaviour, and I see the rejuvenation of empty homes as an important means of achieving that. To enable the Housing Executive to identify owners of empty homes with a view to bringing those properties back into use, the Bill will provide for relevant information held by the Department of Finance and Personnel's Land and Property Services (LPS) for the purpose of rates collection to be shared with my Department and the Housing Executive. That proposal was included in my Department's housing strategy, which was subject to public consultation in 2012. At the request of a former Minister of Finance and Personnel, the Bill will also require my Department and the Housing Executive to provide Land and Property Services with relevant information, for example, where any properties listed as vacant appear to be occupied or have different owner details.

The second clause in the Bill makes provision for disclosure of information relating to antisocial behaviour. In December 2013, my predecessor published proposals for new housing legislation designed to tackle antisocial behaviour in the social rented sector. The Department received more than 30 responses. While I have decided not to proceed with the two specific proposals outlined in the consultation document, a number of organisations that responded to the consultation highlighted the importance of information sharing in tackling antisocial behaviour.

The Bill would therefore ensure that, where the Housing Executive or a registered housing association needs information in order to take action against an individual who has been involved in antisocial behaviour, any person who holds such information would be able to disclose it without breaching data protection legislation.

The Social Development Committee has highlighted the fact that the Bill does not make provision for information sharing with private landlords. While I recognise that private landlords have a legitimate interest in any information that reflects on the good character of individuals who are seeking accommodation in the private rented sector, it appears that the human rights and data protection considerations would effectively preclude extending the disclosure provisions to private landlords within the Bill.

The third clause in the Bill makes provision for registration as statutory charge of certain loans. The Department and the Housing Executive are currently exploring the use of loan assistance for private-sector housing repairs and improvements. While the Housing Executive has power to register statutory charge in respect of most forms of grant assistance, there is no power to register charges in respect of grant by way of loans.

The absence of a power to register charges in respect of such loans means that the Housing Executive would either have to make unsecured lending or secure the lending by means of legal mortgage charge. The cost of the latter is substantially more than the costs associated with preparing and registering a statutory charge. The Bill would therefore make provision for the registration of a statutory charge in respect of grants by way of loan made under article 9(1)(a) of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1981. That would provide a means of security against any such lending and would ensure that, in the event that the owner defaulted on the loan or sold or transferred the property, the Housing Executive would be made aware of the transaction and be able to take any necessary action to recover the debt.

In conclusion, I have outlined the three provisions of the Bill. I believe that there is a need for the proposals and am confident that they will be well received by the relevant stakeholders in the public and voluntary sectors. On that basis, I hope that all parties can give their full support to the Bill. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for bringing the Housing (Amendment) Bill to Second Stage.

The Committee took what I can only describe as a very pragmatic view of what it could do with the Bill to ensure that progress could be made during the period between introduction and Second Stage, given the delay in tabling Second Stage. During the period of uncertainty, therefore, the Committee was prudent and prioritised the Department's legislative programme in its work programme. With the assistance of the Department, which we were grateful for, and, in particular, our stakeholders, we embarked on a call for evidence, even though, as I indicated, the Bill had not been formally transferred to the Committee for consideration. Nevertheless, being prudent and pragmatic, we issued a call for evidence. That was to ensure that, when normal service resumed, there would be sufficient time for the Bill to proceed through the entire legislative process. I thank Committee members for agreeing to that approach. I also thank stakeholders for responding to our call for evidence, despite the uncertainty about whether we would have a Committee Stage.

As a result of that approach, we were able to conclude our stakeholder evidence sessions on 15 October. Since then, we have been briefed by the Department on stakeholder and Committee concerns, and the Committee will, of course, continue with its discussions on the Bill at its meeting this Thursday. The Committee aims to conclude those discussions and report to the Assembly before the Christmas recess.

Given what I have said, I am sure that today's debate on the principles of the Bill, while required by procedure, may seem to Committee members as having been overtaken by their discussions. It is important, however, for Members to focus on the principles of the Bill today, therefore I do not intend to go into detail on the issues that were raised by stakeholders and Committee members, even if you were minded to allow that, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle.

For the record, the Committee received a pre-introductory briefing from the Department on 25 June 2015. Officials provided an overview of the Bill, and members were able to raise initial queries and provide comments on various aspects. The Committee noted that the Bill seeks to address three areas: the sharing of information on empty properties; the disclosure of information on antisocial behaviour; and the registration as a statutory charge of certain loans. I note that it is a significantly different Bill than that contained in the original proposals that were presented to the Committee in February and June 2014, and I highlight the fact that the Committee was advised that that was due to drafting complexities and associated time constraints.

The Committee noted the benefits of information sharing, particularly in the case of the sharing of information with DFP about empty properties. We are all only too aware of the housing crisis that we face, and the provision could assist DSD in bringing vacant dwellings back into use. Although that is not the essential purpose of the Bill, it would nevertheless be a very helpful by-product.

The Committee also noted the benefits of disclosing information on antisocial behaviour. That should help social landlords to deal better with antisocial behaviour. It is not simply envisaged as a means of excluding what might be described as problem tenants but could also help social landlords to provide support to tenants to help them to change their unacceptable behaviour or, indeed, to help them if they needed particular support.

The Committee noted that sharing of information relates only to social landlords. That caused concern among some members who saw it as an opportunity missed, perhaps, by the Department. Members expressed concern, for example, that tenants removed from social housing for reasons of antisocial behaviour could simply move to the private sector, and a new landlord would not have been made aware of their history of antisocial behaviour. However, members have since been briefed on the difficulties of including private landlords in the provision, including the demands that are placed on those landlords by the Data Protection Act. I will not go into detail on that matter, but the issue will be considered further by the Committee, and the House will be informed of its position in due course.

A second concern was raised in Committee about disclosing information on antisocial behaviour in that there is no compulsion on social landlords to disclose such information.

The Committee notes that the Bill provides only that any person "may" disclose information. This is another issue that we will continue to explore with the Department.

The third area of concern was the lack of any provision related to information sharing that would give legal indemnity to persons sharing the information in respect of defamation. However, recent communication from the Department addresses this issue in detail, and I believe that we will resolve it in the near future.

In conclusion, the Department has provided clarification on the concerns of the Committee and stakeholders. Some matters will require further consideration, but we hope to conclude our deliberations in the coming weeks. For today's purposes, the Committee supports the principles of the Bill and asks the House to support its passing Second Stage.

I once again thank Committee officials, stakeholders and the Department, all of whom worked hard to ensure that, whatever the recent difficulties faced by the Minister in dealing with the Bill in the normal procedural manner, the Committee took the pragmatic view, supported by its officials and the Department, of making sure that it could discharge its responsibility to consider the issues in the Bill as quickly as it could and to achieve a successful legislative outcome within a certain time frame.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for bringing the Housing (Amendment) Bill to the Floor. Like the Member who spoke previously, I will talk generally about the principles of the Bill, starting with information sharing and empty homes.

Certainly, for me, there is an opportunity to help to address the increasing housing need across Northern Ireland by renovating and bringing empty homes back into use. Information sharing between the Department of Finance's Land and Property Services, which holds such information, and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is key to identifying the location and ownership of these properties and allowing the Department to encourage owners to take the required action to enable such homes to be occupied.

An opportunity exists to cut through red tape. That could help to reduce the pressures on our housing lists and get homeless people off the streets. Just this morning, I heard a radio debate about homelessness and what we are doing as a community to address it. However, this could also lead to a reduction in the deterioration of properties and related crime, as well as an increase in revenue through rates.

Maybe the Minister will address the growing number of questions on the sharing of information about empty homes and antisocial behaviour. Individuals and organisations are often unwilling to provide information relating to antisocial behaviour to the Housing Executive or housing associations for fear of data protection issues. Clause 2 provides for disclosure of such information. Anything that will help social landlords to take action against individuals involved in antisocial behaviour must be welcomed. Antisocial behaviour is a blight on our communities, and all too often we see individuals in communities taking matters into their own hands. Better information sharing between the different statutory agencies will empower social landlords to tackle these issues more easily. One of the questions that I ask the Minister to address is this: does he believe that we are doing all that we can to address the problems of antisocial behaviour?

Finally, on the registration of statutory charges, the Minister referred to how the Department and Housing

Executive are exploring the use of loan assistance for private-sector housing repairs and improvements. Without the Bill, loans made would be unsecured. Whilst there are other ways to secure lending, such as through a legal mortgage or a charge, the proposal to enable the Housing Executive to register a statutory charge in respect of grants by way of a loan is the most cost-effective. I again thank the Minister for moving Second Stage and officials for their help and support.

Mrs D Kelly: The SDLP supports the sharing of information and the Minister's attempt to tackle the empty houses situation. The growing list of people looking for social housing and the misuse of social housing by some should concern us all, so we are very supportive of that aspect of the Bill.

Clause 2 deals with antisocial behaviour, which is a problem that is raised daily across our constituency offices and is something that the public are very concerned about. On the definition of antisocial behaviour, there is a note about widening it to include not maintaining a property. I urge caution on that, because there could be a number of reasons: the person could be older, have a disability or mental ill health. We should be very clear about how and when that might be used.

Like Mr Douglas, I listened intently today to some of the public debate on homelessness, and it is a regret that the issue is not included in the Bill, as the Minister had initially intended. Perhaps the Minister will inform the House as to how and when he hopes to include the aspirations on homelessness that he had wanted in the Bill and how they might come forward from the policy proposers in his Department, if not in this mandate, in the next one. Short-term tenancies are also excluded from the Bill.

We are happy to endorse the Chair's comments and ask the Minister to address some of the issues that I highlighted in his closing remarks.

Mr Beggs: Like other Members, I support the Bill coming forward. As the Chairman said, we have discussed it in Committee and feel that there is some room for improvement. I am content that it should formally pass its Second Stage today.

The sharing of information can address problems from vacant properties that adversely affect neighbours. From my experience of constituents getting in touch with me, I am aware that vacant properties can cause great distress and concern to neighbours for a range of reasons. There may be antisocial activity around a property, or there could be vermin infestation, which, with no one living at the property and the owner perhaps being difficult to trace, may become difficult to address.

There is a bungalow in the Antiville area, which I managed to get some movement on in the past year or so. It sat empty for a number of years, with the gardens not being cut and overgrowth taking over the place. Young people had started to congregate, and the police and environmental health officers were being called out. All that is a cost to public services, which could be avoided with earlier information sharing and owners addressing the issues concerned. I support anything that assists in earlier information sharing.

There is another property in the Whitehead area that blighted the neighbourhood for decades. Initially, I was called out by a pensioner who was concerned that an overgrown tree was damaging the adjoining wall; it had not been cut back and, in the wind, was hitting against the wall. The coping stone had already been damaged. As well as that, it was a jungle, with some 68 feet of overgrowth. Eventually, after information sharing — the community provided me with information, which I provided to the statutory services — the owner was traced, and his responsibility was highlighted to him. The overgrowth was cut back, and the property was sold. They found a garden shed and a boat below the undergrowth — it was a jungle. There was also concern about vermin infestation, so there needs to be better sharing of information. The interesting aspect of that case was that DFP knew who the owner was — he was listed with Land and Property Services — but did not know where he was. He was a social tenant of the Housing Executive, but it did not share the information.

Thankfully, through the community coming to me, we were able to share the information. Why should that information not be shared for the benefit of the community or rates collection? I strongly support the concept of the Bill and the sharing of information for the benefit of the wider community.

I think of another private home in Monkstown. Strangely, it has been lying unrented for at least a year. The window of the front door was broken, and young people were congregating, so there was concern from a neighbour about the safety of young people. There was even concern from the neighbour about the safety of everyone in the row. Because there is no automatic, fast sharing of information, it took some time to go through processes and for an environmental officer to eventually contact the owner. Clearly, there needs to be better information sharing to speed up the process. I am aware, from my previous experience as a councillor, that protocols and information can be shared to a limited degree. That needs to be looked at to see how it can be widened for, again, the benefit of the wider community.

I also welcome the concept of sharing information more widely. Some have mentioned the aspect of social housing landlords and how they are defined differently from the Housing Executive. The earlier transfer of relevant information can assist organisations to nip difficulties in the bud before they get out of hand, so I see benefits in widening the sharing of information. Perhaps systems need to be developed to manage this, but I firmly believe — we have already picked this up in Committee — that, if there were earlier sharing of information with social housing landlords, there could be benefits to communities and even to some of the tenants who are having difficulties and support could be brought in earlier. They might not even get to the stage where they get evicted if that system were brought in earlier and assistance given at an earlier stage.

If we go along that line, however, we then face the issue of private sector landlords, who are becoming more and more important in many communities. With many former Housing Executive houses having been sold off, they are now in the private rental sector. Are we going to protect the Housing Executive and social housing associations from potentially disruptive tenants by sharing information? If we do that but do not have some mechanism for including private sector landlords, we risk pushing those involved in antisocial activity, who might get evicted, into the private rental sector. That would leave private landlords, some of whom are small landlords, with less support available and having to manage some of the most difficult tenants around. We need to look at how, particularly in cases where there is known antisocial activity and there are clear convictions, that can be shared more widely, so that people become more responsible for their actions and ultimately look after their home, property and neighbourhood. We should not simply pass such situations on to the private rental sector, which has to attempt to manage them. One landlord told me about a training course that he was on. He was advised that one of the best means of dealing with a disruptive tenant was to pay him to go somewhere else, because it would cost a fortune in unpaid rents and legal cases — it is a long process, perhaps two years — to get him evicted. We need to see how we can better manage private landlord legislation, so that we get a balanced system that protects tenants but also landlords, whether social or private sector.

The other aspect of the Bill is the issue of grants by way of a statutory charge. I am open to supporting such an option. We can expect public capital grants to become fewer. We all face significant financial challenges, and this is an option that may enable necessary improvements to be brought about for the benefit of tenants. Perhaps some substandard housing stock could be brought back into use so that additional homes would be available for those who may, at this moment in time, be homeless. I am open to such a proposal, but we will have to monitor it carefully and see that it works in practice.

As a general comment, I welcome the Bill, although I wonder why it has taken so long, given that some of the issues have been around since 2009. I look forward to dealing formally with the Bill, after it passes Second Reading, at Committee Stage.

Mr Dickson: I will be as brief as possible. We are at the Second Stage of the Bill. I welcome the Bill back to the House today. We do not have a lot of time between now and the end of the mandate to proceed with a lot of legislation, all of which requires careful and appropriate scrutiny. This is a short Bill, but it is, nevertheless, important, and there are important details in it that we, as a Committee, need to examine carefully. I am glad that the time-wasting by Ministers and others appears to be over and we can get on with the work in hand.

I thank the Chair and members of the Committee for the work that has been done in the background to get the Committee work done, at least at an informal stage and now at a well-advanced stage. It is a track that we have been going down with other legislation.

As has been mentioned, the Bill covers three areas: empty homes, antisocial behaviour information sharing and statutory charges. The Alliance Party is content to support all those areas in general, but we will want to scrutinise some areas of detail in Committee to ensure that we get the best out of the Bill and to ensure that it delivers for everyone whom it is intended to cover.

I also want to comment on empty homes, in particular. Mr Beggs made reference to properties in our constituency of East Antrim. I am sure that such references could be replicated for areas across the Province, but there is an important point in that regard. While the identification and, hopefully, re-incorporation of empty homes into the social or private sector is important, it is not a panacea for our housing needs problem, and I think that the Minister will readily recognise that. It is a small step to dealing with properties that are, perhaps, a nuisance in an area, and it provides a useful means of providing housing. It may be that those contacts will simply result in a piece of land or property being sold into the private sector, or it may allow social or other housing providers to open negotiations with the owners of land or derelict properties to see whether they can be brought back into business, all of which is good, but none of which will solve our housing crisis.

I move now to antisocial behaviour and information sharing. Notwithstanding the concerns that others have raised informally in Committee about data protection and the sharing of information, the principle is right and is taking us into the right area. We need to share appropriate information so that we have the most effective and efficient means of dealing with those who commit acts of antisocial behaviour, for which, perhaps, we need to look at a definition in the context of the Bill. It is not to penalise people; it is to identify where the problem is and to take appropriate remedial action. It may simply be that knowing that a future landlord could be warned about behaviour could be sufficient in dealing with a problem.

In general, I support what the Bill is trying to achieve with regard to the statutory charge. Overall, at this stage, I am content to support the Bill.

1.30 pm

Mr McQuillan: I rise to support the Bill in its current form and welcome its contents, which I feel will provide lasting benefits not only for statutory and non-statutory partners in the provision of housing but for the communities that are blighted by empty homes and antisocial behaviour directed by tenants.

Part 1 deals with empty homes. We have discussed at length in this House the impact of empty commercial premises on high streets over the course of many years, especially with the economic downturn. We are all too aware of the impact that empty premises have on any city or town, especially if they fall into disrepair. I therefore wholeheartedly welcome the Bill in this respect, as, unfortunately, the experience of empty houses in many housing estates is that they become a problem for all concerned. Houses become rundown, subject to vandalism and attract antisocial behaviour. While this aspect of the Bill is not the all-in-one cure for such problems associated with empty homes, it will most certainly help statutory bodies and agencies to work together more effectively to see that empty premises are secured at minimum expense to the taxpayer through the sharing of relevant landlords' details and utilised in order to address the needs of the community, be it through homing a family or individual who is in need of a new home.

Suitable accommodation is becoming harder to find, and with pressure on the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and associated housing associations to identify suitable accommodation for those in need, we can see housing waiting lists reduced and needs met. An occupied home is better than an empty home. I hope that this aspect will go some way to alleviate the problems of housing stress and empty homes.

Part 2 deals with antisocial behaviour. I believe that the part of the Bill that relates to information sharing between statutory and non-statutory partners, such as housing associations, goes a long way to tackle the problem of tenants who subject others to antisocial behaviour. Antisocial behaviour is wrong. I believe that permitting statutory bodies to share information regarding bad tenants will allow housing associations, which are becoming more prominent, to deal with those who have no respect for their neighbours or for anyone else for that matter. At present, statutory bodies are restricted in and how and with whom they can share information due to data protection. As housing associations become the main vehicle for providing quality affordable homes in Northern Ireland, they are, in effect, a statutory partner. It is therefore essential that we are afforded the information in order to allow them to take appropriate and proportionate action against tenants who are guilty of antisocial behaviour.

Those tenants who are guilty of antisocial behaviour are difficult to deal with and should, within the law, be brought to account for their actions, which cause others so much stress and annoyance. I would like to see the legislation extended or afforded in some way to private landlords and property management agencies; otherwise we risk seeing the problem of antisocial behaviour moving into the private sector, with such tenants subjecting communities to their antisocial and socially disruptive behaviour that threatens the cohesion of communities and disturbs private life.

While everyone needs somewhere to live, it must be made clear that such behaviour will not be tolerated. It is therefore up to statutory partners, including the PSNI and the justice system at large, to enforce the law in respect of antisocial behaviour, taking a zero-tolerance position to the issue.

Part 3 is on loans and properties. While technical, it is essential in allowing statutory bodies to secure outstanding loans in respect of repairs and improvements to private-sector housing stock. I therefore fully support this part of the Bill.

To conclude, I fully endorse the Bill in its entirety and commend it to the House. The first two parts are vital in tackling dereliction and the causes of antisocial behaviour in communities across Northern Ireland, which I fully endorse. Together, we must tackle these issues in order to protect responsible tenants and landlords.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I would like to start off by saying that, whilst the Bill is short, its content will have an impact right across the board. For too long, we have been talking in this House about the impact that empty homes have had on many communities across the North and the need for us to get our act together not only to identify them but to do something about them. The Bill, when it is passed, will help us along the road to doing that. For all of us, when we are out during elections in our constituencies and communities, one of the main issues raised with us at all times is the ever-growing difficulties with antisocial behaviour and how it is dealt with. I think that the question of information-sharing protocols being brought in will, for the first time, bring housing associations into the loop and allow them to act.

Many of us are aware of incidences in the past where somebody may have been guilty of severe antisocial behaviour in one community in a constituency and, because of some block on information sharing, was moved to another part of the constituency, and that led to difficulties in that community.

One of the difficulties that we need to take on board when we are doing this is that, while we need to deal with antisocial behaviour, it is sometimes so wide that it takes in people who may suffer from mental illness or serious addiction problems. It is also crucial to look at having a wrap-around package that puts the onus on housing providers to give full support to the people they are moving. At present, that is virtually non-existent. These are all important issues when they are all put together, and, whilst this is a short Bill, it will have a dramatic impact and will allow housing providers to deal with things more competently.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the debate. As Members have said, the Bill is short and fairly straightforward legislation. It is much shorter than the other Bill that the Minister is trying to bring through the House. The Second Stage debate, as has been mentioned, is concerned with the principles of the Bill, and I, like others, will try my best to adhere to those broad principles.

The sharing of information, with particular emphasis on empty properties, and the potential for the rating agency and LPS to share information about empty properties with statutory agencies and social housing providers, is a logical step. It is something that we can all support to make better use of existing residential properties that could be taken out of the vacant or abandoned column and occupied by families or citizens in need. It would not only deliver major improvements for those who now reside in the property but would help to regenerate communities where empty premises are a blight and are often a centre for attracting antisocial behaviour. It is a straightforward proposal that we would all support.

During the informal work that the Committee has done to date, we discussed with the Department the potential for sharing other forms of information. I would be keen to hear what the Minister has to say about that, because when we raised it with the Department, we were told that work was ongoing and that efforts were being made to deal with the issue of sharing information from electricity supply companies and whether those properties were, indeed, empty or not. It would be useful to hear from the Minister about that, because when we raised it at the Committee we were told that that work was ongoing. Perhaps the Minister will give us a more concrete update today on how information from electricity supply companies can be better shared with the Housing Executive and social housing providers to tackle empty properties and the potential for tenancy fraud, which, we are told, is a significant issue.

With regard to the potential for housing families. If you look at many of the Housing Executive investment plans, you will see that in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone, the vast majority of areas will not see any investment in new social housing before 2020. Putting vacant properties back into use is the only avenue that we will have to try to get more tenants into social housing over the next five years.

I still think that much more investment is needed and that the Housing Executive needs to do more to demonstrate that there is a need for social housing in communities. However, if we are going to be faced with a situation where there is no investment in many rural areas over the next five years, then it is unacceptable that Housing Executive or housing association properties or, indeed, private houses, which agencies think that people are living in, are lying empty. We need to see more being done to bring those houses back into occupation. The same goes for properties that are nearly finished. Much more needs to be done to bring those properties up to a standard where they can be completed, so that people in need can be put into them. The section of information to be shared, as proposed in the Bill, is very narrow, but it is a fairly common-sense approach, so we would all support that.

Clause 2 deals with antisocial behaviour, and this is an important aspect that does need to be resolved because, too often, we hear from the Housing Executive and social housing providers that there is a small minority of tenants who are engaged in antisocial behaviour and that they have few mechanisms for establishing the prior activities of a social tenant in previous accommodation provision. Once again, it is a straightforward proposal, but I would like to see some detail about how this information will be shared in a way that complies with the various data protection Acts that exist and how that can be done uniformly across our 11 councils so that it is done with a system or a mechanism where the information can be easily accessed and it is not a situation like we have at the minute where there may be 11 different databases and, if you want information, somebody has to trawl through a book or a different form of a spreadsheet. That might be quite time-consuming and take a long list of people to try to get to the bottom of it. If this information is going to be shared, it needs to be done in such a way that people can access it easily and that there is uniformity across the system in how it is stored.

I do think that this is a sensible proposal on how we protect social landlords in making sure that repeat antisocial offenders are not abusing their rights as tenants and damaging homes or damaging communities. However, I also think that there is a need for a reciprocal arrangement for tenants to find out such information about their landlords, because we have heard a call from landlords in the private rented sector that they should have access to this information too to see how landlords in the private sector have previously behaved. If we are ever going to go down such a road, I do think that we want to see a reciprocal arrangement where information on landlords and their past behaviour with tenants should also be shared with tenants. It would be unacceptable to me if landlords could find out what previous activities tenants had been involved in but there was no mechanism for tenants to find out about the potential past activities of a small number of rogue landlords who still exist. Dealing with antisocial tenants is a problem for social housing providers, and I support, once again, what is a very narrowly focused element of the Bill.

Those are the two most substantial clauses in the Bill. I commend the Minister for his efforts. I support him in his deliberations in trying to bring this Bill forward, and I look forward to working with fellow members of the Committee in the next stage of the Bill.

Mr Allister: I welcome the opportunity to take part in this Second Stage debate — some weeks later than one might have anticipated, but then the Minister had some political acrobatics to engage in as he flip-flopped in and out of Government because he told us, of course, that business could not be as usual because the IRA had murdered. Once the independent panel confirmed that the IRA had murdered and, more than that, it had guns, an army council and everything else, suddenly it was time to sweep murder under the carpet and it was time for business as usual. That brings us back here today. Nothing to do with principle or conviction in politics; simply to do with buying time for the expediency of clinging to office, and so we arrive here today.

I think that the Bill embraces a number of sensible and necessary steps. I wish to comment only on clause 2 of the Bill. It quite rightly deals with a long-running problem, or an aspect of that problem, pertaining to antisocial behaviour. It is right that, within the social sector, there should most certainly be the opportunity to exchange important information about those who have been engaged in antisocial behaviour, but the fact, of course, that it is restricted to the social housing sector in the public sense points up a gap or a lacuna in the arrangements. As we know, many people are housed in the private rented sector, and antisocial behaviour, sadly, can be as rife in the private housing sector as in the social sector. Therefore, the situation that we would arrive at with the implementation of the legislation would be that, between a housing association and the Housing Executive, there would be an interchange and interplay of information about the tenancy record etc of that individual, and that is right and that is good. However, more often than not, the individual who gets into trouble because of his antisocial behaviour can walk around the corner to the private sector, and do so with immunity, because his deeds and the information on him do not follow him. If he were to walk around the corner to a housing association or Housing Executive property, the exchange of information would follow him, but not with the private rented sector. That leaves a gap in what is being attempted here.

1.45 pm

We had the Minister say today that the reason for that gap, and the reason why it cannot be plugged, is that there are data protection and human rights issues involved. I have to say that that is a slightly different emphasis from what I understood the officials to have said to us in Committee. The emphasis of what the Committee was told was that it is not really possible to extend the exchange of information to the private rented sector, because it is not adequately regulated. The adequate regulation of the private rented sector could equally embrace how it complies etc with data protection, and that could be a spin-off from that. Therefore, my suggestion — I hope that the Minister will think that this is a positive suggestion — is that he should reserve to himself in the Bill an enabling clause, whereby, at the point at which the private sector is adequately regulated, he can apply, by secondary legislation, the information-exchanging provisions about antisocial behaviour to that regulated sector rather than have to start from scratch with fresh legislation to plug the gap. I therefore suggest to him that all that he needs to do at this stage is to encompass in the Bill an enabling clause, whereby, as and when the private rented sector is adequately regulated, he can apply the essence of clause 2 to it.

I will listen with interest to hear whether there is a sound argument against that. It seems to me that it would take us some way down the road to ensuring that the sharing of information would ultimately not simply be done within the public sector and the housing association sector but cover the ambit of the rental sector, including private housing. I trust that the Minister will take and consider that idea and see whether it is a viable way forward for clause 2. I respectfully suggest that it is.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I call the Minister, Mr Mervyn Storey, to conclude and wind on the debate, I have to inform him that, if he is still speaking at 2.00 pm, we will stop the debate for Question Time and restart afterwards.

Mr Storey: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. If I do not respond to all Members, they will know the reason why.

First, I thank the Members who made a constructive contribution to the debate for the time that they took. In particular, I thank the Chair of the Committee and its members. I appreciate the difficulties and the issues that we have had to deal with. I welcome the Committee's recognition of the benefits that the Bill could have by bringing empty homes back into use and tackling antisocial behaviour.

It is regrettable that, on the day that we bring the Bill back to the House, there was another incident this morning, on Bracken Avenue in Newcastle. I have already had conversations this morning with the Housing Executive. I am glad that there have been no injuries, as the situation could have been a lot worse.

I pay tribute to the Fire and Rescue Service, the police and all involved in ensuring that that incident did not result in a worse situation than we have. I have also had discussions this morning with the Housing Executive because a number of elderly people are involved in that incident, and I want to make sure that everything is done to meet the needs of the people who have been affected.

I return to the issue in front of us. The Committee was concerned at the absence of provisions on information-sharing with private rented sector landlords and that the provision on antisocial behaviour was not compulsory and there was no legal indemnity for those disclosing information. The Committee intends to give those issues further consideration during Committee Stage. I welcome the fact that the Committee has now taken a proactive approach not only on this issue but on other issues. I appreciate what my officials have done to brief the Committee on numerous occasions around a number of those issues.

Some questions were raised by Members, and, with your indulgence, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will try to work my way through them. The Chair of the Committee raised the issue of why the Bill did not cover the whole range of topics set out in the consultation paper as of 2 December 2013. As you know, that consultation document proposed new legislation in regard to a new form of social housing tenancy and clarification of the legislation that provides for the Housing Executive homelessness duty to come to an end in cases of antisocial behaviour. It was subsequently proposed that the Bill should also enable the courts to grant a more comprehensive injunction against antisocial behaviour and breach of tenancy agreement, including a power for courts to enable the PSNI to arrest without warrant persons who breach such injunctions. The timescale for progressing the Bill through the Assembly, as we all know, is tight, and, due to the requirements of making sure that we do this in a timely way, the Bill concentrates on the areas where there is a pressing need for legislation.

There was also an issue raised by my colleague Sammy Douglas and by the Chair about whether the Bill could amend the requirement of the Housing Executive to share information about antisocial behaviour with private landlords. My Bill as introduced will make provision for information to be shared with the Housing Executive or a registered housing association. Those are professional organisations that are governed or regulated by my Department, and they have governing boards and established policies and procedures in place for the proper management of what is deemed sensitive information. The Information Commissioner's Office has advised that social landlords should not disclose any personal information unless they are satisfied that the parties receiving the information have arrangements in place that conform to data protection and human rights requirements — for example, ensuring that information is held securely. Given that, unlike social landlords, private landlords do not have a governing body, I do not consider that private landlords would be in a position to meet the strict requirements of data protection and the issues in relation to human rights. The sharing of information with private landlords has not been subject to public consultation. I believe that, given the far-reaching impact of the proposal, there should be an opportunity for those who would be affected to air their views. Apart from the other considerations that I have mentioned, the timescale for taking the Bill through the legislative process is already challenging.

Mr Douglas also raised the issue of how the proposal relating to sharing information about antisocial behaviour would represent an improvement on the existing arrangements. Existing legislation only allows a limited range of information relating to certain court orders to be disclosed: it is therefore proposed to allow any person to disclose information about antisocial behaviour that may be required by social landlords for a comprehensive range of housing management purposes. Such purposes would include applying for an injunction, an anti-social behaviour order or an order for possession; conducting criminal proceedings for any offence; deciding whether to withhold consent to a mutual exchange of secure tenancy; deciding whether a tenant is entitled to exercise the right to buy; deciding whether the threat of the applicant is ineligible; deciding whether to allocate housing to any person; and deciding whether to take any other action.

Other issues were raised. I want to say in response to Mr McCann that some antisocial behaviours are the result of mental illness. We all know that there is a variety of reasons. I have had some discussions with my colleagues in Upper Bann about recent events in the Dingwell Park area, and we all know the circumstances and challenges there. Social landlords are aware of issues around mental illness, and my Department has issued guidance that emphasises the need to provide appropriate support to tenants with particular challenges. We need to bear that in mind when we look at the issue. We would all like to have a society where we did not have to deal with these issues; however, the reality is far from that.

Let me conclude by reaffirming a point about empty homes, which repeatedly comes up and is always an issue of concern for Members. You will recall that the Department's empty homes strategy and action plan seeks to address the issue. The strategy was introduced on 5 September 2013, and we are working our way through that action plan and strategy. I hope to be in a position to give a further detailed briefing to the Committee on empty homes, but suffice it to say that steady progress has been made in meeting the targets outlined in the plan since its launch, with 13 of the 16 actions listed in the action plan either being achieved or ongoing. We could give more detail on that.

Due to the time, I will conclude by saying that I take these responsibilities seriously. Housing is an important issue, and I will be judged, I trust, on my actions and on the sincerity of those actions and not trying to make cheap political points.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

OFMDFM: Consultation

1. Mr McNarry asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline the external bodies they consult routinely before making departmental decisions. (AQO 9014/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister): The time available does not allow me to list individually the bodies consulted by our Department during the policy development process. The OFMDFM equality scheme, which is available on the departmental website, provides a core list of 156 organisations that should be routinely consulted.

However, individual business areas are encouraged to add to that list as necessary to reflect the interests of particular stakeholders in the matter under consultation or if new groups or bodies emerge. The external bodies consulted may, therefore, vary in accordance with the subject matter and objectives of each consultation exercise.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate the response from the deputy First Minister and recognise the time constraints that he talks about. Would he have time to confirm that the IRA army council is also consulted routinely in decisions taken by his own office?

Mr M McGuinness: In the course of my duties as deputy First Minister over the last eight years, working with the Rev Ian Paisley and Peter Robinson in their capacity as First Minister, and working with four other Sinn Féin Ministers in the Executive, I do not ever recall anybody questioning any decision as having been subject to a group of people in a smoke-filled room.

I really do not think that the question is appropriate, but, in the context of the discussions that we are involved in, all of us recognise that there is a job of work to be done collectively by the Executive and by every Member in standing together against those who would try to plunge us back into the past.

In the course of the last eight years, the records of the five Sinn Féin Ministers are beyond question. As we move forward, hopefully to an agreement in the coming days, I hope that we can devise an approach and strategy that has all of us singing from the same hymn sheet to make it absolutely clear to anybody who believes that violence represents the way forward for all of us that we say no. We say that we will stand together and devise approaches and strategies to undermine those who would try to overturn the democratic and peace processes.

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I am stating the obvious, I am quite certain, in saying that the Minister can, in choosing whether to answer a question, decide whether it is directly relevant to the original question.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his answer. To get the question back on track, can the Minister indicate the yearly cost of consulting external bodies? I am not suggesting that consultation is not necessary; I would just like to have some indication of the cost to his Department.

Mr M McGuinness: We all understand in this House that consultation is sometimes an indispensable part of the processes that we are involved in. I do not have the cost of all of that to hand, but I will write to the Member with the answer to that question.

Mr Allister: Whatever the arrangements for his colleagues, when it comes to the deputy First Minister, is it simply a matter of looking in the mirror when he is taking directions from the IRA army council?

Mr M McGuinness: I do not think that that is an appropriate question. It obviously comes from someone who, since he came into the House in the first instance, has been hell-bent on trying to undermine the processes of the House. Obviously, the Member is dedicated to the overturn of all the agreements that have been made in the last eight years. Of course, he is a former member of the Democratic Unionist Party and decided, for whatever reason, to part ways. Clearly, when he parted ways, he walked off into the wilderness.

Mr Speaker: Mr Jim Wells is not in his place. Before we move on, I inform Members that questions 3 and 5 have been withdrawn.

Syrian Refugees: Preparation

4. Mr McCartney asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline the plans in place for the arrival of Syrian refugees. (AQO 9017/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, junior Minister Jennifer McCann will answer this question.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): We have committed to welcoming between 50 and 100 refugees by December under the vulnerable persons relocation scheme, with the intention that further groups would arrive on a phased basis. By taking this approach, we hope to resolve any unforeseen issues that might arise before further refugees arrive. We anticipate that the first group of refugees will arrive before Christmas. They will spend a short period in a welcome centre to provide orientation and prepare them for life here. Initially, they will be placed in temporary accommodation, most likely in the greater Belfast area.

The strategic and operational groups are considering a wide range of factors to ensure that we meet refugees' needs. These include the process for managing their arrival, the availability of translators and interpreters, and health, housing and education requirements. We are also taking into account any implications for the existing community. We are working closely with NGOs to ensure that we draw on their expertise and experience and involve them in our arrangements. Their support has been very helpful, particularly in ensuring that we develop plans that effectively meet the social and cultural needs of refugees and support their integration. Although the Executive are taking the lead, councils have the essential role of preparing communities for new arrivals and ensuring that they are welcomed with dignity and respect.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the junior Minister for her answer. She has given a good outline, in particular that some refugees will be coming before Christmas, which I think most people will welcome. She talked about the roles of local councils. What roles does she think that councils, in particular, will play in the integration of these Syrians into local communities?

Ms J McCann: As the Member says, local councils have a really pivotal role in this. They are already on the operational group that is headed up by DSD. They have expressed a willingness to play a role in creating a welcoming environment and working with communities and everything else. A number of councils have already convened their own groups. In your council area of Derry and Strabane, the group consists of church leaders, elected representatives, community leaders and representatives from minority groups. There is also a representation from the business and charity sectors. The local mayor has already joined with Trócaire to set up a special tax-giving service to allow people to donate to an emergency refugee fund. Belfast City Council also already has a subgroup that meets on a regular basis. There is an overall group that the councils are represented on. I have met the mayors of a number of councils, along with voluntary and community organisations and NGOs that deal with refugees on a daily basis. People are very keen to work together. Obviously, there is a great deal of goodwill out there among local people. We want to get the maximum benefit from that. Councils have a pivotal role to play.

Ms Hanna: I thank the junior Minister for her answers so far. You have referenced the pressure on the existing sector providing for refugees and asylum seekers who are already here and the concerns about the lack of an integration strategy, which means that each new arriver is having to reinvent the wheel. Is there any more funding for existing groups providing existing services? Is it likely that Northern Ireland will be open to receiving more refugees after this initial tranche?

Ms J McCann: I can tell the Member that we will be receiving more refugees, but on a phased basis. Obviously, you point out that there are already people here who are refugees or asylum seekers. They are from Syria and other countries. We need to ensure that those people are looked after, as well. The best way of doing it is in a partnership, collaborative approach because we also need to ensure that the groups, particularly the local groups — the voluntary and community organisations like NICRAS and others — are resourced and able to pass on whatever knowledge they have. From speaking to some people who have already come here about the difficulties that they face even as we speak, I know that we need to ensure that the people who come here in December — because they are very vulnerable people, as well. A lot of them are women and children, and they have been through great hardship and difficulties already. We need to ensure that we have the services in place, right across the board, that will meet their needs. You are certainly right about that approach, and we will look to make sure that those organisations are resourced.

Mr Moutray: Any Syrian refugees who come here will find a country with a very different culture to the one that they left behind. What help will be given to them to adapt in that respect?

Ms J McCann: You make a very valid point. It is essential that we have an approach of partnership working. As I said, there are people who are already here who have experienced the difficulties of coming here, when, for example, you do not know the language. In the first year, we will put on English language classes and so on. Also, we will look to ensure that their health and housing needs are met. We will look for places so that the education needs of their children are met. Some of these people are very vulnerable and will need special services, such as counselling and other support services. We will look to local community groups and those organisations on the ground, particularly the council representatives, because the services need to be organised in a joined-up way if we are to get the maximum benefit from them.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: NGOs have identified to the OFMDFM Committee a tension between what the Executive do for current refugees and asylum seekers and what is, potentially, enhanced support later this year for the Syrian refugees. What actions are being taken to try to address that tension?

Ms J McCann: In my previous answers, you heard about the partnership approach that we are taking. At the minute, our officials are drafting a strategy for integration. Basically, we are working away. Two groups are working at the Executive level: a strategic group that is headed up by OFMDFM, and also an operational group. There are separate groups in council areas as well. We have had a number of meetings; I myself have met a number of the NGOs and local organisations that are already working with refugees who are already here and seeking asylum. The learned experiences that those people have passed on to those organisations and which the organisations are passing on to us are going to be pivotal in taking this forward.

Victims and Survivors: Severe Injury Pension

6. Mr Lyttle asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the progress of a victims and survivors severe injury pension. (AQO 9019/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question also.

Ms J McCann: Our Department continues to consider proposals for a pension for severely physically injured victims. In conjunction with the Commission for Victims and Survivors and the Victims and Survivors Service, research is ongoing into various issues, such as legislative requirements, to allow the scheme to be implemented in a way that benefits all victims and survivors. In the Stormont House Agreement it was also agreed that further work will be undertaken to seek an acceptable way forward on the proposals. As a result, our Department is looking at drafting a document that will seek opinion on various aspects of the pension proposals. The draft is to be submitted to the Stormont House implementation group for consideration later this month. We remain committed to ensuring that all victims and survivors receive the best services possible.

2.15 pm

Mr Lyttle: I thank the junior Minister for her update. Does she agree that improving the services available for victims and survivors in our community remains an important task? Does she agree that it needs to be an open and transparent process? If so, why has research undertaken by the Commission for Victims and Survivors, proposing a model for a severe injury pension for victims and survivors, yet to be published?

Ms J McCann: Discussions about this issue are ongoing. It was raised in the Stormont House Agreement, for instance. As you rightly say, there are other issues: the development of the Victims and Survivors Service; the regional mental trauma service; advocacy; and counselling support. Pensions have been part of the negotiations. When taking this forward, we need to be very sensitive to the needs of the people involved. Having met them — I have a meeting today with some victims who were severely injured — we are really listening to their voices and what they are saying. We want to take this forward.

Mr Campbell: I am glad to hear that work is continuing. Does the junior Minister agree that it is important that the needs of those who were severely physically injured during the Troubles are paramount in the consideration of this issue and that the focus of attention does not become an assuaging of any guilt for what she and the deputy First Minister may have done in the past?

Ms J McCann: The needs of all victims and survivors are and should be central in everybody's mind when we take forward any service. As I said in my previous answer, we have been looking at a number of legacy mechanisms to develop the services, including the mental trauma service. There are also legacy mechanisms to give families the maximum disclosure that they need: the Historical Investigation Unit (HIU), information retrieval and the archive. No matter what we do through legacy mechanisms, it is very important that they are victim-centred and that people should not put party political issues before the needs of victims and survivors in any way.

Community Safety College: Desertcreat

7. Mr McGlone asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline any discussions they have had with the Minister of Justice on the proposed Northern Ireland Community Safety College at Desertcreat. (AQO 9020/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: We are committed to providing a community safety college that provides a high standard of training for our public safety services so that they can respond effectively to the needs of the whole population. This was a Programme for Government commitment by the Executive, and we remain fully committed to it. We have not had any recent discussions with the Minister of Justice on the matter. We understand that an updated business case is being prepared to take account of a review of the projected needs of the services involved. I expect that the Ministers of Justice and Health will present recommendations based on this business case to the Executive before the end of the year.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. I hope that the use of the past tense in "this was a Programme for Government commitment" is not of relevance to people who are from and live in the constituency.

Will the Minister provide some detail on the efforts that have been made to recover the £53 million that had been committed by the Westminster Government to the project?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member will know that the First Minister and I met a very large delegation from the constituency of Mid Ulster. We made it absolutely clear during our engagement that we were still committed to the development at Desertcreat.

The big question will centre on the scale of that development.

The Member would have been in the House when I said that I was disappointed by the PSNI's attitude to its contribution to its aspect of the training college at Desertcreat, near Cookstown in County Tyrone. Over a period of years, it was obvious to me that there was little enthusiasm in the higher echelons of the PSNI for the policing facility that was on offer at that college, and that, if it ever came to fruition, the PSNI would not be determined to pursue that aspect.

We are now dealing with the needs of the different community safety agencies, whether it be the Ambulance Service, the Fire and Rescue Service or policing, but our commitment to the project remains. During the course of the very complex and extensive negotiations that are taking place, I think that the Member would be surprised if that issue was not raised. We certainly believe that the project would bring enormous benefits to the community safety services that we depend on. We are still committed to the project and to Desertcreat.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mo bhúochas fosta leis an LeasChéad-Aire. The deputy First Minister mentioned receiving a new proposition and business plan by the end of the year. If we can get back on course with Desertcreat, what is the expected time frame for completion?

Mr M McGuinness: I fully expect that this matter will be brought to the Executive in the coming days; certainly before the end of this month. The time frame for work to begin will depend on the Executive's decision, whatever that may be.

Mrs Overend: I thank the deputy First Minister for his responses. Since the original funding earmarked for this project was announced, it has been lost. Where does the deputy First Minister propose that funding for this can be found? Is it part of his negotiations, since it would benefit the constituency that both he and I represent?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member understands, as do I, and as did the previous Member who spoke, that this was a Programme for Government commitment. It has been impacted by the requirements of the different organisations that would locate at Desertcreat. Very shortly, we will take possession of a business case that will be brought by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Health, and we will see what that brings. However, as I said previously, the First Minister and I have been committed to this project from the very beginning and we have remained true to it.

I am not pre-empting the outcome of any decision by the Executive, but paying for the project will be a matter for them to deal with. There is a huge responsibility on the British Government to recognise that the money was taken back as a result of the difficulties that were presented to the promulgation of this case. They must also recognise the need for the community safety college, and that the Executive are determined not only to move the project forward but to point out to the British Government that they, too, could make a contribution.

Programme for Government 2011-15: Update

8. Mrs Dobson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the delivery of their Programme for Government 2011-15 targets. (AQO 9021/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: Of the 82 commitments in the Programme for Government, over 80% have been achieved, which is a significant improvement on the 70% achieved in the last Programme for Government. OFMDFM led on the delivery of 14 of the commitments, including some of the most complex and challenging issues in government. Our track record in delivery has been strong, in particular through the Delivering Social Change framework, the social investment fund and Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC). Those projects have brought new, innovative approaches and unprecedented levels of collaboration to bear on tackling the most invidious issues facing our communities.

Through Delivering Social Change, among other achievements, we have supported remarkable improvements in achievement in literacy and numeracy by our young people; we have improved and streamlined support to families with complex needs through a new network of family support hubs; and we have invested in growing the capacity of the social economy through the establishment of incubation hubs in locations across our communities.

Through the social investment fund, we have committed approximately £58 million to projects, which is 73% of the total fund. Under Together: Building a United Community, seven major good relations programmes have been put in place. They represent the largest investment in constructive community relations in our history and are a positive statement of our intention to build a better shared future. In addition, engagement with Europe has increased, exceeding targets by drawing down over £95 million of competitive funds.

When the First Minister and I published the Programme for Government, we were very clear that it was an ambitious programme aimed at achieving deep and meaningful change in the quality of people's lives. Our record and delivery demonstrate that that was the right approach.

Mrs Dobson: Does the deputy First Minister accept that the redevelopment and regeneration of the Maze site should not be dependent on the location of a conflict transformation centre there? Will he prioritise the redevelopment of the Maze and the jobs it will bring?

Mr M McGuinness: I think that the Member and her party will be very conscious of the fact that that was one of the very big Programme for Government commitments that we had agreed. The Member and her party should also be conscious that they, with others, led the way in undermining the development of that site. The Programme for Government commitment was about the construction of a peace-building and conflict resolution centre on the site, as well as the further development of the site through, for example, the relocation of the Royal Ulster Agricultural Society from the King's Hall to the Maze. It has obviously moved forward very decisively, and a fantastic future is in store for it as a result of that move. We have been to the site on several occasions through its agricultural show in the last couple of years, and it is going from strength to strength.

I would like to see a resolution of it, but that obviously depends on the collaboration and cooperation of all parties in the House. It was unfortunate that a certain Member from North Antrim, elements in the Ulster Unionist Party, some people in the DUP and others in organisations outside of the House effectively collaborated to prevent the construction of a peace centre, which would not have been a shrine to anything other than peace.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Given the significant achievements outlined by the deputy First Minister, how can the next PFG improve on further delivering its commitments?

Mr M McGuinness: That really depends on the outcome of the next election. The next Programme for Government will be a matter for an incoming Executive, which the people will decide upon in that election. That said, work is ongoing to look at potential high-level objectives and identify possible delivery models and governance and accountability structures. In particular, we are exploring potential benefits of an increased focus on outcomes, through the development of an outcomes framework for the public sector. It is helpful that the development of the new structures in government and preparation for a new Programme for Government are progressing together so that future delivery of outcomes should benefit from better collaboration and decision-making with increased accountability.

Mr McCarthy: The deputy First Minister will be aware that, under the Programme for Government, some £80 million was set aside in the social investment fund for the regeneration and rejuvenation of areas. Can he tell the Assembly how much of that money has been spent for those purposes in those areas?

Mr M McGuinness: I think that I did that in the last answer. I think that it is well over £50 million.

Mr Speaker: We will take a quick question from Mr Seán Rogers.

2.30 pm

Anti-poverty Strategy

9. Mr Rogers asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, following the High Court ruling in June 2015 which stated that the Executive had failed to adopt a strategy to tackle poverty, social exclusion and patterns of deprivation, what actions have they taken to establish a new anti-poverty strategy. (AQO 9022/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question.

Ms J McCann: The Programme for Government sets the general objectives and direction for the Executive in tackling poverty. It is also the means for integrating the activities of Departments and agencies and utilising and allocating resources between them to meet those objectives.

In the Programme for Government, the Executive made a commitment to reduce poverty, promote equality and tackle existing patterns of disadvantage through the Delivering Social Change framework. That framework was established to deliver a sustained reduction in poverty and associated issues across all ages and to improve children and young people's health, well-being and lifetime opportunities, thereby breaking the long-term cycle of multigenerational problems. However, it is clear that a lot more needs to be done to address those issues.

We have agreed not to appeal the court's judgement and are considering the recent High Court ruling. We will take account of the court's view of our statutory obligations and what is necessary to bring us in line with the requirements in law as well as in our community. We expect to bring forward further proposals in the coming months.

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. I thought that I was going to be very unlucky and get a two-minute answer. We move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Sport: Good Relations

T1. Mr Anderson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what OFMDFM is doing to promote good relations within sport, in view of the refusal of nationalist members of Mid Ulster District Council to support a motion to congratulate the Northern Ireland football team on its qualification for Euro 2016. (AQT 3081/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: In the aftermath of the qualification, I congratulated them, as I also held out hope and expectation that the Republic of Ireland would qualify along with them. They face two very testing matches at the weekend against Bosnia and Herzegovina. I hope that they will come through those. The two managers — the O'Neills — have done a fantastic job for the North and the South.

It will not come as a surprise to anybody in the House that, not on a political level but on a purely sporting one, I believe that a single team would be much more effective in Europe and in qualifying for the World Cup. That said, I applaud the achievements of our sportspeople North and South, and I have never been reluctant — nor has the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure — to congratulate teams from the North that have done well on the world stage. It is something for all of us to be proud of.

Mr Anderson: Deputy First Minister, I hope that you relay your comments to your Sinn Féin colleagues in Mid Ulster District Council. Do you agree that the recent decision by the GAA to form a guard of honour at the paramilitary-style funeral of Declan McGlinchey in Bellaghy sends out a very negative signal to the Protestant and unionist community and does nothing to contribute to good relations in sport?

Mr M McGuinness: I was very saddened by the death of Declan McGlinchey. He was a young man who suffered grievously as a result of the conflict; he lost his mother and his father in that conflict. I feel a tremendous sympathy for his wife and seven children. For someone to die of a heart attack before the age of 40 is terrible for any family.

In the circumstances, it is quite obvious that Mr McGlinchey was very much a part of the GAA in the Bellaghy area. The decision of the GAA, along with other members of the community, to participate in the funeral, I think, does not indicate any sympathy for what people might think were Mr McGlinchey's views, which, previously, were in opposition to the work that we have been involved in in the Assembly.

NAMA Portfolio: Sale

T2. Mrs Dobson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether the deputy First Minister has held any discussions with colleagues or officials about the sale of the Northern Ireland NAMA portfolio. (AQT 3082/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: The First Minister and I have been very much involved in a lot of discussions that have taken place at the Finance Committee. Other discussions are also taking place in Dublin. It is obvious from the statements that have been issued by the Police Service and by police in the United States of America that what happened as a result of £7.5 million finding its way to a bank account on the Isle of Man is the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. Does he share my concern and perception that sharp practices in business dealings here risk damaging the worldwide reputation of Northern Ireland as a place in which to invest and do business?

Mr M McGuinness: We have been very successful over recent years in showing that we are open for business. Quite a number of delegations from all over the world have come here. I think that all of them have been very impressed, to the extent that we have brought in more foreign direct investment than at any other time in the history of the state. Of course, the First Minister and I, along with Arlene Foster, when she was in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, have been very much involved in engaging with world business leaders, particularly in North America. A lot of those investments that are taking place and will take place in the future are down to those important engagements.

The issue of the NAMA portfolio is the subject of an investigation in other areas, and my sense of it is that we can move forward with considerable confidence that people who are looking at committing their businesses or establishing new ones here in the North will continue to pursue those objectives.

Disability Strategy: Progress Indicators

T3. Mr Allen asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the consultation on measuring progress indicators in the strategy to improve the lives of people with disabilities. (AQT 3083/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: Junior Minister McCann will take this question.

Ms J McCann: We recently had a meeting with local organisations in terms of the UN commissioner who was over. We had gone out and consulted people from those organisations and groups on our disability strategy. They decided that the strategy should roll over into the next period. We are trying to ensure that the UN declaration on people with disabilities is met but that we also ensure that we have a strategy, going forward, which is resourced in such a way that we can introduce some of the signature programmes that we had been discussing in the earlier period with those organisations and groups. That is how we are trying to proceed and take that forward.

Mr Allen: I thank the junior Minister for her answer. As she may or may not be aware, I have had difficulties with accessibility in this great Building. Can the Minister outline whether there is any funding in her Department for Departments to improve access to their own buildings?

Ms J McCann: I totally appreciate what the Member says, and it is not the first time that this issue has been brought to our attention. Indeed, I think that it was two weeks ago that I spoke to people who were up here in wheelchairs, and they found accessing the Building quite difficult. That is something that we will be raising. You make a very valid point, and we certainly need to practise what we preach, so to speak. If our strategy is asking other places to have disability access, we also need to provide that for people here.

Criminality and Paramilitarism

T4. Mr Kennedy asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what measures the deputy First Minister believes need to be put in place to satisfy the desire of law-abiding citizens to finally deal with the twin evils of criminality and paramilitarism. (AQT 3084/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: The Member will be as aware as any other of the delegations to the discussions that have been going on for the past eight or nine weeks that that is a serious issue that we are dealing with.

As I have said, emerging from that has to be an agreed approach by all the parties to how we will stand together against paramilitarism, armed gangs and criminality. I am 100% behind that. It is unfortunate that, in the course of the debate, some sight has been lost of the Davison and McGuigan families, who suffered so grievously as a result of the actions of the criminals who took the lives of their loved ones.

Yes, there is a huge responsibility, and I hope for a successful conclusion to the discussions that we are involved in that will feature an agreed approach by all the parties in the Assembly. That is essential. There are people on the extremes of so-called republicanism and so-called loyalism who are still determined to use violence to promote their objectives. The only way to defeat that is to make politics work, but in making politics work there is a duty and a responsibility on all politicians to stand together, as I have stood with unionist politicians over the last eight years, against both the loyalist extremists and the so-called extreme republicans who would try to plunge us back to the past.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful for the reply from the deputy First Minister. Will he stand with the Chief Constable and his senior command, other political parties and the British and Irish Governments on the Chief Constable's clear stance on the status and existence of paramilitary organisations, including the Provisional IRA?

Mr M McGuinness: I will stand with all democratically elected politicians in the House against violence, against armed gangs of all descriptions, against criminality of all descriptions and against all paramilitary organisations. It is always possible that you will end up with recriminations when questions like that are asked in that fashion, but it is not lost on the community that I come from that, over the past two or three years, unionist politicians have had absolutely no difficulty standing alongside the UVF in north Belfast.

Paramilitarism: Executive Strategy

T5. Mr Dickson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what contribution the deputy First Minister thinks he and the First Minister can make to an Executive strategy to combat paramilitarism. (AQT 3085/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: There have been many discussions over the last eight or nine weeks, and they have all been very inclusive — the round tables, bilaterals and trilaterals that have taken place. In the discussions that I have had with the First Minister, we have effectively recognised the problem that we face in terms of opposition to these institutions, opposition to the peace process and opposition to all the political parties in the Assembly. Do I think he is serious about coming to an agreed approach that bears down in an effective way on the activities of those who would plunge us back to the past? Yes, I do, and I think that he believes that I am serious. What is required over the next while is for all politicians in the House to join us in our approach to bearing down on those who thought it was a good idea to lift a gun and go out and shoot Jock Davison and Kevin McGuigan in east Belfast. I think that —

Mr Campbell: Patsy Gillespie.

Mr M McGuinness: I hear some barracking from the other side of the House from people who have been less than constructive in the work of peace-making and reconciliation, but I will ignore that for the moment. There is a serious discussion taking place, and the outcome of all of this will hopefully see an approach that finds favour not just in the House but in the community.

2.45 pm

Mr Dickson: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. There are many statutory agencies that, unfortunately, have to deal with paramilitaries as so-called or de facto gatekeepers: what action will you and OFMDFM take to remove that scourge from the community?

Mr M McGuinness: It is all part of the challenge that we face. In my role as deputy First Minister over the past eight years, I have been threatened by paramilitaries. My life has been threatened by so-called republicans in different parts of Ireland. My home has been attacked. My wife has been verbally abused in the streets. I know what people face when dealing with those matters, but I have not bowed the knee to any of the people who make such threats; in fact, when they issue threats, it makes me stronger. We are trying to move from a position of recognising that we are in a society emerging from conflict into a post-conflict situation. We are not there yet — there is still a considerable amount of work to be done — but making politics work and coming to agreements such as the agreement that we are trying to forge at the moment can, on the other side, send a very powerful message to those in our society who believe that violence represents the best way forward that it is the road to no town. What represents the best way forward for us is working institutions, people being prepared to work on reconciliation processes and people working to ensure that we provide foreign direct investment and support for our indigenous businesses. If we can get our act together on all of that, I know that our young people can have a bright future and will not be rich pickings for those who would criminalise them and drag them into activities that will see them end up in prison.

Mr Speaker: Time is up. We now move on to questions to the Minister for Employment and Learning.

Employment and Learning

Mr Speaker: Question 1 has been withdrawn.

Ulster University: Modern Languages

2. Mr Anderson asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the impact of the closure of the school of modern languages at Ulster University. (AQO 9028/11-16)

12. Mr Wells asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how his Department will ensure that the Northern Ireland workforce retains the necessary language skills to succeed at a global level, given the recent cuts in funding to third-level education. (AQO 9038/11-16)

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): Mr Speaker, with your permission, I will group questions 2 and 12.

Ulster University's decision to close its school of modern languages is the outworking of the budget cuts to my Department and the higher education sector. As a result of the cuts, Ulster University has sought to rationalise its course offerings across campuses. That has resulted in the decision to close some courses and consolidate others. The university has advised that, in making those decisions, a number of factors have been taken into consideration, including student demand, attrition rates, student satisfaction, employment statistics and research performance. The consolidation of teaching provision across all campuses will facilitate budgetary savings without impacting on the quality of teaching, which remains paramount.

The level of interest and demand from students choosing modern language subjects at Ulster University is low both in terms of the number of students who select modern language as a first choice and in terms of those who meet the requirements of the course. While I acknowledge the concern among business and other stakeholders regarding access to modern language courses, given the language skills required by the workforce, the further education colleges are well positioned to help meet the demand for modern language learning in Northern Ireland at the level needed. There is also the potential for my Department to give consideration to the provision of a business language academy through the Assured Skills programme. However, that is dependent on an identified need of a group of employers, where the availability of language skills is impeding the growth of a particular sector.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that response.

Local firms have said that modern language skills are crucial for the development and growth of business. The chief executive of the Northern Ireland Chamber of Commerce and Industry, Ann McGregor, has described the closure of the school of modern languages at Ulster University as a setback for exporters. In the light of the importance to our economy of countries such as China and Germany, does the Minister agree that it is vital that both those languages are taught at university level in Northern Ireland? Does he also agree that the failure to offer such courses will simply add to the brain drain?

Dr Farry: We need to be slightly cautious about the latter points that the Member makes. Issues were raised around the viability of the school to begin with. That is reflected in the decision-making process in which the university has been involved. Overall, taking on board the comments made by the Chamber of Commerce and other business organisations, it is worth reflecting on the point that none of what we are doing around higher education makes a huge amount of sense. To be perfectly frank, it does not make any sense at all.

Obviously, that includes what we are doing around modern languages. I think that we would all prefer it to be different, but we have not followed through, in our actions, by having a more realistic approach to budget setting as an Executive and, in turn, through what comes through to my Department. Therein lies the difficulty of where we find ourselves today.

By way of mitigation, we could look to the further education sector and the potential for an academy to be created, where demand exists, under the Assured Skills programme. Indeed, that may prove to be a more effective way of addressing the language skills that are required by businesses. It is important to bear in mind that there can be a difference between the teaching of languages in an academic context, such as that you would find in a university, and the more practical, selective requirements of business, such as the ability to engage in sales and marketing, with an eye to exports.

Mr Wells: I understand that sackcloth and ashes are the order of the day. I have just realised that I missed question 2 to OFMDFM. I got slightly confused between the two sets of questions. I apologise to you and the House for that.

Minister, some of my close relatives are Swiss. When I visit them, I am appalled at how the capabilities of graduates from our part of Europe compare with the those of the Swiss people in European languages. Surely we are sending out the wrong signal to industrialists and investors when we say that, instead of expanding modern languages and its education throughout the Province, we are cutting back. Surely that is the totally wrong thing to do as we attempt to increase our markets throughout Europe.

Dr Farry: I will say several things to the Member. The fact that we are cutting our higher education sector in Northern Ireland is at the heart of the negative message that we are sending out to the rest of the world. We need to be mindful of how important our base — the universities and the skilled graduates that we are producing — is to Invest Northern Ireland's narrative on how it is successful in attracting investment into Northern Ireland. There are real dangers in that regard. Obviously, what we are doing around languages is one subset of that. I mentioned to Mr Anderson that the further education sector and, indeed, a potential academy approach may well be able to address the particular language requirements of the business community.

The Member made a comparison with Switzerland. It is useful to reflect on the fact that Switzerland's economy has a different approach to higher level skills. The Swiss actually have a much smaller higher education sector than us, per capita participation, but they have a much more advanced system of higher level vocational skills. Without wanting to diminish what we are doing around higher education in Northern Ireland, we have drawn very heavily from colleagues in Switzerland in designing our system of apprenticeships, including higher level apprenticeships in Northern Ireland.

Mr Dallat: I have listened very carefully to the Minister. He has made reference, twice, to further education colleges taking up the slack created by Ulster University abandoning courses in modern languages. Perhaps he might detail more elaborately what consultation and discussions he has had with the colleges of further education and what additional resources he is making available to them. Finally, I will squeeze in another question. Has he had any discussions with the Minister of Education on the knock-on effect that the abandonment of modern languages will have in our schools throughout Northern Ireland?

Dr Farry: I have had discussions with the Minister of Education primarily around the Irish language, which we will come to shortly. The further education colleges are very clear on their own mission about supporting the local economy. As the Member will appreciate, we are finalising a new further education strategy for Northern Ireland. It will consolidate a lot of the progress that has been made in recent years. While the colleges are certainly up for the challenge, we need to be realistic about the prospect of directing more resources to them. Resources are very scarce at present, and the prospect is that they may get scarcer before the situation improves.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: In view of the Minister's comments on FE, can he elaborate on the capacity, ability and indeed the available funding in the FE sector to take up the challenge of modern languages delivery, because the drastic cuts have made significant cutbacks in the criteria for students already?

Dr Farry: That question tends to follow on from and reinforce what Mr Dallat has said. Again, to take the answer further, there are no good answers, short of actually having a more responsible approach to public finances across the board. We are not in a situation where we can make more money available to further education. The further education sector itself is already battling with cuts, has had to make very significant savings in this year's budget and, like other parts of the public sector, is looking ahead with great concern to what may be happening in the future.

We need to get our priorities right. I am very clear that we have to invest in skills across a very broad front if we are to truly transform the economy. Quite sadly, we are going in the opposite direction: we are defunding our colleges and universities. We cannot simply say that, if cutbacks are happening at universities, we will put more resources into further education. That is just not realistic. We have to make do with what we have at present and deliver things more efficiently and effectively and, at the same time, make the case for more resources through future years' budget allocations.

Catering College, Portrush: Derelict Land

3. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline his Department's plans for the area of derelict land that was formerly the catering college in Portrush. (AQO 9029/11-16)

Dr Farry: This site is owned by the Ulster University. In July 2009, the university advised that the site was surplus to requirements and that planning permission for residential use had been obtained. It was proposed that the site be offered for sale at an appropriate time, with all the proceeds being reinvested in the university's core business. The university has advised me that the position has not changed.

Mr McQuillan: Could a portion of this site be used for a new site for Mill Strand Integrated Primary School? It is in desperate need of a site in that area, and there is no green space at all apart from that site.

Dr Farry: At a personal level, I would be more than happy to see the school get new premises. Ultimately, those are conversations to be had between the Education Authority and the university. I am sure that, not least on the back of the comments made by the Member, those conversations can take place.

Mr Ó hOisín: Like others, I would support the relocation of Mill Strand Integrated Primary School, although I do not believe that that site would necessarily be its first choice. If that is not to be, the Minister will be aware that, with the Open coming up in 2019, there will be demand for hotel accommodation. Perhaps he would agree that that might be a consideration.

Dr Farry: I am happy to concur with the Member that, again, that may well be a useful way to look at the future of the site. I should stress that these are not matters for me or the Department: this is for the university to take forward. Again, I am sure that the university will pick up the comments that have been made by the Member and continue efforts to explore a more productive use for the site than the current situation.

European Social Fund: Difficulties

4. Mr Weir asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on how he is resolving funding difficulties in relation to groups involved in the European social fund. (AQO 9030/11-16)

Dr Farry: My Department is continuing to process final claims from projects that were originally funded as part of the European social fund (ESF) between 2007 and 2013. The majority of organisations have now received full payment under the programme. My Department has brought on board additional staff to further assist this process and to ensure that it is completed as soon as possible. I am pleased to report that 66 projects under the 2014-2020 programme are now fully up and running. Many of the projects have been operational since April, while some other EU-funded programmes from the 2014-2020 funding round, here and in other parts of the UK, have yet to initiate their application processes.

In order to ease cash flow issues for the new projects, I have agreed to my Department's implementing an interim measure whereby 50% of the ESF and DEL contribution in unpaid claims is paid now and vouched later. Applying this process has alleviated the initial financial pressures that the projects have experienced, whilst work continues apace to ensure that all claims are fully vouched in line with audit requirements. In tandem with this, the Department has brought further staff into the ESF managing authority on a temporary basis in order to assist with the vouching of all claims.

I am confident that this combination of short-term measures has gone a significant way to addressing the backlog of claims and will soon bring the managing authority to a position whereby it can efficiently vouch each individual claim as and when it arrives.

3.00 pm

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for his response so far. Will he outline what further meetings he intends to have with groups that are still impacted by the problems with ESF funding?

Dr Farry: At this stage, I am open to groups that wish to get in touch with me and ask for meetings, and we will look to facilitate those. Obviously, my officials will have ongoing interaction with them, and the managing authority meets groups to discuss problems. There is a range of avenues through which we have ongoing dialogue with the groups that benefit from the European social fund.

Mr Swann: Will the Minister update the House on the two judicial reviews being taken against the Department on the European social fund?

Dr Farry: Strictly speaking, those judicial reviews are not yet at the point at which they are being taken against the Department. That remains to be seen over the coming weeks. We will, obviously, defend our position in the event of any challenge. I am certainly confident about the procedures that have been deployed by my Department and officials over the incoming 2014-20 period, although we are always happy to learn lessons about how things can be done better. We are in the hands of the process, but I stress to the Member that it remains to be seen whether, in practice, anything will transpire.

Mrs McKevitt: Are any outstanding moneys for the groups still there? You said that the approach was that you were paying now and the groups would apply later, but are there still moneys for ongoing programmes that groups have applied for and not received?

Dr Farry: There are two processes in play. One is the closure of the outgoing 2007-2013 period. The Member will know that we put measures in place at the beginning of July to accelerate the closure of that programme, and good progress has been made. We are down to the final outstanding payments, and, hopefully, those will be cleared up before the end of this calendar year. The second process is the flow of resource to projects in the incoming programme between 2014 and 2020. As I set out in the main answer, we have put in place a process of accelerated payments in the form of a 50% contribution towards unpaid claims: in effect, we pay now and vouch later, and we are happy to do that at our risk. That is a fairly low-risk approach for us to take. Hopefully, that delay in the system will work itself out over the coming months, and we will be back on a level playing field and addressing claims as they come in.

Ms Lo: What impact is the ESF having on communities across Northern Ireland?

Dr Farry: It is important to recognise that — I made this point in the main answer — we have the European social fund for 2014-20 up and running. We managed that without any break in coverage, albeit that it was rather tight at the end of March into the beginning of April. The timescales provided to us by the European Commission for the clearance of our operational programme meant a very tight turnaround. It is worth noting that we are well ahead of many other parts of the European Union in having our European social fund up and running. Certainly, we stand in a good place compared with the situation elsewhere in the UK.

Of course, the European social fund itself makes a massive contribution to the provision of skills and to bringing people closer to the labour market across Northern Ireland. I am pleased that we have 66 projects up and running. We have a commitment over the next three years whereby in excess of €110 million is due to be spent on what we do to support the community and voluntary sector and to support others, particularly those who are most marginalised from the labour market and from those skills, in improving their life opportunities.

Ulster University: Irish Language

5. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of how the closure of full-time Irish language classes at Ulster University in Belfast will affect the revival of the Irish language in Belfast. (AQO 9031/11-16)

7. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the rationale behind the termination of the full-time Irish BA degree at Ulster University in Belfast. (AQO 9033/11-16)

Dr Farry: Mr Speaker, with your permission, I wish to group questions 5 and 7. As a result of the budget cuts to my Department, Ulster University has sought to rationalise its course offerings across campuses, which has resulted in the decision to close some courses and to consolidate others. This includes the consolidation of Irish courses at the Magee campus. A bachelor's degree in Irish language and literature will continue to be offered at the Belfast campus as a part-time study option. The university has advised that, in making these decisions, a number of factors have been taken into consideration, including student demand, attrition rates, student satisfaction, employment statistics and research performance. Consolidation of teaching provision across all campuses will facilitate budgetary savings without impacting on the quality of teaching, which remains paramount.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that Belfast's reputation as the Irish language capital of Ireland has been built on the phenomenal foundation of Ulster University in York Street? Does he accept that it is a blow to the city and its reputation for this course to have been ended?

Dr Farry: It is important to clarify that the course has not been ended: the university has sought to consolidate its full-time provision in the Irish language at the Magee campus in Derry. Without wishing to intrude on internal Sinn Féin politics, I was under the impression that people were keen to see the expansion of the university at Magee and certainly to build up Magee's impact in taking forward a number of courses. Obviously, Magee is not that far from Belfast, and, as we expect students to travel to Magee for a range of other courses, particularly as courses are consolidated, the provision for Irish language should not be any different. It would be nice, of course, to have a situation in which the full-time provision was available in Belfast and Derry, and the Member will be fully aware of the context in which the decisions have been taken: cuts to the higher education budget. In the context of an improved situation, I hope that the university's approach could be reconsidered, and we could see the restoration of some full-time provision in Irish language in Belfast. As we look to the development of a Gaeltacht quarter in Belfast, for example, a certain logic and synergy could be developed. I certainly would not be disparaging about the fact that course provision is going to Derry, and I encourage the Member to recognise the difficult decisions that the university has been taking and the fact that it has, in the main, preserved Irish language provision overall.

Mr Poots: Is it not the case, Minister, that your Department has had to deal with severe cuts in its funding, not least because £10 million a month of fines were being paid back to Westminster as a result of the failure to implement the Stormont House Agreement and welfare reform? This is a consequence. The cuts to Irish language budgets and Irish language at universities are a direct consequence of Sinn Féin's actions in ensuring that those fines are sent to Westminster instead of being spent on universities?

Dr Farry: I concur with the Member in the main: we are in a very serious situation with our public finances. We need to have much more financial responsibility, and that starts with a resolution of the situation on welfare reform and the cessation of money leaking out of Northern Ireland through welfare fines. Obviously, there have been serious consequences for our higher education provision. It is worth stressing again that Irish language provision has escaped the axe. We have seen a consolidation of provision in Derry rather than having it split between Belfast and Derry. People should take some comfort from that, particularly those who are Irish language enthusiasts, because the university has sought to preserve what has happened. Across the board, consolidation means that less money is spent on overheads, which allows the university to do more to maximise the number of student places that are retained in what is otherwise a very serious situation in which places are being lost.

Mr B McCrea: Minister, given that Ulster University receives 40% of its funding from your Department and a significant amount of the balance from student loans, which also have a government bias, is it appropriate that you should be more directive in telling the universities what studies they should deliver and on which campus?

Dr Farry: No, I do not. I think that we need to show a degree of caution in how government seeks to micromanage what happens in universities, the education sector, hospitals, the health service, museums, sporting organisations and arts organisations. We have to have a pluralist society in this country. We have to respect the fact that we employ professionals and recognise that civil servants and Ministers are there to take broad-based decisions on policy and resources. In doing so, we have to recognise that we have, whether it is NDPBs in other situations or universities, formally autonomous bodies. We have to trust those who are professionally qualified to take the decisions on how best to use scarce resources and to invest in courses that are relevant to the future of our economy and which have an impact on the further development of our society.

Special Educational Needs: Post-19 Provision

6. Mr Moutray asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the progress made on post-19 special educational needs provision. (AQO 9032/11-16)

Dr Farry: My Department is committed to ensuring that anyone over 19 years of age with learning difficulties or disabilities, and who can benefit from available provision, can avail themselves of the opportunities on offer. The offer includes a range of education, skills and employment provision such as Training for Success, apprenticeships, further and higher education, programmes funded through the European social fund, careers guidance and employment support services.

In addition to the current provision, I recently initiated a number of strategic approaches that, cumulatively, will enhance our provision for those who are post-19 and deliver improved support and services. Those include the outworking of the review of careers support; the implementation of the new youth training strategy, Generating our Success; the further education strategy; an employment and skills strategy for people with disabilities; the delivery of a wide range of support services under the new European social fund programme; and the new economic inactivity strategy. Those initiatives will put in place additional and improved provision that young people with learning difficulties or disabilities can access to achieve their education, skills and employment goals.

Furthermore, my Department chairs a cross-departmental group that has been considering current gaps in provision and opportunities for making improvements to services for young people with severe learning difficulties or disabilities who are making the transition from school to adult services. The work of that group has resulted in a transitions action plan, which sets out a range of proposed actions across government that aims to deliver improved support for people post-19 with severe learning disabilities.

The action plan, which was agreed in May 2015, will be monitored by the Bamford interdepartmental senior officials group, which will report to the ministerial group. My Department will be responsible for collating the necessary information and updates from relevant lead Departments in order to assess progress.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response. He will be aware, no doubt, of the angst that often comes to families of children with special needs when they turn 19 and have to leave their special school. Has he consulted schools such as Ceara in Lurgan and Donard in Banbridge, both in my Upper Bann constituency, on issues like that?

Dr Farry: First of all, I identify with the sentiment that the Member outlined — the real difficulties and fears that families experience in the transition from special school to adult services. Going from that certainty to a very uncertain situation has often been described to me as feeling like you are walking off a cliff. It is in that context that we have this action plan in place to better advise on the services available across a range of provision, whether in the Department of Health or in my Department through the further education sector and employment opportunities. There are often gaps between what Departments can offer. It is important that we use the strategy and the action plan to try to close those gaps. Obviously, the Department of Education is an important partner in that regard. I have not personally had a discussion with the schools that the Member refers to. It is the Department of Education's responsibility to engage with them and to reflect their experiences and concerns to the Civil Service group and the ministerial group as we try to take forward the action plan. Proper signposting to the available services and identifying and trying to overcome the gaps will be critical aspects of the work that we take forward.

Mrs Dobson: What assurances can the Minister give that the reduction in college places will not adversely affect young people with special educational needs entering further education and those already progressing in community and off-campus provision? Minister, you are aware of the particular concerns in my constituency of Upper Bann.

3.15 pm

Dr Farry: We have sought to protect those places in the cuts that have been made to the further education sector this year. That is my intention as we look to further years as well, because I recognise the importance of the provision and how families rely on that.

It is also important to recognise that, during my term in office, we have had a 50% increase in resources available through the additional support fund for students in further education. That commitment also remains very much in place.

We are also taking forward the public consultation on a new employment strategy for people with disabilities. Again, that is a fresh commitment that we are making. We are privileged to have support from a whole range of community and voluntary sectors, particularly those that are funded through the European social fund, who will be our partners in the delivery of that strategy once it is formally agreed in the new year.

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Construction Sector: Employee Gaps

T1. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what action his Department has taken to address the employee gaps in the construction sector. (AQT 3091/11-16)

Dr Farry: First of all, we work very closely with the construction employers, and the Construction Industry Training Board is a non-departmental public body of my Department. The Member will also be aware that we are taking forward new strategies for apprenticeships and youth training. We are working towards a sectoral partnership for the construction sector, whereby it can identify its very particular training requirements and work in partnership with the colleges and other training providers around the creation of a refreshed curriculum for what is required to ensure that the sector can continue to flourish in Northern Ireland.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answer. I was recently at a meeting with Helm Housing in Rathcoole housing estate, looking at a new development there, and some of the issues that were brought up were around social clauses and apprenticeships. They had been working with Northern Regional College to try to address some of those issues, and they found that quite problematic. I just want to ask for your assessment of the further education colleges' placements in construction sites. How good has that been to date, and how can that be improved upon?

Dr Farry: The Member will be aware that we are moving from the outgoing system of Training for Success and previously programme-led apprenticeships, which may be at the heart of the tensions that have existed in finding placements because that has not always gone as smoothly as has been the hope in the past. Under the new systems, that situation should be improved because we are going to see a much stronger focus on employer-led advice on where particular training is required rather than the sector guessing where it is.

I am conscious, however, that our situation in Northern Ireland is turning around, and we are now seeing that with people expressing concerns about the future pipeline of talent. We are committed to working very closely with the FE colleges. We have a very strong track record of what they do to support construction. In some ways, that is exemplified by the stunning success that Northern Ireland has had in skill competitions and, most recently, WorldSkills. To put that in context, Northern Ireland managed to achieve 40% of the entire UK medals in WorldSkills in São Paulo in Brazil in August this year. Gary Doyle, who was a former student of the Southern Regional College, won the gold medal and is essentially now the world's best plumber. That is a great accolade, and it really shows the real effort that colleges are making in investing in construction skills that we are achieving that level of success.

Academic and Professional Qualifications: Fermanagh and South Tyrone

T2. Ms McGahan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning whether he is aware of the startling figures in her constituency that state that almost 42% of those people aged 16 and over who live in Fivemiletown have no academic or professional qualifications, with similar figures for neighbouring areas stating that the figure in Clogher is almost 40%; in Aghnacloy, it is almost 37%; and, in Ballygawley, it is almost 35%; and, if he is not aware, will he give these alarmingly high figures his attention. (AQT 3092/11-16)

Dr Farry: I agree with the Member that those figures are alarming, but I regret to say that they will be reflected in many other parts of Northern Ireland as well. We do have some major issues with underachievement in our education system, and we have historic problems with those who have low or no qualifications. That is why it is so important that we are investing across a very broad front of educational opportunities and training opportunities. There is a role for the Department of Education, for which the Member's colleague is the Minister, and my Department obviously has a role to play. It is important that we have a joined-up strategy that bridges the two Departments; seamless progression between school and training opportunities, including the new system of youth training and apprenticeships, and through to further education and higher education; and early warning of those who are likely to leave school without any formal qualifications so that we are able to put in place measures to try to capture them and to see what other techniques we can deploy to try to ensure that they get on the first rung of the ladder of skills and qualifications.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr Roy Beggs. Sorry, I call Ms McGahan for a supplementary. I beg your pardon.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his response and commend him on his efforts to tackle the skills deficit in the North. What measures and actions can he take immediately, in improving prospects for those local people and providing support, to deal with this alarming problem in a rural area, where proximity to services appears to be the problem?

Dr Farry: We can offer some limited support through transport to further education, depending upon people's personal situation, through application to their local college, which will be South West College in the case of the areas that the Member mentioned. Ultimately, this requires resources, and the more resources that we have, the more we are able to invest in those types of interventions. For example, we have a NEETs strategy, Pathways to Success, for which there is no effective budget. That budget essentially expired at the end of March 2015. I had hoped that it would have been renewed in different circumstances, but it was one of the first things that was dropped when the Executive were trying to wrestle with balancing their budget. We also have an economic inactivity strategy, which was agreed by the Executive in April this year, and, again, that has not been commenced because of the absence of resources. We essentially have two strategies sitting on the shelf at present that we could activate if we had the resources. Those would directly benefit the Member's constituents in the circumstances that she mentions.

Manufacturing: Skilled Craftsmen and Women

T3. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how he and his Department proactively monitor the demand for skilled craftsmen and women, such as fitters and welders, in order to maintain current demand and meet future demand in the manufacturing industry, given that, last week, we learned that private sector employment is increasing in every sector in Northern Ireland except for manufacturing. (AQT 3093/11-16)

Dr Farry: I chair a working group for engineering and advanced manufacturing, which brings together business organisations, our colleges, our universities and a representative sample of employers. We have an action plan that examines the different skills requirements, and we seek to update that on a regular basis. There is a strong pipeline of skills. There is obviously more that we need to do in that regard, but opportunities also depend upon the underlying economic climate in Northern Ireland, and that, in turn, is affected by what is happening in the wider global economy.

It is a difficult and challenging time for manufacturing. Obviously, we have heard some very difficult and troubling announcements in recent weeks and, indeed, over the past couple of years, but it is important that we continue to talk about the underlying strength of manufacturing in Northern Ireland and the fact that we have a critical number of world-class businesses that really are making major contributions and are exporting beyond Northern Ireland to other markets.

Mr Beggs: Last week, my colleague Robin Swann and me visited Larne Skills Development and learned of its remarkable 96% success rate in moving trainees into full-time employment by working closely with private sector companies in meeting their needs. One issue raised with us was the demographics among the welding community. In the next 10 years, a high proportion of welders will be approaching retirement age. How are those demographics being addressed? Will the Minister ensure that we do not reach a situation where there are vacancies for key skills where gainful employment could be had and that the skills will be developed to meet the needs of industry?

Dr Farry: The further education sector can respond to requirements from employers and where there are gaps. This week, we are launching Northern Ireland's first skills barometer, which takes down to a more granular level where we see pressure points emerging in our economy. That advice will be there to help policymakers, and those in charge of resources, so that they can use them more efficiently and effectively, as well as advising those making career decisions.

We invested in welding academies at Belfast Metropolitan College and the Northern Regional College, particularly to ensure that Harland and Wolff has a stream of people skilled in the welding required for oil rigs, which is a highly skilled and lucrative occupation.

Steps 2 Success: Voluntary or Mandatory

T4. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning, given that, although his understanding following consideration at Committee was that Steps 2 Success was a purely voluntary scheme for participants, it has subsequently transpired that it is mandatory for people aged 18 to 24 after nine months and for people aged 25 and over after 12 months, for an indication of when that policy decision was taken or was that the purpose of Steps 2 Success all along. (AQT 3094/11-16)

Dr Farry: I am not sure at what stage the Member was under the impression that this would be a purely voluntary process; that was never the undertaking given by me or my officials at any stage in the development of Steps 2 Success. Steps 2 Success is a fresh programme that replaced Steps to Work. That process of referral to Steps to Work was in place long before Steps 2 Success was considered.

Steps 2 Success seeks to learn positive lessons from Steps to Work. It also took on board the implications of how work programmes were taken forward elsewhere in the UK. That allows us to have a very Northern Ireland-orientated system that meets our circumstances and has a more focused approach to the needs of the individual and ensures that everyone is assisted in their search for work.

However, I am puzzled as to why the Member ever thought that participation in this programme was ever purely voluntary.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for his answer, but he will establish me in puzzlement later. Does the Minister believe that Steps 2 Success is a worthwhile programme? There have been 21,000 participants until June 2015, but only 1,500 did so voluntarily. That is less than 9% and at a total cost of £14 million to your Department. Will the Minister tell us whether he thinks it is a worthwhile scheme or whether his Department is merely implementing a lightened version of the work programme that has been so ridiculed in England?

Dr Farry: The Member will be aware that there is a degree of conditionality with jobseeker's allowance. That is out of our hands, so it is important that we respond where people are in long-term unemployment.

If we do not have a programme in place, we have a vacuum in the offering made by my Department, or any successor Department, in addressing the long-term unemployed. We sought to ensure that what we put in place met the circumstances of Northern Ireland. That is one of the attractions and benefits of devolution.

If we had not had devolution, we would have had in place in Northern Ireland the same Great Britain Work Programme that Scotland and Wales have, given that employment matters are not devolved in those contexts. In putting in place our own programme, we sought to be much more sympathetic to the direct needs of our own economy and to ensure that we treat everyone as an individual and understand their particular requirements in investing in skills and trying to avail themselves of employment opportunities.

3.30 pm

It is important that we try to help people out of unemployment. It is not a situation that they want to be in, and it is not a situation that is good for our society. I have met very few people who actively want to be unemployed. People are not moving into Steps 2 Success with any sense of compulsion. It is technically mandatory, but it is seen as an opportunity for people to try to transform their lives.

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Donaldson Report

Mr Speaker: Mr Jim Allister has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Mr Allister: Why did the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety choose to outline his policies on an issue as important as the outcome of the Donaldson report at a conference in Ballymena rather than making an oral statement in the House?

Mr Speaker: I have been advised that, unfortunately, the Minister is unavailable to respond to the question at this time. I have written to the Minister expressing my disappointment. This, I believe, is one of the key and most important strategic decisions that has been taken by any of our Ministers, and I am very anxious to facilitate Members in questioning the Minister. Consequently, I am going to move this question to the same spot tomorrow, 24 hours from now. I am sure that the Minister is anxious to discuss this matter with Members and the House, so we will move it to this time tomorrow.

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. As I understand Standing Orders, they require notice of such a question to be given by 10.30 am to allow the Minister a four-hour window to arrange to be here. This is a Minister who has been in this Building today and who I wanted to question as to the contempt that he showed for the House in making a key policy announcement outside the House and avoiding the questioning of it within the House. Then, we are told that he compounds that contempt by simply saying, it seems, that he is too busy to be here. Is that not a serious challenge to the authority of the House?

Mr Speaker: I have to say that that sounded more like a statement than a point of order. The criteria for eligibility for urgent oral questions does not include either the requirement or the foreknowledge that the Minister will be available. I understand, and I suppose others understand, that there is another engagement nearby that urgently requires the attention of Ministers, but I noted the attendance of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and both junior Ministers at Question Time. I think that I have taken a reasonable approach. We will, hopefully, be able to deal with this matter in an appropriate fashion this time tomorrow. Let us move on.

Mr McKinney: On a point of order, Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: Is it a separate point of order?

Mr McKinney: It is related.

Mr Speaker: No, I do not want to take any further discussion on this. I have made my decision, and I think that that is sufficient for now. There will be an opportunity to discuss it tomorrow. Let us move on.

Committee Business

Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill: Extension of Committee Stage

Mr Moutray (The Chairperson of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 26 January 2016, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill [NIA 62/11-16].

As provided for in Standing Order 33(1), on 12 October 2015, the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill was referred to the AERC for Committee Stage. The Committee was asked to consider and report to the Assembly no later than 30 November 2015. The Bill contains nine parts, 24 clauses and a schedule, which sets out 10 areas that may, subject to the approval of the Assembly, be included in an Assembly and Executive reform motion. The purpose of the Bill is to provide for the formation of an Assembly opposition, with certain rights and benefits, and, in the words of the Bill itself, "to promote constitutional change" and "reform the Executive."

It goes without saying that any Bill that seeks to change the constitutional arrangements of the Assembly merits careful consideration. At its meeting on 13 October, the Assembly and Executive Review Committee agreed to issue a call for evidence to invite interested parties to submit their views on the Bill. The Committee considered an extension to the Bill's Committee Stage necessary in order to give stakeholders adequate time to respond and to enable the Committee to reflect on the evidence received.

The Committee believes that, to do justice to the Bill and the matters that must be considered, additional time is required before reporting to the Assembly. To date, the Committee has heard oral evidence from legislative experts and leading academics, and the call for evidence is due to close tomorrow. Further oral evidence sessions are planned for the weeks ahead. The Committee therefore asks that, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 26 January 2016 for the Committee Stage of the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 26 January 2016, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill [NIA 62/11-16].

Private Members' Business

Ballymurphy 1971

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Ms McCorley: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Secretary of State to join the Irish Government in supporting the proposed investigation into the events in Ballymurphy in 1971, when 11 civilians were killed, to be conducted on the same basis as the Hillsborough football stadium investigation and jointly funded by the two Governments.

Éirim inniu leis an rún seo a mholadh, agus tá mé lán-sásta é a dhéanamh. I am very content to move the motion, which is very important for the families of the Ballymurphy massacre victims.

Tá sé 44 bliain ón Samhradh 1971 nuair a chuaigh Arm na Breataine ag dúnmharú daoine ar feadh trí lá i mí Lúnasa. Forty-four years ago, in the summer of 1971, in the month of August, the British Army went on a three-day killing spree. Throughout the greater Ballymurphy area, it wreaked havoc on the streets, and, at the end of those three days, 11 people lay dead and lives were changed forever. Those who died were Father Hugh Mullan, Francis Quinn, Daniel Teggart, Joan Connolly, Joseph Murphy, Noel Phillips, Edward Doherty, John Laverty, Joseph Corr and John McKerr. Paddy McCarthy died later after a heart attack, as a result of being put through a mock execution by members of a British Army foot patrol. Mar thoradh, chaill 57 páiste tuismitheoir agus scriosadh teaghlaigh. As a result, 57 children lost a parent and families were devastated. Indeed, the whole community of greater Ballymurphy was traumatised by this mass murder.

For over four decades, the families of those who were killed have been tirelessly campaigning to find out the truth of what happened over those three days, who was responsible and what decisions were taken that led to the murders of their loved ones. Those efforts have been consistently thwarted, with closed doors at every turn. Notwithstanding that, however, a robust body of evidence has been gathered over the years by the families that points to the clear fact that all those people were innocent victims, unlawfully killed, and that the actions represent a breach of article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights. As Pádraig Ó Muirigh, the families' solicitor, stated:

"The case raises serious questions regarding human rights abuses committed by the British Army and of a culture of impunity in the north of Ireland in which members of the security forces routinely were above the law."

In the immediate aftermath of the atrocity, the GOC of the British Army and the Chief Constable of the RUC jointly decided that the Royal Military Police would carry out an investigation, and a very poor and shallow investigation it turned out to be. There was no probing or searching for the truth, no attempt to challenge the inconsistencies in soldiers' statements and no place given to the eyewitness accounts of local people whose evidence refuted that of the soldiers. Significantly, no investigation was carried out by the police force at the time: the RUC. At the original inquest in 1972, vital evidence was withheld from the coroner, and the statements accepted from soldiers were riddled with inconsistencies. Those statements were just accepted without question. There has been a total failure to bring about adequate inquests in the cases. Mar sin de, fágadh teaghlaigh dhúnmharú Bhaile Uí Mhurchú ar an trá bhán, mar a bheadh Oisín i ndiaidh na Féinne iontu agus an doras druidte os a gcomhair. The families of the Ballymurphy massacre were left distraught and bereft, and the door closed before them.

After many years of campaigning, the families produced overwhelming new evidence and witness statements, which resulted in the Attorney General for the North of Ireland directing the coroner to reopen the inquest in 2011. Four years on, however, no inquest has taken place due to the failure of the MoD and the PSNI to fulfil their legal requirements to assist the inquest. Níl aon mhuinín ag na teaghlaigh go rachaidh seo áit ar bith. The families remain very sceptical that this avenue will lead anywhere. The whole issue of legacy inquests cries out for fundamental reform, and, as we know, this is part of the current negotiations, which as yet are incomplete.

Ms J McCann: I thank the Member for giving way. Does she agree that families such as those who lost loved ones in the Ballymurphy massacre in 1971 are entitled to maximum disclosure and that the British Government are protecting the people responsible for that murder and the people in the British state who knew about it? In a sense, they are still covering up what happened by refusing the families an inquiry. That is why it is important that the Stormont House Agreement mechanisms are brought forward in such a way as to give the maximum disclosure that the families are entitled to.

Ms McCorley: I agree with everything that the Member said. There needs to be a very robust outcome to the legacy issue in the Stormont House Agreement.

Tá an rud atá na teaghlaigh a iarraidh simplí agus díreach. The families' demands are simple and straightforward. They want an independent panel to be set up to give in-depth oversight of all the documentation on the causes, context and consequences of the Ballymurphy killings in August 1971. The seven-person panel must have the trust and confidence of the families. The documentation must include evidence on the part played by the British Government, the British Army, the RUC, the DPP and the coroner's office. A report must be published informing the public of the comprehensive detail of everything that happened. This is a necessary process that must also include simultaneous consultation with the bereaved families, at the end of which each family should have a separate confidential report on the panel's findings on the death of their loved one. Finally, on costs, it should be made clear that what is sought here is not a Saville-type investigation, as carried out into Bloody Sunday; what is proposed is time-bound work, similar to the investigation of the Hillsborough tragedy, lasting between 12 and 18 months. The British and Irish Governments should share the costs arising from the panel's work.

In the last number of weeks, Janet Donnelly succeeded in having her father's body exhumed, and it is now being scrutinised for evidence by two forensic experts. Joseph Murphy's family said from the start that they believed that he was shot, into his open wounds, at a military barracks after being injured and that a bullet may still be lodged in his leg. Initial evidence from the exhumation certainly seems to suggest that there was indeed a second bullet. Rather than being treated for his injuries at the time, Joseph Murphy was beaten and then shot again.

To add to their pain and loss, Joseph's family, along with the other Ballymurphy families, have had to endure rejection, insults and closed doors from British agencies for asking for the truth about what happened to their loved ones. More recently, Secretary of State Theresa Villiers rejected their proposal for an investigatory panel to be set up. She said that she was very moved by their pain and loss but did not feel that the public interest would be served by establishing an independent review. Secretary of State, I beg to differ, as do the Ballymurphy families. Níl ciall ar bith le do fhocail do dhaoine atá ag iarraidh na firinne. Your words mean nothing to people who seek the truth.

3.45 pm

It is heartening to see the response from the Irish Government in recent times. Taoiseach Enda Kenny also expressed his disappointment at Theresa Villiers's failure to appoint a Hillsborough-style panel. He visited Ballymurphy earlier this year and listened to personal accounts of what happened from bereaved family members. He told them that he supported their case and undertook to raise it with David Cameron. We call on the British Government to do the decent thing and join the Irish Government to help bring forward the truth of what happened in August 1971.

“‘Truth’ is a small word, but a daunting concept.” — so said Professor Phil Scraton, who was central to the campaign for truth after the Hillsborough disaster, which eventually succeeded in uncovering all of the truth of what happened on that terrible day in 1989. The families in Ballymurphy who lost their loved ones in 1971 are just as entitled to their truth. The 11 people who were brutally done to death on their own streets by the British Army will never regain the lives that they should have had, and those they left behind can only imagine the richness of the lives they should have shared. Tá sé ceart agus cóir go mbeidh a lá firinne acu faoi dheireadh. It is only right and just that they should finally have their day of truth.

Mr Craig: Ballymurphy in 1971 was one in a long list of events in Northern Ireland that created a long list of victims, victims of a war of terrorism that was waged in the Province. It was one horrific event in a long list of horrific events in the history of Northern Ireland. It was, unfortunately, neither unique nor the worst to take place in the Province.

I have listened with interest, and I have absolutely no doubt that the victims and the families who are left want to hear the truth of what actually occurred in that unique piece of our history. It is something that I certainly have sympathy with and understanding of. This was not the only event to take place where no one has been brought to account and where we had major breaches of article 2 — the right to life — in the Province. My family suffered from that in the bombing of Newry police station, when eight police officers were bombed to pieces and there was nothing left. No one was ever brought to book. No investigation ever uncovered what happened there. The truth is out there, and there are those on the opposite Benches here today who, I suspect, know something of the truth of that situation but refuse to bring it forward. There is hypocrisy on all sides about these things.

Will we get satisfaction for the families? I have severe doubts. Will yet another inquiry bring any closure for them? I have my doubts, because I have looked at what happened with the Bloody Sunday inquiry, where millions upon millions of pounds of taxpayers' money was spent that could have been used elsewhere. Is one person any more satisfied now than they were when that event occurred? I doubt it. I think that we are all reinforced in our opinions, no matter what they are, of what happened in that event and, unfortunately, I do not think that it will bring truth in this case.

We have all seen the demise of the Historical Enquiries Team (HET), and I can understand the families' frustration about that. Looking at the whole Coroners' Court situation in Northern Ireland and at what is happening in the ombudsman's office, I do not think that anyone in the Chamber believes that any of that will bring satisfaction to the families. It is grinding to a halt under its own pressures. We have a historic situation in Northern Ireland that, unfortunately for all of us, all the victims who sit around the Chamber, we will see no satisfaction from. We need a comprehensive way forward on the whole issue of historical inquiries.

I thought we had come close to achieving something that would bring that about in the HIU and the whole Stormont agreement at Christmas. Unfortunately, that has been delayed. I live in hope as a victim, and I hope that others live in hope as victims, that we will find a way forward in treating and dealing with the past in this Province, but I do not believe for one second that taking any one issue from the past in Northern Ireland and dealing with it separately and uniquely moves that situation forward. We need a comprehensive way of looking at the past. That is hopefully what we are going to get with the HIU. I think where that family needs to look with hope is towards the HIU and how we can move all those situations forward, but not take them as one. Northern Ireland is full of victims, many of whom sit on these Benches.

Mr Attwood: I apologise for the fact that, when I finish my remarks, I have to leave to go elsewhere in the Stormont estate to deal with some of the issues that Mr Craig has just touched on. Apologies to the House and anybody else in the Building for the fact that I cannot stay and hear what is a very important and welcome debate.

First of all, as is always the point of reference when it comes to issues of victims and survivors, I acknowledge the victims and survivors, not least the Ballymurphy massacre families, but many other individual families, groups of families and communities. It is because of their resilience and dignity that, even as I speak, people are continuing to interrogate how the issue of the past should be addressed and, hopefully, addressed in a comprehensive and ethical way.

I do not know if I have said it in the Chamber before, but, at the Haass/O'Sullivan talks, in the early hours of New Year's Eve, Richard Haass said to me that it was the impact upon him and on Meghan O'Sullivan of the voices of victims and survivors that moved him from a position, in September, around the first plenary meeting of those negotiations, where he was not of a full open mind when it came to dealing with the issues of the past, to one where he proposed a variation on Eames/Bradley when it came to dealing with the past. That was because of the voices of victims and survivors and the impact, intellectually and emotionally, that they had on him and her. That is because of the dignity, resilience, courage and dedication of families like the Ballymurphy massacre families in refusing to have anything other than an acknowledgement of truth and accountability, and, hard though it may be to secure, justice as well. I want to first acknowledge the families.

Mr Bell asked a fair question. Why should people support this group of families in the call for an independent review and investigation of the circumstances of the murders of their family members? The answer actually comes from Eames/Bradley, because, without breaking the confidence of Eames/Bradley, there are people in that process who, when they met the families of the Ballymurphy massacre, said that not only was their message and experience compelling but that it was of such a scale that the denial of justice, truth and accountability to the families was of such enormity that, if there was ever to be another public inquiry into an event from the past, that might be one such case. That is not, in any way, to diminish the equal right of any victim or survivor to have justice, truth and accountability in the circumstances that they face. However, consistent with that principle, which is common to all, people in and around Eames/Bradley saw in this issue a need to respond in a discrete way over and above what might be the mechanisms to deal with truth and justice that are being negotiated.

It is very timely that we have the debate today. Not only is the shadow of Ballymurphy over the Chamber, it is over the negotiations that are ongoing not far away from here. The shadow of all the past is across all the negotiations that are ongoing as we speak. If, on the far side of two, three, four or whatever number of days it takes to conclude those negotiations, any party or Government is on the wrong side of the right standards of justice, truth and accountability, it is not only the families in Ballymurphy who will have been let down. Families across Northern Ireland will say that, if we could not do it with Eames/Bradley —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Attwood: — Haass/O'Sullivan, Stormont House 1 or Stormont House 2, it is an indictment on Governments and politicians that they should, once again, so gravely let down victims and survivors in their search for truth, accountability and justice.

Mr Nesbitt: My primary objective is trying to get through my speech without causing offence. I have met members of the Ballymurphy families on a number of occasions, and there can be no doubting the impact that that day had on their lives. For them, the Troubles are not history; they are a living legacy that they endure daily.

I heard Mr Craig talking about closure. For victims, there is no such thing as closure this side of the grave. There is a weight and burden that will be carried daily. The challenge for the House is to take steps that might, to some degree, lighten that load between now and the inevitable.

What we do at the moment through a series of processes is incomplete and imperfect. It is also imbalanced, in that any objective analysis would say that the focus tends to be more on the state and state agents than on the paramilitary organisations. Victims, of course, have had a huge range of experiences, from the 14 who died on Bloody Sunday, into which there has been not one but two public inquiries and an expenditure of hundreds of millions of pounds, to the many relatives of the over 1,000 dead who still wait for something. Since the HET was wound up, there has been nothing for that huge number of people who, like the Ballymurphy families, seek truth, justice, acknowledgement and information.

We have to accept that getting truth and justice is just one of the needs of victims and survivors. Another need for many is simply an acknowledgement that something happened that should not have happened. Reconciliation must challenge us in the House. Do we have a common definition of what reconciliation means at a time when the range of opinion offered by politicians is stark? One political leader can talk of an event and say that it was unjustified and unjustifiable, while another says that he is proud of what he did during the Troubles, would do it all again and would not take a step back from the activities that we acknowledge as terrorism.

Over the last two years, the main parties have given considerable thought and effort to a better, more balanced way forward in dealing with the past. In proposing the motion, Ms McCorley said that legacy inquests are crying out for reform.

Well, right from the Haass/O'Sullivan talks, the Ulster Unionist Party said, "Yes, you were right about that. Let's get them into the historical investigation unit". Sinn Féin did not support us in that call.

4.00 pm

Jennifer McCann criticised the British Government and the authorities for not divulging information that she says they possess: we can all play that game. Think back to the Saville inquiry and the evidence of Martin McGuinness: asked about others who, like him, were members of the Provisional IRA in Londonderry at the time of Bloody Sunday, he said that he had a code, had taken an oath and would not divulge that information "under any circumstances". Everybody is withholding information, republicans and loyalists equally.

What we are doing really serves nobody's best interests. I hope that we can find a better and fairer way forward over the next number of days elsewhere on this estate. It is with regret, bearing in mind the impact on the Ballymurphy families of what happened in the early 1970s, that it is my position that the Ulster Unionist Party cannot support the motion. For us, it is time to stop the piecemeal approach.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. From the outset, I pay tribute to the Ballymurphy massacre families. They have pursued their quest for truth with incredible stamina and determination. They have been steadfast and relentless in their campaign to have the truth told to the world about the events in Ballymurphy in August 1971, when 11 people lost their lives. It is important to state that, despite their great loss and the disgraceful way that they have been treated by the British state, the families have at all times conducted themselves with great dignity, and their campaign has been characterised by a complete absence of bitterness.

The narrative of the families' campaign is as follows. Over three days — 9, 10 and 11 August 1971 — more than 600 British paratroopers entered Ballymurphy and shot dead, on those three days, eight civilians. Another two were fatally injured and died subsequently of their wounds, and an eleventh person, Pat McCarthy, died of a heart attack after being subjected to a mock execution by the paratroopers. On 9 August, Frank Quinn was shot and killed when he went to assist Father Hugh Mullan, who had been shot in the back while administering the last rites to another injured man. Frank was shot in the back of the head. Noel Phillips was shot and wounded in a field opposite the Henry Taggart military base. On hearing his cries for help, Joan Connolly, a mother of eight, went to his aid. She was shot in the face and lay wounded in the field. When the shooting stopped, Daniel Teggart lay dead, having been shot 14 times.

Joan Connolly cried out for help for many hours and eventually bled to death. An eminent A&E consultant said that had she been brought to hospital she would most likely have survived. British soldiers entered the field where Noel Phillips lay injured and, according to eyewitnesses, shot him twice in the head. Joseph Murphy, who had been wounded, was taken to the Henry Taggart base, where he was brutalised and shot again in the wound that he had received earlier. Joseph Murphy died 13 days later in hospital. On 10 August, Eddie Doherty was shot in the back on the Whiterock Road and died a short time later. On 11 August, John Laverty, who was 20, was shot and killed. Joseph Corr, a father of six, was also shot and died of his injuries 16 days later. John McKerr, a carpenter and father of eight, was carrying out repair work on Corpus Christi Church when he was shot in the head and died outside the church.

People will say that this case is like every other case: the victims are not going to get justice. The difference between this and other cases is that no investigation was carried out. The slaughter took place at the time of the infamous tea and sandwiches agreement between the Chief Constable of the RUC and the commander of British armed forces in the North, whereby the Royal Military Police would investigate any fatal shootings by military personnel. We know that the statements that were taken by the military police contained many contradictions and inaccuracies and were later contradicted by civilian witnesses. At the time, no statements were taken from civilian witnesses. What is also important in this case is that the same regiment, only a matter of months later, was deployed on the streets of Derry on Bloody Sunday. If something had been done after the Ballymurphy massacre, we might never have had Bloody Sunday in Derry and the downward spiral that followed the events of that day.

What are the families asking for? What they are asking for is quite reasonable. The British Government have said there will be no more public inquiries that cost a fortune to the public purse, so the families took up that challenge. They went away with their legal advisers and Professor Phil Scraton from Queen's University and devised a model based on the inquiry into the Hillsborough tragedy that would have a minimal cost and perhaps bring truth to the families. The British Government have rejected that.

Mr Speaker: Thank you.

Mr Sheehan: I call for the truth to be brought out and brought out now.

Mr Allister: It is no part of my purpose or intent to diminish or demean suffering by any family, be they connected with this Ballymurphy matter or anything else. Let me be very clear: anyone who was not involved in criminality and died as a result of a criminal act against them is an innocent victim, as are their families, and they are entitled to be regarded as such.

I suppose that the biggest difficulty with the selectivity of the motion is that many in the community that I know best will say, "Where's the inquiry into La Mon? Where's the inquiry into Kingsmills? Where are the inquiries into a litany of such incidents?". We have already had over £200 million spent on the Bloody Sunday inquiry, and the Ballymurphy incidents are to be investigated through an inquest process. Yet, for many who were the victims of terrorists, there have been no such investigations and no such inquiries.

Of course, what happened in Ballymurphy transpired in an operation just a few days after the notorious Bloody Friday events. Of those, we are yet to hear the truth. We have yet to hear who and from what part of the city masterminded Bloody Friday. We have yet to hear the truth from those who know the truth and, with great calculated determination, conspire to conceal the truth. The demands that come selectively for inquiries such as this would be so much stronger if in all cases — this is not a generalisation at all of the Ballymurphy families — some of those who advocate them were themselves not victim makers and were, instead, truth tellers. Therein is part of the problem. It is the proportionality of the demand that creates difficulty for some of us.

I find it rather surprising that the motion calls on the two Governments, as they are referred to, to jointly fund any investigation. What happened at Ballymurphy, whatever the details, happened in the United Kingdom. If there are matters to be investigated, and if that were thought to be the appropriate course, it is a matter for the United Kingdom authorities, not for some third party to be involved in the funding of any investigation. I quibble over that part of the proposal.

My fundamental message is this: consider the imbalance, disproportionality and lack of investigation into a litany of terrorist episodes as horrendous as any by an organisation that some have recently suggested has its own malevolent influence in government. The sparsity and the lack of investigation on that side of things and the repeated demand for investigation at whatever cost in respect of this matter speaks so loudly to some of us that that proportionality and imbalance is something that we cannot endorse.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the motion. I commend the proposers, and I know that Trevor Lunn will make a winding-up speech on it. Rosie McCorley and Pat Sheehan laid out in very detailed terms the incident that took place in Ballymurphy in August 1971. Our party has pledged its support to the families in their search for the truth. I say with a degree of confidence that, although many doors have been closed to them over many years, most people would say that, because of the quiet and dignified manner in which they have approached it, a door will eventually open and they will get their request. Apart from the fact that the British state was responsible for killing their loved ones, a big part of their demand in searching for the truth is that they were failed by the state in terms of investigation.

Irrespective of what the incident is, people should make their judgements on the merit of the case put forward by the families, not on side arguments or other flawed arguments. We have seen a combination today. The Bloody Sunday inquiry is often used. I heard Mike Nesbitt saying that there were two inquiries. There were two inquiries because the first one was so flawed that it was unbelievable. Other people talked about the cost. Again, the cost of the inquiry could have been avoided if people had faced up to their responsibilities and told the truth in the first instance.

The Ballymurphy families have realised that perhaps some part of public opinion might think that some of the inquiries are open-ended and therefore cost too much. The fact is that they have put forward the Hillsborough stadium model as the way forward. I think that most people who watched the Hillsborough incident accept that families got to the truth and that it was done in a more time-bound way and that there was less cost as a result.

The second aspect of the proposition is that other cases have not been investigated or have not been investigated properly. If that is the case, Members are entitled, as are these families, to bring the case to public opinion, seek political support and seek redress. That is what should be done. You cannot say to some person, "Yes, you have the merit for a particular course of action, but we can't support it simply because, in other instances, other people haven't made the case". That is not only a poor but a flawed argument.

Importantly — Pat Sheehan referred to this — one of the things that came out during the Saville inquiry was the arrangement between the British military police and the RUC around investigations, which was that the military police were charged with conducting investigations into all killings carried out by the British Army at that time. Subsequently, a very senior figure within the judiciary here in the North of Ireland said that he found that questionable and dubious. Indeed, he went on to say that he could find no legal basis for that arrangement. That instance alone, and the breaching of article 2, showed beyond any shadow of a doubt that the investigations were improper. So, on that ground alone, the Ballymurphy families deserve an inquiry. It is only through that that we will see that there was not only a poor or improper investigation and an arrangement between the British Army and the British military police, but —

4.15 pm

Mr Dallat: I thank the Member for giving way. Does the Member agree that while this dark cloud hangs over Northern Ireland, we are limited in the progress that we can make in the peace process, which we are all involved in, and in the extent to which we are one community speaking with one voice and putting the past behind it?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McCartney: Absolutely. Members have referred to the processes that are in place, and people are trying to conclude on that this week. There is absolutely no doubt that those families who are seeking the truth will not be put off or deterred. In my opinion, they should be supported. Certainly, we have the responsibility to ensure that all matters relating to the truth are ventilated and that people are given proper recourse. The Ballymurphy families are an excellent example. From the outset, they have asked for nothing more and, certainly, they deserve nothing less, than the truth. People have tried to say, "This is going to be Saville mark II", and I have heard people say that Saville did not achieve anything. It is wrong to say that. A British Prime Minister had to stand up and say that what happened was unjustified and unjustifiable, so at least one person changed their mind.

The families deserve support. It is crucial to note that there are many unanswered questions on the nature of the investigation, the subsequent closing of doors and the holding back of evidence at the inquest. Members have outlined their opinion on the motion, as it is framed. They have all said that there was something grievously wrong, that some great hurt was visited upon these families and that they deserve the truth. Members should support the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Lunn: I thank everybody who has contributed today, including those who, evidently, will not agree with me, because we needed to hear from all sides in a debate like this. As others have done, I acknowledge the families, some of whom are with us today, for their dignity and persistence in the matter.

I do not see this as an occasion to vilify the army. It is tempting, and others have succumbed to the temptation. I want to talk about the call for a specific form of inquiry to deal with a particular circumstance involving state forces. It has a lot of merit. That sort of inquiry would be a review of the available evidence. There is a lot of it, and it comes from all sides. It needs a team with the forensic skills of Phil Scraton and his team, which were demonstrated through the Hillsborough inquiry, to run some of it to earth and to try to establish the facts. Some of the facts are not contested. The evidence comes largely from such official sources as witness statements, soldier statements, autopsy reports and hospital reports. It is all there; it is available for any of you to look at.

On the dates in question, there was certainly a riotous situation in Ballymurphy and in areas across west and north Belfast and other parts of the country. It was the day following the night on which internment was brought in, and feelings were running high in those areas. There was certainly gunfire from different sources — republican and loyalist — in the area, and the army was trying to control a very difficult situation as best it could. The real question is this: were any of the 11 people who were killed on the day or died of their wounds a few days later a threat to the army? That is the question.

There was gunfire directed at the army, but there does not appear, on the face of it, to be any evidence that it came from any of the people who were shot.

You could look at some of the individual situations. I think that the first person to be shot was a gentleman called Bobby Clarke. He is still alive. He has made a statement and can make a further statement. He was the man whom Father Hugh Mullan went to comfort, anoint or give the last rites in the Catholic tradition. The evidence appears to be that Father Mullan was waving some sort of white cloth. He attended to Bobby Clarke. He went to get some further help, at which point he was shot. This is evidence taken from autopsy reports. He appears to have fallen to a kneeling position, at which point he was shot again and killed.

A gentleman called Frank Quinn tried to go to his aid, as others said. Mr Sheehan mentioned all the names, as did Ms McCorley. He was shot dead. All this happened — it is not contested — on open ground. If people were shooting at the army, they certainly were not shooting at them from an area of waste ground where they would have been completely exposed. It just does not sound right. No firearms were recovered from any of these people. There is no evidence of firearm residue on any of them. It is not me saying that or some republican source; it is the autopsy reports. That is the official version. Joan Connolly, a married woman of about 45, was shot at the same time. She was shot three times. She was shot, and, as she tried to recover and get back to her home or get help, she was shot again. This is not contested. Danny Teggart, whose son John is with us today, was also shot on open ground. He was shot 13 times. The army operated under rules of engagement. Even then, they had to fire only at identified targets who were a threat to them personally; in other words, a petrol bomber or somebody with a gun. Yet all those people were shot over three days.

Members mentioned others. The case of Joseph Murphy is interesting. The allegation has been around for a long time that he was not only shot and wounded but abused back in the army barracks and that perhaps another bullet was put into him. I do not have the evidence for that, but there is evidence because his body has just been exhumed and there is, in fact, another bullet lodged in it. Maybe that is correct as well. John McKerr was mentioned as well. He was a carpenter. He was doing some work to the Corpus Christi chapel in preparation for a funeral. He finished it and was walking away from the chapel when he was shot dead. He was shot in the head. This is not contested. It is in the records.

All this happened 44 years ago. It happened in the same month as I was married, two weeks later. The bereaved relatives have had to carry the weight of this grief for 44 years. While people like me and others of my generation have grown through the period and raised families and grandchildren, these people have had to live with the weight of this grief. We now have an opportunity to agree to try to get the British Government to agree to a particular sort of inquiry that is very cost-effective, as has been proved by the Hillsborough inquiry. It works, it is effective, and it does not have to interfere with the coronial process. In fact, the Hillsborough inquiry fed the coronial process. It was used as very useful evidence.

There are no, evidently anyway, national security issues here; there are no handlers or informers to protect. The MoD, as part of the coronial process, so far as it has gone, has said that it is having difficulty in tracing particular soldiers — any soldiers — who might have been on the ground on that day. I find it, frankly, absurd that ex-soldiers cannot be traced. They have not gone to ground; they are not hiding. They are receiving pensions from the Government, and the MoD says that it cannot trace them. That is ridiculous.

The range of available evidence is very wide. There is the MoD, the RUC and the HET inquiry, which went nowhere. The Catholic Church has a major dossier on all of this.

There are civilian witness statements, hospital records, autopsy records and the national archives in Kew and Dublin. I could go on, but I will make my main point before I finish.

It may surprise some people that I am standing here making this plea. I am sure that I am the only one wearing a poppy who is making this plea, but there is a reason for that: I want to be proud of our army. I wear this poppy with pride, and I wear it to commemorate and acknowledge the sacrifice that the army has made over the years in theatres of war. This was not a theatre of war. If the army has misbehaved in these circumstances, it needs to be able to acknowledge it. It happened on Bloody Sunday, which, Mr Sheehan rightly said, need never have happened, had this been properly investigated. I want to continue to regard the army with pride, and it needs to cooperate if such an inquiry can be put together. The British Government, if needs be — I think they do — need to be able to man up and acknowledge that something went dreadfully wrong on this occasion.

I ask the House to support the motion. I ask the DUP and the Ulster Unionists, perhaps, not to oppose it. There is no loss of face in this; you have to acknowledge that something is wrong here. I will leave it at that, Mr Speaker.

Speaker's Business

Mr Speaker: Before commencing business today, I want to bring a matter to the House's attention. Members will be aware that the Assembly and Executive Review Committee is gathering evidence for its inquiry into the Assembly and Executive Reform Bill. I will be submitting evidence on a range of matters in relation to the House's procedure, and I will put that evidence in the Library so that it is public for the information of all Members. However, the Bill also contains proposals in relation to the future election of the Speaker, so it is important for me to be clear that I have no self-interest in these proposals. I know that it is no secret to many Members, but I want to publicly put it on the record today that I will be stepping down as a Member of the Assembly at the end of this mandate. I will not, therefore, be seeking re-election as Speaker.

I turned 70 during the Hallowe'en recess, and I look forward to the opportunity of doing other things outside the Assembly. However, there will be plenty of time to be reflective at a later point, and I am making this announcement at this stage only to show proper courtesy to the House.

There is a lot of work in front of all of us in the next few months. There are a lot of issues that I still want to try to make progress on with not much time to do so. However, I am particularly focused on managing the heavy legislative workload that I am expecting to confront us in the months ahead. That will be challenging, and I will speak to the Business Committee about it today. So, let us move on.

Shared Education Bill: Second Stage

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Shared Education Bill [NIA 66/11-16] be agreed.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I know that you have said that there will be future opportunity to reflect on your announcement this morning, but I wish you belated birthday greetings and wish you well in your retirement.

The case for shared education has been well established. There is an extensive body of international research regarding the effectiveness of school collaboration generally and in divided societies more particularly. That has been supplemented by specific local evidence, particularly a series of evaluations of pilot projects, which were supported by investment from the International Fund for Ireland.

Shared education provides the opportunity to raise educational standards and encourage and facilitate a culture of mutual understanding through ongoing and purposeful engagement in learning between children and young people from different community backgrounds. The access for learners to a wider choice of subjects, increasing access to specialist teaching and modern facilities and sharing of good practice, makes a compelling educational case. The statutory curriculum provides a core enabling framework to promote shared education through the development of the young person as an individual, as a contributor to society and as a contributor to the economy and environment.

Local evidence has shown that participation in shared education leads to an increase in self-confidence, self-awareness and self-reflection. Participants in high-quality shared education opportunities are more open to meeting others with differing perspectives and opinions and showed improved skills in problem-solving, decision-making and critical and creative thinking. All those skills are integral to the high-quality delivery of our curriculum. Equally, the opportunity afforded by shared education to make more effective and efficient use of facilities and resources provides a strong economic argument. My Bill seeks to realise those potential benefits offered through the collaborative, cross-community approach that shared education will provide.

In its report on shared and integrated education, which was published in July, the Education Committee accepted the need for a statutory definition for shared education.

In the subsequent debate on the report in September, the Assembly endorsed its recommendations. My Bill will put that into effect.

I will turn to the Bill itself. This is a short Bill that provides a legislative definition of shared education and places a power on the Department and its arm's-length bodies to encourage and facilitate shared education. The Bill will also enact the duty on the Education Authority to encourage, facilitate and promote shared education, as provided in the Education Act 2014. In its report on shared and integrated education, the Committee recommended that the statutory obligation to encourage, facilitate and promote shared education, as set out in the Education Act, should be extended to my Department and all its relevant arm's-length bodies. The Education Reform Order 1989 places a duty on my Department to encourage and facilitate the development of integrated education. It is my considered view that it would not be helpful to now place a duty on my Department that would include a requirement to additionally "promote" shared education without any similar requirement to promote integrated education or, indeed, Irish-medium education. I am also firmly of the view that a power rather than a duty is the best approach at this juncture.

Shared education is still a relatively new and evolving area, and good practice is still being developed. We need to accrue good practice learning before placing a legal obligation on our education system that entails mandatory action. A power gives the flexibility to encourage and build confidence within the education system and the wider community around the benefits of shared education and to remove doubts about perceived risks voiced by some who responded to my Department's consultation. It also avoids any risk of communities perceiving that shared education is being imposed on them rather than encouraging and facilitating communities to move at a pace that they find acceptable.

The Bill will be underpinned by Sharing Works, my policy for shared education, which was published on 16 September. Sharing Works expands on the legislative definition by providing a practical description of how shared education will work in practice. The description is based on that which was endorsed by the ministerial advisory group on advancing shared education, the establishment of which was a Programme for Government commitment. The policy contains a series of actions that my Department will take forward by way of encouraging and facilitating shared education. The actions are based on the recommendations of the ministerial advisory group.

The Bill will send a strong signal to the education sector and the wider community that shared education is now a key feature of our education system moving forward. The Bill and the policy have been subject to equality screening and public consultation. Both have been generally welcomed by stakeholders and provide an opportunity to build a more inclusive approach at a pace that communities are comfortable with and that does not threaten any particular sector. In conclusion, I recommend the Bill to Members and will carefully consider today's debate in moving my Bill forward.

Mr Weir (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): Thank you, Mr Speaker. I wish you well in your retirement. As part of the somewhat ageing class of '98, I think that you are one of the few Members in the Chamber who has reached the age of 70. I hope that I look as well when I am 70. I hope to actually reach the age of 70, but that is another bridge to be crossed.

The Committee has considered the Bill in considerable depth. It undertook, and recently reported on, an inquiry into shared and integrated education. A key recommendation of that report was that there should be a statutory obligation on the Department and its arm's-length bodies to encourage the participation of all schools in shared education, and I welcome the Bill in going some way to meeting that recommendation. I anticipate that Committee members will generally give a broad welcome to the Bill in principle and will want to take it through the Committee Stage in order to examine the need for amendments.

As the Minister indicated, the Bill is relatively short, so I expect that some of the examination will be to ensure that the detail is got right and to look at areas where there may be a concern that the Bill does not go far enough or perhaps leaves something out. However, those will be matters for Consideration Stage.

As the Minister said in his opening remarks, the Bill is the legislative underpinning for the Department's Sharing Works policy. That policy defines shared education as cross-sectoral, inclusive cooperation between educational providers, delivering educational benefits and promoting good relations. The definition of that policy goes a considerable way towards the Committee's recommendation on the definition of shared education. As the Bill is focused in that regard, it is not surprising that it provides less definition on the policy than the policy itself. That is to be expected.

However, the Bill does not make explicit reference to educational improvement, it does not emphasise the importance of shared education being based on curriculum-based activities, and it seems to restrict inclusion to Protestants and Catholics and to socio-economic deprivation. The Minister outlined his reasons for suggesting that: namely that the Bill gives the Department and others a power — not a duty — to encourage and facilitate shared education. I suspect that those are issues that the Committee will want to tease out at Consideration Stage.

I would like to deal with some of those issues. First, educational improvement. The Committee previously indicated that it strongly believed that the unique selling point of shared education was its focus on improving the educational attainment of participants. That was evidenced in programmes operated by the Centre for Shared Education and others. It was clearly critical to winning the trust and securing the participation of those who are a little wary of engagement with neighbouring communities or are a little suspicious of the motives of the Department of Education. I am sure that the Minister would say that those are ill-founded suspicions. Nevertheless, they appear. Therefore, the absence in the Bill of a direct reference to educational improvement is a little disconcerting.

Also absent is a linkage to supporting the curriculum. Witnesses to the inquiry felt that that lack of clarity allowed all sorts of activities to be questionably labelled as shared education. The witnesses argued that that served to debase the term and allowed detractors to dismiss it as a light touch and as supporting the status quo.

During our consideration of the Special Educational Needs and Disability (SEND) Bill, Members talked about the inclusion of a purposes clause in that Bill. A discussion on whether we need a purposes clause for shared education may resurface during Committee Stage. Such a change might provide a level of definition and certainty, without limiting schools' imagination in respect of shared education programmes.

I talked about what shared education is; it is just as important to know and talk about who is going to be doing shared education. The Bill mentions reasonable numbers of Protestant and Catholic children. When we had a pre-briefing on that by the Department, the purpose of that was to allow a level of flexibility. I suppose where we are always trying to strike a balance in these things is on the issue between flexibility and providing schools with a level of certainty. I suppose it will be interesting to obtain the views of the Minister on that. For example, if we are talking about reasonable numbers, how will that be interpreted, and can that mean, for example, that it can be provided for in sharing between schools in a single sector?

The Committee, during its inquiry, also felt that the relevant section 75 groups should be covered by shared education and that it should promote attitudinal improvement and meaningful contact between them. Again, we will want to see whether this will be covered directly by the Bill.

10.45 am

As I indicated, the Bill gives the Department and some arm's-length bodies — and I think that it is important that it does not focus purely on the Department but covers arm's-length bodies — powers and not duties. The Minister has explained why he believes that that should be the case, but we, as a Committee, wonder whether this sits a little inconsistently with the obligations on the Education Authority as set out in the Education Act 2014. Again, members may well want to look at that during the anticipated Committee Stage.

The Bill does not refer to measures of educational improvement associated with the shared education signature project. I suspect that this will be mentioned in today's debate. With your indulgence, Mr Speaker, I simply remind the House that the Education Committee supports the measurement and reporting of educational improvements associated with all shared education programmes. However, the Committee has repeatedly advised the Department:

“that given: the concerns previously expressed by the General Teaching Council NI in respect of the efficacy of LoPs; the very low levels of participation; and the ongoing related industrial action, it was both surprising and unwise for the Department” to make Levels of Progression part of the funding criteria for participation in the shared education signature programme. I know from correspondence with the Minister, at the levels of MLA and Committee member, that he is trying to resolve this and, indeed, is in discussions with the various teaching bodies and unions. However, we, as a Committee, are keen that some of the problems that have arisen there are not repeated when we pass this Bill.

In concluding my remarks as Chair in anticipation of the Committee Stage, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Department and our stakeholders. We have issued a call for evidence, so I suspect that the latter are busy drafting their responses and will submit those within a relatively short time frame. Given that we are close to the end of the mandate and that the Committee has dealt with this in a full report, I expect the Committee Stage to be short and rather intense. I appeal then to officials and stakeholders to be flexible as we consider this important legislation. It is the Committee's intention to do its job well and quickly. We see no desire to hold up the Bill, and we ask for everyone's cooperation in this task.

I will now make some remarks not as Chair of the Committee but as a DUP MLA. I give a broad welcome to the legislation. I have highlighted some areas where I would like to see some level of change. The legislation, by its nature, is not going to be perfect. To be fair, that is not necessarily a criticism of the legislation, because we have to recognise two things. First, legislation in and of itself will not do everything as regards shared education. A lot of work will have to happen on the ground that is not appropriate for legislation. Really, what we are looking for in legislation is a broad framework that aids what is happening. Secondly, it is also important to realise that there are many good shared education projects already happening. We are not starting simply with a blank page. We are looking to see a broadening and deepening of shared education. As such, we need to provide a framework for it and a facilitation of it; that would be helpful.

A number of benefits can accrue from shared education. The Minister has highlighted some of them, and I suspect that others will make reference to them in their speeches. There is a broader societal benefit. There is the commonly understood area of community relations of various sections of society working together, which I think that everyone would acknowledge is a benefit. There is also something else, and I think that it is important and right that the Bill makes direct reference to it. We often think of the community relations side of it as being purely between the two main sections of the community, but the emphasis in the Bill on socio-economic interaction is also very helpful.

I think that that will be of benefit to society as well. Also, and I concur with the Minister in this, it is not just about the broader, wider, societal benefits but the benefits to individual pupils who are involved in shared education. The widening of their experiences and the broadening of their confidence is something that will be helpful.

Secondly, I think that there is a broad educational benefit. That will come down to where we see the particular definitions in this. Undoubtedly, this should be a driver. While the focus will largely be on the societal benefits, I believe that cooperation between schools can be of benefit educationally and can help, for instance, pupils in one area to be linked in with another, and they can learn from each other's experiences. That should be an educational driver. It is right also that the legislation goes beyond schools and looks, for instance, at youth settings and indeed has the full panoply across that.

Also, it has been highlighted that — particularly when it comes to issues around IT and, perhaps, in the future, issues around personnel as well — in tight economic times, when we are trying to get the best possible value for everybody involved in the education system, sharing can lead to a higher level of efficiency in the system. We see sometimes, particularly with small schools, a movement at times to a situation of joint management of schools and sharing between principals of schools, which can be helpful as well. Whereas it is important that schools play a vital role in communities, that should not simply be used as a device to protect the existence of a school when that school is really unsustainable, but I think that there are efficiencies in the system that could be driven by shared education, and there are benefits to be had there.

The Bill itself is widely drawn in terms of what is meant by shared education. Mention has already been made of the socio-economic impact, and it is right that there should be flexibility, because there is a wide range of activities out there in shared education, which we should encourage. I welcome the fact that the focus is very much on the provider and the sectors, whether through the Department, the arm's-length bodies and the youth settings. I believe that that format looks to the main providers but gives space for schools to develop at their own pace and in their own way. There are models of shared education that will be of benefit. Here, we need to see a degree of balance. There is also a need to ensure that schools can move forward with clear understanding as well.

The representatives of the Department indicated to the Committee that they would judge things on a case-by-case basis, and, yes, there is a need for a level of flexibility. However, as I indicated when speaking as Chair, I expect that there will be suspicions within the sector. We do not want to see a situation where anyone at the Department of Education — given the timescale for this, it will probably not apply to the current Minister but to his successor or his officials — sees himself as playing the role of mighty Caesar in the gladiatorial arena, giving a thumbs up or thumbs down, at whim, to particular projects. Schools need a level of certainty.

Linked to that is the issue of educational benefits. It is important that we put at the heart of this an educational driver. If assessment is to be used as part of the process of measuring that, we must have widely and clearly agreed means of assessment that have the confidence of the wider sector. The experience that we had with the shared education signature projects is one that we want to avoid. I suspect that it will be highlighted in this debate that we have reached a situation where a differential approach is taken in different areas of Northern Ireland. Because of the advice they have had, some schools feel confident simply to plough ahead; others are, at the moment, without funding, because they are caught as schools in a degree of dispute between the teaching unions, on the one side, and the Department, on the other.

That is a situation we want to avoid. Moving ahead, this should be focused on clearly agreed methods of assessment.

It is also important that we take a curriculum-orientated — indeed, a whole-school — approach to shared education. Flexibility is important. It comes back to balance. Shared education and cooperation between schools will operate in slightly different ways. From the point of view of the DUP — I suspect that the Committee will take a similar view — we do not want that to be tokenistic in its nature. It is not simply a question of two schools ticking a box to receive a level of funding, but that it is very much curriculum-orientated. In doing that, as I said, we have to encompass the full range of possibilities.

There are a range of issues for us to look at, and I will come on to a final one in a moment, but it would be churlish of me not to admit that this Bill is a step in the right direction. It is good legislation. The role of the Committee will be to take what is good and debate the ways in which it can be further improved.

In conclusion, and I appreciate the position that the Minister has taken, I share the view expressed in the Committee report that we need to look at an obligation, particularly on the higher-level bodies, rather than simply a power. I think that the wording is a little bit weak in that regard, and that is something that we as a Committee will need to look at. I look forward to the Consideration Stage. I believe that this can improve our education system, improve the opportunities for all our children and improve Northern Ireland, but let us make sure that we get the best possible Bill. That will be the key challenge for the Committee in the few weeks ahead.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I start by paying tribute to you following your announcement this morning. Your leadership and vision in this place, both as an MLA and as Speaker, will be badly missed. I had the pleasure to serve with you when you were Assembly private secretary (APS) to the Minister of Education, and it was a thoroughly enjoyable role, but unfortunately I was not left on the Education Committee long enough to cause the Minister too many problems. That is the role of a Back-Bench MLA.

I welcome the opportunity to take part in the Second Stage debate on the Shared Education Bill. I start by acknowledging the very many solid examples of sharing and cooperation by many schools across many different sectors. It is only right that I commend the leadership of MLAs from all parties in this Chamber who, in their role as community leaders, have grasped the issue of shared education and promoted it, but also the small number of MLAs who, as parents of children participating in the shared education programme, have really taken the bull by the horns and engaged with their school communities, their peers and other parents to sell the benefits of the programme. It is good to see parents and MLAs from all sides doing that.

During the Committee inquiry into shared education, members of the Committee felt strongly that societal objectives were important and should extend beyond reconciliation of the two largest groups in our society in order to fully incorporate all section 75 groups. The Committee also felt that the statutory objective to encourage, facilitate and promote shared education should be extended to the Department and arm's-length bodies, and with that in mind I welcome the proposals contained in the Shared Education Bill.

The clear intent of the Bill is to provide a legislative definition of shared education, which is missing from legislation at the minute. There is a lot of talk about shared education, but there is not really any great understanding of what it means. A legislative definition of shared education will be very welcome.

The Bill will confer a power on the Department and its arm's-length bodies to both encourage and facilitate shared education, and it sets in train when the legislation will kick in. The legislation and policy is underpinned by the whole notion of Sharing Works, which is a policy for shared education. The four clauses of the Bill are quite self-explanatory, and anyone who is interested in reading them can, or probably already has.

One of the recommendations from the Committee inquiry that I would like to give some consideration to deals with the whole issue of measurement. Recommendation 6 of the inquiry stated that:

“the Department should give consideration to a wide range of agreed, objective impact measures ... based on educational improvement ... and societal reconciliation progress ... should be published regularly by the Department.”

I am keen to hear from the Minister, either today or at a later stage, as to how that will be advanced.

11.00 am

As Members know, the county of Fermanagh has played a leading role in the development of the shared education programme and in rolling it out across the county so that people from Fermanagh, from all sections of our community, have had the chance to engage. My daughter, who is in P2, participates in the shared education programme in St Mary's Primary School in Tempo with Tempo Primary School, which is a controlled school. She thoroughly enjoys it, primarily because she went to a cross-community preschool — the only one in the village. She made a number of friends there who were not from a Catholic background and who now attend the controlled primary school. When she went into P1 and the shared education programme was brought to the school for the first afternoon, I saw such joy in that child's face when I came home. She was able to tell me that she had met her young friends whom she had not seen since preschool.

It is good that the programme is in place to allow children to make new friendships with people from a different background and also to keep existing friendships going. All too often, we hear stories of people from different generations who really did not engage or make friends with people from another background. I am talking about people from a Catholic tradition, a Protestant tradition and neither, who do not get to engage with people from another community until much later in life, whether in the workplace or at university. The shared education programme, and the concept of providing our children with the opportunity to engage in shared education, is a good opportunity to give them.

I commend the leadership shown by the Fermanagh Trust, which is one of the key organisations behind the shared education programme, and its trustees and staff, as well as the school communities in Fermanagh and across the North that have embraced this concept. The principals, staff and boards of governors of those schools have shown tremendous leadership for their communities in articulating what the benefits of shared education could mean for our society. This is much bigger than any individual child, family or school community; this is about trying to build a better future for all our young people. The leadership shown by the organisations involved in developing and rolling out shared education, as well as by the parents and school communities that have embraced it, has given us all an insight into how popular this area is and how much demand exists, so it is only right and proper that we see legislation being brought forward to enhance it further.

It is also important to reflect on the success of the shared education programme in Fermanagh, in the sense that it is not just cross-community but cross-border. A number of the maintained schools along the border corridor regularly engage and share with minority Protestant schools on the other side of the border. Protestant schools from the South come up to engage with children from a Catholic background in the North, which is tremendous, because not only do we have a problem in the North with children from both backgrounds not engaging with each other but we have a serious problem with neighbours from Fermanagh and Leitrim or Fermanagh and Donegal not engaging. The shared education programme in Fermanagh has also helped to break down those barriers.

In engaging with parents, teachers and school leaders across Fermanagh, it is easy to see the empirical evidence of the benefits of shared education in how it helps our children to develop, to broaden their minds and to know that their identity is not the only one. There is no one identity here that is more right or more justified than the other. All of us come from different backgrounds and mentalities, and it is important that we allow young people, at an early age, to establish that there are other people out there who hold different views. That is one of the key benefits of the shared education programme, and it also helps to break down community relations and tensions between communities.

We do not have peace walls in Fermanagh. We do not live cheek by jowl with people from the other community. In Fermanagh, by and large, there are whole villages made up of more than 95% of one or other section of the community. Take the village of Kesh, which is predominantly Protestant or unionist, and then take a village such as Rosslea, which is, on the other hand, more than 95% nationalist.

We do not have the same situation as in Belfast, where they have peace walls between our two communities. We have completely divided our society, and people live in different places. That is the way it is done. There is not necessarily anything wrong with it, but in how we break down the barriers and get our people to engage with it, it is widely accepted that we need to start at an early age and get people mixing from other backgrounds at as early an age as possible. That is why the shared education programme has been hugely successful.

I think we would all agree that, if we were starting with a blank canvas, we would not put in place the systems and mechanisms that we have for providing education today, but this is a step in the right direction. It is good to see the Assembly coming together to give statutory bodies the legislative power to facilitate and encourage shared education, but it is not about competing, and it is not contrary to the views of those who articulate a vision for integrated education. Not all of our citizens are at a place where they want to see integrated education yet. Many people in our society do, and several opinion polls indicate the support that exists for it, but there are some within our society who are not there yet. The provision of an option of shared education to those people will highlight the benefits that moving to such a system can bring. It is complementary to the whole notion of integrated education, which grows year on year, but the concept of shared education is growing as well, and it is something that we should encourage.

I will express some concern about what I see as the entrenched positions of the former education and library boards and CCMS. The Minister announced his plans to carry out the area planning process in September 2012 or 2013 — I cannot remember which year it was. It is clear to see, when you look through the reports that were generated, that there was not enough joint planning done. CCMS went and did its plan and the education and library board did its plan, but there was no effort made to join those two things together, despite the fact that, in many communities, there was a strong desire for joint planning to take place to provide the best possible education for our young people in a joint approach. The statutory bodies were somewhat behind.

I recognise that we are conferring a power to encourage and facilitate shared education on the Education Authority, the Department, the library boards and a couple of other organisations, but I just wonder whether that mindset remains within the higher echelons of those organisations, and how we as an Assembly and a society can challenge those mindsets and try to get the people who are in leadership positions in those organisations to take the views of people in society and actually move ahead with joint area planning, as was requested or mandated of them by the Minister of Education.

In conclusion, it is clear to see that our young people benefit educationally, personally and intellectually from engaging with people from another community or another background. There is an onus on us as an Assembly to do all that we can to facilitate, encourage and promote that. I think the Bill is an excellent first step. I hope that it passes. I am sure it will; it seems to have cross-party support and is something that all MLAs have spoken positively about in the past. I wish members of the Committee well as they strive to carry out the Committee Stage that will follow. I will keep a close eye on the Bill.

Mr Rogers: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate on the Second Stage of the Bill. The SDLP is broadly supportive of the Bill. Our schools need to move more and more towards models of sharing — sharing expertise, resources, facilities and educational experiences.

It is clear for the SDLP that principles of shared education must be firmly embedded in the curriculum. It is about more than schools coming together for an annual sports tournament or a walk up the Mourne. Shared education must be deep, meaningful and sustained. Clause 2 of the Bill is particularly important in that regard. Shared education can be delivered in many forms. It can range from large-scale projects at Lisanelly to the sharing of particular resources within specific classes. It remains the case that it would not be feasible to establish projects like Lisanelly all across the North. It takes a substantial amount of money and a high threshold of local agreement. We must be realistic if we want shared education to work. We must work within our constraints. There are constraints such as rural isolation, and there are financial constraints as well.

There are many smarter ways that we can achieve meaningful sharing in classrooms. The sharing of IT infrastructure already exists within schools in Northern Ireland. I am somewhat disappointed that the Department has not really taken on board the definition of shared education that the Committee agreed, which was:

“curriculum-based interactions that always foreground educational improvement and involve children and young people in sustained whole school/organisation activities across ... educational phases while making optimal use of ... IT infrastructure.”

From the Department's response at the Committee last week, it is clear that it has ICT as an optional tool for schools to use. Given the huge investment by the Department in C2k and projects that have used ICT for inter-school links like, for example, Dissolving Boundaries, which proved how effective blended contact is, using ICT as an option is wasteful of shared public resources and is likely to mean that schools in rural areas will have difficulties in finding partners that they can work effectively with. Schools should be required to show how they plan to use ICT, not whether they intend to use it. That is important for schools that are close geographically as well as those that are far further apart.

I think of the Dissolving Boundaries project and go back to my background; it is probably nearly 20 years since we were involved in that project. I remember sitting in a history lesson — it was very appropriate for the time of year — in which children from a school in Kilkeel were working with children in Taunton in Somerset on a World War I project, and the children in Taunton talked about their grandparents in the trenches. That shows how ICT can bring the sharing of education alive — not just even on a Northern Ireland basis but across our island and across Europe.

The Department has referred to supporting shared education in initial teacher education. It is not clear who will provide the funding for that or how that process will be managed. Maybe that can be addressed.

We talk about ICT as an essential tool in shared education. The assessment of ICT will become statutory in 2016-17. That will include the use of ICT for exchange — using ICT to exchange ideas and information with others, such as partner schools. As a former teacher, and knowing how teachers work, I feel that we have a better chance of these projects coming together and working well in the classroom when shared education can work along with the requirements of ICT assessment and when teachers become more motivated by it and tuned into it.

Children will benefit when they learn the same subject together, not in different rooms of the same building. In that way, shared education that is embedded in the curriculum can be delivered without creating super-school structures. Furthermore, I welcome the Shared Education Bill as I hope that it will help the Department to become strategic in relation to the delivery of shared education. A number of schools that have engaged in real sharing of resources have had funding cut as a result of an apparent link to the Key Stage assessment. That is entirely counterproductive and will make the transition to shared education much more difficult.

Clause 3 of the Bill puts a statutory obligation on the Education Authority to promote education. That should benefit the strategic delivery of shared education. I suppose that when we talk about shared education, we have to think about the mutual benefits of shared education. First and foremost, it is about addressing educational underachievement and ensuring that children achieve their potential. It is about children benefiting from learning together and embracing religious and cultural diversity. In turn, society will benefit from that.

It would be remiss of me if I did not acknowledge the great work that goes on in shared education at the moment. I think of the integrated sector and Shimna Integrated College in my constituency — the work that goes on in that school, and also the outreach work that it does with primary schools.

11.15 am

Other schools, such as my old school St Louis working with Kilkeel High and schools that have a really good mix across their school population, schools such as St Columbanus in Bangor, Down High and Strabane Academy. I could go on and on.

We had a presentation from Cross and Passion and from Ballycastle in County Antrim. The one that I have been associated with for a long time is Limavady learning partnership. However, thinking of those two in particular, part of their success has been in the culture in the schools and their geographical proximity, which helps as well.

When I talk about sharing, I think about taking it that bit further to staff sharing their expertise and professional development. We can use ICT as a great tool again there. If you are to do professional development and you teach in Kilkeel or Belcoo, it is a long trip to Belfast for that professional development, so we can use ICT and so on to deliver these things online. Beyond that, we must share business and schools to ensure that our schools are tuned in to what the business world requires and understands what our schools are like.

However, it remains the case that the vast majority of children in the primary and post-primary sectors attend single-denomination schools. So we need to broaden the debate not just to sharing between Protestant and Catholic but to all section 75 groups. The SDLP envisages that sharing education will lead to more diverse opportunities for our schools, children, teachers and for senior leadership in our schools. Shared education is a priority for society here. That can be delivered only by promoting a culture of mutual understanding of society here through a purposeful shared curriculum in Northern Ireland.

There are many opportunities in shared education that I have only touched on. The Bill offers a first step.

Mrs Overend: We have before us the much-anticipated, long-awaited Shared Education Bill. Comprising four clauses that fit onto an A4 piece of paper, the Bill is nothing if not concise. It is not, however, visionary. It is minimalist legislation that certainly does not set out a road map for a Utopian shared future in education.

It should perhaps not come as a surprise that the Shared Education Bill is short. Last December, when the Committee was holding its inquiry into shared and integrated education, we had an interesting evidence session with the centre for shared education at Queen's University. The centre argued that the lack of coordinated policy or clear definition of shared education has created a policy vacuum that allows it to be labelled as "light touch" and supportive of the status quo. It was noted that this also affects the depth of meaningful activity and limits the potential of shared education to effect lasting systemic change.

The centre called for legislation that will provide a consensus on the definition of shared education. So, almost a year down the track, the question is this: does the definition of shared education in the Bill and the policy that underpins it provide us with a working and workable definition that commands widespread support?

I know that the definition is also a concern for other Education Committee members, as the issue was raised by many of them during our recent briefing on the Bill. At Second Stage, it is worth looking at the evolution of the definition of shared education. I hope that Members will bear with me, but I feel that it is important to look at the various definitions. The Bain report of December 2006 described shared education as a cross-sectoral approach to education, where:

"children grow up to feel comfortable in their own uniqueness and comfortable with difference. For that to happen, they need to be able to work together and 'play' together so that eventually, they can assume a shared responsibility for their future."

The definition of shared education used by Queen's University's centre for shared education is:

"Shared education is broadly defined as any collaborative activity within or between schools or other educational institutions that can: contribute towards school improvement, provide access to opportunity, encourage more effective use of resources, and promote social cohesion"

The definition that the ministerial advisory group was asked to use in 2012 involved the organisation and delivery of education so that it:

"Meets the needs of, and provides for the education together of, learners from all Section 75 categories and socio-economic status; involves schools and other education providers of differing ownership, sectoral identity and ethos, management type or governance arrangements; and Delivers educational benefits to learners, promotes the efficient and effective use of resources, and promotes equality of opportunity, good relations, equality of identity, respect for diversity and community cohesion."

The Sharing Works policy was published on 1 December this year. It states:

"Shared Education is described as the organisation and delivery of education so that it: meets the needs of, and provides for the education together of learners from all Section 75 categories and socio-economic status; involves schools and other education providers of differing ownership, sectoral identity and ethos, management type or governance arrangements; and delivers educational benefits to learners, promotes the efficient and effective use of resources, and promotes inclusion in terms of equality of opportunity, good relations, equality of identity, respect for diversity and community cohesion."

Specifically, Shared Education involves the sustained provision of opportunities for children and young people from different community, as well as social and economic, backgrounds to learn together.

It is expected that Shared Education will be organised and delivered in such a way that promotes equality of opportunity and social inclusion by providing opportunities for children from differing Section 75 groups (e.g. children from different religious backgrounds, children from different racial backgrounds, children with and without disabilities, children who are carers or school age mothers) and from differing socioeconomic backgrounds to learn together at school and in less formal education."

From all that, we have a boiled-down definition in the Bill. Clause 1(2) states:

"Shared education" means the education together of—

(a) those of different religious belief, including reasonable numbers of both Protestant and Roman Catholic children or young persons; and

(b) those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation and those who are not,

which is secured by the working together and co-operation of two or more relevant providers."

I feel that the Assembly needs clarity on why the Department has gone for such a short definition.

The explanatory and financial memorandum of the Bill states that funding has been committed to support the implementation of shared education up to June 2018. The Minister says that funding will be mainstreamed after that and for the longer term. In the past, when short-term funded programmes that focused on community relations ended, so did the schemes.

In the Sharing Works policy, the Department is committed to increasing the percentage of pupils to 80% within four years. To put it mildly, this is ambitious and will place huge logistical demands on schools. Option 4 in the shared education business plan estimates that scaling up would cost £44 million. As legislators, we have a duty to seriously question the wisdom of spending the £44 million that it is estimated it would take to expand sharing between segregated sectors at a time when basic maintenance in schools is being neglected and special needs teaching is being squeezed.

It seems to me that the basic problem is that we have not even begun to tackle the lack of consensus on where we want to go as a society. Perhaps that lack of consensus is the reason why we have such a minimalist and unambitious Bill in front of us today. We have seen some very good work undertaken in the area of shared education over the past decade. Since the phrase first emerged in the Bain report of December 2006, there has been extensive academic research carried out in the School of Education at Queen's. Commitments were inserted into the Programme for Government and the ministerial advisory group reported in 2012.

We have the shared education campuses programme being rolled out. We have also had the recently published report from the Education Committee on shared and integrated education and the recent publication of 'Sharing Works: A Policy for Shared Education' from the Department of Education.

One would have thought that, with all that activity, the political class in the Assembly would have come to some sort of understanding on the issue and on the way forward. However, go back to 27 January this year and reread the adjournment debate on St Mary's teacher training college. An objective reviewer of that debate could only come up with one conclusion: that the overriding priority in education for the two nationalist parties in the Assembly is the protection of the Catholic maintained sector, and that any sharing must not compromise the ethical purity of that sector and its distinctive religious and Irish identity. That is an absolutely valid and defensible position to take up; just do not, at the same time, come out with rhetoric about a shared future. It constantly amazes me to see the Minister at the Dispatch Box railing against the perceived evils of separating children by academic selection at the age of 11.

He has never shown the same concern about separating children at age five, never mind at age 11, on the basis of religious denomination. Suddenly, in that scenario, the concept of parental choice trumps everything else.

To continue on the same theme, if we are to have sharing in education, surely there should be no barriers to teachers from all community backgrounds and none taking up employment in any grant-aided publicly funded school in Northern Ireland. The fair employment exemption and the certificate are two obvious barriers. On 13 April this year, the Assembly debated an Ulster Unionist motion proposed by Danny Kinahan, who is now the MP for South Antrim, that stated:

"this Assembly notes the failure of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to repeal the exemption in fair employment law allowing discrimination on the grounds of religious belief in teacher appointments, as mandated by the motion Teachers: Employment Law, which was approved by the Assembly on 22 April 2013; recognises that the teacher exemption, as well as the continuing requirement for a certificate in religious education at nursery and primary level in the Catholic maintained sector, are unnecessary barriers to truly shared education; and calls on the First Minister and deputy First Minister to take action to remove these overt examples of inequality and discrimination." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 103, p206, col 2].

To remind Members, it was about the fact that, in 2015, the teaching profession is exempt from fair employment regulations here. Moreover, in the maintained sector, at nursery and primary level, schools can insist on applicants for teaching posts having a Catholic RE certificate. The Bill does not address those anomalies. The position of the Minister of Education is massively muddled on these issues. One minute, he says that he has written to OFMDFM on the certificate issue; the next, he says that he made a slip and that he actually wrote to it on the teacher exemption issue. Then he admits that he never wrote to it at all and just laughs the whole thing off.

In the debate on our motion on 13 April, nationalist MLAs lined up to defend the status quo. Mr Rogers of the SDLP said:

"Many parents want their children to be taught in a Catholic ethos". — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 103, p224, col 1].

He added:

"The religious education provided by our teachers is essential for the right foundation in life and the development of the Catholic ethos. Our primary-school teachers do not teach just religious education but the whole curriculum. The Catholic ethos permeates all aspects of the curriculum." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 103, p224, col 1].

Winding on that debate, I said:

"do we actually want a shared society and a shared future? That is something that everyone in the Assembly must ask themselves. If some want the perpetuation of inequality, segregation and a shared-out future, they should be honest and say so. Some recent debates in the House suggest that more than a few prefer the status quo; however, there can be no genuine shared education under the current circumstances. Without change, the shared education concept can never succeed. Unless schools have interchangeable staff, the whole project will not be balanced and, for practical reasons, will not work." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 103, p229, col 2].

I repeat that challenge today. Surely shared education cannot be simply about bussing children from one type of school to share, say, a physics GCSE class with children from another type of school in order to make up the numbers. Surely shared education cannot simply be about building a new school building to accommodate two schools, with the children entering the front door and half turning right and half turning left. It seems that, for some, sharing is to be undertaken only on their own terms and must not lead to a process of integration or a dilution of the ethos of their individual sector.

After the Bain review of 2006, the Catholic maintained sector did its own thing and independently rationalised its schools estate. The area planning process conducted by the former education and library boards happened after that. In one large provincial town, a Catholic maintained secondary and a state controlled secondary had, for over a decade, developed a shared learning community; they had established formal links and shared classes to develop the curriculum. After the maintained sector rationalised its schools estate, that all stopped; sharing across the traditional divide ended. That was six years ago.

It is not all doom and gloom. Good practice is continuing in many parts of the country, including in my constituency of Mid Ulster. However, despite talk of shared campuses and shared education, the current picture is mixed and patchy. Some could question the Minister's commitment to the delivery of the signature projects on shared education as the schools applying to participate, and even those already signed up to participate, are the only schools in Northern Ireland that are being pressurised to adhere to specific assessment criteria that are still the subject of a dispute between the unions and the Department. Time is of the essence in finding a resolution here as time progresses for the successful delivery of each project where funds can be spent appropriately.

I know of a proposed project that aims to focus on children in the foundation years. That is surely admirable, as they are building a shared education ethos from the beginning of their school years, but the assessments that are being called for take place on older children in the school. In actual fact, the assessments of that school are not relating to the actual shared education project that would be implemented in that school. Those are the sorts of anomalies that need to be thought about, and a resolution must be found in that area. The Chair of the Committee knew that I might raise the issue of the assessments. I believe that the type of assessment is not necessarily key, but rather that some type of assessment is made.

The shared education that the Ulster Unionist Party believes in must lead somewhere. There is no indication in the Bill that it will lead anywhere. Is the Assembly serious about a shared future? Is it serious about shared education? What do we mean by shared education? The answers to those fundamental questions are not to be found on the A4 page that contains the four clauses of the Shared Education Bill. We will listen carefully to what the Minister and others have to say, and make further contributions as the Bill proceeds at Committee and Further Consideration Stages.

Mr Lunn: First, I join others in wishing you well, Mr Speaker, as you attempt to complete the good work that you are involved in in this mandate and, obviously, beyond that, I wish you well for your retirement, whatever you decide to do. I am told that 70 is the new 50. I certainly hope it is, in my case, as well. Good luck to you.

I am going to speak in favour of the Bill. I am saying that at the outset, and I will say it at the end of my contribution because, in between, people might wonder what I meant by that. I am glad that other Members have expressed reservations in various forms about the quality, content and significance of the Bill. As somebody has said, it is a good starting point. It is worthwhile; it is an attempt by the Department to at least clarify what is meant by shared education. I cannot help thinking that the definition that it has come up with is not perfect, and I am glad that I am not the only one to say that.

I enjoyed the Minister's opening remarks. That is not to say that I do not normally enjoy them, but I enjoyed them on this occasion because, for a start, they were mercifully brief, and, apart from that, the content was good to my ears, because, at the beginning of his comments, the Minister highlighted at some length the benefits of children being educated together. He actually could have been talking about the integrated sector. It would have been the same speech. I hope I heard him right on this, because it was quite encouraging to me, but he talked about the word "promote" and its inclusion in the Bill. There is now an obligation on the Department to:

"encourage, facilitate and promote shared education", but only to "facilitate" and "encourage" integrated education. I happen to think that "promote" is a powerful word. If you look at the dictionary definition, you may find that it is the strongest of those three words.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Sure; yes.

Mr Weir: I am loath to interrupt the school report that the Member is giving the Minister, but, by way of clarification, the Bill talks about "encourage" rather than "promote".

Strictly speaking, it is, I suppose, one of the things on which the Minister made clear there may be a divergence of opinion. It does not place an obligation; it places a power, which is of a different nature.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Chair for that. I was going to mention at some stage the use of the words “power”, “duty” and “obligation”. I am not sure which is the strongest; I fancy it is “obligation”. Perhaps the Minister can clarify that. I also point out that the Minister has recently agreed to conduct a review of the integrated education sector. I look forward to hearing more detail from him on what he has in mind, because the sector would like that review to be independent and not conducted by the Department.

Quite a lot of money has been set aside for this project. My understanding is that quite a lot of money is to be set aside for shared and integrated projects, particularly capital projects. I cannot escape the feeling that it is all directed at the shared education projects at the moment. “Shared” is the buzzword, and that is the direction of travel. That is what worries people who have spent well over 30 years now trying to bring children together through the medium of integrated education, despite the blockages, objections and all the reasons not to honour the Department’s obligations in that respect, all of which have held back the development of the sector. Now, we are told that the integrated schools are at the top end of the continuum — that is the word being used — of shared education. In other words, there is an expectation, or perhaps a hope, that all this on shared education will lead to some integration and that schools will get to know each other and begin to realise that integrated education is not something to be feared but perhaps a natural consequence of what they are now embarking on. I hope that that is the case. In, I think, 35 years, the integrated sector has produced only roughly 7% penetration into the entire school population. We will just have to see where this all goes.

We talked about measurable outcomes, which are very important. It is not hard to measure the educational outcomes of a sharing programme. There is either improvement or there is not. I hope that there is. I guess that the socio-economic and social development outcomes will be a lot more difficult to measure. I hope that, in the timescale that we are talking about, proper measuring devices can be arrived at to ensure that we can see an outcome, because the money will run out. I think that Mrs Overend said that the project is funded until 2018. Beyond that, it will be mainstreamed. Well, let us see in 2018 whether it is worthwhile mainstreaming it. The jury will certainly be out.

The Bill misses an opportunity to consolidate the relationship between shared and integrated education. That is something that we may come back to at Consideration Stage.

I will talk specifically about the wording in the Bill. The definition of “shared education” is the education together of:

“those of different religious belief, including reasonable numbers of both Protestant and Roman Catholic children”.

That will be of interest to a school such as, let us say, Methody. I often refer to Methodist College. For the record again — Robin Newton, an old boy, is looking at me — the composition of Methodist College is roughly 45% Protestant, 25% Catholic and 30% other. What about the others? The others may be Protestants and Catholics who do not chose to define themselves in that way; genuine others who have no belief whatsoever; or, if they are from the immigrant population, they could be Muslim. There is a lot of diversity in our society these days. I would like to see something in there that refers to people who are not Protestant or Catholic.

Just last week, we had a presentation from the Department. I see Faustina and Andrew in the Officials’ Box today. It was very interesting presentation on flexibility, which other Members have mentioned. The Chair mentioned the possibility of having some kind of Roman tribune or czar sitting at the top of all this making decisions about which projects will be acceptable and which will not. I am sure that we will not get to that point, but somebody presumably has to make decisions. I hope that there will be a lot of room for flexibility, because it worries me that projects could fall between the stools of “Protestant”, “Catholic”, “other”, “socially deprived” and whatever other criteria come over the horizon. It would be a shame if good projects were not accepted or funded because they did not meet the specific criteria — not enough Catholics, Protestants or socially deprived children involved — even though they were very worthy projects. I hope that we do not get to that stage, because it would make a nonsense of the whole project.

I will say something positive about the Bill. Clause 1(3)(b) refers to:

“services of any kind ... which provide educational benefit to children or young persons or which are ancillary to education.”

That is quite important, because it indicates to me that “services” does not have to mean something strictly and directly connected to the curriculum. Mr Rogers mentioned a project on World War One and that kind of thing involving his old school, St Louis Grammar School, and a school in Taunton. That may not be on the curriculum, but it is absolutely vital.

I always come back to this point: what is the thrust of this? Is it meant to be educational benefit? That was my understanding of the original reason for shared education. It still has to be the basic reason for it, but is it also about some kind of belief that it will have a dramatic effect on our children? If it does have that dramatic effect on our children, surely the natural consequence is to bring children together through a properly integrated system and not this constant reference to sharing. I hope that that is the way in which we go, and I hope that people come to realise that through the sharing projects.

Mr Flanagan paid tribute, as he would do, to what goes on in Fermanagh. Fermanagh is a terrific example of what can be achieved. Others mentioned Ballycastle High School and Cross and Passion College. We had a presentation from them, and they do excellent work. It is only a small point, but they told us that their sixth-form bash this year was a joint event for the first time. I do not know what consequences will flow from that, but it is great to see.

We have visited Limavady a couple of times. You cannot fault what is going on there, as it is excellent. Even if you aspire to the concept that schools should be coming together as one rather than being separate and sharing, Limavady is an excellent example of what can be achieved. It is also happening in Londonderry, or Derry, and elsewhere.

I do not want to knock the Bill, but I continually wonder whether the needs and rights of the integrated sector are being honoured, and I would like to hear from the Minister about that. I could cite many examples from down the years of where integrated schools have been held back or turned down. I will make an exception in your case, Minister, because I believe that you have honestly done your best to respect the obligation during your tenure. Again, I could quote example of that happening.

Beyond that, we will have more to say about the Bill at Consideration Stage, and, I fancy, others will as well. The Bill is not perfect, but what Bill ever has been? It is mercifully short, so we should not have to agonise over it for months. Sometimes, things that are short and sweet are quite complicated, too, but let us see where we go with it.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Yes, certainly.

Mr B McCrea: I want to ask the Member's opinion about the merit of the Bill being mercifully short. For a topic of this importance, maybe there ought to be a bit more substance to it. I find it strange that the Bill is only one A4 page in length. I wonder whether that is an omission rather than a positive.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Member for that. He is not known for brevity himself, so he may learn something from it. [Laughter.]

I do not mind that it is a short Bill. This is the groundwork and first step, as others have said, towards something that will obviously have to be tweaked and amended along the way as we learn from it. I do think that it has merit, so I hope that you will forgive me, Members, for anything I have said that appears to cast doubt on the whole project because I am not intending to be entirely negative about this.

11.45 am

Mr Newton: Like others, including the Chair, my party colleague, I am generally supportive of the Bill. I think that it is important to recognise where the Bill is coming from, what its genesis was and what its driver is. It is coming from the parties that sit around the Executive table and that develop the Programme for Government.

The Programme for Government placed specific objectives on the Department of Education, and those were determined to be in three areas. The first was to establish a ministerial advisory group to explore and bring forward recommendations to the Minister of Education. The second was to ensure that all children had the opportunity to participate in shared education programmes by 2015. We may have missed the target of including all children. The third objective was to substantially increase the number of schools sharing facilities by 2015, and, in welcoming the progress that is being made in that sphere, I can say that some excellent examples have been brought to the Committee as evidence of that. Indeed, the Committee has had the opportunity to go out and look at the practice that is in operation. I do not think that any member of the Committee has not been impressed by what they have heard or what they have seen, appreciating all the difficulties and hurdles that principals and boards of governors have had to get over to make the initiatives work.

Reference was made to this being a small Bill, and I would not use the words "mercifully small". It is small, but it is significant, and it is a significant step in progress in Northern Ireland. If we can get the Bill passed, we will have taken a very positive step forward in education. All the evidence and all of what we have seen has been positive. The visits that we have undertaken as a Committee have been good examples of good practice, and, where projects have emerged, they have involved the essential condition or criteria that local parents, schools and communities have been supportive of them. I think that this is one of the essential ingredients as shared education moves forward.

There are good examples, and Trevor Lunn referred to the long history of Methodist College, or Methody. I am not a former pupil, by the way. I never had the brains to go to Methody.

Mr Lunn: They turned you down.

Mr Newton: They turned me down.

That long history and ethos, and the good practice that is there, is embedded in that school. There is much good practice in other areas, and Trevor referred to those as good examples. Much of it has been done below the radar, where a song and dance has not been made about it, where press releases have not been issued, and where communities together have got on with each other and have done it and seen the benefits. If we are going down this route, as we are, then I suppose that the ethos and objectives need to be encapsulated in the Bill. Certainly, we need to see an improvement in education standards and all that flows from that for our children and young people and we need to further explore and examine at the next stage how that can be built in, too.

Much can be made of sending a class of A-level pupils to one school or another and sharing facilities. Is that really what we want? No, it is not really what we want, but it is a step forward. Where we have a school with a good reputation in mathematics, science, English, the arts, or whatever it might be, and an adjacent school that is maybe not just as strong in an area, why would we not want the former to share its strengths? Why would we not bring those schools together? Why would we not let that be shared with the pupils in the schools, or the young people in the colleges, for the benefit of their education?

On sharing the skills of our teaching staff, there are teachers who are exemplars and have leadership qualities that are way beyond what might be regarded as the norm. Why would we not allow a wider range of children to experience, or live within, those leadership qualities and gain from the knowledge and enthusiasm that some teachers can impart, beyond what others can do?

Moving forward, in the next five, 10 and 15 years, buildings and resources will be tight and at a premium; so why would we not want to share them where possible. There is a strong economic and educational case for shared education.

I have made the point that communities need to be comfortable with it. I suggest, as others have done, that not every community can move at the same pace and not every community will have the same opportunity, but a start needs to be made and a building block needs to be put in place. If we put that building block in place, I have no doubt that, when the benefits of it are seen, other communities will follow.

There have been a number of examples in the past, one of which was education for mutual understanding. I happen to believe that it was not a great initiative, but it was an initiative nonetheless. I know that Trevor Lunn is very much tied into the integrated education movement, but he recognises that it has not set the education world alight, given that he said that only 7% of the school population is involved in the integrated sector. Parents have not bought into the integrated sector, generally speaking, and pupils are not flocking to it.

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Newton for giving way. I hear what he says, but where we differ is the reason why the integrated sector has not set the world on fire. It is not because of the lack of parental demand or choice, it is because of what I referred to in my speech as the Department's reluctance down the years to entirely embrace the sector and the obligations that it has towards it. Again, for the record, I have tried to absolve the present Minister of that. The sector has not been given the opportunity to flourish; that is where the problem is.

Mr Newton: I am not sure that I can totally agree with what the Member said, but he has shared that view in the Committee and, indeed, in the Chamber on previous occasions.

If we are going to move forward on this, we have to recognise that we have a very good cohort of teaching staff.

They are professional, dedicated and committed to their teaching profession, and shared education gives them an opportunity to share those skills and knowledge with a wider range of pupils.

I have already said that we cannot force the pace of this initiative, but we can indicate to parents and schools what the benefits might be for our children and young people. Where I think there is an essential feature if we are to fully gain the benefits — reference was made to it — is the matter of area planning. I have been greatly disappointed by what I have seen of area planning activities, which were described by one learned gentleman who came to give evidence to the Committee as being a cut-and-paste exercise. Many will agree with that description. If we are to be successful and this Bill is to deliver, we need to have successful, effective and holistic area planning. There needs to be a holistic approach to the planning of our schools estate, not a sectoral approach. It brings benefits to the Minister's budget and releases money to be spent on other things if we have an area plan that works.

This is a good step forward. Further work is needed on the Bill. Other steps need to be put in place for the Bill to work and to deliver in and around our education. Let me finish with the one area in the Bill that gives me great encouragement. It refers to not only dealing with Protestant, Catholic or others. The Bill will help those:

and allow them to mix with those who are not experiencing it, and to allow schools to implement initiatives that can ensure that those from a less-well-off background have the opportunities to go to what might be regarded as some of the more elite grammar schools. That takes us another step forward that can only be of benefit to our schoolchildren, young people and the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr Kennedy: Thanks for the opportunity to speak on this brief Bill — and to speak briefly, because much of the ground has already been covered by my colleague Sandra Overend. The Ulster Unionist Party has always given fair wind to the concept of shared education. We applaud the efforts of schools from different sectors to come together to share classes and facilities, whether that is in County Fermanagh or other parts of Northern Ireland, such as Limavady or Ballycastle. There are very good examples of practical cooperation out there, not least in my constituency of Newry and Armagh, and I am certainly aware of those.

As my colleague Mrs Overend explained in her speech, however, the concern is that there is no consensus about what shared education means. We have had some discussion on that and highlighted that even through this debate. In some ways, this short Bill does not take us much further forward in that. We have heard the rhetoric in this Assembly about shared education, but we should remind ourselves that, just a few months ago, in this very Assembly in debates about St Mary's teaching college and its future, Sinn Féin and the SDLP were competing as to who could stand up for the separate Catholic education system. There was no hint there of a shared future in education. It is also a fact that the CCMS continues to criticise integrated education heavily. It is my understanding that no Catholic maintained school has ever transformed into an integrated school. Twenty-five controlled schools have become officially integrated over 25 years.

12.00 noon

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way on that?

Mr Kennedy: I will give way.

Mr Lunn: Just for the record: one Catholic maintained primary school has attempted to become integrated recently, and it is being blocked by the Minister.

Mr Kennedy: That confirms concerns that are still out there that, whilst the rhetoric is about shared education, the reality is still some way off. Those facts raise concern about equity.

It seems to me that there has been a complete lack of consistent policy on shared education. The Minister published a shared education policy three days after he approved yet another amalgamation of three Catholic maintained primary schools. He has approved increases in integrated school enrolments when they will affect controlled schools in places such as Moira and Carrickfergus, but he refuses integrated enrolments when they will affect the maintained sector, certainly in the Omagh area. There is no evidence of shared education there. It may be that Sinn Féin and the DUP are signing up to some shared campuses —

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: The Minister will have ample opportunity when he makes his winding-up speech, and I am sure that he will take the opportunity. He normally likes to hold forth on his opinions.

It appears that Sinn Féin and the DUP are signing up to some shared campuses with separate schools and, effectively, to a tick-box exercise called "shared education". We need to understand that shared education is more important than that and has to be treated as shared education and not shared-out education. We support shared education if it is part of a process leading to a single-state education system in Northern Ireland that is open to all. As my colleague indicated, this short Bill, as it stands, does not signal a proper or full way forward to obtaining a shared future in education. We will seek to improve it as it continues on its legislative process, and I hope very much that others will be open to the suggestions that we will make.

Mr McCausland: The document that we have before us today, the Shared Education Bill, in many ways provides definition, context and a framework, but there is clearly a lot of work still to be done on taking shared education forward. It is certainly the case, as was highlighted by others, that there is a growth of interest in shared education in many areas across the Province and in many schools. This is part of the picture for moving forward, but it is only part.

Benefits will flow from sharing in education. We are faced with a situation in which we are not starting to develop education in Northern Ireland with a clean sheet. There are strongly entrenched interests and rights, and it will take quite a long time to change that, because there is no clear evidence of any desire for change in many sectors. However, benefits flow from shared education, one of which is in community cohesion. The more that we can move forward in creating a shared and better future for Northern Ireland and for the people who live in Northern Ireland, so much the better. One element of that has to be community cohesion, and one element of building community cohesion is around the better understanding of others and their traditions, background and identity.

The benefits of building a shared and better future are clear. There is also evidence of educational benefits in shared learning, which was put to the Committee.

Our education system reflects the divisions in our society. The Bill will go some way, I hope, to addressing that and ameliorating the disadvantages of such division.

Among the issues going forward is that we need to look at the financial aspect of the Bill. How that is handled will be crucial. There are also practical issues, in that there are differences between sectors that need to be recognised. The definition in the Bill of shared education is:

"those of different religious belief, including reasonable numbers of both Protestant and Roman Catholic children or young persons".

Most children from the Roman Catholic community attend a Roman Catholic maintained school, and most children from the Protestant community attend a controlled school. The Bill defines the bringing together of children in terms of religious belief, but religious belief has some correlation with political belief and some with cultural identity.

If children are coming together from different backgrounds and sectors, it is important that they do so on the basis of equity and cultural confidence. That is a question that I put repeatedly over a number of Committee sessions to the academic experts who were giving evidence. It always reminds me of Pierre Trudeau's comment on the relationship between Canada and America, when he said that living in Canada was a bit like being in bed "with an elephant." If people are coming together in anything, and it is to be genuinely shared, it is important that they come together on the basis of equity in the cultural confidence, awareness and competence of the children. When we questioned those who gave evidence to the Education Committee, some got it as an issue and some did not. That troubled me because, if there are folk in the education establishment who do not get it, that does not augur well.

I have emphasised time and again that, educationally, in being right for the child and in terms of the rights of the child, every child should have the opportunity in school to embrace, and have a greater awareness and better understanding of, the culture of the community from which they come. It is part of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, and a hugely important right, that the identity of the home and community from which a child comes — a child's cultural identity — is embraced, validated and affirmed in their school.

That certainly happens in Irish-medium schools, which are fundamentally based around language, culture and identity. It also happens to a large extent in the maintained sector. I remember an article by renowned columnist Jude Collins in the now defunct — thankfully — 'Daily Ireland', in which he said that we needed to fight for the preservation of CCMS and Roman Catholic schools, even for those who were not practising or devout Catholics, because they affirmed an Irish identity, taught Irish culture and helped children to see the world through Irish eyes. That was his perception, and I thought that, as an educationalist, he probably did know something about the subject. Who was I to disagree on that matter and in that area with Mr Collins?

In the same way, children coming from the controlled sector need to go into any sharing, shared or inclusive situation on the basis that their school has validated, affirmed and embraced their culture. It is a rights issue. It is an issue that arises in the context of shared education. It is many years indeed since I went through teacher training, but we were told in those days about the Bullock report on education. The Bullock report said that one of the contributors to a successful education was bringing the culture and language of the community into the school. Educationally, it is right. It is right in the context of shared education, and it is also the right of the child. I raise it today in this context merely because I want to take every opportunity to raise it so that those who are not so aware of the issue at the moment will become more aware of it within the cultural establishment and seek to play their part.

I am delighted that the Bill includes a reference to the Youth Council for Northern Ireland. That may have some relevance to the future existence or otherwise of the Youth Council for Northern Ireland. I do not know the Minister's thinking in that regard, but it is certainly specified in the Bill as one of the contributors. That is important, because what happens outside the school in the youth context is just as important as what happens within the school setting. CCEA also has an important role here. That relates to the point that I have been making about the cultural education of the children.

I am sure that there is a lot more work to be done on the Bill. There is a lot more work to be done in developing a common understanding of shared education, where it leads and where it is going. However, it does recognise that, for many people in Northern Ireland, there is not a desire at this point to have a fully integrated system, but they would be comfortable with something of an incremental nature such as this facilitates. In many difficult issues, an incremental approach is best. It has to be one with which local communities are comfortable.

Mr Allister: My experience of my constituents is that their aspiration and primary interest in respect of their children is that they can obtain for them the best available education. Many do not nuance it much beyond that reality. I do not find that that is trumped by any aspiration towards social engineering, yet much that the Department brings forth seems to fit within the category of social engineering. Last night, I again chaired my local primary school's board of governors. The message that was coming through to me on a multiplicity of educational issues from parents, representatives and others was simply, "We want the best for our kids. We want a school that delivers. We want a school that passes them into a post-primary system that maximises their talents. We are not particularly interested in ticking social-engineering boxes. We are interested in achievement for our kids."

I must say that I fear that some of what should be the foundational and overarching objective in education of that nature is being lost. I also detect in the context of this proposal the hand of those who, of course, are determined to rewrite the educational charter in Northern Ireland. We had another exposition of it from the Minister last week. He is determined, if he can, to write grammar schools out of it and to write selection out of it. This seems to dovetail with that, almost to the point of being a Trojan facilitator of it.

Let me say that I have no difficulties whatsoever, where it is pragmatic and sensible, with two, three or more schools sharing a new science lab or whatever to better all in that school community.

There is no sensible or practical objection to that.

12.15 pm

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr McNarry: Does the Member agree that, perhaps within this multicoloured vision, what we are heading towards is multi-developed sites, campuses of 2,000 or 2,500 pupils, brought there, as the Member says, in some form of social engineering? In what he is saying, could the Member address the House on how we might escape from that, in terms of coming back to what his constituency wants, which is very similar to what my constituents are saying on the matter?

Mr Allister: I think that, under the aegis of this Bill, we are not going to escape from that. The Bill requires the Education Authority, by virtue of the definition it gives, to activate the statutory obligation on it under section 2 of the 2014 Act:

"to encourage, facilitate and promote shared education."

Of course, it does this in respect of integrated education, and we know what that means: preferential funding. It does it in respect of the Irish-medium sector, and we know what that means: preferential funding. Now, it is to do that in respect of what is termed "shared education", so we know what that will mean: preferential funding. Preferential funding, as experienced, as applied to the integrated and the Irish-medium sectors, has meant a dearth of funding for the controlled sector and, at times, the maintained sector. So, we can see where this is going.

I think that the experience of large campuses is not perhaps working out as all the promise packaged in them said it would. I hear rumblings from Omagh Academy about how it feels it is being squeezed and its identity lost. That which was promised to the school is, in fact, being repressed. So, I think there is, within the Bill, an element of social engineering and politicising of education, even more than it already is. I detect within the Bill the very distinct anti-grammar school and anti-selection agenda of the Minister.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment.

Those who are signing up for this seem to include people who have painted themselves as the saviours of grammar schools and selection. This is almost going to create a new elitism, the triumph of Marxist philosophy. That is really what is being ensconced in clause 1 of the Bill, in the definition. This is the Minister's prime argument, as I understand it, for he is anti-selection and he takes an anti-grammar school stance. For all the reasons of political correctness, we are going to tick the sectarian box and then tick the box so that all, from whatever background, might have, enjoy and attain — irrespective of the fact that it is a conglomeration of different talents — the same opportunities and achievements. There is nothing wrong with that, but it is absolute folly to think that all kids are equal in their academic or non-academic abilities. This idea of the second part of the definition:

"those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation and those who are not",

has now, suddenly, become a prioritised, funded objective of shared education. It is an ill-disguised attack on what, in the Minister's definition, grammar school education and selection represent. It is an ill-disguised attack on those concepts. So I have no difficulty in identifying what I perceive to be the political agenda driving this.

I make the point again: you do not need this sort of legislation to enable the pragmatic, practical, sensible cooperation that you might see in any one town. You only need this gloss and this element of definition if, in fact, your motivation is to build a Trojan Horse in support of an anti-selection, anti-grammar school agenda.

I think that I was due to give way first to Mr McCrea.

Mr B McCrea: You are very kind, Mr Allister. Actually, you have gone on to develop the theme; I was not sure that you were going to. As Mr Allister was aware, I highlighted clause 1(2)(b):

"those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation and those who are not"

It seems to me that this is the central point of the Bill. This is indeed a Trojan Horse; an attack on existing structures and an attempt to bring in comprehensive education by an alternative route. The Member carried on and dealt with the matter, but I find it strange, and I ask him whether he also finds it strange, that the point has not been raised by any of the major parties heretofore?

Mr Allister: The Member puts it well and articulates what I myself feel about this. This is a scarcely concealed assault on the existing educational establishment for the purpose of peddling and promoting the comprehensive agenda — which, of course, other parts of the United Kingdom are retreating from at a great rate of knots. That is exactly what is afoot here, and I identify and empathise with that point.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. I share in the belief that parents around Northern Ireland see educational improvement as the main objective. Wanting to link in with educational attainment is important, but I have to say that I am somewhat amazed by the leaps that the Member has made. He uses a Trojan Horse analogy. I and the Minister take very different views of selection. This is not some sort of Trojan Horse for comprehensive education or the destruction of the grammars. Rather, if one is to use an analogy, the Member is in the role of Don Quixote tilting at fantasy windmills. Shared education can be of educational benefit: cooperation can lead to dealing with issues of social and educational deprivation and educational underachievement. However, the kind of fantasy problems seen by the Member in the legislation are wide of the mark. He is peddling a completely false premise and completely false fears.

Mr Allister: With respect, the DUP Chief Whip is the last person to give lectures on fantasy windmills because, of course, it was the DUP that bought into Government in 2007 on a number of premises, each of which has now been shown to have been utterly false. They now discover that the party that they are sitting in Government with is controlled by a body that they said had been disbanded with the decommissioning of all weapons. Now they find that is not so —

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to return immediately to the issue before us. We are well off the topic.

Mr Allister: I suppose that I am. [Laughter.] I was making the point that the credentials of the Member in making a judgement of when and where there are Trojan Horses are perhaps a little suspect.

You cannot analyse the Bill without the conclusion. Ask yourself the simple question: does the process outlined, along with the statutory duty in last year's Bill, advance comprehensive education or the alternative? I think that any fair-minded person would come to the conclusion that the primary beneficiaries will be those who build their philosophy on the words of clause 1(2)(b) by bringing together:

“those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation and those who are not”,

thereby comprehensivising all of the educational system.

That is, patently and obviously, what it is about. There are those who, by dint of the political agreements that they are required to make to keep themselves in office, have strained at many a gnat, but here is another camel that they are quite prepared to swallow. The DUP has swallowed this camel. It will still wear a badge that says that the party is for grammar schools or for selection, but its Members will troop through the Lobbies to endorse the very philosophy that undermines the —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: No. Judging by his previous contribution, I do not think that there is a lot of merit in giving way to the Member, although I normally do, as he knows.

I think that there is a bit of discomfort among them, and so there should be, and if I can add to that discomfort by shining the torch of truth on to what is really going on, not for the first time I am happy to do so.

I will finish where I started: education should be about outcomes and improvements. It should not be about ticking fashionable boxes, and doing so in such a way that it financially disadvantages others whose cause some still claim to endorse. I have no interest in the social engineering that I detect in the Bill. Therefore, I think that the Bill is of the nature that I have described.

Mr Speaker, I am normally fairly diligent about staying on to listen to the entirety of a debate, but I have an arrangement that I have to fulfil. I hope to be back in time to hear the Minister's reply, but I apologise to succeeding contributors if I am not here when they speak.

Mr B McCrea: The Bill is an assault on the existing education structures. It is certainly an assault on integrated education. There are some who started their contribution by saying that it is “mercifully short”. We must therefore take the opportunity to look at why the Bill has been introduced at all. What is the purpose of introducing a “mercifully short” Bill?

Mr Allister indicated that he may have to go. Before he does, I will deal with his issues. He was challenged by the Chief Whip of the DUP across the Chamber, and whether the Chief Whip of the DUP wants to take on Mr Allister or me, the argument will be the same. Clause 1(2)(b) states:

“those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation and those who are not”.

This is a Trojan Horse. It is an attempt to put finance where finance was not before. Given that we are dealing in a fixed sum of money, taking money from one source to give preference to the other will mean the demise of the financial contribution.

There may well be people here who tut-tut. When the great mantra of Don Quixote is brought up, I always know that a nerve has been touched, as it alludes to the fact that someone is mad to be suggesting the point that he or she is making. Well, in looking through the Bill, I see relatively few things to discuss other than these issues. It is not being a Don Quixote to point out the fallacy in the argument that is being put forward.

In a speech made by Mr Kennedy — I am sure that the words that I am about to say will cause him a little concern — I agreed with what he had to say, almost in its entirety. I realise that that may be something of a shock and we may have to revisit the issue, but he said that this short Bill does not take us very far. He said, in relation to the argument about Stranmillis and St Mary's, that, if people were genuine in their approach to shared education, they might have adopted a different position on that.

12.30 pm

Others have made contributions about integrated education and the fact that only 7% of the population are involved in integrated education. The reason for that is that the numbers in integrated schools are capped, so those who wish to change to some form of integrated education are prevented from doing so. If you look through successive polls, you will see that there is willingness to change.

Some say that the Bill is a stepping stone. My problem with stepping stones is that they are all very well when you are dealing with shallow water and can get from one side to the other, but a stepping stone that leads you into a deep-water channel brings you nowhere but to destruction. We need not to put in place stepping stones but to build bridges.

I do not necessarily need to have an integrated structure per se. I am happy to have other forms of education. It is time for another uncomfortable truth: I noted when Nelson McCausland was talking that he and I went to Belfast Royal Academy, as did Mr Lunn — we may have to have some form of reunion. That school has a very mixed intake. It is a grammar school that brings in people from all backgrounds and tries to reach, on the basis of merit, those who want an academic education. I do not want that school to have to change its position because it does not provide strictly integrated education, but, believe me, it is integrated education nonetheless.

If you want to know where I think that we should be strategically in 20 to 25 years' time — those of you who are interested in a lot of stepping stones — I think that our children should be freely educated together. They should be in a structure in which they can be educated on the basis of and where they are provided with services that they want to receive. I agree with Mr Allister that what really influences most parents is that they want quality education for their children. When I look at the Bill — Trojan Horse/Don Quixote — I see a really strange Bill. I just do not understand why such a modest proposal has been put forward.

There is a strategic issue. The fundamental fault line in our society, the Assembly and our political processes is the idea of maintaining Catholic, Protestant and separate. That is the issue that we have to resolve, and, simply put, this form of delivery will take too long. It will be hijacked for alternative strategies that have nothing to do with what is in the Bill.

Almost half of our children are taught in schools in which 95% or more of pupils are of the same religion. Only 7% attend integrated schools. It was suggested in the Committee that this shows the failure of integrated education, yet what I pick up from successive opinion polls — maybe others will have different information — is that the public at large want greater integration and an end to segregation.

There was a poll by LucidTalk in 2013. I know that there are others, but these are the figures that I happen to have. In that poll, 66% said that they believed that integrated schools should be the main model for our education system; 68% said that they believed that integrated schools are the best settings to prepare children for living and working in an increasingly diverse society; and 79% said that they would support a request to transform the school that their children attend to an integrated school.

You go back to how our friends try to help us. Speaking in the Waterfront Hall in July 2013, no less a figure than President Obama said:

"If towns remain divided — if Catholics have their schools and buildings, and Protestants have theirs — if we can't see ourselves in one another, if fear or resentment are allowed to harden, that encourages division. It discourages cooperation."

I am sure that other Members will deal with it, but, as far back as 2010, the First Minister, Peter Robinson, described Northern Ireland's education system as being a "benign form of apartheid".

The Good Friday Agreement — the Belfast Agreement — contains a specific pledge to:

"facilitate and encourage integrated education and mixed housing", as an essential element in the process of reconciliation and the creation of a culture of tolerance at every level of society. The Bill attempts to change that balance. It attempts to put shared education on a similar level as integrated education and, in the fullness of time, it will subsume that obligation. This is a change of political priorities, and it should not go unremarked.

There are people here who talk about shared education, who believe that it is in some way the same or analogous to integrated education. There are people who say the words, but they do not really mean them. It is a tick-box exercise. The principal of Enniskillen Integrated Primary School, Adele Kerr, was dismayed when Arlene Foster made comments about her school when Obama and Cameron came to see it. She said that it was:

"a blatant attempt to sabotage this historical day".

She said that Mrs Foster's comment was "insulting" and:

"If Mrs Foster visited our school which she has never done, despite me telling her the door is always open, she would know why we were chosen for our visit."

We should not speak with weasel words. We should not pretend to be one thing and do another. We have to tackle the integration of our children if we want to have a future in this place.

I am coming to the end of my contribution. In its recent report on shared and integrated education, which it presented in September, the Committee for Education was spectacularly dismissive of integrated education. It stated:

"Given the relatively limited uptake of Integrated Education and the very different views expressed by sectoral bodies in respect of its facilitation, encouragement and definition, the Committee agreed that the Department should undertake a strategic review of its approach and relevant actions to date relating to Integrated Education."

I was not on that Committee, though I have been in the past. I resile from that point of view. I do not think that it is the right way forward. I do not think that we should abandon integrated education nor try to supplant it with something different. The Bill, in its points, pays lip service to integration and, in the process, attempts to introduce a legislative framework that will allow the Minister of the day to produce finance for his own particular interests.

This is not the right way forward, and that is why the Bill is extremely dangerous. For those who say that they will give it a fair wind and have a look at it in the Committee, it is a Bill that is on two sides of A4 paper with no real clauses or information. What are you going to do at Committee Stage? Are you going to introduce 100 amendments? Are you going to get agreements on those amendments? Or, are you going to push through something that lets the Minister of the day do whatever he likes? Members on the Benches opposite have a responsibility to stand up and fight for the education system in this part of the world because it is a good system. Of course there are areas that we need to address, but the issue is that doing it on one page of A4 is not the right way forward.

I intend to return to that after Committee Stage. This should not go through on the nod. Those Members sitting opposite really need to have a look at the Bill and see if they truly agree with it.

Mr Speaker: I just point out, John, that the Business Committee has agreed to meet at 1.00 pm. I do not know how long you intend to take with your contribution.

Mr McCallister: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I hope to finish at 1.00 pm or possibly before it.

In opening my contribution to the debate, I will say that I welcome the Bill in the context that I proposed the amendments that put it in the Bill that established the Education Authority. I suppose there are several options that we could look at that people have produced around education and where we may go on these things. Some say that we should go to a single education system. That is fine because no doubt that would be a secular education system. Dare I say that to go down that road, with a comprehensive-style system, would be much more of a Trojan Horse. It would also be much more limiting to parental choice. It would fly in the face of what I would like to see.

I agree with one point made by Mr Allister, which was that educational outcomes should be the main objective of this. However, by sharing, you hope to give access to the best schools and the best teachers and to broaden the curriculum. That is what you want to do. I hope that the Minister's policy and aspirations for the Bill are about that: extending choice and giving kids from various backgrounds the opportunity to share and have a curriculum that they would not otherwise be able to take advantage of. That is the essence of the Bill and, for me, its importance.

I give the Minister notice that I may think of amending the Bill when it comes back from Committee Stage. Of course there are things that I want included. However, the Bill is not a Trojan Horse for some sort of all-embracing comprehensive system. It cannot be. The very definition of having to share means that you must have different systems and sectors. It may be desirable to go to a single education system, if you want a very much one-size-fits-all approach to education. I think that Mr Flanagan said, at the start of the debate, that this may not be where you would start if you had a blank canvas, but we are where we are in education terms.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. As has been indicated, there are different views around the Chamber on comprehensive education and academic selection, and those are well trodden. However, the Bill is essentially silent on that. There has been a slight element of educational McCarthyism that sees reds under every bed and some sort of subliminal Marxist agenda — the Minister may well have an overt Marxist agenda — but this is about sharing between sectors. I really fail to see where the difficulty is with trying to share, particularly between those who are in socio-economic deprivation and those who are not. I am not quite sure how this is some amazing pathway to comprehensive education or, as some would have it, some reinforcement of the current system.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to Mr Weir for that, and I agree with his point. It has long been established that we have a huge job to do in our education system, especially to deal with the huge failing in Protestant working-class areas and across the board in all working-class areas where our education system is not delivering.

The Member knows my views on creating social mobility and, of course, education is one of the greatest assets we can give people. One of the greatest advantages we can give our young people to get them economically active is a proper and decent education. That way, they get a start in life and do not get trapped on welfare. It ties in with so much of our policy agenda, and it is crucial that we get it right. So, I do not fear giving people from poorer backgrounds some advantages through access to better schools, widening the curriculum choice and sharing what we need to share. There is no Trojan Horse here.

My commitment is the same as that of many others, namely to have grammar schools that perform very well. I would also like to see us using other models in which schools can specialise. Mr Allister quite rightly mentioned that in England they are retreating from some of the comprehensive models, but they are looking at specialist schools. Could we have other schools — vocational schools — that specialise, whether it is in sport or music, and lift the standard?

You have various models that advocate totally integrated schools. That is much more of a worry and much more of a Trojan Horse towards a one-size-fits-all model. The people who argue for it may want to create some sort of beige-coloured society where we are all the same and of the one ability. That is not life. Diversity and pluralism make up our community in Northern Ireland, and we should celebrate that because it enriches all our society, right across not only to Northern Ireland but the entire United Kingdom and indeed the British Isles. Diversity enhances and enriches our lives, and we should cherish it.

It is also a great vehicle for providing parental choice, where parents can choose the model of education they would like to have. To those who say that we should go entirely integrated and secular in education, I say, "You are limiting parental choice by doing that." You are also trying to pretend that the Catholic Church, the CCMS or the Transferor Representatives' Council should be out of existence. That is not where we are. That view also denies the fact that faith-ethos education outperforms other types of education. If we look at the list of the best performing schools, Catholic grammar schools are amongst the best and I think that the top 10 non-selective secondary schools are all in the maintained sector. What are they doing and giving in that ethos-based education that other schools need to replicate? We should be sharing and lifting all boats in a rising tide. That is what we need to do.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that the Bill provides a real opportunity for the grammar schools, which so many here support, as do I, to share some of their expertise and experience and demonstrate generosity and, perhaps, community responsibility by reaching out to other schools that are not quite so successful? That may be a problem as regards the criteria in the Bill on different sectors, but there is a real opportunity for a trickle-down experience and, as you said, to lift all boats.

Mr McCallister: I agree with Mr Lunn that there is an opportunity. If some of the criteria need to be changed, then that is what the Committee Stage and Consideration Stage are for.

I am quite sure that Members, the Committee and the Chair will want to work with the Minister, and I am sure that the Minister will be keen to engage.

The big challenge for CCMS and the Catholic Church is how they open up those schools to others. As Mr Lunn said, how do we use that expertise, knowledge and ethos? How do we share it and help to raise standards across our school system? The societal benefits that flow from that are of great benefit to us, but education is the key priority. If we get that, the challenge that I put down to, broadly, the Catholic Church and the maintained sector is this: how do you make your schools more receptive to people from other faiths and none? We have models, and we do not have to look that far to other parts of our country. Some Church of England and Roman Catholic schools in England are even setting targets for admissions of 25% to 30% from other faiths or no faith. Why are parents in other parts of the country choosing that? It is because the standards are there.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I listened intently to what he said about educational attainment in working-class areas. I recently spoke at the opening of an extension to a primary school in my constituency of North Belfast: Springfield. I made the point to those gathered that parents valuing education is a key element of raising the educational attainment that we are talking about, particularly in working-class areas of north and west Belfast. The issues that face young Catholics in Ardoyne are very similar to those that face young Protestants in Woodvale just across the Crumlin Road, where I live.

Mr McCallister: I absolutely accept that point. Not only do you have generational dependency on welfare and benefits but you need to give an education to help to get people out of that poverty trap. This is why, in the past, I have been critical of some of the Minister's cuts to early intervention. All that stuff contributes dramatically to improving outcomes for our children and their eventual participation in the wider economy. It is absolutely critical, and the point is well made as to how we would do that and actually start to share.

The big challenge, of course, is to those in the Catholic maintained sector who want, as I do, to maintain a faith/ethos education. They do not want a secular education and want to maintain their ethos. It is about how you open it up. How do you get a much more diverse intake into a school? You will have to look at diversity on your boards of governors. You will also have to look at diversity in your teaching staff and the barriers that they face. Mrs Overend mentioned the barriers for teaching staff. All those things can make a huge contribution in how you tackle genuine sharing.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member acknowledge that there are many schools with a faith-based ethos? I am thinking particularly of the likes of St Columbanus' College in Bangor. While it is a Catholic school, it has a large mix from right across the community. We really need to work on that to ensure that there is a better spread throughout our schools.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful, as always, to Mr Rogers for that point. We have some brilliant examples, whether St Columbanus' College in Bangor, Method in Belfast or Dominican College up in Portstewart. I think that Mr Lunn mentioned Cross and Passion College in Ballycastle. Sadly, however, as the figures suggest, we remain in the mid- to high 90s in percentage terms of those of us who are being educated in schools that have the same religious or community background as ourselves. We have some brilliant examples for the Minister to model on and to look at how we do that around Northern Ireland. I applaud those schools for doing it. I like that model because it is organic and natural, and it is happening without forcibly bringing people together. That is something to be welcomed.

However, you come back to the big challenges: what are the barriers to truly sharing and to having those models that Mr Rogers talked about in Bangor, Portstewart or Belfast? I suggest that in some areas, it is the diversity of the teaching staff, the diversity of the intake, making sure that people from a different faith, or no faith, feel welcome and can get the benefits of the pastoral care that is very recognisable in some of those schools, and making sure that they get all of the educational advantages. How do we get all of that in? How do we open up those schools and, effectively, free them and many of our parents into feeling that they can look at schools from a different community background as a realistic option to send their children to? We will know that we have started to make a difference on this when we have achieved that.

Yes, of course, like every piece of legislation, the Bill will need amendments and changes to be made and will demand that. That is why I welcome the Minister's bringing the Bill. I also welcome the fact that he has not moved on accelerated passage and that the Bill will go through the scrutiny stage. I agree with and applaud the overall objectives of what I believe is his policy intent. It should be focused on the educational outcomes, widening choice, extending the curriculum, using our education system to truly lift all boats and get aspiration back into all communities and using education to deliver that and to deliver on skills, the economy and releasing people from the poverty trap and the trap of welfare. I welcome the Bill, and I welcome the societal benefits that I very much hope will flow from it, if it is successfully passed and implemented. Thank you, Mr Speaker.

Assembly Business

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet at 1.00 pm. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

Before I suspend the sitting, I wish to advise the House that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety will respond to Mr Jim Allister's question for urgent oral answer immediately after the private Members' motion on funding for transport infrastructure. I have also been advised that Mrs Overend is not in a position to move the Adjournment debate today, so a revised indicative timings of the order of business has been issued.

The sitting was suspended at 12.57 pm.

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Brexit: Local Impact

1. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of the impact that the EU referendum will have on the local economy. (AQO 9041/11-16)

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I have an opportunity to wish you well, Mr Speaker, after your announcement this morning.

My Department became aware of an existing research study by Oxford Economics that was seeking UK-wide funding to examine the potential impacts of a UK exit from the EU under a selection of plausible scenarios. We have now accepted a proposal from Oxford Economics to join its UK study and to have its work extended to Northern Ireland following a formal approach that we made to it during October.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister. While the Oxford Economics approach is welcome, given the scale of EU assistance to Northern Ireland in agriculture, infrastructure, Peace and innovation, does the Minister agree that the Northern Irish economy would continue to experience a net benefit from remaining in the EU?

Mr Bell: The Oxford Economics research study proposes to examine a range of the potential scenarios, not just a simple in/out scenario. The study we have commissioned will look at, for example, the Norwegian option, which is to leave the European Union but become a member of the European economic area; the Swiss option, which is a new settlement as a product of continued bilateral negotiation; the Turkish option whereby the UK would enter into a customs union with the European Union similar to the current arrangements adopted by Turkey; and also complete withdrawal involving a complete repatriation of powers, with the UK's EU trading relationship determined according to the work of the World Trade Organization's most-favoured-nation criteria. We will look at all the specific impacts of these potential exit scenarios in Northern Ireland across issues such as GDP, sector output, trade volume, household spending and unemployment.

Mr Lyons: Will the Minister tell us the terms of reference that have been agreed between the Department and the Oxford Economics research group?

Mr Bell: We have set them specifically to look at what I have explained; the different options available and the potential impact those will have across the whole range of scenarios. We have to look very seriously at the implications of being in and being out. If we are to be in, then what potential benefits will there be, and, if we are to be out, what pitfalls will there be and what potential successes could we have, such as free-trade agreements and specific economic zones with areas where we currently do not have them. Let us take all the research and consider it in the round, looking specifically at a range of metrics; GDP, output by sector, trade volume, household spending, employment and unemployment. Comparisons will be made throughout the United Kingdom as a whole. The short paper exercise and access to a database detailing the results are expected to be available to us by the end of this financial year.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers. I note that there is no firm opinion from him on what his or his party's view is on our future position within Europe. Will he give us an indication of whether he would be willing to support the call for any decision on a referendum here to be binding, so that if the majority of people here vote to stay within the European Union, that is what should happen?

Mr Bell: As we are part of the United Kingdom then, legally, we will be part of the United Kingdom when taking part in the United Kingdom referendum. It is the "United Kingdom referendum": the clue is in the title.

Mr Allister: Does the Minister agree that it would be liberating for this trading nation, the United Kingdom, to be freed, in consequence of leaving the EU, of the shackles of bureaucracy on our economy and that it would be liberating with regard to the growth markets which are outside the EU in that we would have the free facility to make our own trade agreements where there is growth rather than be tied to the moribund EU economy, which is now down to less than 20% of the world's GDP?

Mr Bell: All that will need to be considered in the round. Members have asked me about the DUP's position, and I stand fully behind what Diane Dodds has done. I am not, however, answering questions as a DUP Minister; I am answering questions as the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister. We have to take a number of issues into account. There are particular advantages in being part of a market of 500 million people. We have to look at the scenarios that I outlined to see what the benefits are, what brings in the most GDP and employment and what represents the best value for United Kingdom citizens.

We also need to consider the scenarios that the honourable Member pointed out — very well, I have to add — of the potential, should we leave the European Union and look towards what we can do with free trade in some of the world's emerging markets. The honourable Member made those points well; I suppose that we trained you well when you were a DUP MEP.

Ms Sugden: I am glad to hear that the Minister acknowledges the pitfalls of being in and out. Given that farming underpins our economy, has he met any farming groups to discuss the impact of a Brexit on that industry?

Mr Bell: I have met a number of farming groups on a range of issues. We have to look, for example, towards the common agricultural policy, but we also need expert opinion on what would be available to Northern Ireland farmers if we were not paying money into the European Union. What scenarios could there be? I understand that the agrifood sector is a key beneficiary of EU membership as a trading partner and as the result of direct funding from the sector. I also acknowledge that we exported over £1.1 billion in sales to the European Union, although the exact impact on those sales, according to research, depends on the terms that the UK Government would negotiate with the European Union on the movement of goods and services.

The UK, including Northern Ireland, would face a departure from the common agricultural policy and its related subsidies and regulations. I know that many local farmers rely on the single farm payment in order to be viable, but we also need to look at the money that would be available for them were we to be out.

Job Creation

2. Lord Morrow asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment how he plans to create jobs over the next five years. (AQO 9042/11-16)

Mr Bell: The Executive's economic strategy sets out an overarching goal to 2030 to improve the economic competitiveness of the economy through a focus on export-led economic growth, and this will remain our priority going forward. Our most important exporting sector is manufacturing, and, despite the recent bad news about Michelin, the manufacturing sector has been posting strong growth in output and has created over 1,800 jobs in the past year to March 2015. It is interesting to note that the manufacturing sector is outperforming the UK average.

As we look to refocus the economic strategy, we will continue to invest in the key drivers of innovation, research and development and skills in order to create the conditions that will allow businesses in all sectors to grow and prosper. That is how we will contribute to the Executive's collective goal of delivering economic growth, increasing prosperity and creating jobs.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister for his response. Having listened to it, I suspect that he will agree that manufacturing jobs are the future. He outlined that some 1,800 jobs have been created in the manufacturing sector over the past year or thereabouts. What is his target for the next five years, particularly in the manufacturing sector?

Mr Bell: Manufacturing is a vital sector, accounting for 14% of all local economic output. It accounts for one in every nine of our local jobs. Despite the bad news, the output was 3.2% over the year to quarter 2 in 2015, which outperformed the UK average. The latest DETI research on the cost of doing business showed that we are competitive on all costs against the rest of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland but that we cannot compete globally on cost alone.

I am targeting trying to compete for higher-end jobs that require high skills. That is where our competitive edge lies. That is why I am looking to life sciences, agrifood, advanced materials and advanced engineering. I note the success of the Member's constituency in accounting for some 21% of all jobs in manufacturing.

Mr Lynch: Does the Minister accept that regional targets need to form part of Invest NI's corporate plan and the Programme for Government going forward?

Mr Bell: We have to be careful. All of us want jobs to come to our constituency, and that is natural. I want jobs for Strangford as much as you want them for anywhere else. However, we have to be careful and look at the evidence from the last census: 40% of the people working in all constituencies work in areas outside the parliamentary boundary that they live within. We have to be very careful because we cannot instruct businesses where to go. Businesses will determine that on that on the basis of whatever factors are in their criteria. We will seek to put the best-case scenario right across Northern Ireland to attract jobs because we are conscious that nearly half of our people work outside their parliamentary boundary.

Mr Speaker: My apologies, Mr McGlone. I should have called you as the Chair first. Please accept my apology.

Mr McGlone: Tá tú ceart go leor. You are all right. Agus mo bhuíochas leis an Aire chomh maith. Thanks very much to the Minister as well.

Much has been made, Minister, by the manufacturing sector of the need for a more strategic approach and the development of a manufacturing strategy. Has the Minister deliberated on a stakeholder-type approach involving manufacturers, the social and trade union sector and his Department in order to develop a more contemporary manufacturing strategy?

Mr Bell: The manufacturing strategy that the five parties, including the Member's, came to was the economic strategy, and DETI's manufacturing strategy is within that. I have met unions, and I have tried to take forward some of their ideas. They have asked me specifically to do things around energy costs, and I think that everyone in the House knows what we did, particularly in relation to Bombardier, our biggest manufacturer.

Sadly, we will never see the truth. I was ready to sign off a three quarters of a million pounds grant investment to Michelin to try to bring its energy costs down. I can work with trade unions on some things; I do not think that other things that they have asked me to do, like appointing additional junior Ministers, would be acceptable to the House. We will work together to support them in the way they are and to continue their growth.

Mr Speaker: I inform Members that question 9 has been withdrawn.

Chinese Government: Ministerial Engagement

3. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what engagement he has had with the Chinese Government in his capacity as Minister. (AQO 9043/11-16)

Mr Bell: In June this year, I met Madam Wang Ling, the vice governor of Hubei province in China during her visit to Northern Ireland. The meeting related specifically to our agrifood sector, and I was there with some of our major companies, including Moy Park.

At the beginning of July, I met Madam Wang Shuying, consul general of the People's Republic of China when we addressed the China Healthcare and Life Sciences Roadshow in Riddel Hall at Stranmillis. That was an important initiative taken forward by United Kingdom trade and industry on how we can develop health and life sciences.

Last month, I attended the UK-China business summit at the Mansion House in London, after which a dinner was hosted by the Lord Mayor and President Xi. At that economic summit, the value to the United Kingdom of up to £40 billion of investment was outlined by the Prime Minister, David Cameron, and by President Xi Jinping.

Mr Cree: Minister, welcome back. You have been quoted as saying that we are now in what is being labelled the “golden age” in UK-China relations. Can you explain to us exactly why you say that, how it is “golden”, particularly with respect to Northern Ireland, and when we may see direct benefits in Northern Ireland from China?

2.15 pm

While I appreciate your attributing the quotation to me, I was repeating what the Prime Minister, David Cameron, said when he talked about the “golden age” of UK-China relations and the development of the new Silk Road. The Chancellor very wisely said that he wants the United Kingdom to be the European choice of investment for the Chinese Government. There are trillions available, in their foreign exchange and how they invest it, and we want to bring that to Northern Ireland.

Six years ago, Northern Ireland was exporting in the region of £60 million to China. Figures for the last period show that we have raised that to £95.5 million. It is my intention and target to take our exports to China over £100 million by the next period of office.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for his responses so far. Can he tell us what potential he sees for the Confucius Institute in Northern Ireland? How does he see that relationship growing?

Mr Bell: It is a valuable relationship for Northern Ireland. All the work through Ulster University in the Confucius classrooms is funded through the UK Hanban Institute. I would like to thank the First Minister and the deputy First Minister for their support in helping us to bring that together; Dolores Kelly who, as chair of the all-party group on China and as Chair of the Employment and Learning Committee in that period, helped us to get the initiative off the ground; and Danny Kennedy who, as Minister at the time, supported it. There was also very valuable input from Anna Lo.

What we need to realise is that, according to Goldman Sachs, China will become the world's largest economy somewhere in the 2020s. We have a unique opportunity to work alongside to attract investment to Northern Ireland from what is the world's largest trading economy and which is about to become the world's largest economy.

I am delighted that from the convent school in Omagh to Bangor Academy in my area, to Millburn Primary School in Coleraine, to South West College in Fermanagh, 1,500 of our young people have successfully passed their first qualification in Mandarin this year.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his answers. I freely acknowledge that he is deeply committed to human rights and religious freedom. Can he tell the House on how many occasions he raised those issues with the Chinese Government?

Mr Bell: As the Member knows, human rights and foreign and Commonwealth matters are raised by the UK Government, and I fully endorse the position taken forward by them. Anybody who knows me will know that I was a commissioner with the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission for many years. I passionately believe, in terms of my faith and the principles of being an Orangeman, in civil and religious liberty for all. I will always advocate those principles, no matter which country I am in.

Mr Speaker: Mr Paul Givan is not in his place. We will move on.

McAuley Precision/McAuley Fabrication: Expansion

5. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment how the expansion of McAuley Precision and McAuley Fabrication will benefit North Antrim. (AQO 9045/11-16)

Mr Bell: Advanced engineering businesses McAuley Precision and McAuley Fabrication are undertaking a £5 million expansion, supported by Invest Northern Ireland, which will cumulatively create 87 new skilled advanced manufacturing jobs in Ballymoney by 2019. The 87 new jobs are planned to be recruited over the next four years, and it is anticipated that they will generate £2.1 million annually in additional salaries in the north Antrim economy.

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his answer. I am sure that he will agree with me that that was excellent news for the economy of north Antrim. However, he will be aware that, unfortunately, it was a case of the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, given the devastating announcement just some weeks later of the job losses at Michelin. Is the Minister willing to meet me, along with stakeholders in the Ballymena and north Antrim area, to discuss a strategy to bring more much needed jobs into the area?

Mr Bell: Yes, I am more than happy to do that. The announcement was a surprise to me, and the unions have confirmed that it was a surprise to them.

I pay tribute from this Dispatch Box to the workers specifically at Michelin. Their output was high, and my quarterly report of September showed some of the best figures ever. Unfortunately, through no fault of their own, there was a five million unit reduction in the tyre market, and there were costs associated with Asia and the fluctuation of the euro that were beyond everyone's control at that particular time. I have met unions and workers, and I praise the fact that, on Friday, as I met some of the management, the workers were back on the floor. We have period of two to two and a half years, right through to 2018, to try to get this right, and I will leave no stone unturned to try to bring in jobs to replace what is there.

Mr Allister: The news at McAuley's was most welcome and came against a landscape of a succession of less-good-news stories for Ballymoney, where there has been a downward trend in employment. Although the McAuley announcement was somewhat overshadowed by the news from Michelin, it is nonetheless of itself good news for Ballymoney. On the subject of Ballymoney, what can the Minister tell us about planned and scheduled FDI visits to that part of north Antrim?

Mr Bell: What we do is this: we go out to companies and try to attract them. When I talk about the specific area, I do not just say, "Look, just come to this town and don't look at anywhere else". I give them the skill set for the area. I get very disappointed when I read in the media about people talking about declining industrial towns and declining manufacturing. I do not take anything away from what happened with Patton, JTI Gallaher or Michelin, but there is a huge good-news story to tell in that particular area, and it is the good-news story of Moy Park, Randox — with its hundreds of new jobs — Schrader and Wrightbus. You would be privileged to sit on a bus in Hong Kong that is made in Ballymena. Therefore, be conscious of the fact that, according to the census, 40% of us work outside our area. Let us attract the jobs into Northern Ireland. We have a golden opportunity through reducing our corporation tax to make ourselves competitive and to bring in tens of thousands of new jobs.

Bombardier/Airbus: Talks

6. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of the aborted talks about the deal between Bombardier and Airbus. (AQO 9046/11-16)

Mr Bell: It was a pleasure to meet Bombardier senior management during my visit to Canada. Although Bombardier faces challenges, its management team is confident that those can be overcome and that sales will follow. It would be wrong to speculate further on the potential outcomes of Bombardier's commercial decisions. I welcome the recent Bombardier announcement of the Quebec Government's plan to invest $1 billion in the CSeries. All of us should view that as a very positive development.

Bombardier Aerospace is a major contributor to the manufacturing economy. It has a workforce of almost 5,500, and all of us know that it is a vibrant supply chain right across Northern Ireland. Bombardier Belfast supports almost all the company's aircraft programmes, and it provides advanced engineering services to a number of third-party customers. Therefore, it was a very positive meeting, and we are very upbeat about the future of a quality product in the CSeries.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answer. Given what the Minister termed as the "surprise" collapse of Michelin, can he guarantee that he will monitor the situation here so that we do not have any further nasty surprises?

Mr Bell: I cannot guarantee that what happened with Michelin can never happen again, and nobody in the House can give that guarantee. What I can guarantee is that we will do all in our power to ensure that it does not happen. What we had at Michelin was almost monthly visits from Invest Northern Ireland. We put in about £4.75 million of taxpayers' money to support the jobs that were there, and we put in training support. On the specific issue of energy, we tried to act where we had the tools to act, and that was with a £750,000 grant to support them in using renewables to bring their energy costs down.

We are keeping a watching brief across a number of areas that are finding it difficult. We have people — in many cases, Invest Northern Ireland — going in monthly. We are also receiving, in many cases, reports — sometimes quarterly reports and sometimes monthly updates — on specific areas. We will do all in our power to protect the manufacturing sector.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his answers today. Does he recognise — I know that he has mentioned it — that Bombardier is leading in cutting-edge technology in composite engineering? Does he recognise the good work that Bombardier is doing in looking at alternative energy sources, especially in the renewables sector?

Mr Bell: Bombardier is doing excellent work. I saw the CSeries in production and saw the busy factory floor and the aircraft being assembled in the final stages of production, and I want to congratulate the entire Bombardier team. They can be very proud, as the Member rightly says, of the C Series. There is a great sense of pride across Northern Ireland to see wings that have been built in Belfast being attached to what is a game-changing aircraft. There will be challenges, but the management team is confident that those can be overcome and that more success can follow.

What have the Government done? I brought legislation to the House specifically to give the reassurance that was necessary to the investors about their renewable plant, which is valued at well over £100 million, and I am delighted to see that the other finance has now stacked up. We look forward to seeing the reduction, which could mean up to a quarter of energy costs reduced for our largest manufacturer.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister and commend him on his visit to Bombardier in Quebec. Of course, we all echo the support for Bombardier at this time. Minister, do you agree with me that, in light of the commitment of the Quebec Government through the $1 billion invested in Bombardier, there are lessons there for all of us here about getting behind our industries, particularly our manufacturing industries, in this part of the world?

Mr Bell: Yes, I want to fully get behind them. I met one union initially and have had a series of meetings with Manufacturing Northern Ireland. I attended its programme here in Parliament Buildings, where we celebrated the manufacturing industry. We heard the good news that some of the things that we have done in the House have been game changers and are not available anywhere else in the UK. That has supported the manufacturing industry. That is why I think we are seeing growth. I am open to ideas. I will continue to meet manufacturers. I spent a period with the Chamber of Commerce in Magherafelt, with the huge success of SDC Trailers, but I also took the opportunity to meet dozens of people from the manufacturing sector and Manufacturing Northern Ireland. I want to salute them for the growth that they have already achieved, and I will certainly apply whatever is in my toolbox to help it go forward, because we want those jobs and that growth in the manufacturing sector.

Mrs McKeivitt: In your previous answers, Minister, you did not want to speculate much on the $1 billion bailout of Bombardier and the proposed aid from, I think you said, the federal Canadian Government. Has the Minister made an assessment of the threat to manufacturing jobs in Belfast due to the impact on Bombardier of the loss of the market share to the Chinese state-owned aerospace companies?

Mr Bell: Bombardier has made a huge commitment to Northern Ireland. I think that we want to be a little bit careful before we use words like "bailout", because I am not sure that it accurately reflects what has happened. When you bring an aircraft into production, there are huge challenges. I have looked at the Bombardier chart in Canada for airworthiness and all the checks that it has to make, and it is fully confident that it can get entry into the market by the second quarter of 2016. I will not speculate on potential sales or potential discussions and joint ventures, because there is a need for commercial sensitivity.

What I can tell you is that the management are confident that those challenges can be overcome and that they will successfully enter the market in the second quarter of 2016 with a brilliant aircraft, with its wings made here in Northern Ireland, with all the support that gives to the supply chain. I am confident that it will be successful.

2.30 pm

Mr Speaker: That is the end of the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

VAT: Tourism Businesses

T1. Mr McCallister asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment whether he will concede that a reduction in the rate of VAT in Northern Ireland for tourism businesses is unlikely to happen, given that he will be aware that the Northern Ireland Select Committee is considering that issue, and to state what other policies he would like to put in place if that differential is not established. (AQT 3101/11-16)

Mr Bell: I do not accept that, just because in a reserved matter people think it less or more likely for us to achieve something, we should not continue to make the argument that we need to achieve it. Our hospitality and tourism sector is going from strength to strength. Figures recently released showed that our tourism is up. We have set ourselves a target of a £1 billion tourism industry by 2020. Major events will do that, such as the Open Championship coming to Northern Ireland, which is good news. As the Member will know, the only times that the Irish Open sold out were at Royal Portrush and Royal County Down, with a staggering 107,000 paying spectators. Just think how that bodes for the Open coming to Northern Ireland. We will continue to make the argument for a reduction in VAT because the case can be well made, and we will continue to support the sector to achieve that £1 billion target.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply. The other issue that tourism faces is cuts to the arts: does he feel that that is a difficulty? While I accept that the Irish Open was a huge success at Royal County Down, the other challenge, particularly in a constituency like South Down, is growing tourism, making it sustainable, having jobs and increasing tourism spend. He needs to address all those things. How does he propose to address some of them?

Mr Bell: The first thing in growing tourism is for the industry to look at tourism and hospitality as a career choice from the outset and give it the status that it deserves as an industry that provides a similar number of jobs in Northern Ireland to agriculture. The first thing that you want to do is ensure that you have your skills base right. Tourism research informs me that people remember the people they meet at the first point of contact, and we must make sure that they are properly skilled. The second thing is your tourism offering. We have a huge offering from the creative industries, and you mentioned the arts. There is "Game of Thrones", which is HBO's most successful series, right through to golf tourism and the beauty of the geography of Northern Ireland, particularly in areas such as the Mourne mountains. All in all, we need to thank the industry for the 2% increase in visitor numbers that it achieved in the first six months of this year.

Michelin Job Losses: Government Support

T2. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, in light of the news last week about Michelin, which was devastating not only for north Antrim but for many people in the East Antrim constituency, for an assurance that his Department will continue to work with Invest NI, Mid and East Antrim Borough Council and the Department for Employment and Learning to ensure that support is available for workers at the Michelin plant, not only in the next few months but up to 2018 and beyond. (AQT 3102/11-16)

Mr Bell: Yes, I can give that assurance, and we have already started. I place on the record my thanks to Stephen Farry, the Minister for Employment and Learning, who, on hearing the news, was immediately in my office. We spent several hours together discussing with the mayor and the chief executive of the council what we could do and what Invest NI support could come to the council. We acknowledge the work of the Michelin management team in ensuring that people will not be out of work until 2018. Their hope and ambition, which is an ambition that everybody in the House should have, is that those people can leave work and go to another job with a healthy pay cheque in their hands. What we have to do now is reduce our corporation tax, set the date on which we will do that and attract the 30,000-plus new jobs that are available to Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for his answer. There has also been an awful lot of good news in East Antrim recently. The Minister visited my constituency on Friday and was able to see the excellent work of businesses and a social enterprise there. We now have the Gobbins visitor attraction, which he has also been to, so we have much positive news as well. Can the Minister tell the House how many jobs have been promoted in East Antrim during this Assembly term? What can Invest NI do to ensure that employment can continue to grow in my constituency?

Mr Bell: Mr Lyons will be proud to know that, at one point in the history of Northern Ireland, the Gobbins cliff path was more successful in attracting tourists than the Giant's Causeway. I can see huge potential for what can be done there in the future. On the specific question on jobs promoted in East Antrim, there have been 672 external, with 33 in the last period. In East Antrim locally, from 2011-12 to the forwarding period, we have had 458 and 119. The number of jobs promoted in the East Antrim parliamentary constituency from 2011-12 to 2014-15 sits at 1,130, with 152 in the last period.

Wind Energy

T3. Ms Hanna asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, now that the NIRO consultation has ended, to outline what conversations he might be able to have with the Department of Energy and Climate Change across the water about the future of wind energy in Northern Ireland. (AQT 3103/11-16)

Mr Bell: I was very disappointed that, having consulted the coalition Government and set out our figure for 2017-18, a Conservative Government stepped in and immediately changed it with respect to wind. They changed their position; we did not change ours. In response to that, I tried to support farmers, I tried to support small-scale industry and I tried to support large-scale industry.

However, it fell at the first hurdle in the House, with some Members telling me, "We will not allow you to spend one penny extra in Northern Ireland". Subsequent to that, the Department of Energy and Climate Change (DECC) changed its position. In its changed position, DECC allowed us to bring across over 90% large-scale and a significant number of small-scale. Others were to follow, and we could socialise the costs across the whole of the United Kingdom. I will continue to do what I can for small-scale in conversations. We are in detailed discussions and correspondence with DECC, but I also have to be conscious of the cost of energy to the Northern Ireland domestic user and to industry.

Ms Hanna: With all that in mind, does the Minister regret his earlier statement about the certainty of that funding, which gave considerable comfort to small-scale producers? I appreciate that there are mitigating circumstances in the UK-wide context, but can he outline what, specifically, he will be able to do to help that sector recover?

Mr Bell: I am seeking to ensure the best outcomes in cost to the consumer and the number of megawatts that can be achieved. I have to take DECC's changing position into account. It took position a, and I responded to position a in the best interests of Northern Ireland and supported the small-scale. I tried to put it through the Committee of the House, and the Committee rejected it. Then, when DECC came up with position b, I tried to look at what was in the best interests of Northern Ireland for the industry and for the domestic consumer. Energy is devolved, but costs are socialised. We need to take into account the three parts of what is known as the energy trilemma. You cannot go just for any one sector: you have to look at security of supply. We need to get the North/South interconnector up and running, as we are missing out on £20 million savings because of the circumstances of that project. However, we will always have to look at cost and at people's ability to pay.

Energy: Meeting with Amber Rudd

T4. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment whether, given his previous comments and previous meetings with Amber Rudd from the Department of Energy and Climate Change (DECC), he would be willing to meet her again. (AQT 3104/11-16)

Mr Bell: I will meet her any time, any place, anywhere, but Amber Rudd was a Minister in the previous Government. The present Prime Minister was Prime Minister in the previous Government. As a result of discussions that my predecessor had with them, we went out to our industry and said that the date is 2017, with a grace period to 2018. When the Conservative Government came into power, they moved the goalposts in Northern Ireland, and everything that I have done subsequent to that and to DECC's change of position is to try to drive forward a position that can ensure that the Northern Ireland consumer — the business customer — gets best value at minimum cost.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his clarity and welcome the fact that he intends to meet Amber Rudd again. Do I take that as a declaration of his intent to go in and fight for those people who are clearly losing out?

Mr Bell: People in my constituency borrowed money against their own homes to go for renewables on the basis of what DECC had allowed Northern Ireland to do in the terms of its consultation. I am acutely aware of their needs, and, when the record of this period is written, they will see that, when Amber Rudd changed her position, I tried to put legislation specific to Northern Ireland through the House. The Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee turned down legislation that I was seeking to introduce for farmers and small-scale users. When Amber Rudd changed her position again, I tried to nuance the position, and the Committee again turned down proposals for small-scale users and farmers. I am in discussion with Amber Rudd, in writing and through my officials, to see what we can do for those people, but I can only do what is realistic and introduce legislation that the Committee allows to go to the Floor.

Energy Legislation: Committee Position

T5. Mr McGlone asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment at what point he believes that the Committee rejected legislation, given that, at no point did it reject legislation and, on two occasions, it sought further clarification, albeit that, if the Minister is so unaware of that, that makes for a worse situation, given the two preposterously bad evidence sessions that the Committee held on the matter. (AQT 3105/11-16)

Mr Bell: I am fearful when a Committee Chairman has to ask a Minister what his own Committee did in terms of delay and getting legislation through. Members of the Committee, including the Chairman, have adopted different positions at different times. One cannot be a chameleon and change colours depending on who we are talking to. The Chairman of the Committee cannot be like a cushion, simply bearing the imprint of whoever sat on him last. We did not change our position. I brought legislation to the Committee, and it got delayed and did not go through. I nuanced it and tried to bring additional information, but it got delayed and did not go through. I hope that farmers look to that Committee to see what could have been done, had it followed the advice that I originally gave it. Those people who are losing out — Members may laugh — should take a close look at the work of the Committee.

Mr McGlone: That is very good. It is good to have a Minister who lives in a parallel world. I invite him to look at Hansard and the public record. On a unanimous cross-party basis, the spotlight shone very firmly on his Department, and its shortcomings were incredibly crass. Is the Minister prepared to be part of the solution, which, on a cross-party basis and with the agreement of all parties, we have sought to bring with his cooperation, which is not great today?

Mr Speaker: I am glad that you could find a question.

2.45 pm

Mr Bell: Sadly, the Chairman is not across his brief on what occurred. When we tried to do what we said we would do in Northern Ireland, it did not go forward. I agree that there was a cross-party basis for not taking it forward. My understanding, when I sat down with the Chairman in my room upstairs and pleaded the case for small-scale farmers and others who are suffering today — many of whom borrowed against their house — is that he was supportive. Then, in the Committee room, the position was completely different. In fact, I was told that Northern Ireland would not allow one single extra penny. You saw the work of the Committee. It is a matter of record what I brought to the House. It is a matter of record how DECC changed its position. I am more than happy to stand with anyone and look at what DECC proposed, what it changed, and how, in every single case, I looked at what was in the best interests of Northern Ireland as a whole.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. Time is up.

Environment

Mr Speaker: I inform Members that questions 8 and 12 have been withdrawn.

Councillors: Code of Conduct

1. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of the Environment when the review into the Northern Ireland local government code of conduct for councillors will be completed. (AQO 9055/11-16)

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I have appointed the chair of a working group that will shortly commence a review of the Northern Ireland local government code of conduct for councillors. The working group will review the principles in part 3 and the rules on decision-making in part 8 by February 2016. I will consider the outcome of the review and any proposed changes to the code of conduct prior to consultation.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

It is important that the local government sector has an opportunity to put forward its views on the code, and the working group will engage with key stakeholders and invite them to give their views in writing or at a stakeholders' engagement event. The review will be completed, and consultation on any revised code of conduct will commence during the current mandate. However, I have asked the chair of the working group to seek the views of key stakeholders on the possibility of shortening the timetable for the review to enable the consultation to be completed and the revised code put in place during this mandate.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. Is the Minister confident that the anomalies in part 8.1 of the code will be rectified in a way that enables councillors to interact lawfully with one another?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. Part 8 has caused the most consternation and, indeed, I think it fair to say, confusion among councillors and NILGA, their representative body. Many of the issues revolve around the fact that it can be interpreted as diluting or emasculating their performance as elected representatives. The concerns expressed were that councillors would not be allowed to organise support for, or opposition against, a particular recommendation or matter being considered; they would not be allowed to lobby other councillors on a matter being considered or not to comply with political group decisions on a matter being considered where the decisions differed from a councillor's own views. Further, they would not be allowed to act as an advocate for, or promote, a particular recommendation in relation to matters being considered. Basically, councillors would not be allowed to be politicians or public representatives. The working group will look at each of these concerns, and part 8 in general, and I look forward to receiving its comments. Clearly, I am hopeful and confident that these issues will be resolved.

Mr Campbell: Can the Minister assure the House that, when the reviewed code of conduct sees the light of day, we will not have a repeat of the current position that at least one councillor in Northern Ireland, in Londonderry and Strabane, has not only been convicted of a criminal offence but has repeatedly not only refused to condemn terrorist incidents but expressed his support for dissident republican activity? I am sure that the Minister is well aware of whom I speak. That person remains an elected representative and is not seen as having breached the current code of conduct.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. The aspects of the code that are being reviewed are in parts 3 and 8. I have described in detail the implications around part 8, which pertains to decision-making by councils and councillors. Part 3 deals with principles, and that will hopefully address some of the concerns that the Member has raised. I cannot pre-empt the workings of a review, but it will go out to consultation and the Member and party colleagues will have an opportunity to take part in that consultation.

Mr Cree: Minister, while it is essential that we have a workable code of conduct, do you agree that it is important that the content of that code or protocol should not become a tool for vexatious purposes by political opponents?

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Cree for that question, although I am sure that no political opponents would stoop to such depths as to use what is written in the code as a means to attack or detract from a political opponent. I think that it is vitally important that all members adhere to what is written in the code and also to what is not written with regards to the respect with which they treat their fellow politicians and members of the public.

Mr Allister: Will there be any opportunity to write into the code an obligation on councillors to request and receive allowances only to their personal accounts, in order to end the abuse that is presently ongoing with Sinn Féin councillors in some areas? If that cannot be done within the code, how will the Minister deal with that abuse?

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Allister for that question; again, I am aware of the situation to which the Member refers. However, I fear that this review will not provide an opportunity to address that anomaly that he quite rightly identifies. Both primary and subordinate legislation clearly state that councillor allowances are payable by councils directly to councillors. The relevant legislation is contained in Part 3 of the Local Government Finance Act (NI) 2011 and in the Local Government (Payments to Councillors) Regulations (NI) 2012.

In light of the recent court proceedings, my officials wrote to all district council chief executives to remind them of this legislation, but the legislation is silent on which bank accounts councillors' allowances must be paid into. I have written to council chief executives on the matter, and I will speak to them all about it in the near future. Whereas the Assembly has the power to investigate whether an account number given by a Member is actually a personal account, councils do not have that investigative duty or power.

Neighbourhood Renewal/Regeneration Powers

2. Ms Fearon asked the Minister of the Environment whether neighbourhood renewal and regeneration powers will be transferred to councils in April 2016. (AQO 9056/11-16)

Mr Durkan: Thank you —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, Minister. I understand that there has been an administrative error within the system. I understand that you were informed that the question had been withdrawn. The Member was not informed that the question had been withdrawn and that another Department may well answer the question.

I call Mr Trevor Lunn.

Natural Environment Fund

3. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of the Environment whether he has secured the continuation of the natural environment fund after May 2016. (AQO 9057/11-16)

Mr Durkan: Conscious of the difficult operating environment and the fact that current funding arrangements finish on 31 March 2016, I had indicated that I would urgently consider the development of appropriate funding mechanisms to enable third parties to deliver key environmental outcomes from April 2016. I have listened to the views of stakeholders, who particularly sought certainty on funding and multi-year funding, and I today announce a new environment fund that will cover two years, with possible extension for a third year. Funding will be allocated for the next financial year, 2016-17, with the potential for funding in future years subject to future Budget decisions made by the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly. That is a broader fund than the previous natural environment fund. The new fund will cover the delivery of a wider range of key environmental outcomes under two broad themes: ensuring good habitat quality, landscape and species abundance and diversity; and the promotion of health, well-being, resource efficiency and sustainable economic development, realising the full value of our environment. It will provide a more comprehensive, transparent and consistent funding mechanism by which the majority of environmental outcomes can be delivered by third parties under grant aid.

Alongside the environment fund, I have also recognised that the Department will continue to need to develop additional mechanisms to support the delivery of environmental priorities in 2016-17, and beyond, via funding to third parties.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for that comprehensive answer. It is quite a coincidence that he should launch the fund on the same day as I ask that question, but he has completely killed any opportunity for a supplementary question. Thank you very much.

Mr Flanagan: I will be honest: I was not really listening to the Minister's answer, so I do not know whether he has answered my question or not, but I presume that he has not, because I am asking him about something else. Can he give us an update on the scheme announced in June, similar to the plastic bag tax? He proposes to bring in a deposit-return scheme for bottles. Can he give us any update on that off the top of his head?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for the question, although the link is quite tenuous. I think the Member gave that away himself by saying that he had not listened to my previous answer but was going to ask me about something completely different anyway.

I floated the idea of introducing something along the lines of a deposit-return scheme for drinks containers — bottles, largely — at the start of the summer, and since then my officials have been working on it. We have been looking at and learning from other jurisdictions. Scotland ran a pilot on it, and we are now looking at the results of that pilot. It is something that I will be speaking about to my counterpart — counterpart, sorry; that is another vessel — counterpart in Scotland, Minister Lochhead, in January when I visit him. I see great opportunities, not just for our environment, but for collaboration with other jurisdictions. There will be considerable outlay involved if we are to proceed with that scheme, but I believe that the expense of the initial outlay can be offset and greatly reduced by collaborating with Scotland and, potentially, the Irish Republic.

Mr Rogers: Minister, thanks for your answers thus far. What will the total value of the fund be? Will you ensure that funding will be available to ensure the effective management of areas of outstanding natural beauty like the Mournes?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. As yet, we do not have detail on how much will be available; I am working on that with officials. It is vital that those organisations have certainty as early as possible. They will be able to apply from this week. I intend to open applications from Thursday, and they will have a month, up until 10 December, in which to apply. In the meantime, we will work on how much money we can make available from the fund. As the fund is broader than the natural environment fund that I established this year, I hope that the pot will be bigger in terms of finance available as well. It will also be broader in that it will be able to assist groups like those the Member referred to that ensure the effective management of areas of natural beauty such as the Mournes.

It is worth underlining that, even this year, with an extremely challenging budget outcome for my Department, over half a million pounds was allocated to various environmental NGOs to continue to provide a full range of environmental and visitor management for areas of outstanding natural beauty. Indeed, it was mainly for the Mournes area. I can also confirm that those organisations will be able to apply for funding from the new environment fund that I have spoken of today.

Ms Lo: I am sorry for my voice today.

I am absolutely delighted with the Minister's announcement, and I am sure that the sector is very reassured by it. I understand that the Minister has said that he is still working out what money there will be. What about the built heritage sector? Will it be protected, too? Will it be assured of further funding from that pot?

3.00 pm

Mr Durkan: I thank the Chairperson of the Environment Committee for that question, which is indeed very topical, given 'The Detail' report that, I believe, was given comprehensive coverage on the BBC's 'Talkback' today.

Regrettably, built heritage projects will not be able to avail themselves of the environment fund that we are talking about. However, I very much value our built heritage, and the funding that I was able to provide to it in the previous financial year is indicative of that. That should be looked at, rather than how much I was unable to provide in that direction this year.

Under the restructuring of Departments, the function of built heritage will go in a different direction to that of environment and will lie in the new Department for Communities. However, it is extremely important that its importance and value be recognised. Built heritage plays a massive role in promoting our economy and, indeed, the health and well-being of our citizens.

I have spoken to officials about built heritage's importance, and they recognise its importance. It has frustrated my officials in the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) greatly that the only money that we were able to allocate to built heritage this year was through the carrier-bag levy. We were able to allocate almost £600,000 to buildings that were deemed to have a community function or benefit. I am aware of a number of buildings of great value out there that really need work done on them. We are working on finding a way in which to do just that.

Planning Applications

4. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister of the Environment to outline the criteria used when making the decision to call in a planning application. (AQO 9058/11-16)

Mr Durkan: Since April 2015, district councils have been responsible for determining the vast majority of planning applications. Under the reformed two-tier planning system, applications for local and major developments are submitted to, and determined by, local councils, while applications for regionally significant developments are processed and decided by the Department.

The Planning Act also allows the Department to direct that any planning application be referred to it instead of being dealt with by a council. In recognising and respecting the important role of councils in making decisions on the future development of their area, I envisage that call-in power being exercised only in exceptional circumstances. I believe that councils, with locally elected and accountable representatives, are best placed to take the key decisions about the future growth and development of their local areas and communities. However, there may be circumstances in which a proposed development raises issues of such regional importance or strategic interest that the application should be called in so that the Department can in effect take over the role of decision-maker.

My Department has published guidance, 'Notification and Call In of Applications', which highlights the legislative procedures to be complied with by district councils when notifying the Department on all types of applications, including potential call-in cases, and provides an indication of the matters that may be considered by the Department when deciding whether an application should be called in. Those include considering the relevant development plan; the opinions of statutory consultees; the national importance of the proposal; the relationship of the proposal to a regionally significant application; the significance of the development to the whole or part of Northern Ireland; and any potential significant effects that a proposal may have outside Northern Ireland. Each case will, however, be considered on its own merits, and the fact that a particular development proposal may be complex or controversial will not necessarily mean that it is of strategic interest or regional importance.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his answer. Minister, you recently called in the application of the Cam Burn wind farm, which is causing a bit of a breeze in my constituency. You issued a notice of an opinion to approve, which is at odds with the views of the local council. What happens next with that application?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. There has indeed been some attention around my decision to call in this application and to approve it. I have written to the council not only to outline my decision to approve it, and the rationale behind that, but to inform the council of its next steps. The council has 28 days during which it can ask for a hearing on my decision, in effect. Should it choose to do so, that hearing will be held by the Planning Appeals Commission (PAC), which will give its determination on the application. However, the final decision will ultimately come back to me. Should the council wish to go down that route, and the PAC decides that I was wrong, the decision would come back to me and I could reverse it. I am very doubtful that the PAC would find that to be so, and the decision would come back to me either way.

Mr Swann: Minister, when you say that you doubt that the PAC will change that, have you already made up your mind? So, is there no point in members of the Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council coming to you? If you are saying in the Chamber today that you have made up your mind, you have breached that entire process. By calling in this planning application, you have undermined councillors on the council's planning committee. It was disgraceful that the chief planning officer in that area and the chair of the planning committee found out about your decision through the BBC.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. However, I correct him by saying that I have not breached any process or procedure. I share his disdain about the manner in which elected representatives found out about this decision. I do not know how the BBC got hold of this so quickly, and I place that on record.

The council now has a chance to ask for a hearing. I am not saying that I would overrule the PAC, should it come to a different view to mine. However, I am saying that it would have to come back to me, and I very much doubt that the commission would come to a different conclusion than have I, given that council and DOE planners thought that this was a nailed-on approval. I may have done the council a favour in some respects.

I caught the end of Minister Bell's Question Time, and there was something around the Northern Ireland renewables or renewables obligation certificates (ROCs) situation here. Given its failure to issue an approval to what, I think, is a blatantly approvable application that it might have stopped or stymied, the council could have left itself in a precarious position and open to not just a planning appeal but further legal proceedings.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. It appears that when you mention the word renewables in this place, you have to get things firmly on the record or, when you meet a Minister, make sure that you have someone to take an independent minute, as I did.

Will the Minister outline what progress has been made towards meeting the Programme for Government renewable energy targets, as his Department fits into that?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. The Programme for Government targets are a material consideration when dealing with or processing any planning application. The Member will be aware that I published the strategic planning policy statement, the SPPS, on 28 September. It consolidates, updates and improves the policy context of the suite of planning policy statements (PPS), including PPS 18 on renewable energy. The aim of the SPPS in relation to renewable energy is:

"to facilitate the siting of renewable energy generating facilities in appropriate locations within the built and natural environment in order to achieve Northern Ireland's renewable energy targets and to realise the benefits of renewable energy without compromising other environmental assets of acknowledged importance."

The SPPS will, inter alia, continue to support and contribute to the renewable energy target of 40% of electricity consumption here in the North from renewable resources by 2020, as set out by the Executive and indicated in DETI's strategic energy framework. Furthermore, DETI has advised that the Executive's 2015 Programme for Government target of 20% renewable energy generation is being met.

Ms Sugden: I will bring the issue back to where we started. Does the Minister concede that his initial decision to approve Cam Burn wind farm was ill advised, given the planning legislation, and that, since I submitted two priority written questions, which he is yet to answer, he has done a quick U-turn to abide by the law?

Mr Durkan: I look forward to reading that question again in Hansard. I have not conceded anything; I have outlined what the council could do, should it wish to challenge my decision, which, let me state clearly, is, I believe, the right decision and is a legal decision.

I have also answered a priority question from the Member. She may not have received the answer yet, but I have answered that question. I am taken aback by her, shall we say, recent interest in this planning application. The planning application was in the Department for a considerable time and has been with the council for six months or more, yet the first the council or I heard from the Member on it was after she learned about it on the BBC.

Road Safety

5. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of the Environment to outline what action he is taking to address the rising numbers of fatalities and serious injuries on local roads. (AQO 9059/11-16)

Mr Durkan: The number of road deaths in 2015 is a serious concern, and I extend my sympathy to those who have lost loved ones and those who have suffered life-changing injuries. So far this year, 61 people have died, compared with 69 at the same time last year.

At the beginning of the year, severe cuts were made by the Executive to my Department's Budget allocation. Despite the very challenging financial position, I was able to allocate just over £1 million to road safety communications, grants and educational materials. In recent weeks, I have been able to supplement that with a further £184,000 through internal reallocations. Despite the regrettable 50% reduction in the road safety budget, my Department continues to take a range of actions to reduce deaths and serious injuries on our roads. We focus on problem areas, such as drink-driving, speeding and carelessness and inattention and on groups that are over-represented in the casualty figures. Those areas are the key focus of the Road Traffic (Amendment) Bill, which completed its Consideration Stage in June. I will shortly bring the Bill back to the Assembly to conclude its legislative passage.

In March, I launched a new motorcyclist safety campaign, and in June I launched the 2015-16 road safety grant scheme, through which I have approved funding for 15 projects across the North. Also in June, I launched a road safety community toolkit to give local voluntary groups all the resources they need to organise events, bringing road safety messages into the heart of local communities. Also in June, I rolled out the safe driving teaching aid, enabling driving instructors to address road safety with learner drivers. My Department also continues to provide a range of resources and schemes to be used by teachers to allow them to improve road safety behaviours in children and young people.

I assure you that I remain fully committed to continuing to work with my Executive colleagues, the PSNI and other stakeholders to improve road safety and reduce casualties.

Mr McKinney: I am sure that the House joins the Minister in recognising the deep pain felt in families and communities as a result of such tragedies. Will the Minister further outline what action will be taken to target vulnerable road users, such as younger people and older people?

Mr Durkan: There are many activities being carried out through the Department's mix of channels to address vulnerable road users. Through its social media activity and TV, radio and outdoor advertising, the Department regularly reminds drivers to give extra consideration to children, older road users and those with less protection, such as pedestrians, cyclists and motorcyclists. Messages also address vulnerable road users to increase their own safety, as they share the road with motorists, by wearing high-vis vests or coats, crossing at a safe place and obeying the rules of the road as advised in the Highway Code, amongst others.

My Department provides a range of resources and schemes to be used by teachers to allow them to improve the road safety of their pupils. The initiatives include, among others, the road safety teaching aid calendar, the enhanced cycling proficiency scheme, the junior road safety officer scheme and education packs. They have been very well received, and, for the most recent initiatives, early indications show a positive response.

3.15 pm

Through various channels, the Department reminds parents that it is their responsibility to ensure that children are properly restrained when travelling in vehicles. As I said in my original answer, I have recently approved funding for 15 road safety projects through the road safety grant scheme. Two of the projects address older road user safety, which is one of my road safety priorities. I have, therefore, approved additional funding for each project to extend their coverage to an even wider audience. One project addresses the importance of fitness-to-drive through drama. The second will deliver a comprehensive training package on alcohol and drugs awareness and hazard identification and will provide a series of driving assessments for older people.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move to topical questions.

Local Government Reform: Cost Review

T1. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of the Environment whether he sees merit in a financial review of the cost of local government reform, particularly considering that the transfer of functions, such as the planning portal and some off-street car parks, has been estimated by NILGA as costing somewhere in the region of £100 million, which could hardly be considered to be cost-neutral to councils. (AQT 3111/11-16)

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. It was always anticipated that, as we approached local government reform and the Assembly voted for it, there would be significant costs in the beginning but that, when offset against the savings that would be yielded in the medium to long term, they would pale into insignificance. I am aware of major concerns felt by and across local government on some of the issues that the Member has referred to. The problems regarding the planning portal are a lot less than they are with the transfer of off-street car parking. The responsibility for that lies, ultimately, with the DRD; it transferred that function. However, in my opinion and that of local government, the budget that transferred with the function was nowhere near adequate.

As regards a review, I will continue to work with local government, chiefly through the partnership panel. I will also meet a group of chief executives of the new councils tomorrow. I will be happy — well, I will not be happy, but I have no doubt that I will hear more from them on the issue tomorrow and through the various fora in which I engage with them. Local government knows that it has a friend in me. I will do everything I can to persuade my Executive colleagues to ensure that local government is adequately resourced to fulfil its new duties and provide good services for ratepayers at good value.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I welcome the fact that the Minister has said that he will work in partnership. I hope that he does so, particularly through NILGA and SOLACE. He agrees that, regarding the transfer of functions, there have been discrepancies between the cost impacts on councils and those projected by DOE and other Departments.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. I slated another Department — I can speak about it, but I cannot really speak for it. I can speak about the DOE and the function that we transferred: planning. I took a brave and bold step; it was unique among Ministers or those with responsibility for Departments that were transferring functions. Early in the previous financial year, I ring-fenced the budget for planning that was to go to local government so that it would not be impacted by the in-year cuts that Departments were facing. As a result, I had to make bigger cuts in different areas of my Department. That was based solely on my belief that the functions should be transferred at a point that was cost-neutral to the ratepayers in the new councils. I came up to the mark on that one. I am aware that some issues have arisen around planning, but, like I said, they are minuscule in comparison with some of the other issues facing local government. However, that does not diminish my appetite to resolve them.

Wind Farms: Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

T2. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of the Environment to outline his views on the development of wind farms in areas of outstanding natural beauty, given that wind farms are a very topical issue. (AQT 3112/11-16)

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. Wind farms are, indeed, very topical this afternoon. Following the transfer of the majority of planning functions to local councils, the determination of most wind energy proposals falls to councils, as we discussed. As such, my Department's strategic planning policy statement (SPPS) requires that the environmental, landscape, visual and amenity impacts associated with or arising from renewable energy development are given proper consideration and that adequate protection is afforded to the region's natural and cultural heritage features.

While planning policy does not rule out wind farm development in areas of outstanding natural beauty, it is a key policy objective to ensure that the environmental, landscape, visual and amenity impacts of such developments in such sensitive areas are fully considered before any decision is reached. In addition, the SPPS makes clear that a cautious approach to renewable energy development proposals will apply in designated landscapes that are of significant value, such as areas of outstanding natural beauty. That is one area in the SPPS on which we have actually strengthened policy and made it less permissive. I know that that was the view among Members, which came across very strongly in the Environment Committee's report on wind energy. I responded to that and tightened it up in the SPPS.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for that. What is his view on the proposed wind farm development in the Mourne's?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for the question; he is bringing it back to the Mourne's again. An application for Gruggandoo wind farm was received by the strategic planning division on 16 March 2015. It proposes 12 turbines, with an overall height of 125 metres, with a potential power output of 39.6 MW. An environmental statement to accompany the application was received on 31 March, and the application was declared an article 31 on that date, so it will be determined centrally by the Department. The application has been advertised in accordance with environmental impact assessment regulations, and neighbour notifications have been carried out and the consultation sent to the appropriate bodies, including Newry, Mourne and Down District Council. To date, 41 objections from third parties have been received and, just yesterday, a letter of support came in. The application is still under consideration by my Department, so I cannot comment further on it.

Ancient and Culturally Important Trees: Registry

T3. Mr Cree asked the Minister of the Environment what is being done to create a registry of ancient and culturally important trees in Northern Ireland. (AQT 3113/11-16)

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Cree. I thought that he was going to ask about a registry of Cree's rather than trees. The Member has raised the issue with me in written correspondence, and I have received quite a bit of correspondence on it through social media.

The patchwork of native broadleaved woods and hedgerows that comprise our countryside gives it a unique appearance in the context of north-west Europe. Many of Northern Ireland's native woodlands and hedgerows possess high biodiversity, landscape and cultural value and have been given statutory protection as special areas of conservation, areas of special scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty. Although many trees of special interest, due to their great age or other factors, are located in the foregoing protected areas, many grow in the countryside or in urban areas and deserve and require individual protection.

Many of the legislative functions regarding the protection of trees, the management of existing trees and the consideration of further or future protection of trees through, for example, the making of tree preservation orders transferred to the councils on 1 April this year. Councils also have the powers to draw up local development plans, which can provide policy and guidance on the management and protection of trees as part of the development proposals. I know that the Woodland Trust is campaigning very vociferously for a national tree register to celebrate our remarkable trees. I welcome the initiative for the creation of a register of trees of national special interest for Northern Ireland. I have instructed my officials to consider the resources required to establish and maintain a register and to advise me who would be best placed to administer such a register.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that. It is indeed good news. Does he envisage that the only protection would be tree protection orders or is some other form of protection needed for these trees, particularly the ancient trees that may be one-offs?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that supplementary. As I said, I have tasked my officials to do some work on this, and they will not do so in isolation. I have instructed them to go to the Woodland Trust to hear its views on this and to councils, which, as I said, now have responsibility for the protection of trees. I am not passing the buck to them. I am saying quite clearly that I want to work with councils and other interested third parties to see that this gets done.

Bonfires: Licensing Proposals

T4. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of the Environment for an update on the licensing of bonfires and to state whether he is aware that some councils provide differential funding for bonfires depending on whether they are traditional or non-traditional. (AQT 3114/11-16)

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr McCrea for that question. This is another issue on which I have announced my intention to work to resolve what is a perennial problem here in Northern Ireland. Many communities suffer at the hands of those who organise bonfires badly or whose motives are not to bring communities together but to create division and indeed chaos in their own communities.

My officials and I have been working behind the scenes with councils on the issue. There is a lot of good practice across councils. Across the North, we have seen a reduction in the number of bonfires. Indeed, I read a report in today's 'Belfast Telegraph' that stated that there has been a huge reduction in the number of fires in Belfast that burn tyres, which is to be welcomed. There is good practice. It is important that we develop that good practice, roll it out and ensure that it is uniform across all council areas.

I think that everyone — everyone in their right mind — agreed that, of the list of options that I had come forward with, the third option, that of introducing a licensing scheme, was the best way to go. I think that it has to be uniform across all council areas. I know that some councils allocate bonfire management scheme money to community groups that organise bonfires. In some cases, the group that organises the bonfire might not necessarily be the group that gets the money, and I think that that was what the Member was getting at. That needs to be stamped out. I am not trying to stamp out bonfires per se. I know that a lot of people run these things responsibly, enjoy them and see them as part of their culture.

Mr B McCrea: Is the Minister aware that some community groups feel that when you fund something, it attracts the attention of outside agencies and that this applies in particular — I will say it here — to paramilitaries? Is he aware that those community groups are looking for such funding, if there is to be a licensing scheme, to be properly recognised? Will he take the opportunity to meet some community leaders so that they can explain the problems that they are having?

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr McCrea for his question. I have said previously in the Assembly that there is a need for collective, if not unanimous, political support for a scheme like this to succeed, and not just political support but community support. Therefore, it is extremely important that we consult far and wide.

I would be happy to meet the community group or groups to which the Member referred, as I have already met people from diverse communities, shall we say, to discuss this issue as well, as I said earlier, as continuing discussions with councils and other Departments and agencies.

3.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Time is up. That concludes Question Time. I invite Members to take their ease while we change the top Table.

Executive Committee Business

Shared Education Bill: Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Shared Education Bill [NIA 66/11-16] be agreed. — [Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education).]

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I have listened with interest to the debate and welcome the interest that Members have shown in their contributions on this important matter. I will further reflect on the points that Members have raised during the debate.

Moving the Bill to its next stage will afford the opportunity to consider fully the issues. While there may be differing views as to what is necessary in the Bill, I welcome the general support for advancing shared education and for the need for legislation to define shared education. However, I acknowledge that there were a number of dissenting voices throughout the debate. Shared education has the potential to make a significant difference to the educational outcomes of our young people and to building a strong and shared community. Most Members have endorsed this, with impressive examples from their own constituencies.

I will now turn to Members' comments; I may not be able to cover them all, but I hope to cover the generality of them in my concluding remarks.

The Chair of the Education Committee set out the Committee's position on shared education and reflected on the fact that the Committee has carried out its own inquiry on the matter. I hope that the Bill passes Second Stage and moves to Committee Stage; that will give the Committee a further opportunity to explore the issues in and around the Bill with those whom it deems to be interested or wishes to see.

I welcome further debate on shared education and on the Bill. The Bill is short, but it is important. The Bill's brevity does not reflect the Department's commitment to shared education; the brevity of the Bill reflects what is needed in legislation around this issue. Members should also familiarise themselves with the shared education policy that was published earlier this year, which gives greater detail about the Department's policy and work and scope in and around shared education and direction of travel.

I suspect that the issues that were raised by the Chair to do with educational improvement, connection with the curriculum and definition, as he pointed out, will be the subject of much debate in the next stage of the Bill. The very core of shared education has to be educational improvement. It has to ensure that it connects with the curriculum, not only in schools but with youth work as well. The definition of shared education has been much debated. The inclusion of all sections in legislation around schools in terms of section 75 has, to date, proven difficult, but I await the Committee's further deliberations on that matter.

Will there be a Caesar giving a thumbs up or a thumbs down on programmes? I know that the Chair was jesting somewhat — at least I hope that he was — but there will be, as there have been up to now, clearly defined criteria against which the merits of applications and projects will be judged. Any applications that to date have gone through panels in the Education Authority and which have proven successful have been informed, and any that have not proven successful have been informed on where there were shortcomings in their projects and where they may want to concentrate in any further application. The application process for funding for shared education is open and transparent and will ensure that everyone involved in shared education is aware of how they are being judged against the criteria.

The Chair also raised the issue of whether, under this definition, children with different socio-economic levels may qualify for shared education if they all come from the one religion. That will not be the case because the legislation is quite clear that shared education is the educating together of those of different religious belief and socio-economic deprivation, so there will have to be a cross-community element. A number of Members raised the issue —

Mr Weir: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will, yes.

Mr Weir: I have a point that was raised at Committee. Obviously, the definition in the legislation is reasonable numbers of Protestants and Roman Catholics. I suppose, first, there is an issue about how that is defined, and, secondly, the query was on whether two schools from the same sector that may well have some level of mix in them would be able to qualify.

Mr O'Dowd: I do not think that it rules it out. I do not want to prejudge any application from any school. Under the criteria that we are using or can use, imaginative proposals from schools should certainly be given an opportunity to be judged against the criteria that will be published.

A number of Members raised concerns about shared education versus integrated education. Mr Lunn raised concerns about this matter and, in fairness, has done so in the past, although he is supportive of shared education policies and the Bill as it stands. No doubt, he will make his mind up about any amendments, or anything else, that come forward. Let us be clear: it is not a case of either/or. These are programmes of work in our society that, in my opinion, are complementary of each other but which should not be seen as competition to each other.

However, I will caution the House. Some Members may be of the view that they need to make it a duty rather than a power around shared education. Shared education includes the word "promote"; the legislation on integrated education does not include the word "promote". If we move to a stage where shared education is a duty and includes the word "promote", there may well be a justifiable argument that we have put integrated education into the shadows. I caution Members, when they are discussing whether there should be a power or a duty on the Department of Education, to remember that there is a difference between the definition of integrated and Irish-medium education and the Department's duties on that and the shared education clause, which includes, as was the will of the House in a previous debate on the Education Act, the word "promote". It is not in the definition of integrated, so Members should be careful in how they approach those things.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for giving way. He talked about the will of the House. It was the will of the House in 2012 that the word "promote" should be included in the obligation to promote integrated education. I know that that was in a private Members' motion rather than legislation, but it was clearly the will of the House.

Mr O'Dowd: As the Member said, a motion is not legislation. Several pieces of legislation have gone through the House since then, and the House has not taken a decision on those matters. I flag up to Members that, if they support "promote" in this instance, they are making a distinct difference between shared education, integrated education and Irish-medium education.

I also want to touch on the issue of whether the Bill allows me as Minister to undermine academic selection. Unfortunately, it does not. That is the truth of the matter, and that is to my regret but, I suspect, less to the regret of others in the House. However, I reluctantly welcome the fact that Mr Allister and Mr McCrea have now confirmed to the House that academic selection is to the disadvantage of those from a socially deprived and disadvantaged background. They have confirmed it from their own mouths today because they are opposed to the inclusion of, in clause 2, the term "socially disadvantaged". In their words, they claim that it will be to the detriment of grammar schools and to the detriment of academic selection.

I will never again have to prove to the House, or use any reference source other than the clear statement from those two gentlemen today, that academic selection is to the disadvantage of those from a socially disadvantaged background.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: They are terrified to include a clause in a Shared Education Bill that has nothing, unfortunately, to do with academic selection, but it is a fact, even though that would ensure that we break down barriers across our entire society and in our community, whether those are between people from different community backgrounds or different socio-economic backgrounds. Such is their irrational fear on the matter.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way? Will he give way?

Mr O'Dowd: They have stood up today and confirmed the very fact —

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: — that academic selection is to the disadvantage of those from a disadvantaged socio-economic background.

I will give way.

Mr Allister: Thank you. Academic selection has been an elevator for many people from very socially deprived backgrounds, so the positive proof of academic selection is that it lifts people. In deploying the argument that was used, it was deploying the Minister's approach, because it is his constant mantra that academic selection exacerbates the conflict between those who are socially deprived and those who are not. The challenge to the Minister, since that is his view against academic selection, and since the Bill enconces that, is that he is being less than forthright in failing to acknowledge that it is a leg-up for the anti-selection campaign that he heads, because it embraces the very concept that lies at the heart of —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. That is a very long intervention.

Mr O'Dowd: I caution the Member to watch his balance, because he is dancing on the head of a pin there. He knows quite well what he said in the debate earlier. Mr McCrea, who is looking to make an intervention, was on the airwaves only last week saying the exact same thing. His concern about the Shared Education Bill is that we would have groups from different socio-economic backgrounds sharing together and that that would be to the disadvantage — in his words — of the selective sector. Now that I have pointed out that they are confirming an argument that I have been using, they are trying to change that terminology. They can do that if they wish, but it does not change what they have said and what they are on record as saying.

I will give way to the Member.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. My point, Minister, which you do not appear either to accept or understand, is that you are entitled to bring forward legislation seeking the end of academic selection, if you wish to do so. What you are not entitled to do, and what I worry about in the Bill, is to do that in an underhand way. This is a Trojan Horse. Had you brought forward the Bill and not mentioned those who are experiencing socio-economic deprivation, I would have followed your argument. This legislation is supposed to be about shared education. However, it gives you an open door to fund whatever you want, and I am just putting it to you here that, if you think that the Bill is going through without scrutiny and challenge, you are wrong. This is not the right way in which to go about it. I will stand over my argument here, in a Committee or on the airwaves, because it is correct.

Mr O'Dowd: It is the Shared Education Bill, and I think that it is only right and proper that we have sharing across as many aspects of our community as possible, that we break down as many barriers in our community as possible and that we give as many young people in our community as possible different experiences and different opportunities to share those experiences.

Under current legislation, I can basically fund what I want, so that is a silly argument. Under current legislation, I can basically fund what I want — if we follow your pathway. Therefore, if I thought that funding on its own would end academic selection, I would have carried that out four and a half years ago, instead of waiting until the last six months of the term.

The Bill has absolutely nothing to do with academic selection.

It has everything to do with shared education, the four clauses in the Bill and the policy set out in Sharing Works, which was published earlier this year. Members may want to read more into it than there is. Members may wish to come up with all sorts of conspiracy theories, but they do not exist because the legislation will set the parameters of how I can work, and previous legislation sets out exactly what I can and cannot fund. So, none of this changes it whatsoever. If we go off on that tangent, we will miss the opportunities that the Bill presents.

3.45 pm

During his contribution, Mr Rogers talked about the use of ICT. There is an opportunity for the usage of ICT in the programme, and some of the schemes that are already on the ground are using ICT, but it is vital that we have contact. I am not suggesting that Mr Rogers is saying this, but we do not want to turn this into sharing through Skype. We want young people engaging with each other, meeting each other, being taught the curriculum together, learning about each other's experiences together and learning about each other from each other. ICT will play a part in that. It will not be the lead role in it, but it has a role to play going into the future in all aspects of our education system.

Mrs Overend, who, I understand, had to leave the Chamber for personal reasons, provided commentary and set out the position of the Ulster Unionist Party around the Bill, expanding it into a vision of the future of a single education system. I may not agree with everything that she has said, but if the Ulster Unionist Party has a vision of a single education system, let us see it. Let us see how we protect the rights and entitlements of individuals, communities and people from different religious, community and cultural backgrounds and how we protect people's British and Irish identity, all within that education system.

There has been much talk over a number of years that people would like to see a single education system. I would like to see more meat on the bones around exactly what that proposal means. I do not think that anybody should be fearful of the debate, but there has to be a debate about it. A single education system may mean different things to the various parties around this Chamber, but, unless we debate it, we will not find common ground on it.

I have touched on Mr Lunn's comments around various matters. In my approach to integrated education, I was accused by Mr Kennedy of favouring integrated education over the controlled sector and doing damage to the controlled sector in various areas through another conspiracy that I am involved in, as well as the academic conspiracy, which is going on in that corner over there. He used the example of Omagh. He said that I refused to approve an expansion of integrated education in Omagh because it would damage the maintained sector. I will give Mr Kennedy a piece of advice. Never, ever believe your own propaganda because you end up coming out with statements that are completely wrong.

One of the reasons why an expansion of integrated education in Omagh was turned down was not because it would have a detrimental impact on the maintained sector but because it would have had a detrimental impact on the controlled sector. So, I carried out an action that was the complete opposite of what you accused me of. I do not know whether you want to intervene and withdraw your remark or you want it to stay on the record, but it is factually inaccurate. You have a habit of coming into the Chamber and making comments about what I am up to and none of them ever stacks up. In this instance, the record will show, the reports on which I based my decision around Omagh will show and, I have no doubt, the upcoming court case that is proceeding around that decision will also show exactly why that decision was made, and the judge will decide whether my decision was based on reasonable arguments moving forward.

The Second Stage of any Bill is always that moment in time when Members will have different views on the direction of travel of a Bill. Some will reject it outright, and some will decide to give it a fair wind and debate it through Committee Stage. Others may be happier with various clauses of the Bill than others. The Bill is very short, but, as I said in my opening remarks, it is very important for moving our education system and our society forward.

It is a much-debated subject. Mr Newton was correct when he said that shared education is a Programme for Government commitment. It is set out across three areas, and the Programme for Government put an onus and a responsibility on my Department to move shared education forward. This is yet another step in moving shared education forward. The policy was also another step in moving shared education forward.

I encourage Members to support the Second Stage of the Bill and to allow it to go through to Committee Stage and Consideration Stage. Mr McCallister said that he may have amendments etc. That is the way the system works. Let us ensure that, if we move the Bill forward, we do not miss the focus on what the shared education programme is about. It is about another step forward for our education system and for our society, and, if we work together on this, I believe that we can make significant gains for everyone without involving losers in the equation. I thank the Members.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Shared Education Bill [NIA 66/11-16] be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That concludes the Second Stage of the Shared Education Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Committee for Education.

Private Members' Business

Regional Economic Imbalance

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes.

Mr Flanagan: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses concern at the high levels of regional economic imbalance, as evidenced by high levels of long-term unemployment and economic inactivity in north and west Belfast, west of the Bann and along the border corridor; welcomes the commitment in the Programme for Government 2011-15 to address regional imbalance, and the establishment of the ministerial subgroup on regional opportunities; recognises the role that the availability of property, skills, appropriate infrastructure and telecommunications can play in making areas magnets of attraction for investment; acknowledges the desire of local government, political, community and business leaders in areas of high unemployment to work in partnership with government to attract greater investment and prosperity; and calls for the inclusion of subregional job creation targets in the next Programme for Government.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht tábhachtach seo. I welcome that we are debating this issue once again. We debated it about two years ago, and progress has been slim to date. Hopefully, this motion will be the impetus for corrective action to resolve what has been a long-standing issue.

In 2014-15, almost 40% of the jobs that were promoted with Invest NI support were in the Belfast City Council area, with two thirds of all the jobs promoted being east of the Bann. That is not reflective of the overall economic output in this region or the location of our people, as only 18% of the North's population actually lives in the Belfast City Council area. It is forcing the displacement of our people to already overcrowded, overpriced and under pressure urban communities, and that leaves our rural areas like ghost towns that are struggling for viability and sustainability.

It is not a new policy, but it has worsened as a result of the changing economic conditions in recent years and the switch to focusing on attracting jobs in the service sector as opposed to the manufacturing sector. Jobs in the manufacturing sector were more likely to be based in rural communities as a result of the comparatively cheaper price of land and the availability of space as well as a range of other issues. It is also partly the legacy of decades of deliberate underinvestment in areas with large nationalist populations, as the majority of both government and private investment was directed, for both political and gerrymandering reasons, into already affluent unionist areas.

Mr Campbell: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will not, Gregory, no.

A Fermanagh MLA held the position of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (ETI) Minister for nearly eight years, and the county was neglected just as much under that leadership as it was under direct rule. Two thousand people left Fermanagh last year, mainly to get work.

Many people think, and I am one, that it does not suit some unionist politicians for jobs to be created in areas with large nationalist populations, or along the border, as they are more likely to be filled by nationalists or, heaven forbid, by people who live across the border. Those mindsets remain to the fore in many unionist politicians.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will not, William, no.

It is convenient for unionist politicians that those 2,000 people, most of them young, are no longer in Fermanagh to vote, as the census and other figures point to a growing younger population from the nationalist community.

West of the Bann and along the border are the areas with the worst road and rail networks, telecoms infrastructure, sewerage, water and electricity grid services. There is also inadequate provision of social and affordable housing and an absence of higher education provision for the most part, despite there being a sufficient population on both sides of the border to sustain such services.

Regardless, with the inability or refusal of successive ETI Ministers to address the growing problem of uncompetitive energy prices for intensive users, Invest NI openly admits that it does not even bother trying to attract manufacturing companies any more. So, we are left with call centres and other service centre jobs, which are invariably based in large urban areas.

It would be wrong of me not to welcome the recent announcement of 800 jobs in a call centre in Enniskillen, jobs that will pay below the living wage. However, jobs of that nature will not bring our people home.

A report for the Scottish Executive last year indicated that the North does well in attracting inward investment but that it tends to be lower-value inward investment. Invest NI has seen record performance in the greater Belfast area but that is not shared across the North.

Recently published Office for National Statistics (ONS) figures on the number of workers being paid below the living wage revealed that our three council areas with the highest number of workers being paid below the living wage are the Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council, with 39.9%; Fermanagh and Omagh District Council, with 38.9%; and Mid Ulster District Council with 37.4%. Over 200,000 workers here — or 28% — are paid below the living wage, far higher than any region in Britain.

A recent OECD report on the border region found that the North:

“remains relatively more peripheral with respect to its political influence”.

If the North is already on the periphery as a result of the emanation of economic policies from London, imagine how much more peripheral areas west of the Bann and along the border corridor are. The threatened withdrawal from the European Union would only worsen this as any existing opportunities for cross-border cooperation and harmonisation using EU mechanisms would be removed.

Official statistics for disposable income, low pay, levels of economic inactivity and long-term unemployment are also comparably worse in peripheral areas such as Fermanagh and Omagh, Derry and Strabane, and the Causeway Coast and Glens. While our overall unemployment rate is falling steadily, it is remaining steady for long-term unemployment.

Some Members may well rise to deny once more that a problem exists, even Members who left Fermanagh many years ago to get a job in the greater Belfast area. There was a commitment in the Programme for Government 2011-15 to address regional imbalance.

The establishment of the ministerial subgroup on regional opportunities has done initial exploratory work on the Derry area. I would like to hear news about what it is actually doing and when we can see that group beginning to look at the specific challenges facing rural communities and how we can create employment for our citizens, particularly to stem the growing demographic changes in our society — the wholesale movement of people from rural to urban communities and the problems we face with emigration.

There has been much talk of a proposed reduction in corporation tax being the solution for our economic woes. Would a reduced rate of corporation tax address or compound the problem of regional disparity? We need to take informed, evidence-based decisions in that regard.

I witnessed the ETI Minister spoofing the Chamber last week about the need to set a date and rate for corporation tax, as if that were going to be the solution for the manufacturing crisis.

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Can I ask you to rule on the word “spoofing”, given that what I was saying was repeating what the deputy First Minister, Martin McGuinness, told the Chamber of Commerce lunch in Belfast City Hall?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I am happy to tell the Member that I do not rule on words. At the same time, I urge Members to show respect.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. So, the ETI Minister talks about corporation tax being the solution for the manufacturing crisis, as almost Pontius Pilate-like he washes his hands of the loss of 860 jobs. I am sure that his colleagues in north Antrim are grateful for this blissful ignorance as he runs around with his fingers in his ears ignoring the warnings that emanated from Michelin more than two years ago, that came from the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment for over two years and that have been coming from the trade union movement for several months, as he stood up and repeated ad nauseam his claim that a reduced rate of corporation tax was the solution for businesses that were not making a profit. At any stage —

4.00 pm

Mr Bell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I invite you to check the record. The foolish allegation — I know that it is difficult to work out which foolish comment I am talking about among the number that have been made — is that I said that corporation tax would be a solution for people of low profit. Will you check Hansard to see whether I have ever said that and, if not, rule against the Member? I said the same words as the deputy First Minister said. Is he spoofing as well?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I will take that as an intervention rather than a point of order. I remind Members that there will be ample opportunity for them to make a contribution to the debate.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister never took his fingers out of his ears to assess the nonsense message that somebody had given him to parrot and parrot and parrot.

We live in a society with a two-tier economy. There is greater Belfast, and then there is everywhere else. Are we a regional Assembly for greater Belfast, or are we something else? It is time that we stepped up to the plate and dealt with areas that are not within the greater Belfast circle. We cannot allow the trend of a two-tier economy to continue. The golden circle around Belfast attracts the vast bulk of investment at the expense of other areas. I was not elected by the people of Fermanagh to stand idly by — nor were other Members — and allow another generation of our young people to be forced to flee the county in search of employment, whether in Belfast, Dublin, England, America, Canada or Australia. It is long past time for appropriate action to be taken to address this shameful trend. The number of workers from rural communities, particularly in the construction sector, who spend every Sunday evening or Monday morning sitting in an airport waiting to catch a flight to England for a week's work is a shameful indictment of our failure to create balanced subregional growth.

According to a new study by the TUC, the number of commuters who spend two hours or more each day stuck behind the wheel or on public transport just getting to and from their workplaces soared to more than 47,000 people. The Minister stood up at Question Time and said that 40% of people work in a neighbouring constituency so we cannot set subregional job targets. That is the biggest load of nonsense that I ever heard. Just because somebody works somewhere else, why can you not have a target for Invest NI to support jobs in a particular area?

We need to take action to address the problem. The action that we need to take in the short term is to include concrete targets for the Executive and Invest NI for subregional job creation. That was a cross-party agreement in the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment's recent inquiry into the economy. Unless we take action, the same problem will persist. It should not be tolerated, particularly by those in the House who claim to want to rebalance our economy. Perhaps when they talk about rebalancing our economy, they are actually talking about cutting public expenditure. That is what that phrase means when some people use it. What rebalancing our economy should mean is facilitating balanced economic growth across the North. That should be our collective objective.

Putting in place subregional targets will not deter investment. No matter how many times we hear it, it is not true. It will simply focus the minds in Invest NI on the need to do more for the areas that have been neglected since the foundation of this state. Putting a target for performance in Invest NI is completely different from a quota. I am not advocating that we put a quota on the number of jobs that go to Belfast or any other area. I am merely asking that the Assembly, when it is considering items for the next Programme for Government, puts in targets for each area that Invest NI should work towards. That will not deter investment. It will change mindsets in Invest NI and, hopefully, in the private sector. I hope that Members are pragmatic enough to see that.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak against the motion. Whilst there is no doubt that we continue to live in difficult financial conditions, which are seen all over the world, we have a lot going for us in Northern Ireland, with a highly skilled, educated population combined with our rich industrial and entrepreneurial heritage.

We cannot deny that there are regional economic imbalances across Northern Ireland. The figures show that some areas here suffer higher unemployment than others. That is not a situation unique to this country. Naturally, there will be variations in economic activity in any country, and they are seen across the world.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. While he is on the subject of the regional disparities seen in various countries — he is right about that — does he agree that, given what the Member who moved the motion said about sectarianism, the people of Donegal, for example, in the Irish Republic were hardly discriminated against on grounds of sectarianism by their Government and yet they constantly complain about not getting jobs there?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Dunne: I concur with the point that the honourable Member has made.

Such variations are due not least to geographical realities and the physical and infrastructure variances that exist across the Province. There are many issues: we need improved road access and broadband provision, and we need more energy to be provided from renewables through the use of gas etc. Although challenges exist, we see our economy continuing to recover from the global recession. In the year to September 2015, benefit queues shrank at their fastest rate in the past 15 years. Those are the most recent figures.

Much of the work to grow our economy has been led by Invest NI and the good work of our Enterprise Ministers, Arlene Foster and, more recently, Jonathan Bell. They must continue to make the growth of our economy the number one priority, as it is that of the Northern Ireland Executive. Look at the evidence from Invest NI for 2013-14. The figures that we have been given are that, in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, which was mentioned earlier, 637 jobs were created; in the Foyle area, there were 434; in Mid Ulster, 495; and in Newry and Armagh, 371. However, in my constituency, North Down, which suffers from its proximity to Belfast, only 128 jobs were created in 2013-14. The evidence confirms that a good spread of jobs is promoted and created outside the Belfast area.

Much of what the motion contains is already work in progress through the Executive's regional opportunities ministerial subgroup. That work is being done by the Department and Invest NI. Now that the 11 new councils are in place, there is the opportunity for work to really get under way, through their new community planning powers and the levers now available to councils in partnership with Invest NI and central government to ensure that areas are tailored appropriately to attracting inward investment and job creation.

Despite the challenges to our economy, not least in the manufacturing sector, as, sadly, we have seen in recent days, there are growth areas, including the agrifood and tourism sectors. Many of the areas mentioned are areas of need, particularly those west of the Bann, but they have rich tourism potential and a thriving agrifood sector that must be fully exploited. The new councils must take a proactive approach in helping those areas by working in a joined-up way to set real and ambitious job creation targets.

We must all redouble our efforts to grow the private sector, rebalance the economy and get people into work. With a joined-up approach involving councils, schools, colleges and all agencies, we have an opportunity to continue the work of helping this country to grow and develop. The devolution of corporation tax, which has been mentioned many times in the Chamber, is another lever that would help to make this a more attractive place to do business and enable us to compete with the Republic of Ireland, mainland UK and, indeed, countries throughout Europe.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas le moltóir an rúin. I thank the supporters of the motion for introducing the matter into the Assembly.

While at one level this is an opportunity to speak on the motion, it is set in the context of difficult times. Only a week ago, Ballymena was devastated by the news of the closure of the Michelin plant, so soon after the JTI Gallaher announcement. It represents a significant blow to the local economy and to the Northern Ireland manufacturing industry. Indeed, Michelin had an impact on my constituency: people from that area were in the supply chain or worked there, as you will know, Mr Deputy Speaker.

The manufacturing industry as a whole represents 10% of our employment. Following this disaster, it is even more pressing that the Assembly recognises not only the scale of the economic damage but the rippling effects that political instability has on the historic regional imbalance in the North. Of course, I recognise that regional imbalances and variations can be a natural part of any economy, but, in Northern Ireland, the east/west divide remains as stark as ever, nearly 20 years after peace and much promise of a prosperity process — indeed, a peace dividend was much talked about. I remember hearing Gordon Brown talk regularly and frequently about it. There was plenty of talk but little delivery.

A failure to address serious skills and infrastructural deficits has squandered long-term strategies and crucial business regeneration. In Mid Ulster, we saw this at first hand, when the initial prospects for the Desertcreat project faltered significantly, before almost collapsing altogether. Fortunately, it has survived, so we hope, in reduced format, but I am very discouraged by the clear failure to invest in the infrastructure to ensure its long-term viability and the regeneration of the economies around it.

The figures we see reaffirm that regional inequalities haunt our economy. At this point they have become almost a cliché. Ards and North Down, for example, has the highest rates of employment and economic activity, at 73·8% and 76·2% respectively. That is in stark contrast to Derry and Strabane, which had the lowest levels of employment, at 56·6%, and the lowest level of economic activity, at 66·5%. Overall, long-term unemployment has remained at 68%, while economic inactivity remains in the upper margins, with 27·6% of 16- to 64-year-olds out of work and not actively searching for work. This confirms that, while some regions are doing well, the lack of opportunity across the North has continued to stifle employment progress.

While the above figures are a cause for concern, it is essential that we pick specific areas of weakness and areas that must see improvement if the economy is to prosper. It is vital that long-term initiatives, whether investing in the economy, infrastructure or skills, are targeted to rebalance our economy away from being primarily public sector towards more of a private sector base. Northern Ireland has shown an ability to attract large-scale investment, and we have seen many names come to the North in the past — fortunately for Belfast and east of the Bann but not so fortunately for west of the Bann. There is a litany of reasons for this, most notably the deficit of skills and, especially, the lack of infrastructure. Those of us who drive down either the M1 or the M2 motorways see a very obvious sign of that.

A skills base remains absolutely vital to the development of a competitive and healthy economy, while allowing people personally to prosper. New skills open up opportunities and grant people the tools that they need to succeed. Indeed, in my constituency, some good employers cannot wait for government to do the job. They are re-skilling, taking in new people and training them themselves. Such employer-led initiatives among good firms, some of which I know very well, could probably give an example to government and to other sections of industry of how to do things efficiently. They rely on a skilled workforce not only to make a profit but to expand and grow into new regions. The Assembly can attract all the investment it wants, but, if we lack the long-term skills that are necessary, businesses will not want to stay. It will become unviable for them to do so. For example —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is up.

Mr McGlone: — I have referred to my constituency of Mid Ulster, where we have had good examples and some poor examples of figures —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Sorry, the Member's time is really up.

4.15 pm

Mr McGlone: Sorry, have I finished, Mr Deputy Speaker?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): You are very definitely finished. [Laughter.]

Mr McGlone: I was only just getting warmed up there. I had not quite concluded, but I support the motion.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I welcome the opportunity to speak in a debate on the economy, even though, to be honest, a motion on the economy from Sinn Féin is like a motion on childcare from King Herod. However, there is nothing in the motion that I take great issue with, although I cannot avoid the fact that all the constituencies highlighted are areas where Sinn Féin is electorally strong. That is disappointing.

It seems somewhat late in the day to welcome a Programme for Government commitment at this stage of the mandate. A better question would be to ask whether the ministerial subgroup on regional opportunities has had any impact. The inclusion of a subregional job creation target is a reasonable ask, but, again, would it make a difference to the outcome?

As a representative of South Antrim, I want to praise my constituents for their relatively low levels of economic inactivity, but should those people now be penalised because of their work ethic? It must also be pointed out that many people in the east of the Province commute daily to our capital city of Belfast for their work. Those of us who live east of the Bann could easily complain about the lack of foreign direct investment and the lack of Invest NI-sponsored job creation.

One constituency not mentioned in the motion has just received a third hammer blow to its employment base: Ballymena in North Antrim is to lose 860 jobs with the closure of Michelin, which comes hot on the heels of the closures of JTI and Pattons. Many in my constituency will suffer because of those job losses. That high number of job losses will only kick in next year, but they are indicators of what I believe to be a crisis in local manufacturing. There is concern about manufacturing as the sector is exposed to wider global economic slowdown. Last month, manufacturing output growth was flat, and manufacturing employment fell for the second consecutive month in October, which is the fastest rate of decline since June 2013. It is not a positive situation.

Northern Ireland is a small place, and we need to think of the overall economic picture. In May 2007, Northern Ireland had an unemployment rate of 3.7%, which was lower than the UK average of 5.4% and of the Republic's 4.1%. In that month, the Executive were re-established under the leadership of DUP/Sinn Féin. Today, our unemployment rate is 6% while the UK average has returned to 5.4%, as it was before the financial crash. Even more worrying is the fact that 27.6% of our population is deemed to be economically inactive. It was 27% in 2007. At the same time, we know that, overall, one in nine of our population is in receipt of disability living allowance. That compares to one in 20 in England. We also have black spots: I believe that it is one in five in west Belfast.

That is not a record that the Executive or the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment should be proud of. I hope that he thinks about the statements that he made earlier and that he thinks about himself having no concern about manufacturing so that I can pass on his real concerns to the many in South Antrim —

Mr Bell: Mr Deputy Speaker, on a point of order. At no stage in this House — the Hansard report will reflect it, and you can check the comments that I made earlier and the lie that has been told — did I say that I had no concern for manufacturing. Can that be addressed?

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I am sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker, but without the Hansard report in front of me, I cannot qualify that, but a very positive picture —

Mr Bell: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker, the Member has taken words that I did not say and attributed them to me today, so can you reflect on what I said in Hansard, respond to the Member and strike what he said from the record?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I suggest to the Minister that he has now corrected the record. We can certainly look at Hansard.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will you reflect on the Minister's statement and his use of the word "lie"?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I have already said that I do not rule on words, but I have asked Members to show courtesy to and consideration for other Members. I hope that that is taken seriously.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I was reflecting only on what I thought was a very positive message coming through at Question Time earlier on the manufacturing sector in Northern Ireland. I do not share that positive message. I do not think that the 860 people from Michelin would share that positive message. I do not think that those from JTI or Patton, or many hundreds of my constituents in South Antrim, would share that positive message. I am only asking whether the Minister will reflect on that. I have grave concerns for manufacturing —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: — in Northern Ireland. Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Lunn: I must say that I did not expect the debate to be quite so feisty, but there we are. I want to start off by speaking about the way in which Mr Flanagan introduced the motion. He made the point that two thirds of Invest NI-produced jobs are east of the Bann. Although I acknowledge that I would like to see a more even distribution of those jobs, where does he think that the population, connectivity, and so on, are?

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: In a minute. You might want to intervene again if I do not.

He also made a political argument. What he effectively said was that a Fermanagh MLA acting as Minister of Enterprise actually sought to divert jobs from Fermanagh to other areas for political reasons. I know that he has a fond relationship with Mrs Foster, but, really, that is outrageous. I am very surprised by that. If you want to intervene now, I will let you. [Laughter.]

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. I am going to answer his first question, which is what I wanted to intervene about. Some 40% of the jobs went into the Belfast City Council area, which has 18% of the population, so Belfast is certainly doing better than its population would lead you to believe.

Regarding your other comment, I did not specify any one individual as being behind it. I said that it is a mindset among unionist politicians, but if the perception that the Member has is that I was alleging that the former Enterprise Minister was doing that, that is regrettable.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I am pleased to say that the Member has an additional minute, but there is something else that I wish to say. Lest the Chair be totally ignored, I ask Members to make references through the Chair, please.

Mr Lunn: To clarify, my understanding of what Mr Flanagan said was that the Minister who had been in post for about eight years was making those decisions.

Mr I McCrea: That is definitely what he said.

Mr Lunn: Well, there we are. I will get back to the motion. It is a rambling kind of motion. I think that I am able to say that I will be the first to mention north and west Belfast. It is not a Fermanagh motion. It expresses concern at the:

“high levels of regional economic imbalance ... in north and west Belfast, west of the Bann and along the border corridor”.

That is fair enough, but I think that the problems in north and west Belfast are every bit as bad as the problems in Fermanagh and along the border corridor — not the whole border corridor, but certain sections of it — and for different reasons, because the connectivity, transportation links, and so on, are better. That is part of the problem for the border areas.

I want to take up the question of the establishment of the ministerial subgroup on regional opportunities, because, as far as I can tell, and I think that Mr Dunne mentioned it, that body appears to have been established early this year — January is the date that I see — and met once. Somebody can correct me if I am wrong, but it has met once. It will soon be a year old. There was a freedom of information request submitted looking for the minutes of the meeting that did take place. I have seen a picture of the meeting, but I have not seen any outcome or progress report. I think that I saw a reference to the fact that Mr Durkan could not be there, for perfectly sound reasons. How long does it take something such as that to be set up and produce some actions, ambitions or targets?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for giving way. To give some clarification: the group met twice. The second meeting comprised, I think, OFMDFM and the Minister for Employment and Learning. No other Ministers were available for that, despite my insistence that the Minister for Regional Development should be at those meetings, should be invited to those meetings and that none of those meetings should take place in his absence. Would the Member agree with me that it is more of a wasted opportunities group than a regional opportunities group?

Mr Lunn: I am in enough trouble already, Mr Deputy Speaker. [Laughter.] I will not go there. However, the group met twice, the second time with only three Ministers, and has not produced any outcomes whatsoever. The word that Mr Durkan used is perhaps appropriate.

I want to deal with the meat of the motion, but it is only in the last line that it calls for:

“the inclusion of subregional job creation targets in the next Programme for Government.”

Here are quotations from the last Programme for Government and economic strategy:

“Balanced sub-regional growth: we will ensure that all sub regions are able to grow and prosper, whilst recognising the importance of Belfast and Derry/Londonderry as key drivers”.

“In identifying our economic priorities, we realise that economic growth must create a fairer and more equitable society for all our citizens”.

“Balanced sub-regional growth: we will ensure that all sub regions are able to grow and prosper;

Equality: we will ensure that no section of the community is left behind”.

On equality of opportunity, fairness, inclusion, the promotion of good relations and all the rest of it:

“Our North/South and East/West links are important”.

It is already there in a document that is almost four years old. Frankly, I wonder how the inclusion of subregional targets would improve the situation.

We will not oppose the motion. It is open to question.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Lunn: I doubt very much that, if somebody puts in targets, all of a sudden there will be a transformation in the situation. It will be interesting to hear what the Minister says about it.

Mr Givan: From the outset, it is clear that this is a party political motion and, actually, a very narrow party political motion for Sinn Féin in Fermanagh. Even within that, I think that it is more to allow the Member who proposed it to carve out a niche amongst his colleagues in Fermanagh. It is clear that it is being used for that purpose, and we can look at it through that lens. It is also clear that the Ulster Unionists will use it as a way to attack the DUP and Sinn Féin. Let us not point out that infrastructural road improvements are critical to developing any economy, and their Minister held that responsibility for four and a half years. So, the motion will be used in that way, and I want to try, as far as possible, to avoid that, but I think that I will need to respond to it in some way and talk about its general principles.

The argument that is being made by the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone is not unique to Fermanagh. As someone who represents a constituency that is only seven miles away from Belfast, I know very well that my constituents feel that Lisburn is overlooked for Belfast investment. We do not need to go too far outside Belfast for people to feel that the investment is centralised there. Even within Belfast, and within political parties in Belfast, there is a view that it is east and south Belfast where the focus is. I know — I looked it up — that the SDLP's Alex Attwood made it clear in response to jobs being lost in west Belfast. He said:

“you do not put FDI into south and east Belfast but protect industrial sites in west Belfast”. — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 102, p225, col 2].

The SDLP's response to job losses in west Belfast was to say that we should not put any more money into south Belfast, which happens to have an SDLP Member of Parliament. It is an issue on which, even within parties, there will often be that kind of internal division, struggle for power and calls for investment to come into those constituencies.

In Fermanagh —

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Will the Member take a point?

Mr Givan: I will.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Since none of Mr Attwood's colleagues are rushing to his defence, it is important to say that he put it on record that he apologised for that statement. I am reiterating that for him.

A Member: You are very generous.

Mr Givan: I am sure that he will appreciate that.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member has earned an extra minute for that.

Mr Givan: Thank you.

When we look at Mr Flanagan's track record, there was an opportunity for investment with Tamboran in Belcoo. He fought tooth and nail against it and did not want investment in his constituency when it came to that opportunity.

4.30 pm

You could say that Mr Flanagan was less than lukewarm about the G8 summit coming to Fermanagh, despite the global exposure that Fermanagh was going to get from that for tourism opportunities. It is fair to say that he was hostile to the G8 coming because of political ideology, and behind the motion is a political ideology driven on a Marxist theory that you can force investors to put their money in a particular area. That is not how the market works. As much as some may want it to be, you cannot force private investors to put their money in particular areas.

What you can do, however, is try to create the right environment for that to happen. Mr Flanagan may want to look at his colleague Bronwyn McGahan, who organised a seminar in July for jobs to do with a rural business investment scheme. She encouraged people to come to Fermanagh and South Tyrone so that people will get jobs. She took, in my view, a more positive approach, as opposed to Mr Flanagan's approach of doing down the Ministers involved and demanding that you force people to come into an area. Maybe he should speak to his colleague and ask, "How can we create the right environment for this?"

A real opportunity exists for Mr Flanagan to put pressure on his own elected representatives on Fermanagh council, because the Assembly has increased, through the reform of local government, the opportunity for councils to be the economic drivers and to set targets. So, put the pressure where it should be, as I do in my constituency on Lisburn and Castlereagh City Council. Put it on Fermanagh council by asking what it is going to do to get people to come into its area to create jobs. I have no doubt that Invest NI, the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister and the deputy First Minister will get fully behind the efforts of Fermanagh and Omagh District Council, from which the pressure and demand should rightly be coming. Let the council bring it forward, so that can happen.

Ultimately, these are commercially led decisions. However, let us create the right environment and context to attract businesses to all of our constituencies and do that in a positive way, not in the way that I believe Mr Flanagan wants, which is by setting specific targets to seek businesses to go into places where they will simply not go if it does not stack up for their bottom line. We need to recognise that that is how the market operates but shape the environment to attract them to our communities. I think that Mr Flanagan can learn, even from his colleagues, about how to go about doing that. Indeed, Mr Ó Muilleoir, a former Mayor of Belfast, may be able to help him on ways to be proactive and constructive on these issues rather than negative.

Finally, let us just dismiss this idea that, from the very foundation of the state, there has been discrimination against Fermanagh. That, to me, almost suggests that Arlene Foster announced 800 new jobs in Enniskillen because unionism took the seat back from Sinn Féin. Maybe Enniskillen got 800 jobs because Michelle Gildernew lost her seat and unionists are back in Fermanagh and South Tyrone. It is a nonsense.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Member almost made it sound as though Marxist theory was a bad thing, but I will not get into that.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion. As we have heard, economic imbalances are particularly evident west of the Bann, in unionist and nationalist communities in north and west Belfast, and along the border corridor, which will be the main focus of my remarks. It is important that we recognise levels of regional economic imbalance, and it is welcome that the Programme for Government commits to tackling this problem. However, we have to ask how effective the actions taken have been.

In 2010, 29.7% of the North's gross value added was in Belfast. In 2013, that had increased to 31.4%, which suggests a further concentration of economic activity in Belfast. The motion refers to the need for infrastructure and telecommunications, and I cannot stress enough how important it is that we ensure that broadband is available to everybody. In my own area of south Armagh, it is crazy that a local construction firm takes hours to download a simple tender document due to poor connections. So, it is important that we invest seriously in improving broadband provision and address "not spots" across the North.

People and businesses in the border corridor, including those in my area of Newry and Armagh, face a unique set of circumstances. The response to that must be tailored to those needs. The Minister should seriously consider the proposal of a border development zone. Historical lack of investment has ensured that the border region suffers higher levels of unemployment, emigration, deprivation and stunted economic growth.

Given the prevalence of the border in everyday life, solutions to this must be cross-border in nature.

The island-wide economy generates £3 billion annually, with significant potential for growth. There are already some cross-border initiatives that can be built upon. I believe that InterTradeIreland must be supported in its work — and it has made such a difference in my area — as should Newry, Mourne and Down Council and Louth County Council's memorandum of understanding.

Targeted and sustained action over a period of time from both Governments, North and South, could make a real difference to the lives of citizens in the border region. However, these area-based initiatives will only go so far towards a solution. They play an important role but are incapable of transforming the local economy on their own. Areas are being given responsibility for economic development but not really the resources and policy levers required to deliver it. Basically, it is responsibility without power.

Initiatives that focus specifically on the disadvantaged area are important, but we must not ignore the operation of the mainstream economy, which is actually what produces and reproduces patterns of inequality. We need a new approach, and we need to focus on structural change that complements the targeted initiatives. We need fiscal powers so that we can deliver a transformation in economic policy and performance. A more progressive tax system, a living wage for all and a focus on the economic inequality between the rich and poor will go a long way to addressing regional imbalances that exist.

Encouraging as it is to see such interest in our economy from overseas, I think that caution must be given to a reliance on FDI over the growth of our indigenous SMEs, which have been the backbone of our local economy for some time. We have seen the indigenous sector in the South of Ireland almost being sacrificed to appease multinationals. I do not think that we cannot allow that to happen. Investing in local sustainable growth and innovative approaches will be key to a successful economy in the long run.

Focus must also be given to the types of jobs that we are creating in regions. We have a really highly skilled, young and talented workforce, who need opportunities to develop at home. The brain drain that politicians love to decry so much will not be solved by investing millions in call centres; they, among other things, are the cause of the brain drain.

I welcome the motion. I believe that subregional targets should be taken on board. Any steps taken to address regional imbalance in job creation must be outcome focused, and I hope to see a more collaborative approach to building our entire economy.

Mr Girvan: I oppose the motion. I appreciate that we look at Northern Ireland's economy as a whole. The phrase that everyone keeps using is this: a rising tide floats all boats. Money spent in Northern Ireland has a ripple effect, no matter where it is spent. I appreciate that there might well be areas in Northern Ireland that seem to have been, for some reasons, whether geographical or other, excluded from opportunity for investment. I do not accept that that has been due to religious or political bias.

We live in a Province where you can travel from one side to the other in less than two hours. I had the opportunity to visit England recently, where I met people whose daily commute is three and a half hours to work and three and a half hours home. That is quite a bit out of their day, and that happens in certain areas of the south-east of England. Those people make a decision on that.

If you look at London, it has sucked the life out of some of the small areas around it. It has been the magnet for a lot of major industry and major business. The same has happened in Northern Ireland with Belfast. My colleague in South Antrim made reference to what goes on in our constituency. Many of our people commute to Belfast on a daily basis to work. I appreciate that Belfast has become the economic hub of Northern Ireland, and it is good that we have somewhere that has easy access to rail and road transport links, boats and air connectivity.

We have work to do on improving our infrastructure. There are areas where we need to improve infrastructure.

Half of my family live in the Fermanagh area — my mother is from Fermanagh — so I appreciate that there are difficulties in certain rural settings. However, a fund has been set up that is helping to deliver local economic development in rural communities through the local action groups (LAGs) that were set up through the Department that the party opposite's Minister has control of. They have the opportunity to deliver economic development in rural communities. Some areas have more money than others.

South Antrim, which I represent, has a minuscule amount of money for its LAG this term compared with other areas, and that is simply because a large part of my area is classed as urban. As a consequence, it has not availed itself of as much money.

There are areas that we need to focus on and improve. We need to ensure that we get a fair crack of the whip. As far as inward investment, visits and opportunities for firms to come in are concerned, nobody goes out wilfully to discriminate or to ensure that they do not visit west of the Bann or west or north Belfast. My colleague from North Belfast will be only too glad to say that it is vital that one region of our capital city is not excluded. It is important that we all get a fair crack of the whip. As far as I am concerned, people should not be brought here and told that they have to locate their business in Dungannon or Enniskillen. They will pick what they believe is the proper economic heartland that will best meet their purpose.

We have a job of work to do on infrastructure. However, I mentioned earlier that Northern Ireland is so small a country that we cannot say that we should try to ensure that we do not have jobs five miles down the road because the area that I represent will be excluded, which is somewhat petty. We have to see Northern Ireland as a whole —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Girvan: — look at the big picture and ensure that we deliver for the whole Province.

Mr Nesbitt: I stand as a substitute for my colleague Sandra Overend, who has been called away for personal reasons. Hopefully, Mid Ulster's loss will be Strangford's gain over the next couple of minutes.

Economic inactivity in Northern Ireland stands at an astounding 27.6%. In other words, more than one in four of the working-age population is economically inactive. That is shocking in its own right. By way of benchmarking, it is many percentage points higher than the rate in the rest of the UK. It has also increased here in the last quarter, as it has in the last year. While a joint DETI/DEL strategy to tackle the issue was announced in April, it is fair to question the capacity of the Executive to deliver on such commitments.

It should also be argued that the time for joint DEL/DETI strategies has long gone. The Executive endorsed the recommendation of the independent review of economic policy that we should establish a single Department of the economy, but hey ho, that recommendation is only six years old and economic inactivity is only 27.6%, so why rush? The logic of a single Department is beyond dispute. I am glad that it may come eventually with the proposed restructuring of the Executive. However, that alone will not tackle economic inactivity. I make no apology for returning to the theme of mental health and well-being. There can be no doubt that poor mental health explains in a significant part why so many of our people are unable to enjoy the benefits — financial and psychological — of being economically active. A successful strategy must be a cross-cutting one embedded in the next Programme for Government.

A week seldom passes without somebody challenging me to tell them what the Executive have done to create jobs in my constituency of Strangford. Down the years, we have taken big hits, not least in and around Newtownards and on the peninsula. However, there is hope, which can be turned into reality if there is a strategic approach to regional balance that recognises subregional strengths. I would like to illustrate two that are perfect for Strangford. One is agrifood: the produce from land and sea is of the highest international standard. As we know, the Comber potato enjoys protected geographical indication status, and agrifood companies such as Willowbrook Foods, Sparky Pac and Mash Direct, to name but three, seem to be in constant expansion mode, along with the likes of Pritchitts on the Kiltonga estate, which recently opened a world-class logistics facility. There is conglomeration potential for agrifood businesses in and around the peninsula, a potential that can currently be classified as truly limitless.

4.45 pm

The other area is renewable energy. Strangford led the way with SeaGen, which was a world-leading experiment in tidal energy generation. It has spawned several other experiments of global significance, bringing a focus to the area. Draw a line from where SeaGen began, at the mouth of the lough, up to Newtownards, where the local regional college, SERC, has specialist units looking at applied energy research, and go onward to Queen's Island and the work that Harland and Wolff has been doing in the area of renewables, and you have an energy corridor that is ripe for development at a time when economists predict that thousands of new well-paid jobs are possible in that area.

In fairness, the motion notes key fundamentals that investors are looking for by way of skills and infrastructure. We must ensure that our young people leave formal education with the skills required by employers. If the Executive were serious about addressing regional economic imbalances, we would not be disinvesting in further and higher education as we are currently, with cuts to staff and student numbers that will have a detrimental impact on communities across Northern Ireland. We cannot expect sufficient jobs and investment if we do not, first, invest in the next generation workforce.

I can see the justification for subregional targets in the next Programme for Government, but there is no guarantee that they will be met. The Republic introduced regional targets for half of all investments to be located outside Dublin and Cork, but those targets were never met. It is my view that the focus of the next Programme for Government should be on improving our human and physical capital, investing properly in skills and infrastructure, and ensuring that, as a whole, we have an attractive location for investment and job creation, with recognition of the unique economic and physical characteristics of subregional areas of Northern Ireland.

Mr Humphrey: I oppose the motion. I was appalled at its narrow, party political and, indeed, sectarian nature. I was appalled, too, at how it was moved by the Member from Fermanagh and South Tyrone. The nature and way in which he did so did no service whatsoever to the people of west Belfast and north Belfast whom I represent. In fact, he took away from the point that, I think, he was trying to make. Funnily enough, he also failed to mention the investment made in the west of the Province, in the constituency of Foyle, and, indeed, the huge investment made in the city of Londonderry — and it is Londonderry.

It has been a bad week. We have lost 860 jobs. That is a hammer blow for people in Ballymena, in particular, and in the basin that surrounds that town in County Antrim. I took an interest in what the Minister said earlier about the work that he will do and the work that he will undertake with colleagues to try to ensure that employment and investment are brought to a town that has been deeply affected in the last year, as we all know.

Economic conditions continue to improve. Unemployment is down, the number of jobs has increased by 30,000 in three years, to March of this year, and growth in economic activity continues. We continue to witness growth in the rebalancing of the economy, which is essential, in the private sector, which is vital and, of course, in exports. It is essential that the Northern Ireland Executive continue to review, update and refocus their economic strategy for growth and rebalancing the economy. The target of improving Northern Ireland's economic growth, with a particular focus on export-led economic growth, is, I believe, key.

As Members will know, I am a Belfast Member. However, it is critical that the focus is on Northern Ireland, holistically. Belfast is a huge subregional economy in terms of its population, commerce, tourism, transportation, industry and finance.

Belfast is a key economic driver. Investment, whether it be by local, regional or national government or the private sector, does not simply benefit the ratepayer and taxpayer in the city of Belfast. Those who work in the city, those who visit it, particularly those who stay overnight in the city's hotels, those who invest in it and those who live in its suburbs and satellite towns all benefit from investment in Belfast and its regional economy.

The rising tide, as Mr Girvan said, must lift all boats. This is consistent with DRD's regional development strategy and the independent review of economic policy. City and town centres should be recognised as catalysts for economic growth. In large towns and cities, that investment can vary significantly. Compare the investment that there has been in north Belfast with that in west Belfast or east Belfast. North Belfast has received significantly less investment, and I ask the Minister to address that when he replies to the House. The reality of investment in this city is that people need to be mobile. Therefore, the upgrade of transportation and infrastructural improvements to facilitate that mobility are key for our workforce.

Mrs McKevitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Humphrey: Yes, I will give way.

Mrs McKevitt: I agree with the comment that the Member has just made about investment, but I would like to hear his views on the announcement this evening that the IT centre of CVS Caremark is to close with the loss of 70 jobs. It was my understanding that this was a firm that, last year, announced that it wanted to grow from 70 to 150 employees. I know that, in 2012 and 2014, Invest NI offered it grants — in excess of £725,000 last year. What are the Member's views on that? We have offers of investment, yet firms are still leaving.

Mr Humphrey: Obviously, I am very sad to hear about anyone losing their job. I am not over the detail that the Member has talked about, but I am sorry to hear about anyone losing their job. I am sure that the Minister may well touch on that when he comes to respond to the House.

To maximise growth and investment, we must have a clear, joined-up approach. For example, in tourism in Belfast, hotels, bars, restaurants, shops, retail, tourist attractions and of course transportation are key. They represent thousands of jobs and hundreds of employers. The joined-up approach by Invest Northern Ireland and the new Tourism Northern Ireland are essential. The marketing and promotion of Northern Ireland are key. Belfast and Northern Ireland are dealing with a reputational and perceptual problem because of the Troubles and terrorism. One positive that has come out of a negative is the once-divisive issue of the cultural mix of our city. Diversity is now a positive. More than 50% of tourists who travel the world are cultural tourists. That positive is something that Belfast has exposed in its most positive way. The good relationship between Northern Ireland, the Government of the Irish Republic and the councils that straddle the border is positive and of benefit to the taxpayer in both jurisdictions. In economic growth, health, tourism, transportation and energy, it is positive. However, economic cooperation and benefit between the Northern Ireland —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Humphrey: — and Republic of Ireland economies can go only so far. Remember that IDA and Invest Northern Ireland will compete for inward investment across the globe, and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board will compete with Bórd Fáilte to get people to come and stay in Northern Ireland. I have much more to say, but I will conclude by saying that I oppose the motion.

Mr Bell: It has been an interesting debate for the most part. I welcome the opportunity to respond to a motion — I was going to say, “a motion that had been so ably proposed”, but, if we compare the contribution of the first contributor with that of the second Sinn Féin Member, we see that the difference is chalk and cheese with regard to quality, content and ability. Northern Ireland’s economic recovery is now well established. It is evidenced by the labour market. August witnessed a further fall of 1,100 in the number of people claiming unemployment benefit, which is now more —

Mr Durkan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: Yes.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for that statistic. Whilst we certainly welcome a reduction in the number of people who are unemployed, does he have a corresponding figure for the number of people in employment? Has there been an increase in the number of people in employment?

Mr Bell: The figure that I will give the Member is from the last period from 1 April, which is 2, 532. We have witnessed a further fall of 1,100 in the number of people claiming unemployment benefit — 24,000 below its previous peak. The economy has added 30,000 jobs since March 2012, a fact that seems to have escaped the Ulster Unionist Benches. I encourage them, please, to stop talking Northern Ireland down.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for giving way. I note that he says that 30,000 jobs have been created since 2012: how many have been lost?

Mr Bell: The numbers that I have in front of me show that we have created 2,532 jobs. Externally, we have brought in 1,991 jobs, and locally we have brought in 541 jobs. It is my understanding that the number of jobs that we have created exceeds the number that we have lost. Can I say to the Member, “Please stop talking Northern Ireland down”? There is no advantage in talking Northern Ireland down. The business community that I speak to is asking me to help to build confidence in Northern Ireland. That is why we see the falls in unemployment of 1,100 that you did not mention; that is why we see the fall of 24,000 that you did not mention. I do not know whether it is just that you do not want to allow the DUP to take some credit for 30,000 jobs since March 2012. That, to a certain extent, is fair enough, but please do not damage Northern Ireland by talking its skills and its people down.

The proposer of the motion made a very direct attack on the previous Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I ask anybody out there who is prepared to listen and review the evidence to consider two things. Under her distinguished tenure, more jobs were created for Northern Ireland over a four-year period than had been created in Northern Ireland since we started to keep records. More jobs were created under Arlene Foster’s leadership in four years than had ever been created before. There was more foreign direct investment on Arlene Foster’s watch per head of our 1.82 million people than in any other part of the United Kingdom.

I heard Mr Cochrane-Watson. Having listened to Sir Reg Empey holding the DETI brief and now listening to Cochrane-Watson do damage to the economics of Northern Ireland, I think, “How are the mighty fallen”. He fails to understand the critical points. To be fair to Danny Kennedy, he was part of the Ulster Unionist/Sinn Féin Executive that they keep referring to for many years before they dropped out before the election only to retake the post after the election. Of course, having dropped out of the Executive, had my colleague Michelle McIlveen not taken the post, the Ulster Unionists would have given Northern Ireland its first nationalist majority in the Executive. Good luck trying to sell that one on the doors to unionists. I say to Mr Cochrane-Watson that, at a time when we are creating more jobs than Northern Ireland has ever created, with the net number of jobs created being 29,520, that is the time for serious politics to talk Northern Ireland up. Now is not the time for the economics of Oliver Hardy.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. As a member of the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee, I can assure the Minister that — colleagues from across the House will bear this out — when business people, business organisations and investors come before the Committee, the message is consistently the same: there needs to be political stability in Northern Ireland for people to come and invest. Indeed, we heard that again only this morning.

Mr Bell: The Member makes his point very well. We will get onto the meat of the discussion, but there is one final thing to say. Mr Cochrane-Watson could learn a little from Mr Nesbitt, who was able to make his way through a constituency that we share and show all the successes. Unfortunately, Mr Cochrane-Watson does not appear to know what is happening in RLC or Schrader or what is happening with the hundreds of new jobs in Randox. He does not appear to know what is happening with Moy Park. All of that has a direct impact —

Mr Cochrane-Watson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: Yes.

5.00 pm

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I remind the Minister of what is happening in Ballymena in North Antrim that is having a massive effect on my constituency. I estimate that there could be upwards of around 500 job losses from JTI and Michelin, as well as the impact that there has already been from Patton. I want to remind the Minister of that while he is wanting to remind me of what is happening in South Antrim.

Mr Bell: I think that people will justifiably ask why the Member for South Antrim is so ignorant of the hundreds of new jobs in Randox. Why is the Member for South Antrim so ignorant about the world-beating technology of Schrader? Why is the Member for South Antrim so ignorant about the jobs that are provided to people in South Antrim by Moy Park, where there is some of the best technology and the safest food anywhere in the world? Why is the Member for South Antrim so ignorant of the huge profits that are made by Wrightbus? People will not understand that level of ignorance of the constituency and of the economy.

There is positive news coming from all our main sectors. The construction sector has been our sector most impacted on during the downturn. It posted its highest growth output in three years. The service sector's output and number of jobs has grown. Service-sector job levels are now above their previous peak from 2008. Despite the recent bad news about Michelin, I say to Members who would seek to grandstand politically for their own narrow, sectional interests about Michelin, listen to what the company said. It said that there was nothing more that Invest Northern Ireland or DETI could have done. We faced a reduction in the market of five million truck tyres and competition from Asia caused by fluctuation in the euro. The company said that there was nothing more that could be done, and Unite the Union is on record as saying that there was nothing more that government could have done to save that particular factory. When people ignorantly speak of hands on ears, or when they make up and fantasise words that I never said, I challenge them to come with me on a journey —

Mr Cochrane-Watson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: You have given us enough nonsense already.

Come with me on a journey, a journey that will lead us to 30,000 new jobs in Northern Ireland.

I am sure that the deputy First Minister, when he has a chance to review the Mr Flanagan's comments on corporation tax, will be embarrassed to say the least, given that he as deputy First Minister stood on a platform in Belfast with me as Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment calling for corporation tax to be devolved to Northern Ireland. I have to say that the Speaker previously referred to Mr Flanagan as behaving like a child. His contribution this afternoon leads me not to depart from Mr McLaughlin's words, because it was the economics of a child.

Northern Ireland has a unique opportunity to create 30,000 new jobs. Those are not my words but those of the Economic Policy Centre.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for giving way. He is getting very personal in his remarks. He makes these comments that what was said about the 30,000 jobs are not his words. If they are not your words, come up with some of your own, because they are the only solutions that you are offering, Minister. What have you got for the energy crisis? What have you got for regional disparity? What have you got for the growing cost-of-living crisis? You have not got anything. All that you have got is corporation tax, and that is not the solution to the problems that we face here and now.

Mr Bell: The words on corporation tax were the words of the deputy First Minister, which you are contradicting. Further to that, when I was saying that they were not my words, I was going to tell you that they are the words of Professor Neil Gibson of the Economic Policy Centre at Ulster University. He is rated in the top three economists in Northern Ireland. Is anybody in Northern Ireland going to listen to Mr Flanagan, or will people listen to the Economic Policy Centre at Ulster University? Of course regional disparities exist. They exist in all countries. They exist in London and in Dublin. In the UK, regional variations exist, despite, for the most part, economic and fiscal policies being identical. The Member put to me a direct challenge, asking what have we done on energy costs. I do not know where the Member has been. It has just been announced this week that Bombardier, from the manufacturing sector, has, as a result of what I led with in the House, got all the finance stacked now for a project of over £100 million that could lead to its energy costs being brought down by a full quarter.

Where have those Members been? Michelin was offered three quarters of a million pounds to do that.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: Let me make more progress on the issue of the Province.

There are undoubtedly subregional differences, but let me tell the House clearly that I will fight for a job anywhere in Northern Ireland; I make no exception. I will certainly not tell somebody in Northern Ireland that, because we do not have a little target here, I am not going to take their investment; I am going to take the investment because, according to the census, 40% of people in Northern Ireland operate outside their parliamentary constituency. So, every job brought to Northern Ireland means that we are one step further on the road to economic recovery.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for giving way. He referred to the regional disparities that exist in the UK. Has he looked at the tools that have been adopted or introduced to tackle those disparities, namely city deals? Does he see and accept the merits for a city deal to tackle the economic regional imbalance here, namely for Derry and the north-west?

Mr Bell: In terms of Londonderry, I have met the Member of Parliament for that area, and, as the Member will know, that is a matter between us. It is also a matter that is reserved in parts to the UK Government, and we will try to progress that. Again, I think that we should talk up the skills of Londonderry. When I came to office — just to name two — Metaverse Mod Squad created 100 jobs and OneSource Virtual created 289 jobs. So, progress is being made in Northern Ireland. There is no party political advantage in trying to talk Northern Ireland down.

What we have to do in the future is bring jobs directly to Northern Ireland. It is difficult, and I understand that people want to be near an airport. If somebody wants to come and invest in Belfast — I hope that Mr Ó Muilleoir refers to this when summing up — they will look at the success of areas such as south Belfast where jobs are accessible. I know that it is difficult to travel. I travelled for five years to a job in Omagh, but I travelled because there was a job there and I could take all the benefits from it.

So, while we will encourage people and will look in the round, we will never, ever say to a company, "Do not invest in Northern Ireland because that particular area has met its targets", because I do not want that company to go to Manchester or Liverpool; I want it in Northern Ireland. If it has to be Belfast, I want it in Belfast. Personally, I am with the Member who spoke earlier in wanting to have it in Strangford, but we want jobs in Northern Ireland.

What we need to do collectively is look at where we are at. We are creating more jobs than we ever created before. Under the Ulster Unionist and Sinn Féin Executive, which we were a part of, we set a Programme for Government, and that Programme for Government asked Invest Northern Ireland to create 25,000 jobs. That was the target set. Unusually, we have had a chance to reflect on where we are. It had a target of 25,000, and it created 37,000. Foolish people who say, as Mr Flanagan did, "Only go for jobs above the private sector median average" have no idea that many young people in Fermanagh need to get on the job ladder and are not graduates. I make no apology for trying to get jobs for those people to get them on the employment ladder, given all the physical and mental health benefits that job creation can provide.

So, we will look to build across, but we will also ensure, in opposing the motion, that we attract investment to Northern Ireland and do nothing to deter it.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm críoch a chur leis an díospóireacht seo.

I saw the former Minister, Arlene Foster, come in at one point. I think that she was here to pour oil on troubled waters, but she left fairly rapidly, perhaps to deal with more important issues at hand. It was the former Minister who referred to opportunities, rather than imbalances, when we addressed the issue of disparities. I think that that is the right approach. I note that, when my colleague Mr Flanagan put the case of why we are where we are, no one disputed that. All economies have imbalances and disparities, but the reasons here are historic, and they are because of the place that we have been.

The challenge for us is to move beyond that in the time ahead and to find a way — and I heard the frustration coming from Mr Durkan, who has just left us — to even out the prosperity to ensure that the peace dividend goes right across the jurisdiction. I suppose the burden of blame has to be carried by all of us that we have not made enough headway in ensuring that people right across the jurisdiction have enjoyed more of an economic uplift in the 20 years of peace, which Mr McGlone talked about.

My colleague Mr Dunne went in to bat for Invest NI, and good for him. He extolled the virtues of the great job that it has done. Of course, it was helped by some of the European rules at that time, but no one will dispute that it has done a stand-up job in bringing in jobs and selling the opportunities here. He also said something very pertinent. He said that tourism west of the Bann is totally undersold. I agree with that, and I think that we need to focus on that and concentrate on that. I will venture that, if you were to go to Donegal and see the Wild Atlantic Way, you would see that our colleagues south of the border are a little bit ahead of us. I see the beauty of Fermanagh — if I am allowed to say that in front of my colleague, and I hope that he does not get too emotional — the beauty of the Fermanagh lakes and our inability to build a really prosperous, strong tourism industry around that is something that we need to examine and see how we can do better in the time ahead.

Mrs McKeivitt referred, in her intervention, to jobs lost again today. It is another hammer blow for another 100 people. CVS Caremark, a Boston company that received support from Invest NI, is closing up shop. That is a matter of regret, and our support should go to all those who have lost their jobs, and we should try and do what we can to find alternative employment or training for those people. It is important that that is mentioned today because, as Mr McGlone said, those are the difficult times that we live in, and it has been evidenced again and again. It is the misfortune of our current economy Minister that he has come in at a time when there has been a really bad run of job losses. It is incumbent on all of us to tackle that in the time ahead.

I thank Mr Cochrane-Watson, the Keynesian heavyweight of the Ulster Unionists, for coming here and educating us. [Laughter.] All we wanted you to do was build the A6. When we talk about imbalances, it is not all Invest NI and it is not all the Minister; every one of us and every Department — someone mentioned the Agriculture Department — has a role to play. All we wanted you to do was to build the bloody road to Derry — the A5 — and finish the A6 as well.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ó Muilleoir: I will not give way just yet. North Down has spoken, and I am going to get to North Down and Strangford now. The other fantasy project from Strangford was to have an energy corridor, and I look forward to seeing the budget proposition behind that energy corridor in Strangford and, in the time ahead, to seeing the Ulster Unionists argue within or without the Executive for the money to build the energy corridor that Mr Nesbitt spoke about.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Not just at the minute. I thought that I gave a fairly good summary. I want to move on to Mr Lunn. He made good points. I cannot understand why there is going to be a division on this motion. If subregional targets were an issue, it is something that we should have discussed before we came and split the House and ended up in an acrimonious discussion today. Mr Lunn made the important point that perhaps there is more that unites us than divides us, especially when there are other matters and talks going on in this estate. He also asked how often the ministerial subgroup on regional opportunities meets. I think that is a fair question. Mr Durkan told us that it has met twice, but it has not met because of the difficult political times. It is our hope — and I think that Mr Lunn referred to this — that we can get back to work again and get the focus back again on trying to raise all the boats to try to ensure that the prosperity extends to all communities, and on all sides of peace lines in north and west Belfast in particular.

Mr Givan lamented the Belfast/Lisburn competition but accepted that Lisburn has its own strengths and that many people in Lisburn commute into Belfast. We all understand that there has to be mobility among our workforce. That is one of the reasons why we are encouraging young people to take opportunities as they arise. Mr Givan brought the issue back again to jobs. Regardless of our differences and regardless of the minutiae of the argument, jobs, growth and investment are what unites us.

5.15 pm

Megan Fearon brought suggestions for new proposals to the table about a border economic development zone. We should look at that. In that context, the cutbacks to InterTradeIreland by both Governments worry us, but the Newry/Louth memorandum of understanding that she mentioned is an example of positive development. The Minister referred to that as well.

I am convinced that there are innovative and exemplary projects out there from which we can learn, such as, in particular, the North West Science Park in Derry and Letterkenny. I endorse what the Minister said about Metaverse Mod Squad and OneSource Virtual in Derry. We also need to put our money where our mouth is. We need these magnets of attraction, and, in that context, what has happened in Mr Humphrey's constituency — he mentioned North Belfast in particular — with the innovation centre at Forthriver is exactly the way we need to go. We need to make it as easy as possible for potential investors to go into areas where they perhaps have not gone before and where we have not seen as much investment. In that regard, we need to have the broadband problems that Ms Fearon referred to sorted out and we need to make sure that, as was referred to previously, during familiarisation visits, potential investors go everywhere. It is one thing to say that we cannot force an investor to go into an area — of course we cannot — but we need to make sure that they get a proper introduction to every area.

I want to finish by agreeing with Mr Givan who, I think, referred to the new opportunity with 11 councils rather than 26. It is my view that this needs to be an era of partnership, and there is a possibility that we can have good news for all our people this week. We need to move away from division and pointing to one area doing better than another. The councils can lead the way, and Invest NI can have a real partnership with councils. We also need to have a partnership with councils that will lead to the type of jobs, investment and growth that the Minister spoke about in his closing remarks. I support the motion and have no doubt that, in the time ahead, around the Executive table and around every part of the Chamber, my colleagues will get a chance to talk out the opportunities that exist across the jurisdiction and how we will deliver on them.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Too late.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is a matter of accuracy. Reference was made to Schrader Electronics, which is a flagship company in my constituency and a huge success story for Northern Ireland. I do not want the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to be travelling the world and be ignorant of the fact that it is now called Sensata following the $1 billion purchase in August 2014 and that it has been rebranded.

As he comes to Antrim, he will see the sign. I do not want him to be ignorant of that.

Mr Bell: Further to that point of order, it was Schrader itself that informed me that it wants to create 241 jobs with the support of Invest Northern Ireland, and it was Schrader itself that said that it is delighted with the fact that it has created 301. You do not seem to know very much about your constituency.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: You do not know the name of the company.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. Could I bring this cosy little debate to an end?

Assembly Business

Mr McGlone: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Earlier today, during the debate around renewables, the Minister put on record and said that I had committed to a certain course of action during a meeting which I had with him on 2 July. That was erroneous, if not misleading. I have the full minute of that meeting with the Minister, which I can give to you, Mr Speaker, and I request that you check the accuracy of that minute, taken impartially by an Assembly official, with the comments made by the Minister, please.

Mr Speaker: I will have to consider carefully whether that is in fact the best approach but, until I have had that chance to reflect on it, I will be quite happy to receive the document. There has to be at least the possibility that this can be resolved between the officials of the scrutiny Committee of that Department and the Minister, on the basis of the records that they keep, so I just want to reflect on that. I recognise that the comments were made in the Chamber but, without the verbatim information in front of you, you can have disputes and different memories. Is there not another way of dealing with this issue that would be less —

Mr McGlone: I hope that there is not a clash of responsibilities. You were actually on the Committee at the time that this all went on, and you would have been privy to the briefings that were received. I suggest, Mr Speaker, that you please look at what is committed to Hansard today and the clear, impartial record of the meeting held with the Minister, and reflect on the correct course of action to be taken.

Mr Speaker: OK. Just lodge the document with me and allow me the opportunity to consider the circumstances and the appropriate way to respond. I was actually present during the exchange between the two of you, and at the time I wondered who would have the best recollection.

Private Members' Business

Transport Infrastructure Funding

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to 1 hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes.

Mr Dallat: I beg to move

That this Assembly, mindful of the transport infrastructure in the north-west and conscious of the influence good transport infrastructure has in attracting new inward investment, asks that a special case be made to source the capital investment needed to complete the A5 cross-border project, the A6 dual carriageway, including the bypass for Dungiven, the final upgrade of the Belfast to Derry rail line that will ensure an hourly service, and the reopening of the Antrim to Portadown line to allow a direct service to Dublin.

I am grateful for the opportunity to bring this motion to the Assembly, and I welcome the new Minister for Regional Development. I appeal for cross-party support for what I believe is a non-contentious motion.

Northern Ireland has come a long way in the last few years. While political issues have dominated the Assembly, we in the SDLP believe that there is now an opportunity to begin the process of identifying the other issues that are preventing the whole region from rising on the tide of change. The north-west — indeed, the west in general — is less attractive to potential inward investors because of the poor transport infrastructure, which is a legacy issue that can never be fully addressed by yearly allocations from the Executive to the Departments responsible for capital investment in roads, railways, airports and, in the case of the north-west, the ferry service between Magilligan and Greencastle, which, I believe, should be the joint responsibility of the two Governments.

Those issues merit special attention and the collaborative support of the British and Irish Governments and the European Union. Above all, the issues require Members to look outside their immediate territory, irrespective of which party they belong to. In recent years, projects described as “shovel-ready” tended to be successful. While that enabled financial deadlines to be met to spend money, it did not address long-standing need. Indeed, the shovel-ready approach, I believe, compounded the problem of regional inequality in relation to road infrastructure, in particular.

Allow me to move on. Increasingly it is argued that Northern Ireland must become more focused on generating its own economic activity. I agree. I also accept that potential inward investors cannot be compelled to locate their industries in one particular area because it is economically and socially disadvantaged. That happened in the past, but, all too often, when the grants ran out the projects folded and the entrepreneurs moved on to another economically deprived part of the world. The option open to us as an Assembly, therefore, is to address the infrastructural issues, which are clearly identified as labelling a region as economically and socially disadvantaged. There is clear evidence that if transport infrastructure issues are tackled we can begin to address the causes of deprivation.

In the north-west, as I said at the beginning of my speech, the critical issue is the availability of decent road infrastructure to keep costs down when moving people, goods and, indeed, services from the regions to the centre of commercial activity and the ports. We have had some success in recent years in rail transport, which constitutes a small but critical part of our transport infrastructure. Already we can measure the success of investment in the Belfast area railway, which is increasingly bringing prosperity, not just to Derry and beyond, but to the towns that the railway travels through. A few years ago, senior civil servants, egged on by direct rule Ministers, recommended the closure of the railway north of Ballymena. They almost got their way. Recently, the Assembly invested £46 million to complete the third phase of the improvements, critical to making the railway the success that I believe it will be.

That work is progressing and should encourage us to keep our hand on the tiller in what I believe has been the most exciting period in the development of rail transport over the past 100 years. When finished, the Belfast to Derry railway will be able to offer an hourly service between our two great cities, and that will be a major factor in enticing potential inward investors to locate in the North and in the north-west. It also fulfils the dream that that railway will, in the future, become part of an all-island rail network, as I believe that it will when the Antrim to Portadown section is reopened, enabling a more direct route to Dublin and the rest of Ireland.

However, rail is only a small part of the renaissance of transport in modern times. Road is critical, and, here, the two major projects that have dominated modern thinking are the A5 and A6, which are the main arteries to allow the free flow of people and goods to the various outlets on this island. The A5 is, of course, a joint project with the Government of the Republic, and I am delighted that it is dominating the current talks between the British and Irish Governments, as well as our own Assembly. I have confidence that those projects will happen, but time is not on our side. It is highly regrettable that the A5 is not well on the way to completion in order to enhance the north-west and make it a more attractive place to invest in, allowing it to expand and become a truly vibrant section of a thriving economy.

The A5 project has been on the books for many years, but not as long as the A6 project, and especially the bypass at Dungiven, which I believe is now in its fiftieth year of planning in one shape or another. I ask myself this question: for how much longer can this go on? How much longer can the people of that town tolerate the pollution, congestion and road safety issues that they live with day and daily? However, the bypass is only part of the issue. Day and daily, sections of the existing roadway are little more than an elongated car park, where traffic is brought to a standstill as vehicles filter into the queues at various junctions in the struggle to get to Belfast and beyond.

Some time ago, when I was stuck in a traffic jam on the way from the airport to Nairobi, the capital of Kenya, I said to myself, "Am I back home? Is this the daily traffic jam at Moneynick on the A6?". It really was home from home, but Kenya is a Third World country experiencing economic and political problems on a scale much worse than we have had to live with.

Other countries have faced much more formidable challenges to modernise and upgrade transport infrastructure than we have, including emerging economies in the expanded European Union. Take Slovenia, for example, which, within a few short years of independence, created a new road and rail infrastructure second to none, including massive tunnels that linked the country with neighbouring countries that it does business with. Today, Ljubljana is an important transport hub. There is no reason that Derry and the north-west cannot enjoy the same success as a modern economic entity. That must, of course, include road rail, air and sea transport. However, the area needs investment, and that investment needs to be prioritised, in recognition of the historical events that prevented it from getting the investment that it needed to progress and be taken out of the category of "area with the highest unemployment and social deprivation". It can and will happen, and the Assembly can make it happen if there is a will and a way.

We do not have to go to Slovenia. Travel to Galway and see living proof of what happens when money is invested in transport infrastructure. See the transformation that has taken place and experience how it is to travel from Galway to Dublin without seeing a single set of traffic lights. Indeed, I understand that you can now travel the whole way from Galway to Belfast without seeing a set of traffic lights.

Let us be positive and build on the obvious successes that have happened in recent years. Let us do it together, because, as I said, if Northern Ireland is to be economically successful, all areas must rise on the tide of success. Investment in new trains created the miracle that is now the Belfast to Derry railway, carrying more passengers than the highly successful Belfast to Dublin Enterprise.

We need more miracles, but it will take more than prayer. It will take the determination of the Assembly, pulling in the same direction and setting in motion a plan and strategy over several years to ensure that the renewal and development of roads and railways really happens. All of us in every party can be part of that success. If we do nothing, the north-west will never catch up, and that is not in the interests of everyone.

In conclusion, I ask all Members of the Assembly to unite before the motion and demonstrate to the outside world that, as an Assembly, we can and will make this place work.

5.45 pm

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate in my capacity as the Chair. I will add some comments towards the end in my own capacity.

I trust that it is in order to welcome the new Minister. I have been fortunate to attend one of her first ministerial functions today. I suppose the announcement of that will be next week in relation to the winter programme, and that was useful.

The Committee has consistently supported all four projects referred to in the motion. It was, after all, the Committee that put pressure on the previous Minister to bring forward the first phase of the Coleraine to Londonderry project in order for the City of Culture celebrations to be exploited to the fullest potential. We are thankful for that.

The A5 project has also been debated and has been subject to oral and written questions in the House on numerous occasions. It is also referred to at the Committee on frequent occasions by Members on the Benches opposite and, indeed, on these Benches. There is no division on it, or the A6, which is equally important to Members in the east of the Province and those who travel to Dungiven or Londonderry daily. The Committee has travelled to both those routes and has taken evidence from landowners and householders in Omagh — those in favour and those against. Again, there was an Executive commitment on the project. The economic climate in the Republic of Ireland and the judicial review in this jurisdiction have slowed that project considerably. However, as a Committee, we have also continued to liaise with counterparts in Dublin to ensure that the project is progressed. It does, however, remain a commitment, as is frequently evidenced in the North/South ministerial meetings. I fully accept that there will be little progress on the project in what remains of this mandate. However, the Committee would encourage the new Executive, and, indeed, the new Committee for Infrastructure, to ensure that that remains firmly on the agenda.

The A6 has been debated over the last 40-odd years. Whilst I am not as old as the Member who moved the motion, I know that it has been about for a considerable time, so I do not think that we are going to see any resistance from the Committee in relation to that.

I will add a few remarks in my own right. I know that the Minister is relatively new in post and that she has taken the opportunity to meet, for example, the Quarry Products Association Northern Ireland on the value that it would put into new road projects. It is not only them. I am sure that other Members will speak about pet projects in their constituencies. That is why I am happy to join this one today — because the A6 is actually in my constituency, albeit that it joins a considerable road from Randalstown right up to Londonderry. The members of the Committee will know that I and others made representation when we were up in the port of Londonderry a few weeks ago about the significance and importance of that and how it would be useful for everyone to join that up.

In speaking about the quarry products, we have to recognise that there have been considerable job losses because of the reduction in the budget and what the Minister — and, indeed, the previous Minister — had to spend. I suppose the motion does seem somewhat aspirational in relation to the amount of money that it is actually going to take to deliver the projects that are outlined. I think, previously, we heard that from the M2 to Londonderry was costing in excess of £350 million. If we just focus on that one scheme alone, we are talking about a considerable amount of money. However, it would be foolish for any of us to say today that we do not want to see that project, or, indeed, any other project, whether in the east of the Province or the west of the Province. They all bear a certain degree of merit. I do not think that anyone should be disadvantaged just because they are from the west of the Province. Given that the Executive have previously made a commitment for those projects, I encourage the Minister and her Executive colleagues to do whatever they can to expedite those projects and get them delivered as soon as humanly possible.

However, dare I put a wee sting in at the last? I mean nothing personal against the proposer of the motion, he and I have grown very friendly over the last number of months — I do not know how — but it is ironic how much has been wasted on welfare, and his party is one of those that have held back on welfare reform. Some £214 million in welfare reform fines have been handed back to the British Treasury to date. Had we had that £214 million, we could have built the road from Randalstown to probably three quarters of the way to Dungiven; we would have had a road and something to show for it. We would have secured investment and jobs for the Quarry Products Association and its members. Instead, that Member's party and the other Members opposite decided to stand in the way of welfare and progress and hand back £214 million. I am glad that the motion is bringing forward a project that will deliver and continue to move Northern Ireland forward for everyone's prosperity.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I agree with some of the sentiments of the previous Member who spoke. I take the opportunity to welcome the Minister to her first debate and wish her well in the coming time.

I welcome the chance to debate the motion on infrastructure in the wider north-west area. I am glad that the A6 has been included in the motion, as it was omitted previously, and the Dungiven bypass, which I and many others have championed for many years. I do not want to rehearse all that has been said previously on that matter, but it has been a festering sore for locals and travellers alike in my town for some 50 years.

I also welcome the inclusion of the A5 and phases 2 and 3 of the upgrade of the Derry to Coleraine railway line. I am less certain about the reopening of the Antrim to Portadown line as a direct service to Dublin, and I often think that it might be preferable to examine reopening the Derry to Portadown line or to consider re-establishing the Derry to Sligo line, or the western arc as we like to call it, which would open up the entire rail network. I would also like to see a regular, year-round and adequately resourced ferry service on the Magilligan to Greencastle route.

The Committee for Regional Development recently visited Lisahally docks, and I certainly sensed a feeling by some that the railway line that runs through the docks may be a hindrance to the development of the docks instead of assisting the delivery of goods and services across the island. There is, of course, no stop, as yet, for passengers on the railway line at the City of Derry airport and no halt for the new DARD headquarters at Ballykelly. Also, despite the success of the 212 bus service from Derry to Belfast and, indeed, the proposed introduction of a round-the-clock service, there is still no park-and-ride for nearly 35 miles of the route.

However, we are here to discuss funding. Much was made of the opportunities that were provided by the Trans-European Transport Network, or TEN-T. That might still be doable, and, of course, £14.3 million went from that into the Derry to Coleraine railway line. Our focus should be on other sources of funding. Europe wants to see balanced —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ó hOisín: Yes, absolutely.

Mr McCartney: Would the Member agree with me that the north-west ministerial subgroup, which looks at regional disparities, would be a good vehicle to assist in the process of seeking out funding streams?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for his intervention. The ministerial subgroup has come forward with a number of proposals, and it absolutely is a good vehicle for identifying some of the European funding sources.

As I said, Europe wants to see balanced regional development. The Juncker investment plan is worth €315 billion. Most of the European regional development fund (ERDF) moneys go into INI, almost two thirds of them, and a regional approach is advocated but does not happen. The ERDF has a monitoring committee whose job is to ensure balanced regional development. We should pressurise that committee to ensure that its commitments are fulfilled. There is also the European economic and social committee (EESC).

Last year, a scoping exercise by NILGA identified opportunities for local authorities through European Investment Bank (EIB) loans. That would not be reinventing the wheel, because, ironically, the A6 road in England was funded by alternative sources and brought together the council areas of Cheshire, Manchester and Stockport. The issue for the Assembly is that it cannot draw down loans on investment from the European Investment Bank, but local authorities can. Joint applications are no longer required as a power of competence, which means that local authorities could access those — the joint committee requirement is no longer needed. In effect, that means that a single council can apply for these. The former Minister, despite his flaws, was keen on this and he promised DRD buy-in. The EIB is also open to this. Certainly, guarantees must be given, perhaps under the UK guarantee scheme, but we need further political buy-in, and I welcome yesterday's intonations from the South on potentially funding infrastructure. However, we also require, of course, input from the Assembly, local councils and other source buy-ins. I again think of the ministerial subgroup there as well.

The Chair referred to the Quarry Products Association, and speaking on Radio Ulster's 'Inside Business' Gordon Best said that the maintenance of our road infrastructure, valued at £33 billion, was being carried out by default, through monitoring rounds that, unlike in the South and elsewhere, are not front-loaded and leave little in the way of wriggle room.

What do we need to do collectively? We need to build a case for transport infrastructure, particularly in the north-west. We need to look at the regional spread of the block grant spend. We need to ensure that the north-west is included as a priority in the Programme for Government. We need to challenge Departments, including DRD and DETI, on balanced regional development. We need to look actively at all alternative funding.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: Like other Members, I welcome the Minister to the House today. I also welcome the opportunity to talk to the motion, which our party is broadly supportive of.

We need a modern and sustainable economic infrastructure to support economic growth and help realise the visions we all have for the economy. Investment in areas such as transport, energy and telecoms etc will make a difference to a more vibrant economy, moving forward.

The positive relationship between a modern, sustainable economic infrastructure and economic growth is well established. The quality of the business environment, including transport infrastructure, has been identified as a significant factor, alongside issues such as access to markets, labour supply etc. With that in mind, we are very supportive of a railway investment prioritisation strategy. I am pleased that, under the themes, the number one priority is the completion of the Coleraine to Londonderry line and to establish a modern, efficient railway service between Belfast and Londonderry and indeed Londonderry and Dublin. We very much welcome that.

Moving to the A6, I, like the Chair, my colleague from South Antrim, attended a Regional Development Committee meeting in Londonderry port. I am sure he would agree with me that driving conditions were horrendous on the evening we travelled along the A6. It really brought the issue of the A6 home to us, and we discussed the priority for the road at length that evening. I will just remind the House that more than 50 years ago, in 1964, the Northern Ireland Government announced plans to build a motorway from Belfast to Londonderry. Half a century on, we are still waiting. While the route east of the "city" of Randalstown is of motorway standard, the rest of the A6, as many of you know, is very much a single carriageway. So, we are very committed to seeing that upgraded. There are plans to upgrade further stretches between Belfast and Londonderry, but the most recent addition was the Toome bypass, and that took place over 10 years ago in my constituency of South Antrim.

We appreciate the need for the A5 to be upgraded. We are very concerned that £72 million, I believe, has already been spent on the project. I know that it has been a stop-start scenario. The promise of funding, which may be coming back again, and the court actions and so on, have caused stoppages to the project. However, again, we in the Ulster Unionist Party welcome greater connectivity between all parts of our Province. For me, in my constituency, there would be significant benefit, as my colleague Trevor Clarke identified for the A6; and there would be the enhanced railway links, not just to Belfast but to Crumlin, Lisburn and further afield to Portadown and Dublin.

We will be supporting the motion, but we highlight concerns. Capital expenditure is under a huge strain. Although this is deemed a priority, we also highlight the other priorities that are out there in the form of our schools, hospitals and other major public realm works.

Although we give a guarded welcome to the motion, we hope that it is not at the expense of other significant projects.

I echo the comments that have been heard in here today: had welfare reform been resolved, over £200 million would be available for these projects. I urge a resolution of that and urge that we move forward on the much-needed projects that were brought here by the proposer of the motion.

6.00 pm

Mr Lunn: I also welcome the Minister to her new post and wish her well.

I will say this for you, Mr Dallat: the motion is nothing if not ambitious. I have to agree with it because, if you are not ambitious, you will not realise ambitions.

I will deal with the Belfast-Londonderry train service first. It is not a service with which I am particularly familiar because I tend to drive, but the comparison with Slovenia or anywhere else on the Continent is correct: we are miles behind. The United Kingdom is miles behind countries that have far fewer resources and much less access to finance than us. I hope that that project will be completed sooner rather than later, because it is high time that it was.

The A6 project seems to have been going on for ever. I see it in different sections. It is a massively important road, but doing the whole upgrade is a massively ambitious project. A motorway from Belfast to Londonderry sounds terrific, and a cost of £350 million would not surprise me at all. There are real bottlenecks, including the Moneynick section, as we know it. I happened to listen to the radio traffic report today at 7.20 am, and the advice was to avoid the Moneynick Road. Apparently, it was absolutely chock-a-block and at a standstill before 7.30 am. For traffic management and speed of access, that is perhaps the most important section of the whole road, but it would not be good news for the people of Dungiven, who have been waiting, as somebody said, for close to 50 years since they were first promised a bypass. It is not purely a matter of traffic movement around Dungiven; there is also the question of pollution and the detrimental effect on the population. The last time that we debated this — it was not that long ago; about a year, I think — I came down in favour of Dungiven being first, if there was to be prioritisation.

The A5 intrigues me. Apparently, it is a priority project for Martin McGuinness. It is a stand-or-fall project, and the whole Assembly will collapse if we do not upgrade the A5. The section of the A4 from the end of the motorway to Ballygawley shows what can be done; it is fantastic. The main problem is from Ballygawley to Strabane, but the A5 also extends the other way, down to Aghnacloy. That is the reason for the Southern Government's interest in it: it is part of their overall strategy for an all-Ireland network. That is very laudable. I do not know the road, but I am told that the section to the south of Aghnacloy is single carriageway. It is not as if they have brought the dual carriageway to the border and are waiting for us to do the rest. It would open up the north-west and Donegal, and I could not argue with that. I would love to see it done.

I am slightly intrigued by the reference in the motion to the reopening of the Antrim-Portadown line. As a native, I was not aware that there was an Antrim-Portadown line, so I presume that you must be talking about what I would call the Knockmore link, which is the line from Antrim that goes through Lisburn and into Belfast. If there is a proposal to change that route to make it easier for people coming from the north-west by train to link up to the Enterprise, I query whether it is worth the cost.

At the moment, they have to get to Belfast and then get on the Enterprise.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Sure.

Mr Clarke: Is the Member saying that he would deny people in a constituency bordering his, such as those who live in Stoneyford, a good rail link? Would he also deny Belfast International Airport the opportunity to expand?

Mr Lunn: I was coming to the Belfast International Airport, but thanks for the extra minute. I favour the reopening of the Knockmore link. Anybody who lives in Lisburn would say that that is a good idea because it was a good commuter line and could become busier than it was. I also favour a link to Aldergrove airport, which could be done quite easily. It would also be quite easy to provide a spur to the Maze, if anything is ever done at the Maze, of course. In the overall scheme of things, I fancy that that is probably bottom of the list.

There is nothing here to oppose. The new Minister hardly has her feet under the table, but I am sure that she has plenty of ideas. I would be interested to hear where her priority is. It is inconceivable that we will have the money in the next number of years to do all these projects, so is there any prioritisation in the scheme of things? If so, what is coming first and what is on the long finger?

Obviously, we will support the motion.

Mr G Robinson: I welcome the Minister to the debate. I speak for the motion, but I do so with the warning that the projects identified are subject to the necessary funding being made available. I stress just how difficult a task the Minister and her officials have due to the financial implications that she has to grapple with. The welfare reform situation certainly has not helped the Minister's financial situation.

The projects in the motion are but a few of the infrastructure projects needed in the north-west. I add to the list the need for a dual carriageway from Coleraine to the Drones Road junction outside Ballymoney and from Coleraine to Londonderry, with an emphasis on the Gortcorbies climbing lane between Limavady and Coleraine. Those are also essential targets to aim for, but the finances have to be made available.

I certainly agree that the development of good transport infrastructure will be of immense benefit to the north-west in attracting inward investment. However, the reality is that this, too, is dependent on finances. I live in the real world and have to accept the limitations that come with being a realist. I am on record as saying in the House that I fully understand the need for the Dungiven bypass, for health reasons and to ease traffic congestion, even as a stand-alone scheme. My support for that has not changed. However, a climbing lane at Gortcorbies on the A37 would reduce travel times and accidents on the road between Limavady and Coleraine.

When it comes to the rail infrastructure in the north-west, I congratulate Translink on the work that it did recently and is still doing. It is easy to criticise, but a word of congratulation on concluding major capital projects is well deserved. There have been problems with the signalling on the Coleraine to Londonderry line. Commuters acknowledge that, but we should all concentrate on bringing the signal upgrade to a successful conclusion. The hourly service proposed by Translink will be welcomed by commuters. The Minister will not be surprised to learn that I still support the establishment of a rail halt adjacent to Shackleton barracks to aid commuters to the new DARD headquarters at Ballykelly. However, I am aware that there would be a substantial and unwelcome budget implication for the Department. Ideally, that project should be shared by other Departments, such as DARD.

I note the reference in the motion to the Antrim to Portadown railway line. Of course, if that line were reopened, I would urge the establishment of a halt adjacent to Belfast International Airport, depending on funding being made available or in a joint venture with the international airport. It is a question of finance being made available. What impact would that have on the existing Dublin services, especially considering the rebranding of the Enterprise rail service that is occurring?

I support the motion.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. First, I take the opportunity to commend the proposers of the motion and welcome the Minister to the House. I wish her well in her position.

At the outset, I express strong support for the motion, which proposes a focus on the north-west and the addressing of the infrastructure deficit that exists. Many projects have been referenced during the debate, but you will not be surprised that one of the key ones that many of my colleagues in west Tyrone and I are interested in is the development of the A5 dual carriageway. We have been engaging widely throughout the business community and civic society. It is an essential lifeline to the north-west. Indeed, the economic projections that were arrived at during the planning of the road indicate that it could generate as much as £1 billion for the economy. That includes hundreds of jobs but, most importantly, lives would be saved.

Following recent comments from the Taoiseach, Enda Kenny, we need to see the commitment to funding for the A5 from the Irish Government, which was pledged in the Stormont House Agreement last Christmas, honoured. At that stage, they pledged £50 million. I note that comments were made yesterday by the Taoiseach that they will continue to honour that commitment. It is important that those commitments are kept in full. At this point, I also call on the Regional Development Minister to take a look at the A5 and move on towards issuing the draft orders, which would move the project on to the next stage.

As I said, throughout the course of the project we have engaged extensively with civic society, the chambers of commerce and businesspeople in Derry, Omagh, Strabane and through the whole of the north-west. They see the A5 as being the most important project for the development of the north-west. They have cited many examples of prospective inward investors who are unwilling to invest in the north-west because of the very poor infrastructure that we have there.

Mr Ó hOisín: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that the inclusion of some of the infrastructure projects in the north-west would be helped by their inclusion on the core network?

Mr McAleer: Yes, it is good that you mentioned that. A few weeks ago, we visited the Derry port, where we met the chief executive, Brian McGrath. We went along with the Regional Development Committee. That is certainly one of the issues that he raised. As the most peripheral port of the EU, it is not on the core network — nor indeed is the A5 or the A6. I was intrigued by how strategic the Derry port is. It is a gateway to Canada and North America. It handles £1 billion of trade every year, which is absolutely phenomenal, and it imports hundreds of thousands of tons of oil, coal and gas. In fact, there is a 10-acre coal yard on the site. It is also the key port of entry for plywood from China. The port in Derry is used to distribute all around Ireland and Britain. The chief executive made the point that the development of the A5 and the A6 is absolutely critical for the development of Derry port and the onward distribution of those supplies.

In the wider European context, Trevor Lunn and John Dallat made reference to the fact that we are miles behind many other EU countries. As we are, rightfully, debating this motion today, the implementation of the first phase of the core network within TEN-T is already taking place. That is coming out of a huge £200 billion budget for the 2014-2020 period. The objective is to have an integrated transport system across the EU to enable the seamless movement of people, services and goods. They want to have the core network established by 2030 and the comprehensive network established by 2050, with the objective of full coverage of the EU. Frustratingly, Derry city is not considered as a core node, and the routes leading to it are not considered part of the core network, so they are excluded from that £200 billion pot. That is very frustrating. DRD has told us that it has lobbied the European Commission intensively for that, but it is precluded, even though it is sitting at the junction of two EU member states and is the most peripheral area of the EU. We feel that it would be a major game changer if Derry city was considered as a core node. It would open the way for funding for the A5 and A6, and indeed the port, as part of the core network.

We have already seen that infrastructure is clearly linked to economic development. You would also expect that it is linked to deprivation.

6.15 pm

In the last year, I co-hosted a seminar with Trutz Haase, who was at the Committee as well. He worked for NISRA and is a very experienced and respected economic consultant. He produced deprivation measures for the island of Ireland based on the 2011 census and demonstrated clearly that where the motorway, the M1, was built in the North, there was a better spread of wealth along that corridor. He linked it clearly to the fact that the M1 was there. He has clearly linked deprivation with infrastructure.

Fifty years ago, a decision was made here to close the railway lines in counties Tyrone and Fermanagh; a crime against the people that left them very isolated. At that time, people hoped that they would see infrastructural development and that the M1 would hopefully reach that way, but that was not the case. We have it in our hands now to try to redress that historical infrastructural imbalance in the west and north-west.

Mr Middleton: I, too, welcome the Minister to her new role and wish her well. Of course, I thank her for taking time out recently to visit Foyle and meet constituents.

As a Londonderry man, I am all too aware of the transport infrastructure issues that we face, along with the thousands of others who use it daily. Whether it be the logjam at Dungiven or the bottleneck at Moneynick, the journey for commuters between Londonderry and Belfast is less than efficient, no matter what mode of transport you use. Of course, similar difficulties exist between Londonderry, Strabane, Omagh and Enniskillen.

We need to refocus our efforts on the importance of transport connectivity in Northern Ireland, particularly between the key cities. The delivery of the proposed road schemes will significantly enhance connectivity and shorten the duration of travel; it can therefore be shown to have clear economic worth. In particular, they address bottlenecks on those key strategic routes. In order to ensure that all areas of Northern Ireland contribute to and benefit from increased prosperity, it is essential that we invest in the wider regional transport network to enhance rural and urban connectivity. Of course, there are many benefits from that: the fact that the local economy will be improved by bringing workers and jobs together; improved access to markets and onward connectivity; and, of course, more reliable journey times as well.

In the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment's report 'Opportunity for Excellence', Manufacturing NI recently highlighted:

"a lack of integration between available space for businesses to locate and the transportation infrastructure."

It commented that one manufacturer planned to double its space but was unwilling to locate to the north-west where space was available. That was clearly down to the poor road infrastructure. Of course, we know that it was not the only business in that position.

In relation to public transport and the rail service between Belfast and Londonderry, it is important to stress the role that it has to play in the economy and community in Northern Ireland. With a strong tourism offering in the north-west and two university campuses, public transport must be strengthened. Alongside this, I have highlighted on many occasions the case for the refurbishment of the old Waterside railway station.

With all that in mind, as was already touched on by a colleague, we must be mindful of the current situation that we find ourselves in, both financially and politically. The amount of money that has been wasted by the failure of the parties opposite to implement welfare reform was highlighted. It is mentioned in the motion that we want to see it as a priority or even made a special case. Many people will want to see other projects made special cases. Just this morning, I, along with colleagues, met the Rural Community Network about other challenges that face the north-west — broadband provision, connectivity and access to services as well. Of course, that is not to take away from the motion, as I am supportive of the schemes outlined in it. In particular, I would like to see progress on the A6 and the completion of the rail-line upgrade. I believe that, where appropriate, the schemes should be split into sections and carried out as and when money becomes available, whether it be secured through Westminster, Europe or indeed the Irish Government.

There is no doubt that we need to see further investment in the transport infrastructure. I know that the Minister will do all she can to progress those schemes as soon as possible.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I wish the Minister well in her new role and look forward to working with her in the Committee. She has been well introduced to the A5 and the A6, and I will mention the A4 extension to Enniskillen and beyond, just to put it on her radar.

As I was going home, I was listening to the programme that my colleague mentioned, 'Inside Business'; it was all about infrastructure. One statistic that stuck out for me was that the South of Ireland and Scotland have three times more road carriageway per head than we have here. Obviously, there are reasons for that, and there are legacy issues. Mr Dallat talked about travelling throughout the South of Ireland. I live fairly close to the border, and I know that we lag behind, particularly in the north-west and west of the Bann.

Gordon Best, from the Quarry Products Association, told the Committee that the A5 was a priority and said that it was dangerous. I do not travel on it very often, but we were going to a DRD meeting a number of weeks ago at night when it was wet and it was dangerous. I know that I am not used to it, but the next day we had our meeting at the port and, as my other colleague said, we spoke to the CEO, who gave us a presentation. I was surprised when he said that £1 billion in imports and exports came in and out of Derry. The two key routes for distribution are the A5 and the A6. Those two routes, which are not up to standard, have costs and act as a barrier to economic growth. There is increased congestion, longer travel times and higher costs. I experienced that on the way back to Fermanagh from Derry that day along the A5. I saw all the heavy goods vehicles coming back and forward from the port, particularly the Quinn Group lorries, of which there are 150 or 160. The lorries were being held up by long queues behind farming vehicles, and the time that it was taking them was too long. I spoke to drivers who said that they would rather go to Belfast twice in the same day than go to Derry once.

It is widely recognised that major benefits accrue to the economy through investment in infrastructure. Investment in the north-west and, indeed, west of the Bann is about balanced regional development. To be competitive in regional locations, business must have access to good infrastructure. I will not keep the House any longer tonight: I support the motion.

Ms Hanna: The motion is, in some ways, complementary to the motion that we discussed earlier this afternoon and seeks to expand on the same issues. It is clear from both debates that increased and improved transport infrastructure would go a lot of the way towards alleviating some of the imbalances for those outside Belfast who have to deal with it on a daily basis. It is easy for us to get up and ask for funding for this, that and the other project, and I know that the budget is not in place to dole out money for everything, but these are not new requests. With respect, the welfare reform issue has been a problem for the last year but, particularly with regard to the Derry road, these are proposals that have been on the table for 50 years, and we did not necessarily have welfare reform as the block —

Mr Clarke: I thank the Member for giving way. You still wasted £214 million.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Ms Hanna: I would like to take that as a commitment: it sounds like a deal on welfare reform is coming. It is above my pay grade, but, if you are saying that, once welfare reform is resolved, we will have money for this project, I will happily take that as a win.

It is clear that, if we do not invest in this infrastructure, we will be back to these issues in years to come. A balanced investment programme will mean that prosperity can, possibly, be spread out across Northern Ireland. Possibly, the foreign direct investment ship has sailed a little bit; we are probably quite late to that. I know that there was some discussion earlier, but attracting it has been a big part of the Executive's economic strategy. We will not be able to expand that if we do not address these issues. I am not seeking to undersell my city — it is an advantage that I represent the centre of the universe — but we have to realise that the devolution of corporation tax will only take us so far and that, if we do not join up the other dots and learn the other lessons from the Republic of investing in education and infrastructure as well, it will not make much of a difference.

A couple of Members have mentioned infrastructure down South. I am from Galway originally, and we moved to Belfast when I was a child. I am up and down multiple times a year, and, every time I am in Galway, I see the differences in the fortunes of my two home cities and how that region keeps getting economic and investment wins that we just do not get. Members who have taken that road from Dublin will pass Athenry, and anybody who is a follower of Irish rugby will know about Athenry and its low-lying fields. Athenry is about to be on the end of €850 million of investment from Apple. It is clear to see that it is not very near Dublin geographically, but it has got that because it is accessible from anywhere else on the island. We do not get wins like that and will not get wins like that until we start to invest in the infrastructure. Even if Belfast were getting that number of quality jobs, we could not expect people from Fermanagh, Tyrone and Derry to compete on a level playing field for those jobs and be able to raise their families and stay with their families at home until we invest.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member accept that we are talking about the north-west of Ireland, which is Donegal, Derry and Tyrone, and that, given that the two Governments made this a priority in the St Andrews Agreement, the time has come for real delivery? We want to see evidence that this will happen to make sure that there is the economic development necessary in the north-west of the island, as, indeed, it will be complemented by the A6 going forward.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I agree entirely.

The Irish Government have indicated that they are putting the funding back on the table for the A5 in particular. That clearly shows that the ball is back in the Northern Ireland Executive's court to make that project happen. Equally important is the A6. As I said, we have discussed that for 50 years, and we all know the original plan of proper linkages from Belfast to Derry. As I understand it, this project has gone through all its statutory processes. A contractor is in place, and the only thing that is missing is money. Particularly for people in the north-west, it must rank as one of the major failures in devolution that, 15 years into the Assembly and the Ministry having been passed around various parties, that project has not advanced any.

There have been some positive announcements on railways, which is in part due to the lobbying of my colleague from East Derry. I am glad that that is back on track, although I believe that a cyclist recently beat the train from Belfast to Derry in an experiment where he decided to see whether he could do that. I do not think that that speaks very well about the quality of the railway. I understand that the Executive have committed £44 million per annum, but, in a 20-year plan, that will equate to £880 million of expenditure for rail, of which £620 million is required for maintenance. That would leave very little investment for trains.

I will wrap up by echoing the words of my colleagues. We have had a lot of good words, particularly about the A5 and A6, but it really is time for meaningful capital investment that will attract and facilitate the sort of 21st-century jobs that we need all across the region and not just in Belfast.

Mr Lyons: I also take the opportunity to welcome the Minister to her new post, and I wish her well in it. I note with interest the motion before the House this evening, and I certainly cannot blame the Members for wanting to table the motion and say, "Here are the issues that we have in our constituency, and here is the infrastructure that we want to see to get them sorted". It is, of course, the season where children are beginning to write their letter to Santa, and that is possibly what we have here in front of us. It is a wish list, if you like, for the SDLP. I do not know whether the SDLP has been good or bad this year. Something has already been said on welfare reform, and perhaps the party leader will comment on that further; of course, I could not possibly comment. By my calculations, we have at least £1 billion of spending in the motion.

As I say, I cannot blame the Members for bringing that forward. Those are good projects that we want to see completed.

6.30 pm

From my perspective, we in East Antrim have been very fortunate during this mandate because we have had the construction of two long-awaited roads, the A8; and the A2. On Friday morning, I spoke to business leaders in Larne who said that it has been and will be of benefit to them. So, I certainly believe that it is good and right that we improve the road transport infrastructure throughout Northern Ireland. For those of you who want to try them out, please do so. I extend an invitation for you to visit Carrickfergus and Larne. You can get from Sandyknowes roundabout to Larne in 16 or 17 minutes, so why not take up that opportunity and see the road that we have? Perhaps you can visit the Gobbins or some of the other wonderful attractions on the way.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: I am more than happy to give way to Mr Dallat.

Mr Dallat: I know that the Member is new to the Assembly, so I need to put on record that we did, in fact, go and see that wonderful new motorway, which cost, I think, £140 million for 14.5 miles. I did not see a lot of traffic on it, but I did admire the bypass round six houses. I said to myself, "My God, if the people of Dungiven see this, they will go bananas". [Laughter.]

Mr Lyons: Of course, the bypass also goes round Ballynure, which I am sure the Member took note of. Traffic is flowing well on that road, and we are very pleased to have it. We are pleased to have the A2 to Carrickfergus as well. I am making the point that, yes, it is good for business and the economy. Of course we want to see the easy movement of goods and people. We want to have accessible services as well. We get jobs from construction. Good infrastructure is obviously a key component for businesses involved in FDI. It improves competitiveness and connectivity and helps with regeneration, economic productivity and all those other things. So, it is a very worthy desire to want to see more and better infrastructure in our country, and I am very supportive of that.

Issues about funding have obviously been raised already in the debate. The issue of welfare reform was raised, including the possible consequences that that may have on our overall Budget. I want to place it on the record that I very much believe that infrastructure is good for Northern Ireland and the economy. I do not think that many Members in here will disagree with that. I note the absence this evening of the Member for North Down Mr Agnew of the Green Party. Of course, at the last election, his manifesto stated that there would be a moratorium on all new road-building projects. I think that that is the wrong route to go down. If we want to build our economy and create more jobs, we need to have the necessary infrastructure in place. A lot of decisions will obviously be taken in the next mandate on those issues, and some projects may be prioritised over others. We have had good investment over the mandate, and I hope that that continues.

I have just one word of warning for Members in the House: this is not a silver bullet; it is not some perfect solution to all the problems. If we build the A6, it will not mean that the north-west becomes a great economic powerhouse overnight. Yes, it will help and, yes, it is important that we have that infrastructure, but let us be realistic at the same time.

Mr Speaker: It is my pleasure to welcome the Minister to the podium to respond to the debate.

Miss M McIlveen (The Minister for Regional Development): Thank you, Mr Speaker. I thank the Members who tabled the motion and welcome this opportunity to speak on an issue of such importance.

As a member of the Executive, my job is to support and drive economic recovery across all parts of Northern Ireland. The motion rightly highlights the importance of transport infrastructure in that recovery. It is obvious from comments expressed this evening that all of us in the House recognise the need to invest in our economic infrastructure if we are to realise our shared ambition to transform our economy and society.

As was highlighted during the previous debate, our transport infrastructure needs to be fit for purpose to ensure that people, particularly in more remote areas west of the Bann, are in reach of available jobs and that the correct economic infrastructure is in place to enable the conditions through which economic growth can take place.

It is all too easy to take for granted the connections and opportunities that modern transport infrastructure provides not just in Northern Ireland but in an increasingly connected global community. It is those very connections that determine our economic potential. They connect our manufacturers and businesses to global markets, allow us to attract the talent and investment we need to transform our economy and provide access to employment, education and, indeed, the social opportunities our people and communities need to benefit from growth and realise their potential. That is why laying the foundations for a modern, efficient transport infrastructure in all parts of Northern Ireland will be my priority as Minister.

Investment in our transport infrastructure is a significant, long-term commitment and is one that lays the foundations for our future economic well-being. Investment decisions cannot be driven solely by a focus on the present and must enjoy wider Executive support if they are to survive beyond a single mandate. As the Chair of the Committee and Mr Ó hOisín have stated, there is also a need to provide greater certainty on our long-term funding priorities to the industry to provide it with the clarity it needs to plan, invest and build the skills required to deliver those schemes. There is a clear and immediate economic benefit here for our businesses, and we should not ignore that.

When considering our priorities for investment, we must take account of the realities and constraints that we face today. Equally, however, we must look forward. We must anticipate and plan for the needs of our people and our economy not just today but in 10, 20, 30 years' time. In that context, the desirability of the schemes highlighted in the motion are not in question. We can be united on that. The challenge is one of affordability and prioritisation.

I will work hard to make the case for the Executive investing in a modern, efficient transport infrastructure across all parts of Northern Ireland, and I welcome support from across the House in making that case.

We all recognise the need to invest in the transport infrastructure in the north-west. However, these decisions cannot be taken in isolation; they must be part of a wider regional strategy.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for giving way. When we talk about priorities, will she accept that, given the importance that the two Governments put on the A5 western transport corridor at St Andrews, and given that the Irish Government have put €50 million on account for two years, that is, 2014-15 and 2015-16, evidence now has to be demonstrated by the Executive that there will be forward movement to make sure that the rest of the money can be triggered so that the programme can proceed as envisaged?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I will return to the issue around the A5.

If we focus solely on schemes or deal with the north-west in isolation, no matter how well intentioned that is, we run the very real risk of diminishing the impact of the investment we are likely to get. So, we cannot ignore the real needs for significant investment in our transport infrastructure elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

All successful regions have vibrant connected cities at their core. It is for that reason that the Programme for Government, the Executive's economic strategy and the regional development strategy all highlight the need to strengthen Londonderry as a principal city and driver for the north-west and Belfast as the regional economic driver.

Members have correctly identified the importance of key projects such as the A5 and A6 in unlocking the economic potential of Londonderry and, indeed, the wider north-west region. I visited those schemes recently, and I am satisfied that they are regionally significant schemes with all the associated benefits. However, in recognising the benefits of such schemes, I am acutely aware of the concerns of local landowners particularly affected by the A5 scheme. I am aware that there are significant misgivings because of how they have been treated to date. I plan to engage with some of the agents representing those landowners to address the concerns of those affected. Unfortunately, I cannot undo what was done before my time in office, but I can give an assurance that I will listen to concerns going forward during my tenure.

Mr Ó hOisín: Will the Minister give way?

Miss M McIlveen: I have quite a bit to say, so, if you do not mind.

On the A6 corridor, two major projects are being developed: the Londonderry to Dungiven scheme and the Randalstown to Castledawson scheme.

A contract for Randalstown to Castledawson was awarded in May this year, and work is progressing on the first phase to develop the scheme to a shovel-ready position, which will allow construction to start at short notice when funding becomes available. The Londonderry to Dungiven scheme is also well advanced, and the draft vesting order was published in three parts to increase flexibility with construction and to allow options such as the building of the Dungiven bypass ahead of the remainder of the scheme. Equally, the delivery of the York Street interchange, the Belfast transport hub and, indeed, rapid transit have an essential role to play in Northern Ireland's economic future. In their absence, we run a very real risk of constraining our capacity for growth not just in Belfast but right across Northern Ireland. My challenge as Minister is to find an appropriate balance within the available funding envelope.

The need for investment, of course, is not and should not be limited to Belfast or Londonderry. As I stated, investment must be part of a wider and balanced regional strategy if our rural areas and major towns throughout Northern Ireland are to benefit from growth and attract business attention and investment. This year, £67 million has been allocated to develop and construct strategic road schemes. Most of that will be spent on the construction of the A31 Magherafelt bypass and the A26 Frosses Road dualling. In addition, that funding has also allowed my Department to complete the £130 million investment in the A8 Belfast to Larne dualling scheme and the £50 million A2 Shore Road dualling scheme at Jordanstown, and to develop a range of projects including new bypass proposals for Ballynahinch and Enniskillen. The Enniskillen bypass will build on the £146 million upgrade of the A4 Dungannon to Ballygawley road. It is those more modest schemes that collectively provide the connections and local conditions that create attractive environments for people to live and work in. Alongside investment in public transport, they provide the links between our towns and rural areas, which are essential to building sustainable rural economies and communities. There is also the danger that we can lose sight of the importance of what might appear to be localised investment in the likes of crossings and footpaths. Those may not appear to have regional benefit, but they can make a huge difference to a local community, including its ability to access services and wider opportunities. We need, therefore, to continue to make adequate provision for those schemes.

I also welcome the opportunity today to set out my commitment to further investment in the rail network, including in the north-west. As was highlighted, significant progress has been made in recent years in upgrading the track between Belfast and Londonderry. I recently visited Bellarena to see for myself the progress that has been made on the current phase 2 Coleraine to Londonderry project, which, at a cost of nearly £46 million, will overhaul the antiquated signalling system and create a new passing loop by the end of next year. I agree with Mr Dallat that that is an exciting development. Alongside the development of a new rail station in Londonderry, there is an opportunity to continue the growth in passenger numbers and services that we have seen in recent years. More recently, our investment in the Londonderry line sends a strong signal to businesses and overseas investors of the Executive's strong commitment to the north-west. That capital investment will provide the infrastructure required to make an hourly service from Londonderry to Belfast possible. However, I need to emphasise that the actual delivery of the additional rail services involved would create a significant extra annual financial pressure on Translink. It is not apparent at this stage where that investment will come from.

The motion calls for the reopening of the Antrim to Portadown line to provide a direct rail link to Dublin and, indeed, to Belfast International Airport at Aldergrove. To answer Mr Lunn's question: the reopening of the line would require an investment of at least £50 million, and it is unlikely that the demand would exist to justify prioritising that level of funding in the immediate future. The number of passengers using Belfast International Airport is projected to reach 10 million per annum by 2030, and, at that stage, it may be possible to make an economic case for reopening the line.

I firmly believe that we must have an ambitious programme of investment to build a modern, efficient transport infrastructure right across Northern Ireland, including in the north-west. However, it must be balanced. It cannot be to the benefit of one area and to the detriment of another. We also need to be realistic: while we can lay the foundations of that network today, it will require long-term investment stretching across a number of Budget periods. It is simply not affordable otherwise. The capital investment required to deliver the projects identified in this motion alone is greater than my Department's entire capital budget for the current Programme for Government mandate. It is for that reason, as I highlighted, that we need a collective agreement across the Executive on the prioritisation of investment in key transport infrastructure. The restructuring of Departments provides the opportunity to better coordinate our efforts and align key strategies. It is critical that we seize that opportunity.

Investment in transport will not, on its own, deliver growth or well-being. It must be aligned with efforts to enhance our skills base to attract businesses, tackle deprivation and build communities in urban and rural environments that are attractive places to live and work in order to ensure that they can compete for investment in a global economy.

No single Department can create the conditions for growth and prosperity. We need coordinated action from all sectors across the Executive and the wider public sector, including local government. I share the view of others in the House that the reform of local government and the community planning process provide us with a unique opportunity.

I am committed to improving the road and rail transport infrastructure in the north-west. I am committed to taking that forward as part of a balanced, regional strategy to deliver a modern, efficient transport infrastructure that unlocks the economic potential of all parts of Northern Ireland and enhances well-being and access to opportunities for all our communities.

I am pleased to note the supportive comments of the Members who spoke, and I look forward to support from across the House as I make the case for greater investment in our entire transport infrastructure. Members mentioned the opportunities presented by Europe. My Department has a strong track record in that area, securing almost £18 million towards transport projects in Londonderry alone. In addition, my Department has secured the inclusion of €20 million towards a new multimodal transport hub in the north-west.

I welcome the support of the House as I look to build on this success and seek to lay the foundations for a modern, efficient transport infrastructure across all parts of Northern Ireland.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for that, welcome her here and reiterate my commitment to working with her in the Assembly and Executive.

The Minister comes fresh to the debate, but, for many of us, debating the infrastructural deficit in the north-west will seem quite like the film 'Groundhog Day'. It also gets me thinking of another film. Just a few weeks ago, we marked 'Back to the Future' day. In the film, Marty McFly travelled 30 years into the future to 21 October 2015. Before setting off on that remarkable journey, Doc — Dr Emmett Brown, to give him his full title — exclaimed the immortal line:

"Roads? Where we're going, we don't need roads."

For some time now, I have been saying that Derry is the future, but it is clear that successive Ministers for Regional Development have thought that Derry is the future and does not "need roads".

I turn to the contributions to today's debate. John Dallat, who has long been a champion of infrastructure projects, particularly the A5, the Belfast to Derry train, the A6, and, of course, the Magilligan to Greencastle ferry, referred to recommendations a few years back by DRD officials to close the Derry to Belfast rail line. Had it not been for the passion and vision of people like John Dallat and the lobby group Into the West, which is from our city, Mr Speaker, the service would not have been saved, there would have been no subsequent investment in it, and there would certainly not have been the benefit that we all now see as a result.

John Dallat spoke about the Dungiven bypass, which I am familiar with.

There are awful problems there with congestion and pollution. That bypass is long overdue. However, when it comes to Dungiven, it is fair to say that it has been bypassed for 50 years. John also looked enviously at road development and infrastructure advances that have been made in the South.

Trevor Clarke, the Committee Chair, spoke of the A6. I actually met him in Derry one morning. He had travelled up the night before and seemed a wee bit bedraggled. I will put it down to the journey. He touched on the wider economic benefits of investing in infrastructure. He referred to the QPA and the fact that so many jobs can be created in the construction industry through ambitious road building programmes. He referred to welfare reform and the £214 million that has not been handed back. I do not know. Would all of that have been given to Danny Kennedy to build new roads and improve rail infrastructure? I find it difficult to believe that it would, given that, when there was a proposal to ring-fence the underspend or the money that could not be spent on the A5 and retain it within DRD for spend on this type of project, the Member's party and Sinn Féin voted it down.

We then had a contribution from Cathal Ó hOisín and an intervention from Mr McCartney looking at alternative sources of funding. It is vital that we are open to doing that. However, it is also unacceptable that a key pillar of the north-west's economic regeneration — indeed, economic survival — should or could be caught up in wider policy debates. Mr Ó hOisín said that the north-west must be prioritised in the Programme for Government. I can assure the House that my party will be seeking to prioritise it there as well.

Mr Cochrane-Watson welcomed the work that has been done on the railway. He said that, around 50 years ago, the Government here announced their intention to build a motorway between Belfast and Derry. The fact that that has not been done to date is shameful. I am not going to try to apportion blame anywhere — we all get a fair share of the blame from our constituents — but it really is shameful. I certainly welcome his reiteration that the UUP will support the vital A5 project, which will benefit not just the west of the North but also our friends in the north-west of the South. Donegal has suffered equally due to its peripherality.

Trevor Lunn spoke about the daily bottleneck at Moneynick. He referred to particular stretches of the A5. That got me thinking about road safety, more with my departmental hat on. The A5 has a particularly horrendous record of collisions, casualties and fatalities. Improving infrastructure does not just save journey time; it saves lives.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for giving way. Will the Minister accept that saving lives is equally, and maybe even more, important than the environmental issues that pertained to the proposals for the A5?

Mr Durkan: Saving lives should be paramount in everything that we do, so, still with my Environment hat on, I agree with the Member on that.

I thank George Robinson for his support for the motion and the virtual tour of his constituency. Declan McAleer urged the Minister to speed up progress on the A5. He spoke of Derry port and the success that the team at the port have had in comparatively unfavourable conditions. I pay tribute to the team there. We can all work to expand on their success. He pointed out, quite rightly, the links between underdevelopment and unemployment and economic inactivity. Gary Middleton cited the recent Manufacturing NI report, which is an extremely interesting document that I recommend to Members. We are glad of his support, as well, for proposals around the Waterside train station.

I have to move to dispel the theory promulgated by all the unionist Members who spoke that if we, on this side of the House, had rolled over to Tory welfare reform, all these roads would not only have been built but probably paved with gold. The SDLP tabled workable, realistic, affordable amendments to the Welfare Reform Bill, and parties here voted them down. We have no problem with welfare reform, but we will not accept unfair reform.

Claire Hanna referred to the, by now, infamous great bike and train race that demonstrated clearly that, despite the expenditure, the undeniable improvements in infrastructure, and the increase in passenger numbers on the Derry/Belfast train line, there is still much to do. Danny Kennedy, though, was probably secretly happy that the cyclist won.

In her own contribution, I am glad to say that the Minister clearly recognised that investment in transport infrastructure lays the foundation for our future economic development. She spoke of her priorities and the need to plan for the needs of our economy and, most important, the needs of our people. I am certainly happy to take the Minister's word that she will work hard to progress those issues, and I assure her of my support in the Executive, and that of my party in the Assembly, as she does so.

In conclusion, I hark back to the debate this afternoon on regional economic imbalance. Transport infrastructure has a clear role to play in addressing that undeniable imbalance. During that debate, I raised again the prospect and potential of a city deal to regenerate the north-west's economy. That mechanism can, could, and, I believe, would enable projects such as those discussed today to progress. It is my understanding that the Chancellor's door is open to a bid from the Executive for such a deal. After all, the door of Number 10 was open to OFMDFM last week. All the Executive need do is ask for it, and I am hopeful of the Minister's support for that as a means of helping her to deliver these long, long overdue improvements.

Resolved:

That this Assembly, mindful of the transport infrastructure in the north-west and conscious of the influence good transport infrastructure has in attracting new inward investment, asks that a special case be made to source the capital investment needed to complete the A5 cross-border project, the A6 dual carriageway, including the bypass for Dungiven, the final upgrade of the Belfast to Derry rail line that will ensure an hourly service, and the reopening of the Antrim to Portadown line to allow a direct service to Dublin.

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Donaldson Report

Mr Speaker: Mr Jim Allister has given notice of an urgent oral question to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I remind Members that if they wish to ask a supplementary question they should rise continually in their places. The Member who tabled the question will be called automatically to ask a supplementary.

Mr Allister asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety why he chose to outline his policies on an issue as important as the outcome of the Donaldson report at a conference in Ballymena rather than making an oral statement in the House.

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Let me begin by thanking you, Mr Speaker, for accommodating the question at this time. My speech to an audience of front-line health and care leaders on Wednesday 4 November was a follow-up to the speech that I made at the cancer centre in May, where I addressed a group of care professionals in order to set out my vision for health and social care.

Wednesday's speech provided some detail on how I expect to deliver that vision. I wrote to the Chair of the Health, Social Services and Public Safety Committee last Wednesday to set out the content of my speech, and I will appear before the Committee this Wednesday to answer questions about the announcement. Oral Answers to Questions next week will provide a further opportunity for Members to quiz me on what I have said, as do written Assembly questions and correspondence.

Mr Allister: I acknowledge that the Minister is finally, though grudgingly, here tonight. Surely it is central to the credibility and authority of the House that Ministers make key policy announcements, when they can, to the House. By choosing deliberately not to do that, can I ask the Minister why he showed such contempt for the House and its processes, and how he thinks the general public can be expected to show respect if he demonstrates such obvious contempt? And, if I am permitted, can I ask him why, since he is sweeping away the Health and Social Care Board, he is not also dealing with the Public Health Agency? Why can its functions not be dealt with by the trusts and his Department?

Mr Hamilton: Mr Speaker, the Member is some fellow to be talking about treating the House with contempt. He has fallen foul of the Speaker's Chair, whether it was with you or previous Speakers, on more than one occasion.

I welcome the fact that, latterly, he asked a question about the substance of the speech instead of concentrating on a peripheral point about process. I am not surprised that Mr Allister would want to do that; that is his style.

I also wonder why the Member seeks to pick out a particular Minister for criticism for not making an announcement in the House. You could draw up a long list of Ministers from probably every party who have made statements outside the House by way of press statements, radio or newspaper interviews or speeches at events — by whatever means. In fact, only today, the Agriculture Minister made a major announcement after a big consultation on the value of basic payment scheme entitlements and young farmers' top-up rates, something that I understand the industry has been waiting for an announcement on for the best part of a year. It is of considerable significance to that sector, as, I am sure, Mr Allister will appreciate, and I wonder whether a question for urgent oral answer has been tabled by him about why that was announced by press statement and not in an oral statement in the House.

Mr Allister: [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Hamilton: I suspect that it was not.

Typically, Mr Allister, the big macho man who wants to be seen as the one who takes on Sinn Féin, is not taking on Sinn Féin on this issue but is instead singling out the DUP. That, of course, is Mr Allister's style. That is what he always wants to do. He does not really want to take on Sinn Féin; in fact, he wants to embrace them in government, in line with the latest policy position that he has adopted.

On the issue of the Public Health Agency, I think that public health is incredibly important —

Mr Speaker: I remind the Minister that the two-minute rule applies.

Mr Hamilton: OK. I am sorry that I cannot answer the Member on that.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: If this is the right thing to do, I want to offer our support to the Minister. He has long heard from me and my colleagues that we have an overly bureaucratic and complex system, with ineffective and confusing decision-making. Therefore, if it is the right thing to do, whether the statement was made in the House or outside it, you will find an ally in us.

Having said that, I ask the Minister, because much has been said about the lack of political consensus, whether this is a genuine break with previous DUP Ministers of Health. Can he accept or will he agree with me, that there was political consensus on the delivery of health three-plus years ago, when we collectively signed up to Transforming Your Care? Where it failed was the Department and previous Ministers not putting the meat on the bones. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Hamilton: I look forward to attending the Committee tomorrow. I was pleased to accept the invitation of the Chair to attend. I am happy to go into much more detail on the announcement that I made last week in questions from her and fellow Committee members tomorrow. I welcomed her comments last week, which were supportive of the announcement, and I welcome her comments here today. I accept that there has been on different occasions a consensus of sorts. I think that I said to the Chair when I appeared before the Committee in early July that there has been in the past a degree of consensus on some health reforms, and I am sure that she appreciates that the reforms that I was outlining went significantly further than what has been said in the past, particularly on Transforming Your Care. [Interruption.] Sorry for that interruption.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I hope that that was not Jim Wells.

Mr Hamilton: It was Peter Robinson, actually. [Laughter.]

Mr McCartney: That's the last two Ministers phoning you.

Mr Hamilton: It was the First Minister.

The reforms that I announced yesterday were additional to Transforming Your Care. I am prepared to accept that some mistakes may have been made in implementation in the past, and we need to learn from those mistakes. It would be churlish to attack each other on the basis of those mistakes. We need to learn from them, because the challenge that is before us to get health and social care right now and to get it right for future generations is too big a prize for us to get petty about. We need to build the political consensus that I have spoken about; if we do not, we will have a health service and a social care system in Northern Ireland that will fail. That is the evidence that is coming forward, whether it is from the Donaldson report or from clinicians on the front line. That is why we need to do our level best to set aside the political differences that we have from time to time on some health issues and try to build a shared vision of a world-class health and social care system for Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I will say that this is obviously a hugely significant and strategic discussion. I have half an hour, and I have an extensive list of people who wish to ask a question, so I have no flexibility to allow any further mini speeches. Members will get straight to the question; the Minister will answer it; and we will endeavour to give everyone on the list the opportunity to ask a question.

Mr Easton: What type of feedback has the Minister had on his announcement from the people who really matter?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his question. The feedback so far has been positive, and significant political communications have been made that have been quite supportive of it. I acknowledge the comments made by the Chair of the Committee today and last week, which I think are helpful and bode well for trying to build the political consensus that I spoke about last week and have spoken about in the past.

I might agree with the Chair, and we might be able to agree with others on the way forward, and that is important. I think that it is a critical factor in trying to reform our health and social care system. But we need to listen to what people on the front line are saying, and the feedback that has come from clinicians, many of whom have written to me or emailed me about the decisions or announcements that were made, has been exceptionally positive. They see the opportunities in de-layering the system and in getting rid of bureaucracy. They see the attempt to remove barriers to innovation as a vote of confidence in them, and that was what it is intended to be.

We have a fantastic health and social care system in Northern Ireland. Yes, there are challenges, and we know that there needs to be change, but we have some incredibly talented and gifted people. When you go out on to the front line and speak to them, and they tell you to your face that they believe that the system of bureaucracy that we have, currently, is getting in the way of them doing things that they know that they can do and that will achieve better outcomes for people in Northern Ireland, you have to listen to them, and you have to take action, and that is what I am proposing to do. I am encouraged by the feedback coming from the front line; from clinicians, doctors, nurses and others. I think that we would all do well to listen to their response, to be encouraged and emboldened by that, and to try to move forward and make the reforms to our health and social care system that we all know that we need to make.

Mr McKinney: The Minister was clearly stung by criticism of his in-out approach. I think that he made that point at the outset of his speech, but he did not bring this to the House so soon after coming back. Given the importance of gaining consensus around changes in health, has he not done his project a great disservice and risked criticism that he is more interested in deflecting further criticism from his in-out approach and long-term DUP failures over health than in gaining important consensus if change is to be achieved?

Mr Hamilton: I made it clear that I wanted to be in office but, equally, I did not want to see people murdered on the streets of Northern Ireland. The Member and his party were offered the opportunity to do things in a much cleaner and clearer way through having an adjournment or supporting a suspension, but they did not take that. Action was required in those circumstances, and we took that action.

No one was as frustrated as I was, because I know the extent of the decisions that needed to be taken to reform our health and social care system. I wanted to take those decisions, and I am glad that I was able to outline my vision and announce those decisions around reforming our health and social care system, getting rid of a layer of bureaucracy, appointing a panel, and talking about how we can finance transformation moving forward. I am glad that I was able to make those decisions. I think that it ill behoves the Member to do what he is unfortunately prone to do and try to criticise. I think that he would do well to take a lead from the Chair of the Health Committee and the stance that she is taking.

The Member also seeks to criticise the state of the health service at this time. I appreciate, and no one knows better than me, the difficulties that the health service currently faces in Northern Ireland. However, given the fact that his party's stance in blocking progress on welfare reform is costing the whole Executive £9.5 million each and every month, which will mean £200 million to be lost by the end of this year — countless thousands of operations, assessments and treatments could have been carried out using that money — if there is anywhere that the finger of blame should be pointed for the difficulties that our health service is facing, it is at those who seek to squander that money at a time when it is needed at the front line in Health, in DRD and right across the board.

Mrs Dobson: Does the Minister agree that the figures clearly show that the board lost the run of itself in terms of administrative staffing, with a 40% increase in three years? Why was it allowed to become a bloated board?

Will the Minister accept that he and his predecessors have responsibility for pumping it up to 600 staff?

Mr Hamilton: I do not accept the criticism. What we need to be careful about — I sought to be careful about it last week, and I hope that the Member does not take the argument down that line, now or in the future — is that we focus on the staff within the system. In fact, as I said in response to Mr Easton, I think we are blessed and very fortunate to have some fantastic staff in our health and social care system.

Mrs Dobson: In administration.

Mr Hamilton: Even in administration, I am sure she will accept that there are some incredibly gifted and talented people who are working in the board and on other parts of administration within our health and social care system. It is not about them or their number; it is about developing as efficient a system as we can possibly have.

When I go out and speak to people on the front line, as I mentioned, they tell me that the layer of bureaucracy that was created in the last Assembly term got in the way of them being innovative and caused confusion. When you have senior consultants saying to you that they do not understand the system, how it works and how it benefits the people they are serving and the patients they are working to make better, you have to listen to that feedback and appreciate that there is a problem with bureaucracy. That is not about the numbers of people; it is about the system.

My objective is to dismantle and de-layer that system so that we can get the best out of the people in our health and social care system. There are some incredibly talented and gifted people. I want them to serve in a system that makes the most of their talents, not a system — which, unfortunately, is the one we have at the moment — that has got in the way of their talents and has not unlocked them in the way that we should all be seeking to achieve.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an ráiteas agus cuirim fáilte roimh an ráiteas. I thank the Minister for the statement, and I welcome it. The statement refers to the principles that the health service should be free at the point of delivery and that there should be equal access for all, but, given the huge inequalities that exist within the system, how does he intend to address those inequalities with what he proposed in the statement?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for welcoming the statement. I accept the point that she is making. One of the principal objectives of the reforms that I have outlined — which I hope the House will, in time, support the implementation of — is to get the most efficient use of the £4.7 billion that is currently spent on health and social care in Northern Ireland. One of the ways in which we can better tackle the health inequalities that she referred to is by the more efficient spend of that money that is going into the system.

Getting rid of a layer of bureaucracy will help, certainly, but that is not what will automatically come from that. I appreciate that, but it is about creating a system where that money — which is close to half of the complete Budget — comes out at the other end as better outcomes for people. That obviously includes tackling many of those health inequalities.

One of the other things that I announced last week — it did not get a terrible lot of attention — was my support for the creation of a transformation fund so that we can develop and fund some of the innovation that is out there, which sometimes gets funded through the system and sometimes does not. Much of that will tackle issues around health inequalities, as well as trying to get new, innovative, very creative ways of tackling many of the problems and challenges that we face, not just in our society but right across the world. Many aspects of it will have an impact on tackling the sort of issues that she mentioned, if not directly, at least by making a more efficient system, which will be better for everybody in Northern Ireland.

Mr McGimpsey: How many staff are currently employed within the board? Since it performs a vital function of commissioning services from the trust, how many staff will be required for the new structure, which, I understand, he calls a directorate within the Department, and how many staff, if any, will therefore become surplus?

Mr Hamilton: The current figures as of March this year show that the net average persons employed by the board were 584, of which 544 were permanently employed.

7.15 pm

We are undertaking a scoping exercise to look particularly at what the announced reforms that will close down the board will mean in actual actions that need to take place. As I said in my speech last week, there are clearly implications for the board and its staff. As the Member highlighted, some staff will move to the Department, some will move to the trusts, particularly those who are involved in planning for care, and some may move to the Public Health Agency, which I intend to align much more closely with the Department and focus more on early intervention and prevention and the good work that it can do on the public health agenda.

We are not definite on the numbers yet, and work will be undertaken to do that. Those people are doing useful tasks and jobs, particularly on planning for care and need. That will continue to be undertaken, but it will just be undertaken in a different place. We can sometimes get a little obsessed about where people work and the name of the entity they work for. I want to create a system-wide approach and get the best out of the system we have. Unfortunately, the reforms that were implemented in 2009, which the Member will be all too familiar with, have been tried and tested and have not worked. They have not made the best of the talent within the system. That is why I made the suggestions and proposals last week to take away that layer of bureaucracy that has blurred the lines of accountability and has got in the way of getting real innovation across our system. I hope that the Member recognises that and will support the reforms that I have proposed.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the announcement by the Minister. He is absolutely right: it has to benefit those on the front line. Indeed, I have received a number of complaints from nurses in Antrim Area Hospital about a situation in the emergency department there. I will discuss it with the Minister tomorrow at the Committee.

What contact has the Minister had with trade unions about his announcement and the implications for staff?

Mr Hamilton: I did not address that point in response to Mr McGimpsey's question. The announcement has been made and there will be discussions with the unions as we roll it out. They will be very much involved in the process. There will be a consultation on the proposals for the board and removing that layer of bureaucracy, and I expect them to participate fully in that.

As I said before — I tried to say it last week — this is not an exercise in trying to make savings by getting rid of the board. There may be some monetary savings, and what monetary savings there are will be redeployed back to the front line. That is a very important point; we are trying to get the most efficient system that we can possibly get.

I do not envisage the need for compulsory redundancies; that is not something that I think we will be looking at. Whilst some posts will be no longer required, as I tried to outline to Mr McGimpsey, a substantial number will be required because of the important work they do. At the minute, they are doing it in the board. They may be doing it in the Department, in the trusts or elsewhere in the future, but there will still be important work for those people to do. In some cases, they are doing a good job already, so that will need to be tapped into to ensure that it continues to be the case. They may be in a different place, but that is less important than removing the bureaucracy that I think the Member and I share concerns about, making sure that we get that efficient system, and getting the best from the talents of those who are operating within our health and social care system.

Mr Swann: The Health and Social Care Board was one of the key players and often one of the main stumbling blocks in the reformation of children's cardiac surgery in Northern Ireland. Where do the parents and users of that service look to when the Health and Social Care Board is no longer in place after the current review? What moneys will be available from the Minister's transformation fund for children's cardiac services in Northern Ireland? I declare an interest as my son had an operation three weeks ago.

Mr Hamilton: I appreciate the Member's particular interest in the issue. He has raised it with me in the past in the Chamber.

I welcome the fact that he recognises and characterises the board as a "stumbling block" — I think that he used that phrase. I do not want a system in which there are stumbling blocks. All too often, I have heard such a characterisation of our health and social care system: stumbling blocks, barriers, hurdles and entities get in the way and allow the buck to be passed while, ultimately, very little is done.

I think that the Member is jumping ahead a couple of stages on the transformation fund and the board itself. Obviously, this is my view and is what I want to do. I am glad to have received broad support about the board, but it is not a matter of my standing up in Ballymena, in the Chamber or wherever to announce this and its happening overnight. A process must be gone through. A legislative process will have to be undertaken before my proposed changes are fully implemented. We are talking about some time off in the near future for implementation. In the short term, the current arrangements remain in place.

I cannot say how much any project will get out of a transformation fund that has not yet been created. In my speech, I said that I want to create a transformation fund to encourage and to finance those innovations that we all know that we need and that sometimes, within current budgets, trusts or others find difficult to fund because they are spending so much on keeping front-line services going. However, they know that these will be beneficial for cost savings and better outcomes for patients and people. That is what the funding is about. I cannot commit to any amount of funding because I do not know what any increase might be or whether I will get an increase at all in the health budget for the next Budget period. I am determined to parcel off a significant portion of that for a transformation fund so that the changes that we know we need can be made.

I remain committed to the all-Ireland congenital heart paediatric care network, and I want it to be developed as quickly as possible.

Mr Speaker: That concludes this item of business. Thank you, Minister and Members.

As I announced earlier, Mrs Overend is not in a position to move the Adjournment debate.

Adjourned at 7.22 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 16 November 2015

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Matter of the Day

Paris Attacks

Mr Speaker: Mr Mike Nesbitt has given notice and been given leave to make a statement on the attacks in Paris, which fulfils the criteria set out in Standing Order 24. If other Members wish to be called, they should indicate by rising in their place and continuing to do so. All Members who are called will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject. I remind Members that I will not take any points of order on this or any other matter until the item of business is finished.

Mr Nesbitt: I rise because, not for the first time, Paris, its natives and its tourists have been subjected to a most vicious and vile terrorist attack by religious extremists. To date, 132 are dead. Hundreds more are injured, many fighting for their life. Why? Because they ended the traditional working week in a bar or a restaurant or by attending a concert. It is hard to accept that, in 2015, such a simple act as shopping or socialising should represent an existential threat to life, but that is the grim reality of terrorism.

The House must take a firm stand against those terrorists, who, of course, are not just attacking Paris or France but represent a threat to the Western World and beyond. We must also demand a robust response. The Prime Minister has told us that, here in the United Kingdom, the threat is severe, and he revealed today that the security forces have prevented no fewer than seven planned attacks in the United Kingdom this year.

We must also remember who the enemy are. We must not paint everybody with the same brush. No Member of this Assembly should be held responsible if a high school in the United States is shot up by a white Christian just because we share the same colour of skin and the same religious affiliation. The enemy are the extremists, and any security policy must make that very firm distinction.

Today, we should focus on the human cost of the inhumanity of the perpetrators. On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I extend my deepest sympathies to the families of the deceased and the injured, to President François Hollande and to the people of France. We stand together with them in defiance of those who have attacked our way of life.

In concentrating on the human cost, I finish with a quote from a restaurant worker in the wake of the attack. He said:

“One woman had been shot with several Kalashnikov bullets in her side, and she had a huge hole there, an open wound. There was nothing anybody could do. She was only about 20 years old. I knelt down and talked to her. I told her not to move and to take deep breaths. She didn't complain at all, or even say anything. She was just looking up at me and her eyes faded away. I will remember her face and her eyes all my life.”

Mr P Robinson: Mr Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to join in expressing our revulsion and horror at the evil bloodbath in Paris on Friday evening, and for organising the minute's act of remembrance in the Great Hall this morning. We, in equal measure, send out our sympathy and support to the people of France. We, from our experiences, can truly empathise with them.

This was not an attack against a military or government target. The gunmen were not engaging their enemies in open warfare, nor were they locked in conflict with an army that they opposed. This was an attack upon innocent, defenceless and harmless citizens. It comprised coordinated assaults upon a concert hall, a football stadium, bars and restaurants. These were attacks on people who were out relaxing and were enjoying an evening socialising or at sporting or entertainment events. It is hard to think of less threatening or less hostile targets.

Those of my vintage will vividly remember from our country's dark past all the emotions felt last Friday by the population of Paris: the desolation, the anxiety for friends and relatives who were in the area of the attacks, the grieving for victims and the apprehension for the future. They will know for sure that life will never be the same. The scale and the merciless savagery of the carnage will make these killings stand out, but, for all the victims and survivors of terror, every act over the decades leaves a life-changing impact.

On behalf of the people of Northern Ireland, we mourn with the families of the Paris victims and pray for the recovery of the many who are critically injured and scarred. From this Chamber, we extend our condolences to the citizens of Paris and the people of France. As they mourn, we stand with them in solidarity.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. On Friday night, like other Members, I followed the terrible events in Paris by social media, radio and TV, but I also had a running commentary because my daughter was down the street from Le Petit Cambodge, which was the first restaurant that was attacked.

I thank those who gave her and her group shelter that night close to the restaurant. In the hours since then, she has told me about the atmosphere in Paris; about how frightened people are, but also how resolute they are. In her boyfriend's circle, one young man was killed in the Bataclan concert hall, and, in her place of work, one friend has a close friend still missing. That is the horror that brings us here today in solidarity with Paris.

I will start en français: nous sommes solidaires du peuple parisien en ce moment terribles. Nous exprimons notre plus grande compassion à tous les citoyens de cette ville blessée. Geallaimid comhghuaillíocht le muintir Pháras ag an am chorrach seo, agus déanaimid comhbhrón ó chroí le muintir na cathrach cráite sin. We pledge our solidarity to the people of Paris at this terrible time. We extend deepest sympathy from across our community to the victims and survivors of Friday night's horror. We send our love and respect to the people of the wounded city of Paris, with which we enjoy close ties of history, heritage, commerce and community. Our thoughts this morning are with all victims of the global wars that engulf us today. Of course, the civilian populations suffer the most in those wars and are the most frightened, as we saw clearly in not only Paris but Beirut at the weekend. We stand, therefore, with the people of Paris in their message to the assailants who carried out Friday night's horrific attacks. We use the words of the famous civil rights song: Nous n'avons pas peur. Níl eagla orainn. We are not afraid.

Mr Eastwood: On behalf of the SDLP, I express our sincere sympathy and solidarity with the people of Paris following the devastating scenes that unfolded on the streets of the city over the weekend. As our party members gathered in Armagh, we were acutely aware of the tragedy that was taking place in the French capital. It cast a shadow over our proceedings.

I also express our profound sadness following the suspected ISIS bombing of a busy Beirut marketplace that killed over 40 innocent people. These attacks, no matter where they happen, the scale of the destruction or the culprit, are an attack on all of us who value the primacy and power of peace. As a people and as an island, we acutely understand the suffering of the people of France and Lebanon. We know what it is like to face the threat of terror and violence, and to face down those who seek to murder and maim their way to political goals. Today, we stand in solidarity with the founding principles of the French republic: the liberty to live our lives free from the threat of violence; the equality of all peoples, regardless of colour or creed; and a fraternal bond between all peoples and all parties committed to the power of peace as a tool for change. We are all united in the Chamber, across these islands and across Europe against those who seek to shake the foundations of our peace. Let that spirit of unity be the message that we send to them. It says more than anything else we could do.

Mr Ford: On behalf of my colleagues, I associate us with remarks already made in the Chamber. I thank you, Mr Speaker, for your initiative earlier today in arranging the opportunity for not just Members but staff and visitors to show their solidarity to the people of Paris and France in the wake of the multiple atrocities that happened last Friday evening. Of course, as has just been said, we should not forget the similar atrocity that happened in Beirut, the ongoing challenge posed by the atrocities being perpetrated daily in Iraq and Syria by ISIS, and similar actions that happened in relatively recent times across the Middle East and north Africa, particularly in Kenya and Nigeria.

France is one of our closest neighbours geographically. It is a partner and has been an ally. It is a business partner, a partner in times of difficulty and a partner in terms of where many of us first had our opportunities to experience life in a different culture. So it is felt particularly sensitively by people throughout these islands when they see the atrocities that happened in Paris — somewhere that people can associate with holidays and times of great pleasure for themselves.

12.15 pm

It is one of the ironies of this weekend that, in 1940, and, indeed, again in 1944, Paris was declared an open city, so that not only the architecture but the people were left undisturbed in the opening and closing phases of the Second World War. It is a further irony that a friendly football match was being played in the Stade de France between France and Germany. That is an indication of where we in Europe have moved on in recent years, but where there clearly are challenges from those who do not accept the fundamental principles of human life and welfare that we do. Friday was a direct attack, not on any perceived justifiable target, not even in the twisted sense that would have justified the attack on 'Charlie Hebdo' earlier this year, but on ordinary people — Parisians, others from throughout France, visitors — engaging in what people throughout Europe engage in on a Friday night, the opportunity to go out with friends and enjoy themselves with whatever entertainment they wish. That is why it has so devastated so many people; that is why it has affected people so strongly in what that meant. That is the reason why we must ensure that we do not have just words but that we stand together in practical solidarity with our French neighbours, whatever language we speak and whatever way we express it. Whether it is in French, German, English or Irish, the message has to be of solidarity in the face of those who would carry out such terror, and a unity of purpose that we will protect human life and human dignity, wherever the threat comes from.

Mr Allister: I join in the sentiments of shock, dismay, empathy and deep sympathy with the people of Paris and France at this time. We in this Province, of all places, know the horrors of terrorism. The scale of the slaughter in Paris, I think, causes us to struggle with the question of how any human being could do such things. It is a question that had to be asked in this Province as well, because the uncomfortable truth is that the unmitigated evil that manifested itself in a theatre in Paris was the same unmitigated evil that lined innocent workmen up against their van in Kingsmills and riddled them to death; the unmitigated evil that launched an attack on a restaurant in Paris was the same unmitigated evil that attacked a pub in Greysteel or in Loughinisland; and the unmitigated evil that launched bombs to kill was the same unmitigated evil that we experienced in La Mon and, yes, even in the most sacred of places, a remembrance service in Enniskillen. Terrorists — all terrorists — are evil and remain evil. There are no good terrorists, even in retrospect. I trust that the people of France will have the resolve and determination to ensure that they will not pander to terrorists or fete them in any way, such as happened in this country.

Another uncomfortable truth is that the open borders of Europe, sadly, have the appearance of supplying a supply line to the fifth column in Europe that would destroy our civilisation. Europe needs to assert itself and assert control over its borders before more of this horror is visited upon us. I trust that that will be a lesson learned from this horrendous episode.

Mr Agnew: On behalf of the Green Party in Northern Ireland, I would like to express my condolences to the people of France, particularly those families who have suffered directly as a result of these attacks. It is hard to understand the mindset of people who are so determined to cause misery, suffering and death and to think that, whilst we all join here in sympathy and sorrow, somewhere, there are those who celebrate those actions. That is very difficult to fathom. What is important is how we respond. I look back to the response of the Norwegian Prime Minister after the horrendous atrocity that was committed by Anders Breivik. His answer to the violence was that we need more democracy and more openness, but not naivety. That is easy to say and difficult to achieve, but it has to be our starting point. We must protect our way of life, but we must not do so by destroying it.

I have only questions, not answers. My fear is that the simple answer to the complex questions and situations that we face is usually the wrong one. We have to question how we respond. My party stands on a platform of non-violence. That is not to say that there should be no violence ever: violence can be acceptable only if and when it prevents greater violence. Again, I think that it is another principle with which we should underpin any response to these attacks. I do not believe that fighting fire with fire is the way forward. The way to mourn victims is not to create more innocent victims.

I wish the absolute best to those who are injured and in recovery and to the families who have been directly impacted by these attacks. I stand in solidarity with that wider community. This attack has had ripple effects throughout Europe. I stand in solidarity with all those who absolutely abhor terrorism.

Mr McNarry: It is not that long ago that we in this House said, "Je suis Charlie" after those murders by ISIS. We in UKIP offer our sincere condolences and sympathy to all those who have been bereaved and saddened by the carnage in Paris. We think that we are right in speaking up for many people to demand that the evil perpetrators be brought to justice and that the horror of Paris is not repeated.

I note that COBRA has been meeting to mobilise national security. That includes us. I trust that our cities, towns and villages can be assured that they, too, are protected from attacks by ISIS just as people across the rest of the United Kingdom have that assurance.

Our best wishes to Paris. Let us hope that we can all visit it for better times in the future.

Mr B McCrea: Of course, we must send our condolences to those who have suffered and show our solidarity in standing with France at this tragic time. One of the key questions that we might all consider, however, which has not yet been discussed in this Chamber, is why it is that France has become the focal point of the ISIS campaign. Why is it that France is identified as the crusader whilst others are not?

I know that President Hollande will have been disappointed in the support that he had from some people when he wanted to take air strike initiatives. There was a vote in the House of Commons, and there was a reference to the United States Congress, but Hollande and France were left standing alone. That is why they are the ones who are identified as being at the point of this war. We, therefore, all have decisions to make about whether we are going to stand four-square with them and whether we are going to do more than just issue words and platitudes. We will have to consider what the right way forward is.

Mr Allister said that there are no good terrorists. I suppose that the rejoinder to that is that there are no good wars. What is the appropriate response that we all must make to this challenge to our democracy? There is a danger that there will be a knee-jerk reaction against Islam and against Muslims. The ISIS strategy is to divide humanity. Not all those people are bad people. We must find a way to show our humanity and our support. We must win hearts and minds. That is the way forward, and it requires cool, calm and calculated thought and not necessarily a knee-jerk reaction.

Mr Poots: As we all realised the scale of what happened on Friday evening, we were shocked and stunned at the events. The fact that so many people lost their lives is something that we should all draw on, as well as the pain that has been caused to all the families that are involved. Such an unmitigated waste of human life is an absolute tragedy.

It makes us think back a little to the 7/7 murders that took place in London and the 9/11 murders in New York, which emanated from similar sources. A little further back, we go back to the murders in Omagh, Teebane, on Bloody Friday, in McGurk's bar, and the Shankill bombing. These things are all the same; they all happen when someone else thinks that they have a right, for a cause, to go out and take other people's lives — innocent people's lives. Of the 129 people who are reported dead, eight of those are not innocent victims but murdering terrorists, and we must always remember that. Those people are not in the same classification as the innocent victims in Paris from many parts of the world.

We need to reflect on our policies. Mr McCrea and Mr Allister spoke about that from different angles, but the foolishness of opening up borders without having any checks or balances is ludicrously stupid. We need to be compassionate to people who are in desperate situations, and we need to support them, but allowing an absolute free flow across our borders without any checks or balances being put in place will inevitably lead to more people with a terrorist background coming into Europe. That is totally unacceptable.

I have taken my family on holiday to France many times, and we have spent many wonderful times in that beautiful country. Today, we stand with the people of France. Vive la France, vive la liberté.

Ms Sugden: I take no pleasure in joining Members of this House to express my horror and deep sadness at the events in Paris on Friday evening. I offer my sincere condolences to those who have been bereaved of those lives that were taken so callously by others. When a loved one is taken from you at the hands of another, the pain sears through your whole being and that pain never leaves you; it scars you. Mr Speaker, it takes a special kind of bastard to inflict that pain on so many. I apologise for my language, but I really cannot think of any other word to describe them. Friday's events were inhumane. They were carried out by bad people driven by a gross misinterpretation of religion and God. They have no place among us. I stand by the people of France and all the people of the world who are fighting against this evil.

Mr D McIlveen: I, too, offer our sincere sympathies to the people of Paris today, who no doubt find themselves still under an immense shadow of darkness over the events that unfolded over the weekend. I remember that, on 26 June last year, I had the opportunity to go to a concert in the Bataclan, and it was a place of happiness and celebration. It was a place where people of all different creeds, colours and races gathered together to enjoy an event. For those who have not been in the venue, it is comparable in size and layout to the Ulster Hall in Belfast and has limited points of exit. To think of those cowardly, grotesque, inhumane people coming into the building and opening fire indiscriminately while the poor people who were contained therein had really no easy means of escape is just horrific beyond any description or explanation.

One of the founding principles of France was the principle of liberty and of freedom. This was an attack on freedom. It was an attack on those of us who believe in the right of each individual country and each individual people to determine their own direction of travel. It was a grotesque attack on that principle. The rise of Islamic terrorism throughout the world has spread like a cancer. There have been attacks throughout many cities in many places — everywhere from New York to Jerusalem to Paris to Beirut. We have seen it in London, and we have seen it right across many major cities in the world.

I find myself agreeing with what a number of colleagues have expressed today. With cancer in a physical sense, you do not talk to cancer. You do not persuade cancer to leave a person's body. You have to deal with it aggressively. You have to deal with it in the right way. We have to be very careful, Mr Speaker. This is not a war on Islam or on any religion, but this is and should be a war on terrorism and on the very people who threaten the liberty of the people of France and on the people who threaten the freedom of the people of Europe and the Western World. I urge our Government in Westminster to step up to the mark now and rally behind those countries that are taking a forward-thinking approach to dealing with this blight of terrorism that we find in our country at this time.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I will make one point. We are talking about very emotional and terrible circumstances, and I regret the fact that one Member departed from what I thought was a very appropriate level of discussion and conversation. Despite the circumstances, I see no excuse for that departure, and I hope that it does not happen again.

Human Transplantation Bill: Second Stage

Mr Speaker: I call Mrs Jo-Anne Dobson to move the Second Stage of the Human Transplantation Bill and to open the debate.

Mrs Dobson: I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Human Transplantation Bill [NIA 64/11-16] be agreed.

I welcome the opportunity to move the Bill. I rise to speak, first, as a mother of a transplant recipient and as an unashamed lifelong supporter of the life-saving and life-giving power of organ transplantation. I feel that it is only right that, in the Chamber, we reflect our life's experiences in what we do and seek to achieve as elected Members, in the interests of all our constituents.

If Members will allow me to be personal for a moment, long before I entered politics, our life as a family was turned upside down with the birth of our second son, Mark. We knew when he was five weeks old and diagnosed with severe reflux of the kidneys that he would be very ill throughout his young life and would eventually need a kidney transplant. We never knew when that would happen but, at the age of 13, his kidneys began to slowly shut down. The wonderful staff at Craigavon Area Hospital and then the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, including the amazing Professor Maurice Savage, Dr Mary O'Connor, renal nurse Hazel Gibson and her team, became our second family. They loved and cared for Mark as if he was their own. I will never ever be able to repay those 15 years of care that we received during the seemingly endless journeys to and from, initially, Craigavon, and then the children's hospital, before his transplant.

Like every transplant patient, Mark celebrates two birthdays each year: his real birthday on 20 March, and the birthday of his new life on 5 February. In all life's experiences — birth, marriage and, ultimately and unfortunately, death — nothing can, could or should ever prepare a young mother, as I was, to look at the very real prospect of losing her son or daughter. I faced that prospect, and I firmly believe that it shapes you as a person for the rest of your life. It gives a real sense of priority and focus, and, in our case, it strengthened an already strong faith at that time and has done so ever since.

Now that Mark is through his transplant and has returned to his fit and generally healthy self, he knows too well the responsibility that comes with looking after the precious gift that saved his life. I know countless transplant patients who, in their daily lives, seek to honour that gift and honour the donor in all that they do. Three years after his transplant, when he became 18, Mark moved from the care of the children's hospital to the wonderful care of Dr Aisling Courtney, the clinical lead for transplantation in Belfast City Hospital, and, more recently, to Dr Neal Morgan, consultant nephrologist at Daisy Hill Hospital, Newry.

In our home, we know what it is like to have someone save the life of our son because of a kidney donated by someone who died in England on 4 February 2009. We think of that person and their family every single day, but we will never know who they are. Like many families, we have sent a letter, and we hope that they have received comfort in knowing how we appreciate, from the bottom of our hearts, the gift of new life that Mark has received.

Medical staff have played an important part in Mark's life and my family's life, and they play an equally important role in the lives of countless families touched by organ donation across Northern Ireland. It is for that very personal reason that I took the decision to bring forward the private Member's Bill. I want more parents to be able to see their son or daughter transformed back to having a fit and healthy life before their eyes, just as we saw with Mark, to move back from being a mere shadow of themselves, which they become following organ failure, and to see more people being released from a life sentence of dialysis and returning to as normal a life as possible.

The plain truth about organ donation is that the number of available organs does not meet the demand; and that, in a nutshell, is the reason why a change in legislation is required. I fully appreciate that this will be an emotional and, for many, a sensitive debate. I encourage Members to keep the recipients and donors at the forefront of their thoughts when making their contributions today.

I will spend a little time laying out the current stark reality facing local people when it comes to organ transplantation. The first and perhaps most striking thing is that 17 people from Northern Ireland died last year while waiting on a life-saving transplant. The local average is 15 people every year. In 2013, 932 local people underwent kidney dialysis, which is a three-times-a-week life sentence. In a sense, they are the luckier ones. There is no dialysis for people who need a heart, liver, lung or other organ. The only option for them is to receive an organ or to die.

Figures from National Health Service Blood and Transplant (NHSBT) provided to us by Assembly Research — and I pay tribute to it for the pack it has provided us with for this debate — show that, at the end of September this year, 162 local people were on the transplant waiting list. That is made up of 117 patients waiting for a kidney, five for a kidney and pancreas, seven for a heart, 13 for lungs, one for a heart and lung and 19 for a liver. Indeed, the figures for September this year see the highest number of patients waiting on a transplant for organs other than a kidney in the last four years where we have available figures.

It is also equally important to point out that the figures show us that there were no heart transplants conducted in Northern Ireland for Northern Ireland patients last year. That is a point that I know is being highlighted by the British Heart Foundation. That is despite five local patients receiving a heart transplant in each of the two previous years and four in 2011-12. Focusing on the transplant waiting list, that is 162 local people and their families who are waiting, watching and wondering when that all-important call will come to let them know that a match organ has been found.

Statistics should never be used to mask or hide the human reality felt by patients. Behind each and every one of those patients is an individual story of pain and anguish. None of us know when and if we may need an organ at some stage to save our lives. Anyone could be waiting on that life-saving telephone call; and those who have been in that position — and I know what it feels like — are best placed to describe it; but they are the lucky ones because, for them, that call came. For others, it is too late, that time has passed and that call will never ever come.

I will remember presenting to the Health Committee in 2013, and I was joined by Mr William Johnston, who is now chairman of the Northern Ireland Kidney Patients' Association. William waited for over 17 years until he received that call and had his transplant last year; but, on that day, when he presented to the Health Committee and the security guard at the door of the Senate Chamber asked him to turn off his mobile phone before he entered the room to present to the Committee, William fixed him with a stare and said, "My phone is never switched off. I never ever know when that call might come". I think that that highlights starkly for us the human reality behind the statistics and figures.

Last year, 17 people from Northern Ireland died while they were waiting on that telephone call to let them know that a match organ had become available. Members, for them, that call will never come. It is for them and for future generations that we need to adopt a different approach; to lift our eyes from the present to a future where organ donation is not viewed an exception but rather the norm.

12.45 pm

Members, we often get much criticism in this Building for failing to bring forward legislation that brings a real benefit to the lives of people right across Northern Ireland. Few issues could be more important than introducing legislation in the Chamber that increases life chances and gives all our people — our constituents — greater hope for a new life after an organ transplant. Medicine has moved on considerably since the organ donor register was first introduced some decades ago. I believe that, as a devolved region of the United Kingdom with the right to frame our own legislation, we should follow the lead of the Welsh Government, through their Health Minister, Mark Drakeford AM, and my colleague Anne McTaggart MSP in Scotland, and work together to achieve the right Bill for Northern Ireland.

I am, however, a single MLA working alongside the Bill Office to bring forward a Bill of this extent and importance. I obviously do not have the Health Minister's army of staff and resources or, indeed, the equal armies of staff of the First Minister or deputy First Minister to bring forward this Bill. That is why I want to say at the outset that I am happy to work alongside any Member on any aspect of the Bill and would welcome input, help and assistance in bringing it further through the Assembly processes. I am also looking forward to a close working relationship with the Department of Health, and the Minister will be aware that, two weeks ago, I had a preliminary meeting with one of his directors. I am hopeful that this will provide help and assistance in the weeks and months ahead.

I am certainly open to improvements and changes that will achieve the right Bill for Northern Ireland. I very much welcome the support of the First Minister and recognise that he has given a clear commitment to me in the House to support the Bill. His views on the soft opt-out system were clear when, in response to Joe Broly and Shane Finnegan when they asked him about the movement to change the law, he said:

"If somebody dies in hospital, they need an organ, so the family are asked. How is that different from the family being asked in an opt-out situation?"

That is a key point. I welcome the support for the Bill from the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, from Members across the Chamber, from councils and from MPs from all the local parties at Westminster. I would also like to commend the support that I have received from the volunteers and officers of the local and national charities, who work so hard to promote organ donation and for whom the donor families are the real heroes.

Each year, Dame Mary Peters, who until last year was Lord Lieutenant of Belfast, presents certificates to families of those who have donated life-saving organs following the death of a loved one. That is a fitting tribute to our amazing donor families in Northern Ireland by Northern Ireland's own ambassador, who is a lady in every sense of the word. I was delighted to receive her support for the Bill progressing today, and she joins a long list, including the majority of the public, in supporting the move to a soft opt-out system for Northern Ireland.

Looking through political party websites and manifestos is not something that I often find the time to do. However, they make for interesting reading. I have been delighted to see reference in manifestos, on party websites and in press releases to organ donation policies and, specifically, to support for the soft opt-out system. To give a flavour, I welcome its inclusion in the Green Party's policies as well as in the Alliance Party's 2012 manifesto. I welcome the support of Sinn Féin and the SDLP for the issue, and I know that Mark Durkan MP has been a regular attendee and supporter at the all-party parliamentary group for transplantation at Westminster.

Equally, the DUP's 2010 Westminster manifesto included the line:

"In order to improve public health the DUP supports ... presumed consent for organ donation."

I welcome my party's continued support for the introduction of a soft opt-out system at a policy and personal level, and I thank all political parties that responded to the consultation.

Whilst discussing the political stances towards organ donation, I am conscious that this matter should — and, in my opinion, will — remain well above party politics. We have more than enough policy issues that divide us in the Chamber, but on this issue, surely, as the Second Stage goes forward, we can unite and work together to introduce something that the public, our constituents, supports.

I like nothing more than taking time to visit renal units and chat to patients undergoing dialysis. For some, a transplant is not an option, and they are resigned to the fact that they will end their days on dialysis. For others, it is all about giving them hope. I am thinking of one family that I know where 12 members have a genetic renal condition. It is a family that never knows how long their children, or any family member, will have until their kidneys fail.

Imagine what providing hope to that family would mean to them when faced with a possible future on dialysis for any family member — hope that a new life will come. I firmly believe that, working together, we can deliver that hope to them, their family members and other families in the same position across Northern Ireland.

Let us also remember that one kidney transplant does not last a lifetime; kidney patients often require two or three transplants during their life. They are also required to take a permanent course of immunosuppressive drugs to suppress the immune system, meaning that kidney transplant patients are prone to infection.

I was not alone in the House or among the organ donation community in being absolutely delighted to hear that the fantastic team at the City Hospital undertook five kidney transplants in one day in September. Whilst a one-off, it shows that we have the expertise and capacity for kidney transplants. However, I am conscious that that was a fantastic one-off event. We all want to see more people being given that chance of a new life and the hope that they need to go on. I firmly believe that a soft opt-out system will deliver that hope. I have nothing but admiration for the amazing staff in the renal units. We should be equally proud that our live donor programme at the City Hospital under Dr Aisling Courtney is the envy of clinicians across the world. I visited it on a number of occasions and pay tribute to everyone involved in that programme and wish it continued success.

However, Luc Colenbie, head of Belgium's successful transplant strategy, told me in Brussels at the beginning of the year that their experience was that live donor programmes will eventually reach a plateau. Belgium has a positive culture towards organ donation, in part because policymakers made the issue a national priority. When they switched to an opt-out system in 1986, there was an 86% rise in the number of kidneys retrieved for life-saving transplants. That change generated a positive change in the public's perception of organ donation that resulted in roughly 2% of their 11 million population saying that they did not wish to donate organs after death.

I apologise to my fellow Committee members if some of my contribution overlaps with my presentation to the Committee two Wednesdays ago, but these are important issues and central to the reasons behind the Bill.

One thing that I learnt over the past few years in bringing forward the Bill is that our local organ donation system is complex and confusing.

Indeed, a greater proportion of our transplants, currently 68%, come from people who have had no interaction at all with the organ donor register during their lifetime than from those who have.

Another aspect of our current system is that, even though we are one of the most giving people, with wide support in society for organ donation, we still have a relatively high bedside refusal rate, roughly 40% to 45%. That is another aspect where figures differ between opt-in and opt-out countries across Europe. Our high rate suggests that, prior to death, people often have not had that all-important conversation with their loved ones about their wishes. In other opt-in countries in Europe, the average refusal rate is roughly between 40% and 60%. As I said, in Northern Ireland, we are around 40% to 45%.

In opt-out societies, however, the rejection rate tends to be much lower, at between 2% and 15%. The bedside rejection rate in Belgium, incidentally, is closer to 2%. That fits in very well with the PHA's findings that 96% of local families agree to donation, if they know their loved one's wishes. So, the figures suggest that, in opt-out countries, such conversations are taking place and, when it comes to asking the family whether they know and can confirm the wishes of their loved ones, they will be in a better place to understand and articulate those wishes.

Mr Ross: I appreciate the Member giving way. She highlights some of the opt-out countries where there has clearly been success, though I would contend that that success is to do with other mechanisms in their systems, rather than just the opt-out. She would, of course, acknowledge that there are other countries, such as Sweden, Brazil, Chile and a raft of others, that have moved to an opt-out system and their rates are worse than those we have in the United Kingdom and far worse than those in Northern Ireland. So, there is no real correlation between whether you have an opt-in or opt-out system. It is more to do with other issues, such as public awareness and experts in hospitals.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for his intervention. That is precisely why clause 1 sets out that we need an education programme as well. If he reads the Hansard report of my speech, he will find that I referred to the fact that opt-out should go in line with the education programme as well, which is crucial for everyone to make their wishes known.

I take a moment to break down the main aspects of the Bill's content for Members. It is fair to say that, of the 22 clauses, the most important are towards the beginning of the Bill. The first clause places a duty on the Health Minister to promote human transplantation and to conduct a yearly campaign to inform the public how the new opt-out system would operate in practice, including the role of the family in affirming consent. The second, third and fourth clauses set out the requirement for there to be appropriate consent before a transplant can be lawfully conducted and cover, in detail, the two types of consent.

"Express consent" is where the individual can provide their own consent for a live donation; has engaged with the organ donor register to make their wishes known; appoints two advocates; or has placed their wishes in a will. That is the current procedure and, for donations after death, is subject to a procedure conducted by clinicians, where the family is required to provide express written consent to confirm the individual's wishes prior to donation proceeding. The Bill makes no change whatsoever to that current practice. If someone, for whatever reason, is opposed organ donation, they will, for the first time, be able to engage with the register to opt off and their family will not be approached at the time of their death.

The second form of consent is "deemed consent", where there was no interaction between the individual and the organ donor register during their lifetime. Following death, and in the knowledge that they have not engaged with the organ donor register during their lifetime, it will be deemed that they have provided the necessary consent for transplantation to proceed.

However, crucially, and I have always said this, consent is subject to family affirmation prior to donation taking place. This is included in clause 4. That is why having the conversation amongst family members and loved ones is so important, and I have always said that a duty to promote, as contained in clause 1, would be central to increasing public awareness.

1.00 pm

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: No, I want to make my points.

It has been said many times in the Chamber that education is critical as we look to the future of organ donation in Northern Ireland. We should be focusing now on the needs of local families in five, 10, 15 or even 20 years' time.

There are certainly many lessons that I believe we can and should learn from the experiences of other countries. I come back to Belgium for a moment. It has a fantastic programme in its schools, where, from an early age, the power of saving lives through donation is introduced into the curriculum. I wrote some time ago to the Education Minister calling for the introduction of a similar system in our schools. In Belgium, they have changed the public view of organ donation from being an exception to being the norm. I believe that we can learn from those experiences.

I will now address some of the concerns raised during the recent Committee meeting. I commend the idea of people being able to nominate advocates when they sign up to the organ donor register. Concerns were raised about family members who may have an opposing view on organ donation. This is where advocates play such an important role. Advocates provide people with the opportunity to nominate someone to make the decision if they do not want to make it themselves at the time. The Public Health Agency's (PHA) consultation identified what it termed the "ick" factor amongst some respondents who simply did not want to make a decision or consider the issue.

The advocate would also have a role where someone has a specific wish or instruction that they wanted carried out after death. They could appoint someone to make that decision for them. If the person were to die in circumstances where donation is possible, their advocates would be asked if organs should be donated. Equally, if the advocates nominated have predeceased the person or cannot be contacted at the time, a family member or relation could be contacted and asked to provide consent. This is similar to the current situation when someone has interacted with the register during their lifetime.

We should also remember that there is a window of time after death during which clinicians may use an organ for transplantation. I stand to be corrected, but I believe that it is roughly 24 hours for a kidney, which is one of the most robust organs under the circumstances. That is why I feel that it is not advisable for people to make their wishes known in a will, because by the time it is actioned, the window may well be closed and transplantation will not be able to take place.

Concerns were also raised to the Committee about conflict between family members over providing consent for donation, something that can arise at present, albeit rarely. This is more likely when a family has not had that important conversation, and that situation is one the Bill seeks to resolve through greater public awareness. Initially, having the conversation between family members is the best way to avoid the situation. However, we have exceptional specialist nurses in organ donation, who are trained to deal with these situations and advise families at the time.

I support the crucial role that family plays in the process, not least because death does not just affect the person who has died but the whole family, who have a role to play. The consultation identified a willingness to retain the crucial role of the family in providing consent for organ donation to proceed, and that is clearly in place at present for express, as it is in the Bill for deemed, consent.

On 4 June 2013 I launched my public consultation for this Bill. I am also grateful to the Public Health Agency for the findings of its two consultations on public attitudes towards organ donation, conducted initially in the same year. At that time, I wrote to each Member and provided them with a copy of the consultation document. In my letter, I reiterated that my door has always been open. I thank those Members who have taken the opportunity to meet me to discuss the Bill and to respond to the consultation.

The public consultation ran for 16 weeks and received 1,366 responses. Those responses were made both online and offline, and came from a mix of the general public, charities, councils, churches, the health and social care sector, political parties and others. A summary report was produced in October of that year, giving an overview of the 10 questions and the responses to them. That report is available in the Library and details responses that were positive, as well as concerns raised in answer to each question. It showed that 82% of respondents supported a change in the law and a move to a soft opt-out system. Also, 61% supported the attainment of the key role of the family and 86% supported protecting the rights of those who lack capacity in the legislation. Those views have been well reflected in the Bill.

I want, again, to record my thanks to each and every person and organisation who took the time to respond. I also want to record my grateful thanks to the local charities of the Transplant Forum as well as the British Medical Association, the British Heart Foundation, Opt for Life and others for their support in promoting the consultation.

In addition to my own consultation, the Public Health Agency conducted a consultation on public attitudes, also in June 2013. More recently, a PHA survey with figures from February this year again highlighted public attitudes to organ donation. The Public Health Agency survey highlighted 56% support for a move to a soft opt-out system in June 2013. That grew in the PHA's most recent survey to 61% of the public supporting a move to a soft opt-out system. Again, in 2013, 18% of the 1,012 respondents to the Public Health Agency's consultation were opposed to a change in the law geared towards soft opt-out. In 2015, that figure dropped to 10%, signalling a clear change in attitude, with the percentage of those opposed almost halved. That reduction could, possibly, be a result of the continued hard work of local charities, as well as the PHA's important 'Speak up and save a life' campaign, with its two powerful television adverts and associated campaigns. Few people can have failed to see the leaflets, posters and billboards, and that is precisely what clause 1 of the Bill envisages when it comes to public education. A continued programme such as that must be central to the future of organ donation.

It is also noteworthy that, in responses to the PHA's 2015 survey, 79% of the public agreed with the statement: "The soft OPT-OUT system will result in more lives being saved". The equivalent figure in 2013 was lower, at 74%, and I pay tribute to all of those involved in the charities associated with the continued promotion that is having an impact on the public's view on this issue.

When the Welsh Government decided to go down the route of a soft opt-out system, their surveys concluded that 49% of the public in Wales supported changing the law. As I said, the equivalent figure here was 56% in 2013 and at present, from the 2015 figures, we have a figure of 61%, according to the Public Health Agency. That shows clear evidence of public support from the majority of people for changing the law and that they believe that the move to a soft opt-out system will result in more lives being saved.

I would like now to focus on the finances. No one can ever put a price on what it is like for a transplant recipient to receive a new life; as a family, we know this in our home. However, there will inevitably be cost implications with this Bill. The Assembly research service has produced a research paper that looked into the implementation costs of the legislation.

The paper, which is entitled 'Organ Donation Bill: Estimated Financial Costs and Benefits' is available in the Assembly Library. I should also say that I look forward to working with the Department as we look in greater detail to the cost figures.

Assembly research estimated that implementation costs for the Bill would be between £2 million and £5 million over a 10-year period. Based on the assumption that implementation would be two years after the passage of the Bill, it reached the conclusion that the net discounted financial benefits from achieving one additional transplant a year over a 10-year period by organ type are as follows: £4.6 million for kidney; £6.3 million for liver; £2.3 million for heart; and £1.4 million for lung. More up-to-date figures from the Department will help to provide greater clarity. However, the paper's conclusion on the cost benefit to the health service of increasing transplant numbers is startling; it could be as much as £7.4 million net benefit to the Northern Ireland economy.

To give just one example, focusing on kidney patients for a moment, the average cost of keeping a patient alive through renal dialysis is £30,800 per patient per year. It is roughly £17,500 per patient per year for a patient on peritoneal dialysis and £35,000 per patient per year for a patient on hospital haemodialysis.

In response to an oral question that I asked in the Chamber, the then Health Minister, Mr Poots, confirmed that, in 2013, 932 local patients underwent dialysis. That meant a total cost of over £29 million to the health budget, based on NHS cost estimates, in one year alone. Each kidney transplant costs roughly £17,000 per patient. Post-transplant, the yearly cost of immunosuppressive medication is roughly £5,000 per patient, meaning that, for each kidney patient who receives a transplant, the NHS estimates that it receives a saving of £25,800 in the second and subsequent years. That obviously does not take into account the benefits of people returning to a normal life and the impact on their families, community and wider society.

It is very clear that the lack of available organs is placing major stresses and strains on local patients' families. One of the major reasons for that is that all transplants for local patients, with the exception of kidney transplants, are conducted in hospitals in other regions of the United Kingdom. Liver transplants for adults are conducted in King's College Hospital, London, and for children in Birmingham Children's Hospital. Heart and lung transplants take place at Freeman Hospital in Newcastle. Imagine the long and difficult trips back and forward to those hospitals and the anguish and pain while they live with their condition while waiting on an organ.

The lack of available organs means that patients must endure a greater number of trips from home to hospitals across the country, at considerable strain to them and their families, and considerable cost to the health service. Increasing the availability of organs increases life chances and decreases stress, as well as reducing financial costs. I believe that the Bill will achieve that.

Recent figures from the British Heart Foundation reveal that there are 10 people in Northern Ireland on the waiting list for a heart transplant and one person waiting for a heart and lung transplant. According to the latest NHS transplant statistics — I mentioned this earlier — no one from Northern Ireland received a heart transplant last year. Can you imagine the stress and worry of those 10 patients and their families, often making multiple journeys to hospitals far away from home? They are arduous journeys for seriously ill patients. In some cases — I know this from experience — it is with hopes built up, only to be dashed when, for any number of reasons, a transplant cannot take place. That is sadly more common than it may seem. The arrangements for transporting patients from Northern Ireland to hospitals across England are complex.

Last year, I had the opportunity to visit the NHS Blood and Transplant organ donation and transplantation directorate in Bristol. It is miraculous to see that all transplants in the UK are coordinated through one tiny room in the middle of an industrial estate in Bristol. We are very fortunate to be part of the wider UK network, which allows patients to benefit from organs that are donated in the rest of the UK and vice versa.

1.15 pm

Mark's kidney came from a donor in England and was held up by snow. That meant that, even though we had reached the hospital, his kidney had not. The team in NHSBT would have allocated the kidney to the next match on the list if the weather conditions had not improved. Thankfully, conditions improved and the organ arrived in Belfast healthy and within the timescale window for transplant.

Those are issues that few tend to consider when thinking about organ donation, albeit that they are important issues. That office in Bristol is where they match an organ to a patient and start the process by which patients receive the call, which I spoke about earlier. For me, visiting that room was quite a surreal experience, because I knew that that was where, with the call on 4 February 2009, the process started when an organ had been found for Mark. It was an emotional visit for me, and I was delighted to spend time with staff who operate that vital service 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. I was also delighted to meet Sally Johnson, NHSBT's director of organ donation and transplantation, and her team who maintain the organ donor register database. We discussed the future of the register and the likely impact of the Human Transplantation (Wales) Bill being passed at the Welsh Assembly.

I understand that — the then Minister Poots confirmed it — local patients can register on the Republic of Ireland's transplant register, but that means that they cannot be on the UK register at the same time. I also understand that arrangements are in place that make it possible for organ retrieval teams from the Republic of Ireland to operate in Northern Ireland. It may be useful to seek clarity on that issue from the Department.

Last year, I was also grateful for the opportunity to meet the Welsh Health Minister, Mark Drakeford AM, in Cardiff. I also hosted Mark and Anne McTaggart MSP at a Long Gallery event just over a year ago.

Following my conversations with Sally at NHSBT, I was absolutely delighted when the new organ donor register was launched across the United Kingdom in July. That was a direct result of the Welsh legislation that comes into force next month, two years after being passed by the Assembly there, which is the same timescale that I have proposed in the Bill. The changes to the register included the provision for people to be a donor, to not be a donor or to nominate two advocates to help affirm and make that decision for them after death. I also very much welcome the fact that the Health Minister warmly welcomed those changes. However, it is important to note that we would need legislation to come into place through the Assembly here to enable us to avail ourselves of the changes, which, I understand, our health service has rightly paid its portion towards. This Bill makes those changes.

Under the current opt-in system, we have never broken through the glass ceiling of the mid-30% of the public in Northern Ireland signing the organ donor register and consenting to donation after death. That is despite decades of promotion by the charities and the recent campaign by the Public Health Agency. From the perspective of someone who has been working alongside the charities for over 20 years, I know that that campaign was very much welcomed, given the heavy lifting that the charities have been doing and continue to do, day in and day out.

One of the little-known facts is that signing the register does not guarantee that a person's organs can or will be used after their death. That is because the manner of an individual's death often determines whether it is possible. The donation rate in the UK is 26 donors per million of our population. People often assume that, if they join the register, it automatically means that they will donate their organs.

The facts are very different indeed. Donald Cairnduff, whose son Philip had a successful liver transplant in 2004, joined me in presenting to the Health Committee two weeks ago. I believe he explained it best when he used a footballing analogy. He asked the Committee to imagine, on the last day of the Premier League season, when all the games kick off at the same time, that every stadium hosting a home game is packed to capacity. Only 26 people among all those spectators in all those stadiums will become organ donors. Just 26; very long odds indeed.

That gives you a vivid idea of how rare it is for people to die in circumstances in which they can donate their organs. However, with over 90% of the population consistently supporting organ donation and people in their mid-30s pledging in the register, there is a considerable difference between pledges to donate and support for donation. Indeed, as I mentioned earlier, 68% of our donations come from people who have never interacted with the organ donor register during their lifetime. That feeds into the argument that I laid out earlier on our currently high bedside rejection rates, standing as they are between 40% and 45%. This is frighteningly high and shows that families have perhaps not had the crucial conversation about donating that would have enabled them to better know what their loved ones' wishes were. They could then have confirmed and honoured those wishes by signing a document that is required by clinicians prior the loved ones' organs being donated.

The Bill does not propose to make any changes to the current system operated by clinicians, when an individual has already signed the organ donor register and has consented to donate their organs after death. I am also pleased by the three local public consultations into the issue of organ donation in Northern Ireland. The findings of the two PHA consultations into the issue of organ donation in Northern Ireland have been largely in line with the findings of my consultation for the Bill. I am also thankful that these consultations were conducted in parallel, as I believe that they too show that public support for a new opt-out system is rising. They also provide an independent assessment of the public's views on this issue.

It stood out for me that, when asked, only 36% of the public knew that the organ donor register existed in the first place. If you ask any of the countless local transplant volunteers, many of them are waiting for an organ transplant themselves, are successful recipients of a transplant, are family members of those who have donated or been recipients of an organ, or are people who, in some way, have an emotional connection with organ donation. They will tell you that it is their sole life's purpose and drive to increase the number of organs available for transplantation. Members, these people deserve our respect, gratitude and praise. They are the true heroes in Northern Ireland, and they have absolutely nothing but my admiration and praise for all that they do to help increase the life chances of others.

It must never, ever be forgotten that behind each volunteer is an individual story of emotion and one that will tug at the very heartstrings. We have heard so many of their stories through the all-party group, which I am honoured to chair. I am delighted by the fact that it has become an efficient vehicle to bring to the Assembly the stories behind human transplantation, whether it be an individual's story, the fantastic success of the transplant games athletes from Northern Ireland or the views of individual groups and charities.

Organ donation has a voice in this Building. I, for one, am truly glad that that is, and will continue to be, the case. I am truly humbled and delighted, as a mother of a transplant recipient, to be included in their number, and to work towards an aim that many of them have held close to their hearts for many decades. Members, I am asking you to join this campaign today. I will say in the House again what I have said many times before, that I bring the Bill forward first as a mother of a transplant recipient and as an organ donation campaigner who happens to be a Member of this legislative Assembly.

It is with a deep sense of pride and purpose that I commend the Second Stage of the Human Transplantation Bill to the House. I look forward to Members' contributions to the debate and the ongoing help and assistance to deliver the best Bill possible for the people of Northern Ireland. We owe it to the present generation who are awaiting a transplant, and we owe it to future generations to come, to change the law and to improve the life chances for all our people.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety):

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Bill sponsor for that very detailed overview of the Second Stage. On behalf of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I note the introduction of the Human Transplantation Bill. As the Bill sponsor outlined, the principal objective of the Bill is to save lives — that is very clear — by changing organ donation laws, by introducing a new soft opt-out option with safeguards and by placing an additional duty on the Department to educate the public on organ transplantation.

The Committee heard evidence from the Bill sponsor on 4 November 2015, accompanied by the father of a recipient of a successful liver transplant. We heard at first hand how successful organ transplants not only save lives but enable people to live their lives more fully — for example, by freeing them from the need for dialysis. The Bill sponsor also spoke about the differences between express consent and deemed consent and the role that families and advocates would play in decision-making under the Bill. The Bill sponsor provided the Committee with a range of statistical information, some of which has been referred to today. It is quite stark when we hear that, on average, 15 people die waiting for a life-saving transplant locally each year; in fact, 17 people died waiting last year. That is a stark reminder for all of us. We also heard about the results of the three consultations on organ donation that have taken place in the last year — the consultation on the Bill and the two consultations by the Public Health Agency. During the evidence session, the Bill sponsor stated that the majority of respondents to the consultation on the Bill and the PHA's attitudes surveys were supportive of some sort of soft opt-out option.

The Committee appreciates the importance of the issue of human organ transplantation, and there is an acceptance that more must be done to improve donor levels and transplantation rates. The Bill has the potential to affect every one of us, and that was emphasised by Committee members. It has to be acknowledged that there are wide-ranging opinions and feelings on the subject of organ donation. Regardless of whether people support organ donation itself or are themselves on the organ donor register, there are differing views on the soft opt-out option proposed in the Bill.

Some Committee members have some concerns around the Bill, and there are a number of areas that will need further exploration and clarification. Some of those areas were raised during the recent evidence session with the Bill sponsor. An obvious concern was that of consent. The introduction of the soft opt-out option was discussed, and members spoke of how organ donation is approached in other countries — the Bill sponsor has referred to some of that today — such as Wales, Belgium and Spain, and what levels of success they have had in relation to donor and transplantation rates.

We also know that further affirmation will be sought after death unless a person had already taken their name off the register before death. That affirmation can come from family members, advocates or others as outlined in the Bill. Although the affirmation is intended as a safeguard, it has the potential to raise issues. Consent to organ donation is a difficult decision for families to take, particularly at a time of terrible grief and loss, and it is made even more difficult if there are differences of opinion between family members or others involved. During our evidence session with the Bill sponsor, a number of members outlined possible scenarios whereby consent might be disputed; for example, where there is a potential donor who has expressed consent to organ donation and has perhaps appointed advocates, but whose family is opposed.

Other scenarios include those where family cannot be located or where there is disagreement between the next of kin. In those circumstances, who has the balance of power?

1.30 pm

Another issue raised was the role that clinicians play. Are they expected to make decisions that may go against families' wishes? Importantly, how do they feel about the proposed legislation? Should the Bill pass Second Stage, the Committee will want to hear from those clinicians who will be making the judgements and decisions on the ground.

Some Members raised the point that many people view organ donation as a gift freely given and expressed concern that the proposed changes to the law could alter that. Another issue discussed in our evidence session was finance, and the Bill's sponsor alluded to some of the statistics, and whilst it is apparent, no one can put a price on good health. The issue of finance needs to be considered.

The Committee heard evidence on the cost of implementing the Bill, the cost of dialysis for kidney patients, and the cost of transplant surgery. Initial figures produced by the Assembly Research and Information Service indicate that it would take between £2 million and £5 million to implement the Bill. However, the Bill's sponsor advised that the net benefit to the health service and the local economy of increasing transplants could be as much as a £7.4 million.

The Bill proposes to place additional duties on the Department to promote transplantation and to provide information about transplantation through a campaign at least once a year. That is intended to raise public understanding of organ donation and to make it more socially acceptable to discuss the issue. It is clear that education and communication are key if any change is to be effected in donor and transplantation rates. Some feel that a cultural change is also needed so that organ donation is discussed openly and frankly, particularly between family members, and the wishes of potential donors may be known, making it easier for next of kin to take that difficult decision if the time comes.

The Human Transplantation Bill is an emotive and complex piece of legislation, and, should it pass Second Stage, the Committee will consider all the issues raised and report its opinion to the Assembly.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. I have listened intently to what she said. She mentioned consent being raised as a concern by some Members. The Health Committee has looked at this Bill and at a range of other Bills in which consent is an issue. Is she aware of any other area of medicine in which silence from an individual on an issue is deemed as their consent to do something to their body?

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Member for his intervention. I was going to mention consent in my comments as an MLA. We need to be very clear not only on the issue of consent but on the issue of conflict, as it may arise. I was about to say that I hope that some of the issues that need to be reflected in the Bill will be progressed in that manner.

I thank the Bill's sponsor for bringing the Bill to the House today. The Committee notes the Second Stage of the Bill. As a constituency MLA, I look forward to engaging with, and maybe enhancing and strengthening, the Bill as it passes further stages. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Easton: The Human Transplantation Bill makes provision concerning the consent required for the removal, storage and use of human organs and tissue for transplantation and connected purposes. It must be enacted by the Northern Ireland Assembly and assented to by Her Majesty The Queen.

Under the Bill, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety must promote transplantation. It must also provide information and increase awareness of transplantation and inform the public about the circumstances where consent to transplantation is deemed to have been given and the role of relatives and friends in affirming that deemed consent. That also includes a duty to promote a campaign informing the public at least once a year.

The Bill contains 22 clauses and one schedule. It is proposed that the Bill will seek to increase the availability of organs for the purpose of transplantation through a consent process requiring affirmation after death unless the person has already taken their name off the organ donor register.

At the moment, human transplantation is governed by the Human Tissue Act 2004, which is a piece of law that applies to England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It is stated that, if the Bill becomes law, it will fit into the general framework already established by that Act. Some parts of the Bill repeat the provisions of that Act and make them apply to transplants under the Bill. Some parts follow the approach taken by the Human Transplantation (Wales) Act 2013. The Human Transplantation Bill will result in consequential amendments to the Human Tissue Act 2004. Those amendments will see a number of sections of the Human Tissue Act becoming non applicable to Northern Ireland, and restrictions will be put in place where consent is required.

The sponsor of the Bill undertook an extensive public consultation over 16 weeks on the policy objectives and proposed approaches of the Bill. A total of 1,366 responses were registered, from which it is said that a sizeable majority agreed with the objectives of the Bill. The majority of respondents stated that they believed that legislation and the introduction of a soft opt-out system would make a greater number of organs available for transplantation and therefore increase the chance of saving lives. A clear majority of respondents to the consultation also agreed that the family should continue to play a key role in the decision as to whether donors should have their organs removed.

At the end of the consultation, the sponsor gave a detailed overview of the responses to each of the questions available to the public. The overview included the number and percentage of each response and an overview of positive comments made and concerns expressed about each. The sponsor also briefed the Stormont all-party group on organ donation as to the findings of the consultation. I ask the sponsor this: how many of those who undertook the public consultation were from a medical background or worked in the field of medicine? The Royal College of Surgeons has expressed concerns in a recent article. I wish to hear from it. We need to hear more from the medical world on this issue before any final decision is made on the Bill.

I also note a letter sent to me by Dr John D Woods, the BMA Northern Ireland council chair, in which he mentions concerns over clause 4(2). He states:

"We realise that family involvement is a sensitive issue but the proposal at clause 4(2), Deemed Consent: deceased adults, we believe could lead to confusion."

He then goes on to offer an amendment. It is something that we maybe need to examine.

The Bill before us today has the potential to affect every single person across Northern Ireland at some stage. The sponsor of the Bill is bringing it forward with good intent. However, I still need to have further information on various issues as the Bill reaches the Committee Stage for scrutiny and clarification and to gain a better knowledge of the facts for myself before I can reach a conclusion. I am open-minded, but I need to be sure on issues such as costs. How will everybody be informed? How will people be able to take themselves off the list? What about dealing with sensitive issues of asking loved ones to give consent after their family member has passed away? What about training for staff on these issues? Will this boost organ donation? We see from some countries that it actually has not but that it has in others. Will there be too many donors? If so, will organs be sent to other regions of the United Kingdom or even further afield? I am also keen to see what it means under the Welsh model and how it is going to work there. I want to speak to the transplantation teams and explore the Welsh model.

Those are all questions that need to be explored. I ask that the Bill be given the proper time at Committee Stage, rather than being rushed through, so that we get all the facts. It is a vital issue. I thank the sponsor of the Bill for bringing it forward for consideration to the House. I hope to get a better understanding of the Bill as it progresses.

Mr McKinney: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to today's extremely important debate, and I am grateful to Mrs Dobson for bringing it to the Chamber. I know that she has worked extremely hard over the last few years in pushing for a legislative change to organ donation law to ensure that the many people on waiting lists have the best possible prospects for receiving a life-changing transplant. I encourage Members to think about that as we continue our discourse around the subject. Mrs Dobson and her staff deserve the highest recognition in the Chamber for their sustained hard work in bringing forward the Bill. Indeed, their contribution to the Committee reflected the depth and breadth of that hard work, and that has been reflected again, today, with the weight of her contribution.

As we have heard, about 200 people in Northern Ireland are waiting for an organ transplant. Sadly, 17 died last year, as we have heard, long before being offered one. So, it is important that the Chamber does everything it can to ensure that people on waiting lists have the best chance of receiving a life-changing organ. As I said, I urge Members to consider those lost lives and the, potentially, increasing number of lost lives, when they reflect on all these issues.

I welcome today's debate. Perhaps, the most important aspect of it is whether we move from an opt-in to an opt-out system. An opt-out system, as we have heard, requires an individual to explicitly make it known while they are alive that they are not in favour of their organs being used for transplant when they die. The key difference is that an opt-in system involves people expressly stating a wish that their organs and tissues be used for transplant on their death, while an opt-out system assumes that organs and tissues are available for transplant, unless there is a specific instruction to the contrary. At the moment, the fundamental principle is that organs are donated actively, freely, voluntarily and unconditionally using a soft opt-in system.

The proposed change is to promote organ donation more widely and raise levels of consent, improve public awareness and ensure best practice at all stages of the donation process, but the decision that we in Northern Ireland need to make around a change in the law involving organ donation involves ethical, legal, medical, organisational and societal components. The important balance to be struck is between respecting the views and rights of a potential donor and their respective families, and obtaining organs in an efficient manner. As I said, the weight of the contribution by Mrs Dobson and her team, at Committee and the Assembly, reflects real depth and a consideration of those issues.

In considering the change to an opt-out system, the Welsh system, which comes into effect next month, provides key guidance. Welsh authorities have stated that the process for opting out would be very straightforward, with people being able to opt out at general practitioner surgeries, online or by phone. The Welsh system presumes consent, but allows people to opt out. They can also confirm their wish to opt in. If no preference is registered, the assumption is that they wish to donate. At the time of death, the family is asked whether they know whether the person wished to opt out. They are not asked to make a choice, but simply to confirm, if they can, their loved one's wishes. If they do not know their loved one's wishes, donation is presumed. However, I welcome the concept around the proposer of the Bill's ideas on advocates.

During the past two years between —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: Yes.

Mr Ross: The Member has been on the Health Committee and has been a health spokesperson for some time. Does he share the concern that the Bill would make the absence of an objection to being considered as an organ donor equal to somebody who has expressly said that they wish to be an organ donor? Is he not concerned that silence on the issue is going to be deemed as consent? As I asked the Chair, earlier; is he aware of anywhere else in medicine where consent is presumed or deemed by any member of staff?

Mr McKinney: I do not share the concern. I am interested in the way that the Member phrases it. He asks if I have a concern. I do not have a concern. Clearly, he does have a concern, and he has the right to reflect it. I think that that is the importance of this discussion; we must have the debate and put in as many safeguards as we can around this. As I said at the outset of my remarks, we are talking here about lost lives and the ability to do something about that; trying to reach out to the community in a way that allows people to make decisions about potential organ donation and raising public awareness of it.

1.45 pm

Fundamentally, I understand — I will get to some of the finances in a moment — that it is very important that we treat this debate in the most respectful way possible. I re-emphasise that the depth and breadth of the work here, and the outreach that is being done by the proposer of the Bill — the scale of that work and interrogation of the issues — will allow us, particularly me and lots of people in the community who will have concerns about this, to move forward in the most comfortable way possible, so that we do not allow fears to be raised where potentially they could be allayed. That is an important and mature way to approach this debate. I know that the Member will also want to approach the debate in that way.

During the past two years, between passing the Act and its coming into force, the Welsh Government and health authorities have engaged in that process of awareness raising and education to ensure that people in Wales are aware of the changes to the law and the new choices that they will have.

As I said, I would just like to touch on the finances. We know that the costs involved with the introduction of the new system in Wales, estimated to be £7.5 million, are being set aside to support a range of activities around the change there. I know that the Member has touched on this. We would have to have meaningful funding for awareness campaigns as well. The Welsh Health Minister has advised that all the evidence that is available suggests that if Wales were able to secure just two more kidney donations, the system would pay for itself, given the cost of kidney dialysis. While I would not want anybody to set aside their concerns and worries about some of the proposals, I think that there is weight in the Bill's proposers taking that money-saving aspect of it very much into consideration. If two people could be taken off dialysis, the cost savings would cover the cost of the law change. It is extremely significant. In fact, it seems almost incredible that such a small change in the number of donations could cover the cost of that legislation. In fairness, that did indeed grab the Committee's attention.

There is much to do from this point to ensure that the Bill is right. I repeat that I think that we should welcome the debate. Moving forward, let us interrogate the issues at Committee in a respectful and mature way so that the people of Northern Ireland know that when it comes to looking at saving people's lives, the Assembly has arrived at the most mature point that it can in a positive way, with full public awareness and the right resources being directed towards these new proposals, and so that the people of Northern Ireland know that we have done it for their benefit and for the very vulnerable people who, as I said at the outset, are still waiting on that phone call. Let us see whether we can arrive at a point where more phone calls can be made and more lives can be saved.

Mr Speaker: Not to curtail or discourage your contribution in any way, Mr McGimpsey, especially as you were a previous Minister in this brief, I will just indicate briefly that Question Time is at 2.00 pm, and I may need to interrupt you to allow it to proceed.

Mr McGimpsey: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I rise to support the Bill's Second Stage and indeed to thank Mrs Dobson for bringing it forward. I know the huge amount of work that has gone on in the background to get it to this stage. The situation can of course simply be put by the fact that we are losing patients annually for want of appropriate organs for transplant. Organs are absolutely life-saving in situations. We often talk about kidney dialysis. We assume that patients with kidney failure go on dialysis and that although it is inconvenient and might be difficult for them, it offers them a way out. In fact, the process has a limit. There is a limiting factor in it. Without appropriate donation, it lasts only so long.

Without organ donation and kidney transplant, patients will perish. I know that from personal experience of a friend of mine whom we lost last summer; he had been on dialysis for about five years but perished after that for want of a kidney.

That is particularly difficult for individuals and families, but it is especially difficult for children. We have situations in Northern Ireland where we are losing wee ones with their entire lives ahead of them and who could have their lives back and could be saved for want of the appropriate donation. Again, I had experience of that when I was Health Minister. I have no doubt that the Health Minister, when he visits the Children's Hospital now, will meet children in exactly that situation. If they had the appropriate support, by which I mean organ donation, those children would get their lives back. When you are looking at wee ones of two, three and four years of age and think that they have a prognosis of only a year or two because of this situation, that is very difficult for families and for the doctors, nurses and staff dealing with that situation.

We have an opportunity here, through this process. The Bill is by no means done and dusted, and very important points were raised by Mr Easton and others that we need further information. We will want that information at Committee Stage to allow us to come to an informed decision. That is appropriate; that is what should happen with a Bill such as this. That is exactly what we should be doing, and I believe that that is exactly what the Committee will be doing. That is the appropriate way forward.

Issues have also been raised about consent and how it is freely given. We need to ensure that we have the views of donors, families and relatives. That is particularly important when talking about children, who do not have the capacity and who rely on their families. Those are all key issues. They are very difficult issues for the families concerned and for many adults in that situation. Those are things that we need to face. By facing them, we are saving lives, and that is what our health service is about and what we are about in the House. We must find a way forward that can provide life-saving interventions for patients who would not survive without them, and if we decide not to go forward with this legislation, that is, in effect, what we will be doing. We will be saying to a number of patients that we cannot help them, knowing that their prognosis will certainly be that they will come to harm.

I support the Bill and will continue to do so through its Committee Stage. There are important questions that have to be asked, and information is required. I believe that all those questions can be answered satisfactorily to allow us to go forward. It will be ground-breaking for us in the Assembly, and for our health service, to take those steps. It will also be strongly welcomed by our doctors and nurses working in the health service, who will have an opportunity to provide that key, special intervention. We have a workforce that is, by and large, dedicated to providing the very best support that they possibly can for their patients. It is up to us to give them the support and resources to allow them to deliver that.

Mr Speaker, I got your warning at the beginning about time. I do not need a huge amount of time to deliberate this through. I think that the Committee Stage is an appropriate stage to take it to and at which to deal with a number of these issues. In principle, for the prize that we get out of this, for the gain that we will make, for the lives that we will save and for the lives that will be lost if we do not go forward with this piece of legislation, I am happy to stop there, Mr Speaker, for the moment as far as this Bill is concerned other than to indicate again that I fully support this proposal.

Mr Speaker: Can I assume that you have completed your contribution?

Mr McGimpsey: Yes.

Mr Speaker: Thank you very much. As Question Time begins at 2.00 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. This debate will continue after Question Time, when the next listed Member to speak is Mr Stewart Dickson.

Oral Answers to Questions

Finance and Personnel

Budget: Expenditure Limits

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the process to agree a Budget that matches expected expenditure limits following the 2015 spending review. (AQO 9069/11-16)

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

The UK spending review 2015 will determine the Executive's Budget allocation for the five years commencing 2016-17. The outcome of the spending review will be announced on 25 November 2015. I will bring a Budget to the Executive and the Assembly for consideration after that date.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her response. Given the very tight timings between now and the start of the next financial year, how can she ensure that a strategic approach will be adopted that reflects emerging priorities such as investing in skills and, indeed, growing our economy?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. He has put his finger on the problem that faces us in this spending review. Ordinarily, we would issue and consult on a draft Budget, and that would give us time to listen to all the stakeholders and, indeed, all the Members here about how to address strategic priorities. However, given the lateness of the spending review, on 25 November, we are having to look at different ways of engaging with stakeholders. We cannot go through the process that we normally go through for the draft Budget and confirming the Budget, so I am considering alternative ways of seeking the views of stakeholders to make sure that we hear from all the voices about what the priorities should be.

As for whether it should be a one-year Budget or a multi-year Budget, obviously, I am of the opinion that it should be a one-year Budget because we will be entering a new mandate after May next year, and it would not be right to set budgetary priorities without allowing the new Executive to set those in the new Programme for Government. Of course, it is a matter for the Executive as a whole, but it is my opinion that we should just set a one-year Budget.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answers up to now. If she is not to hold a formal consultation on her draft Budget, how will she engage with stakeholders?

Mrs Foster: That is what we are considering at present. As I said, the preferable way would be to have the usual 12-week consultation on the draft Budget and allow people from all the different sectors affected to put forward what they believe is the right way to move ahead. However, we will have to be more targeted. Presumably, we will hold events to go out and engage with different sectors on what we think are the emerging priorities for the Budget. We simply do not have the time to engage in a draft Budget process, and I regret that.

Indeed, I regret the fact that we do not have clarity on where Westminster is going in the comprehensive spending review. There has been not much negotiation, or meetings, on how the devolved institutions will be treated in the comprehensive spending review. We have heard a lot about how some Departments at Westminster are facing cuts of up to 30%, which is an incredible amount of savings. Unfortunately, we have not had much engagement with the Treasury or, indeed, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on how this will impact the devolved Administrations. That is a frustration that is shared by not only my Welsh colleague but my Scottish colleague, and we have raised it directly in correspondence.

Mr Lyons: Can the Minister give the House her assessment of the Budget envelope for the next five years?

Mrs Foster: Of course, we will not know what the Budget envelope will be until it is announced by the Chancellor on 25 November. Whilst we do not have the exact Budget envelope, the economic and fiscal outlook, as published by the Office for Budget Responsibility in July indicates that, once again, we in Northern Ireland will be largely protected from the worst of the cuts that will come to UK public expenditure. However, we will continue to see a real-term reduction until around 2020-21. That is when the Office for Budget Responsibility thinks that things will start to move in the opposite direction, but, as I said, we will have more clarity on 25 November when we will be able to look at how we are going to be directly impacted.

Ms Boyle: What revenue-raising measures are the Executive considering, if any, ahead of a new Programme for Government? Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Foster: Hopefully, once we have completed the current talks process — I use the term “current”, but, hopefully, it is the last talks process — in relation to the difficulties that we currently face, we will turn to looking at the Programme for Government for the next Administration and what the outcomes should be around all that. Indeed, revenue raising will be looked at, but it is a very controversial area, and many in this House share with me the view that some of the revenue-raising options that have been suggested by others are simply not something that we would engage in, such as water charging. This party has been very clear in relation to water charging. We believe that it would be a retrograde step, particularly for householders who have been through a very difficult time over the past couple of years. However, there is scope to look at other issues, and I think that we should look at other issues when we are thinking about the next Programme for Government.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I advise Members that questions 5 and 6 have been withdrawn.

Financial Position 2015-16

2. Mr Givan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the financial position of the Northern Ireland Executive for the 2015-16 financial year. (AQO 9070/11-16)

7. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on both the Executive's Budget position and financial plans for the remainder of 2015-16. (AQO 9075/11-16)

10. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the Executive's 2015-16 budgetary position. (AQO 9078/11-16)

Mrs Foster: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 2, 7 and 10 together.

I have commissioned a November monitoring round, with a view to seeking Executive agreement on outstanding budgetary issues in this financial year. Departmental returns submitted as part of the process indicate that significant progress has been made in managing the significant pressures identified early in this financial year. I will update the Assembly in due course, once Executive agreement on the November monitoring round has been secured.

Mr Givan: The Minister will be aware that critical to the completion of this financial year is the implementation of the Stormont House Agreement. Can the Minister outline the financial impact to the Northern Ireland Executive's Budget if a deal is not reached?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. He will know that the Budget for this year — 2015-16 — is predicated on the Stormont House Agreement being implemented. The financial consequences would be significant, if not dire, if the December 2014 Stormont House Agreement was not honoured. There is no realistic way in which we could live within the 2015-16 DEL control total if the Stormont House Agreement flexibilities in particular are not dealt with. The key financial pressures that would bite would be the need to pay a £100 million reserve claim for 2014-15 and the welfare reform costs, both of which would come out of our resource DEL. It is very important that we reach agreement in relation to Stormont House and that we do so as soon as possible.

Mr Cree: Further to question 7, can you advise how, with the difficult and very short time remaining, capital, including conventional and financial transactions, can be utilised before the end of March? Is there a serious risk of money being returned to the Treasury?

Mrs Foster: I am sorry; I did not catch the very last part of that about the Treasury.

Mr Cree: Will there be capital moneys returned to the Treasury at the end of March?

Mrs Foster: That is certainly not our plan in relation to the capital funding. As I said, in June monitoring, there was a significant pressure appearing. Very significant monitoring bids were made at that particular time. I took the decision to write to all Departments to say to them that they needed to stop all discretionary spend. I am very pleased to say that that had an impact and there is a greatly reduced monitoring round now in November, and we will be able to deal with that, hopefully, in the coming days when we will be able to make announcements.

As he knows, we are hoping to find a home for the financial transactions capital in the Northern Ireland investment fund so that we do not lose any financial transactions capital. We believe that we have a home for normal capital, if I can call it that, as well, so we do not foresee any capital being handed back to the Treasury.

Voluntary Exit Scheme

3. Mr Buchanan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the number of people who have left the Civil Service under the voluntary exit scheme. (AQO 9071/11-16)

Mrs Foster: Eight hundred and sixty-six employees left the Civil Service on 30 September; a further 1,540 will leave between 30 November and 31 January. Those exits will deliver a pay bill saving in 2015-16 of £23.6 million and £69.1 million per annum thereafter. The compensation cost will be £68.4 million. Further offers will be made at the end of November for exits at the end of March.

Mr Buchanan: I thank the Minister for her response. Can she advise how staff are selected to leave?

Mrs Foster: Essentially, the selection criteria are being applied in order by Department grade, analogous grade and by discipline, where necessary, based on the numbers required by each Department to determine those who will exit under the scheme. The first criterion is the best value for money score, using the least cost, which is upfront compensation payment, and the maximum payback — the resultant wage savings in a one-year period. Where individuals are tied on that criterion, random selection is used thereafter. The decision on which staff are to leave has been devolved to departmental level because we felt that Departments were best placed to make the decisions on the staff that they need.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is the Minister confident that the scheme will not be subject to a legal challenge by the unions?

Mrs Foster: Yes, as much as one can be confident that it will not be challenged by the unions. We engaged, as you would expect, with our lawyers before the scheme was put in place, and, therefore, we very much believe that the legal basis is robust. However, that does not stop others thinking that they may want to challenge, but I believe that we will be able to defend against any challenge that is brought.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí. I thank the Minister for her answers. Can the Minister give an assurance that the reduction in personnel will not have a detrimental effect on front-line services, particularly given the experienced personnel who are leaving, or who are projected to leave, the service?

Mrs Foster: I made the point that we had devolved the decision to departmental level, and one reason that we did that was because the sheer scale of the exits and the speed with which they needed to happen meant that Departments had to be able to make sure that they would maintain appropriate service delivery. Therefore, we wanted to ensure that essential employees, for example, were exempted from the scheme and wanted to allow Departments to deploy quotas, if that was considered necessary. We did not allow employees to go all in one tranche.

As you know, it has been spread across the year, and they will be released over four tranches. As I say, employees are released on a departmental basis. Some Departments are allowing more to go than others, and constituents have been in touch with me about why the Department for Social Development is not allowing as many people to go as the Department for Employment and Learning. Those are departmental decisions that they believe they can stand over. It is a mixture of all those things, but it is about ensuring that Departments have resilience after the voluntary exit scheme has finished and to make sure that they can continue to deliver and maintain the public service that we expect from them.

Mrs Overend: It seems that certain grades of civil servants are not being allowed to leave at this time, and she has maybe touched on the reasoning for that. Can she confirm whether that is true and whether everyone who wants to leave will be allowed to leave at some stage?

2.15 pm

Mrs Foster: There may be grades that a Department feels are necessary to keep it functioning in the proper fashion, and some of those have been exempted from the scheme. Each Department determined the numbers by grade that it needed to release under the scheme to secure the pay bill savings. Corporate HR and my Department acted on those instructions.

Offers were made commensurate with the numbers to be released as determined by Departments rather than with reference to the total number of applicants within a business area or grade. Some staff may be disappointed that they are not being allowed to avail themselves of the voluntary exit scheme, but we have to be mindful that we have a Civil Service to run and maintain, and that the public expect to have a level of service from their Civil Service. Some will be disappointed, but that is tied in with the voluntary exit scheme.

Mr Allister: Is the Minister monitoring the impact of the exit scheme on the community background of the Civil Service composition? If so, has she any grounds for concern, and when will that be revealed to the public?

Mrs Foster: That information will be fed into human resources and go to the Civil Service board, which will report on that. I do not have figures at present, but I am sure that the Member will monitor that and ask me again, when I will be able to answer in more detail.

Defamation Act 2013

4. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on any plans she has to introduce legislation similar to the Defamation Act 2013. (AQO 9072/11-16)

Mrs Foster: The Northern Ireland Law Commission was asked to assess the law of defamation by reference to the 2013 Act. However, the commission ceased operations before it completed the review. I have asked Dr Andrew Scott, who was undertaking the review on behalf of the commission, to produce a final report, and that report will help to inform policy direction.

Ms Lo: I am pleased to hear about the review. I am sure the Minister is aware that the law in England and Wales has helped not only to ensure free speech but to deter reckless defamation claims. Are there any clauses in the Bill that the Minister particularly objects to?

Mrs Foster: No. I have no preconceptions about what should or should not be done. Dr Scott is taking an independent look at what the needs are in Northern Ireland. I was disappointed that he was not able to complete the review under the Law Commission. However, we have asked him to complete that work. Unfortunately, it will have to fit around his teaching commitments, but we hope that he will be able to deliver it in the new year. I took forward to receiving it, considering it and looking at his recommendations.

Mr Nesbitt: The Minister makes reference to Dr Scott and the commission, which, as she will be aware, undertook a consultation. Is she prepared to publish that consultation?

Mrs Foster: As I understand it, there were around 32 responses to that consultation. I do not think that we should pre-empt Dr Scott's independent review. Therefore, I will not be letting those consultation responses come out until Dr Scott has finished his review. He is a very thorough individual, and I look forward to the work. As I said, the review will have to fit around his teaching commitments at the London School of Economics. I hope that the final report will be complete and available in the first months of 2016.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her interesting answer. When the work done by Dr Scott comes into being, will the Minister go out to further consultation, or what process will she follow on foot of the report?

Mrs Foster: First of all, the Committee will receive a copy of the independent report, so it will be free to comment on it. As Minister, I will have decisions to take on the foot of the report. We do not know what those will be until we receive it.

If there are changes to be made, we will move into policy development to consider how we make them. I do not think that it would be right to follow the Defamation Act 2013 slavishly. Obviously, it will inform what we do, but we need to wait on the report and decide how to move forward, because, of course, it depends on what is in the report.

Rates: Food and Life Sciences Sector

8. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel how the review of business rates can help manufacturing companies in the food and life science sectors. (AQO 9076/11-16)

Mrs Foster: The review will re-examine all non-domestic rate reliefs and their continued relevance. Currently, manufacturing companies in a wide range of the sector benefit from 70% industrial derating if the premises are used primarily for factory purposes and involve the use of manual labour. That relief extends to the food sector. Life sciences companies may also be entitled to it if a production process is involved. However, research does not normally qualify for derating. The public consultation paper sets out the case for retaining that support, recognising the importance of Northern Ireland maintaining its competitive position for manufacturing.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that response. Will she update the House on how the Executive support the manufacturing sector through rate relief?

Mrs Foster: Early in the last mandate, we took a decision to keep industrial derating, and that helps a lot of our companies across Northern Ireland. Some 70% of their rates bill is given rate relief and, therefore, they pay 30% of what they would pay if they were in England, Wales or wherever. We believe that that is of great assistance to manufacturing companies across Northern Ireland, whatever manufacturing sub-sector they are in. As I said in the paper that has been put forward, we will not be changing that; we will keep it. Some people have suggested that this review will lead to the end of industrial derating. That is not the case, and I want to make that very clear today.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: I thank the Minister, especially for her commitment to keep industrial derating. Following the review and the public consultation, does she believe that we will be able to come up with solutions to tackle some of the real problems facing small businesses in our high streets and main streets? I think, in particular, of the number of empty stores and shops that pepper many of the main roads and streets in our towns and cities.

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. The Member took part in a debate that we had recently in relation to the impact of rates on small businesses in South Belfast. That was very worthwhile and useful because it allowed us to set out what is happening in relation to rate relief and the rating system in that constituency. As he knows, small business rate relief has had a very good impact for many businesses across Northern Ireland. Some say that it does not go far enough; some want us to change the system. The current small business rate relief system runs only to the end of this financial year and then we will have to decide whether to keep it in its current form or to engage and do something slightly different for town centres. That has been suggested to me. The Member will know that the Ulster University economic policy centre suggested that we should do something different, rather than continue with the small business rate relief scheme. I will take that decision in conjunction with colleagues in the Department for Social Development and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I have already met with both Ministers to see whether there is something we can do that would have more of an impact. Certainly, moving into the future, we will continue to support small businesses. It is just how we do it, whether through rates or another system.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for her previous answers, particularly the latest. Can she advise at this time whether all the existing rate relief schemes are likely to be extended to 2016-17?

Mrs Foster: No, I cannot say that. There would not be much point in us having a review if I were to stand up and say that everything that is there at the moment will continue to be there in 2016-17. It is important that we reiterate the situation in relation to manufacturing because of the difficult week that manufacturing has just been through with the number of job losses. That is not to take away from the fact that, while last week and, indeed, the week before were particularly bad weeks for manufacturing, manufacturing is actually on the up in Northern Ireland, based on the number of jobs that have come to, and been created in, Northern Ireland over the past year. However, I believe that, given other pressures, not least energy costs, it is right to keep derating for manufacturing businesses. As I have said, small business rate relief is something we are looking at. Whether it would be better to use the £20 million that was set aside for small business rate relief in a different way is a discussion that is ongoing.

Construction Contracts: SMEs

9. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the work her Department has undertaken to ensure that small and medium-sized enterprises have a competitive chance of bidding for tendered construction contracts. (AQO 9077/11-16)

Mrs Foster: My Department introduced new public contracts regulations in February 2015. These are intended to facilitate the participation of small and medium-sized businesses by, for example, limiting turnover requirements to twice the contract value. The Central Procurement Directorate (CPD) has also worked with the construction industry to simplify the pre-qualification process and reduce the effort needed to tender. SMEs are now winning around 85% of construction contracts. CPD has also published guidance to help SMEs benefit from subcontracting opportunities.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her answer. Specifically on procurement and tendering, is the Minister minded to look at the Public Services (Social Value) Act 2012 in England?

Mrs Foster: Actually I held a procurement board meeting last week, and that was the subject of the discussion. I received a very helpful report from a group of people, including the Strategic Investment Board, who have been running social contract pilots. One of the queries was whether we go down the route of legislation or of guidance. That discussion has really just begun. I have asked for an Executive memorandum to go round colleagues asking what they feel is the best way forward on the issue. The procurement board is looking at this issue at present.

Mrs McKevitt: What has been done to remove prohibitive criteria that prevent companies winning tenders for the first time?

Mrs Foster: CPD has introduced a range of measures to increase opportunities for small and medium-sized companies, including those dipping their toes into the market for the first time. A single web-based procurement portal, eTendersNI, has been introduced. It shows all the public-sector procurement opportunities that are available and alerts firms to tender opportunities in which they may be interested. It also allows them to store their profile information for use when completing further tenders.

Breaking larger contracts into lots is a very important method of allowing small and medium-sized businesses to come forward on their own behalf. For a while it seemed that the only way that you could obtain a government contract was if you were part of a big partnership that went forward together. However, we are now breaking larger contracts into lots to allow SMEs to come forward on their own behalf.

As I said, we are making sure that the turnover requirements are only twice the contract value. Again, that was a big challenge for a lot of small and medium-sized businesses. Indeed, I came across it in my constituency. Setting proportionate minimum standards for experience and financial standing is also important. In the past, standards were, quite rightly, being asked for, but when we looked at them we did not think that they were proportionate to the size of the contract. We have tried to increase the opportunities for small and medium-sized businesses in a range of ways. It is something that I feel very strongly about and take a particular interest in, having come from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Children's Bill: Pooled Budget

11. Mr Agnew asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel how the pooled budget provisions in the Children's Services Co-operation Bill 2015 will operate in practice. (AQO 9079/11-16)

Mrs Foster: The Children's Services Co-operation Bill 2015 states that the Department of Finance and Personnel may, by regulations, make provision for the procedures to be followed on the sharing of resources or pooling of funds. Such regulations will be used to ensure that the handling of shared resources or pooled funds complies with DFP public expenditure and financial management guidance. Accountability and governance issues will also be addressed. Subject to the Bill receiving Royal Assent, DFP will work with OFMDFM and other stakeholders to draft such regulations.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Members, that ends the period for listed questions. We now move to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Minimum Wage: Departmental Budgets

T1. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to detail the implications of the new minimum wage for departmental budgets. (AQT 3121/11-16)

Ms McCorley: An dtig liom iarraidh ar an Aire cad iad na himpleachtaí do bhuiséad a Roinne mar gheall ar an tuarastal is ísle nua?

Mrs Foster: I am not sure that the new minimum wage will have a big impact on departmental budgets. When it comes in, the living wage will have an impact, particularly on the Department of Health and Social Services, because many of our care workers, for example, are paid in and around the minimum wage. When they move on to the living wage, that will obviously be more expensive for the Department, and that will have to be taken into account when we set its budget.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra.

I thank the Minister for her answer. What challenges will that pose for arm's-length bodies and community organisations? What can government do to support those groups?

Mrs Foster: We must be aware of the scale of the issue. I was recently contacted by some of the groups involved in the social care sector to say that it will have a big impact on them. I know from the tourism and hospitality sector that it will be a big challenge there as well. While we all welcome the fact that we are moving towards having a living-wage economy, we should be aware that there are challenges associated with it, particularly for the lower-paid sectors. Whilst bigger employers in the private sector will be able to absorb those costs, it will be a challenge for us in the public sector.

Fisheries Conservancy Board: Pensions

T2. Mr McKay asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to take up the case of Mr William Owens of Broughshane, who worked for the Fisheries Conservancy Board (FCB) during the '80s, given that, even though he has evidence of his membership of the FCB pension scheme dated 1987, he has been denied his pension payable to age 64, even though other members of the scheme received same; and will she help Mr Owens and other people in that position to get the four years' pension that they have been unjustly denied. (AQT 3122/11-16)

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. I am aware of the individual whom he has brought before the House this afternoon; indeed, my colleagues have written to me about the issue, and Mr Owens has written to me directly about it. It is being investigated by the Department. I know that he may be a bit frustrated about the time that it has taken to look into the matter, but the Department is looking at it.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Many Members will be aware of Mr Owens's case; he has campaigned and canvassed for many years on the matter. Is the Minister willing to meet Mr Owens to move the matter on?

Mrs Foster: I am prepared to come back to you and, indeed, to the other Members who have written to me about the matter, once the Department has finished its investigations and we can see where it is at at present.

Civil Service Recruitment: Community Balance

T3. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to keep monitoring and under review the breakdown of community balance of people coming into the Civil Service, given that she will be aware that by far the majority of people recruited are at the administrative assistant (AA) and administrative officer (AO) grades. (AQT 3123/11-16)

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. I know that the matter concerns the Member greatly, and I will communicate with him on it once I have had a chance to look at the figures again for this year. We will certainly look at whether there is a need for intervention in some way in relation to the recruitment of AOs and AAs.

Mr Campbell: The Minister will be aware that, a considerable number of years ago, there was a concern because there were too few Protestant employees in the much larger section of the Civil Service than in any of the other sections. Hopefully, she will be able to keep that matter under review and, if required, adopt a policy that other public-sector bodies have had to adopt, which is intervention to ensure that there is equitable treatment across the communities.

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. I am aware that some arm's-length bodies have had to adopt that process, but, unfortunately, it has not had as much of an impact as I would have liked, because, in the circumstance that I am thinking of, that organisation was capped at 49 employees and, therefore, there was little room for movement on that matter. I take the Member's point and will certainly keep it under review.

Empty Premises: Rates Review

T4. Ms Boyle asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether she has given any thought to how, under the rates review, we might bring in some changes that would help to bring more businesses into empty premises across our towns and cities. (AQT 3124/11-16)

Mrs Foster: The Member will be aware that we already have provision that, if someone moves into an empty shop, they are able to avail themselves of rates relief for a limited time. I accept that it is a limited time, but it helps when someone is starting up a new business. I know of businesses in my constituency that have really appreciated that. The non-domestic review has only started. It runs, I think, until the middle of January, so I hope that Members and, indeed, stakeholders will come forward with new and innovative ideas, not just around rates relief but around all the other areas.

Ms Boyle: I thank the Minister for her answer. Minister, would you ever consider specifying certain areas — for example, a street in a town centre — where a special rates exemption would apply to empty stores?

Mrs Foster: Again, that is the kind of thing that we need to think about. I mentioned the small business rate relief scheme. Indeed, some town centre organisations believe that, instead of just having a generalised small business rate relief scheme, we should target it on the area in the town centre that, at present, is having difficulty, frankly, in filling spaces because of the level of rates that have been levied on the shops.

One area that has also been raised with me — it is a controversial area — is in the realm of charity shops. Since the review went out, I have already had a number of charities in contact with me, worried about the fact that they will not be able to avail themselves of rates relief. However, on the other hand, I have small businesses saying to me, "They are not paying any rates. I am next door, and I pay full rates". Those are the difficult decisions that we will have to grapple with, but we can and should look at doing things differently. We should not just be driven by what everybody else does. If there is a challenge in relation to town centres — frankly, some of our town centres are struggling — we should look at those and see if they can make a difference.

Rate Relief for Sports Clubs

T6. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what progress has been made on rate relief for sports clubs since the private Member's Bill failed to pass. (AQT 3126/11-16)

Mrs Foster: The Bill that I intend to bring forward will contain an enabling power that will permit enhanced rate relief for sports clubs, subject to conditions. My current intention is to use the power to permit enhanced relief of 100% for community amateur sports clubs that do not have a permanent liquor licence. That deals with the issue of competition with hotels, pubs and clubs. It would align them with the rating treatment of community halls legislation rather than putting them into competition with pubs and clubs.

Mr Hilditch: I and some of my colleagues met the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs, which expressed some disappointment at the lack of consultation on the previous process. Can the Minister ensure that the likes of those people will have the opportunity to fully engage in any new process?

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. I hope that they will understand that, because of the short time that we have available, it will be a targeted consultation rather than the full 12 weeks of consultation. I hope to go — indeed, I am going, God willing — to the Committee tomorrow morning to talk about my proposals. It will be a matter for the Committee whether it grants accelerated passage. If it grants accelerated passage, we can get the Bill through; if it decides against it, it will probably be a matter for the next mandate. I will regret that, but it is a matter for the Committee.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Joe Byrne is not in his place.

Fraud

T9. Mr Givan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel, given that she will be aware of the case involving his constituent Amanda Jackson, who was subject to a £77,000 fraud, to outline to the public and to all the professional organisations involved in such transactions the need to be vigilant and the need to ensure that robust systems are in place to prevent such fraud in the future. (AQT 3129/11-16)

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am aware of your constituent's case. It was, of course, raised publicly, but I also know that you corresponded with me on the matter. I suppose that it really is a matter for my colleague the Enterprise Minister and about making sure that everything is in place in Trading Standards. I urge vigilance on the issue that was brought to my attention. There was an awful lot of money involved in that case, but, you know, small amounts of money in other cases mean a big lot to those individuals who have been defrauded. We should be alert and aware of the dangers online.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for that response and for undertaking in her written correspondence to write on the issue to the Law Society, owing to its oversight of the legal profession. Of particular concern is that, for electronic transfers, Barclays, with which I and the Member of Parliament have corresponded, does not check the name of accounts. That is prevalent across all electronic transactions. Is that something that the Minister could undertake to correspond on with the banking institutions? Danske Bank was the organisation that allowed the money to go out, and Barclays allowed the money to be received into what was ultimately a fraudulent account that was set up in its organisation.

Mrs Foster: I am more than happy to do that if the Member wishes to give me the fuller details of that side of it. I undertook to write to the Law Society as that end of it caused me a great deal of concern. As he knows, we do not have any control over the banking systems in Northern Ireland. That falls to the Westminster Government. I am more than happy, however, to correspond with those banks about the incident.

Thousands if not millions of people transact their banking online every day. We should not forget that that is the way in which people chose to do their business nowadays, and 99% of it is carried out in a very safe manner. If there are instances in which there are difficulties — clearly, this is a case in which something went fundamentally wrong — we should raise it and make sure that it does not happen again.

Health Service Investment

T10. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether she is willing and able to invest further in the health service to enable patients to be seen in a more reasonable time, bearing in mind that a request went to her Department during the June monitoring round for £45 million and the fact that she will be aware of the dire position with the ever-growing waiting lists. (AQT 3130/11-16)

Mrs Foster: In the 2015-16 Budget, I and my Executive colleagues demonstrated our commitment to improving health and social care by protecting front-line health and social care from budgetary reductions. Further to that, some £200 million of additional funding was provided to the Department for front-line health and social care. I am glad that my colleague is here to hear about all that great funding that has been provided to him by the Department of Finance.

Unfortunately, the deterioration in waiting times is due to a number of factors that are placing increasing pressures on our health service. Those include demographic changes, which I have talked about in the House before, an ageing population and increasing demand for healthcare interventions. However, all of that has been made worse by the fact that we have been incurring welfare fines that otherwise could have gone to the Department of Health. I make no apology for saying that. I hope that we are able to find a solution to the difficulties that we have found ourselves in over welfare so that money can be allocated to the Department of Health to deal with those issues.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her response. She will remember that a former Finance Minister criticised a former Health Minister for not providing value for money. Can the present Finance Minister assure the Assembly that the present Health Minister will deliver a better service for all our people, particularly on the waiting lists that we have just been talking about?

Mr Hamilton: "I have every confidence in him."

Mrs Foster: He is saying that I have every confidence. [Laughter.] I do have every confidence in my colleague the Minister of Health on the issue. The key to all of this is to make sure that, after the talks have finished — we hope that they will finish very soon and that we will have an agreement in place — we can move to a sustainable budgetary position, where we can allocate the appropriate amount of money to the Department of Health and are able to deal with those waiting lists, which have accumulated and are unacceptable. I think that we all accept that, but we are where we are. Now, we have to deal with the issue, and I look forward to being able to make a statement in relation to November monitoring in the next number of days.

2.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is the end of the period for questions to the Minister of Finance and Personnel.

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Health Service Reforms

1. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline his plans for reforming the health service. (AQO 9084/11-16)

5. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety when the recently announced panel to examine the configuration of health and social care services will be appointed. (AQO 9088/11-16)

15. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety how much will be saved through the abolition of the Health and Social Care Board. (AQO 9098/11-16)

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I would like to answer questions 1, 5 and 15 together.

It has been clear for a number of years that our health and social care services in Northern Ireland are facing the significant challenges of rising demand, rising expectations and tightening finances. We cannot hope to respond to those challenges unless we are focused on ensuring the highest quality and safety of care, configure our services correctly and have an appropriate administrative structure.

There are simply too many layers of administration in our system, which are making it difficult to meet those challenges to drive change and weakening accountability. I want to drastically delay the system to remove complexity and bring about greater accountability and better responsiveness. I want our trusts to be responsible for the planning of care in their areas and to have the operational independence to deliver it. I want to see my Department take firmer strategic control of the health and social care system. I have therefore announced that we will close the Health and Social Care Board, as I believe that we no longer need a stand-alone organisation. I intend to retain a Public Health Agency, with a renewed focus on early intervention and prevention, which will work more closely alongside the Department in that essential work. I have also announced a panel to lead a debate on the best configuration of health and social care services in Northern Ireland.

It is important that this is a clinically led debate with clinical evidence for any proposed changes to services and evidence about the implications of failing to make changes. I envisage a panel comprising around half a dozen experts drawn from across the sphere of health and social care. I hope to be able to announce the membership of the panel shortly and that it will begin its work before Christmas. One of its first tasks will be to convene a summit involving political parties to gather ideas, suggest solutions and, I hope, collectively reach agreement on a shared vision for the future of health and social care in Northern Ireland.

As I have said before, these changes are about moving towards a more streamlined and accountable structure so that we can make the most of the talent of our staff, encourage innovation and create a more efficient system. Although there may be some savings, my focus is on getting the structures right. All health and social care bodies are subject to challenging efficiency savings and, until detailed work is completed —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Does the Minister need extra time?

Mr Hamilton: Yes. Sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker, I thought that that was requested beforehand, but I appreciate that. Thank you.

All health and social care bodies are subject to challenging efficiency savings and, until detailed work has been completed, it is not possible to identify whether any additional savings can be delivered. I hope that all political parties will embrace the opportunity for change and work positively to create a world-class health and social care system in Northern Ireland.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that detail. I have been very welcoming of the reform agenda that he is taking forward. The board's figures on waiting times for elective care were published for the period from April to August. The figures showed that all trusts were failing to reach their targets and that one trust was actually 17% behind target. Specifically, how will this reform proposal tackle that very direct need?

Mr Hamilton: I, again, welcome her welcome of the proposals that I put forward nearly a fortnight ago. I particularly welcome that because I think that the Chair has taken the proposals that I put forward in the proper spirit, recognising the fact that there is an additional layer of bureaucracy in our system that is getting in the way of front-line delivery, which is what she focused on. In the past, that has also proved a barrier to innovation across our health and social care system. I think that she and I are as one in wanting to see that bureaucracy removed from our system.

The Finance Minister was just in her place, outlining the difficulties that we have this year with finances. Pressures are increasing, driving up demand and our waiting lists, but we have also had the situation of losing money through welfare reform penalties. I, like her, do not wish to dwell on that. I hope that, in other parts of this Building and this estate, we will be able to reach a swift conclusion to the issues around our Budget and welfare reform that have been bedevilling us.

That will then result in a resolution of welfare reform, which will result in more money for waiting lists, and that is what I have been lobbying my colleague the Finance Minister for. In the short and the long term, we need an injection of resources to tackle waiting lists. That is what I am seeking, that is what I want, and that is what I hope will happen. In and of themselves, those changes will not address that, other than the fact that they will make the £4.7 billion health and social care system in Northern Ireland work more efficiently. By taking out the layer of bureaucracy that she and I have focused on, we can make that system — which has not been working to the full and to the optimum over the last number of years since its inception in 2009 — work more efficiently and get more resources into the front line. I want to see any savings that are realised going back into the front line to help patients and people across Northern Ireland.

Mr Weir: In order to make the necessary changes, the Minister has always referred to the need for a transformation fund. Will he advise us whether he envisages that extra income-generation measures will also be required?

Mr Hamilton: We need to be clear that in wanting to transform our health and social care system we need more resources. That might seem almost counter-intuitive to wanting to get the most efficient use out of the resources that we have. Understanding the pressures we face across our entire budget, we need to see more money going into health and social care in order to get a more efficient system. In the short term, in order to make the changes that might come forward as a result of the recommendations from any panel a reality, we need a boost and an injection of cash over the next number of years.

If we want to do some of the innovative things that many of our trusts are doing, then we need to have money to do it, which is not money that is coming away from the front line. That has been the challenge in the past. We have had to fund innovation, and money has had to come from the front line, and that is never an easy thing to do.

In and of themselves, the reforms do not depend on more income generation. The reintroduction of prescription charges might have been a way of getting more money into the system in the short term. I am aware that a campaign has been running recently that is opposed to the reintroduction of prescription charges or, perhaps more accurately, wants to exempt certain people from prescription charges. My view is that, if we were to reintroduce prescription charges, it should be for everyone, or we should stick with no one and have no exemptions. Unfortunately, there has been a misunderstanding with the campaign; the proposal that was made in a recent consultation was for a small charge of around 50p or £1 up to a maximum of about £20 or £25 a year. Given the lack of political consensus, I do not think that there will be any reintroduction of prescription charges in my time as Minister, but there will be consequences. Not having the income from prescription charges is not without consequences in terms of paying for some of the very expensive new drugs and treatments that are out there. Some people may see some success in not having prescription charges reintroduced, but there will be consequences, sometimes even for those —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Minister's time is up.

Mr Hamilton: — who are very sick and rely on new drugs.

Mr McQuillan: Minister, what impact, if any, will abolishing the board have on front-line services?

Mr Hamilton: There will be an impact on creating a more efficient system, which is what I want to see, and that is where the impact of the reforms that I have put forward will be most targeted on. I do not want to dwell on staffing issues, because, as I said during my statement in Ballymena a couple of weeks ago, we have some tremendous staff in our system who are working exceptionally well and doing some exceptional things, but we are not getting the best out of their talents because of the system that they operate in — that very bureaucratic system that we have.

Some have wanted to focus on the issue of staff, saying that it was an easy decision to get rid of the board because its numbers had become big. Yes, the numbers have risen. It started pretty high; under the tenure of Mr McGimpsey when he was Health Minister, it started with around 390 full-time equivalents in the board, and it has grown to 600. It was always quite a big beast no matter what his intentions were for it.

Over the same period — since 2010 — the number of staff in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has dropped dramatically. In March 2010, the number of full-time equivalents in the Department was 670. In November 2015 — the most up-to-date figure we have — the number of staff within the Department is 466. So there has been a one-third reduction in the number of staff in the Department over the last four years, and that number is set to go down further.

The voluntary exit scheme, which my colleague the Finance Minister referenced earlier, will see 43 full-time equivalent posts removed from the Department by the end of 2015-16, which will make £0.5 million of savings in-year and £1.5 million recurring savings thereafter. So, on the issue of the board's staffing levels, yes, it has grown in size, but a reduction in the number of staff in the Department has occurred over the same period.

Mr McKinney: The Transforming Your Care (TYC) plan had consensus but not enough money. He is seeking further consensus and is pointing to the potential for money, but there is no guarantee that he can get it. Is that not a fatal flaw in his plan?

Mr Hamilton: No, and we should not be looking for fatal flaws in the plan. We should be seeking to build political consensus.

Sorry, I have not had the chance to formally congratulate the Member — I did so very informally earlier — on his victory at the weekend. I will not say too much, given who is sitting directly behind him. I congratulate him and I also congratulate Mr Eastwood, which makes me sound like a famous boxer thanking Mr Eastwood in the past. Taking over the reins of the SDLP so close to an election is like taking over managerial office at a Premier League club that is sitting at the bottom of the table with only about 10 matches to go. I am sure the Member and his party colleagues hope that he is more Tony Pulis than Felix Magath, but time will tell. I wish him well.

We should be looking for a political consensus, because the prize from that is the crafting, building and putting in place of that world-class health and social care system. We know what we can have in Northern Ireland, and Sir Liam Donaldson pointed to that in his report, and we all want to see that happen. Yes, it absolutely does depend on resources. I do not want to labour the points that I made to Mr Weir, but it absolutely requires resources to make that transformation. That will require some difficult decisions by me and the Executive, but I hope that, given the extent of the prize and the size of the challenges that are facing our health and social care system, we can all unite as one to lobby for those additional resources so that we can put in place a transformation fund that will make the vision of a world-class health and social care system a reality. I look to the Member as much as I look to any other Member for support in trying to realise that goal.

Mr McGimpsey: The changes that you propose are contained in Liam Donaldson's proposals. At the Committee and in previous utterances you estimated that it would take 18 months to deliver this change. I saw Liam Donaldson in the press over the weekend saying that that is far too long a time and that you must shorten it. Have you reconsidered your time frame?

Mr Hamilton: I welcomed what Sir Liam Donaldson said when I made my speech, and I welcome the comments that he made last week. He welcomed my decision to get rid of the board, and he did make the points about the timescale. It is significant that he said we absolutely should be getting rid of the additional layer of bureaucracy in our health and social care system that was created, as the Member knows very well, back in 2009, so I welcome what Sir Liam said in respect of that.

I made the point about the implementation of possible recommendations that might flow from the work of a panel, namely that they may take between five years and 10 years to be implemented in full. I used the 18-month figure for practical considerations: it will be the time within which to pass and implement the legislation that will be required to do away with the board. In between, officials have been tasked with scoping out what steps can be taken without the need for legislation to be passed and start to implement them as quickly as possible. That is so that we can have the effect of the reforms that I have proposed, which are about taking out bureaucracy and focusing and encouraging innovation. We can have all of that without needing to pass legislation. Where we need to pass legislation, we will do so. Being realistic about the timescale so close to an election and the dissolution of the Assembly, I do not believe that legislation will be able to be passed by the end of March.

Realistically, it will have to be introduced very quickly after the next election and implemented at the beginning of the next financial year. The 18 months is a practical point. I would like to see it happen more quickly; I wish that I could click my fingers and make it happen overnight, but, unfortunately, it cannot.

Autism Act 2011: Implementation

2. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the implementation of the Autism Act (Northern Ireland) 2011. (AQO 9085/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: The Autism Act (NI) 2011 required my Department to lead on the development and implementation of a cross-departmental autism strategy. Every Department has signed up to the strategy, and it is an important commitment for the Executive. Although a report is not due until January 2017, given the focus on the issue, I have decided to provide Members with a detailed report on progress against the autism action plan. I have therefore issued a written statement to Members advising that a progress report on the cross-departmental autism strategy 2013–2020 and action plan 2013–16 has been placed in the Assembly Library and has been published.

Many aspects of the strategy are progressing well, with better access to services for people with autism and their families and carers; the appointment of a regional ASD coordinator; and training for front-line staff, education professionals, youth workers, parents and carers. There is also better awareness of support services through signposting by HSC trusts as part of their triaging process. However, it is undoubtedly the case that the unprecedented increase in referrals has created a major challenge for the system. Over the past six years, referrals of children and young people for assessment have nearly doubled from around 1,500 to 2,936 per year. That has inevitably resulted in longer waiting times for the first assessment and ultimate diagnosis. Therefore, while I am pleased with the progress made to date, there is no room for complacency. I will continue to work with the board and the trusts to tackle the current difficulties and to improve access to services.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Considering the importance of early diagnosis and intervention for people who have autism, does the Minister, since he is so fond of footballing metaphors, not see that he is in the bottom league regarding autism, given the fact that 1,400 people await diagnosis?

Mr Hamilton: I do not come to the House to give those figures or statistics with any sense of pride: far from it. The Act has helped, along with many charities working in the field, to raise awareness of autism. It is a positive thing that that has happened. It has created a significant increase in demand: a doubling of the number of referrals. As I said in my original answer, there has been an increase from 1,500 to nearly 3,000 this year. Obviously, that puts an understandable pressure and strain on the resources that I have at my disposal.

I accept the point about early diagnosis. Just because an ultimate diagnosis has not happened, that does not mean that there are not supports or interventions — quite the opposite. There are interventions that take place prior to ultimate diagnosis. There is much work from community paediatrics, speech and language therapy, occupational therapy, social services and educational psychology as appropriate as an intervention, even in advance of diagnosis. We are working hard to reduce the impact of the long waits by looking and reviewing autism assessment processes, which is quite a long and extensive process. We are looking at what we can do to streamline that as much as possible while still having a high quality of diagnosis. We are also looking at standardising autism service models across all trusts and extending service capacity through the greater integration and alignment of autism services with other child development and young people's mental health services. It is not that we have sat back and done nothing; it is not even as if, before diagnosis, nothing happens with interventions. More could be done, but to deliver more we need more resources. The Member knows full well the pressure on resources in the Department. I hope that he will also appreciate and understand that the £9.5 million a month being lost through welfare reform penalties because of the failure of his party and others to live up to their commitments on welfare reform is costing —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member's time is up.

Mr Hamilton: The Member rolls his eyes, but it is a serious issue. We cannot afford to lose that amount of money that could be going to the front line.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask Members to check that their mobile devices are off and not causing interference.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for his answer so far. Will the Minister outline how the numbers of assessments provided and the numbers of diagnoses of autism made have changed in recent years?

Mr Hamilton: The Bill became an Act in 2011. Since just before that, as I mentioned to Mr Bradley, the number of referrals of children and young people for assessment has nearly doubled from around 1,500 to close to 3,000 this year, but resources have not increased at a commensurate rate. We need to invest more. I accept the point that Members have made: we absolutely need to invest more in getting staff into the front line. We estimate that around 20 to 23 whole-time equivalent clinical staff are required.

The cost of doing that would be around £1 million of additional expenditure, so, when Members opposite roll their eyes about raising issues around welfare reform and the loss of £9.5 million every month, they should consider that £1 million out of that £9.5 million that is lost in one month would cover the increased costs. People take their positions on opposing welfare reform, but I hope that we can resolve those issues over the next number of days. That will, I hope, free up more resources to go into the front line to deal with waiting lists and other problems. There are consequences of taking the ideological position that some have taken in respect of welfare reform and not living up to the commitments that they made last year: we can see that in autism services, in waiting lists and elsewhere.

Mr McCarthy: The Minister will be aware of the old saying “prevention is better than cure”. The figures that the Minister has given us for youngsters being diagnosed with autism, which we know to be fact, are absolutely staggering. Will the Minister advise the House whether proper investment is going to scientists and universities etc to try to establish the cause? The numbers are staggering, and it is going from bad to worse as the years go on.

Mr Hamilton: I do not have the expertise to delve into why there has been a doubling in a very short period. It is a six-year period; it is not a lengthy period. It is a very, very short period, during which we have had a doubling in referrals. Perhaps, the fact that there is increased awareness of the existence of autism is one of the contributing factors; I think that that is fair to say. I am free enough to say that there is, obviously, support and work going on in research. The extent to which my Department contributes to, funds or supports that, I cannot say, but I am happy to write to the Member and inform him of what support we are involved in. I know that we will be supporting in various ways through trusts, the PHA and others and in helping autism charities across Northern Ireland. He and I will know of some that operate in our constituency. I am sure that that is replicated around Northern Ireland. I am sure that support is going to those from the health and social care sector, but I will inform the Member of the extent to which that is happening.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister ensure that all the partners in the autism plan will commit to playing their role in addressing autism?

Mr Hamilton: As I said in my original response, all Departments have bought into the strategy and action plan. I know that officials from my Department have been working closely with officials from the Department of Education because of the direct read-across of children and young people who are at school and the impact on their education. I know that work is going on at a practical level, as well as agreement on the strategy and action plan. Following the passage of the Act in 2011, good cross-departmental work has been going on in respect of autism.

Lifeline

3. Ms McGahan asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline any discussions he has with Contact NI and Lifeline staff regarding the proposed changes to the Lifeline service. (AQO 9086/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I have not held any discussions with the current provider of the service. The Public Health Agency commissions Lifeline and is undertaking the consultation process on the new service model. The agency participated in a Contact NI staff workshop on 10 October to outline the proposals and offered to attend a second workshop, which was subsequently cancelled by Contact NI. Contact NI staff have attended a number of the public consultation workshops organised by the Public Health Agency and have expressed their views at those events.

The proposed model retains the core elements of the existing service, namely the free-to-call crisis telephone helpline, which will be accessible 24 hours a day; qualified helpline operatives who are skilled in talking to people in crisis and have professional skills in listening and in assessing suicide risk; the ability to direct callers to the most appropriate service for their needs; and, finally, follow-on support from locally based suicide prevention organisations, enhanced with complementary therapies and local face-to-face immediate support.

For callers at high risk, helpline staff would directly arrange further care through to emergency mental health services.

By splitting the management of immediate helpline support from follow-up support, the proposals avoid a potential perverse incentive, whereby the helpline provider would potentially gain financially from referring a client to follow-up support that it also delivers. That does not imply in any way that Contact NI has sought financial gain in that manner.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response. Will he give serious consideration to an extension to the Lifeline contract to allow for further consultation on the future of its services?

Mr Hamilton: There have actually been three offers made of an extension to the existing contract. Two offers were turned down. As the Member may know, the contract expires on 31 December. I am glad to say that the third offer of a contract extension, until the end of September 2016, has been agreed. Obviously, that allows for continuity of service while we move to a new model of service delivery.

Mr Lyons: Further to the Minister’s answer, can he confirm that a Lifeline service will continue and that this is about the way in which it is delivered and the organisations that deliver it?

Mr Hamilton: Yes, I can. Again, the nature of the campaign and the way in which it was styled was about protecting Lifeline. I want to make it absolutely clear — I have done so previously in the House and will do so again now — that the Lifeline service and brand will remain. As the Member said in his question, this is entirely about getting the best possible service moving forward, getting it better integrated with other emergency services right across the system and extending it out much more into the whole of Northern Ireland, particularly rural areas. As I mentioned, there is an important governance point about the possible perverse incentive that exists. On a governance basis, I do not think that that can be allowed to continue to be the case. The PHA is right to consider that. Let no one be under any illusion here: this is not about doing away with a Lifeline service. This is about how that service might operate and who might operate it. It is not about doing away with Lifeline and the important work that needs to be done to provide that service for people who are contemplating suicide.

Mrs Overend: Does the Minister accept that the Lifeline service plays a truly invaluable role in every corner of Northern Ireland and that allegations or insinuations of its being a Belfast-centric service are truly inaccurate?

Mr Hamilton: Given that the Member represents a rural constituency, I would think that the issue of rurality is something that she is concerned about and interested in. Allegations have certainly been put to me about whether it serves the whole of Northern Ireland as well as it perhaps does some bits of it. If it is a criticism that has been put to me, I think that that is well worth examining, because, as the Member will know, there are sometimes, particularly in rural communities, hidden mental health problems. There can be suicides. In my constituency, I know of members of the farming community taking their own life. We should seek to do the best that we can to ensure that services such as Lifeline are spread right across Northern Ireland. That is certainly what I want to see as an outcome of the process. It is certainly something that I will be carefully keeping an eye on as any final recommendation comes to me to sign off on as Minister. Again, this is about getting the best possible service for people in Northern Ireland. It is about protecting what is best and also improving the service that can be delivered.

Waiting Lists

4. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline the plans that he has to address the pressures on waiting lists. (AQO 9087/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I have indicated consistently over the past weeks and months that immediate pressures surrounding waiting lists and our emergency departments can be resolved only with the injection of funding as quickly as possible.

The Health and Social Care Board and trusts are already putting in place plans should additional funding become available, and that will, of course, be focused on patients with the greatest clinical need. However, even with additional funding, there are limits to what the system can deliver before the end of the year.

For the longer term, I have asked the board to examine how we can deal with demand and stabilise waiting times to put them on a more sustainable footing over the next few years. That elective care work will set out what areas need to be stabilised, how and when that can be achieved, and what it will cost to get performance back to the nine, nine and 13-week positions that the health service previously achieved. I expect to receive the conclusions of that work soon.

3.15 pm

Of course, it is a great frustration to me that we have wasted close to £200 million of taxpayers' money during the last three years in penalties because of the continued failure to implement welfare reform. That has affected thousands of vulnerable people who have not been able to obtain the operations that they desperately need. Every month, we are losing £9.5 million, which could pay for over 1,800 hip operations or 2,100 knee operations.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to topical questions.

Daisy Hill Hospital: Emergency Department

T1. Ms Fearon asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to do all in his power to protect the Daisy Hill Hospital emergency department (ED), given that she cannot underestimate the importance of a fully functioning, 24/7 ED, particularly for rural communities such as hers. (AQT 3131/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I am aware of the issue that the Member raises. I have spoken to her colleague Mr Murphy about this. I have no desire to see emergency services reduced at Daisy Hill Hospital but, as the Member will appreciate, my priority will always be to try to ensure the highest possible levels of quality and safety in our health and social care services.

I know, and the Member will appreciate, that there have been issues around recruitment and retention in the emergency department at Daisy Hill Hospital. The trust has undertaken work to alleviate that, but the hospital has been dealt a further blow by the decision of a member of staff to leave early next year. I know that Members who represent that area, or the area that is covered by Daisy Hill Hospital, were informed of that last week.

The letter that went to Members of this House and, perhaps, MPs as well, was right to point out that, in raising this issue, we are right to be concerned. The letter said:

"While we appreciate the concerns of the local community, we would worry that further speculation over the future of the emergency department will significantly hinder our ability to attract medical staff to help the situation."

The Member appreciates that point and she is right to raise it today, but it is unfortunate that others ran to the press within 24 hours, creating additional problems and doing exactly what they were advised not to do. If we are to resolve the issue around recruiting and retaining staff at Daisy Hill Hospital, which I want to do, as does the Member and, I am sure, everybody who represents the area and lives there, it is not helped by scaremongering by some in the press. We should all be trying to collectively work together to address the issues and work with the trust, the board and others to alleviate the problems.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. This is especially important, given the completely inadequate Ambulance Service cover that there has been in south Armagh. Recently, the south Armagh first responders were set up as a community innovation to tackle the problem, but the Health Minister needs to bring his own innovation to recruitment, and new and fresh —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Can we have a question, please?

Ms Fearon: I am getting there. To date, his predecessors have failed to tackle the recruitment problem that has been bubbling up in the health service.

Mr Hamilton: It predates my time — both my immediate predecessors are in the House — but work was done to address the overall problems that emergency departments are having with recruitment. It is a very difficult area to work in. We all appreciate and understand that, and it can be challenging to recruit sufficient numbers.

I met representatives of the Royal College of Emergency Medicine last week to discuss not specifically the issue at Daisy Hill Hospital but a range of issues. They welcomed the efforts that had been put in over the last number of years to attract more staff to emergency medicine. They did not, by any means, conclude that we were out of the woods or that we had solved all the problems. There were still issues, but I am sure that they would agree that the most important thing is to serve all our people, wherever they are, whether in Newry or Newtownards, and that they have the highest standard of care and safety of care. I would be irresponsible in my job and would be going against my duty if staff were coming to me and saying that there were issues with patient safety and I did not act on that.

There are issues and challenges at Daisy Hill Hospital, and I am aware of them. I look to the trusts to work at resolving those issues and I am happy to make my own suggestions if I have them. Indeed, I am prepared to listen to others who come forward with suggestions. If the Member or anybody in the House has ideas or suggestions about how we might resolve the issues at Daisy Hill Hospital, I am happy to listen to them.

Donaldson Report: Recommendations

T2. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether he has had any discussions with Sir Liam Donaldson about the recommendations in his report. (AQT 3132/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I met Sir Liam Donaldson at a conference that he was in Belfast to speak at last Thursday. It was organised by the Faculty of Medical Leadership and Management. He spoke in the morning and I spoke in the afternoon, and I had an opportunity in between to have a brief conversation with him. I began by welcoming his positive response to the reforms that I put forward in my speech in Ballymena almost a fortnight ago.

Obviously, he gave some comment to the media as well, about which I responded to Mr McGimpsey. I think that Sir Liam has been incredibly positive in his response. The report he produced was very useful, and, whilst I do not think that all of us will have agreed 100% with everything he suggested in it, I welcome the fact that he has acknowledged that the spirit of what he was putting forward has been agreed and taken forward in the proposals that I made. I have had a useful conversation with him, and I have welcomed the comments he made. I am sure that, given the work he has done here and the interest he has, he will continue to take a keen interest in Northern Ireland, particularly in how we roll out the reforms that I have put forward.

Mr I McCrea: Given the reforms that the Minister has put forward, many of which will no doubt bring financial benefits to the health service, can he outline how he sees the speed of this process and how we can get and feel some real change as quickly as possible?

Mr Hamilton: I know that urgent change is required in our health and social care system because of the extent of the looming challenges that we face in health and social care. We know and have discussed at length today the financial pressures that our budget and, indeed, all budgets in this place are under. Coupled with that, in health, we have a growing and an ageing population, which presents a series of challenges. We have a ticking time bomb of unhealthy lifestyles, and even good things like medical and technological advances are putting additional pressures on costs and increasing demand. I know that urgent action is required.

I put out a road map of reform in the speech I made on getting rid of unnecessary bureaucracy in our system and seeking to configure our hospital services in the most appropriate way to deal with those challenges and give the beneficial outcome of world-class health and social care system to people in Northern Ireland. That is not easy to do. It takes time. I wish that I could make it happen overnight, but I cannot do that. I do not have the magic ability to do that. If I could, I would, and I will not take a minute longer to do it than is necessary.

We need to be mindful that there are processes that we need to go through in closing down organisations in the public sector, but, as I said previously, I will make sure that whatever can be done without the need for legislation will be done and will be implemented as quickly as possible. The work on the panel's recommendations will take longer, and that is why I have said that that might take half a decade or even up to 10 years. That is work that is very much long term, but, even though it is long term, we cannot lose sight of the need to do it.

Air Ambulance: Update

T3. Mr Girvan asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the air ambulance service that he announced to the House a few weeks ago. (AQT 3133/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: In September, I was very glad to announce my commitment to introducing an air ambulance service for Northern Ireland. I think that that announcement has been very well received across Northern Ireland. I committed to carrying out a consultation. I hope to be in a position this week to launch that consultation and that it will look at a range of important issues on which it is pivotal that we come to a conclusion in respect of an air ambulance. Those issues include where it might be based, how it might be funded and to what level it should be staffed with clinical involvement. There is a range of serious issues beyond the basic commitment to do it that need to be ironed out, and I hope that a consultation can do that.

I encourage everyone with an interest in this to contribute to the consultation, and I am sure that there will be a range of very different views around what it might be. The important thing is that we realise the vision set out by Dr John Hinds and, indeed, by many of his colleagues that Northern Ireland can sustain an air ambulance service and, indeed, that it needs one.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister for his answer, and I appreciate the positive approach that is being taken to this matter. All politics being local, I am putting forward a good suggestion that the international airport, which is located in my constituency, is the ideal location for such a service. Does the Minister consider that to be possible?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Hamilton: There seems to be common accord for that suggestion, even from Members from other constituencies around the Chamber. I want to leave it to the consultation to look at issues such as where it might be located. I do not want to make a commitment here or there today. I might be tempted to say Newtownards airport, actually. I think that it is incredibly important that, in taking forward such a serious thing which will benefit people in Northern Ireland in the years ahead, we get it right in terms of how it is funded, how it is operated clinically and where it is located. I do not want to prejudge the consultation. I acknowledge that there are certain advantages with Aldergrove, given the collocation with the Police Service of Northern Ireland, which has a series of helicopters there. I am not sure of the exact number, but I know that there is a handful. There are certain advantages there — good geographical advantages, as well — but I certainly do not want to rule out anywhere. There may be other considerations as to the total geographical area that a helicopter emergency medical service might cover. Certainly, your bid for Aldergrove has been heard loudly and clearly.

Mater Hospital: Consultants

T4. Mr F McCann asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what he is doing to address the shortage of consultants in the Mater Hospital. (AQT 3134/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I thought that this issue might come up today because it has obviously developed over the last number of days, so it is the very definition of a topical question. Much as Ms Fearon raised concerns about consultant cover at Daisy Hill, similar issues have arisen in the emergency department at the Mater Hospital. As I said to her, my job — indeed, this goes for anybody who holds this post — should be, I believe, to ensure the highest possible levels of quality and safety in our health and social care services.

The Belfast Health and Social Care Trust advised my Department last week of service difficulties at the Mater Hospital emergency department. As a precautionary measure, in response to concerns raised by senior medical staff about medical cover in the evening and overnight and the management of paediatric patients, the Belfast Trust has instigated short-term measures to ensure that safe, effective arrangements are in place outside normal working hours and to ensure that children needing emergency treatment get that treatment in the most appropriate place.

Belfast Trust emergency departments are managed as a full, joined-up service, and this precautionary measure was implemented on a coordinated basis to ensure continuity of service in Belfast. Overnight ambulance divers from the Mater are expected to remain in place as a temporary measure. Children will be redirected to the nearby Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, which has a dedicated paediatric emergency department, while the Belfast Trust seeks to resolve the concerns identified and recruit senior medical staff. I made the point to Ms Fearon that, if clinicians come to me and my Department and say that a service being run in the short or longer term is unsafe, I have a duty to listen to them and to act.

Mr F McCann: I thank the Minister for his answer. I accept and appreciate that there are many difficulties in this, but can he assure us that he will do all within his power to try to ensure that consultancy posts are filled to meet the demand in the Mater Hospital?

Mr Hamilton: Absolutely. I am certainly committed to doing that and to ensuring that the highest quality of care and safety of care can be carried out in the Mater, Daisy Hill or wherever. I am certainly committed to doing that. He should acknowledge, as I am sure he does, the challenges with recruitment. There is much competition inside Northern Ireland, never mind outside it. I will certainly do my best.

As I mentioned before, I had a conversation last week with the Royal College of Emergency Medicine, which has acknowledged — I hope that I can speak for it — the good work that has been done by my predecessors in trying to recruit more people to emergency medicine. Certainly, it warned me that there is a risk that some of the things that we talked about today around Daisy Hill and the Mater Hospital may happen, and we need to do our very best to ensure that they do not happen. I have tried to put in place the appropriate resources, particularly in terms of staff. I will certainly make a commitment to do all that I can to ensure that the issue in the Mater Hospital is resolved in the short term and is made sustainable in the longer term.

Slieve Roe House, Kilkeel: Update

T5. Mr Wells asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the Southern Trust's consultation on the future of Slieve Roe House in Kilkeel, given that he will be aware of the concerns. (AQT 3135/11-16)

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his question. I know that Slieve Roe House in Kilkeel is an issue that he has a deep and long-standing interest in. As he will know, the recommendation from the trust, which went out to consultation, was that Slieve Roe should close. However, the board recognises that there are limited alternative options available in the Mourne and Kilkeel area, and it has agreed to reopen it to admissions until alternative options, in particular the proposed 12-unit supported living facility, become available in the spring of 2017. Those proposals have gone to the board, and they will come to me as Minister to ultimately sign off on. I will consider a range of factors before making my final decision.

It is worth re-emphasising, if I may, his commitment and that of Minister Poots when he was in post, and which I have reiterated: if a final decision is taken for closure, no resident in any of the homes that are earmarked for closure will be moved if they do not wish to move.

Human Transplantation Bill: Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Human Transplantation Bill [NIA 64/11-16] be agreed. — [Mrs Dobson.]

Mr Dickson: First, I thank Mrs Dobson for bringing the Bill to the House today and for the tremendous work that she has done in preparation for what is a very difficult and emotional subject for her personally, and which is also of great importance to many people who have had to face the trauma of a transplant or, indeed, make the decision with a loved one that donation is the appropriate thing that they wish to do when death occurs or, as is the situation now, where many people will make live donations for kidney transplants.

I want to be very brief and say a few things about this issue. The Alliance Party is supportive of the Bill. We will listen in detail to the work done in the Committee and follow its progress with interest, but, in broad principle terms, we are very supportive of the Bill as proposed. I will refer to a number of personal experiences that have taken me to the conclusion that this Bill is of benefit and should be encouraged.

Over 20 years ago, I remember two young men from my constituency who, coincidentally, knew each other through youth activities and the Boys' Brigade, one from Carrickfergus and one from Greenisland. They were two very early recipients of heart transplants at Harefield Hospital. Sadly, in time, both of them died, but both were brave in the operation that they faced and both had an extension to their lives that would not have been granted to them had their illnesses continued. I have no doubt that, as their families look back on what they did at that time, they will realise that they made an immense contribution not only to their lives but to medical science and to the team that was working at Harefield Hospital.

I also want to refer to a friend who has now received the second kidney transplant of his lifetime and to attest to the life-giving powers that that has brought to someone who is in their working years; is fit and able to return to work and to make a contribution to this society and community, and is able to be a taxpayer and not a burden on our health service as he is fully fit and able to make a contribution.

I encourage anyone who today wishes to be an organ donor to give serious consideration to that. I carry a donor card with me. I have given consent on my driving licence application form just in case anybody is not sure what the card in my wallet is for or it cannot be found, and I have told my family and friends that I wish to consent to donation after my death, if that is appropriate. As Mrs Dobson pointed out, there are many circumstances where, sadly, it is not appropriate. A small number of people can become donors. For those who actively do not wish to be donors, I believe that the soft opt-out is the right approach. No one will be forced into making a donation. Family members should not feel under pressure. It should be a decision made at a particular time and one that the donor should hopefully have given consideration to, but, nevertheless, families and close relatives will have a final say.

I am delighted to support Mrs Dobson in the work that she has done and in the research that she has undertaken, which has been meticulous. She has consulted widely, and the consultation has, I think, delivered a very clear message to the Assembly. I have no doubt that the Welsh model, which is one that is proposed, carries a great deal of merit. I encourage the House to unite today in support of the motion.

Mr Middleton: I, too, welcome the opportunity to speak on the Human Transplantation Bill this afternoon. Around the world, organ donation policies vary greatly. There are arguments for and against whether an opt-in donation system, like the one we currently have, or an opt-out system, which exists in other countries, is better. With the current opt-in system, people have to actively sign the organ donation register to donate their organs after death, and, of course, with the opt-out system, organ donation will occur automatically unless a specific request is made before death for organs not to be taken. Whilst I have no doubt that there are positives and negatives with both systems, the fact that both are reliant on active decisions from individuals can lead to drawbacks. Inaction in an opt-in system can lead to individuals who want to donate their organs not donating. In contrast, the inaction in an opt-out system can potentially lead to an individual who does not want to donate becoming a donor. There are numerous reasons why people may not act, whether it be through lack of awareness, because of loss aversion or because of a belief that the policymakers have got it right and that there is no need to do anything.

Whilst I have opted in for organ donation by signing the register, it is only when I hear the personal stories of those who are waiting for an organ transplant or those who have received an organ that it truly hits home how life-changing and life-saving the decision is. One such story that I wish to touch on today is that of Andrew Duncan. At the age of 23, Andrew was diagnosed with a hereditary condition called dilated cardiomyopathy. Andrew lived in the Waterside area of the Foyle constituency, in which I reside, with his wife and two children. He had been on the waiting list for a heart transplant since 2011. Andrew was a strong advocate in principle for the new legislation on the opt-out system for organ donation in Northern Ireland. Even though he suffered from a heart condition that made it difficult for him to walk, last February, he carried out a sponsored walk to raise awareness and to raise money for the British Heart Foundation.

He made a poignant video for the British Heart Foundation, appealing for people to consider donating their organs. I encourage anybody who has not yet signed the register to watch Andy's video. Sadly, one year ago to this very day, Andrew's time ran out, and he lost his fight for life. My sympathies today go to his wife, family and friends. There is no doubt that many others out there have lost loved ones.

As we debate the Bill, it is impossible to ignore the personal stories and those who have been directly affected by organ failure and are reliant on organ donation, just like Andrew. Although it is important to listen to personal stories, we should not let emotion dictate the legislation.

With nine out of 10 people in the UK saying that they support organ donation, and only three out of 10 having signed the organ donation register, more needs to be done. I support the elements of the Bill that ensure that the Department of Health further promote transplantation, in particular that it carry out a public campaign at least once a year.

However, a report on organ donation systems by Professor Eamonn Ferguson of the University of Nottingham, noted that countries that used opt-out consent still experienced organ donor shortages. Completely changing the system of consent was therefore unlikely to solve such a problem. The report suggested that consent legislation or adopting aspects of the Spanish model could be ways of improving donor rates.

Spain currently has the highest organ donation rate in the world. The Spanish utilise opt-out consent, but their success is accredited by experts to measures such as a transplant coordination network that works locally and nationally and improving the quality of public information available about organ donation.

More thorough research is needed on the use of the opt-out system, particularly the soft opt-out system that is going through in Wales, which we hope to relate to closely when looking at the Bill. I expect that we will be able to learn from Wales's experience and use it to carefully consider the future of organ donation in Northern Ireland. It is vital that we hear further on this very important matter from clinicians and health professionals.

As was made clear from the consultation on the Bill, it is vital that safeguards be put in place to protect children and young people, vulnerable adults, those whose identity is unknown and those who are not normally resident in Northern Ireland. The report 'The potential impact of an opt out system for organ donation in the UK' stated that data protection and privacy were of concern to many individuals. Assurances need to be in place for members of the public who feel concerned about the security of key pieces of personal information.

The report also stated:

"An opt out system has the potential to erode the trust between clinicians and families at a distressing time. The concept of a gift freely given is an important one to both donor families and transplant recipients. The Taskforce feels that an opt out system of consent has the potential to undermine this concept."

Although there are many concerns about the opt-out system, if we can get it to Committee Stage, that will give the Health Committee an opportunity to delve deeper into and scrutinise the Bill and to hear more evidence.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an deis labhairt ar an rún thar a bheith tábhachtach seo inniu. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important Bill.

I acknowledge the good work done by Jo-Anne Dobson in bringing about the Bill. It has been comprehensive, with lots and lots of hard, in-depth work, and it has raised awareness of the subject. It is an emotive subject, as we have heard from most Members. That is naturally so, because it involves lives, and lives are being lost because we do not have enough organ donors.

We have the opt-in system that allows people to opt in to be an organ donor. The soft opt-out way that is proposed is the right way to go, as it will allow for more opportunities for organ donation for people in difficult circumstances.

The circumstances for everyone involved are extremely difficult.

3.45 pm

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. I have heard from a number of Members that moving to a system of opt-out will produce more organs available for transplant. Will the Member tell us where she gets the evidence for that? The evidence from around the world is incredibly sketchy and there are many areas that operate systems of opt-out which produce a much lower level of organ donation than we have in the UK or Northern Ireland.

Ms McCorley: I thank the Member for his intervention. He has made it quite a few times today and it has been responded to. Jo-Anne Dobson made a good response to it, so I am not going to add anything further. I believe that more lives will be saved and prolonged if we adopt a new soft opt-out system.

As I was saying, it is an emotive and painful issue. It comes at a time in people's lives when hard decisions are made very difficult. We must try to make the circumstances easier for people to deal with. There are no more compelling arguments than the stories that we have heard today. At Committee, we also heard from people who have had real-life experience of organ donation, what it has meant for them and how it has made such a difference to their lives. I acknowledge the difficulties and the fact that lots of different views pertain on the subject. We will work through all the difficulties, hopefully, if the Bill proceeds to Committee Stage.

On average, 15 people die while on the waiting list; that statistic was referred to earlier. We need to bear in mind that, maybe, that does not need to happen. As I said, given the opportunity, we will reflect very carefully on the implications of the Bill, and I hope that Members of the Assembly see fit to give it full support.

Before I finish, I will make one last point. It is important that we take responsibility for having conversations with our families and friends so that people know our wishes. The more we can do that and the more we can discuss the subject, the easier it will be in times when difficult circumstances arise.

Mrs Cameron: I rise as a member of the Health Committee and as someone whose name is on the organ donor register. I would like to pay tribute to Mrs Dobson for her work in raising the profile of this important issue and for ensuring that there has been considerable public attention and media coverage, which can only raise awareness further. That is to be welcomed.

Before I turn to specific aspects of the Bill, I would like to make some general remarks on the subject of organ donation. Although I have not had the personal experience of the Member, I am equally as passionate about the subject and believe that it is critical to raise awareness and provide the public with as much information and support as possible. There are some truly amazing stories — we heard some today — of lives saved thanks to the generosity of individuals who made the decision to donate their organs. It is also amazing to see that the families of those tragically left behind after the death of a family member are able to gain at least some comfort from the fact that other lives have been saved or improved as a result of organs donated by their loved one.

For all the stories of courage, love and human kindness, organ donation remains an area that still has enough issues around it to merit further debate and action. I am pleased that this debate brings that opportunity to the House and to take part in it. I spent a number of hours at Committee evidence sessions and took further time over the weekend to read through the draft Bill and its supporting material in more depth. After doing so, I have some questions as I seek further clarification on certain matters. I have real concerns with regard to the Bill, but I will reserve judgement on it until I have heard the full debate.

The main problem that I have with the content of the Bill is that it appears to be a Bill of assumptions. Let me just give one or two examples of what I mean. The Bill assumes that no family member would go against the wishes of any potential donor and offers the use of advocates to ensure that the donor's wishes are adhered to.

I simply do not accept that this can be taken as given. Families will be in turmoil and possibly not even in the right state of mind due to the magnitude of their loss. How can a clinician be expected to oversee the practical outworkings of this? Will families be expelled from the bedside if they do not wish the donation to take place, with only advocates being present when arrangements for donation are being made? It seems unfair to me to place additional burdens on already overworked clinicians.

I give the example of someone who has expressed their wish to donate. They have two advocates in place, neither of whom is the next of kin. The donor has obviously placed their trust in these advocates to back up their wish, and we are assuming that it is for organ donation. The next of kin, however — possibly a husband, wife or partner — is absolutely opposed and devastated at the thought of their loved-one's organs being donated. My question is this: how will clinicians be able to deal with this at the hospital bedside?

The Bill assumes that an annual awareness campaign can be funded and will be pivotal in raising donation figures. Again, much as I think that the idea is sound, we all know that there simply are not the resources available for every awareness campaign that we might want. Even if funding were available for this type of campaign, which, incidentally, I am very supportive of, as it is how we will get more names on the organ donor register and prompt more families to have the conversation, we cannot even be sure that an organ donation campaign would be amongst the top health priorities in Northern Ireland, given the many competing pressures on our health service at any given time.

The Bill assumes that soft opt-out and state ownership of organs will be acceptable to everyone and will become a societal norm. No matter how much I would like there to be no shortage of organs for donation, this just does not sit easily with me, and I daresay that I am not the only one.

Whilst the consultation and the accompanying media coverage have heightened awareness of the issue, it was interesting to note in Committee that, according to the PHA survey, which took evidence from a range of clinicians who are actually involved in the process of organ donation, support for presumed consent was lower amongst them. At the very least, this would be a warning light to me that we need further consultation with the professionals, as opposed to a public consultation on the SurveyMonkey website.

When I look at the time that an individual would have to invest in discussing this with family and in appointing advocates, I wonder why they would not just take a few moments to fill in a donor card, thereby ensuring that their wishes are known in the event of their death. On balance, I have to say that I am not entirely convinced that a Bill is the way forward on such a highly controversial, sensitive, emotional and, for some, distressing subject. I am much more comfortable with the agreed aim of both public and clinicians that more effort be put into raising awareness and encouraging discussions in families.

Finally, Dr Courtney, a transplant doctor at the coalface who accompanied Mrs Dobson to a meeting of the Health Committee in October 2013, expressed the view in response to questions that if the legislation were introduced in the wrong way, it could make things worse. I will leave it at that. Thank you.

Mr Ramsey: I am delighted to be able to talk in the debate today. I declare my membership of the all-party group on organ donation.

I have watched with interest over the years the political role that Jo-Anne Dobson has played in, and the passion that she has had for, elevating and promoting organ donation. Clearly, she has a huge personal interest in it. I have also noticed the compassion of a mother coming through, as she has tried to ensure that other families in a similar position reach the desired outcome of a transplant that can save the life of their loved one.

The SDLP supported what Jo-Anne Dobson is proposing in her Bill in our manifesto. It is an important piece of legislation, and I commend Mrs Dobson for bringing it to the House. I am aware of her hard work, determination and commitment in pushing through this legislation on organ donation.

I have heard other Members talking about it, and I have absolutely no doubt in my mind that this Bill will change lives. The Bill aims to change organ donation laws, moving from an opt-in to an opt-out system. I am grateful for the safeguards that the Bill will put in place, with appropriate family safeguards, a requirement for express consent in certain cases and the ability for people to nominate advocates to affirm wishes upon their deaths. A key provision set out in clause 2 of the Bill is that transplantation activities are lawful only if there is consent.

I welcome the additional duties in the Bill that will ensure that the Department of Health will actively promote and increase awareness of transplantation. It will also ensure that the Department provides information about transplantation, deemed consent and the role of family and friends.

During the debate, I have been reflecting on the very untimely death, a few months back, of one of my constituents, Lisa Orsi. Lisa was a young student, 22 years of age, who had graduated and was working as a physiotherapist in a hospital in Singapore. She went trekking with a number of her friends and died after taking altitude sickness. I know the family — Dennis, her father and Sharon, her mother — would like me to reflect on their case. On her death, Lisa was awarded an ambassador role by the Singapore Government because of the level of donations she was able to give. Around 50 people got some form of donated organs from Lisa as a result of her untimely death. It was a heartache and a serious trauma for the family, but they took great solace and comfort from, and were proud of, the fact that Lisa was able to give a quality of life back to so many people in Singapore. That is the basis — a very personal basis — that I am coming from: knowing the effect and the desired outcome that it will have, not just in saving lives but clearly, in other cases, in improving the quality of life for many people.

In advance of the Bill being brought forward, a comprehensive consultation process was undertaken — almost 1,300 responses. We cannot ignore that. People can question the validity of this or that aspect of the Bill, but the whole purpose of this Second Stage is to enable it to go to the Committee for effective and appropriate scrutiny. Those Members who have been negative have not just been negative during this debate. I have seen them having the same negativity at the organ donation group meetings, and not being clear on it. I think that there is an opportunity —

Mr Ross: I appreciate the Member giving way. To provide absolute clarity; when the Member talks about “negativity”, that negativity is not about organ donation. I do not think that I have heard anybody say that they have any problem with organ donation. Indeed, the aims of the Bill’s proposer are laudable ones that we all agree with. The difficulty is around the method used to arrive at that solution. There are genuine concerns around the issue of consent. I think it important to point out that, when the Member talks about negativity, we are not talking about negativity around organ donation; it is about the way in which we deliver the outcome that everybody wants to see.

Mr Ramsey: I did not identify you as being negative, but you have certainly been very challenging. Those challenges can play a part in the process during the Committee’s scrutiny of the Bill in those areas of evidence. Let the Committee scrutinise; let it find out where there is evidence and where there is lack of evidence. The important thing is that there is a Bill here that people want to amend. If people want to look at different areas, then let us hear their ideas.

We have heard that 83% of the respondents that took part in that consultation were supportive. That is a big majority of that figure of 1,300 people. The Member is still shaking his head. I hope, Alastair, that —

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way on the consultation. That consultation, which Members have also seen, is from the PHA. That consultation is, I think, much more in line with other consultations around the United Kingdom around presumed or deemed consent laws, which indicated that the population is much more evenly split: around 50%. What is interesting in the PHA document that Members have had sight of, and hopefully, particularly Health Committee members have had sight of, is that it shows that the more that people learn about the system of deemed consent, the less likely they are to support it.

Is he not concerned about that, and does he not recognise the PHA consultation as opposed to the consultation carried out by Mrs Dobson?

4.00 pm

Mr Ramsey: The Member has certainly been very articulate about his reasons. He has justifiable reasons, some of them, may I add, very fundamental. I do not accept that —

Mr McGimpsey: Will the Member take a point of information?

Mr Ramsey: Yes.

Mr McGimpsey: I thank Mr Ramsey. As I understand it, the PHA consultation had a 61% approval; it was not 50:50.

Mr Ramsey: I say to the Member again that there is an opportunity for DUP members of the Health Committee to pose questions and to challenge. If they have concerns, they can raise those concerns. Like other Members, I would like to see an opportunity for the Bill, and I believe that it is a good Bill. As Jo-Anne Dobson outlined very clearly and admirably, it will save lives. The Member persists in shaking his head, but anyway.

For many families, it is difficult to discuss an untimely death, even with those who are very close to it. I referred to Sharon and Dennis Orsi: they took pride, at their daughter's death, in the fact that she was able to invigorate and give life back to so many people in Singapore. I see the same happening here if the Bill progresses. The increased awareness and discussion coming out of this is very helpful, as it will encourage and stimulate debate among the medical fraternity and clinicians. Alastair, you have been in some of the meetings where we had senior clinicians voicing their clear support in Northern Ireland for the Bill.

The family safeguards in the Bill will ensure that families are more involved in organ transplantation, unless the person himself or herself has expressly chosen to opt out. Locally, under the current system, 30% of the population are registered, despite the fact that UK-wide surveys have shown that 90% of individuals are willing to donate organs. At the end of September this year, there were 162 patients in Northern Ireland on the transplant list. I hope that, if the Bill passes, the number of transplants will seriously increase, as Jo-Anne Dobson outlined, and I have no doubt that it will. Lives will be saved.

I will take personal and political pleasure in supporting the Bill's passage to the Committee. I say to Members across the way that they should give it a chance. Nothing will happen. It will go through Committee, and there may be areas of it that the DUP wants to amend or feels should be changed. Have any of you met Jo-Anne Dobson to personally go through it to see what areas, doubts or concerns there are? That is the challenge. I encourage you to talk to Jo-Anne Dobson and her advisers, get an insight into where she is coming from, and maybe we can progress things a lot better. I certainly support the Bill.

Mr McKay: I support the principles of the Bill and support its passage to Committee Stage, because it is about saving lives. The Welsh Assembly realised that: their Health Minister said, quite simply, that it would give hope to people on the register. This is a soft opt-out system. We do not want to see a system that in any way adds to a family's grief, but paramount is the need to offer hope to those people and to protect a person's wish to donate.

At present, there are over 650,000 people on the organ donation register, but, as Mr Donald Cairnduff told the Committee, many of them have not told their loved ones or their families. In many cases, they do not wish to have that conversation and would feel uncomfortable doing so, so we need to see a culture change as well. Where it has been introduced in other countries, culture change has soon followed.

The Committee discussed scenarios such as where a next of kin opposed donation, even against the deceased's wishes. In such cases, it is important that the wishes of the donor are protected.

With the introduction of the system in Wales, people have a better chance. If we have a soft opt-out here, people will have a better chance. Those in need of a successful transplant need to be given a better chance of life: in essence, that is what we are talking about. By passing the Bill, without or without amendments, we can give people a better chance of life.

The way that I see it, the Bill is one of the most important Bills in the lifetime of this Assembly. That is the magnitude of what we are talking about. I congratulate the sponsor of the Bill for bringing it forward. She has obviously invested a lot of time and effort, and, as someone who has brought forward two private Member's Bills, I can certainly understand the frustration when a Bill is killed off at Second Stage without getting a fair hearing. In that context, supporting the Bill is simply the right thing to do. The evidence is overwhelming. On the whole, when variables are accounted for, countries with a soft opt-out have 30% higher donation rates than those that are described as informed consent countries. The Westminster Government commissioned research by the York group. It concluded that the available evidence suggested that presumed consent was associated with increased organ donation rates, even when other factors were accounted for.

It is a simple decision for me. We are debating the broad principles of the Bill, and Members are in agreement with those broad principles. They may want to make amendments at a later stage, but they should not try to kill the Bill at this stage without giving the opportunity for it to be discussed at Committee Stage. I reiterate: lives are at stake. Members will have an opportunity, if they want, to vote the Bill down at Final Stage, but, at this stage, the proper and mature thing to do is to allow it to proceed to Committee Stage, so that we can look at the issues and concerns that all Members and some parties may have with the Bill.

As far as I am concerned, the evidence that I have seen shows that the Bill will save lives. The introduction of a soft opt-out system has saved lives in other countries. I believe that it is a no-brainer and should be supported by Members. I look forward to Committee Stage. We need to look at experiences elsewhere. We need to look at the Welsh experience, given that they have just come through the introduction of legislation. Given the size of Wales in comparison with this part of Ireland, it is only proper that we look at the Welsh experience, and then we can look at amendments. At this stage, we are only discussing the principles of the Bill. Given its importance to people who are worried about their lives, it is a simple decision to support the Bill at Second Stage.

Mr Ross: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. The Bill has been a long time coming. We have had debates over the last number of years about its general themes. I have expressed my concerns about it, and I still have the same concerns. Whilst I remain of the view that legislating in the area is unnecessary and potentially counterproductive, I, of course, recognise that getting legislation to the Floor is, in itself, no easy task. Therefore, I genuinely congratulate Mrs Dobson on all her efforts over the last number of years to raise public awareness of organ donation.

The truth is that, until four or five years ago, many people in Northern Ireland probably did not think about organ donation, let alone have a conversation with their loved ones or families about their wishes for when they died. I listened to the opening arguments from Mrs Dobson, and it was clear that, as a mother and a campaigner, she is incredibly passionate about organ donation. She made a powerful emotional argument about why, in her view, the Bill should be passed.

I heard other Members give equally powerful and emotional testimonies from their own constituency and about people in their constituency who have benefited from organ donation. I have spoken to many families who have had loved ones sadly pass away but were able to save up to six or seven other lives because of the fact that they were organ donors. It is hard not to recognise the powerful nature of those arguments.

However, I gently remind and appeal to the House that, as well as being mothers or fathers, brothers or sisters and sons or daughters, we are legislators. It is our job to look at legislative proposals and scrutinise them in depth. We must look at evidence from elsewhere in the world and not get carried away with the emotional argument, because it is important that we fulfil our role as legislators.

I am also quite sure that the amount of media attention around the proposals in the Bill will have prompted people to have the conversations that I mentioned and let their loved ones know what their wishes are. I think that it is something with which everyone in the House and outside it with an interest in organ donation will agree on: that the most important thing that we can all do is discuss with our family what our wishes are for when we die. If I have learnt one thing over the past number of years from taking a particular interest in this area, it is that what we want in our system is certainty and clarity when it comes to organ donation.

In my view, the only sure way of achieving that clarity and certainty is to make an informed decision during our life and to share that decision with our loved ones. That makes decisions that are ultimately taken by our surviving relatives easier in what are almost always incredibly difficult circumstances. As I have said on many occasions before, and I will say again to the House, one of my real concerns about passing a Bill of this nature is that we will have less rather than more certainty in the system.

Consider a family being called to a trauma unit in a hospital following a tragic accident involving a loved one. It could be a family that have never discussed organ donation and have no idea about the wishes of their loved ones. Under the Bill, that individual would be considered in law a willing organ donor, even when he or she has not been asked or never considered the issue.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Go on.

Mr Wells: The Member is making valid points, but is he telling me that he is going to vote against the Bill moving into Committee, where many of his concerns can be addressed and the arguments teased out? Is he advocating that we vote against the principle of the Bill going to Committee or saying, "Take it to Committee and consider the points that I am raising"?

Mr Ross: The Member makes an interesting contribution. Other Members have raised the point about the importance of letting the Bill go to Committee Stage for it to be investigated further. I view the principle of the Bill, and Second Stage is about a Bill's principles. The principle of the Bill is not the importance of organ donation. The principle of the Bill is introducing an opt-out system — a presumed consent system, or a deemed consent system — for Northern Ireland. On that basis, I am opposed to the principle of introducing law to make presumed consent the reality in Northern Ireland. On that basis, yes, I am opposed to supporting the Bill at Second Stage.

I accept that I am very much in the minority. However, that will not stop me advocating my own concerns around the issue. I genuinely hold the belief that Second Stage is about principles, and the principle of the Bill is presumed consent.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. I just remind him that my door remains open, as it has been since I first proposed the Bill. I have corresponded via email, and I am still waiting for the Member to take up the offer to come and meet me. I also remind him that, in a radio interview on Frank Mitchell's show last year or the year before, you reiterated the fact that, if a family affirmation were in the Bill, you would have no concerns about it. What has changed since then?

Mr Ross: That is not my position, and I challenge the Member to find a transcript of any radio interview in which I said that. We did try to have a meeting. As I recall, a number of dates were provided, and none was suitable to the Member to meet. Let me make the point to her, and this is not in any way an attack on Mrs Dobson, but she is intent on introducing a system of presumed consent for organ donation in Northern Ireland. I am absolutely opposed to introducing a system of presumed consent. Therefore, in my view, there is nothing in clause 4 that would be bettered through amendment, because you would be going against the very principle of the Bill.

4.15 pm

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. Where does it say "presumed consent"? It is deemed consent with family affirmation.

Mr Ross: Presumed consent and deemed consent is exactly the same thing. In law, it is exactly the same thing. I listened to the Member and some of her supporters say that the Bill would not have deemed consent or presumed consent. It does have deemed consent, which is presumed consent, and everybody, I think, acknowledges that. Other Members have used that phrase as well.

I will try to make some progress. I support organ donation — hopefully I have articulated those views — and I think everybody does. However, I think that there are ethical and moral issues around this Bill. Moving towards a system of presumed consent will put more pressure on families and medical staff in what are already incredibly difficult circumstances. I do not want a situation where families will feel pressured into allowing donation to proceed in those circumstances. I raised the issue of consent with a number of Members, and how the absence of an objection from the individual concerned can never be considered the same as actual consent, and they have not given me a good answer on that issue.

Just as I commend Mrs Dobson for provoking a public debate on organ donation, some of the media coverage generated around the issue has been incredibly disappointing. Not only is much of it incorrect, ill-informed and sensationalist, but it has not, in my view, provided a balanced coverage for what is, as Members have acknowledged, an extremely sensitive and potentially controversial issue. To quote one example, on 12 February last year, the editor of the 'Belfast Telegraph' wrote:

"To allow even one person to die through needless delay in the passage of this Bill would be an indelible stain on the Executive's legislative record."

It is very difficult to have a rational debate in the circumstances in which those of us who oppose presumed consent or deemed consent are accused of not wanting to save lives or worse — of actively wanting people to die.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I am trying to get to the crux of the objection. He speaks of a moral and an ethical objection. Is it his contention that the evidence suggests that it will not increase organ donation? My analysis of the evidence is that it will. Or is it that he believes that the end does not justify the means — that it will increase donation, but there is a moral argument against doing it?

Mr Ross: I appeal to the Member to be patient, because I will articulate my arguments against the Bill for both reasons; first, because I do not believe that the evidence suggests that it will work; and, secondly, even if it did work, I think that there are real ethical questions around the consent issue. However, I will articulate those in more detail. If the Member wants to make an intervention at that stage, I will be more than happy to allow him to do that.

As I said with regard to some of the public statements on this, I think that no responsible person should call for important legislation of this nature to be rushed through without it being thoroughly scrutinised and considered, because that is, after all, our job. In her opening comments, Mrs Dobson appealed for us to rise above petty political posturing or party politics. She did that after reading out a series of comments from party manifestos. In my view, this is not a political issue; it is a personal issue. I certainly have not stood on any Assembly manifesto supporting presumed consent, and my colleagues in the Assembly have not either.

There are stark differences of opinion and different views on the issue. There are different views within the Democratic Unionist Party, and we have a free vote on the matter. Therefore, I found it particularly odd that people accused me of playing party politics with the issue, when some of my colleagues are very supportive of Mrs Dobson's Bill. In fact, the keenest supporter is Mr Jim Shannon, who is the Member of Parliament for Strangford. Mr Shannon and I have had many arguments over the merits or lack of merits of moving towards the position of presumed consent. This is not a political issue for me. I really despair at times when Members try to raise that issue, because, in my view, it is not a party political issue.

Given that it is a controversial issue, it is perhaps unfortunate that it is being introduced so late in the mandate, when the Health Committee could have a particularly heavy legislative workload. I noted the comments that Mrs Dobson made during the Second Stage debate on the Mental Capacity Bill on 16 June when she recognised the difficulty of introducing legislation so late in the mandate.

She said of that Bill:

"the Bill faces a challenging legislative timescale. As the Chair of the Ad Hoc Committee has already said, the problem with passing it through the House at the latter end of the term is that it will inevitably get caught up in a raft of other Bills, especially after the summer recess. Whilst I think that the Ad Hoc Committee will be able to perform its role, it is regrettable that the Assembly more generally will have less opportunity to examine this important legislation than it would have had if the Bill had been introduced a year or even six months ago." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 105, p382, col 1].

I agree with her. In my view, this Bill is not simple or uncontroversial legislation. I say that not because I want to embarrass Mrs Dobson but because she highlighted an important issue on the complexity and challenging circumstances of the Mental Capacity Bill. Equally, this Bill needs a lot of scrutiny and attention, and I am not sure that towards the end of the mandate we will be in a position to do that.

Mrs Dobson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Certainly.

Mrs Dobson: Maybe the Member can give us an update, following consultation, on the position of his Bill.

Mr Ross: I went out to consult on a different way of boosting organ donation. After consulting medical clinicians, my view is, very simply, that legislation is not required to boost the number of organ donors. Therefore, I did not bring legislation forward. The Member or any other Member should know by this stage that I am not particularly keen on legislating if it is not necessary. Sometimes, we legislate far too much.

I spoke to clinicians and experts on organ donation, and the view was quite clear: they did not feel that legislation was required. If I had reached the position where I felt that legislation was required, the way I was proposing would have been better than presumed consent. However, legislation is not required —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Mr Wells.

Mr Wells: Had the Member pursued his Bill, would he not have felt aggrieved if the House had decided to block it at Second Reading and not allowed the nuances of what he was trying to say to be teased out in Committee? Does he not see that as a fundamental issue? He has concerns — they are well articulated — but he is denying the Health Committee an opportunity to tease out his arguments. If he remains unconvinced, there will be another opportunity at Final Stage to vote against the Bill. He is denying the debate that everyone else believes is required.

Mr Ross: I have not denied any debate; we are having a debate right now.

Mr D McIlveen: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: I will give way in one second.

Mr Wells has been a Member of the House for much longer than virtually anybody else in the Chamber. He, more than anybody, should know that the Second Stage debate is about the principles of the Bill. If you are opposed to the principles of the Bill and it passes through Second Stage, whatever happens with amendments, the same principles will come out at the other end. You are agreeing to the principles of a Bill. He shakes his head, but that is the process by which legislation goes through the House. If you agree with the general principles of the Bill, you can amend certain elements of it, but the fundamental core of the Bill, which is presumed consent, will come out at the other end.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: I am not going to give way again. Mr McIlveen asked me to give way.

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree, in relation to the interesting debate that has broken out on the Back Benches, that this is not an issue of tinkering around the edges? An amendment will not fundamentally fix the issue. Presumed or deemed consent is one of the foundation stones of the Bill. Therefore, suggesting that it can be tinkered with around the edges is an argument that would be difficult to stand over for those of us who have concerns.

Mr Ross: I thank Mr McIlveen. That is the view that I was trying to articulate to Mr Wells. I am not trying to deny a debate on any issue. I hope that there is a healthy debate in the Chamber, because, up until this point, I have not heard much debate. Hopefully, if we are to fulfil our functions correctly, we will have that debate. There are genuine concerns about moving towards a position of presumed consent, not just from me and some of my colleagues and not just from ordinary members of the public but from clinicians and medical professionals.

A number of the clinicians who work closest to transplants have expressed their unease about changing the legal parameters in relation to organ donation. That is recognised in the PHA public consultation document, which showed clearly that, the closer you got to clinicians who work with potential donors, families of donors and patients, the less likely they were to support changing to a system of presumed or deemed consent in an opt-out system. The same PHA report indicated that the more people understood about deemed consent, the less likely they were to support it. Suddenly, the figure of 90% for the people who, we often hear, support organ donation drops to around 50% for those who support a system of presumed or deemed consent.

I listened to Mr McGimpsey saying that around 60% of people supported presumed consent. That was during the first question. The PHA report shows that, once they learnt more about what presumed consent was, that figure dropped to one that is more evenly balanced. That is something that we should certainly take cognisance of. When considering the views of donor families, the PHA document shows that there was no clear consensus on whether they would prefer an opt-in or opt-out system.

As I have said on numerous occasions already during my contribution, the role of the Chamber is to scrutinise legislation, to examine the impact and potential unintended consequences and to use evidence to decide on whether legislation is desirable or required. Having considered the issue in some depth over the last number of years, I hold the firm view that changing the legal framework from the current voluntary opt-in system for organ donation and enacting legislation such as is in front of us today creates confusion for families rather than certainty, is not proven to work and is wholly unnecessary to promote and boost the level of organ donation here in Northern Ireland.

Before addressing some of my concerns in detail, let me say again, as I said at the beginning, that I support organ donation. I said that to Mr Ramsey. I agree with the goal that Mrs Dobson has, namely increasing public awareness and increasing the number of organs available for transplant. I simply disagree on how we get there. Presumed consent or deemed consent, as it is labelled in the Bill, is a legislative framework in which all adults living in this jurisdiction will be considered to be willing organ donors unless they actively opt out by joining a register. That changes the default position. By passing the Bill, the 108 Members in the Chamber would effectively decide that everyone in Northern Ireland wants to donate their organs upon death, without ever asking them. I do not believe that we have the moral authority to make that choice for people. I strongly believe that we should make it easier for people to make their own choice about what happens to their body when they die and that we should absolutely not try to make that decision for them.

My principal opposition to the Bill is around consent. I will examine that in greater detail later. We should also use the evidence available to us to consider whether legislation is required at all. To do that, we must first determine whether we have a problem in Northern Ireland to solve and, secondly, ask whether this type of legislation will solve it. Only after examining those two issues should we consider whether the proposed legislation would be legally, ethically or morally sound.

Let us look at the current state of play in Northern Ireland. We have a reasonably good story to tell, as was acknowledged by the Minister on a recent visit to one of the Belfast hospitals. In Northern Ireland, we have a rate of 26.2% for transplants from donors, which is a higher donation rate than in many of the places in Europe that currently operate systems of presumed consent when we consider donations from those who have passed away. Sweden has a rate of 17.1%; Austria's rate is 25.5%; and the much-lauded Belgium, which is globally recognised as a good example of organ donation, has a rate of 26.8%. That is reasonably comparable to what we have in Northern Ireland, which would, in European terms, be the fifth highest rate. Furthermore, Northern Ireland consistently has one of the highest living donation rates anywhere in Europe. With a rate of 32.8%, we can celebrate the bravery and generosity of those in Northern Ireland who go through surgery to donate organs to those who need them most. That is higher than in Sweden at 16.2% and Austria at 9.1% and much higher than the much-touted Spain, where the rate is 9.9%. When considered on a global level, Northern Ireland would be third on the table for living donor rates, as is shown by the International Registry in Organ Donation and Transplantation.

From considering the number of organs that are gifted by those in Northern Ireland it is clear that we have some of the most generous people in the United Kingdom. The net gifting of organs in Northern Ireland is of a negative number for every major organ donated, meaning that we take less than we give to the national organ transplant pool. Some of the stats were read out by Mrs Dobson for the number of organs, whether it be liver, lung, heart or pancreas, that we donate and the few that we get back. It is important to note that not every heart will be suitable for every person waiting for a transplant. Sometimes, unfortunately, the individual does not take to the organ that they receive. It is not simply an arbitrary argument over numbers. Nevertheless, the numbers in Northern Ireland should be celebrated, although, of course, there is more to be done.

We should be applauded for the efforts that we have made in recent years to boost organ donation, but, of course, as other Members have said, that will be of little comfort to those waiting for a transplant who cannot get one.

So there is an argument that, even though we have had a relatively positive story to tell, more should, and could, be done.

4.30 pm

Those who support the Bill claim that, by passing it, we will save lives and boost organ donation numbers. Those, of course, are laudable aims, but, as I have said, evidence from around the world suggests that deemed consent does not work, and, if it did, there are all kinds of ethical, moral and legal difficulties with the system.

The presumed consent model is not a new one. It has been tried elsewhere and, most recently, Wales, as has been mentioned, decided that they would introduce presumed consent for organ donation. Interestingly, there is no established correlation between those countries that operate deemed consent and an increase in organ donation rates. Sweden, Norway, Brazil and Chile have presumed consent models but have significantly lower rates of organ donation than we do in Northern Ireland. Indeed, when deemed consent legislation was enacted in Brazil and France, it had the opposite effect to that which was intended, and the rate of organ donation dropped rather than went up. More importantly, the top two countries in the world for organ donation, the United States of America and Spain, have an opt-in system similar to what we have in the United Kingdom.

I want to spend a little time examining the Spanish case study, because, over the last decade, Spain has consistently had one of the best organ donation rates and the family acceptance rate, the importance of which Mrs Dobson talked about earlier, is an impressive 85%, yet some misinformed commentary on Spain says that they use presumed consent. The truth of the matter is that Spain does not use presumed consent. I will quickly refer to an article written by Professor John Fabre, a professor at King's College London. He goes into some detail about the system that operates in Spain.

He said that Spain has consistently had the world's best donation rate, with around 32 to 35 per million population for more than 10 years, and that its family acceptance rate is an outstanding 85%. However, Spain does not operate a presumed consent system. As a result of its pre-eminent international position, advocates of presumed consent very frequently misrepresent Spain out of ignorance or wishful thinking. Spain passed presumed consent legislation in 1979. However, the legislation did not have a positive influence on donation and, so, in 1989, crucial organisational changes were instituted at a national level. These changes created an organisational infrastructure for transplantation, now internationally known as the "Spanish system". It is that system that the UK has emulated so successfully in recent years. It is from 1989 that Spain's donation rate began to rise to the pre-eminent position that it currently occupies. Many observers have wrongly attributed Spain's success to its 1979 presumed consent legislation. To correct that misconception, the director of the Spanish organ donation organisation, Dr Rafael Matesanz, was co-author of a paper that was published in the 'British Medical Journal' in 2010, which clearly stated that presumed consent law in Spain is dormant.

I think that that is important as we look at the countries that have the best rate and destroying some of the myths that exist around that. Spain's success is also referred to in a 'British Medical Journal' article written by Linda Wright, a bioethicist from Toronto. In that document she argues against presumed consent. She says:

"Presumed consent will not answer the organ shortage. It has not eliminated waiting lists despite evidence that it increased organ donation in some countries. Systems of opting out do not ensure higher rates of donation than opting-in systems. Strategies to encourage people to donate and public education seem to help and are independent of whether people have to opt in or out. The shortage of organs has multiple causes; no single strategy is likely to solve it."

In particular and specific reference to Spain, Linda Wright goes on to say:

"Other factors that might explain Spain's enviable rates of organ donation include an environment that treats organ donation as a priority. Transplantation has a strong support system, a dedicated budget, and accountability for performance. Staff are trained how to approach grieving families about organ donation. Donation will not increase without the necessary equipment, trained staff, and intensive care beds to enable a potential donor to donate viable organs. These institutional factors contribute to the donation rate and seem to account for some of the variation in rates of organ availability."

Again, that is a medical journal arguing against bringing in presumed consent and saying that the main drivers are ones other than an opt-in or opt-out system.

A further interesting article on Spain's organ donation success can be found in a 'Health Law Review' paper of 2010, which explains what worked in Spain and why they have changed their mind on deemed consent. Again, I will quote from that journal. It says:

"Spain's rate of ... donation is currently the highest in the world, and has been for some time. As a result, Spain is often viewed as the country to emulate in this field. ... The Spanish government enacted a presumed consent law in 1979. ... the Spanish organ donation system floundered again through the mid 1980s, plagued with erratic donation rates, lack of infrastructure and administrative inefficiencies."

Echoing the comments that were made by Professor Fabre, this article says:

"The true turning point came in 1989, when the Spanish Ministry of Health set up the National Organization of Transplants (ONT). The ONT is a national body responsible for administering and coordinating Spain's system. Shortly after its creation, the ONT reorganized the Spanish system to allow more efficient and greater regional decision making. The ONT made extensive efforts to put infrastructure and training into place for transplant teams. These efforts bore tremendous dividends — between 1989 and 2006, Spain's organ donation increased enormously and has remained at a sustained high level for years."

The article goes on to say why it did not support presumed consent. It says:

"The ONT's primary fear was that trying to enforce the presumed consent law strictly would 'increase grief and would taint the system as coercive, labelling the ONT as an organ hunting device protected by an abusive law.' This approach appears to have paid dividends"

It goes on to say that, as it is pointed out:

"Spain's rate of family refusal fell to 21.3% in 1998, representing a drop of almost 30% from refusal rates in the early 1990s. The authors credit this to significant efforts to overcome various obstacles, including an earlier reluctance to approach grieving families."

The importance of those transplant coordinators cannot be overstated. In Spain, the data quite clearly suggests that family consent rates are more than doubled when a coordinator in a hospital is able to spend three or more hours with a family.

Of course, the other country with a good record in organ donation is the United States of America. In the US, the surgeon general introduced new legislation on the US federal register that meant that each hospital had a legal duty to identify and refer every potential donor to the organ donor organisation. Potential donors are identified using clinical triggers that are very often present in patients who are likely to be diagnosed as brainstem dead. In addition, the US has a well-staffed and extensive network of organ donor coordinators and systems in place to reimburse hospital costs.

I have referred to the fact that, in the UK, Wales has indeed gone ahead and legislated for deemed consent, although clearly most Members would acknowledge that it is far too early to determine whether it will have any impact. When Prime Minister Gordon Brown was in office, he was very supportive of moving towards a system of presumed consent. He indeed commissioned a piece of independent advice from the organ donation task force. What is interesting about that piece of work is that, although it started from a position of supporting a change in the law on how we donate organs in the UK, the report concluded, however, that the UK should not move away from the current opt-in system. Let me quote from that report because I think that it is important that we listen to the evidence that was produced by the organ donation task force. It says:

"When the Taskforce began its deliberations, members had a variety of views. By the end of the process a clear consensus had been reached, but only after an extensive range of evidence had been considered along the way, with much powerful and well considered opinion expressed on both sides of the equation."

That report goes on to say:

"we found considerable evidence highlighting the potential downside of such a move" towards deemed consent. It goes on to say:

*"The Clinical Working Group heard persuasive arguments from health professionals about the potentially negative implications for clinical practice, especially the potential to damage the vital relationship of trust between clinicians caring for people at the end of life, their patients and their families. Some intensive care staff in particular fear that a move to an opt out system would make critical care more difficult and could lead to some intensive care practitioners themselves opting out of participation in donation programmes. This would be disastrous for the future of organ donation in the UK since many of the recommendations made by the Taskforce in its earlier report, Organs for Transplants, are dependent on the active support of intensive care practitioners."*

The report continues:

"The working group considering clinical implications also heard powerful evidence from recipients of organs who stressed their need to know that organs had been freely given by donors and their families, and from donor families who often find great comfort in being an active part of the decision to donate."

It goes on:

"It became increasingly clear that it would be both complex in practical terms and also costly to put in place an opt out system that could command the trust of professionals and members of the public. There would need to be a significant and sustained communications programme to ensure that all members of society knew about the new system and what it would mean for them. Real concerns were expressed about the security of information on an opt out register"

The next paragraph states:

"We heard support from members of the public and patients' groups for the principle of informed consent, and a perception that assuming consent from silence belongs to a more paternalistic era. Some felt that an opt out system could be 'dehumanising'. Given that current trends in healthcare place great emphasis on choice and responsiveness, this is an important consideration."

Again, that is a point that I tried to make to Members.

The report then states:

"Many people have reservations about a change to an opt out system, including some who are currently on the Organ Donor Register (ODR). Some faith leaders we spoke to warned of the potential for provoking anti-donation feelings" and even active anti-donation campaigning. We heard considerable concerns about the impact on some groups, for example those who might be less comfortable using the 'opting out' process ... On balance, the Taskforce feels that moving to an opt out system carries a significant risk of making the current situation worse."

Members should read that report by a group of experts that was set up by the then Prime Minister Gordon Brown and digest some of the information that is in there. As I said to Mr Agnew, even if the evidence from elsewhere in the world were to suggest that an opt-out system, or a deemed consent system, will result in higher levels of organ donation, there would still be questions around whether it is the right thing to do. I contend that it is probably not.

Earlier, I mentioned the fact that in Brazil deemed consent was introduced to boost the rate of organ donation. However, in practical terms, the actual rate of donation dropped in Brazil. That was in part because of a backlash against the state presuming the consent of its citizens and also because of a lack of trust in the medical profession in Brazil. To document that, I will quote from a 'Health Law Review' of 2010, which talks about the Brazilian experience and states:

"Far less needs to be written about Brazil's attempt at presumed consent. By way of background, the Brazilian law was passed in 1997, became effective in 1998 and immediately faced heavy criticism."

It continues that it was noted:

"in practice, almost all surgeons sought consent from family members", and that the presumed consent law was not really used. It goes on to state:

"Brazil still lacked the necessary infrastructure and administrative effectiveness to take advantage of such a gain. However the core problem with presumed consent in Brazil was widespread public distrust towards the medical profession ... Popular imagination also played a part in the downfall of the law. Part of the population feared that their organs would be removed even before they were clinically dead. Many rushed to public offices to register themselves as non-donors, to avoid such a risk. Apparently there were even difficulties registering as a non-donor in Brazil, further fuelling the fear that the law was ultimately an attempt at exploitation."

I say that not to be alarmist but to point to the fact that issues around consent are important and that we need to consider them. Many clinicians in the United Kingdom, and in Northern Ireland specifically, also harbour concerns about the impact that the Bill could have on the doctor-patient relationship and trust in the medical profession, as well as the question of whether it would work.

I noted comments by Dr Declan Grace, who is the lead clinician in charge of organ donation in the Western Trust. He is one such expert who has publicly come out and said that he has concerns about the Bill. An article that appeared in the Belfast 'News Letter' on Wednesday 19 February 2014, reported that Dr Grace said:

"he had 'great concerns' about the implications of the suggested changes, fearing that mistrust could be created between medics and patients."

The article went on to state that Dr Grace spoke at a public meeting on the issue and reported that:

"he thought that an opt out system would lead to an 'initial subtle uplift' in the number of people signing the donor register or expressing interest. But he expressed fears about the long-term implications", for organ donation. The article said that he feared that there would be a drop:

"in the number of families giving consent for their loved one's organs to be donated", and expressed real concerns about moving forward with such a system.

Anyone who has researched this issue and read the comments of or spoken to clinicians working closest to organ donation will have heard this before; it is a common theme. A survey of Intensive Care Society members in 2008 indicated a belief that the introduction of deemed consent may damage the relationship of trust between clinicians caring for patients at the end of life and their families.

4.45 pm

The Alder Hey case exemplifies why the public are uneasy around issues of consent. For Members who are unfamiliar with Alder Hey, it was a case where doctors took organs from deceased children without parental consent. Obviously, it caused a public outrage and led to questions for the medical profession about whether it is ethical to take organs without informed and expressed consent from anyone. I say this not to be sensationalist; I simply refer to it as a case to highlight the sensitivities and fears around failing to establish consent. Personal autonomy is so important, particularly when it comes to the healthcare system, because it ensures that the individual's views and wishes are respected. Indeed, many members of the Health Committee are also members of the Ad Hoc Joint Committee on the Mental Capacity Bill and, time and again, we talk about the importance of autonomy of individuals being supported to take decisions and actively making decisions during their lifetime.

It is firmly my view that presumed consent is not consent at all. Is it legally valid? How can silence in an opt-out or deemed-consent system be interpreted as actual consent? It is an issue that I raised with many Members previously in the debate, and I do not think that any of them have given me a satisfactory answer to it.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Certainly.

Mr Agnew: I may not give him a satisfactory answer, but I will pose a question. There are many areas in our lives where our consent is deemed. He may have views on the example of telemarketing. It is assumed that our phone numbers and addresses are there to be used by marketing companies and, indeed, can be bought unless we opt out through the Telephone Preference Service or the Mailing Preference Service. That is something that exists in our lives, and it is for profit. This is an area where we can save people's lives and, given that people accept telemarketing,

I am sure that they will be much more favourable towards something as serious as saving people's lives.

Mr Ross: Let me address the issue of saving people's lives. If this were clearly determined to save people's lives, I think that we would be having a different debate today. I contend that this legislation is not the primary driver that can help us to save people's lives through organ donation, and that is one of the reasons why I am opposed to it. I think confusing the two issues of telemarketing and what happens to our bodies when we die is trivialising the issue somewhat. I pose this question back to him: can he point to any area of common or statute law in which silence amounts to consent? Would anybody argue that there is any other area of medicine or in law where somebody's silence on an issue should be interpreted by law as the same as giving informed consent? That is one of the areas where I have real concern over this legislation.

I know that Members will try to trivialise this issue and say that I am just opposing it for a variety of other reasons or that I am not interested in saving lives. I am absolutely interested in saving lives, but I think that we need to do it in an ethical way and, in many cases, the ends do not always justify the means, and the means are equally as important. I think that, when it comes to what happens to our bodies when we die, we absolutely should be making sure that, during our lives, we make a declaration about what we want to happen because that is how we get certainty into the system.

Mrs Dobson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: I will give way to Mrs Dobson, although she does not always give way to me.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member has raised the issue of silence providing consent numerous times during this debate and has challenged a number of Members to inform him of when silence is assumed as consent in other areas of our health service. Well, I am going to accept that challenge from him, and I will welcome confirmation from the Minister that there are many areas in the health service where this is the case, including but not limited to additional procedures during surgery, emergency treatment, mental health conditions, self-harm and attempted suicide, and when there is a risk to public health. However, I have said from the beginning that the family will and should maintain the key role in providing consent following the death of a loved one.

Mr Ross: I absolutely accept the fact that, as with the current system, her proposals would allow families to effectively veto the donation from happening, but I think that that misses the point. The first stage is about how we get to arrive at consent, and I have a real difficulty that this House in passing the Bill is saying that we, as 108 legislators, have decided that every adult in Northern Ireland is a willing organ donor, without ever asking them.

That is the concern. I am not challenging the fact that families will have a veto over it. What I am challenging is how we get the consent in the first place and whether having silence on the issue will help families make those tough decisions. I am very much of the view that it will not help families. If a relative of mine were in a trauma unit and, sadly, was likely to lose their life, of course, I would want to do something that they wanted me to do. The clearest way that I feel I could get that assurance is from knowing that they made an informed choice during their life to donate their organs. In those circumstances, I would be more likely to allow the donation to go ahead than if I was not sure. That is why, again, I have concerns about the Bill.

I have talked about some of the legal and moral difficulties with moving to a system of presumed consent. Again, I think that it is helpful to look at the Organ Donation Taskforce report, which has a specific section on some of the legal issues. I will quote directly from the legal working group, which said that it would be concerned about potential successful challenges under European Convention on Human Rights legislation.

It then states:

"Furthermore, the legal group concluded that simply having a register where people could record their decision (opting either in or out) during their lifetime, without involving families at the time of death, would probably be insufficient to ensure compliance with the ECHR because:

• in an opt out system, it could result in organs being taken from those who had not yet managed to register an objection, perhaps because they were simply busy or disorganised. They might also have learning difficulties or other problems with communication, such as English as a second language".

I recognise that Mrs Dobson is trying to ensure in the Bill that there are certain safeguards around that. However, I will read out the statement again, because this is where my concern around consent comes from:

"in an opt out system, it could result in organs being taken from those who had not yet managed to register an objection".

The failure to register an objection can never be considered to be the same as giving informed and express consent. I have raised that issue a number of times, and I will continue to do so, because that is where some of my major concerns come from.

Mr McKinney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: I will.

Mr McKinney: I apologise to the Member for not being in for all of his contribution, but I had to be at a number of meetings elsewhere.

During Mrs Dobson's presentation to the House and to the Committee, she reflected on the public awareness campaigns and the fact that significant resources would be directed towards that type of campaign. Surely that would limit the issues that the Member is raising about those who may not find themselves able to give consent. Would public awareness campaigns not be able to target the vulnerable or those less able to understand some of the issues as well?

Mr Ross: The intention of a public awareness campaign should be to try to actively get people to make a decision in an opt-in system. Indeed, I paid tribute to Mrs Dobson at the beginning of the debate, because we are all much more aware of organ donation in Northern Ireland now than we perhaps were four years ago. The fact that the media have very much reported on some of her campaigning has meant that families will have those conversations and make decisions, which is a good thing.

I also think that the Department of Health, under various Ministers, should be commended for its public awareness campaign with the PHA in recent years. If we look at the figures for that campaign, we see that more and more people are joining the organ donation register or are having that conversation with families.

I think that that is a much better system than one where we automatically assume that consent has been given but have to check once a year that people are aware of the system. I think that that is a dangerous system. It is a dangerous precedent to create in law or medicine, and there are huge challenges around it. I want to try to eliminate, rather than limit, confusion. I think that by moving to a system where we ask people to give informed consent during their lifetime is a much better safeguard in ensuring that families, at a very difficult point in their lives, make decisions that they are confident and comfortable about.

I raised some of the legal concerns about the absence of consent, and I do not think that the intention of those who drafted the Bill is for organs to be taken when that is not the express wish of the individual concerned. I do not, for one second, say that that is the intention of the drafter of the Bill. However, as legislators, we need to be alive to these issues and ensure that we study and scrutinise the problems that this type of Bill could create.

I will again quote from the Organ Donation Taskforce document, which has a section on ethical issues. A special working group was set up for that. It says that:

"They were unanimous in their belief that a society has an opportunity to do something morally significant by improving donation rates, as it is an opportunity to remove suffering and bring about substantial benefits for many people. Yet, despite this overwhelming moral good, the means of achieving this end still need to be independently scrutinised because it is also important that systems under which organs are removed for transplant are seen as morally acceptable. In other words, the end cannot be seen to justify the means".

That is the point that I tried to make to Mr Agnew previously. On the issue of consent, it says:

"It is then important to be able to demonstrate that each and every donation has been properly authorised; key to this is the need to be able to determine that an individual's wishes (or those of their families, where appropriate) have been honoured. This is of importance because, even though we wish to actively promote donation, we ideally want to know that people have clearly chosen to donate ... Uncertainty about a potential donor's wishes is at the heart of difficulties with the current system, yet uncertainty could remain an issue with an opt out system. It may not be appropriate to assume that all those who have failed to opt out have no objection to becoming donors, given the real possibility of apathy and/or disorganisation preventing them signing the opt out register ... The group was not convinced that evidence of widespread support, as expressed in opinion surveys, could necessarily support a claim that all those who fail to opt out actively intend to donate."

I repeat again that deemed consent, as is proposed in the Bill, can never be considered as being on a level par to actual consent. It is an issue that I have raised previously in debates on this issue, and it is an issue that I discussed at a Queen's University medical ethics debate that I participated in last year and one that was shared by many people in the room. There were concerns that deemed consent or presumed consent could violate a patient's right to make an informed decision, and so does not uphold respect for their autonomy.

The specific purpose of informed consent is to protect a patient's right to autonomy, as is made clear in the Universal Declaration on Bioethics and Human Rights in 2005 and the Declaration of Helsinki at the World Medical Association meeting in 2008. There are those bioethicists who argue that the concept of deemed consent is, in itself, a violation of a person's autonomy as it forces patients to either become donors or state their wish not to become donors. In both instances, a patient's autonomy is violated, as they argue that compelling patients is, in itself, unethical.

I would much prefer to see us create a system where it is easier for people to choose to make a choice, but not making any declaration at all cannot be considered as a choice. I hope that nobody wants to see the case where organs are being donated by default because an individual did not take the time to opt out or was not aware of the law. Even with the fact that a family could veto any donation proceeding, the fact that the Bill would presume consent in the first place is deeply worrying for me, and I know that it is deeply worrying for many medical professionals working in Northern Ireland. In particular, I note comments from Dr Peter Saunders, who is a former general surgeon. He said of deemed consent systems for organ donation:

"I strongly support organ donation but so-called 'presumed consent' involves neither consent nor donation – it is neither voluntary nor informed and involves taking organs rather than giving them."

The General Medical Council also rightly focused on the importance of individuals giving their informed consent. In this proposed Bill, that autonomy of an individual to give informed consent is removed, because consent is deemed. At present, the Human Tissue Act 2004 is the law governing much of organ donation in the UK, and the Act makes consent the focus point of deliberation, but this Bill moves away from the focus on consent, as consent will be presumed or deemed. I asked earlier if there was any other area of medicine in which consent would be presumed. Even when it comes to saving someone's life, doctors will act in a patient's best interests, but they do not presume the consent to do so. That is an important acknowledgement to make. I have spoken to doctors, and if you appear at an accident and emergency ward and you are unconscious, if a doctor takes the decision to operate on you when you are unconscious and cannot get the consent to do so, they are not presuming that they have your consent to operate, but they are acting in your best interests. It may seem like a minor point, but, in legal terms, there is a significant difference in the two positions.

My view is that organ donation should be authorised by the individual whose organs are donated. The Bill allows you to withdraw consent, but it does not appear to allow you to authorise it. In my view, we are moving away from relative certainty where an individual gives informed consent during their lives, which guides families and doctors when making difficult decisions on whether to donate, to a system of uncertainty, where families and medical professionals cannot be sure.

As I said earlier to Mrs Dobson, although donor cards can be overruled by a family, they at least prove that the individual made a positive act during their lifetime to express consent, and they give families comfort in that they know what the wishes of their loved ones were.

5.00 pm

I am also an unapologetic supporter of limited government and hold the view that the state should not get involved in every aspect of our lives. It could be argued that the Bill effectively — I listened to Mrs Cameron's contribution earlier — gives ownership of our organs to the state unless we specifically register to object. Even if people dismiss that argument, what cannot be dismissed is that, through the Bill, the 108 Assembly Members will decide that someone living in Northern Ireland has given their consent to donate their organs. I do not think that I, or any other Member, should consider it morally or ethically right that we take that decision for people. Many patient groups across the United Kingdom have also expressed their opposition to deemed consent on those same grounds.

Katherine Murphy, director of the Patients Association, said that it is not a decision that the Government can make on behalf of people. Further ethical difficulties arise when we consider other issues. I talked about people who may lack capacity to make decisions, and I point to the Mental Capacity Bill and the deliberations that we have had in that forum. Will they be supported to make a decision, and will they be asked their view? Can they withdraw consent at a later stage? Other questions have been asked before, such as: how can a child give their consent? Do they have the maturity or the capacity to give consent to organ donation?

An opt-out system is also impractical in an increasingly multicultural society because cultural and religious objections to organ donation are also important. I do not want to labour the point, but certain religions do not believe that organ donation is in keeping with their beliefs. How does the proposer of the Bill intend to allay concerns about cultural and religious sensitivities? Of course, the Human Rights Act allows a person to practise their religion, so would the Bill potentially cause a difficulty with the Human Rights Act? Would article 8 be invoked? Again, I ask the mover whether she is satisfied that the Bill would not be open to successful legal challenge on those grounds.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. He asked a question. In the countries covered by the Human Rights Act, and where there is an opt-out system, has there been any evidence of successful legal challenge?

Mr Ross: As the Member will acknowledge, every Bill is drafted differently. We need to ensure that anything that we draft and pass in the Assembly is compliant. We need to satisfy ourselves of that. I am aware that some eminent lawyers suggested that the Welsh legislation could be open to successful legal challenge. In the end, the Welsh Government decided to ignore that advice, but I am aware that that advice was given. I suppose that, ultimately, until these things are challenged in the courts, we will not know.

The proposer of the Bill also talked about safeguards being built into the Bill. I acknowledge that she has ensured that there are certain safeguards in it, but, as I said earlier, it misses the point to some degree, because, irrespective of the safeguards in it, the Bill deems that every adult in Northern Ireland has given their consent without ever asking them. That is the area that I have major contention with. If 90% of people in Northern Ireland, or across the United Kingdom as a whole, support organ donation, it should not be too difficult a task for us to increase organ donation numbers. A failure to do so may, in fact, prove to be a lack of effort. I mentioned earlier the success that the Department and the PHA have had in recent years in increasing public awareness and boosting the number of people who have voluntarily signed up to the organ donor register. That is why I come to the view that we do not need legislation in this area at all and that there are other things that we could do to improve the situation in Northern Ireland.

As I have already acknowledged, whether I support it or not, the Bill will in all likelihood attract the support of the House at Second Stage and move on to Committee Stage. If it does move into Committee Stage, there are a number of areas in the Bill that I think the Committee would need to look at quite closely. I want to detail some of them.

Clause 1, "Duty to promote transplantation", places a duty on the Department to:

"(a) promote transplantation,

(b) provide information and increase awareness about transplantation, and

(c) inform the public about the circumstances where consent to transplantation is deemed to be given, and the role of relatives and friends in affirming that deemed consent."

Leaving aside the issue of friends, which I will return to, I would say that, generally speaking, most people will see that clause as being uncontroversial.

The Department will also be required:

"to promote a campaign informing the public at least once a year", with regard to the proposal to introduce deemed consent. The objective in that clause should not be controversial. It is hard to see a downside in the Department being required to promote awareness of transplantation, particularly given that it already does some of that work, and the PHA is already doing that work in Northern Ireland. If a presumed consent system is introduced in Northern Ireland, it will certainly need to be advertised and allow individuals to make an informed decision with regard to their organs.

However, issues do arise from the wording of clause 1. It may seem like a minor point, but there is difficulty around the Department promoting transplantation rather than simply awareness of transplantation. Some may argue that that is moralistic or paternalistic rather than raising awareness to allow people to make their choice. The Committee may wish to consider that.

The Bill is not clear on what the role of relatives and friends in affirming deemed consent should be. In a letter to MLAs today, the BMA recorded concerns around that as well. It could be difficult for the Department to be clear with the public as to the role of their friends and relatives. As I said, the last thing that we need in regard to the sensitive issue of organ donation at the end of life is in any way to create confusion.

Clause 1(2) states that the Department will be under:

“a duty to promote a campaign informing the public at least once a year.”

Whilst that seems to be a sensible approach, the Bill is not clear on what constitutes “a campaign”. It could range from as little as sending out a departmental press release to local newspapers to as much as a broadcast advertising campaign. If the legislation does proceed, the Committee will want more clarity around that.

We could draw a parallel with section 15 of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation Act, when the Department of Justice just sent out a press release, believing that it had thereby met its obligations to alert the public to a change in the law. While some Members may argue that that is a less important issue, it is relevant to look at what the Department of Justice thought was adequate to be a campaign. We should ensure that the Department of Health would have a much more sustained information campaign than simply sending out a press release.

Should the House pass the Bill, it is my belief that every citizen who is by law considered a willing organ donor by virtue of deemed consent should be made aware, at least once a year, that they are on the list, if we are to avoid confusion and potential difficulties in the event of death. My preference is that we do not have a deemed consent system, but if it is the will of the House that we should, it is important that on an annual basis every citizen is made aware that they are on that list and told how to opt out if that is their preference.

Another point mentioned by a few Members, and it is not the primary point but it is a significant point, is the costs associated with the Bill. The potential cost of the duty to promote is not mentioned; it is described in the explanatory and financial memorandum (EFM) as “limited”. The bigger cost is implementing the new system of donations. The EFM provides some detail on that. According to a research paper produced by RaSe in November 2013, which does not appear to be publicly available, the:

“indicative estimate of implementation costs of introducing the proposed legislation is between £2,081,000 and £5,149,000”.

It would be helpful if that document was made publicly available to allow us to examine the figures outlined and to understand some of the assumptions within that calculation. For instance, do the figures include the cost of IT systems, assumptions on how many organs will stay in Northern Ireland, and what variance has been taken into account should assumptions change in the values assigned to the quality of life index? All those were factors considered by the Welsh Assembly when considering similar legislation a few years ago.

Clause 4, the most controversial aspect of the Bill, around deemed consent, requires incredibly close and careful scrutiny. As I said, it is interesting that the BMA, which had supported Mrs Dobson in her efforts to introduce a soft opt-out system, has expressed concerns around how it has been drafted. This is also the part of the Bill that clinicians in emergency medicine and renal units have expressed concern over.

As I have said already this afternoon, my fundamental objection to the clause is based on the ethics of changing to that type of system. It would, in my view, see the state going beyond its rightful place. Deemed consent is, in my view, not consent at all, and, in an area as sensitive as what happens to your body when you die, it should be the case that affirmative assent is required or at least sought. I find it somewhat concerning that other Members do not seem to be so concerned about moving away from a system that requires actual consent to one that does not.

It is also important to note in clause 4 the potential for a backlash if citizens believe that the idea of organ donation as a gift is eroded if deemed consent is introduced. I noticed that, on a similar clause in the Welsh Bill, Dr Peter Matthew, who is a consultant in intensive care in Swansea, said to the Health and Social Care Committee:

“My own experience is that the British psyche has a particular view that what it should do is donate organs as an altruistic gift, and if it is felt that the state is going to take over the organs, then there is the potential that people who may have been willing to become a donor will not do so. We have seen two cases in Morriston where patients who were on the organ donation register, on hearing about this, said to their families that if the state was going to take their organs, they were no longer willing to give them. We lost two donations because of that. So, there is a potential backlash.”

Those are not my comments but those of Dr Peter Matthew. A number of Assembly Members in Wales noted that they had received many letters from constituents who had made a decision to take their name off the organ donor register when the legislation was going through the National Assembly. Again, it is very much the case that members of the public are perhaps not fully aware of what “deemed consent” means. I am concerned that, until there has been a full review of clinicians and the public, we should not have the confidence to say that they do.

The clause also assumes that a change is needed, when the percentage of the population registered as donors has consistently risen since 2008. That is a point that I have previously made. Of course, the work of Professor John Fabre will be of great value to the Committee in determining whether clause 4 is beneficial.

I made the point that many countries across Europe and, indeed, the world operate an opt-out system, including Estonia, Austria, Slovenia, Norway, Italy, the Czech Republic, Finland, Latvia, Sweden, Poland, Switzerland, Slovakia, Luxembourg, Greece and Cyprus, all of which have a poorer record of organ donation than we have. I am not necessarily saying that introducing the legislation will result in a poorer rate of organ donation, but I do make the point that there is no clear evidence that an opt-out system is a driving factor in promoting organ donation.

The clause will also require quite a significant amount of investment to be made. It is a matter of debate, and the Committee may wish to consider whether the amount of money spent on servicing the system would be better spent on the public awareness campaign and whether that could have a greater benefit to promoting organ donation in Northern Ireland.

I also have questions around what is considered "reasonable", as is stated in clause 4 where it talks about contacting those who are in a qualifying relationship. Again, what is a reasonable thing for clinicians to do is something that we have looked at with the Mental Capacity Bill, and we need some certainty on that. One of the other areas that I have concern around with the clause is that so much information is to be left to codes of practice. In other Bills, we have consistently said that such important issues should be in the Bill, not left to codes of practice. That is something that the Committee may also want to look at.

Clause 5 is about express consent. The Bill proposes to follow the example of the Welsh legislation regarding "excepted adults" by stating that, if an individual dies:

"who had not been ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland for a period of at least 12 months immediately before dying" their consent cannot be deemed. The same goes for individuals who are judged to have:

"lacked capacity to understand the notion that consent to transplantation activities can be deemed to be given."

However, it is not clear how the law would treat individuals such as international students and armed forces personnel. At present, around 8% or 9% of students at Queen's University are international students. Most students at Queen's take degrees that last three or more years, so an example would be, if we had a Malaysian student at Queen's taking civil engineering, he or she will be in Northern Ireland for a period of three years for the degree but is unlikely to be there continuously for those three years. During the summer break, the student may decide to return to Malaysia before returning to Queen's for the autumn term.

If they return to Northern Ireland and, sadly, pass away, are they to be considered ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland and therefore deemed to have consented, as provided for in this Bill? Similarly, a member of the armed forces may be in a foreign military base for most of the year but resident in Northern Ireland. I seek clarity on how they are to be dealt with under this legislation.

5.15 pm

Clause 6 deals with express consent of children. I have some concerns around that and clause 7. Clause 6 allows children to expressly consent to donation of material covered under clause 2 while alive or after death as a child through their own consent, if considered capable of making such a decision as provided for in clause 18(3), or by appointing a representative. Clause 7 allows a child to expressly consent to transplants involving excluded material, to be defined in future regulations. Of course, leaving such matters to regulations is of concern from the scrutiny point of view. Organ donation by children is a controversial subject that needs much further discussion. In particular, how will a child be judged competent to give consent and understand exactly what it is they are consenting to? As I have mentioned on numerous occasions, members of the Ad Hoc Joint Committee on the Mental Capacity Bill will be well aware of the issues connected with the ability of children to give consent to medical operations. The lack of consistency in the approach by some members of that Committee today has not gone unnoticed.

Clause 8 deals with deemed consent in activities involving material from living adults who lack capacity to consent. It proposes how to deal with the consent of a person who has died but did not have the capacity to consent to the donation before death and requires a third party to provide consent for the person. Clause 8 allows the law to deem consent for such individuals while they are alive in circumstances of a kind specified by regulations made by the Department. The explanatory and financial memorandum says:

"there may be circumstances where it may be in the best interests of a person incapable of giving consent, to donate material to a living relative."

However, there is no indication of the type of circumstances that may be considered applicable, as there is in clause 7(3), nor is there any explanation of why this might be in the individual's best interests. Most importantly, there is no safeguard on who can agree to such a donation. I am concerned that vulnerable adults who cannot consent should have the full safeguards of the law, and it is not clear that they do under this clause. I am not reassured by regulations made under a similar clause in the Welsh legislation, stating that the adult who lacks capacity:

"is deemed to have consented to the activity where the activity is done by a person who is acting in what they reasonably believe to be P's best interests."

There is no further clarity on the person who can make this decision. Again, I draw a parallel with the Ad Hoc Committee and the questions that we raised on best interests. I fail to see how it can be judged to be in an individual's best interests to donate their organs without consenting. It would, of course, be in the recipient's best interests, but I think that Mrs Dobson may wish to explain to the House how it could be considered in the donor's best interests when consent has not been established. It is something that I was a little bit confused about when reading through the Bill.

Clause 10 talks about the qualifying relationships. It sets out the type of people who can provide express consent to organ donation. This clause is based on section 27 of the Human Tissue Act 2004, which sets out detailed instructions on how this should be interpreted. For instance, are those at the top of the list ranked higher than those at the bottom?

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for giving way and for the breadth and depth of his evidence. He has certainly brought more than anybody else, and it has been very helpful indeed. I also have concerns about qualifying relationships in clause 10. Does the Member share my concern that the Bill very clearly defines what a partner is, "for the purposes of this Act", but does not define a "friend of long standing"? Instead, this will be left to the code of practice.

Mr Ross: Yes, I have made the point about the difficulties created from a scrutiny point of view of leaving things to the code of practice. Indeed, Committees that I have sat on are continually having disputes with Departments about leaving things to codes of practice, bearing in mind that you cannot amend them; you can simply accept or reject them. I have not come across the notion of a friend of long standing in any other legislation. How would we ever determine what a friend of long standing is?

There are also questions about how a nurse or doctor in a trauma unit would determine how to establish who a "friend of long standing" is in order to contact them to ask them whether to proceed with an organ donation. That is an area that the Committee would undoubtedly want to investigate more thoroughly. I think that it is an odd phrase to see in a Bill. Even though the Member says that she will leave it to regulations, there would be huge difficulties in determining what a "friend of long standing" is.

I think it would be important to see whether, in that list of qualifying relationships, the ranking order could be made under the code of practice, as proposed in clause 10(4), rather than in statute. I question whether any legal weight is given to the order of ranking. Again, I draw a parallel with the Mental Capacity Bill, where we received advice that the order of ranking makes no legal difference at all. That would be particularly concerning, especially given the point that my colleague, Mr Lyons, has just raised, that, if there was no legal difference in the ranking, then, potentially, a "friend of long standing" would be the first person who could be contacted. Given the difficulties that there would be in establishing exactly what that relationship is, how close that relationship is or what kind of knowledge that person had of the individual, I think it would cause some concern.

Clause 14 refers to an annual report on transplantation. Again, the Bill sensibly requires an annual report on transplantation to be introduced. It requires the Department to include in the report, of which there will be at least one every five financial years, its opinion on whether the Act had been effective in promoting transplantation activities and any recommendations for amending the law so as to promote transplantation activities. I suggest that consideration should be given to making the interval under clause 14(3) three years rather than five. Then, should the Bill be passed and make little or no impact, it could be repealed within a fairly short period of time.

Clause 21 refers to commencement. It is important to note that the date of the commencement of the new system is proposed as 31 May 2018. This suggests that there would be a two-year period of preparation before implementing the Bill. Given the very real concerns about it, and its impact on the ethical questions I have raised today, I would prefer to see work commissioned by the Department that would consult with clinicians directly impacted by the law in order to establish whether they would be comfortable working in this new legal framework before the Bill is enacted.

Members have referred to the consultation process that was carried out, but any consultation that has been carried out has been in absence of the Bill. It has been very difficult to get a draft copy of the Bill over the past number of years. We have talked about broad concepts but we have not seen the detail of it, so I think that consulting in the absence of the wording shows a shortcoming in the consultation process. I think that it is important that doctors can see the detail and that we should specifically ask them about how they feel about the proposed changes it the legal framework in which they would then be required to operate.

It is easy for people to dismiss concerns expressed about the Bill as being politically motivated, or simply say that the Bill is about saving lives and that anybody who opposes it is not interested in doing that. It is my firm view that the Bill will fundamentally shift the relationship between the state and the individual. It is my firm view that the Bill, and what it is trying to do, is unproven internationally, is potentially counterproductive and unnecessary, and, worst of all, moves us away from the well-established need for actual, informed and expressed consent before carrying out a medical procedure on an individual. The lack of consent that the Bill would legislate for makes me deeply uncomfortable and requires me to vote against its passage at Second Stage, because the principle of the Bill is about moving towards deemed consent.

I appeal to Members to detach themselves from the powerful emotional arguments we have heard previously in this debate and consider the fact that, by passing the Bill, a person would no longer need to give their consent for them to be considered in law as a willing organ donor.

I will finish by once again quoting Mrs Dobson speaking in a previous debate on promoting women in politics. She said:

*"we need to inspire change and not to force it." —

Anyone who reads or listens to the extraordinary stories of people who have donated their organs, or who have had loved ones donate their organs on death, and saved up to six other lives, or anyone who have benefited from such an amazing gift of life, could not fail to be inspired.

Let us not move away from the concept of organ donation as a gift. Let us inspire others to give the gift of life by making a decision on whether they wish to donate their organs and help others. Instead of looking to pass legislation on the issue, let us work together to promote the real drivers of organ donation, namely increasing public awareness of organ donation and ensuring that we have the specialist transplant coordinators in every hospital across Northern Ireland.

I appeal to Members, particularly those on the Health Committee, to look at the evidence, get beyond the notion of whether countries operate an opt-in or opt-out system and look at the real drivers for promoting organ donation across Europe and the world. If members of the Health Committee do that, it is my belief that they will quickly come to the conclusion that the most important factors in promoting organ donation are public awareness and having transplant specialist nurses in hospitals who are specially trained to recognise potential organ donors and deal with families in particularly difficult circumstances. If they come to that conclusion, they will also come to the conclusion that we do not need legislation on this issue; we just need a Health Department focused on delivering those changes. I think it is absolutely in our gift to do that.

I hope that, despite perhaps discussing the issue at length, I have injected some form of debate and some level of scrutiny into this Bill at Second Stage. I hope that Members will take those concerns genuinely and have a rational and balanced debate about whether the Bill is the most appropriate way in which we in Northern Ireland can boost organ donation rates.

Mr D McIlveen: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Bill at this stage. I will try to speak briefly. Like others, I want to congratulate the sponsor. A tremendous amount of effort goes into drafting, formulating and consulting on a Bill. There is also a lot of pressure and stress when you find yourself on the other side of the Committee table. Therefore, I want to commend Mrs Dobson on her work. I note that it is obviously inspired by personal circumstances as well. I know that she has been a very effective lobbyist on the issue, and I commend her on that as well.

I want to start by saying that I am on the donor list. I have been for over 10 years, I think. Admittedly, my organs may not be as healthy as those of some of my colleagues. I think particularly of my good friend, Mr Wells, who has left, with the meat-free, alcohol-free, every-pleasure-free lifestyle that he leads. Unfortunately, I do not think I could fall into that category, but I did make that personal choice some time ago. Therefore, whilst I do have sincerely held, genuine concerns about the potential road that that particular approach to the legislation could take, in a desire to see a significant increase in donors way beyond where we are at the moment, I stand entirely shoulder to shoulder with Mrs Dobson and with everybody in the Chamber in wanting to achieve that outcome. My concern, however, is just around how we actually get to that point.

Of course, on the surface, I guess the Bill looks like a no-brainer. We should all be dancing out the Yes Lobby to try to support it if it is to achieve what we believe it is designed to achieve. However, when we start to look at it in more detail and unpick the potential consequences of going down this particular road, whether we call it presumed or deemed consent, I think we have to be much more cautious about how we actually get to that point. I know that it has been mentioned already, but I am yet to be convinced, or have anybody on the other side of the argument convince me, that there is any precedent set in any part of the public service where a split-second decision like this — something that is so important to people and that obviously raises big ethical issues — can be done on the basis of silence meaning that it is assumed.

It is a principle that continues even when you look at issues beyond health. If someone pleads guilty in a court of law to a crime, there is not an assumption that they are guilty; they will be given a trial and the evidence will be interrogated. It is quite likely that, if someone pleads guilty to a crime, they are most likely guilty of that crime. However, my point is a general one, in that, on that basis, there is not an assumption of guilt.

5.30 pm

If someone does not have a will, it is not assumed that whatever is left behind will go to one particular person or another. A very long process is undertaken and gone through with publicity, publication and probate to ensure that, as best as possible, the desires of the person who has passed away are taken into account. As politicians, we do not assume that the decisions that were made at the last election are the decisions that people will always want to make. We have elections every three, four or five years. There is an assumption that people's minds will change, that people will have different views, and that the views of today may not necessarily be the views of tomorrow.

I opened by saying that I am on the donor register. However, for many years of my adult life I chose not to be. At some time in my future life, I cannot rule out deciding that I want to be taken off it again. That is how life is: sometimes we change our views. In politics, we are often castigated when we change our minds — it is called a U-turn — but that is life. People change; people change their views and have different ideas as they grow in experience. That is extremely healthy.

An issue raised by the sponsor of the Bill equally needs to be looked at. In the health service, if someone is sectioned under the Mental Health Act, it is not a simple matter of that person being sectioned in a split second. A process has to be gone through, and the person who has been sectioned is given an opportunity to challenge. Therefore, it is not assumed that that person is in need of being sectioned under that piece of legislation.

I can think of an instance — it could be over 10 years ago — of a little baby who was abandoned and subsequently and tragically lost her life as a result. There was considerable controversy because an assumption was made by the state about what type of burial that child would have — there will always be people on the other side of the argument who will say that it was the wrong one. To over-trivialise the issue and to assume that this is a very simple approach, and that you can up organ donations as a result of presumed or deemed consent takes away from the very deeply held and sincere opinions of many who believe that it should be looked at in a different way.

I do not accept that the opt-in approach has been fully exploited. I do not accept that every effort has been made by Government to ensure that people are given that very important choice — a choice that I urge anyone to make — that they are on that list so that people can benefit from those organs whenever they leave this scene of time.

We now live in a world where forms and bureaucracy are just the order of the day. We are well used to it. Whether it is to do with filling in our passports, driving licence, pension credit forms, HMRC forms or social security, there is a plethora of publicly published forms that every person, no matter what their age or walk of life, will find themselves engaged in and having to sign. I do not see any reason why we could not look at an approach such as that first, before we veer into territory that has an extremely difficult ethical question for us to answer. I would much rather not be in that position.

I am not motivated really by faith when it comes to this particular issue. I take the view that when it comes to what happens to our bodies after we are gone, it is probably well worked out by a much higher hand than mine. Therefore, it is not a motivation of faith that brings me to this position. However, it is a motivation of caring about what the state has control of, and of caring about the state assuming that, because I do not do something or my constituents do not do something, I and they are consenting to something else. I find that deeply troubling. It is something that we should all be aware of and something that, I think, we should all interrogate as thoroughly as we possibly can.

The fact is that the issue of affirmation already exists. Therefore, I do not see affirmation being the safeguard that is required to make this a good piece of legislation. In fact, quite honestly, I would have no difficulty about having a proper debate around the issue of affirmation in itself. I have considerable difficulty and would be extremely vexed — I have had this conversation with my next of kin — if my next of kin were to come along in the event of my death and say, “Well actually, his wishes are not my wishes, and therefore I am going to stand in the way of his organs being donated”. I have considerable difficulty with that. I believe that, so long as my decisions are made sincerely and with a sound mind, they should be honoured. Therefore, the issue of affirmation is something that, should a better piece of legislation be brought to the Assembly, we could perhaps look at in a lot more detail.

I want to touch again on the issue of the split-second nature of this. I think that this is where there is a difference and we do need legislation. We have often heard it said on issues as serious as this that you do not need to legislate; that you should maybe look at guidelines or something that will make things a little bit easier. To be honest, I do not see anything other than legislation dealing with this issue once and for all. That is because, ultimately, we are dealing with a split-second decision. This is unlike a court process or the issues that I listed before, where time is given. This is a split-second decision where a family member, as we stand at the minute, can decide to consent or not consent to the donation of organs. Therefore, I think that legislation is probably the best way to deal with that.

In summary, to opt out presumes that we know the time of our death. The fact is that we do not. I do not know what will happen to me as I drive back to North Antrim tonight. None of us knows what will happen as we drive back to our constituencies. Under this legislation, should it go forward, had I not got round to making my true feelings known about whether to opt out or opt in, an assumption is made that, regardless of what happens to me tonight, I consent to my organs being donated. Yes, my family has a veto, and I understand that. However, this is not about my family; it is about my wishes as an individual. This is about my choice, as an individual. Therefore, I have considerable difficulty that, in the event of my life being cut short, this state — this Assembly — has made an assumption of what my desires are. I find that deeply troubling, and I have considerable difficulty dealing with it.

I desperately want to support a Bill that will help deal with the issue, that will help increase awareness and that will help to get more people on the organ donor register. I genuinely do not believe that this Bill is the way to do it. Therefore, I am asking the sponsor and the Minister to look at a more progressive way of dealing with this. This is punitive; this is going to the very last resort first. If we go through a process where opt-in is made similar to the Spanish model that we have heard a lot about today, and if that is given a try and we find that in one year, two years or however long it has to be gauged, that we are in a position where it has made little or no difference, then, yes, let us bring it back and start having a discussion about what else we can do. However, as far as I am concerned, presumed consent is the last chance saloon. It is the place that you get to if all other options have failed and, even then, it is still going to cause an ethical issue. However, we are not at that point, and we have not exploited the other options that are open to us first of all. Therefore, I appeal to the sponsor and the Minister to get back round the table and see whether a more simple, a more effective and a more ethically neutral position can be found to bring the outcome that we all want to see.

Mr Poots: I, too, will be brief. It is an important subject, and I welcome the fact that we are having this debate. The motivation behind the Bill is good and the principle behind it is soundly based. Is it the right legislation? I very much doubt it. I think that, even if you were to accept the principles of the Bill, it would require substantial amendment, and I accept that, in fairness, that is what the Committee would and should be doing. Do I think that the actual principle of the Bill is right? At this stage, I am not convinced. We need to proceed very carefully and with extreme caution on this hugely sensitive issue.

In Northern Ireland, we have an excellent record on organ donation, both live donation and deceased donor donation. Many people in other parts of the United Kingdom are quite envious of the willingness of people in Northern Ireland to donate their organs. We are privileged to have one of the best kidney transplantation teams in the world. It was reported recently that a record number of transplants was carried out here in little Northern Ireland in one day; I think that it was six, equalling somewhere in the United States — five — and that is a demonstration of the fantastic people that we have, the skills that exist and the ability of Northern Ireland to do this really well. That goes back to the days of Professor McGeown and Dr Douglas, who started off organ donation. Indeed, my uncle received his transplant from him very many years ago.

We can be very proud of what has been achieved and what is being achieved. Therefore, if we are going to radically change that, we need to be very cautious that we are doing the right thing, not just that we are doing it for the right reasons, because that is not in contest here.

5.45 pm

One of the reasons why I wanted to speak in this debate, albeit briefly, is that I was particularly struck by something when I was Health Minister. We held a full-day session on organ donation at the MAC a couple of years ago, and we had all the key players there. The closer you get to the intensive care units and the medical people who are dealing with individuals and families who have a tragedy on their hands and have to deal with death, the less inclined they are to go down this route. They are very clear about that.

In the Belfast Trust, we have six specialist nurses for organ donation (SNODs) who are available at all times to be called upon when it is evident that someone is going to die. Those nurses have immense expertise in very carefully going through a process with people who are in the midst of the most awful grief, steering them through that process and encouraging many of them to willingly have organs donated. Those nurses cherish their ability to deal with people in a pastoral way, a caring way and a way that puts the family at the centre of the decision-making process for their loved one. Those specialist nurses indicated to me that they did not want this tool, which was seen as the big state stepping in and saying, “These organs really belong to us anyway, so we are just going to move in here.” That is not how they want to do it, and it is not how they believe they will get the best results.

I accept that the motivation behind the Bill is good. We all want to see people's lives saved. I always find it remarkable that there is a much greater willingness among people to receive organs than there is to donate them. I do not understand why people cannot step up to the plate and say, "If I am happy enough to receive someone else's organ if I needed it, I should be happy enough to donate my own." However, it is absolutely critical that all we do is done in a very measured and very thoughtful way and that we do it at the appropriate time.

My fear is that this legislation will go to the Committee and that, in the very short space of time that is left of this Assembly, we will have the potential for rushed legislation. Rushed legislation is seldom good legislation. When it is dealing with something of this nature and capacity and will have a massive impact on people who are going through the trauma of losing a loved one, very often in circumstances that they could not have anticipated, we need to be hugely cautious about what we do. It is easy to do something in this Chamber. Walking through one of those Lobbies is not difficult, but when you are sitting in an intensive care unit or another specialist area of a hospital and you are one of those nurses dealing with a family that is in the midst of a grieving process, it is different. You would do well to pay a lot of attention to what they have to say.

I urge the Assembly to be extremely cautious about what it decides to do, either today or at a later point. We need to take our time and get this right. We will have a new mandate come May, and it is important that we ensure that we do the right thing for the Northern Ireland public. We all want to see more lives saved. Just let us make sure that we get it right.

Mr Agnew: I congratulate the sponsor, Mrs Jo-Anne Dobson, on getting the Bill to this stage. Having just finished the process of a private Member's Bill, I know about the challenges and the frustration with drafting. I have not spoken to Mrs Dobson about that specific aspect and the challenges she may have faced, but I certainly found that to be the most frustrating part. Having the idea is fairly simple, as is, to some extent, defending it to the House, but getting the idea from concept to fruition and bringing forth a piece of legislation is challenging. Indeed, going through the stages of the House and getting the legislation right is challenging. I welcome the fact that Mrs Dobson acknowledged that, where the Bill can be improved, she will work with others. I had to do that with my Bill. Some almost used it as a criticism against me. They said, "Well, this Bill's significantly different at Final Stage than at Second Stage". I think that it is a strength, rather than a weakness, of a piece of legislation that it is worked and reworked until it is right. Of course, a group of people working together is going to produce a better piece of work than an individual working alone. In most instances, that is going to be the case.

Mrs Dobson reminded the House that it is Green Party policy to support the soft opt-out option. That is what I rise to do this evening. Organ donation is one of the wonders of modern science. Innovation in health — what can be achieved and what human beings have managed in terms of treatment and keeping people alive — never ceases to amaze me.

The term "gift" has been used. Organ donation is indeed a gift. It is one that I have chosen to opt into in our current system. I would certainly be happy to have the provisions of the Bill applied to me. I am also proud to be a platelet donor. My partner, in the birth of both our children, required platelet transfusions. I thank those who chose to donate platelets for their generosity; they helped to ensure that her life and the lives of my children were protected. With blood donation, platelet donation and organ donation, there is the ever challenging issue of keeping the awareness there and keeping the issue in the public mind to ensure that donors take time out of their busy lives, in the case of living donation, and are sufficiently aware, in the case of deceased donation, to, in advance of death, make that aspect known.

We have seen from the sponsor's consultation, the Public Health Agency polling and the UK-wide polling, the level of support out there for organ donation. Whilst I accept that there is not a direct correlation between supporting organ donation and being a willing donor, I think that there would be a strong correlation between them. That is some of the basis on which I support the legislation.

I first raised the issue of a soft opt-out system — and I was checking the date — exactly four years ago today in a question for written answer to, as it was then, Minister Poots, asking what consideration had been given to such a proposal. It was in the context that the Welsh Assembly was considering the issue. I was hopeful at that time that legislation would come forward from the Department. That, obviously, has not been the case. I welcome the commitment of the Member to bringing it forward in the absence of progress from the Department on the way forward.

My personal connection to it is through my relationship with one of my constituents, William Johnson, who will be known to Mrs Dobson. He has campaigned tirelessly to promote organ donation. He spent the best part of a decade on dialysis, but has, thankfully, received a successful transplant and is experiencing the benefits of that. For many years, he was — I was going to say the word "frustrated", but in fact I never knew him to complain — but he was one of those people who, in the absence of an available organ, had to suffer the lesser quality of life of having to live on dialysis, without receiving a transplant, until recently. When it comes to the Bill, the key question has to be: will it work; is it effective? There have been differing interpretations of the evidence.

I come now to some of the points that Mr Ross raised. If we are convinced that we have the evidence that it works, then, in my view, the end does justify the means. I have listened to the Member's concerns, but I am not compelled that his fears about the role of the state in any way negate my desire to see more lives saved through an opt-out system, if the evidence is available that the opt-out system will increase donation. Mr Ross has questioned that evidence.

I looked to the evidence of Shepherd et al, from 2014, which concludes that countries that have an opt-out system across the board have a higher donation rate than those that have an opt-in system. The evidence also suggests that the opt-out system alone is not enough to ensure greater donation. Whilst the correlation suggests that the opt-out system will lead to increased donations, on its own it is not sufficient to maximise donation. I await the Health Minister's response, but I urge him to support not just the legislation, but the other areas of best practice that are required to maximise the benefits of the legislation, because I think the legislation is part of —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Certainly.

Mr Ross: If the Member is encouraging the Minister to look at the areas of best practice, that will be Spain and the United States of America. Does he accept that neither of those countries use presumed consent? So he is actually asking the Minister to move to a system where we will not have presumed consent and where we maintain the voluntary opt-in system, but where we have greater public awareness of the issue and specialised nurses in hospitals. Those are the two drivers that have evidence from around the world, rather than moving towards presumed consent.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I referred previously to the evidence that, when taken in the round, the correlation is that countries that have the opt-in system perform better than countries that have the opt-out system. Whilst there may be countries that are doing other things that have improved organ donation — the Member mentioned some of the areas, such as the speciality transplant nurses — that does not preclude an opt-out system. The two can go hand in hand.

Looking at the evidence, I very much believe that the — I better make sure I get my terms the right way round — opt-out system is beneficial, but, on its own, it is not the silver bullet; it on its own will not achieve everything. We should look at the examples of best practice and at countries where things are being done well, regardless of whether there is opt in or an opt out, and replicate the other areas as well as the soft opt-out system. My interpretation of the evidence is that it increases the likelihood of positive outcomes in organ donation. I think that that has to be the approach. I do not think for a second that we can pass this legislation and say, "Problem solved. We have a queue of donors; we will no longer have a deficiency of supply."

We need to look at the other areas. One of the most important things is to ensure that quick decisions are made and that organs are properly preserved, transported and maintained. This is one part of the picture, but it is a positive and significant part of how we improve in this area.

6.00 pm

Looking at the best evidence — and promotion was raised — we still need to ensure that families know the will of the individual. That does not go away. We need to ensure that the pastoral care that Mr Poots mentioned is still there. Families will be no less grieving whether we have an opt-in or an opt-out system. The Bill does indeed empower the family; it keeps a degree of power and say with them. I know that there will be some debate about what that should look like. One of the key parts of the Committee scrutiny and amending stages will be to ensure that we have that aspect of the Bill to balance deemed consent with the views of the family. We have to ensure that we get that right.

It is not simply a matter of, "Pass this legislation and problem solved": we still have to be diligent, promote the legislation and raise awareness. We still need that conversation. Indeed, as Mr Ross highlighted, Mrs Dobson's bringing the Bill forward has increased awareness in and of itself. I go back to my own Bill: I know the frustration with the time that it takes to get to this stage. The advantage is that awareness of your Bill is now greater because of the time that it has taken; the time that there has been for discussion, media interest and debate in the Committee and in the House. That is all positive. Indeed, should the Bill be passed, as I hope it will, the two-year lead-in time will allow for that debate to take place and public awareness to be raised. Those are all necessary pieces of the jigsaw.

Figures have been discussed, so I will not go through them, but it is clear that there is support for organ donation. It is clear that the vast majority of people support it. Unfortunately, the vast majority are not on the register. That is a discrepancy and a problem that the Bill will go some way to tackling. Mrs Dobson's consultation has had a positive response. Previous polling indicates that there is positive feeling towards this type of legislation. The Committee consultation will further tease out the evidence, so, by the time the Bill makes its way through the House, it will get significant public attention and will be an opportunity for the public to articulate its views.

As I say, the legislation will not fix the situation overnight, but it will create an opportunity to build on the good work that we have already done on organ donation, enhance it and make Northern Ireland a leader in organ donation rates. That is the opportunity. It requires the legislation, the goodwill and dedication of the Minister and his Department, and that public awareness campaign. Collectively, those things provide us with a tremendous opportunity that, I hope, we will not let go to waste.

Mr McCallister: I am long on record as advocating this type of approach. I would like to begin by congratulating Mrs Dobson. I know the huge volume of work that goes into bringing a private Members' Bill in normal circumstances, and one with as many challenging issues as this Bill is particularly difficult.

Of course, as with every piece of legislation, Members have quite rightly used the usual tactics of trying to kill it by saying that it might not be compliant with human rights or that the Welsh were advised against it but ignored it. All those arguments will be made against the Bill, as we have already heard today.

In raising the issues, the Bill and the debate — not only the debates that Mrs Dobson has had over the past few years as this policy has been developed but the publicity and the public debate — have been to the good. Strangely, one of the key issues — other Members have alluded to it — is that, when you have consented to donate your organs, your family can overrule that consent. It is about having the debate here, but it is most important to have that discussion at home with your family to make sure that there is absolutely no doubt about what your wishes would be.

Of course, like many colleagues here, I have met constituents and know constituents very well who have received donations or are organ donors. I know families who have been in those very difficult circumstances, and I know that it brought them some modicum of comfort that their loved one was fit to bring life, give life and extend life to others in what can only be the most horrendous circumstances that anyone would ever face.

The publicity and the debate and having that discussion around dinner tables at any time about what people's wishes would be are hugely important. That is why public debate is important. Were the Bill not to be amended in any way, it would probably be the only Bill that ever went through the House or the Committee process and was not amended. That is why I am very opposed to accelerated passage when Ministers propose it, because there is an expertise at times that the Committee can tap into and use to tease out the issues and, at times, address concerns. It will not address all the concerns that Mr Ross has expressed, because he is opposed to the principles of the Bill. I know, from knowing him, that his are deeply and sincerely held views. In some regards, I am probably closer to his views on the size and role of the state, but I disagree with him on this. I think that we can address some of his issues and make it easy for people to opt out.

The discussion and the publicity campaign on those issues should not just be a one-off if the Bill is successful but should be ongoing. As Mr Agnew pointed out, it is about looking at best practice around the world and not being afraid to challenge ourselves about what our Department, our hospitals and our units do. Can we improve, and can we put coordinators in place who can deal with that and help to increase numbers? Quite frankly, we lose too many organs where there is some discussion and the wishes of the family are unclear. We lose too many viable organs that could prove to be a life-saving donation to others. That is of huge regret to us all.

I do not doubt that everyone here is sincere about upping our game significantly in what we do with organ donation, and I thank Mrs Dobson for having the tenacity to introduce the Bill and to keep going with it. The Committee will work hard at it. It will get its Committee Stage, and the Committee will possibly have to work hard to keep within the six-week period. If it needs an extension, it will have to get an agreed timetable that will allow the Bill to get the detailed scrutiny required and to make sure that the process, including any amendments, changes or advice that the Department may bring, can be completed by the end of the mandate. The issue is too important for us not to make some significant progress on it. I support the Bill.

Ms Sugden: I support the Bill's Second Stage because the overarching principle, which we should all consider, is that it will save lives. That said, I am not fully convinced by some aspects of the Bill, and it is usually the aspects that are dependent on each other, because it almost seems that one thing has to happen for the other to be fulfilled. Therefore, I believe that it is necessary that we challenge the Bill and look at the aspects of it that we are unsure of in order to uphold its integrity moving forward. It is an important Bill, and it will affect people's lives. We have a responsibility as Assembly Members to give it the consideration that it deserves. In the legislative stages to come, we look forward to doing that.

I acknowledge Mrs Dobson's commitment: it began on the birth of her son, and she has carried it through to the Chamber. She has also instigated debate outside the House. I understand that, since the public debate in January, there have been more cases of organ donation. Even if the Bill should fall at whatever stage in the Assembly, Mrs Dobson should be proud of the fact that she has saved and changed lives.

While preparing for the debate last night, I raised the issue with my partner and we had a conversation. I made my wishes clear: I said that, should anything happen to me, I would be more than happy to donate my organs. I believe that I am on the register; I am not quite sure. I ticked that box when I was upgrading my driving licence. I think that I have gone online, but there has been no follow-up since, so I am not sure whether I am on the register. Perhaps that is my fault, but it is assumed in my own head. Even that in itself is a problem. Should something awful happen, God forbid, and my partner is not approached and I had wanted to give my organs away, someone would have lost the opportunity to have his or her life saved or improved greatly. Mrs Dobson's proposal removes the confusion and gives another opportunity to save a life, and I keep coming back to the point that that is the overarching principle of the Bill. While I have reservations on some aspects, that is something that we should all bear in mind.

I wish to consider the public consultation on the Bill. It demonstrates that, of those who responded, 82% agreed to change the law to soft opt-out. I very deliberately said "those who responded", because I know that a Public Health Agency survey indicated quite a significant figure. I do not believe that the comparison of the two undermines the public consultation conducted by Mrs Dobson; I think that it represents the view of those who are informed about organ donation that it is the right way to go. It strengthens the case that we need to have some sort of public awareness campaign around organ donation, because the likelihood is that most people would then subscribe to it.

I will touch on some of the aspects that I am maybe questioning. I would not go as far to say that I disagree with them, but I am certainly not convinced. Indeed, for me to move forward in supporting the Bill, I have to feel that I am convinced on these issues. Like other Members, I have looked at family consent. On one hand, I believe that the Bill will strengthen the purpose of family consent. Does someone wish to confirm for me that family consent is required by European law? I think that the Bill will reinforce that and make it stronger.

I recently read the Hansard report of Mrs Dobson's presentation to the Committee, and I would like her to clarify a point for me. Is it currently the case that clinicians are able to remove organs from deceased registered donors without the consent of family should they not be available to take the decision, for example?

6.15 pm

Mrs Dobson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Sugden: Yes, sure.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for raising that point. Quite a lengthy document needs to be signed, and no clinician would ever remove organs without having that consent.

Ms Sugden: I appreciate the Member clarifying that for me. If it is the case that people on the organ register cannot donate their organs without that consent for whatever reason, are we losing people who are willing to donate because a family member maybe has not been available to sign that consent form? I appreciate you clarifying that for me, because it does not weaken the argument in any way. I also noted during your presentation —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Ms Sugden: Yes, please go ahead.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. For anybody who wants to see a higher rate of organ donation, one of the major issues is how you get a higher rate of family consent in a difficult position. My argument is that, with an opt-in system, at least family members have something to make a judgement on, because they have either had that discussion with their loved one, or their loved one has signed up to the organ donor register. Whilst signing up to the organ donor register on its own will not necessarily lead to an organ donation, at least the family have something solid to look at in guiding them to their decision.

My concern about moving to presumed consent, deemed consent and an opt-out system is that an individual does not have to make a declaration that they are a willing organ donor during their life; they simply do not have to do anything. Does that give the family more or less certainty when they are being asked the question? My contention and some of the evidence from elsewhere in the world is that clinicians feel that that gives families less certainty because a loved one has never made an active move in their life to say that they are a willing organ donor. In those circumstances, the Bill will be counterproductive, and that is where one of the concerns comes from. Does the Member not accept that what we want is people to give an indication during their life that they are a willing organ donor, rather than trying to move to a position where silence on the issue is somehow interpreted as consent, which will put families in much more difficult circumstances?

Ms Sugden: I thank the Member for his intervention. I do not quite accept that rationale, because I think that people who really do not want to give their organs should they pass away will make that clear to their family. It is a case of changing the culture and the ethos in Northern Ireland. I was quite taken by a quotation from someone who, when presenting to the Committee alongside Mrs Dobson, suggested that we should nearly make this part of the dying process, and that seems to be the case in other parts of the world.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Ms Sugden: Yes, please go ahead.

Mr Ross: I just want to ask where the Member gets her confidence that, by not opting out, that person has made an active decision and that they would have told their family members. There are many reasons why somebody will not have got round to opting out of organ donation. How does that give families certainty that they know what their loved one's wishes were? That is the major concern. If somebody has never been forced to make the decision in their life, it makes the family's decision much more difficult, which leads to a higher refusal rate when it comes to family consent. I just do not see where she gets her confidence that anybody who is opposed to this will necessarily opt out if they do not know how to do it or are not aware that they are on the list and all those sorts of issues.

Ms Sugden: Again, I thank the Member for his intervention. I do not suppose that we can ever be confident in that. I suppose that it is one aspect of the Bill that it has to coincide with a really significant public awareness campaign. Equally, I could say this: where do we get the confidence that my wishes to donate my organs and potentially save four to five lives will be respected after I am gone? I do not have that confidence. The overriding principle for me is that we will save lives in this respect. I do not think that we can have certainty on both sides of the argument, but, at least on one side, we are increasing the opportunity to save lives.

I want to bring in my other concern about family consent. I know that, in Committee, a couple of Members raised the issue of whether consent meant consent. That goes back to my point about having confidence that someone will fulfil my wishes should I pass away. I fully appreciate that the family needs to remain central to this, but there will be cases where, although the deceased was willing to donate an organ, their family will not be willing to make that decision after their death. That is entirely understandable, and I appreciate the reasons around that. Has Mrs Dobson considered provision for willing donors who know that their families would not be able to make the decision in the event of their death? In a soft opt-out system, could there be provision for people who really want to opt in and want to donate their organs after death that almost overrides the family decision? For example, could it be done even through their last will and testament, if that were possible, although I know that timing can be a bit difficult in that respect. According to this legislation, would it supersede the family consent element, or would it even supersede the European law around the family needing to consent to it?

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. I also thank her for her interest in organ donation. You alluded to the fact that you can make your wishes known in a will. Given the timing and the critical window we have for transplanting organs, that would not always be the best way. The safeguard you are talking about is ultimately to make sure that, if you are a passionate supporter of organ donation and you want your wishes to be considered and are not sure if your family can make that decision, whether it is through grief or if they are opposed to it, this would be where the advocates would come in to make your wishes known.

Ms Sugden: I thank the Member for her response. The next question that came to my mind is that the current system is not stimulating the conversation around organ donation.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Ms Sugden: Sure. Go ahead.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for being so generous in giving time. She made an interesting point about somebody who makes a declaration during their life that they want to be a willing organ donor but knows that their family may veto that. It is an interesting area, and it is one that some of my colleagues have raised with Mrs Dobson in Committee. I suppose that the very practical difficulty of doing that is that you are putting not only families in a very difficult position in a trauma unit but doctors too. In practice, would you really want to have a system that puts families and doctors in conflict? In the scenario where families do not give consent in a trauma unit or at the end of someone's life, you are potentially creating an opportunity for conflict between doctors and families, which is exactly what we want to avoid.

Ms Sugden: Yes, I accept that point. If there were a provision that ensured that a deceased person's wishes were fulfilled, perhaps that would take away the conflict. No one could argue with it in that respect. It is how you put that into practice. Logistically, a last will and testament would not work, because there is just no time, but I would be interested to see how that could be considered through Consideration Stage.

It is true to say that the current system is not stimulating the conversation. I am keen to understand how the new system would stimulate the conversation. My understanding is that it would become the norm that, in the event of someone's death, they would donate unless otherwise stated or if the family did not want them to donate. Are we stimulating the conversation around the family having to make a decision that had not been discussed prior to the person passing away? I have a bit of a reservation about that, because it even alludes to some of the points that Mr Ross has raised.

My final point is that Northern Ireland is a generous country. We are the leading country for living donation, but that does not seem to be reflected in deceased organ donation rates. For me, the difference seems to be consent and who gives it. If both systems require family consent and the ultimate variable is family consent, why do we need to change the system? Again, it comes back to the awareness campaign and how effective that will be. If awareness campaigns do not work currently, will we have an awareness campaign that will be effective in upholding the legislation? They are dependent on one another.

There are many questions to be raised around organ donation, but, ultimately, I come back to the overarching principle. This is an opportunity to save more lives, I know that we have to put more into that than just that one notion, but it is a notion that will be dictated by everybody's lives and the decisions they make. I have no issues at this stage saying that I support the Bill, but I will look for it to be strengthened in the other arguments that I have presented.

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute, to respond to some of the points that were made in the debate, to set out the work that is being done by my Department and to explain my position on aspects of the Bill. I acknowledge the Member for Upper Bann's achievement in bringing her Human Transplantation Bill before the Assembly and her contribution to raising awareness about organ donation. I know that she has strived for this, and I share her aim of seeing many more of our fellow citizens who need an organ to improve their health or, indeed, in many cases, to save their life receive that organ at the earliest opportunity.

This year marks 21 years of the NHS organ donor register. In the last 21 years, more than 55,000 people across the United Kingdom have received an organ transplant thanks to someone donating when they died. A total of 21 million people across the United Kingdom have registered to help others. At 30 September 2015, 647,237 people residing in Northern Ireland were on the UK organ donor register. That is approximately 42% of the adult population. The number of registrations per year on the organ donor register has increased from 16,657 in 2010-11 to 36,111 in 2015, so the number of people registering is rising considerably. Those are remarkable achievements, and Northern Ireland has played its part in the success of the organ donor register. That is why I ask Members to think very carefully about giving their support to the Bill, because it proposes that, in future, in Northern Ireland, we will move from a tried and tested voluntary registration system to a statutory soft opt-out system of organ donation. That would be a major change in our long-standing approach to organ donation. In doing so, the Bill raises important issues of ethical, legal, medical and social significance that require careful consideration by the Assembly.

Laudable as the Bill's aims are — none of us would disagree with the objective of increasing the number of donors who could help to save lives — the Bill asks the Assembly to take something of a leap in the dark, because we have no way of knowing what the impact of the Bill will be. There is no clear evidence that a statutory approach will deliver significantly higher rates of donated organs than we have today. In fact, while Spain, which has been much mentioned during the debate, is recognised as having a higher number of donors than the United Kingdom, it does so without having an opt-out system. It legislated for one but never properly or fully enacted it. Going by 2013-14 statistics, Northern Ireland's donor per million figure is also higher than those of many countries around the world — like Estonia, Austria, Italy and Finland — that have opt-out or deemed consent systems.

Until this year, we have never had a statutory requirement anywhere in the United Kingdom to make clear our wishes about donating our organs after death. While the Bill makes provision for families to have the last say in the clauses covering deemed consent and affirmation, even with those safeguards, the Bill, if enacted, will introduce a fundamental change to our organ donation policy in Northern Ireland. These are radical changes, and I fear that the proposed move to statutory soft opt-out could undermine the achievements of the last 21 years by making organ donation a controversial act rather than the act of generosity that it is today. I know that some will say that, if a statutory soft opt-out system saves even one additional life, it is a step worth taking: I would reply that the success of the voluntary system of registration over the past 21 years should not be changed without careful consideration of the potential consequences.

My Department's policy is to fully implement the NHS Blood and Transplant strategy on organ donation. The strategy does not propose that soft opt-out legislation should be introduced as a UK-wide policy. The strategy aims to raise awareness and increase the number of donors and donated organs through society and individuals, NHS hospitals and staff, NHS Blood and Transplant and commissioners working together to achieve the desired outcomes. My Department is committed to working with our partners in England, Scotland and Wales to achieve NHS Blood and Transplant's overall aim, which is for the United Kingdom to match world-class performance in organ donation and transplantation. Given that the NHS Blood and Transplant strategy does not propose that soft opt-out legislation should be introduced as a UK-wide policy, I ask Members to consider whether the introduction of the Bill is premature.

I say that because we will have the opportunity to learn from the impact that statutory soft opt-out will have on organ donation in a part of the United Kingdom when this system comes into operation in Wales next month.

6.30 pm

Northern Ireland and Wales operate their organ donor awareness and transplantation service under the United Kingdom's NHS Blood and Transplant partnership, as do England and Scotland. Northern Ireland and Wales have been members of this successful partnership, which, in the past 21 years, has enabled 55,000 people across the UK to receive an organ transplant. Northern Ireland and Wales have a similar culture that shapes social attitudes towards organ donation. We also have the opportunity in the months ahead to assess the impact that the NHS organ donor register, launched in July, will have. The new register extends the choices that a person can record when they sign it. Previously, we could register only to be an organ donor: the new register provides options to formally register our wishes to be a donor or not to be a donor and to record the details of two representatives to make the decision for us after death. The new organ donor register has, therefore, given us the ability to voluntarily opt out and to nominate named individuals to make the decision to donate or not to donate our organs.

Let us not rush to legislate when we have the opportunity to learn from the experience in Wales and the impact of the new organ donor register in the months ahead. If statutory soft opt-out significantly increases the number of donors and transplants in Wales, many may wish to consider legislation more favourably; if it makes little or no difference, the cautious approach that I advocate will be seen to have been prudent and sensible.

Having made clear my views on the central principle of the Bill and before I make some comments about its content, I would like to say a few words about the team that would be required in part to deliver the Bill in our hospitals if it becomes law. I visited the regional centre for renal medicine and transplantation in the Belfast Trust and met the excellent team that provides that life-saving service. They are an impressive group of professionals. In my time as Minister, I do think that I have met a group of clinicians more dedicated to their work and less afraid to tell you that they want to be world-class. The world-class nature of the service was clearly seen on 13 September when a record five kidney transplants took place in less than 24 hours. That falls just one short of the world record of six transplants in a day, in Texas in 2013, and equals the UK record of transplants performed in a single unit on a single day. A team of 14 doctors, 20 nurses and three scientists were critical to the effort. Notably, several operating theatre nurses came into work on their day off. I am sure that the Assembly will join me in paying tribute to their remarkable skills and dedicated service to their community. They are a truly amazing team of professionals whom we ought to be immensely proud of.

I have given my view, but, on a subject as serious as this, it is of paramount importance that we hear loudly and clearly the views of clinicians. Whatever we feel about the Bill, they will have to operate with the legislation that we might pass. The consultants in the aforementioned regional centre for renal medicine and transplantation in Belfast City Hospital collectively as one wrote to me to express their common position on the Bill. Their views are worth hearing, so I will read their letter in full and will publish it on the Department's website as well as placing a copy in the Assembly Library. The letter reads:

"Dear Minister,

The Belfast Health and Social Care Trust, as providers of the only solid organ transplant service in Northern Ireland, have an obvious interest in the above proposed legislation in relation to organ donation.

While fully supportive of the principle of increasing the number of deceased donor organs available to provide life-saving transplantation, we are cautious about any change which, although well-meaning, might potentially have a detrimental impact on the public's willingness to donate.

There are differing opinions within both the medical profession and society at large with regard to the acceptability of an opt-out system. The perception by some that this effectively means acquisition by the state of body parts, and removal of the altruistic aspect of donation, is of concern. These and other ethical issues have prevented the global adoption of presumed consent legislation."

The letter goes on:

"The Public Health Agency's research in 2013 on public attitudes to organ donation and transplantation revealed a high level of misunderstanding about organ donation. However, the number of living kidney donors per million of population in Northern Ireland is over twice the UK average and is comparable to the highest international living donor rates. This reflects the generosity of the population here and, with understanding of the issues, a very positive attitude towards transplantation. With further public education, it is probable that there will be a better and more widespread willingness to increase deceased organ donation and that an understanding of the benefits of legislative change would also be achieved and accepted.

The higher rate of organ donation in opt-out jurisdictions persists, even when the next of kin are still asked for their approval before donation. Rather than enforcement of a legislative decree, the increase in deceased donation in this setting reflects increased public awareness, societal attitudinal change to donation and improved infrastructure."

The letter then concludes:

"We suggest, therefore, that hesitation may be appropriate at this time. Deferring any change would allow firstly for re-evaluation of the impact of the Public Health Agency's public education campaign and secondly, assessment of the impact of a similar change made by the Welsh Assembly which will take effect on 1 December 2015."

That letter is signed by the consultant nephrologists and transplant surgeons at the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust.

They are lengthy, but powerful and important words and we should listen to them. Two sections of the letter stand out for me. First, the clinicians state, and I repeat:

"While fully supportive of the principle of increasing the number of deceased donor organs available to provide life-saving transplantation, we are cautious about any change which, although well-meaning, may potentially have a detrimental impact on the public's willingness to donate."

I am sure that none of us, least of all Mrs Dobson, wishes to have a detrimental impact instead of a beneficial one. However, that is what the consultant nephrologists and transplant surgeons at the City Hospital fear, and that should sound a note of caution.

I understand their point about a potential negative impact. At present, regardless of the register, 100% of individuals are potential donors and specialist nurses and clinicians have to have the extremely sensitive and difficult conversations with relatives after a death. The experts fear that, if there is a level of backlash against legislation, a large number of people opting out from the outset, could limit that from 100% to, say, 70% or 75%. Clearly, that would not be an outcome that any of us would want, but it is certainly a distinct possibility. The Public Health Agency's evaluation work found that 6% of those currently on the organ donor register said that they would opt out of the system if it became mandatory. Some 23% agreed that organ donation is a gift which the opt-out system will take away. There is a worrying risk that a sizeable number will remove themselves from the register forever.

The second significant section in the letter surrounds the consultants' and surgeons' explicit care for caution. They say:

"We suggest, therefore, that hesitation may be appropriate at this time. Deferring any change would allow firstly, for re-evaluation of the impact of the Public Health Agency's public education campaign and, secondly, assessment of the impact of a similar change made by the Welsh Assembly which will take effect on 1 December 2015."

Clearly, they are urging caution; a wait-and-see approach, not ruling out legislation forever, but urging us to defer change.

This is undoubtedly an emotional issue, but that does not mean that we can or should simply ditch evidence. On a range of issues, I have found that, as Minister of Health, I am encouraged by others to set to one side my personal beliefs, wherever they might emanate from, and follow the science and the evidence. On an issue as potentially far-reaching and controversial as this, we would do well to examine the evidence and listen to our clinicians. Views like those recently expressed by Professor John Fabre, of King's College, London, who wrote in the journal 'Clinical Evidence' that:

"there is scant evidence that presumed consent will be effective."

So, regardless of whether the Bill passes its Second Stage, I want to carefully consider the clinical view and the evidence about an opt-out system. To that end, it is my intention to establish a working group that will do just that: consider what clinicians believe is best, and examine the available evidence about an opt-out system.

Should the Bill pass its Second Stage today, that view will be more important than ever. If it does not, I am still prepared to work with our clinicians, especially as we will have evidence from Wales's experience to consider.

I will now make some comments on the detail of the legislation. If it becomes law, the Bill will have significant implications for my Department's organ transplantation policy and for everyone in Northern Ireland. We must therefore ensure that it provides maximum clarity about the donation and use of human organs in transplantation. That will be of concern to all in Northern Ireland, who in the future may be faced with making decisions on the donation of their loved one's organs.

If the Bill completes its Second Stage today and moves to Committee Stage, appropriate and sufficient time must be given to scrutinising a Bill of such importance. I know that the Committee has a busy workload at present, and giving the Bill sufficient and appropriate scrutiny could mean that other legislation falls. I have heard it suggested that the Committee Stage be expedited or that all evidence sessions be held on one day. That would be a mistake. It would not reflect the seriousness of the legislation, nor would it permit proper scrutiny. It would not inspire public confidence in the outcome either. I look to the wise judgement of the Committee Chair and members to ensure that the Bill gets the most robust scrutiny.

We need to ensure that the Bill gives clear direction on the regulations to be made by my Department in subordinate legislation. Those regulations are required under clause 7, which deals with express consent to transplantation activities involving excluded material, clause 8, which deals with deemed consent to activities involving material from living adults who lack the capacity to consent, and clause 9, which deals with appointed representatives to express consent for transplant activities. Clause 9 is especially important, where the individual concerned may disagree with the views of appointed representatives on organ donation.

In deemed consent cases, the individual specified through qualifying relationships in clause 10 will be an important reference for the necessary information about the views of the potential donor in order to ensure that the donation does not go ahead if the deceased had a known objection to organ donation. Deemed consent as described in the Bill is at the heart of some of the most difficult conversations that any family might face. We must therefore ensure that the Bill provides appropriate safeguards in that sensitive area. One aspect of clause 4 in particular concerns me and needs more consideration and is to do with the designation of a "friend of long standing" in clause 10(1)(h). Nowhere in the legislation does it detail what a "friend of long standing" is, what counts as long-standing or what constitutes a friendship.

Clauses 5 and 8 are also important, owing to their ethical intent. The clauses cover issues concerning the capacity of individuals to consent and, again, need to be clear and easily understood. They also need to be considered in the context of the Mental Capacity Bill, currently under consideration by the Assembly, to ensure consistency of approach.

The schedule to the Bill proposes extensive amendments to the Human Tissue Act 2004 and the related codes of practice issued by the Human Tissue Authority. If the Bill passes to Committee Stage, my Department will need to consult the authority fully on those amendments, as its codes will provide guidance on the implementation of the Bill's amendments to the 2004 Act. My Department believes that it will be essential for it also to produce a code of practice to ensure that guidance on the new transplantation policy proposed by the Bill is available for healthcare professionals, patients and their families — guidance that they can easily understand and apply at hospital level. In addition to the codes of practice, there are other important operational matters that will require careful consideration. Those include an assessment of the impact on critical-care capacity in our hospitals of an increase in the number of donors.

Clause 1 in the Bill places a duty on my Department to promote organ donation in a campaign at least once a year that informs the public about the circumstances in which consent to transplantation is deemed to be given and the role of relatives and friends in affirming deemed consent. The campaign should also increase awareness about transplantation. My Department has estimated that the annual recurrent cost of that campaign could be in the region of £250,000.

I understand that the Member for Upper Bann has said — indeed, she repeated it today — that information available to her indicates that the cost of implementing the Bill is likely to be between £2 million and £5 million. In 2012, the Welsh Government estimated that the cost of implementing similar legislation in Wales would be £8 million, discounted over 10 years. On a population-proportionate basis, the estimated cost of implementing the Bill in Northern Ireland is therefore £5.3 million when inflation is taken into account.

6.45 pm

That estimated cost would cover new investment to set up and maintain the infrastructure required to operate a statutory soft opt-out system of organ donation. The costs would include business and system changes, the processing of opt-out requests, public communications and evaluation. In addition to the new investment in infrastructure, costs would also likely be incurred from any increase in the number of organs retrieved from deceased people and transplanted. Those are variable costs that will differ by organ type. Currently, my Department contributes in the region of £2 million annually to NHS Blood and Transplant, including for the retrieval and transport of organs given by donors in Northern Ireland that are clinically suitable for patients awaiting an organ in the rest of the UK. My Department would therefore need additional resources to implement this Bill.

I think that legitimate questions exist about the human rights compliance of this legislation, and I will be seeking the Attorney General's view about that important aspect. I hope that the Assembly will see from my comments that, if this Bill passes to Committee Stage today, the Committee will need to ensure that the content of the Bill is clear and leaves no room for ambiguity in its interpretation if it becomes law.

I have raised some important points of caution. I have also set out the views of clinicians as they have conveyed them to me. I want to set out my own position on the Bill. I said at the start of my speech that I share the aim of the Member for Upper Bann to see many more of our fellow citizens who need an organ to improve their health, and, indeed, in many cases, to save their life, receive that organ at the earliest opportunity. The debate around this Bill has made me think about the issue in ways that I had not thought about it before. It has provoked not just my own thinking, but conversations in my family. I have, for the first time, signed up to the organ donor register. While I may have some misgivings about the Bill, it has at least made me see the merits of voluntarily signing up to the register.

My predecessors and I have previously stated that making a decision on any legislative change for organ donation is not one to be taken lightly, just as an individual's decision to go on the organ donor register should not be taken lightly either. The last place we want to be is, in seeking to do the right thing for the right reasons, actually doing the wrong thing. That remains my position. It also appears to be the view of clinicians.

The new organ donor register also needs time to establish public awareness of the additional registration options. It is hoped that the new register will encourage more people to donate their organs and to make their wishes clear. I firmly believe that my Department's policy of increased public awareness, education on the key issues, promoting the new organ donor register and the further development of transplantation services through UK-wide action is the best way forward for organ donation in Northern Ireland.

I believe that it would be better for this Assembly to wait and see the impact of the introduction of the statutory soft opt-out system in Wales next month. As it stands, this legislation would come into full operation on 31 May 2018, regardless of the Welsh experience or the clinical evidence available between now and then. I do not believe that either can be ignored.

I will listen very carefully to Mrs Dobson as she concludes the debate. She exhibits a willingness to accept the need expressed by the team of consultants at the renal transplantation centre that waiting and seeing is the best course of action. If she is willing to embrace the need to reflect this in her Bill by way of an amendment, in spite of my serious concerns, I am prepared to work with the Member and make resources from my Department available to craft the Bill into one that is workable and that reflects the need to consider the views of clinicians, the evidence available and the experience in Wales, should the Bill pass Second Stage today.

For our part, my senior official who is leading on this issue has already met Mrs Dobson to indicate my Department's willingness to engage with her because, believe me, this Bill needs some work. There are too many elements of the Bill that are too unclear and uncertain in such an incredibly important and potentially controversial piece of law. Just a few days ago, the British Medical Association, which had been supportive of the Bill, wrote to all MLAs expressing concerns about clause 4, stating its belief that the current drafting "could lead to confusion". Whenever supporters of the Bill are sounding notes of caution, we should respect that and reflect it in our scrutiny.

I believe that it is critical that we take our time, consider the clinical evidence and get this right. If the Member for Upper Bann illustrates a willingness to work with me and my Department to make the legislation workable and reflect the fact that the experience of elsewhere must be taken into account before full operation, I will not stand in its way today. However, if the legislation put before the House at a later stage is still concerning clinicians, I will revisit my position.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

Strong views on either side of the argument clearly exist in the Chamber, just as they will exist in our community. As we move forward with the issue, I caution that those who oppose the Bill today are not pilloried as being against organ donation. Quite the opposite is true, I am sure. Concerns about the state overreaching or adding stress to bereaved families at a very difficult time are entirely legitimate and should be respected and not characterised as being against organ donation or opposed to more donors.

It is an incredibly important issue, deserving of mature debate and careful consideration. I urge the House to debate the issue intensely but without rancour and to carefully consider the issues raised today.

Mrs Dobson: It certainly has been a marathon debate. I thank all those Members who spoke during it. In opening the debate, I said that I rose first as a mother of a successful kidney transplant recipient, and it is in that spirit that I wish to continue to speak in closing the debate. I repeat my offer to continue to work with any Member on any aspect of the Bill. That has always been my intention.

I well remember the Health Minister's immediate predecessor predicting in the Chamber earlier this year that this debate would be:

"a very interesting test of the maturity of the Assembly."
[Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 102, p77, col 1].

That is one prediction that has certainly come true. I thank Members from across the House for their contributions. As I said earlier when talking about organ donation, there is always a need for emotion and sensitivity, and we have certainly had a considerable amount of both in the debate. I am thankful to Members for that.

We have heard much in the House about the Donaldson report in the last couple of weeks. I would like to reference Sir Liam in relation to his views on organ donation. In 2007, the then Chief Medical Officer was at pains to point out that, as we face an ageing population, the demand for organs will inevitably increase. That is an important point, which I do not believe can be overemphasised, especially with recent research from Age UK, which has been raised in the House in relation to other issues. It shows that the number of people over 85 in the United Kingdom is predicted to more than double in the next 23 years to over 3.4 million people. That will inevitably have an impact on our services here in Northern Ireland. As I said earlier, when viewing the Bill, we should look at the position we want to be in in five, 10, 15 or even 20 years' time.

Those figures are to be welcomed and celebrated, but an ageing population will inevitably continue to put pressure on the demand for organs. Sir Liam said:

"People are dying, people are suffering and many people are living on a knife-edge of despair waiting for a phone call that never comes. My view has always been that we need to act with solidarity, generosity and humanity to give these people a future."

Those comments were made eight years ago. As Sir Liam is a senior medical expert, I welcome his continued support for the soft opt-out system and recognise that he supports, as I do, the key role that the family has to play in that system. All too often when we plan, we do not lift our heads to the future. Dealing with the here and now often becomes more important and pressing. On an issue like organ donation, it is very clear, and has been said again today, that change does not and cannot happen overnight. It is a process. It requires careful planning and a vision for the future in, as I said, five, 10, 15 or 20 years' time.

When our fantastic clinicians were pioneering surgery at the City Hospital in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s — I think particularly of Professor Mary "Mollie" McGeown CBE, whose portrait still hangs proudly on the eleventh floor — little did they think that medicine would move on quite so dramatically. Professor McGeown proudly oversaw the opening of a purpose-built transplant unit at the City Hospital in 1968, and a dialysis unit was established on the same site the following year. Countless local lives have been saved in the 47 years since, and the unit that she proudly oversaw has changed dramatically since that time.

Equally, I know that we now have the ability to transplant organs that may have previously been rejected as unsuitable or too risky. That was highlighted vividly in a recent BBC Scotland programme entitled 'Transplant Tales, Life on the List'. The programme made for compelling viewing and was a regular fixture in our house, watched several times on the iPlayer. It looked at the challenges of an ageing population and issues including alcohol, obesity and, specifically, the alarming rise in diabetes. It concluded that, due to those and other issues, the demand for transplant organs is, in the words of the programme:

"set to explode over the next ten years."

It also highlighted the already critical shortage of organs and that three people in the UK die waiting for a transplant every single day. The two-part documentary had exclusive access to Scotland's entire transplant service, and I commend it to Members as compelling viewing on the issue of organ donation and the very human aspect to the ever-growing number of patients whose lives are on hold, desperately waiting for an organ to become available.

As a lifelong supporter of organ donation, I have been heartened by comments that have been made in the Chamber by successive Health Ministers. These included comments on 5 February 2013 after the First Minister and deputy First Minister gave their support to the soft opt-out system alongside the then Health Minister, Mr Poots. In responding to a question that I asked that afternoon, Mr Poots said:

"I believe that we can continue to drive organ donation upwards. I believe that an opt-out scheme can help maximise that, and I believe that an opt-out scheme with a strong educational emphasis will fully maximise the number of organ donations that we have in Northern Ireland." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 81, p254, col 1].

Those words stand as true today as they were two years ago. I hope that Members realise that this Bill includes the all-important education programme that he spoke about.

Equally, I was heartened by the very open debate that took place in the Chamber in February 2012. Member after Member, from all sides of the House, reiterated their support for organ donation, and issues about the opt-out system were raised in what was a very measured and tempered debate. In his contribution to the debate, we received what I believe was an important commitment from Minister Poots. He said that he was of the opinion:

"we need to do more in respect of retrieving and transplanting organs for those who need them." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 72, p73, col 1].

In making the winding-up speech for that important debate, Ms Paula Bradley said — and I could not agree with her more:

“We as an Assembly should work towards ensuring that we can perhaps first follow the Welsh example of changing our current opt-in system to one of the two opt-out systems in place in 22 other countries.” — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 72, p75, col 2].

That, Members, is what I am asking of you today: that we work together to achieve the right Bill for Northern Ireland.

Mr I McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: No, I have already given way plenty.

I have long said that I believed that the Executive should bring forward the legislation, and that it should not be left to a Back-Bencher such as me to do so, although I remain completely committed to seeing it through. No one would have been more delighted to have seen the Bill taken up by the Executive and, indeed, I believed that it was going to happen on a number of occasions. Indeed, when I met the First Minister and the deputy First Minister jointly on the issue in March of last year, I raised the matter of resources, given their public support for the soft opt-out system. I remain hopeful that I will be given the opportunity to work alongside the Department of Health as things progress.

7.00 pm

A number of Members raised the British Medical Association, and I welcome continuing to work with it. I have indeed been in contact with it to set up a meeting in the coming weeks to discuss the Bill. I mentioned earlier that I am also looking forward to a fruitful working relationship with the Department of Health, and I welcomed the opportunity to meet with the director just two weeks ago.

I turn to individual contributions by Members, and there were many. Maeve McLaughlin's was the first. I thank the Chair for supporting organ donation events with charities in this Building, and I welcome her support for transplant awareness week. During her speech, the Chair gave us an overview of the Committee evidence session and highlighted what she called the stark reality of 15 people dying, and that rose to 17 last year. She acknowledged that the Bill has the potential to touch every one of us. Importantly, so too does the issue of organ transplantation. I agree with her that consent is a difficult issue, especially for grieving families. However, it is made a little easier when they know what the wishes of their loved ones were. She referred to the important role of clinicians, but that is to advise and not to take decisions on consent. They are very clear on that. She highlighted that no one could put a financial figure on good health. I agree with her comments about education and communication being crucial cornerstones of the Bill.

I am thankful to the Deputy Chair, Mr Easton, for his contribution to the debate and, at the outset, his open-mindedness as the Bill goes forward. I also welcome his recognition of my extensive consultation and overview of the Bill. Mr Easton spoke about medical opinions on the Bill. I understand that that is exactly what the Committee Stage can achieve and welcome his role in this as Deputy Chair. Finally, I refer to his comments on organs being made available to patients across the United Kingdom. My son Mark's kidney came from England. Mr Easton's colleague Mr Poots, when Minister, recognised that we benefited hugely from that relationship.

The third Member to speak was Fearghal McKinney. He poignantly asked us to consider those lost lives, and that is exactly what we should be doing. I am grateful to the support provided by Mr McKinney and Members of his party for organ donation events in this Building. I am also grateful to Mr Ramsey and, previously, Mr McDevitt for their roles as vice-chairs of the all-party Assembly group on organ donation. I understand that Mr McKinney has asked a number of questions for written answer, and I feel that he has touched on very important issues here. He spoke about an important balance that needed to be struck and supported the role of advocates. I thank him for his support and kind comments, and I agree that there will be major moral, ethical and legal issues as the Bill proceeds. I welcome his commitment to the inclusion of safeguards. I welcome Mr McKinney's recognition of the work that been undertaken and his focus on finance and cost savings.

The next Member to speak was Michael McGimpsey, who referred to the prize that we will get out of this and the fact that this is ground-breaking. I thank Michael for his important support for the Bill; his insight as a former Health Minister has been crucial in bringing it forward. I will try not to embarrass him too much, but I remember being with Michael back in 2009 at the opening of the Wellbeing and Treatment Centre at Forestside. Mark and I were there with an army of organ donation volunteers, raising awareness and funds. Mark was not long after his kidney transplant, but, as always, he was there with me, by my side, and I was delighted with the support that Michael showed us that day. It was a shot in the arm for us volunteers to know that we had the support of the Health Minister. It meant a lot then and does to this day.

Very poignantly, Michael mentioned the loss of children with their entire life ahead of them and said that the greater availability of organs would increase life chances for seriously ill children. By facing serious issues raised in the Bill, we are actually saving lives. Not going forward will be to the detriment of patients, especially the young children whom Michael referred to. In principle, for the prize and what we will get out of it, we should get behind the Bill. I thank him for his contribution.

Stewart Dickson talked about his experience of early heart transplant recipients and said that their lives were extended as a result of organ donation. He also spoke about a friend who had received a second kidney transplant — someone who has returned to as normal a life as possible. I thank Mr Dickson for his comments and for what he said about the meticulous research on the Bill.

Gary Middleton is the newest member of the Health Committee, and he is welcome. He referred to the varying systems across the world. I agree fully with him that the personal stories bring it home to all of us. He talked about Andrew Duncan and his untimely death one year ago today. Andrew was scheduled to present to the all-party group last year, but, sadly, his illness prevented him from doing that. I had the immense privilege of meeting his wife and viewing the video that the British Heart Foundation brought to the all-party group. I also agree with Mr Middleton that Andrew's story and other emotional stories highlight the current situation.

I agree with Rosie McCorley about this being an emotive issue. According to Ms McCorley, due to the lack of available donors, soft opt-out is the right way to go. She referred to the presentations made to the Committee by those whose lives were changed by organ donation. She also referred to the number of people who die each year, and she encouraged Members to support the Bill and for the public to have that conversation.

Pam Cameron said that organ donation was an issue for further debate and that she had real concerns with the Bill. I say to the Member that the central issue should be carrying out the will of the deceased. She also said that any legislation introduced in the wrong way could be detrimental to our constituents. I recognise some of her concerns, but would say, as I have always said, that I am willing to work with her as the Bill proceeds in Committee.

I welcome Pat Ramsey's contribution and his willingness to see the Bill go forward to Committee Stage for scrutiny. He referred to personal stories and talked about the clear support in Northern Ireland for the change to the soft opt-out system. He referred to the 162 people waiting for transplants and encouraged Members across the Chamber to meet me. As I said, I wrote to Members in 2013 offering that opportunity, and my door remains firmly open.

Daithí McKay talked about the cultural changes that have occurred in other countries. He described the Bill as one of the most important in this Assembly term, and I appreciate that, given his record for private Members' Bills. He said that lives were at risk and the proper thing to do was to allow the Bill to proceed to Committee.

I have trouble with Alastair Ross's concerns about ideological difficulties, especially as, I am sure, he probably knocked on the doors of the East Antrim constituency for Sammy Wilson's 2010 Westminster campaign, when there was a commitment in the manifesto to support presumed consent; not soft opt-out, but presumed consent. If it was so right for the people in 2010, why is it so wrong for them five years later? Alastair said that legislation was unnecessary and possibly counterproductive, but he congratulated me on bringing the Bill to this stage. I agree with him that the most important thing that we can do is to discuss the issue with our loved ones. He told us about his strong, fundamental opposition to the Bill and said that he will oppose it at this stage, which, naturally, disappoints me, given his previous stance of wishing to bring forward legislation on this very issue.

I wish to correct the Member. During his contribution, he said that the second PHA consultation showed a drop in public support. It did not; it went up from 56% to 61%. The Member said that he supports —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: No, I want to make my points. You have spoken quite a lot.

The Member says that he supports my aim of increasing the number of donors, yet he wants to put the brake on the only Bill brought before the House that seeks to do so. The Member talked about Brazil and the public mistrust around the issue of abuse of organs. I hope that he is not for one second suggesting that we have, or could ever have, that situation. I am sure that his colleague the Health Minister would be gravely concerned if he is.

The Member said that he opposed the Bill and proceeded to go through his thoughts on how it should be approached at Committee Stage. On the RaISe document that he mentioned, does he agree that, had there been a greater level of support and openness from the Department, we could have had greater knowledge of the costs at this point? That paper is available in the Assembly Library.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: No, I am making my points.

The Member would, of course, have had the opportunity to commission his own research for his own Bill. I agree with him that I would have preferred to see action from the Department, especially given the support from the First Minister and the deputy First Minister.

Steven Agnew stated the support of the Green Party for the soft opt-out system and said that he had tabled a number of questions for written answer on the issue. I welcome his recent support for transplant awareness week, when he took the time to meet the charity volunteers in Room 115 to support their cause. He referred to organ donation as —

Mr Ross: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I fully acknowledge that it is up to Members to decide whether they give way in a debate, but is it in order for a Member to ask a specific question of another Member and then refuse to give way?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: It is entirely in the gift of the Member speaking.

Mrs Dobson: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, for clarifying that.

As I said, I welcome Mr Agnew's recent support for transplant awareness week. As he said, I will work with anyone to get the right Bill for Northern Ireland, and my door has been firmly open. I would welcome Mr Ross taking the opportunity to come to speak to me as the Bill progresses.

Mr Agnew said that organ donation is one of the wonders of modern science, and he spoke of William Johnson, who has waited 17 years on a kidney. He hopes that this opportunity will not go to waste.

John McCallister has been supportive of the Bill from the beginning, and I appreciate his comments, not least because he knows what it is like to bring through a private Member's Bill and the hours of work that it entails. Just like my Bill, his looks to the future — five, 10, 15 and 20 years down the line. It is interesting that such far-reaching issues are being brought through as private Member's Bills, not by the Executive. John spoke about having important discussions over the dinner table. I welcome his contribution.

Claire Sugden raised some very important points. I welcome her support and look forward to working with her as the Bill progresses.

I was disappointed by the Health Minister's "leap in the dark" comment. It is hope that we should be seeking to give our constituents, and consecutive Health Ministers have taken the stance of researching continually rather than taking action, one minute seemingly supporting soft opt-out and the next minute opposing it. The Minister's position seems to be to wait and see whether lives are saved in Wales, and then, when he finds out that they are, to act here. That will be disappointing to campaigners and charities.

In reply to a question for written answer in October 2014, Jim Wells said that he would make a decision on whether to bring forward statutory opt-out legislation once he had reviewed the second PHA survey. I welcome Jim's contribution today. Given that the survey shows an increase in public support for soft opt-out legislation, it would be helpful to know whether the Minister takes the same decision that his predecessor took.

Mr Hamilton: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: Yes. [Interruption.]

Mr Hamilton: I must be privileged, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. The Member stated my view. Does she accept the important letter that I read into the record, which will be available on the Department's website and in the Assembly Library? It states that it is the view of the clinicians and consultants in the transplant centre at the Belfast Trust that we should be cautious, wait and see and view the Welsh experience before moving forward in Northern Ireland? Does she accept that that is their view?

Mrs Dobson: I very much look forward to reading the letter. I want to put it on record, Minister, that we have not been able to get an appointment for a meeting yet. The previous one was cancelled: could we slot that in very soon?

It only remains for me to thank all Members who contributed. I repeat: my door remains open. I have listened carefully to all the points that have been raised and I give an undertaking to carefully consider the points raised by Members. Each donor, as has been said, can save up to seven lives. I know so many families, some of whom have lost mothers, fathers, sons, daughters or grandparents, who take great comfort every day from the fact that their loved one allowed someone else to live. I can think of so many cases where that is true. We in the organ donation family hold each and every one of them up as heroes. I mentioned in my earlier contribution the importance that Dame Mary Peters attaches to donor families. It is fantastic that she recognises them every year and that it is an extremely important issue for her. I welcome Dame Mary's support, alongside so many from the world of sport, including the support of the IFA and particularly Gerry Armstrong; Joe Brolly and the GAA; and Ulster Rugby, which has been assisting and helping to promote the move to a soft opt-out system.

I will leave the final word to the charities —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: I am nearly finished my comments.

We are blessed in Northern Ireland to have so many amazing people promoting and supporting organ donation, people who do the work not for financial reward but quite the opposite —

Mr Ross: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. The Member has just indicated that Ulster Rugby is supportive of a move to soft opt-out: that is not the case. Perhaps Mrs Dobson will use the opportunity to correct the record.

Mrs Dobson: No, I will not correct the record.

I will leave the final word to the charities. As I said, we are blessed in Northern Ireland to have so many amazing people promoting and supporting organ donation, people who do the work not for financial reward but, quite the opposite, because they truly believe. They believe that it is their duty to promote organ donation and to tell the human stories of pain and joy or, in the case of our four local transplant athletes — Philip, Catherine, Kathryn and Matthew — to compete and win on the world stage and honour their donors through sport.

For decades, transplant volunteers were the small but ever-increasing band of voices shouting out for organ donation in Northern Ireland. Why? Because they were touched by it and they knew what it meant to be waiting and for them or a loved one to receive a life-saving transplant. I am extremely proud to count myself amongst their number. They spread the word, whether among students or the general public, that any one of us at any time may need a life-saving transplant. They have also been vigorous supporters of the all-party group, attending regularly or, on a number of occasions, presenting. I have heard charity volunteers on so many occasions encouraging people to think about whether, if they are prepared to receive an organ to save their life, they are prepared to give an organ to save someone else's life. That is the fundamental point. From the bottom of my heart, I thank them for what they continue to do and for their support in bringing forward the Bill.

Our continued focus on organ donation at the Assembly highlights to government and those with responsibility that the issue can and should no longer be left solely to the charities. Government has a key role to play. That is why I support the PHA's Speak Up and Save a Life campaign so vigorously and have included an education programme at clause 1 for that very reason. As I outlined earlier, the scheme would pay for itself through increased donations and decreased costs to the health service.

At a time of immense grief, a family whom we will never know gave me back my son. That is why I stand here moving the Bill. I want us to move to a position where organ donation is the norm in society and where not to donate is the exception. This is a journey that we have already begun, but more needs to be done. I submit that moving to a soft opt-out system will help to bridge the gap between the supply and demand for organs. I commend the Second Stage of the Human Transplantation Bill to the House and encourage Members to support it.

Scrap Metal Dealers Bill: Second Stage

Mr Beggs: I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Scrap Metal Dealers Bill [NIA 65/11-16] be agreed.

Before introducing legislation, it is important to assess whether there is a need for it and whether the proposal is workable and proportionate. I hope to demonstrate that my private Member's Bill, which leans heavily on legislation that is already in place elsewhere, does so.

I live near Gleno in a rural community between Larne and Carrickfergus, and there have been a number of incidents in my local community that have shown me from experience that this has been a major problem. First, in Gleno, a new set of street lights was installed by Roads Service to link the village to the local bus stop at McDowell's shop. Within two weeks, the lights stopped working, and, when I enquired what the nature of the fault was, I was advised that thieves had stolen the underground cable. This was at a cost to the public purse, with inconvenience and loss of service to the public.

My church, Raloo Presbyterian Church, was targeted, and the lead was stripped off the hall roof. Through this, I learned that it is not just the discomfort of having your property attacked and the value of lead stolen but that there is the cost of weather damage to the interior of the building as a result of water ingress. Then, again, there is the cost of repair for installing new material. So, clearly, there is a need to address this issue. Considerable costs are being incurred in the community as a result of metal theft. Similarly, several schools in my constituency have been targeted — Greenisland Primary School, Downshire School and Ulidia Integrated College — disrupting children's education.

Equally, many private homes, social houses and businesses have suffered considerable loss and inconvenience, primarily around the issue of lead-flashing and copper-piping theft. A few miles up the road from where I live in the Gleno valley, there lies the Ballyvallyagh NIE electricity substation, which supplies electricity to much of Larne. I discovered that, on two occasions, the copper earth cables had been stolen. Those who carried out those thefts will have done so at considerable personal risk, and, in addition, the theft endangered the substation and could have resulted in significant failure and the subsequent loss of power for a considerable time to a wider group of constituents in the Larne area.

When I started to question where all this material was going, I became aware that it could be traded in Northern Ireland anonymously and for cash through scrap metal dealers and that no specific legislation existed in Northern Ireland around scrap metal dealers. Criminals will be attracted to or deterred from a particular illegal act depending on the risks and rewards associated with it. For a number of years in Northern Ireland, criminals have been able to prosper anonymously by selling stolen metal goods for cash. If there is a low risk of being detected and an ability to make significant amounts of money, criminals will be drawn into this particular area of crime. This was certainly true of scrap metal theft, particularly when prices peaked around 2011-12. The level of reward is determined by market forces. The value of scrap metal is set by the stock market, based on international prices of metal. It is beyond our control, so we cannot control the rewards that criminals can obtain.

Therefore, I then started to look at the risk side of the equation. How can we as legislators increase the risk of detection for those who steal metal when they go to sell it and profit from it? By licensing scrap metal dealers, we will be able to increase the controls that will exist and increase the risks for those who wish to deal in scrap metal illegally. By requiring a verification of the supplier's identity, an audit trail of those who provide the scrap metal to the dealer is created. Therefore, metal thieves would face an increased risk of being identified. This, of course, will deter them from stealing metal objects in the first place. With a requirement of proof of ID, record of sale and vehicle registration, and the restricting of cash sales in favour of traceable bank transactions, the risk of a thief being identified will increase considerably. Again, I argue that it will further deter metal theft.

There in a nutshell is the principle behind the Scrap Metal Dealers Bill.

What is the history of scrap metal dealers legislation? In the 1960s, there was concern that metal goods were being stolen, so the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 1964 was introduced in England and Wales. There was a fit and proper person requirement for those who wished to be licensed, and that was aimed at preventing criminals from stealing metal and profiting from recycling stolen goods. With soaring metal prices over recent years, more criminals have been profiting from stolen metal, and the 1964 Act proved to be insufficient. In 2012, police in England and Wales led Operation Tornado, which introduced a voluntary scheme whereby many scrap metal dealers recorded the details of individuals who supplied metals for recycling. Although many dealers joined the voluntary scheme, which helped to reduce crime, but many others did not.

That was followed by the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, which started out as a private Member's Bill, I might add. It made the recording of all scrap metal purchases compulsory and introduced a cashless system to better trace those profiting from the sale of scrap metal. As a result of those changes, thefts of metal in England and Wales declined by one third between 2012-13 and 2013-14. Interestingly, during the very same period as that reduction happened in England and Wales, there was an increase in metal thefts in Scotland, which did not have an equivalent scheme in operation. It is thought that organised crime elements moved north to Scotland. Scotland had the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 governing the sale of scrap metal, which had similar provisions to the 1964 Act. When that proved to be insufficient in Scotland, the Scottish Executive amended their scrap metal dealer legislation through the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2015, which only recently received Royal Assent, on 4 August 2015. That brought Scotland into line with the updated traceability requirements in the 2013 legislation that applies to England and Wales.

When I was considering legislation for Northern Ireland, I was unable to find any specific legislation regulating scrap metal dealers. It would appear that, in the past, anyone could set up as a scrap metal dealer and there was no requirement to meet the fit and proper person requirement. Indeed, there were no requirements under the older legislation, never mind the newer legislation that was recently updated. Only environmental and planning regulations exist, imposing restrictions in those areas. We have no scrap metal dealer licensing in Northern Ireland and we are the only part of the United Kingdom without scrap metal dealer licensing and a mandatory traceability scheme involving scrap metal dealing.

I am aware of a concern about the effect of having different rules on either side of the border and how that will potentially distort business. I will come back to Northern Ireland shortly, but I want to update Members on issues that I discovered regarding the Republic of Ireland. I noticed that it, too, had been suffering from a considerable number of metal thefts. In 2012, the Irish Farmers' Association called for the introduction of a track-and-trace scheme to curb scrap metal and machinery thefts. Just as our farmers have been complaining of metal thefts, so have farmers in the Republic. Therefore, it is clear that there have been difficulties there. Mattie McGrath TD introduced a private Member's Bill in 2013, the Scrap and Precious Metal Dealers Bill. There was criticism that it was too wide-ranging, dealing with gold and silver as well as scrap metal. Although it was defeated in the Dáil, I noticed that Sinn Féin TDs there supported it, so I hope that its Members in the Assembly will likewise support my private Member's Bill in an attempt to regulate the industry.

7.45 pm

Additional relevant new legislation has been introduced in the Dáil. Following the defeat of that Bill, statutory instrument No 320/2014, Waste Management (Facility Permit and Registration) (Amendment) Regulations 2014, was approved on 11 July 2014, which amended the Waste Management (Facility Permit and Registration) Regulations 2007. Licensed waste facilities would have to provide traceability of material purchased, documentation proving ID and proof of current address, for example a utility bill. Last week, I contacted the Department of the Environment, Community and Local Government, and a senior official confirmed to me that the regulation was applicable to authorised scrap metal sites. So, there already is a degree of traceability in the Republic of Ireland.

England and Wales have comprehensive scrap metal dealing. What of Northern Ireland? It is the absence of sufficient measures that has led me to develop this private Member's Bill. So, when I approached the previous Environment Minister, I was advised that the Department of the Environment:

"does not have the vires to introduce the type of measure you refer to."

That measure being the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013. The Minister agreed to examine how existing environmental law can be strengthened to address environmental crime. I noticed that the Controlled Waste (Seizure of Property) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 have been introduced. Minister Attwood indicated in correspondence dated 26 March 2013:

"I agree in principle to the introduction of legislation which would regulate Scrap Metal Dealers as an industry".

However, he pointed out that the Home Office in England and the Justice Directorate in Scotland had responsibility. Essentially, he would have liked the Justice Minister to deal with the legislation in Northern Ireland. In recent correspondence dated 22 October 2015, since the publication of my Bill, there have been further changes requiring minimum operator competency, including metal recovery sites involving dry scrap. The Minister is also currently consulting on a Waste Management Licensing (Amendment No. 2) Regulation 2015, although the consultation, I understand, has just recently closed. So, there are other aspects afoot.

So, what of the Justice Minister? When I approached the Department of Justice to ask the Minister if he was going to enact something similar to the scrap metal dealer legislation that existed successfully in England and Wales, he advised me in a letter dated 17 October 2012 that:

"I should advise you that this is an issue where the Department of the Environment is better placed to respond as currently, the Department of Justice does not have any locus over the regulation of the waste management industry in Northern Ireland."

He also pointed to the voluntary code of practice that was being adopted following Operation Tornado in England and Wales. So, the Department of Justice and the Department of the Environment seem to be claiming that it was not their responsibility to legislate for scrap metal dealers. So much for joined-up government. It was at that point that I realised that there was a need for a private Member's Bill to try to bring about this change.

It is clear that there are aspects of the Bill that involve justice, and there are other aspects of the Bill that could be deemed to involve the Department of the Environment. My Scrap Metal Dealers Bill would give the right of a constable to enter and inspect a scrap metal dealer's property at any reasonable time on notice to the site manager, and on other conditions for unannounced visits if necessary. Indeed, the constable or, for that matter, the Department would be able to issue a closure notice where a scrap metal licence were not available and trading was occurring, and it would then have to apply for a court order to enforce it.

I notice that a number of Assembly Members have been pressing on this issue. They, too, have obviously been experiencing difficulty in their areas. I see a range of questions, from David McIlveen, Simon Hamilton, Adrian McQuillan and Judith Cochrane on the issue. Just over a year ago, in May 2014, Karen McKeivitt asked about the theft of metal manholes from the Department, and it turned out that 71 had been stolen in a 12-month period. I notice that, in 2012, John Dallat asked about the cost of replacing manholes, and it was £35,500 in a 12-month period. The cost of replacing electrical cable was £330,000. I am also aware of considerable costs having built up for Translink. At one stage, £145,000 of costs had been incurred.

I also noticed that, in a press release from February 2014 that was published on the BBC, NIE said that the theft of cables by people cutting down electrical poles in Newtownabbey that Tuesday was the seventh such incident that year. This is very serious. Criminals have been cutting down wooden live electricity poles using chainsaws. Some of the cables may have been left over roads. Someone at the end of the line who experienced disrupted supply may have needed an essential electricity supply for their medical condition. These people, of course, had no consideration for that.

What has been happening in Northern Ireland without these powers? I recently came across a publication on serious organised crime reported from illegal trade in stolen metal, and the Organised Crime Task Force annual report and threat assessment 2015 case study, on page 30, highlighted the problem of managing scrap metal dealers when relying solely on limited environmental legislation. It went on to explain that, on 29 June 2010, Robert John Mulholland and Mulholland Scrap Metals Ltd were visited by Northern Ireland Environment Agency officers and a warning letter was issued asking for a cessation of scrap metal processing as no waste management licence was in force. One year later, they visited again and noticed that the letter had been ignored. During the investigation, it was estimated that 19,722 tons of scrap metal had been handled, with an estimated turnover of £3 million during the year. Over three years later, in November 2014, at a hearing, the court imposed a confiscation order of £500,000 with a default period of five years' imprisonment if the site was not cleared within six months. Whilst I welcome that significant court order against the illegal operation, I would point out that it took four and a half years for the court decision to come into being to force the closure of an illegal site. I suggest that, if the Scrap Metal Dealers Bill were in place, a much speedier process would have brought that decision at an earlier time.

We have a voluntary scheme whereby most scrap metal dealers with sites record the details of who supplied the scrap metal; but not all dealers have adopted the scheme. I was made aware that some large dealers did not follow the voluntary scheme and dealt with customers without any traceability. Any could opt in or out of the scheme at any time. There is no mandatory requirement. Certainly, thinking back to the £3 million that I referred to earlier, if someone was content to trade on a large scale without any waste management licences and without any permissions, I do not think that they would volunteer to go into a non-mandatory scheme, and I doubt very much that they would be too concerned about who was depositing scrap metal material at an illegal site. They certainly would not wish to create an audit trail of who was essentially dropping material off at an illegal site.

So it is clear that there are failings in our system.

In addition, mobile scrap metal dealers appear to be outside even the voluntary scheme, which is significant. Where do mobile scrap metal dealers get their metal? We have not got to the end of the supply chain. Potentially, the PSNI cannot trace those who have been stealing metal, should that metal have been fed in through one of the many mobile scrap metal dealers. The only records in the voluntary scheme will be at the main authorised sites, which voluntarily may have bought into the system. My Bill would encompass mobile scrap metal dealers as well as the authorised sites.

Following invitations, I visited a couple of sizeable scrap metal dealer sites. They already have significant systems to record details of those they are purchasing from. Some even automatically take pictures of vehicles and the material that has been supplied. This Bill would ensure that all would follow the good practice that is in the voluntary scheme and already in place for many. There is a clear need for this Bill. Furthermore, Northern Ireland is at risk of attracting scrap metal thieves who, in 2012 and 2013, moved regions and went to Scotland to benefit from weaker regulations elsewhere. In addition, in 2014, the Republic of Ireland tightened its waste management regime, so we are even more open to stolen scrap metal entering the recycling system in Northern Ireland without a mandatory scheme ensuring traceability.

I undertook significant consultation in coming to the principles in my Bill. I held a briefing session in Stormont as part of that process. I had MLAs and interested parties along. I was joined and supported by the Federation of Small Businesses and the Northern Ireland utilities group, which represents Northern Ireland Electricity, Northern Ireland Water, British Telecom and Translink — public bodies and service companies that have suffered considerable expense, disruption and loss of service as a result of the theft of metal. I would like to put on record my appreciation for its encouragement and support, and in particular its coordinators, Sam Gibson of NIE and, now, George Ong of Northern Ireland Water. I also invited the scrap metal industry to an information evening at Stormont where a briefing was given by Ian Hetherington of the British Metals Recycling Association who spoke of his experience of the GB legislation. About 30 interested parties from across Northern Ireland attended.

The consultation was available in paper form as well as online. A total of 66 responses were received, of which 55 were completed fully. Seventy-five per cent of respondents thought that the current provisions for regulating scrap metals were inadequate; 75% thought that the voluntary code was not sufficient; and a massive 85% thought that additional legislation was required to combat metal theft. Almost 82% thought that photographic ID should be required to prove identity when selling scrap metal to a dealer, and 85% agreed that vehicle registration should be recorded when selling. I built those provisions into my Bill.

Concern was expressed about moving to a cashless system. I listened to the consultation and built in an initial limit for going cashless of £100, and the provision to reduce that figure if agreed in future. However, supplier details will have to be recorded to create traceability. The Bill will allow the Minister to amend further and possibly go cashless at some point by using secondary legislation.

8.00 pm

From the consultation and visits to scrap metal dealers, it was clear that the concept of a holding area to receive scrap metal would not be practical. Therefore, I removed that idea from the Bill except in the very limited area of suspicious material — for example, burnt or defaced copper or aluminium cable — which I suggest should be held for inspection if found as part of a delivery. The reason for that is that, in some parts of inner-city England, I saw where vacant office blocks had been stripped of all cables; the cables were literally taken outside and burnt to remove the plastic coating. Part of the reason for that was to remove traceability so that the thieves could not be discovered, and it may increase the value of the metal as well, because it is then reduced to the raw metal. Certainly, I would view it as a bad practice to allow that process to be adopted in Northern Ireland. I suggest that where burnt metal is delivered — it would be a very small proportion of any precious metal, such as copper or aluminium cable — it should be set aside for a limited period and the police advised to allow it to be inspected and ultimately, potentially traced back to records showing who supplied that material to the dealer. Hopefully, by doing that, the practice will be discouraged.

In addition to reduced bureaucracy for dealers — small dealers in particular — I propose that customer details in sales of less than 50 kilograms would not have to be recorded. What does it matter to whom a second-hand door handle, car door or bonnet is sold? The English system would require the small dealer to record that information and take the identification details of the person to whom he sells that item. I view that as bureaucratic. There is no harm in keeping a record of the bigger items. In that way, if a car is stolen, at least the engine or gear box could not be sold that way in most instances and a degree of traceability is enabled.

The Department of the Environment is responsible for waste management licences for sites and monitoring of the transfer of waste material; it is also responsible for the maintenance of the environment and the prevention of pollution. It seems to me better to have one Department dealing with scrap metal dealer licences than two. In the English model, the Environment Agency has an interest in what is happening and also, potentially, the Ministry of Justice. In my consultation, 72% of those who responded agreed that there would be less bureaucracy by having only one Department involved and, I suggest, lower costs.

There was clear support for higher fines for serious and repeat offences; even imprisonment was considered.

Whilst I had hoped to introduce these measures within a year of the Bill gaining support in the Assembly, I recognise that we need to move at an appropriate speed to allow the industry to retrain and put in place all the necessary bits and pieces. In addition, over the next six months, Departments will be undergoing reorganisation, so I am open to allowing more time for introduction.

No concerns were expressed in the consultation about equality of opportunity or human rights implications. If anything, responses were supportive.

As regards the cost implications of the Bill, we can minimise costs if one Department handles this along with the other waste issues that it handles.

I mentioned earlier the Organised Crime Task Force report. There must be considerable costs, at present, in the bureaucratic, ineffective system that we have in taking a complaint to court and getting a judgement. Can we not introduce legislation, such as this, to speed the process up and produce quicker results? We have to remember that while illegal trading goes on, there will be costs to the environment.

Illegal traders will have scant regard for tracing where the material is from. Who knows what the cost will be to the public. I believe, therefore, that better legislation governing scrap metal dealers will bring savings to residential homes, businesses and churches — to a wide range of organisations — as well as potential savings to Departments that have to implement the legislation.

I have focused so far on the Environment Minister. What about the Justice Minister? Since its formation, the Department of Justice has faced huge challenges. It has been heavily involved in legal aid reform and prison reform. Scrap metal dealing has not been a priority. There have been, I daresay, much bigger issues at which the Department has been directing its attention. It has appeared to be relatively satisfied with the voluntary scheme, which, I acknowledge, has brought about improvements, and there has been a significant reduction in the theft of scrap metal in Northern Ireland. I would highlight, however, that scrap metal theft is very closely related to the rewards that can be gained.

When I was researching this area, I came across a Home Office impact assessment of scrap metal theft in a document dated 22 February 2012. In it there is a diagram compiled by the British Transport Police showing that the level of metal theft is closely related to, guess what, the value of the metal. When the value of metal doubled, there was an increase in metal theft, because the rewards were greater and criminals were prepared to take greater risks. Likewise, when there was a significant reduction in the value of copper, lead or other metal prices, there was a considerable reduction in the level of theft. If you were to examine the current value of metals on the international market, you would see that there has been a steady decline from 2011-12. In fact, copper and lead prices are approximately half what they were at that time.

Why I am saying this? If we introduce legislation, I believe that we will be able to reduce metal theft even more in Northern Ireland, but, more importantly, we will protect ourselves when the price of metal increases again, when this will once more be a lucrative area for criminals to be involved in, because the risks and rewards are out of balance again. I am saying to Members that we have been successful in driving down the level of metal thefts in Northern Ireland, but I urge Members not to be complacent. If metal prices were to increase, we could expect the amount of theft to increase too.

I reiterate the point that whilst most scrap metal dealers in Northern Ireland have adopted the voluntary scheme, not all have, but the mobile scrap metal dealers, as far as I am aware, have not become involved in the scheme. There is a grey area where there is the potential for abuse.

I illustrated that, in Great Britain, the roving crime gangs moved north into Scotland. Indeed, in the Republic of Ireland, there were headlines about a Balkan gang flying in at the weekends to steal metal. This involves international organised crime; it is not just about lead being stolen off somebody's roof. There can be significant international criminal involvement.

In May 2015, at the Committee for Justice's stakeholder event on business crime, Wilfred Mitchell, from the Federation of Small Businesses, said:

"One area of rural crime that has been of concern to our members is metal theft."

At the same event, a representative of the Police Service of Northern Ireland indicated that there was ongoing concern and that:

"If it were a mandatory code of conduct, it would make it much harder for metal to be sold on."

— this is illegal metal that we are talking about —

"That means that it would be much easier to reduce the incidence of metal theft."

When I read that, it was clear to me that the PSNI could see the benefits of a mandatory scheme in helping to drive down crime. That has certainly been the experience in England and Wales.

I wish to ensure that we do not face the future pain of being targeted when metal prices increase. Cables supplying the public have been stolen; manhole covers have been stolen, leaving dangerous openings in our roads and on our footpaths; and buildings have been destroyed by the removal of lead flashing and corporate pipes. I therefore argue that there is an urgent need for the legislation.

Daniel Greenberg, the experienced legislative draftsman, said that every piece of legislation, however apparently technical:

"impacts on someone's life: and Assembly Members are directly responsible for authorising the interference. They cannot give that authority without being satisfied that the legislation is the best form reasonably possible to achieve the stated purpose, and that the purpose justifies the intrusion into people's lives and constraints on their liberty."

In bringing the Bill forward, I have attempted to follow those principles.

I hope that Members agree that there is a need for the legislation and that I have included some protection to minimise bureaucracy. I hope that Members will support me and join me on a journey to scrutinise the legislation to ensure that we can make it the best legislation possible to protect our community, our homes and our businesses against the future risk of metal theft so that all will be able to live in Northern Ireland without the unwanted interference of criminals who disrupt lives and businesses. I ask for Members' support.

Mrs Cameron: I commend Mr Beggs for his work so far and for bringing the Scrap Metal Dealers Bill before the Assembly this evening. The Bill is a good example of how the Assembly can seek to resolve an issue that may not be particularly high-profile but nevertheless impacts greatly on those who are unfortunate enough to be the victim of crimes involving scrap metal theft. We heard much about that from the Member this evening. I support the principles of the Bill, and its drafting appears to have satisfactorily covered most of the main issues. I will therefore keep my remarks brief.

I am aware that there have been differing opinions on which Department should lead on the subject: whether it should come under the Department of Justice, as it is about metal theft, or the Department of the Environment, given the licensing element to the Bill. I can see the argument on both sides. I asked Mr Beggs, when he came before the Environment Committee, whether an Ad Hoc Joint Committee might be necessary, and he did not rule that out. What is important is that, whatever Department takes responsibility, full scrutiny of the Bill take place, assuming that the Bill passes its Second Stage. It is disappointing to see that we do not have a Minister here to answer that tonight, so we still do not know where it will sit.

As far as the Department of Justice is concerned in its dealings with scrap metal theft, it is clear that the current scheme that it operates, whereby there is only a voluntary arrangement in place, is not sufficient to prevent or deter the current levels of criminality. I note that, as far back as September 2012, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency's environmental crime unit came before the Committee and expressed concern that the existing measures to reduce and combat the high levels of metal theft in Northern Ireland were not effective. It is clear from statistics received since then that it was right to be concerned. I trust that the Bill will address those concerns in a much more comprehensive way.

I recognise, of course, that there will be many concerns from scrap metal dealers, not least over the idea of moving towards a cashless system. Again, trusting that the Bill passes its Second Stage, the Committee will hear all those concerns in the near future. I support the general principles of the Bill.

8.15 pm

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom cúpla focal a rá.

I would like to say a few words in relation to the Bill.

I commend the Member for bringing the Bill to the Floor and for the work that he has done thus far. I can give him some reassurance that his Bill is certainly not going to be scrapped tonight by Sinn Féin, but I have some issues with it. I know that the Member brought the Bill to the Committee last Tuesday; unfortunately, I could not stay for the whole presentation. I certainly hope that the Member's intention with the Bill is to work with and protect the industry as much as to prevent an outlet for criminals. I hope that that is the full intention of the Member's Bill, because that is important.

At the inception of the Member's Bill away back in 2013, theft and crime in relation to copper, lead and other metals were prevalent. I think that has now dropped, but there is an opportunity to address it. I have had time to speak to some businesses over the weekend that shared some concerns about what the Member proposes. They believed that the voluntary scheme that they were working on was sufficient, but I see from some of the consultation that the Member carried out that a majority of consultees are in favour of legislation.

I just want to mention to the Member — I brought it up the last time, and the Member will know this already — that I know of some people who work in the construction industry, like plumbers and electricians, who, on occasion, collect small cuttings of copper wire: can the Member indicate to me whether those people, who might collect it or once or twice a year and bring a small amount of copper wire or piping to a scrap metal dealer, would require a collector's licence? In his winding up, maybe the Member can explain that to me. If we were down to that level, I would ask for consideration of exemptions in the Bill.

I am not too sure whether the Bill is going to the Environment Committee or the Justice Committee. What he is trying to do on the introduction of licensing may sit with DOE, but, ultimately, it is about organised crime and theft. That is a criminal issue, so you could argue that it lies within the justice system. It will be interesting to see who ends up with it. The Member who spoke previously mentioned an Ad Hoc Committee: that might be the way to go forward with thorough scrutiny in Committee.

I do not propose to keep Members back tonight after a long session on the previous Bill, but maybe in his summing up the Member could indicate the costings of all of this in terms of licences and the cost to businesses. Also, on the issue of verification under clause 9, there is talk about photographic ID and the taking of information. I go back to my original point about a single operator going once a year or twice a year: it would be extreme for them to have to provide that information.

Also, in relation to cash transactions, the Member has specified £100 in that provision of the Bill. I just wonder if there is some scope, through an amendment, to increase that. I am just saying that in line with what I have indicated about the people who may visit the scrap metallur just to offload some cuttings. Basically, that is about all that I would like to say on the Bill.

Sorry, I have one other point, through you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. It is the issue of enforcement and the constable being able to go on site at any point to check. Will the Member elaborate a wee bit more on how that would work? Will he confirm whether the constable is part of the justice system or is a member of an enforcement team in DOE? Maybe we could get some clarity on how he proposes that would work out. Maybe it is down for discussion in Committee or during another phase of the Bill.

The Bill should regulate scrap metal dealers and effectively remove the outlet for criminals whilst not creating more red tape for business owners and undue burdens on the industry. Sin a bhfuil le rá agam. That is all that I have to say for now. I am content to let the Bill go through at this stage. I will support it.

Mr A Maginness: We are dealing with the general principles of the Bill today, and my party and I support its general principles. The principal objective of the Bill is to combat the trade of illegally obtained metal in Northern Ireland, particularly high-value metal such as copper and aluminium. The Bill seeks to do that by licensing the carrying on of scrap metal dealing businesses and certain aspects of the sale and purchase of metal in Northern Ireland. It is clear that there has been significant cost and disruption to private individuals, churches, schools and public and private bodies as a result of stolen metal. At present, there is no legislative requirement for those dealing in scrap metal to provide an audit trail and reduce the ease with which stolen property is traded.

The Bill's origins arise from the significant levels of theft of lead and copper in Belfast, the greater Belfast area and Northern Ireland in general. Metal is sometimes stolen as manhole covers and, at other times, from electricity substations and is then sold on by organised criminal gangs to scrap metal dealers. All those crimes have an immediate consequence for the public whether it is disruption to a service or the public cost of replacing the material. The illegal trade and sale of metal remains a lucrative business, and it is crucial that Northern Ireland has robust regulations that are able to tackle those crimes through targeting and through the regulation of scrap metal dealers.

The Bill seeks to provide new provisions for the further regulation of scrap dealers in Northern Ireland and to directly tackle the stealing and sale of metal. We must all support that. The Bill also aims to reduce the effect of thefts on victims and to protect resources overall. The Bill seeks to licence scrap metal businesses and regulate aspects of the sale and purchase of the metal.

There is a public concern and interest in more robust regulation in this area. My party has been clear that we are concerned about the rise in the theft of metal for sale. We believe that it is essential that organised criminal organisations no longer profit from these acts. The PSNI report 'Metal Theft in Northern Ireland: Quarterly Update to 31st March 2013' recorded that nearly 300 crimes of burglary, robbery and theft were related to metal. In 2015, an update on metal theft in Northern Ireland revealed that, this year, we have had 552 burglaries, robberies and offences relating to metal. Copper remains the most common metal, followed by lead. While the theft figures are still a cause for concern, they are something that we must deal with at source. In Mr Beggs's consultation, 75% of respondents believed that the current legislation was not adequate in detecting the trade in stolen metal. Another 75% believed that the voluntary code of guidance was not sufficient in dealing with metal theft, while 85% agreed that legislation was indeed necessary to combat the problem.

There is an issue, however, that has been raised by two Members, and that is that there is a departmental conflict over the Bill. The central issue of the Bill appears to be whose legislative remit it actually falls under — the Department of the Environment or the Department of Justice. Mr Beggs, as I understand it, believes that the Department of the Environment should be responsible for implementing the Bill, as scrap dealers are regulated under waste legislation; however, the DOE believes that the primary purpose of the Bill is the prevention of non-environmental crime and that it is not for the Department to deal with directly. I believe that the current waste framework directive intention is to protect the environment and the population's health in relation to the environment. Metal theft, upsetting or damaging as it is, does not really fall under this, as it is a crime of material. I suspect that, if the Bill falls into the DOE remit, the Department will need a serious investment of funds from the Executive in order to gain competency in criminal action and the tracking of financial mismanagement. That would provide an extra burden on the Department in dealing with something that is a non-environmental issue. It would be easier to leave the issue under Justice, which, through the PSNI and other relevant agencies, has the skills and knowledge required. Both sides have, indeed, compelling arguments, but I am of the opinion that, as the central purpose and principle of the Bill, as I stated earlier, is tackling metal theft crime, the implication of the legislation in dealing with that would naturally make it a Department of Justice issue. Further to that, I note that the legislation, in the form of the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, in England was prepared by the Home Office and passed at Westminster, whereas, in Scotland, the Scottish Justice Directorate dealt with the legislation, not the equivalent Department of the Environment. Therefore, I argue that a precedent has been set by other legislatures, and the Northern Ireland Department of Justice — the body with the greatest equivalence to the Westminster and Scottish sponsoring Departments — is best placed to prepare the Bill.

At any rate, the implementation of the Bill and the reduction of metal crime will be greatly assisted by the joint efforts of the DOJ, DOE, PSNI and all related agencies working together after the completion of the Bill. I support the principle of the Bill, but I have to indicate that my party and I have reservations as to how it should be implemented. I wait for the authorities in the House to decide on the allocation of the Bill. I am not sure who will make the decision. I understood that it would be the Business Committee. I have asked members of the Business Committee, but they seem to say, "Well, it's not really our responsibility. It is a matter for the Executive to make a decision in relation to who deals with the Bill". I wait with interest and some curiosity to see who will make the decision and to what Department the Bill will fall.

8.30 pm

Ms Lo: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to today's Second Stage debate as the Alliance Party's MLA for South Belfast. We support the principles of the Bill.

As Mr Beggs outlined, the purpose of the Bill is to license scrap metal dealers to carry out their business, to combat the trade of illegally obtained metal, to reduce the impact on victims of scrap metal crime, and to safeguard valuable resources for individuals and organisations. The Bill proposes to establish the Department of the Environment as the issuing body of the licence, whilst providing the PSNI with the right to enter and inspect the premises of licensed scrap metal dealers.

Clearly, there are cross-cutting issues that are relevant for both the DOE and the Department of Justice. As others have mentioned, as yet no Department has taken the lead in the Bill, although Mr Beggs argued that, given that DOE already issues licences to scrap metal dealers as part of the waste management licensing regime, it sits well with DOE to regulate that activity. He also argued that, with DOE issuing the licence and by linking it to existing regulations, there will be resulting efficiencies for Government and the industry.

Metal theft is not a victimless crime; it can cause great distress and expense to those who experience it. Over the years, I have seen numerous metal thefts in my constituency, such as people climbing onto roofs to steal lead flashing, which can cause damage to the roof as it loosens the slates and results in internal damage through rainwater getting in. There have also been incidents in south Belfast of criminals taking copper piping from vacant social housing properties, thereby causing flooding. That happened in the Village during the regeneration of the area and caused considerable problems. In February 2014, copper piping was stolen from a property in Camden Street, which led to a gas leak. That is not just a petty crime; it causes considerable damage and safety risks. I certainly agree that there is a need for more action, and, therefore, I welcome the Bill.

In England and Scotland, legislation is already in place, and the Republic of Ireland has also made similar provisions. We risk the displacement of those crimes to Northern Ireland if we are the only region not to have legislation on this. We need a concerted and coordinated effort from neighbouring countries to drive out those crimes.

Cashless dealings in England have proven to be effective. I understand that, in Northern Ireland, all transactions are done by cash. That means that there is no audit trail of financial dealings. Similarly, requiring identification for those who supply scrap metal would provide traceability if theft were to be investigated by the police.

It is unfortunate that the Bill has come to the House so late. It is so near the end of the mandate that it may not provide sufficient time for scrutiny by whichever Committee it is assigned to. My party's position is that the Bill is better placed in the Department of the Environment, given that the operations of scrap metal dealers and other waste issues fall under the DOE as set out in the 2013 waste management strategy. The Bill is about the regulation of metal recycling facilities, and recycling is done for environmental reasons, which adds further weight for this being a DOE matter. If we look at England and Wales, it is the role of the local authority to lead on this. As we know, DOE is the Department that is responsible for local government. While there is undeniably a justice aspect to the Bill, especially in the case of prosecution, DOE should certainly collaborate. The Alliance Party is of the opinion that the Bill should be assigned to the Department of the Environment.

Mr Girvan: I congratulate Mr Beggs on bringing forward this private Member's Bill on dealing with the scrap metal industry.

I am not going to keep everybody very late, because I appreciate that hot potatoes seem to be on people's minds. This seems to be a bit of a hot potato for the two previous Members to speak, with one defending his Environment Minister's not wishing to take the Bill on and the other defending the Justice Minister's not wishing to take it on. We will just work our way around that.

This is an issue on which there is great interest, and it needs to be grasped and dealt with. Unfortunately, the criminal elements will always find a way of ensuring that they do not abide by whatever process exists. The voluntary system of registration and ensuring that records are held has obviously proven unworkable in its management. So, a mandatory approach is a necessity for ensuring that that happens. That would be of benefit and would give some form of traceability.

I want to make sure that the criminal elements who want to remove lead and copper from buildings receive the full penalties and cannot get rid of the items. That is where the problems arise: if they have a market, they will obviously be willing to engage in such criminal activity. As a consequence, it is vital that we do all within our power to ensure that there is some mechanism for accountability and traceability within an industry that has not had a great press. Putting forward a legal approach in a Bill is probably the way to do that.

I appreciate that one of the mechanisms concerns dealing with cash. Some people say that everything should be dealt with by plastic, but it is nice to have some money in your pocket and know what you are spending. If you work with plastic, you will not know what you have spent: if you start off in the morning with £20 in your pocket and you spend a few pounds, you know what you are left with at the end of the night. Unfortunately, you sometimes spend more when you are using plastic. A cashless society is not necessarily the route I want to go down.

There is major engagement on this. At the Committee Stage, we can tease out a number of concerns we have. We have to encourage those in the industry who have been good custodians and have voluntarily entered into the agreement. The views of those people have to be taken into account. There are those who have excluded themselves from registration, and they probably need more attention.

Mention was made of those who are mobile scrap merchants. There are many other things that can be termed as "mobile", and I do not want to go too far into that, but there are a number of criminal elements who only want to be "mobile". We need to put legislation in place.

I am happy to support the Bill's passage from Second Stage to the Committee Stage for scrutiny. There is work that needs to be done. We have reservations about some areas of the Bill, and I think we can come forward with something that will be workable.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. At this stage, it has all been said, but, for the record, I will carry on with what I have here.

We have only recently been given this Bill. I thank Mr Beggs for the presentation that he made to the Committee on Tuesday. He was very thorough in his rationale for bringing forward this private Member's Bill. I do not think that anyone objects to the broad principle; that is certainly what I have heard tonight, anyway.

However, there are many questions still to be answered, not least about where the legislation belongs. This is repetitive of what has been said tonight. In England, it was dealt with through the Home Office. In Scotland, it was through the Justice Department. In the South of Ireland, a similar Bill, although unsuccessful, was also brought through the Justice Department. The reason, as has already been said, is that the main focus appears to be on tackling organised crime and increasing the powers of the enforcers, whether it is the PSNI or whoever, for the scrap metal industry. I accept that the DOE would have some role to play in terms of waste management and licensing, but, beyond that, everything else points to the Justice Department. If it is to proceed, consideration may need to be given to an Ad Hoc Committee, as was stated earlier this evening.

Additionally, any change to legislation needs to be harmonised with the Twenty-six Counties. Otherwise, it will do nothing to put off those involved in that type of activity; they will simply move their operation South of the border. It will serve no purpose at all. That is evidenced by the Scottish example after England and Wales enacted the Scrap Metals Dealers Act 2013.

Scrutiny of the Bill will fall to the Department determined by the Business Committee or whoever, as the Member to my left said, but at this stage, wherever it goes, bureaucracy needs to be kept to a minimum. Care must be taken to ensure that the customer's interaction at the scrapyards does not become so difficult or intrusive that the genuine customer is put off or is so expensive that the small dealer is put out of business.

I support the broad principles of the Bill.

Mr Beggs: I thank all the Members who contributed to this discussion and have indicated their support for the principles of the Bill.

Pam Cameron suggested an Ad Hoc Committee or joint Committee to deal with it. I understand that the Business Committee will decide what the future model will be, assuming that we continue through this process. It appears that we will today. I hope that Members will, ultimately, vote for it.

Cathal Boylan wanted to know about ensuring that we would not over-regulate the industry. He wanted to look at costs that would flow from it. That has been quite central to my thinking. It is for that reason that I put in some weight exemptions to enable cashless transactions to occur up to a certain level. He asked about what would happen to the plumber and the electrician. I will be seeking advice from a lawyer. It was a draftsman who ultimately came up with the wording. Ultimately, a court or judge would finalise it. I suggest that, if there had not been any transaction in obtaining the bits and pieces by a tradesman, he would not be trading. If he had the items and some form of reward was given in exchange, I would have thought that that would be some form of transaction. I accept that it is certainly an area that needs to be clarified. It would be important that those working under it understand the rules.

The cost of a licence will be determined by the amount of bureaucracy that we build into the system. One of the issues that I have highlighted is this: will we require two sets of civil servants to examine this legislation as it goes through? If there were an application for a new licence, will there be two groups of people going out to look at a site?

One of my aims has been to try to reduce costs by minimising any sort of bureaucracy. He also enquired about the power of a constable to close a site down. That appears under a provision on dealing with unlicensed sites. If a site is clearly unlicensed, he would have the power to close it down. We are not talking about authorised sites; we are talking about unlicensed sites in that regard.

Alban Maginness supported the general principles of the Bill. I thank him for that. He highlighted the issue of the departmental conflict. That has been a problem from the beginning. Paul Girvan said that it was a bit of a hot potato. He talked about how everybody seemed to agree that it was a good idea but did not want to take it on board. He said that there was a feeling that somebody else should deal with it.

All I have to say to that is that the criminal does not care which Minister deals with it; the constituent whose lead flashing gets stolen or whose copper pipes get ripped out does not care which Minister deals with it. Where is our joined-up government? We need it dealt with, and dealt with efficiently. Let us not have a fight over whose Department is responsible for it. It is important that it is dealt with.

I am sure that, ultimately, both Departments will be required to interact, because there are issues involving justice and the environment, but we are not having to reinvent the wheel. Luckily, experienced draftsmen have already crafted the legislation in England and Wales and, indeed, Scotland. We just need to refine that to make it applicable to our situation. There is some good wording out there to base it on.

Anna Lo highlighted the theft of lead and copper, and the issues that she is aware of in her constituency. She mentioned an issue that I have not come across — how a gas leak had resulted from metal theft. So, it is not just a petty crime; major dangers can be caused to the public as a result of metal theft. This issue needs to be dealt with appropriately and with a degree of urgency, because it has taken too long already.

As I have said, legislation exists in other parts of the United Kingdom and, indeed, a traceability system is in existence in the Republic of Ireland. Interestingly, she mentioned the fact that local authorities can have a role in England and Wales. With the reform of local government, perhaps there will be a review and a need for the involvement of local councils. Certainly, it is they who will have environmental officers on the ground in each area. I am open to that issue being taken forward. There certainly needs to be collaboration with the Justice Department and the Environment Department, as I said earlier in response to Paul Girvan's comment on it being a hot potato.

Ian Milne indicated his broad support, but he was concerned about the cross-border aspect. As I have explained, there is already a requirement for the audit and traceability of material being purchased at licensed dealers' sites in the Republic of Ireland, so it is us who are open for abuse at present, with material coming the other direction. Certainly, I agree with him that we need to keep bureaucracy to a minimum. When we look at this, we should not be arguing over the Department of the Environment or the Department of Justice. We have to look at the end consumer, the user and the businesses that will have to operate under the legislation, and we should be designing it to meet their needs, not those of civil servants who may have a particular specialism in the area. Certainly, their advice is needed to ensure that the legislation is got right, but we should be looking to the workings of the legislation to ensure that its costs are kept to a minimum and that it is able to do what it sets out to achieve.

One of the most telling aspects of this debate on the Bill is the empty ministerial chair.

That really does show the lack of joined-up government that we have had to date. I highlighted this issue several years ago in a question on the Programme for Government. I was referred to individual Departments. It is such a pity that this was not built into the Programme for Government at some stage, even belatedly, in order to recognise that, even though it is cross-departmental, there is a gap and that joined-up government should bring it forward.

I am pleased to have received general support for the principles of the Bill at this stage. I look forward to further scrutiny and to working with the Committee, whatever Committee is deemed to be appropriate to deal with it, to try to make sure that we deliver legislation which meets the needs of our constituents and minimises the disruption that could occur in their lives as a result of metal theft.

Rural Needs Bill: Second Stage

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Rural Needs Bill [NIA 67/11-16] be agreed.

This important Bill is designed to promote a fair and inclusive rural society and ensure the equitable treatment of our rural dwellers, who account for more than one third of our population across the North of Ireland. The Bill's primary purpose is to introduce a statutory duty on public authorities to consider rural needs when developing policy and delivering public services. The Bill, as a whole, will ensure that the consideration of rural needs becomes an integral part of policy development and service delivery across all sectors of government.

The proposals for this new legislation have been welcomed by stakeholders, who have expressed their strong support for its provisions. I am grateful to all those who responded to the public consultation on the policy proposals for the Bill, in written responses and at the public meetings that were held, and also to those stakeholders who provided input prior to the formal consultation exercise. Their comments have made a significant contribution to shaping the policy for the Bill and to the drafting of the Bill itself.

Before I set out the Bill's main provisions, I will outline why this new legislation is needed. The Executive first committed to rural proofing in 2002, and they reaffirmed their commitment in 2009. This means that policymakers within Departments are required to assess whether their policy proposals are likely to have any adverse impacts on rural dwellers. To date, however, this requirement to rural proof is a non-legislative one and, although there are examples of where it has been working well, good practice in rural proofing has been patchy.

It is evident that rural proofing is not being carried out in an effective, consistent, cohesive and transparent way. Rural stakeholders and respondents to my Department's policy consultation have been clear in their view that more needs to be done to improve rural proofing right across government so that it delivers real benefit to our rural communities. I believe that placing a statutory duty on government to consider rural needs, and providing mechanisms to support and monitor compliance with that duty, will help to ensure that the needs of rural dwellers are being properly considered as part of the Government's decision-making.

I am also of the view that, in this difficult financial climate, with increasing pressures on budgets, it is even more important that the potential impacts of policies on rural dwellers are assessed and addressed appropriately within available resources so that decisions about service provision are as well-informed and evidence-based as possible.

I turn now to the main provisions of the Bill. Clause 1 will introduce a statutory duty on public authorities to consider the social and economic needs of people in rural areas when developing, adopting, implementing or revising policies, strategies and plans and when designing and delivering public services. This duty will also apply to decisions on the funding associated with such policies, strategies, plans and public services. Initially, that obligation will be placed on all Departments and councils. However, clause 1 provides for my Department to specify, through subordinate legislation, other public authorities to which the provisions of the legislation will extend in future. Any such subordinate legislation will be subject to the draft affirmative procedure, which will allow for thorough scrutiny, through the Assembly's procedures, of any proposal to extend the scope of the legislation in that way. The use of subordinate legislation to extend the Bill to other public authorities will allow the new arrangements to embed effectively in central and local government before they are rolled out more widely. There will be further consultation on the other public bodies to which the provisions of the legislation should extend.

Clause 2 will enable my Department to support rural proofing by providing guidance, information and advice to public authorities about matters related to rural needs and ways of meeting them. It will also enable my Department to undertake, commission or support research into matters relating to rural needs.

Clause 3 introduces a mechanism for monitoring and reporting on how public authorities have considered rural needs. All Departments and district councils, as well as any other public authorities that may be specified in future, will have an obligation to gather information on how they meet their statutory duty to consider the needs of people in rural areas, and they will be required to provide that information to my Department. DARD will have a duty to collate the information provided to it and to prepare an annual report, which will be laid before the Assembly. As well as information about the consideration of rural needs, the annual report will include details on how my Department has fulfilled its additional functions under the Bill, such as the support role that I have just mentioned. These monitoring and reporting arrangements will provide the Assembly with the opportunity to scrutinise how public authorities have met their statutory duty to consider rural needs and will provide for greater transparency and accountability on the rural proofing of government policy and service delivery.

The final provision of the Bill that I wish to highlight is the duty placed on my Department by clause 4 to make arrangements with public authorities for the purpose of securing cooperation and sharing of information between them. That provision will enable my Department, other Departments, district councils and any other public authorities that may be specified in future to work collaboratively and to exchange information and good practice where it is appropriate to do so. That will help to ensure a more cohesive and consistent approach across government to the consideration of rural needs.

In conclusion, I firmly believe that the Bill, if enacted, will provide a firm basis for the consistent, systematic, and effective consideration of rural needs. It will demonstrate government's commitment to help all citizens to enjoy equitable treatment, regardless of where they live. Therefore, I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mr Irwin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I speak today as Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and will represent the views of the Committee on the Bill. The Committee had a number of briefings on the Bill as it was developed and its policy proposals were firmed up. Our last two briefings were on 3 November and 19 May 2015. As the Minister outlined, the policy proposals were signed off by the Executive on 7 July, the Bill was drafted over last summer, and, on 20 October, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister agreed that it could be introduced using the urgent decision procedure.

At its meeting on 3 November, the Committee heard that the general purpose of the Bill is to impose a duty on public authorities to consider rural needs. Initially, that duty will extend to all Departments and to local government. It is anticipated by the Department that, in due course, it will be extended to all other public bodies. Therefore, the Bill will introduce a statutory duty on all Departments and district councils to consider the needs of people living in rural areas when developing policy and delivering public services.

The Minister has already outlined in her speech what each clause will do, so I will not go over that again today. Instead, I will outline some of the concerns that the Committee had when it last discussed the Bill. For example, we wanted to know what difference the Bill would make to rural communities and farmers. After all, the Executive have already committed to a rural-proofing obligation.

DARD has been unable to provide the Committee with any concrete information or research to inform it about how well or otherwise the rural-proofing obligation has been working in each Department. DARD officials told the Committee that, when it consulted on the Bill, respondents stated that there was a perception that rural proofing was undertaken in a patchy way. However, that is just a perception, and we have no definite proof that, in reality, this Bill is going to make a difference to rural communities and farmers. When we discussed the Bill with DARD, one member explored that aspect further, asking for specifics about how the statutory duty might have affected the closure of rural schools. What he wanted to know was whether, if the Rural Needs Bill had been in place, it would have made any difference to the way in which decisions were taken or policy made on rural school closures.

The next issue that I draw attention to is the financial impact of the Bill. All Bills, when they are introduced in the Assembly, are accompanied by an explanatory and financial memorandum. That document is meant to outline the financial impacts of the Bill so that we in the Assembly and the wider public can see the implications for the public purse. At this time, with tight budgets and less money to go around, it is even more important that the financial implications of new laws are explained in detail to allow informed and full consideration, so we were disappointed to see that the draft memorandum has only one short paragraph on finance at paragraph 12. There is no real detail on the financial aspects of the Bill other than a vague sentence, which states:

"The requirement across government to report on their functions under this Bill will require some additional administrative resource."

I personally do not think that that is sufficient. Surely it would have been wise for DARD to have made some firmer assessment of the additional administrative support required and what that means in pounds and pence. That will be one of the key issues that we will explore with DARD officials if the Bill comes to us at Committee Stage. We will want to make sure that a proper assessment has been done of the financial impacts across central and local government. I would go as far as to say that the Committee will need proof that that assessment has been made before we are content to allow the Bill out of its Committee Stage.

The provisions in the Bill also impose a new duty on local government. We want to make sure that the new councils are aware of that duty, are prepared for it and have the budget and resources to carry it out. Again, we think that it should be DARD's duty to do that assessment before the Committee completes its scrutiny of the Bill. Similarly, the provisions in the Bill may, at some stage, be extended to a range of public bodies. That would be done after the Bill is enacted and after a period of bedding down in central and local government. I anticipate that the Committee will want to discuss what consultation DARD will have with public bodies on a range of issues, including which bodies should be on that list and how DARD will assess their capabilities to consider rural needs.

The next issue that I want to mention is how the provisions of the Bill will work in practice. How will the various duties be delivered? What will happen if they are not delivered? In other words, given that the Bill has no enforcement, how robust will it be? If the Bill is not proposing methods of sanction beyond those that are already available to the public, such as writing to the Department or their MLA, what tangible difference will the Bill make, and why are we doing it?

A further concern is defining certain terms in the Bill that we believe need further clarification. What is meant by "rural" and "needs"? How will "rural areas" be defined? Will DARD use the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) definition, which is based on the size of settlements? Furthermore, with reference to NISRA, Assembly Members may be aware that NISRA already provides guidance and recommendations to Departments and other public authorities on using spatial measures of deprivation in rural areas. What is the overlap with the Bill? Is DARD now taking on responsibility for a NISRA role and remit?

That is a broad overview of the Committee's thinking to date. I look forward to hearing what other Members have to say on the Bill today. Thank you.

10.45 am

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I take this opportunity to express support for the Bill as we reach Second Stage today. As the Minister quite rightly pointed out, 37% of people in the North of Ireland live in rural areas, which equates to about 670,000 people. Whilst there are many advantages of living in a rural area — I am one of the people who cherishes that — many exceptional challenges face people, which include isolation; very poor infrastructure; poor communication; and access to services. Indeed, during the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development's tackling rural poverty and social isolation (TRPSI) inquiry, we heard of many examples from stakeholders. My constituency of West Tyrone has some of the most rural, isolated areas, such as the Sperrins, and Owenkillew, which is a super output area, is the number one most deprived area in the North of Ireland for lack of services. All that is compounded by the way in which deprivation is measured by NISRA, as a result of which, not one rural area in the North of Ireland is included in the top 10 most deprived areas, which has implications for funding and support for rural areas.

As for the bigger scheme, whilst we as a party welcome the Bill, we do not see it in isolation. We see it as an important part of a wider jigsaw and one of a package of measures to support and enhance rural areas. We are putting it in the context of important decisions on CAP reform and how the North is being treated as a single region as we progress towards an equal rate in the single farm payment. As we move into the incoming financial year, there is a well-funded £623 million rural development programme, LEADER funding for social and economic development in rural areas and the protection of the TRPSI budget.

As the Minister said, in 2002 and again in 2009, the Executive committed to rural proofing to realise the vision of fair and inclusive rural areas where people would have equal access to services. It is becoming increasingly clear, however, that the mechanism that was being used for rural proofing is not working. It is not sufficient to achieve the Executive's aim of a fair and inclusive rural society. For starters, the scheme that has been in place since 2002 is voluntary. It does not have a statutory basis, so there is no statutory obligation on government organisations or any other organisations to rural proof their policies. As the Minister said, it is patchy in areas, and, at a Committee evidence session at the outset of the policy, one official said that rural proofing was not included at the inception of policies but was a bolt-on at the end. We believe that this legislation will have the potential to have rural needs included at policy inception and policy development and not as some sort of bolt-on at the end.

From working in rural areas, being on the ARD Committee and involved in the rural community sector, we know that, but you do not have to take our word for it. Last year, the rural stakeholder forum, which was set up around this time last year to consult with the Department on the need for a Bill, came up with a number of overriding themes and conclusions, one of which was that there is a need for more consistency across government. There is also a need for more transparency. The forum believes that the Rural Needs Bill will increase awareness of the need for rural proofing. A Bill will result in better application of proofing, leading to better outcomes for rural areas, and we support that. I should say that, in the context of our not looking at the Bill in isolation, our colleague Martin Ferris in Leinster House is also introducing a similar private Member's Bill in the other part of the island.

In conclusion, we feel that the Bill — its four clauses include the provision to extend the legislation using subordinate legislation — will be a major step towards achieving the Executive's objective of a fairer and more equitable rural society in which people and families will choose to live, work, learn and play. I commend the Bill.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Fáiltím roimh an deis labhairt ar an Dara Céim den Bhille seo. Creideann an páirtí seo gur gá le polasaí leas na tuaithe agus go bhfuil gá le reachtaíocht le déanamh cinnte de go bhfuil leas na tuaithe san áireamh agus polasaithe nua a gcur i bhfeidhm. Is ar an bhonn sin a chuirim fáilte roimh an Bhille. The SDLP has always believed that there needs to be strict adherence to a policy of rural proofing and that legislation from the Assembly is necessary to ensure that Departments do not carry out policies that have an adverse effect on the rural population. It is in that spirit that we welcome the Rural Needs Bill. We do, however, have some concerns about its implementation, as I will outline later.

Effective communication from DARD is necessary to ensure that rural proofing is in place to protect the interests of rural communities, and that, in turn, will strengthen their voice. DARD should always engage readily with rural communities to ensure the best outcome for those communities. The SDLP has said for some time that the Department must have a statutory role in promoting and encouraging other bodies to undertake rural proofing. The SDLP also believes that the DARD rural White Paper should be acted on and placed on a statutory basis. That would mean that voluntary and community-based support services would be given sustainable long-term funding.

The SDLP recognises the efforts that have been made since rural proofing was introduced in 2002 to make it more prevalent in departmental policymaking. However, it remains the case that no statutory obligation to carry out rural proofing has been in existence and, therefore, there was always the possibility that the rural communities would be ignored. Rural proofing has not received an appropriate amount of consideration and, as a result, many policies have passed through the House and through councils that have had an adverse effect on rural dwellers. One could say that the policy of rural proofing has, in some cases, been more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

The Bill is relatively short and contains the main headline provisions that our party would like to see. However, there are some omissions from the Bill and therefore some uncertainty. For example, a rolling programme of rural research upon which clear decisions of rural circumstance impact could be made would help any policymaker to rural proof a particular policy or decision. That is not apparent in the Bill, and there is not sufficient rigour to constitute an ongoing analysis that will produce long-term benefit. Other support mechanisms, including the availability of rural information and analysis, need to be included in the Department's processes around the Bill. The SDLP wants to see a consistent database of rural-specific research that can be used to create policy that allows for and promotes the unique characteristics and features of rural communities.

One flaw in the Bill can be seen in the form of clause 3, and that is in relation to monitoring. Mr Irwin pointed out that there are no sanctions to enforce aspects of the Bill. We in the SDLP believe strongly that an independent monitoring arrangement should be built into the Bill. Many stakeholders have expressed to us that independence is required in the reporting arrangements, that it does not make sense for the Department that is promoting the Bill and its provisions to also carry out the monitoring, and that there may be a conflict of interest in that respect.

We believe that monitoring should be carried out by an independent organisation properly resourced to enable it to discharge that role. Stakeholders suggested that it would be appropriate for that body to continue research into rural change so that the process could be developed and modified to meet evolving needs. Perhaps Members should consider the mechanisms for rural research more fully as the Bill passes through the House.

The potential conflicts of interest that I have mentioned also apply to the proposed role for any interdepartmental committee on rural policy, where representatives of all Departments would be expected to monitor their own performance. An independent monitoring aspect is needed to ensure that not all processes are taking place in-house and to ensure best practice.

The rural development network stressed the need for implementation to be taken seriously by the Department. They pointed out as a lesson the failure of the implementation of the biodiversity duty placed on public bodies by the Wildlife and Natural Environment Act 2011. The draft guidelines appeared three years after the legislation and were too vague and ambiguous. They have still not been issued in their final form.

In conclusion, the SDLP is supportive of the policy aims in the Bill. The thrust of the Bill is to place a statutory duty on Departments to rural proof. That is welcome. However, there is fine tuning to do around implementation and monitoring. The SDLP will engage fully in the Bill process to ensure that that happens. Mar fhocal scoir, a Cheann Comhairle, ba mhaith liom mo bhúiochas a ghabháil leat arís, agus tacaím leis an Dara Céim den Bhille. We will be supporting the Second Stage of the Bill.

Mr Beggs: I rise on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party to support this legislation. I live in a rural community and am a governor of a rural primary school, Glynn Primary School.

Rural proofing is needed, and the need for public bodies to carry it out has long been spoken about in the Chamber yet little has happened. For several years, the rural community was promised what was initially called a rural White Paper, a document designed to prepare the way for legislation that would protect the rights of rural dwellers to basic services. Out of that came the rural White Paper action plan, a broad-brush list of aspirations. Of the 90 proposed actions, however, 22 were merely commitments to continue to do something as if the rural community should be grateful that services already available were not being withdrawn.

In the so-called action plan, there was an absence of specific and measurable targets against which Departments and Ministers could be held to account. It appeared to many that the plan, and much of the Department's hype around it, was being used simply as a fig leaf to try to present an image of something being done. Unfortunately, that set the tone for much of the debate since.

11.00 am

At long last, and after unnecessary delay, DARD produced the Bill that is before us today. It places a duty on public authorities to consider rural needs. That is a laudable goal, but what exactly does it mean? My party hopes that it means a genuine grasp of the challenges of living in rural areas, and how decisions to change services will often have a very different impact in a rural community than in the middle of a town or city. Take education, for example. In recent years, we have had the widely discredited viability audits. They were followed by the wholly dysfunctional area planning process. Never mind not working in rural areas, it did not work in urban ones. Schools were assessed simply by looking at numbers on sheets, enrolments and deficits particularly. I highlight, in particular, the recent Audit Office report that showed that enrolment numbers, which were contributing to empty-seat calculations in our schools, can be out by as much as 20% in some schools, so the basis of those sheets and figures can be discredited. At present, 55% of Northern Ireland's primary schools and 20% of its post-primary schools are in rural areas. Many of them face an uncertain future as a result of the flawed belief in the minimum enrolment number of 105 pupils for primary schools and 500 for post-primary schools. Senior officials recently suggested that the minimum should be 800 or 900 pupils for post-primary schools. It is not at all surprising to see the recent viability audits revealing that rural schools are much more likely to be identified as "in stress" than their urban counterparts.

Schools, and indeed playgroups, are vital to maintaining the cohesion of rural communities. The school is something that the community generally gathers round, and it is vital in a rural community. Were a playgroup to lose funding and fall, the option of travelling to a nursery school would be removed, so I would like to see increased focus on practical issues to protect schools and playgroups. If a playgroup falls, it puts at risk local schools that the young people would naturally have attended, so this is very important to rural communities. Often, child-minding arrangements are with the extended family, and they may be able to deliver and collect the children from an adjacent school or playgroup. Further travel could endanger such arrangements or, as a result, require expensive additional childcare costs to be borne by rural families.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

Since we are talking about protecting rural communities and working together cohesively, I highlight the case of Islandmagee Primary School. This is a particular example of how the system has not worked. Some 10 years ago, three primary schools — Ballypriormore, Kilcoan, Mullaghduh — agreed to amalgamate. It took considerable effort for each school, its governors and parents to buy into that. Ultimately, it was agreed to move to a new-build site. There followed a protracted delay in the planning process before a site was established. Then, we had to wait for the funding for the site. In 2006, a site was eventually bought, but it took far too long. Next, what did we find? A minimum number of 105 pupils must be enrolled. Of course, that caused everything to be frozen, and there was no more development. The remaining two schools — one has since closed — have approximately 120 pupils. The annual number of births in the Islandmagee ward is growing; it went up from 20 in 2011 to 26 in the most recent figures, so there is clear sustainability. What do we have? Is this one of the schools that has been prioritised for new-build funding? No, that has yet to be delivered, and there is huge uncertainty. If Departments are going to talk about rural needs, they are going to have to deliver them. Actions speak an awful lot louder than words.

Northern Ireland has fallen far behind other jurisdictions in the UK in rural-proofing decisions on schools.

In England, for example, there is a presumption against the closure of rural schools, and Scottish authorities are legally required to explore alternatives, as well as look at the impact of closure, particularly any adverse effects on the local community.

It is worthwhile remembering that closing a smaller rural school would often lead to significant additional new costs, such as transport, and to adverse effects on the local community and parents. Indeed, a report by Ulster University found that if smaller post-primary schools in Northern Ireland were to close — all 76 of them — there would be a saving of only 0.9% of the entire school budget, due to the extra costs that would need to be met. Does the Department of Education care? Will this Bill make it care? We will have to wait and see.

The Bill should apply to every Executive decision that has an impact on rural communities. Education will be one of the most prominent Departments to be affected, but we cannot forget issues such as the future structure and delivery of local health services either. For example, had this Bill been in place, I wonder if changes to care for the elderly in their homes would be viewed any differently.

Much will come down to the interpretation of the Bill, not least the key phrase, “consider rural needs”. What exactly does it mean? Does it mean consider and change, if the Department or public bodies find that the proposal will have a damaging impact on rural communities, or does it mean consider and then progress, regardless of what has been found?

Clause 4 will be one of the most important clauses. It places a duty on DARD to secure cooperation and collaboration between Departments and district councils. With the new councils’ community planning role, there is the potential for them to play a much more significant role in planning for rural communities, and I hope that that will be the case.

Ulster Unionists are content that this legislation passes to the next stage; we will support it.

Mr McCarthy: As a member of the Agriculture Committee, I, on behalf of the Alliance Party, support the Second Stage of the Rural Needs Bill. I concur with the comments made earlier by our Committee Chair.

The Alliance Party supports the implementation of an enhanced rural process across all Departments — and that is important, all Departments — because they all have a role to play in ensuring that all major policies and strategies are assessed to determine whether they will have a differential impact on rural areas. Where appropriate, adjustments must be made to take account of particular rural circumstances.

As an MLA for Strangford living on the Ards peninsula, a mainly rural area, I know all too well, as do others, that services in rural areas face a different range of challenges than those in other parts of Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, rural people and residents are entitled to, and deserve, the same as everyone else. Examples of those challenges include weaker infrastructure roll-out of, for example, broadband and gas heating. Indeed, it is still difficult for rural residents to get planning permission to build a dwelling for a family member, so that they can remain in that community. Another example is fewer public transport options. We must acknowledge the loneliness and isolation that can and does occur.

Something that concerns me greatly is the huge reduction in recent times in the provision of meals on wheels to rural residents. I recall being out on a delivery one morning to rural residents. I travelled down more than one long lane and I saw the difference that the arrival of meals on wheels made to the people there. Not only was it appreciated, but there was a face that those people could speak to — probably the first, and maybe the last, that they would see during the course of the day. That is an important aspect of rural need.

I am sure that all of us in this Chamber want the same quality of life for everyone in Northern Ireland, even if that means delivering services slightly differently in some places. My hope is that this Bill will go some of the way to ensuring that the difference in service delivery in rural areas is addressed. For example, as I said, a strategy to improve the availability of high-speed broadband could have to recognise that broadband is poor in rural areas to begin with, as indeed it is, and that this needs to be addressed. Or it could provide evidence that school reorganisation in rural areas would especially benefit from integrated education as some towns and villages would be able to sustain one school, but not two. My hope is that the model laid out in the Bill is one that ensures that public bodies are cognisant of needs. I will obviously work with my colleagues on the specific details of this part of the Committee’s scrutiny.

My final point is that Alliance has long advocated shared future proofing to ensure that policies promote sharing and not separation. I have yet to hear a cogent argument from supporters of this Bill as to why this approach is possible for rural needs but not for shared future needs. I hope that we will soon be able to apply the approach taken by the Bill to shared future legislation. I welcome the Minister’s contribution this morning and applaud the ideals contained in the Rural Needs Bill. I look forward to its successful progress through the House and onto the statute book.

Mr Anderson: As a member of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Rural Needs Bill. It is a small Bill of seven clauses, four of which contain the substance of the Bill, but it covers a big subject. It is of considerable relevance to many people, and I declare an interest in that I have been a rural dweller for most of my life.

At the outset, it is worth reminding ourselves of some of the key words covered by the Bill. The word "rural" is not defined in it, but, on the basis of the definition given by the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA), it means a settlement of fewer than 5,000 people. The term "rural needs", however, is defined in the Bill as meaning:

"the social and economic needs of persons in rural areas."

The countryside is at the heart of Northern Ireland life. Farming is one of the Province's oldest and most important industries. Many who work in our cities and towns choose to live in the countryside and rear their families there. Rural communities are an essential part of the fabric of society, but they have been disadvantaged and neglected for far too long.

The Bill seeks to address issues that have been of concern to rural dwellers for many years. Over those years, and more so in recent times, rural dwellers have lost many services and facilities. I frequently meet constituents who are very concerned about the reduction, or even the disappearance, of key facilities such as schools, banks, post offices, ATMs and so on. Often, the problem is exacerbated by cuts in public transport which make it even more difficult for rural dwellers to get into a town. This impacts on many folks in the countryside, but it has the most severe impact on vulnerable groups such as the elderly. Many rural dwellers are isolated, and many live alone.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

As part of the rural White Paper action plan, the Executive included a commitment to strive for a fair and inclusive rural society where rural dwellers enjoy the same quality of life as all others in the region. The consultation with key stakeholders that took place this time last year, along with the public consultation process that took place earlier this year, identified many of the problems that I have just outlined. The consultation also confirmed that there is broad support for legislation that puts the needs of the rural community onto a statutory footing.

11.15 am

Although the Bill is being taken forward by the Agriculture and Rural Development Minister, it is very much a Bill that transcends Departments. It stems from a broader Executive commitment and depends for its effectiveness on the willingness of all key players to step up to the plate. The logic underpinning the Bill is to make sure that all major policies and initiatives are properly assessed to see how they impact on rural areas. The Bill requires that consideration is given to what extent, if any, a particular policy might adversely impact on the rural community. Crucially, that rural proofing will involve not only central government but local government, and the intention is that other public bodies will be involved in due course. The Bill gives DARD the power to name those by affirmative resolution. The Bill also gives an enabling power to DARD to provide guidance and advice and to commission research into rural needs. I hope that DARD will not be found wanting in those areas.

I welcome the provision in the Bill to require all relevant bodies to compile data and share information. I also welcome the requirement for DARD to produce an annual report. However, as with all those things, legislation is only effective if it works in practice. It will need the full commitment and active support of central and local government, as well as other public bodies. I also feel that the new councils in particular will have a pivotal role to play. I look forward with interest to further exploring those and other issues at Committee Stage. At this stage, I am content to give my support to the broad principles of the Bill.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I would like to apologise to the Minister, the House and you for not being here for the start of the debate, but I want to make a few general comments regarding the Rural Needs Bill at Second Stage. It is a very important piece of legislation, and, in my opinion, it is long overdue. I am also delighted that the consultation with stakeholders and the wider public indicated widespread support for it, and all the comments of Members this morning have likewise done the same.

The Minister is to be commended for bringing the Bill forward. The Executive commitment to rural proofing in 2002, reaffirmed in 2009, was a step forward, but, without a legal requirement, it has not had the desired impact. During the recent TRPSI review and the motion debated here in the House a number of weeks ago on the multiple deprivation measures, we heard of the difficulties and inequalities for rural communities in access to services, opportunities and public funds, and the impact that that has on day-to-day life in the country.

Even the recent single planning policy statement failed, in my opinion, to make adequate provision for the rural dweller. Year on year, large numbers of young people who would have preferred to build in their local area have to relocate to urban settings. When the Regional Development Minister had to make savings in his Department, maintenance to rural roads and hedge cutting were among some of the first cuts to be made. Those roads may not have the same number of vehicles travelling on them as an A-class road, but, if they form part of your only route to and from your property, their quality affects not just your car but your safety.

If we want to sustain and grow our rural communities, which make up a large percentage of the North's population, they need to be supported and provided for. The Bill, if successful, will for the first time make it a statutory obligation for policymakers in central and local government to consider the needs of rural dwellers when developing policies and delivering public services. Importantly, it will also include an accountability mechanism.

I am delighted that, as stated earlier, Martin Ferris is bringing a similar piece of legislation to Leinster House. I look forward to a more detailed debate and discussion at the Committee Stage. That is my contribution this morning.

Mr Allister: No one will accuse the sponsor of this Bill of cluttering it with detail because there is a great dearth in that regard. Where that concerns me most is in respect of the reach of the Bill. As the Bill stands, it will apply only to Departments and councils and might never apply to anyone else. With so much policy delivered through arm's-length bodies, that is a fundamental flaw and mistake, as it is often through those bodies that the detrimental decisions of which rural dwellers complain are taken. Let me give some examples. The Northern Ireland Environment Agency is, in my experience, one of the most anti-rural and anti-rural dweller operatives in Northern Ireland. Yet, unless and until the Minister gets round to putting it on a list, it will be exempt from the statutory requirement to have regard to rural needs.

In my constituency of North Antrim, we have a significant concentration of the poultry industry, which is connected with the historical existence of O’Kane and Moy Park. In recent months, many affected farmers have come to see me in despair because the planning applications that they have made to extend their poultry houses or to replace them with new up-to-date poultry houses are being blocked by the Northern Ireland Environment Agency. It has come up with a concern that, because of the prevailing wind direction, or some other contention, there is too much of an ammonia influence on a derelict bog in the middle of my constituency. For that reason, go-ahead farmers who are trying to provide for themselves and their families are being trumped by the Northern Ireland Environment Agency’s total disregard for rural needs.

I would very much like to see the Northern Ireland Environment Agency subject to a statutory duty to have regard to the social and economic needs of persons in rural areas. That would put a brake on the folly that it is pursuing in respect of many farmers in rural constituencies. It is a disappointment to me that, in the Bill, that statutory duty is not forthwith extended to bodies such as the Northern Ireland Environment Agency and the Education Authority. Other Members spoke of matters educational; why are they, too, not subject to that duty from the beginning? It would be very easily done. All you have to do is put in a schedule, as you see in much legislation, that is a list of the public bodies to which the legislation applies. That Minister would have an enabling power, by secondary legislation, to amend that list, to take from it or add to it, but they would be there from the outset rather than bringing in legislation that applies to Departments but not to their arm’s-length bodies and councils, however that circumvents the application of the legislation for as long as we think appropriate for the bodies that really matter.

I appeal to the House to address that matter so that the promise that is possible by applying a statutory duty in respect to rural needs and rural proofing might actually be delivered. It will only be delivered if you include in the Bill the deliverers of services to the rural community.

The Minister and the Committee need to look with great sympathy at the idea of activating the Bill at the highest possible level, at the earliest possible opportunity, and with the greatest possible effect on rural dwellers. That can be done by making sure that bodies such as the Northern Ireland Environment Agency are, as they should be, subject to a statutory duty to consider and have due regard to rural needs rather than, as at the moment, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency belligerently sets itself up to suppress and override rural needs. I trust that that point will be taken on board.

Mrs O’Neill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am grateful to all the Members who contributed to this morning’s Second Stage of the Bill. All contributions have been valuable and informative, and I want to try to address some of the issues that have been raised. Obviously, as we move forward through the passage of the Bill, I am open to looking at some of the suggestions that have been made by Members throughout the course of this morning’s debate. Indeed, that is what the passage of the legislative process is for.

I think that most issues were covered initially by the Chair of the ARD Committee, so I will start by picking up on those. However, a thread of the same type of contribution certainly went through all of the debate. First, the Committee Chairperson asked why there is a need for the legislation. I strongly believe that a lot more can be done to improve the effectiveness, working and roll-out of rural proofing. It is fair to say that it has been patchy at best, and we cannot point to a very strong and good example of good practice in the past. So, any legislation that puts it on a statutory footing is to the benefit of rural dwellers — particularly when looking at strategic policymaking decisions — for all the reasons highlighted by quite a lot of the contributors in relation to the day-to-day challenges faced by people who live in rural areas.

For me, this is about having a consistent, cohesive and effective rural-proofing policy that is taken forward in a very transparent way, which allows all those policy decisions to be scrutinised so that rural people feel that their rights and entitlements are properly considered at the stage of inception of policy or strategic decisions that Declan McAleer referred to earlier.

The issue of resource implications was raised. I do not think that we are talking about large amounts of resource. This is something that is a change for Departments to do in the first year but Departments are already supposed to be doing it. They are supposed to carry out rural proofing of their policies. It is difficult, at this stage, to quantify precisely what the resource implication will be, but the long-term benefits for rural people will be that their needs are properly considered when it comes to strategic policy decisions being taken. Although the Bill puts in place a new monitoring and reporting arrangement, it is not anticipated that the resource allocation associated with that will be significant.

There is also the fact that my Department has set out clearly its willingness and intention to work with other Departments and councils on how the monitoring process will take place. My Department is certainly up for working with councils. In relation to that, someone referred to the potential administrative burden on councils. A new era of council structures has come into play. They are obviously actively involved in community planning. Alongside that work, rural development strategies are being developed for each of the LAGs. That, in itself, will mean that there is the proper and right opportunity that there needs to be for councils to embed, from their inception, how they are going to take forward policies and strategic decisions that cater for the needs of all the people that they represent in their council area. So, I do not believe that there is going to be a potentially increased administrative burden on councils.

It is a fair point to make that no sanctions for non-compliance are included in the Bill. It is difficult, at this stage, to set out what sanction would be appropriate in this context. However, the monitoring report will ensure that public authorities provide information on how they have complied with the duty, and that information will be made available. That, in itself, provides transparency and an opportunity for the rural proofing of each Department and council to be properly scrutinised after the report has been laid, and that leads to the challenge function that allows for Departments and councils to be challenged around what they are or are not doing.

11.30 am

In relation to research, we need to be very clear — I think that Declan McAleer also made this point — that this is not something that we look at in isolation. The Bill puts the need to rural proof and for rural needs to be taken into account on a statutory footing. However, we also need to look at other measures that are out there, and I believe that research is a key area. In the past, the Department has taken forward research. Last month, we commissioned AFBI to undertake a three-year research project that aims to assess the impact of rural proofing in improving access to services and to explore alternative models for delivering effective joined-up government in policy development and service provision to rural areas. All those things are complementary and will lead to an improved situation and improved recognition of the needs of rural dwellers. For me, that is all very important and all very complementary work. DARD has an ongoing programme of research under its evidence and innovation strategy that will continue to evaluate existing policy.

One contributor asked how the Bill would sit with the rural White Paper action plan. Again, that is complementary to what we are trying to do with the Rural Needs Bill. Those two things will continue to complement each other, and, on the back of the legislation, I am committed to refreshing the rural White Paper action plan and seeing what other new initiatives can be taken forward across Departments.

With regard to why the word “rural” is not defined in the Bill, NISRA’s findings of the interdepartmental review of urban/rural classification were published in March this year, and that review established a new default urban/rural boundary with settlements of a population of less than 5,000 being considered as rural, which, as Members know, was previously 4,500. The new settlement classification also includes consideration of service provision, which is estimated on the basis of the drive time to the nearest settlement containing a population of at least 10,000. There is still some scope for flexibility in the urban/rural classification, with the NISRA report recommending that users should continue to define urban and rural in ways that are appropriate for different projects and programmes. However, defining “rural” is complex and it is an ongoing piece of work for that to be a definitive blanket definition across Departments. That work will very clearly come from the research that my Department has commissioned through AFBI.

I omitted to say in relation to research that clause 2 puts the Department on a statutory footing to support research into matters relating to rural needs. It is something that we are already doing and something that we are always open to do more of where the need is identified. That will help to form an evidence base for any additional policy decisions in the future.

I think that all Members wanted to know, when the legislation comes into force, whether it could require a wider group, including arm’s-length bodies, to consider rural needs. I look forward to that discussion throughout the course of the Bill. We consulted on that and, at this moment, I believe that a phased approach to the application of the Bill’s provisions will allow for further consultation on those matters across all the arm’s length bodies. However, I am open to discussing that during the passage of the Bill and, if there is an opportunity to do that, I will be up for it. If we are not able to do it during the passage of the Bill, I will want to come back to it. I do not believe that the Bill will deliver what we intend it to deliver as it stands, and we will need to come back with subordinate legislation. However, if we are able to have it in the Bill, I am certainly open to that. As part of the consultation, a number of bodies indicated that they were already undertaking rural proofing. However, I believe that if they are taking policy decisions that impact on rural people, they also should be put on that statutory footing to do so.

I thank Members for their contributions to the debate. This is a small but effective piece of legislation that will make a difference to rural people. I look forward to the passage of the Bill and to engaging with Members and the Committee on how we can improve things where we can to make sure that, at the end of the legislative process, we come out with the strongest possible Bill. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Rural Needs Bill [NIA 67/11-16] be agreed.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Second Stage of the Rural Needs Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development.

Renewable Heat Incentive Schemes (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to move

That the draft Renewable Heat Incentive Schemes (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

This statutory rule is being made under powers contained in the Energy Act 2011, which prescribes that these regulations are laid in draft for approval by affirmative resolution of the Assembly.

In addressing sustainable energy, our focus often falls on renewable electricity, yet a greater proportion of our energy use is for heat. That includes domestic central heating, heating of commercial premises and heating for industrial processes such as poultry production. Northern Ireland's predominant form of heating fuel is oil, in contrast to GB, where it is gas, which is a much cleaner fuel. The Executive are supporting the extension of the gas network through a grant of £30 million for gas to the west, and we hope to see that progress over the next few years, along with the extension of gas to east Down.

The Executive's principal vehicle for promoting renewable heat is the renewable heat incentive (RHI). That is designed to deliver the Executive's Programme for Government renewable heat targets of 4% by 2015 and 10% by 2020. That will contribute to the UK's target of 15% renewable energy by 2020, as required by the EU renewables directive. The non-domestic RHI was introduced in 2012. It incentivises the uptake of renewable heat technologies, such as biomass, heat pumps and solar thermal installations. It provides payments for 20 years, based on heat energy generated. The level of tariff is dependent on the size and type of technology and is calculated to cover capital costs, operating costs and non-financial hassle costs over the lifetime of the technology. Following that, the domestic RHI scheme was introduced in December 2014, replacing the earlier renewable heat premium payment scheme.

It was always the intention to introduce changes to the non-domestic scheme to make tariff changes and introduce cost control measures. Those were consulted on in 2013, but since then implementation of the domestic scheme has been given priority. These regulations begin the process of introducing measures to update the non-domestic scheme. First, new tariffs are being introduced for combined heat and power (CHP). That is to allow CHP projects to claim for their renewable heat under the RHI and their renewable electricity under the NI renewables obligation. Secondly, the medium biomass tariffs are being extended to encompass larger boilers. That will incentivise single larger boilers, and it brings Northern Ireland into line with GB. Thirdly, a tiered tariff and cap are being introduced for new small and medium biomass installations to ensure value for money.

Just under £38 million of funding has been provided by Treasury for the Northern Ireland RHI schemes during the five-year period 2011-16. However, low levels of uptake generated an underspend of around £15 million during the first four years. My Department's focus over the past 12 months has been on trying to improve the performance of the RHI scheme to achieve the Executive's Programme for Government target and ensure that the renewable heating sector and the wider Northern Ireland economy benefit from the investment. To give one example, extensive advertising campaigns were conducted during 2013-14 and 2014-15. These have resulted in increased scheme uptake over the last 12 months. The total number of renewable heating installations under the non-domestic scheme has increased from just over 250 to over 1,600 during the last 14 months.

Current estimates suggest that around 6% of our total heating needs in Northern Ireland are now met through renewable heating technologies. In addition to the reduction in CO<sub>2</sub> emissions that that brings, the local Northern Ireland economy is benefiting from over £23 million of annual investment through the RHI schemes. That investment brings benefits in terms of job retention and creation in the energy services sector. Unfortunately, however, all that success comes at a cost. Total applications for the Northern Ireland non-domestic scheme are now exceeding our highest estimates. Therefore, we need to look at the full range of cost-control measures that have been introduced in GB. Of necessity, that will include measures to curtail the scheme should Treasury funding be restricted.

I will take a decision in the light of any announcements in the spending review. However, those are matters for another day. At this time, I ask Members to support the regulator.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire chomh maith. Thanks to the Minister as well. The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment has closely followed the progress of the renewable heat incentive throughout the current mandate, from the outline proposals, which came to the Committee in June 2011, to the introduction of the non-domestic renewable heat incentive in November 2012 and the domestic RHI in December last year.

When it was introduced, the renewable heat incentive offered a structured means of providing long-term guaranteed financial assistance for renewable heat installations. The incentive is designed to provide a cost-effective option for consumers to switch to renewable sources of heat. It also provides an option for any consumer to avail themselves of a source of heating that can lead to lower CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, increased fuel security and an increase in local employment opportunities in the green energy sector. This statutory rule will provide the legislative basis for extending the non-domestic RHI scheme to offer support for heat generated from combined heat and power installations and will introduce a tiered tariff for non-domestic biomass installations to ensure affordability and value for money.

The Committee considered the SL1 at its meeting on 8 September and was content with the policy proposals at that time. However, that was 10 weeks ago, and the Committee had the opportunity to consider the SR being debated today only at this morning's meeting. The Committee was concerned that, following a 10-week lull between the SL1 and the SR, the Department was suddenly in a hurry to bring the SR to the Committee and get it passed in a plenary sitting within a matter of an hour or so. The Committee, therefore, questioned officials on the reasons for the delay and for the subsequent sudden haste. Officials informed the Committee that the Department originally aimed for the legislation to come into effect on 4 November. However, they said that there was a delay in securing the financial and legal approvals. The Department was concerned to avoid a hiatus in the industry and, therefore, wanted to bring forward the legislation as quickly as possible.

The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment supports the Renewable Heat Incentive Schemes (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 and recommends that the regulations be affirmed by the Assembly.

Mr Bell: I thank the Chairman for those very constructive remarks. Energy matters are, obviously, a major issue for the Assembly, as they are for local households and businesses. I take on board what the Chairman said, and I accept that it is somewhat unusual for a motion to be debated on the same day as scrutiny by the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I know that he knows that my intention was to have the changes introduced from 4 November. However, due to the delay in progressing what were necessary legal and financial clearances, I was unable to bring it to the House earlier, but I wanted to do so as close to 4 November as possible.

11.45 am

I am committed to expanding opportunities to provide greater choice for consumers, promoting more sustainable technologies, and supporting those who wish to change from conventional fossil fuel heating. The development of the renewable heat sector promotes a more diverse and competitive heating market in Northern Ireland. It brings new jobs and businesses and contributes to our targets for cutting carbon emissions. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Renewable Heat Incentive Schemes (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

Local Government (Numbers and Addresses of Buildings in Townlands) Bill: Second Stage

Mr Flanagan: I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Local Government (Numbers and Addresses of Buildings in Townlands) Bill [NIA 63/11-16] be agreed.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am delighted to move the Bill's Second Stage and ask that a debate now be heard. At the outset, I want to thank all those people, particularly the staff in the Assembly's Bill Office, who have helped me through the formulation of the policy and the drafting of the Bill itself. It has been a long process, and I am glad that it has finally got to this stage. At one stage, I feared that we would never get this far. Thankfully, we are now at the Second Stage debate, in which Members from all parties can have their say on the issue, articulate what they think about the proposal in the Bill, and speak about the wider issue of the promotion and protection of townlands.

From my perspective, a Cheann Comhairle, this is a very simple and straightforward Bill, but the positive consequences of the change are potentially significant. As a Fermanagh man, I am acutely aware of the significance of townlands to many of our citizens. As someone who is proud of my own culture and heritage, I know that the townlands that we come from and live in are an important part of who we are and how we identify ourselves.

I am proud to come from the townland of Tullymore, the big bog. There are not too many people who say that they are proud to come from a bog, but I suppose it is the use of townlands that allow us to have wee misnomers like that in society. Tullymore is on the shores of Lough Erne outside the village of Garrison in County Fermanagh. The identity that we all get from our collective townlands is something that all of us, across society, are deeply proud of and attached to.

Across Ireland, townlands are an important part of our shared history. They were an integral part of how this nation was subdivided for the purposes of administration of government and also identity. Most people are proud of the identity given to us by our home village or town or even city. Even those of us who come from Fermanagh are proud of the county or province that we come from. Those of us who know what townland we come from are proud of it also.

Travelling around Ireland, I, like other Members, often get a good sense from people of how they identify themselves. In many counties on this island, there is a strong sense of townlands playing a crucial part in that identity but, in some parts, it is stronger than in others. In places like Fermanagh, where addresses were historically organised on the basis of the townland system, the notion, understanding and usage of townlands among the common language is very strong. At this stage, I pose this question to Members: are Members content with the level of usage of townlands in their area or constituency, or do they want to see further changes made to how we promote, protect and indeed save the use of townlands?

The purpose of the Bill is to protect townlands. In doing so, it would allow councils, if they so wish, to allocate numbers to properties based on the system of townlands rather than by road, which is the only way that it can be done under the current legislation. The Bill would amend the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Order 1995 to make provision about the allocation of numbers to buildings and the format of addresses.

Over the three years that I have been working on the Bill, I have engaged with some Members who did not know what a townland is never mind what their own townland is, so I think that it would be useful if I provide a brief overview of what a townland is and where it comes from.

Mr McCarthy: I am gratified that you were willing to give way. Does the Member recognise that, on probably two occasions in the lifetime of Stormont since its reestablishment, we had unanimous support for the retention of townland names and, as a result, have made significant progress, as shown in the very fact that the address of this establishment now has “Ballymiscaw” contained in it? The direction given from those motions was that all Departments and councils would encourage and use townland names, where possible.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. The debate that he and his now party leader brought on 1 October 2001 is something that I will reference later. I accept what the Member has said about there being unanimous support across the Chamber and society for the greater usage of townlands, particularly in the addressing system. The Assembly, under the stewardship of your predecessor, Mr Speaker, made great strides by adding the townland of Ballymiscaw to its address. It is right and proper that all correspondence emanating from this Building uses that townland, but I do not know how we can judge the extent to which the use of its townland name by this one institution, which does not correspond that much with people, protects and promotes townlands.

I contend that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development including the townland when it issues single farm payment forms or sends letters to farmers notifying them that they are having an inspection or getting a fine or penalty of some kind — and it nearly always is — would be much better than the Assembly, as a corporate institution, using the townland. So there has been some positive progress made over the last 14 years, as a result of the motion that the Alliance Party brought and of the work that the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee engaged in previously, but we are not there yet.

Unfortunately, despite all of that work, townlands are still not as prominent as they need to be. My proposal would not address that in totality, but it would provide an opportunity for some councils, where there is an appetite for it, to put townlands back at the heart of the addressing system — to allow people to understand what their address is, based on a townland system. That is what this proposal is about. I am not standing here telling you that this is going to be the solution to the eradication of townlands. All this does is provide councils with a mechanism by which they can offer and allocate addresses based on the townland system instead of the road name system, which was much lamented in 1973 by members from all parties.

I will return to my speech, Kieran, if you do not mind. Ireland was historically divided into four provinces — Ulster, Munster, Leinster and Connaught — which were then separated into counties. Those counties were further broken down into baronies which, in turn, were split into parishes, with each parish made up of a number of townlands. Across Ireland, there are 61,098 townlands, 16,400 of which are in the province of Ulster. There are 1,756 townlands in Antrim, 967 in Armagh, 2,010 in Cavan, 1,282 in Derry, 2,737 in Donegal, 1,336 in Down, 2,300 in Fermanagh, 2,181 in Tyrone and 1,850 in Monaghan. So, as you can see from each of those nine counties, townlands have considerable significance in each county, but some counties have a better record than others in promoting and protecting them.

In the last number of months, when doing a bit of research on finalising the work on the Bill, I discovered something that many Members who were here for the debate in 2001 will be aware of, but which caught me by surprise: Oliver Gibson, a DUP MLA, revealed that the townland system was also in operation in Sudan. I was not aware of that. I am not sure whether they copied us or we copied them. I have never been to Sudan, but I have no reason to doubt Mr Gibson in that regard. I hope that the people of Sudan find the townland system working well for them.

The issues surrounding townlands have been somewhat controversial, in some parts, over recent decades. The Local Government Act 1972, which constituted the district councils to administer the 26 local government districts created by the Local Government Boundaries Act 1971 and abolish the existing local authorities at the time, saw the introduction of road names for the first time, at the expense of the more widely recognised townland system. The introduction of a formal system of road names was adopted by 25 of the 26 councils. Fermanagh District Council stood alone in retaining townlands, with universal support from councillors from all political parties locally. During the 2001 debate, Members from all parties supported the stance of Fermanagh District Council in preserving townlands and using them as the principal part of the address.

However, Fermanagh District Council reluctantly moved to adopt a system of road names after a lengthy policy of internal debate amongst councillors of all parties. That policy was enacted on 1 February 2013. The decision to introduce a road name-based system was not taken lightly by the council and was taken only because current legislation does not allow the numbering of properties in a townland-based system. The council also agreed at the time to continue campaigning for the minor legislative change that I propose today.

As someone who used to run a business that was heavily reliant on the ability of individuals and businesses to pass credit checks, I understand why there was a desire by some in the county for a change to be made, but there was never a demand for the abandonment of the townland-based system. People were sick, sore and tired of not being able to order products for home delivery or pass a credit check, as the previous system was not compatible with that of the credit checking agencies. The way in which those credit checks and home deliveries work is that you simply type in your house number and postcode. Using the Pointer system that Land and Property Services (LPS) operates, a unique property reference number is generated which then ties you to that property and allows credit checking agencies to ensure that you have a good credit record. It also enables GPS-based systems to allow satnav to find addresses very quickly. That was the problem in Fermanagh. That is why there was a call to implement a system whereby people could access credit and order things online and where a satnav-based system would work. There was never a demand to move away from a townland-based system. It was a very reluctant council that made that decision.

In my previous life, I spent far too much time on hold to credit checking agencies and other organisations trying to explain the uniqueness of the townland-based system in Fermanagh to people who were often based in the south of England, if they were that close. That was a huge problem for people: trying to get something as simple as a credit card, a mortgage or a mobile phone contract or ordering something from one of the multinational retailers online for home delivery caused huge problems. With the way in which technology has advanced, those should be fairly straightforward things for people to access. The whole reason why it was changed was to address those problems. The introduction of the road name-based system has largely dealt with some of those problems, but the knock-on effect has been the diminution of the use of townlands within common language and the threat that, because we do not have townlands at the heart of our addresses, future generations will not know or understand what their townland is. That is a huge concern for me, as it is for many other people in our society.

Despite the fact that the policy has now changed in the council — Fermanagh District Council previously enacted this policy which the 25 other councils had at the time — there remains a strong desire among the councillors on Fermanagh and Omagh District Council and in the population of Fermanagh to restore townlands to their former glory as the predominant part of the addresses of our properties. As I said, many people across the North have lamented the fact that the usage of townlands has largely ceased since the policy change of the early 1970s. The proposed change before the House today will allow councils, if they wish, to put townlands back in use as the principal part of addresses.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

When speaking to people across the North as part of the public consultation, it is clear that there is a strong demand for the greater promotion and protection of townlands. I carried out a consultation exercise on the policy behind the Bill in September and October 2012. Over 80 responses to the consultation were received, including responses from individuals, groups involved in culture and heritage, political parties and local councils. The majority of respondents were supportive of the proposed change and of the greater use of townlands in society and in the address-based system. The reason behind that is that there is much concern about the declining use of townlands. Our townlands are in a very perilous state.

Fermanagh people were proud to be able to say that their county was the exception to the rule as a result of the council's policy of using townlands as the basis of allocating addresses. Everybody in the county knew what their townland was because their address was based on it. There was no confusion about where you lived or where you got your identity from in your townland. However, due to the advancements in technology that I have mentioned and the change in the way in which businesses operate, the previous system was not sustainable, and some form of change was required.

12.00 noon

The old Fermanagh District Council's preferred option was that this exact change in policy would be made. The council wrote to successive Environment Ministers asking for the change to be made, but that request was rejected. I now seek to progress this legislative change through a private Member's Bill. I have consulted DOE officials, as well as the Minister, with regard to previous concerns about the Bill, and, in my view, the concerns and objections that emanated from DOE have now been addressed as a result of the requirement for councils to take account of guidance issued by DFP on how to implement a policy of allocating property numbers in a townland-based or non-linear system. I have also engaged with the director of mapping services in LPS to ensure that the Bill did not have any problematic points for LPS or DFP, which manages the Pointer address database. I am content that it does not, although I hear that some in DFP and the political management in that Department are not supportive of the Bill. That is no real surprise to me, because, when the Finance Minister was Environment Minister, her party colleagues from Fermanagh District Council wrote to her to ask her to make this change, and she refused to do it. I am not entirely surprised that Mrs Foster remains opposed to the Bill.

The Bill would provide councils with the option of numbering individual properties in townlands instead of on roads or in streets. It does not require them to do anything unless they wish to do so. The amendment would allow the townland name to be placed first in the address and to become the principal part of the address. The Bill also states that, if a council chooses to prioritise the townland name:

“a council shall have regard to any guidance issued by the Department.”

— the Department of Finance and Personnel. From my point of view, it is a straightforward policy change, and I encourage Members to approach it with an open mind.

I appeared at the Environment Committee last Thursday week and discussed the issue with Members from all parties. They all claimed to be supportive of townlands, but I hear feedback that some Members will vote against this proposal, which is changing the legislation to allow councils to better protect and promote townlands. I see the Bill as a progressive Bill that has a simple aim and objective. It would better protect and promote townlands, and allowing it to progress to Committee Stage would allow all those who are interested in saving townlands to bring forward their opinions and suggestions about what changes need to take place to ensure that townlands are not lost for ever.

As Mr McCarthy indicated, the Alliance Party tabled a motion in the House in October 2001, calling for each Department to adopt a policy of using and promoting townland names in all government correspondence and official documents. The motion was, of course, passed without any objections from Members. Members from all parties stood up and spoke in favour of retaining townlands. In reality, little has changed. It was a non-binding motion asking Departments to use townlands in their correspondence, but correspondence from Departments is only one small aspect of it.

Changes have been made so that townlands are now included in the Pointer system, which is another important step in acknowledging that the townlands are there, but they are not always used. We have seen examples of people being issued with a driving licence and, because the licence is so small, their townland is often left out. When there are only three, four or five lines to use, people have their house number, road name, town, county and postcode, and there is no space left. It is looked at very pragmatically, and if anything is going to be left out it will be the townland because it is not the principal part of one's address. The change that we are trying to bring in will have the townland as the principal part of the address, so that, if anything was going to be dropped from the address, it would not be the townland. That was the complaint that Members had in 2001, but it is the complaint that society has had since the 1970s. While the Bill would not produce a solution overnight and ensure that townlands would be retained in addresses, it would do something much more pragmatic and give councils the opportunity to number properties in a townland and ensure that the townland appears at the top of the address.

Since 2001, there has been little improvement in the promotion of townlands in most areas. I think that we would all agree that much greater action needs to be taken to promote and protect townlands.

The motion had an impact in that material coming out from Stormont now includes the townland of Ballymiscaw, but I think that the issue is much greater than any literature, post, emails or communication coming from the Assembly as an institution. It is a much bigger problem than that, and I think that this small legislative change would help to further protect and promote townlands. It is not the panacea. It is not a total solution, but I think that it is better than what we have at the minute.

It is clear that some councils want to adopt this change. Not all councils are going to do it, but I repeat that I am not forcing a council to do anything that it does not want to do. Belfast City Council has clearly indicated that it does not want to make this legislative change, and that is fine. If Belfast City Council does not want to do it, I will not force it to do it. It is up to it whether it wants to do it or not. With legislation of this nature, where we are transferring the power to a local authority to make a decision, it is up to those councillors, and to the experts who they have employed in building control, to decide what system suits their needs best. I think that that is the approach that we need to take.

I want to highlight a number of the comments that were made by Members in 2001. Mr McCarthy will speak for himself, hopefully, so I will not rehash anything that he said. Mr McGrady said:

"That sense of identity and heritage has been lost due to things such as numbering vague roads that can be up to 15 miles long." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 12, p263, col 2].

I think that that was a very fair comment, and that issue was raised at the Environment Committee when I appeared at it.

It is clear that some Members are going to flag up a potential issue as a red herring: that this policy change, if it is approved by the Assembly and enacted by a local authority, may present a difficulty for emergency services. However, during that same debate 14 years ago, Mr McGrady highlighted the fact that, in 2001, problems existed for ambulance drivers not being able to find a property on a 10-mile-long road. He said that, without knowing the townland in question, it is often impossible to find a property using the number and the road name because these roads go on for 10 or 15 miles and, unless you know where the numbers are, you might know which side of the road it is on, but it could be four miles away, 100 yards away or eight miles away. Unless you know the townland that it is in, local knowledge is not going to solve that problem.

Some Members may attempt to justify their opposition by raising the emergency services as an issue, but I want to put that issue to bed now and say that it is not a problem because most, if not all, emergency service vehicles and, indeed, individuals who are delivering goods to households and businesses will now use GPS technology or some form of satellite navigation system to find out where they are going and to get the quickest or shortest route. Allowing this change to go through will not impact on the use of satnav technology and the use of GPS systems, because each property will retain its unique property reference number through the Pointer system, which will then be given to the GPS and satnav organisations to direct people to the quickest or shortest way to finding a property. It will allow people to find properties more easily, but it will mean that we are not overly reliant on local knowledge and have a good balance of technology and local knowledge if you say that you are looking for a particular townland as opposed to looking for house number 297 on a particular road.

There are many roads across the North that are 13 miles long, if not longer, and, if an ambulance driver or a firefighter were looking for a property in an emergency, they genuinely would not have a notion where the house was without either some level of local knowledge or using GPS technology. This proposed legislative change would not make the solution any more challenging for those people, and I suggest to Members that the best way to establish this would be to engage with the emergency services through the Committee Stage of the Bill to explore whether this actually is an issue or not.

DUP MLA Oliver Gibson, who revealed that Sudan also used townlands, suggested:

"for those of us who are forced to do so, the townland name should be placed above the road name." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 12, p264, col 2].

That seems to be in line with what I am proposing today. That is what he wanted to see, and that is what a number of Members wanted in 2001. The simple, pragmatic solution for those of us who claim to want to support townlands is to allow councils to number properties in townlands and put the townland above the road name.

Jim Shannon said:

“the disappearance of townland names is further evidence of the eradication of our local culture and history.” — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 12, p266, col 1].

As we all know, Mr Shannon takes great interest in culture and heritage. I think that his comments about where townland names derive from and their meaning were very useful for all of us in providing the context for the significance that many of us, particularly those of us who live in rural communities, attach to our townland names.

The eradication of our local culture and history was well evidenced in Brian Friel's play 'Translations', which deals with the anglicisation of traditional place names from Irish to English in Donegal in the 1830s. The main characters in the play are working on the six-inch-to-the-mile map survey of Ireland for the Ordnance Survey, and a character called Owen acts as a translator and go-between for the English and Irish. Yolland and Owen work to translate local place names into English for the purposes of the map. "Druim Dubh", meaning "black shoulder" in Irish, becomes "Dromduff" in English, and "Poll na gCaorach", meaning "hole of the sheep" in Irish, becomes "Poolkerry". While Owen has no qualms about anglicising the names of places that form part of his heritage, Yolland, who is not actually from Ireland but has fallen in love with the place, is unhappy with what he perceives as a destruction of Irish culture and language.

David Ford, in his contribution to the debate in 2001, summed up perfectly what the problem with the current situation was, and, indeed, it remains to be the problem today. He highlighted the fact that Royal Mail and other such organisations will simply tolerate the use of townlands but not encourage it. He gave the specific example of going into a shop and providing his house number and postcode. The address generated, using a computer, often excluded his townland, as that field of the address is left out due to spacing issues on an envelope or a label. Often, it is done because these mailing companies send out tens of thousands of letters a day, and if they can remove one line from the address, it will save them a significant sum of money. The danger is that, if a line is going to be left out, it will be the townland name, which most of us hold very dear and want to see protected and sustained. Unfortunately, because there is no protection in law for townlands, that is not possible.

From my perspective, that is the crux of the problem: the fact that the townland will be left out if anything is going to be left out. In order to stop that, we need to put the townland in the principal part of the address at the top, because we cannot force private organisations and individuals to use townlands as much as I would like. For me, that would be the best solution: let us bring in a law forcing people to use townlands. I certainly do not think that that would be workable, but it might have the desired outcome that we all want. A compromise position, where we can get workable legislation that has the desired outcome of enhancing the use of townlands by making sure that they are put back at the heart of common language again, is to offer councils the opportunity to put townlands at the heart of the addressing system in their district.

From the outset, I have accepted that not all councils will introduce or implement that system, but some will and, in those areas where they do, it will enhance the use of townlands. For me, that is a positive step. I think that, if the Bill is allowed to progress to Committee Stage, some other ideas might be brought forward either by Committee members, external individuals, organisations involved in the promotion of townlands or experts who deal with the issue. This will not solve the problem across our 11 councils. If one, two or three councils adopt the change, it will have a positive impact in those council areas, but it will not make much impact in other areas, apart from starting the debate on how important townlands are for our people, culture and heritage.

I want to reiterate that no council here is being forced to do anything that it does not want to do. We are merely transferring a power to a council and broadening the scope that a council has when allocating property numbers to addresses. I am open to exploring at the Committee Stage other protections and measures that can be taken to protect townlands. I am confident that other ideas will be added to complement the Bill, and I encourage Members to explore that further.

I want to pay tribute to two organisations that do an awful lot of good work in promoting and protecting townlands on a national basis: Logainm, which is the place names database of Ireland and is developed by Fiontar at Dublin City University; and the place names branch at the Department of Arts, Heritage and the Gaeltacht. I also want to commend those involved in the place name project, which researches the origin and meaning of place names across the North and is based at Queen's University Belfast. Projects and organisations like those have a key role in increasing understanding and awareness of townlands in society.

I remember being in P6 in school, and the 20 of us in our class were asked to do a presentation on our own townland, what it meant, what it stood for and how it contributed to our identity. It was fascinating to see how 20 nine- or 10-year-olds had such a great understanding of their townland. What concerns me is that, if you were to pick 20 random people from other parts of the North, that understanding of their townland, what it means and where the name derives from would just not exist. There is an onus on us as legislators to do something to restore townlands to their rightful place.

Since the early 1970s, the use and understanding of townland names has been on a downward trajectory. We need to take appropriate action to stop that. Townlands are in a perilous state at the minute. If it were not for Fermanagh, they would have been abolished and would have disappeared off the system years ago. The fact that townlands are now included in Pointer is a positive step, but it is not the solution; it is not as far as we can go. There are still too many instances of us getting correspondence from Departments and official sources in which the townland name is not included in the address. It is removed as a cost-saving measure or to save space on a label, an envelope and so on. I do not think that they would get away with it if the townland name were at the top of the address.

It is no coincidence to me that understanding and awareness of townlands is much stronger in Fermanagh than in any other area in the North. It is clearly a result of the historical and recent use of townlands in our addressing system. As an Assembly, we need to learn from that. We need to realise that the best way to promote and protect townland names is to have them as a principal part of the address, and we can do that by allowing councils to have the choice of allocating property numbers using the townland-based system if they so wish.

We should learn from the positive leadership that Fermanagh District Council showed for 40 years by refusing to implement a road name-based system. The sky did not fall in. The council did it without legislation to back it up. Most people in Fermanagh want to return to a system in which their address is allocated on the basis of their townland. That is the change that I propose through the legislation. I encourage Members to support the Bill and allow it to go to Committee Stage to see what complementary measures we can add to it.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I welcome the opportunity to speak in today's debate on the Second Stage of the Local Government (Numbers and Addresses of Buildings in Townlands) Bill.

Following the Bill's introduction on 12 October, the Committee agreed to seek an oral briefing from the Bill's sponsor, Mr Phil Flanagan. Mr Flanagan briefed the Committee at its meeting on 5 November. He outlined the purpose of the Bill and his rationale for bringing it forward. As he has outlined, the Bill will amend the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Order 1995. The amendment would provide councils with the option of numbering individual properties within townlands instead of using roads or streets and would allow the townland name to be placed first in the address and thus become the principal part of it. During the briefing, Committee members were sympathetic towards the intent of the Bill, which is to promote the use of townlands. However, some questioned whether legislation was the best mechanism for that. Other members expressed support for the proposals.

Committee members asked Mr Flanagan for his rationale for wishing to legislate rather than to encourage councils to adopt the proposals voluntarily. He advised the Committee that people need a unique property indicator to access credit checks and background checks, which they would not be afforded using an unauthorised system. He said that a voluntary approach would not therefore work. The Committee heard that, in 2013, Fermanagh District Council had to move away from a townland system to a road names system and that the decision was taken only because the current legislation did not allow the numbering of properties in a townland system.

The Committee discussed the responses to Mr Flanagan's 2012 consultation and noted that, of the then 26 councils, only three stated that they would consider adopting the system if it was introduced. Belfast City Council expressed concerns that, due to continuous development in the city, the use of townlands had more or less stopped and that it would not work in Belfast.

The Committee also heard that the financial implications of the Bill, if enacted, are twofold. First, there are financial implications for a council that wants to change its existing system, and, secondly, minor changes to the Pointer system will be required by Land and Property Services (LPS) and the Department of Finance and Personnel.

The Committee is aware that the Bill does not place a mandatory obligation on councils to adopt the system but rather provides a legislative base should any council wish to do so. Therefore, only councils that opt to move to a townlands system would bear the costs, and it would be a matter for that council to resource it.

The Committee also queried the implications for emergency services and how they would find addresses, as Mr Flanagan referred to earlier. The Committee heard that that is an area of concern, not only for a council that introduces a townlands system but for councils that have roads that are 13, 15 or 20 miles long, and that a legislative change would provide each address with a unique property reference number, addressing issues with GPS compatibility. The Committee also queried the process of numbering individual properties in townlands. The Bill, however, makes provision for DFP to issue guidance that the council has to have regard to. Each council will decide how best to number properties in a townlands system.

The Committee questioned the practicalities of how LPS would operate a system for councils that adopt different approaches, namely road names or townlands. The Committee heard that the system already exists with LPS, that there is a list of data fields and that the townland name would be moved above the road name. Mr Flanagan advised that the biggest challenge for LPS is deciding what parameters to include in the guidance to councils.

Other members expressed their support for the legislative route, given the threat of losing the use of townland names. Options of possible funding streams were discussed. That concludes my comments as Chair of the Committee.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with your indulgence, I would like to speak as an individual Member representing the Alliance Party. As my party colleague Mr McCarthy and Mr Flanagan mentioned, the Alliance Party previously instigated two motions in support of the inclusion of townlands, so my party broadly supports the principle of the Bill.

I am sympathetic to the wish to preserve the use of townland names for heritage reasons. The Bill aims to amend current legislation to allow local councils, if they wish, to number properties based on the townland system, with street or road names being included after the townland name. My main reservations are about the confusion that could arise from numbering properties based on townlands rather than using a linear basis according to streets. Just putting the townland name above the name of the road would be straightforward. However, changing the whole system of numbers and postcodes seems rather complicated. A young friend of mine from County Fermanagh was buying a house in my constituency of South Belfast. All bills and statements used his townland address, an address that his mortgage provider did not recognise. That caused him a great deal of trouble when trying to prove that he had lived in a fixed abode for a number of years.

I welcome the Bill's intent to deal with practical issues but I wonder if the proposed change might just cause further confusion. I understand that there will be guidance from DOE and DFP that will enable councils to adopt these changes if they wish.

I am content to support the Bill. If it proceeds to Committee Stage, I look forward to scrutinising it in more detail.

Mrs Cameron: I appreciate the dedication and commitment that the Member has given to the subject, which is obviously precious to him. I read almost the entire information pack on the issue and heard Mr Flanagan present to the Environment Committee in relation to his proposed Bill.

I am at a loss to understand why the Member feels it necessary to propose that the use of townlands in postal addresses should be enshrined in legislation. From my reading, this concern by Mr Flanagan is rooted solely in County Fermanagh, and perhaps in the past, Fermanagh District Council.

The proposal is that the Assembly should legislate to allow councils, if they desire, to re-template their addresses by putting their townland and house number at the forefront of the address. The first question I would ask is this: "Why?". Why would we legislate to do something that there is no need to do? Why would we legislate to bring in confusion?

What consultation has the Member had with bodies such as the emergency services, including the police, the Ambulance Service and firefighters, Royal Mail, the Post Office, and not to mention schools, colleges, health care providers such as doctors, district nurses, carers, social workers and occupational therapists, among others.

Mr Hazzard: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Cameron: No, I am fine, thanks.

Do not get me wrong, I completely understand the historical value of retaining the knowledge and use of townlands throughout Northern Ireland, but there is nothing to hinder their use. Many councils value the retention and use of townland names, as does the Assembly already.

There are many, including those in my party, who wish to see townland names used and remembered, but does it mean that we need legislation to do that? Can the Assembly's time and efforts not be put to better use in the remaining months of this mandate?

A simple way to help retain these much-valued names is to continue to talk about them, to talk about them in schools, and voluntarily use the townland in addresses. Perhaps as council signage is being replaced — and we understand the financial restraints that our new councils are under — they could add the townland beneath the street or road to demonstrate where the street or road is within a townland.

The Member will be aware that as well as addresses being used by a host of agencies for domestic purposes, there is the more serious matter of addresses being used to identify criminal records of offenders. Given the concerns, particularly in recent years, about sex offenders in rural communities, I would be extremely concerned that changing the addresses of offenders may allow them to evade identification by way of some computerised loophole.

I have an understanding of what is being proposed but, in truth, I do not see the value of this piece of legislation. Our time and efforts can be put to better use in seeing through the many pieces of legislation that require our attention in the remaining months of this mandate.

I and my party do not support the motion.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom cúpla focal a rá i bhfabhar an bhille seo. I rise to support and speak in favour of the Bill.

12.30 pm

I would like to pay tribute to Mr Flanagan for the work he has done, and the way he has presented himself in presenting this Bill to the Floor of the House, and also for the way he conducted himself in Committee when he presented last week. I listened to the Member who spoke previously and I think it is a wee bit disingenuous to ask why this Bill should be coming forward. I think that any Member should have an opportunity to use this forum to bring forward any piece of legislation, and I would like to take this opportunity to support Mr Flanagan in that.

I am from a small town in a rural area; I come from the townland of Caramoyle. Mr Bradley might be able to help me in relation to the understanding of the name. I think it is called "the bald friend", roughly translated.

Mr D Bradley: Yes.

Mr Boylan: That is the townland that I reside in and come from. I am very proud of it. I come from an area where there are a number of townlands, as in Fermanagh to which Mr Flanagan referred earlier. I know that, in the likes of Derrynoose, there are 22 townlands, a number of them with very beautiful names.

The important thing is the connection of the townland to the people and their identity. If you go into many's a graveyard in the countryside, you will see on many's a headstone the names of many's a townland, and people were very proud to come from and live in them. Townlands, as my colleague has outlined, have a historical, cultural and linguistic significance within the island of Ireland, predating parishes and counties. They tell a story of the local area and the people who lived there. They provide a sense of belonging and a link to the history of the area. The change of format in our addresses in the 1960s has meant that the younger generation, in particular, has little or no knowledge of the name of the townland they live in. That is very sad.

I welcome the efforts made by many in local government and the Departments to include townland names in their correspondence. However, I believe that, without legislative requirement, the format can vary and it relies on goodwill. I support Mr Flanagan in trying to introduce this option to give local authorities the chance to retain townland names so that the next generation will not forget them and will understand the significance and identity that comes with them.

I support the preservation of townlands and look forward to discussing this at Committee. I support the Bill.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Éirím ar an ócáid seo le tacaíocht a thabhairt don Bhille. I support the Bill. Rugadh mise i mbaile fearainn darb ainm Cloch Aireamhán a bhí suite taobh leis an Charrraig Bhreac. Is doiligh ainmneacha chomh deas, chomh ceolmhar, nó chomh saibhir a fháil ná ainmneacha ár gcuid bailte fearainn. I was born in Cloughirvin, beside Carrickbrack. It would be difficult to get names that are as attractive in their sound, meaning and richness as the names of our townlands. For example, in my constituency, we have Annacloghmullin, Tullymacreeve, Ballymacdermot, Ballimar, Lisummon, Mullaghbane, and I could go on. A particularly attractive one that I came across recently was Achadh na bhFáinleog, «the field of the swallows.» That is a beautiful name, is it not?

As I said, enclosed within our townland names is a wealth of history. Anyone who has had the opportunity of reading any of the publications of the Place-Name Project at Queen's University will know that the process of understanding a single place name involves a huge amount of historical research. I would probably take issue with Mr Boylan's interpretation of Caramoyle and refer it to someone more learned than me for deliberation, but I hazard a guess that «bald friend» may not be the correct rendition of that name. I may be corrected. In any case, as I said, the names are rich in history, as the Place-Name Project shows very clearly. What a pity that a previous Finance Minister, who knew the cost of everything and the value of nothing, would not provide the match funding to allow the Place-Name Project at Queen's to continue. I pay tribute to the work of Dr Kay Muhr and Dr Patrick McKay, who provided much of the material, and, of course, to the others who helped them and went before them.

Place names tell us about the geography, topography and social history of our local area, which families lived in which places and so on. They are well worth preserving for many reasons. The play, «Translations», which Mr Flanagan referred to, is of course about the adoption of our place names from the original Irish into English. The anglicised versions still hold a reflection of the original Irish. Of course, I am also in favour of the Irish version of the place names being available.

I do not frequently attend Orange parades, but I do see the photographs of the Twelfth in the local paper. One of the things that I have remarked on is that almost all the Orange lodge banners have townland names, such as Altnaveigh, Divernagh, Creeve, Finnard and, here in Belfast, Ballynafeigh. The Orange Order is doing its bit to preserve townland names, and I think that we should support it in that.

Mr Flanagan spoke of the huge amount of work done by many people locally in County Fermanagh. In my county of Armagh, there is an enlightened awareness of the value of townland names. Some communities have marked out the boundaries of their townland in granite. When you are driving through the area — I am sure that Mr Boylan has noticed this — you will see the townlands marked by very attractive local granite stones. I have seen the same thing in other areas, such as the Connemara Gaeltacht.

I believe that, in many areas, townland names are not as prominently in use as they could be. Mr Flanagan's Bill will help to put them back into pole position in those council areas that choose to adopt it. I am very much in favour of preserving townlands, and my party agrees with me, I am glad to say. I would pose a couple of questions to Mr Flanagan. Has he taken into account the Good Friday Agreement, particularly paragraph 4 on economic, social and cultural issues?

I also ask him to look at the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages, particularly article 7, paragraph 2. Perhaps he will also think of discussing his proposals with the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in the light of the responses received on the proposed Irish language Bill.

Tá mé sásta tacaíocht a thabhairt don Bhille faoi mar atá sé san am i láthair ag an Dara Céim. Ar ndóigh, beidh faill agus deis againn na moltaí atá sa Bhille a iniúchadh níos míne agus níos doimhne sna céimeanna den Bhille.

Gabhaim buíochas leat arís, a LeasCheann Comhairle, as deis labhartha a thabhairt dom.

I am glad to support the Bill. We will have the opportunity to explore and delve into its provisions at the various legislative stages, and I am sure that my party will be happy to cooperate with Mr Flanagan.

Mrs Overend: I rise on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party. I very much support the use of townland names; in fact, I generally use my townland name in my postal address. It is Ballymacpeake, which means «homestead of the Macpeakes». It was a tradition passed down by my husband's ancestors, the McCaugheys, who lived there before us. Likewise, I spell the name of my road in the same way as my family did, despite it being different from the way in which it is spelled on the sign at the end of the road. It is a family tradition, and I follow it. I have experienced no problems including my townland name on official documentation, and I generally submit the townland name after the road name and before the town name. I therefore see no problem with continuing that practice.

As for the proposal to enable councils to bring forward changes to addresses so that houses will be numbered by townland rather than by road, I do not see why anyone would abandon the current, workable system. Yes, townlands are precious, particularly for those of us living in rural areas, and I commend the Member for his work, but that affection needs to be balanced with a sensible, effective and efficient address system. Given the choice between having their townland on the first line of their address or having a system that allows ordinary, day-to-day services to function, I hazard a guess that people would choose the latter.

It makes perfect sense to me to have houses numbered along the route used to get to a place. It seems to me that numbering houses by townland would send us back in time to when people would walk from one townland to another, visiting close friends across fields rather than by road. The world is a much smaller place now than in the days of walking to a neighbour's house across the townland. Delivery vans can follow road maps, knowing that even numbers are on one side of the road and odd numbers on the other.

I cannot imagine numbering houses in a townland. Where would we start? Would the numbers go clockwise or anticlockwise? Would we start from the centre and work outwards or vice versa? How easy it would be to confuse the postman. In addition, what would happen on roads that pass through several — sometimes, many — townlands? Sometimes, just by the run of the road, you can enter a townland, leave it and then enter it again. The confusion of such a system, including the sheer frustration of the people affected by the change, should not be underestimated.

Worse still, what about the blue-light services? Such a system would most certainly confuse ambulance drivers, who depend on a simple road number system to find addresses, especially when time is of the essence and an emergency has been called. In the depths of rural Northern Ireland, where there is no mobile signal for GPS systems, surely a simple road network system is the best. During his evidence to the Committee, Mr Flanagan was asked about these services. He took an almost primitive attitude. He claimed that the police, the fire brigade and the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service would depend on local knowledge. I remind him that it is 2015, and he should not totally dismiss the technological advances of recent decades. Local knowledge is invaluable, but I am sure I do not need to tell Mr Flanagan that, even in his constituency, with its swathe of rural roads and lanes, much like my own, many police officers are not from the area where they work. Indeed, I know that the PSNI even tries to base officers away from their home area, for sensible reasons I might add. I ask Mr Flanagan this: in an emergency, how are two officers, both from outside the area, who have the latest but now obsolete mapping kit in their vehicle meant to arrive at an address under the new system without having to waste crucial time? Of course, he also forgets that, in many areas of Northern Ireland, the PSNI is reluctant to casually walk up to a stranger's door and ask for an address. This system, well meaning as it is, is just not feasible. When people ring 999, they want the rescue services to arrive as soon as possible, yet, if what the Bill is offering were introduced in a council area, I suspect that response times would be severely affected.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way and agree with the point that she makes. Does she agree with me that, particularly if we are talking about police arriving at an incident where there is a threat to life or a situation where an ambulance is needed — we often talk about the “golden period” around a heart attack, a stroke or something of that nature, where there needs to be swift intervention — the longer that is delayed, the greater the chance of the damage being permanent or, indeed, the person being dead. I suspect that, 99 times out of 100, the ambulance or police car arrives there at the time it is supposed to, but, if you get a situation where there is confusion and people are scrambling around, does she share my concerns that it might, in some extreme cases, be a matter of life and death?

Mrs Overend: I thank the Member for that intervention and agree with him. In the rush to bolster townlands, Mr Flanagan has simply decided to set that point aside.

Giving primacy to townlands rather than roads is just not workable. I wonder if Mr Flanagan has discussed the matter with Royal Mail to receive its analysis of the proposal. Furthermore, I am interested to hear the cost of introducing such a system for LPS and how it would deal with the varying systems of councils, since none is obliged to introduce the system.

Mr Flanagan stated that, in his consultation, he did not receive much support from councils to introduce such a townland system. In fact, he said during his briefing to the Environment Committee:

“While nearly all councils indicated that they were fully supportive of the use of townlands, none of them went as far as saying that they would want the system adopted. They said that, at present, they had no desire to make use of such a change.”

Only three of the previous 26 councils had some sympathy for Mr Flanagan's desire to bring forward the legislation. Of course, having sympathy is very different from actually using it. Why bring in such legislation, then? I have spoken to my colleagues in County Fermanagh, who explained the unregulated system that existed there for a long time. There was much confusion and debate about simplifying addresses there. In fact, many people in Fermanagh were given new addresses only a couple of years ago, with new house numbers and postcodes. No doubt that caused some problems locally, so I am surprised that Mr Flanagan wants to inflict further upheaval on a far more significant scale.

After talking to people in Fermanagh and mid-Ulster, I believe that there is no desire to remove the current system and return to the simple use of townlands. I share the desire to keep our townlands but not the desire to give them primacy in our postal addresses. I too would like my children to know of the history of the area where we live, but we do not need this legislation to share that information with the next generation; instead, we talk to them about townlands. My children know about Dreenan crossroads and the Mullaghboy hill. They have heard of the Gall bogs and the land at Inneval that my grandfather used to farm. We refer to townlands in our daily conversation. We laugh about the sound of the names and talk about where they originated. That is how we make sure that they continue, not by this legislation, which, the sponsor himself agrees, no one really wants. I oppose the progression of the Bill.

Mr Girvan: I will speak against the progression of the Bill. I have some reservations.

The townland that I was born and reared in is called Dunturky. As stated, a lot of the townland names have been anglicised, and that has probably helped with the understanding of the townland name in the locality where I live. Straidnahanna is a reference to the village of Straid. We also have the townland of Calhame, which is an Ulster Scotsism.

I can see that the opportunity would arise for this to be part of a greater cultural war that has already existed, in which Irish has been promoted, and there would be an attempt to put those anglicised names into an Irish context. That has happened, and you see it as you drive around certain parts of Northern Ireland, especially when you go into a certain area and find that you cannot recognise the street or road you are driving on. You see a road sign, but it has no resemblance to the name of the road that comes up on your satnav, because some well-meaning individual has decided to turn it into a war and use the Irish language as a mechanism for putting that message across. That is by the way.

I use my townland name, and it exists on the deeds of the property that I own within that townland. The names of the townlands are retained within that mechanism. To go down the route of changing numbers along roads within townlands could mean that, as you drive along a road, you could have seven number twos because it just so happens that that road crosses seven townlands. That is where the problem comes in.

On using the townland name first; the postcode system works and works very effectively. Most emergency services have the address, and the house number is located where it should be located. There is a road in my constituency called the Seven Mile Straight. It is called that for obvious reasons, because it is seven miles along part of it. The numbers flow along that road. If you put in that you are looking for —

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Girvan: No, I will not. I have listened to enough nonsense from you. The fact of the matter is that if you are driving along the Seven Mile Straight and put number 255 into your satnav, you will find number 255; it comes up within a few hundred yards of the property. More emphasis should have been put on ensuring that, within a rural setting, people have house numbers at the ends of lanes or on their properties so that they can be identified by the emergency services, but that is not what is being discussed here.

We need to discuss issues associated with why we believe that councils should take this on board and use valuable public resources to create another layer. I have no problem with trying to retain townland names and ensure that they are passed down, but we should not try to legislate for that. We legislate for far too much in this society. Everything has to be legislated for. There is no common sense in an awful lot of cases, so we have had to legislate. If common sense was allowed to prevail, you would not need to put a mechanism in place to allow local authorities to take that approach.

We have heard how confusion has been caused in areas where people have attempted to renumber. Those looking for credit checks, because of an agenda that was being driven, did not wish to give their postcode or their house number, but were keen to just use their address as the townland in which they lived to ensure that that happened. Every address in Northern Ireland has a postcode. As a consequence, there should be some recognition in all of the databases of those who are involved in credit checks and such like so that they can access that information and make use of it.

There are a large number of townlands in Northern Ireland — we heard how many thousands there are. I happen to live on a road that has a fairly unique name, but in many towns there is a Church Road. As a consequence of having a Church Road, the only identifiable way of working out what town it is in is ensuring that the postcode is used.

My colleague who spoke before me asked a question in relation to conversations with Royal Mail. The fact of the matter is that its very name means the Member on the opposite Benches may be reluctant to speak to it because of the term "Royal". He might answer that in his response to this whole matter, but that is something I think that we have to be very careful about.

The words "can, if they wish" are included as part of it. There is no idea that it will be the first part of somebody's address; it would be the townland, the street name and the number. That has caused all sorts of concerns, and I take on board the emergency services' approach. If somebody gave only a townland and a number and the services were using the current system, they may not make it to an emergency in time before someone loses their life. But, on the basis that they were trying to make a political statement, they can rest happy in the fact that they died within the townland that they gave the name for, simply because they could not be found. That needs to be looked at.

We need to take on board more issues associated with, for instance, ensuring that we have street names properly identified by councils that can be read without having to spend time trying to interpret what the Irish name is, and that the properties on that road are numbered to ensure that they are easy to get at. I know that certain people say that the postman can find their house all the time. That is simply because the same postman is always on that route and he knows virtually who everyone is, so there is no issue. The problem is that, if there are no numbers on the ends of lanes, there is always a difficulty in trying to find an address. If somebody new comes on, he will run into difficulty in an awful lot of rural areas.

I, for one, know, because I come from a country location, that you probably know everybody with a mile-and-a-half radius of you, so there is not a problem, but there will be people who have to respond who do not have that local knowledge, and they will have a difficulty. We should be making some move to ensure that numbers are visible and easier to find in that type of environment.

The anglicisation of a number of the townland names was mentioned in the debate. I would like some clarification on whether this is another move by certain people to ensure the promotion of Irish townlands, as was stated by Dominic Bradley, who said that he would encourage that. I just wonder whether this is another string in the bow of those who want to engage in the cultural war that continues to be used, and I am using it because those in my community would say that Presbyterians were the people who kept the Gaelic language alive. Coming from a Presbyterian background, I do not say that I should not support the Irish language, but because it has been politicised and used on that basis, I feel that I cannot embrace it due to its politicisation, even within this forum. I believe that the Bill is another mechanism to do the very same.

Every person in this Building probably knows the townland that they live in or were born, unless they live in certain parts of Belfast where there may not be townlands. Most people, though, will never have thought of it being used politically or in any other way. We should be very careful about allowing this to happen.

It is a four-clause Bill that, in many ways, is relatively straightforward, but it makes absolutely no sense to me. Councils have a responsibility to ensure that numbering goes on, but numbering within townlands is not easy to appreciate. It is vital that we do not allow this to progress because it will just add more confusion for the 11 councils that have been set up. More of a war would now be created within them in relation to these matters. We should kill the Bill at this stage and not allow it to progress any further, because it will incur additional costs for councils and other mechanisms. From what I have been told, the GPS does not even recognise townlands as part of the mapping system. We should kill the Bill at this opportunity, and I will be opposing it.

Oral Answers to Questions

Justice

Maghaberry Inspection Report

1. Mr Lynch asked the Minister of Justice to outline how his Department plans to address the findings of the recently published Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland's inspection report on an unannounced inspection of Maghaberry prison 11-22 May 2015. (AQO 9099/11-16)

6. Mr Allister asked the Minister of Justice, given his responsibility for the Northern Ireland Prison Service, to outline how Maghaberry prison has been found to be unsafe, unstable and dangerous by Her Majesty's Chief Inspectorate of Prisons in England and Wales. (AQO 9104/11-16)

7. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Justice to outline the level of threat that exists currently for both staff and contractors working in Maghaberry prison. (AQO 9105/11-16)

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I will take questions 1, 6 and 7 together. I apologise because that may make my answer slightly longer than usual.

Maghaberry is a challenging and complex high-security prison and this report demonstrates that. The progress that the prison made in 2012 continued through to 2014 against a backdrop of experienced staff leaving under the voluntary exit scheme and new staff coming in. The prison has faced three key challenges: resourcing, building a consistent regime and delivering outcomes for prisoners.

The report from the visit in May demonstrated that Maghaberry had been greatly affected by staff absence, which had had a serious impact on the regime and outcomes for prisoners. This has been addressed through robust management of attendance, recruitment and redeployment from other prisons. Since August, sickness levels have fallen sharply, which means more officers on the landings and a more progressive regime.

The director general of the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS) has already taken steps to strengthen the leadership team at Maghaberry, including the appointment of Phil Wragg as governor. NIPS has developed a detailed action plan to address each of the strategic recommendations contained in the report. That has been published on the NIPS website so that the service can be held to account against that plan. What is important now is that the right leadership team is in place. In the six months since the inspection, the Prison Service has taken action to improve the immediate performance of Maghaberry to ensure that the prison is delivering better outcomes for prisoners and is playing its part in building a safer Northern Ireland. I am confident that, when the inspectors return in January, they will see significant improvement.

It is important to reinforce that the context in which Maghaberry operates is not the same as that for any prison in neighbouring jurisdictions. Prison officers are under severe threat, which means that an attack is highly likely. NIPS has effective mechanisms in place to disseminate information relating to threats, and staff are fully supported when security concerns are raised. Any threats to others, including contractors, are a matter for the PSNI, and there are arrangements in place to share information in that respect. In that context, I am very encouraged that over 1,700 people applied in the recent Prison Service recruitment campaign. Those individuals have an opportunity to play their part in building a safer community.

Mr Lynch: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra chuimsitheach sin. I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answer. Does he agree that a combination of a failure of leadership in the prison and a refusal and resistance to prison reform has led to what can only be described as a “damning report” by the Criminal Justice Inspection (CJINI)? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Ford: When I spoke about the report last week, I highlighted that I believe that we have good leadership in place, at prison headquarters and within Maghaberry, and very good cooperation between the governor and the headquarters team. So, we have now got leadership. There is no doubt that, as we have proceeded through the reform programme, some people have had more difficulty adjusting to it than others. We are seeing a team working together at Maghaberry under the leadership of the governor in conjunction with the work being done by NIPS headquarters and the Department.

Mr Allister: The Minister has not mentioned it, but a significant part of the report dealt with what could be classed as the disproportionate focus on the separated prisoners and the adverse effect that was having on the rest of the prison. What has been done to address that issue?

Mr Ford: Mr Allister raises an entirely reasonable point. The decision to introduce separation was taken by a former Secretary of State some years ago. Decisions on who is admitted to separated conditions are for the Secretary of State and not the devolved Minister. The Department of Justice and the Prison Service has to run the prison on the basis that there are two separated houses.

As part of the reform programme, it is proposed to reconfigure Maghaberry into three mini prisons, which would separate, if that is not an unfortunate use of the term, those who are category A prisoners, whether they are normal category A prisoners or those from the two groups of separated prisoners. That would ensure that it is easier to deal with their needs separate from those of the main bulk of the prison population. If capital funding is forthcoming, I will be very keen to see that happen as soon as possible.

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. He will be aware that, in March of this year, five prisoners were arrested over allegations of making threats towards police officers. There have also been numerous complaints from contractors going into the prison that they have been the subject of threats, particularly from Bush House. Does the Minister wish to comment on where we are today with the state of threats issued against officers, police officers and contractors?

Mr Ford: The point is made very clearly by Mr McIlveen. It is a point that I have made before. I said in my key answer that the threat against individual officers and police officers remains severe. There is no doubt that it creates very difficult working conditions. It is unfortunate that, in the particular context of the separated republican prisoners, the agreement that was made in August 2010, which was predicated on changes in the regime in Roe House, balanced against an end of threats to prison officers, has not been matched by an ending of threats, whether delivered, at times, inside Roe House or by supporters of the dissident prisoners through websites and various other social media. If we are to make progress, it is important that those threats are removed and that prison officers are able to go to work without facing threats, either internally or when they leave afterwards.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that the August 2010 report by the prison assessors’ team led by Peter Bunting and Anne Owers states that everyone — staff and prisoners — should be treated with dignity and respect in a conflict-free environment?

Mr Ford: I am happy to agree with Mr Boylan, but I am not sure that it would necessarily be suggested that, in a team of four equals, Peter Bunting was the leader — although, undoubtedly, he would be one of the co-leaders. Mr Boylan is absolutely right: the 2010 agreement provided the opportunities to move forward, but it appears that dissident supporters outside and dissidents inside have not played their part.

Mr Ramsey: In light of the extensive reporting of the investigation, there is deep worry and concern amongst the families of staff and prisoners. Can the Minister give us an assurance that he is doing everything in his power to ensure the safety of the staff and prisoners in Maghaberry?

Mr Ford: Mr Ramsey has indirectly highlighted one of the unfortunate consequences. I have heard it reported in the media that the report said that Maghaberry was the most dangerous prison in Europe. It said no such thing. Comments from the chief inspector of prisons from England at his press conference went beyond the considered opinion of that report. They certainly were not the comments of the chief inspector of criminal justice. The Member is absolutely right that it is important that we ensure the safety of staff and prisoners. It is a fact that we are by no means the worst regime in these islands in providing safety in the Northern Ireland Prison Service, but there has to be ongoing, serious work and engagement by prison staff at the highest level to ensure that that is maintained. That is their daily task.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. In the Minister’s response to Cathal Boylan, he talked about the approach of dissidents inside. Given what the director general said on Friday about the ineffectual relationship — she accepted that there was a resistance to change amongst prison staff in Maghaberry — does “dissidents” take on a whole new meaning in that context?

Mr Ford: I am not sure that I have ever used the term “dissidents” to refer to any member of prison staff, but I did say earlier that there are clearly members of prison staff who find the change to the new arrangements more difficult than others. Some who had served for long periods in difficult times took advantage of the early retirement scheme. Others remain, many of whom are playing very positive roles in the current operation of the Prison Service, but some are having difficulty adjusting to that.

Mr Beggs: The Minister referred to his action plan and the need to improve the lot of prisoners. Does he accept that it is also vital that we improve conditions for prison officers and that we improve their morale? Has he approached the Secretary of State to see whether the previous impositions need to be changed in order to manage that prison in an effective manner?

Mr Ford: I certainly agree with Mr Beggs that the issue of staff morale is important and significant. I have not specifically discussed with the Secretary of State any change to the separated regime. That is her responsibility. She has not made any proposals to me to change it either. The reality is that we are in a situation where separation was granted by a previous Secretary of State, and that is what we have to work with.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister. It has to be acknowledged that you have been here on a number of occasions, robustly dealing with these matters, and you are to be congratulated for that. Minister, do you agree that, if you were to compare the date of the report with today and visit the prison today, you would find a transformed regime, people working together, reduced absenteeism and more prisoners engaged in meaningful work?

Mr Ford: I pointed out last week — I cannot remember whether it was in response to Mr Dickson's question on the statement — that I hoped that more members of the Justice Committee would get the opportunity to visit. I believe from my most recent visit, which was three weeks ago, that there have been very significant changes, including much reduced sickness rates and, therefore, better numbers of staff on the landings. There is positive work being done. For example, on that occasion, I saw people engaged in what was essentially public service work in doing Braille booklets. They were working through their lunch break with a prison officer who was working through his lunch break because they wanted to get a job done for the benefit of somebody outside. That seems to me symptomatic of the spirit of many of the people in there. It is the same when you visit the new cafe. We have heard a lot about the success of the Cabin Cafe in Hydebank Wood; there is now a very similar arrangement for the Riverbank Cafe in Maghaberry. All of that is symptomatic of the governor and his management team working with staff to ensure better conditions for staff and prisoners.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I move to the next question, I must inform the House that question 10 has been withdrawn.

Access NI: Processing Time

2. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Justice to outline the average time taken to process an Access NI check in each of the last three years. (AQO 9100/11-16)

Mr Ford: The average time to process an enhanced Access NI check was 19 days in 2013-14, 16 days in 2014-15 and eight days for the first half of 2015-16. With the introduction in April of online applications, there have been significant improvements in Access NI turnaround times. In addition, the PSNI has recently reviewed and improved the processes for dealing with the enhanced checks that are referred to them. This has resulted in a 70% reduction in the backlog of Access NI checks with the police over the past three months.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister not only for the answer but the very good news that it contains. He will be aware that an awful lot of community and voluntary organisations and faith-based groups depend on Access NI checks. In the past, far too many of them have had to wait far too long for those to come through. It is very welcome that the online system seems to have helped. The reduction is obviously very welcome. Can the Minister assure the House that he will keep an eye on the situation to ensure that the reduction continues and waiting times stay low?

Mr Ford: It is a pleasure to welcome Mr Lyons to a Justice Question Time. His predecessor Mr Wilson tended to be fairly critical of Access NI, so I have logged the praise for Access NI today. I will give him one specific further statistic: the number of cases that have been with the police for over 60 days for check was 789 in June and 128 last week. Clearly, there will always be cases that need to be checked in some detail by the police, but that shows a very significant turnaround by the police in their role, Access NI staff in their role and the enhanced IT system. I will certainly keep an eye on it as he has asked.

Ms Hanna: I am sure that many Members, like me, will not recognise those waiting times and may have been contacted by constituents who are waiting considerably longer. Having come from the voluntary sector, I know that that is not the story that I have heard from people. Can the Minister give an assurance that any further steps to take up processing will be taken, particularly in the case of an urgent job application? I am aware of people who have waited weeks or even months and been unable to take up employment during that time.

2.15 pm

Mr Ford: Ms Hanna asks a very reasonable question, which is, of course, simple to answer: people who get good service from Access NI do not contact their MLA to complain about it. The tens of thousands of checks that go through reasonably speedily go through, and people are happy. Some of them say, "Thank you" to Access NI, but most people accept that that is what they should expect from a public service. In September, for example, 95% of enhanced certificates were processed within 14 days of receipt of the application, while over 98% were processed within 28 days. We are talking about the small minority of cases, which, overwhelmingly, are those that require further checks by the police — the PSNI or another police service. Those are the applications that have, in some cases, taken a very considerable time, but, in the past few months, we have seen a significant improvement there as well.

Mr McCarthy: When will portable checks be available?

Mr Ford: Mr McCarthy highlights an ongoing challenge. A lot of work has been done, and I hope that we will have the full portability of checks at some point during the next calendar year. It is something that is very disappointing, because that was under way when I became Minister, just over five years ago. Changes were then made by the Home Office for England and Wales that had further knock-on effects for us, but we are looking to see portable checks introduced as quickly as possible. The idea of a portable check, which could be checked online any number of times that people needed, would be significantly better than the current system, which is effectively still a paper-based system, even though it is carried out online. That would show a significant improvement, particularly for those engaged in different areas of voluntary work or a number of short-term periods of employment who need to see that opportunity coming through. Frankly, it cannot happen too soon, in view of the complaints that people still have.

Youth Engagement Clinics

3. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Justice to outline the impact that youth engagement clinics are having on young people's experience of the justice system. (AQO 9101/11-16)

Mr Ford: Following the initial pilot across three police districts in Belfast, youth engagement clinics were rolled out across all districts in Northern Ireland over 2014-15, becoming fully operational in April of this year. I took that decision following a positive evaluation of the pilot, which demonstrated a number of benefits for children and young people. It is clear that youth cases that are dealt with at clinics are resolved far more quickly than those that progress to court, meaning that the negative consequences of delay in our system for victims and offenders can be reduced.

Youth engagement clinics can help young people make better-informed decisions about their options at an early stage by providing advice and support in a language and setting that is appropriate to their age and level of understanding. That includes explaining the consequences of accepting a diversionary or court-ordered disposal and how that might affect them in the future.

Participation in the clinics has allowed young people to take responsibility for and understand the consequences of their actions and to get appropriate support to address the underlying causes of their offending behaviour. That approach of supporting children at the earliest stage to address problems that could lead to further offending or risk-taking behaviour is a key element of the scoping study that I commissioned to improve outcomes for children in or on the fringes of the youth justice system. There is clear evidence that the more we can do to prevent young people entering the system in the first place or to divert them from more formal disposals, the better their long-term outcomes.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for a comprehensive answer. I am pleased to hear that the clinics are having such a positive impact on the outcomes for our young people. In view of the evaluation, has he other initiatives in mind to build on that success?

Mr Ford: I thank Ms Lo for her question. The key issue is the scoping study now looking into the whole operation of youth justice. We need to ensure that we build on the successes of the youth engagement model and continue to see how we can do it to streamline and simplify the system. That is what youth engagement clinics are about. That is what we expect to see followed up in the final report that is being prepared on that work by Criminal Justice Inspection. As we look into the scoping study on how we can make further improvements in the future, I think that there will be continued improvement in the speed with which cases are disposed of and in appropriate measures being adopted for individual offenders. We hope to see significant improvements for society on the back of that.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I commend the Minister on a very in-depth and comprehensive answer. Can he elaborate on what lessons have been learnt from the clinics that could make access to justice more efficient and more effective?

Mr Ford: I thank Ms McCorley for her support. In a sense, it is slightly early, given that the pilot scheme has been running only in part of Belfast for any length of time and the wider roll-out was from April 2015. We need to be slightly careful. We do not have a full statistical basis, but there seems to be evidence from practitioners and from some young people who are participants that the arrangements have helped to create the joined-up response that has helped them to see their way to a better future and to manage their behaviour so that it does not lead to future offending. The benefits that that provides to young people and to those who might otherwise have become victims is to be welcomed. There is no doubt that, as we look generally at the way in which the clinics have operated, we see that they have built on the past successes of the Youth Justice Agency. We are seeing improvements, and we will see the proper evaluation when we get the CJINI report in the near future. I will look to it for full evidence.

Access to Justice Review

4. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of Justice to outline his plans following the publication of the review of access to justice. (AQO 9102/11-16)

5. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Justice, in relation to alternative funding arrangements in the access to justice review part II, to outline his preferred alternative to legal aid. (AQO 9103/11-16)

14. Mrs McKeivitt asked the Minister of Justice, in light of the recent publication of the access to justice review part II, what further efficiency measures in criminal courts he plans to discuss with the Lord Chief Justice and the NI Courts Service. (AQO 9112/11-16)

Mr Ford: With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 4, 5 and 14 together.

Last week, I announced to the House that I welcomed the access to justice review part II report and that the publication of the report would begin a consultation period that would close on 9 February next year. The report has some 150 wide-ranging recommendations, and I hope that those with an interest in improving the justice system and the experience of those who come into contact with it will take the opportunity to comment on the report. I hope to return to the Assembly before the end of the current mandate to outline my proposed response to the report by setting out thematically the priorities that will drive the future reform agenda.

As I have highlighted previously, significant progress has already been made in delivering reforms of many aspects of the justice system. This reform programme will continue. Where there are issues of commonality between current reforms and recommendations in the report, I will reflect on the analysis in the report as I take forward the reforms.

On alternative funding arrangements for money damages cases, the report recommends a new approach that would enable the majority of cases currently supported by legal aid to proceed without that support. It is based on a conditional fee agreement with appropriate safeguards to prevent increased costs. This appears to provide a realistic alternative to the existing approach, and, in order to ensure that we draw out any concerns, I plan to consult specifically on this issue at the same time as consulting more generally on the report. That will ensure that we have a firm basis to proceed with a reform that will save money and improve access to justice.

The report makes a number of recommendations on improving the efficiency of criminal proceedings. I plan to take the views of the Lord Chief Justice on those matters. I meet him regularly, and I expect the report will be a regular focus of future meetings.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Does the Minister agree that, without a properly funded legal aid system, effective access to justice for all will be undermined?

Mr Ford: I am happy to agree with Mr Ó hOisín on that one. The report made the point — I also made it in accepting the report — that we are not looking to reduce legal aid to the bare minimum; we are looking to provide it in a measure that is affordable but meets the needs of this society. That is why, for example, the point that I highlighted about money damages is about finding alternative ways of funding. It is why matters like mediation as opposed to an adversarial court hearing are being looked at as ways of ensuring that justice is provided, but that is not the same thing as continuing to maintain the current legal aid arrangements in all cases.

Mr Dallat: I listened carefully to the Minister. On this day of glad tidings and great joy for the future of the Assembly, will he now consider looking seriously at legal aid with regard to family law and those matters where people have been profoundly affected by the recent scarcity of resources?

Mr Ford: I will keep my counsel until I shortly attend an Executive meeting as to whether I agree with Mr Dallat that it is a day of glad tidings or whatever. Indeed, some of his party colleagues may have a different view from the way in which he has just expressed it.

On the specific issue of family cases, one of the major challenges that have confronted the system for some time and that I get frequent correspondence about is the availability of legal aid for one partner in a family dispute but not the other.

The allegation that is frequently made — indeed, there are several Members in the House at the moment who have made the allegation — is that legal aid is used as a weapon by the legally aided ex-partner against the partner who is on a modest income that disbars them from legal aid.

Those are the kinds of issues that need to be looked at, not cutting out legal aid from the basic key hearings that may deal with a divorce or a separation or issues such as the custody of children. It is about stopping the idea that people who would not take a case to court if they were funding it themselves would have immediate recourse to legal aid to mount a continuing series of challenges. I believe that that is an entirely appropriate way to change. We will see what the responses to the consultation document are; no doubt the joyful Mr Dallat and his colleagues will be among those who will respond.

Mrs McKevitt: Does the Minister have a preferred alternative to legal aid?

Mr Ford: It is not so much a preferred alternative to legal aid but a way in which we find that access to justice is provided by a variety of methods. Existing arrangements for legal aid will have to continue in some areas, but mediation, various forms of alternative dispute resolution, and finding different ways in which, frankly, those who are fighting over money or property of some kind fund it themselves out of the proceeds of that, are all issues that are entirely relevant so that we can concentrate the payment of traditional legal aid where it is most needed and where it has most effect. As I said in response to Mr Dallat, and to spell out what I said in my previous comment on the report, there is no question of removing those private family law cases entirely from scope as has been done in England and Wales. We will ensure that we maintain the basic level of legal aid for a decent, civilised society.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. Does the Minister agree that one of the main cornerstones of access to justice is legal aid, and that any curtailment of access to legal aid is a blockage to access to justice?

Mr Ford: No, I cannot agree with Ms McGahan when she puts it as baldly as that. I have made it clear that there are some areas in which traditional legal aid will continue to be provided. However, at a time of decreasing budgets and very significant financial pressure on the Justice Department, as indeed there is on the Executive as a whole, it is simply not possible to maintain traditional legal aid for all those areas that have had it. I have just highlighted some of the issues around money damages and ongoing family disputes, and we have seen examples from the legal profession, where good work has been done by various forms of alternative dispute resolution. That work has shown that it is possible to manage things in a way that is more constructive for those who are involved than an adversarial system where two lawyers fight it out and the participants see themselves more as spectators. If they are participants, they are much more likely to feel that they had a real part to play. They are much more likely to accept the decision of a mediator than is sometimes the case when a decision is handed down by a judge, to which, they have felt, they have not really contributed.

Mrs Overend: The Minister intends to speed up access to justice. How does he see that working with the closure of so many local courts, including the one in Magherafelt in my constituency?

Mr Ford: I will be making a statement after the Justice Committee has had the opportunity to consider the proposals for court closures. I am not discussing the court in Magherafelt or any other court at this stage. The issue is that access to justice is not access to an inadequate building in every district town. Among other parts of access to justice, it is access to a proper, decent and modern courtroom, which is a place where there is, for example, the ability to provide segregation for vulnerable witnesses and victims and where arrangements are such that there is proper IT, decent disability access and a whole range of matters that, frankly, some of our older courthouses do not currently meet.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the time for listed questions. We will now move to topical questions.

Maghaberry Prison: Healthcare Provision

T1. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Justice, given the focus on Maghaberry over the last number of weeks, whether he agreed with the Criminal Justice Inspection report when it highlighted the serious flaws in healthcare provision in that prison. (AQT 3141/11-16)

2.30 pm

Mr Ford: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I did wonder how many topical questions we would have on Maghaberry, given that I made a statement on it last week and that I have just answered three questions on it from the main list.

Ms McLaughlin highlights quite adequately the references to healthcare in the report of the inspection of Maghaberry, and that issue is being addressed by the South Eastern Trust. Therefore, I should leave that to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to discuss in detail other than to say that the Prison Service is certainly seeking to work in partnership with the trust and that the prison review oversight group, which I chair, gets regular reports as we look at the recommendations of the prison review team. Those reports include where there is engagement on health matters, which are adjudicated on by RQIA, just the same as CJINI deals with the matters that are purely for the justice system.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that, but I do feel that the flaws in healthcare have not, at this point, even been adequately highlighted. Specifically, given that the Minister has a duty of care to those in Maghaberry, does he feel that there now needs to be a review of the relationship between the Prison Service and the South Eastern Trust?

Mr Ford: Ms McLaughlin has highlighted a significant point. I do not agree that we need a review of the arrangements. However, I agree that we need to see the recommendations made by Dame Anne Owers and her team, which are being worked through by the South Eastern Trust and checked over by RQIA, being carried through in full and that the ongoing partnership working needs to be reinforced to ensure that the lines of communication between the prison staff side and the healthcare staff side are fully dealt with. Those are the kinds of points that come back, but, frankly, I do not think that it is a matter of another review. I think that it is a matter of ensuring that the recommendations that we already have are put into place.

Maghaberry: Senior Governor

T2. Mr McCartney asked the Minister of Justice, following his mention of the newly appointed senior governor at Maghaberry, to give a categorical assurance that the governor will be allowed to run the prison and will enjoy close cooperation with the director general to do that; and, given that the Minister referred to Maghaberry being topical, does he accept that that is because we have an opportunity today to ask questions and, if we ask those questions today, Maghaberry will not be a feature of every future session of topical questions. (AQT 3142/11-16)

Mr Ford: It looks as if I have lost the topicality argument, Principal Deputy Speaker, but I take the significant and serious substantive point that Mr McCartney raises. It is an issue that he has raised previously. It is an ongoing challenge to ensure that the prison is run by the governor and his senior team, but that involves cooperation with other staff and with the associations that represent them. It involves not only discipline staff but those who are involved as instructors, the ancillary staff, the education staff and the healthcare staff. There is a huge mix of responsibilities.

I am always slightly reticent when I am asked to give guarantees in the Chamber for matters that are not my direct, day-to-day responsibility. However, since the arrival of Phil Wragg, the current governor, I have seen extremely good work being done, close cooperation with Prison Service headquarters and with the Department, and an understanding of the challenges that Maghaberry faces. Remember, Phil Wragg's previous experience was as governor of Belmarsh. Belmarsh may not be as complex as Maghaberry, but it does deal with some of the most difficult prisoners in custody in England and Wales. He clearly has a range of experience there as well as his experience in other mainstream, if you want to put it that way, prisons, which is being put to good use. I have no doubt that the very positive relationship between him and the director general, the other members of the senior team, his senior team in Maghaberry and even, dare I say, the Minister and the senior team in the Department is having good effects already in Maghaberry. I have no doubt that that will continue.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answer to that question and his approach to it. At the Committee meeting last week, and in the Minister's earlier answers, it was said that Anne Owers in 2011 said that one of the ways around the complexity of Maghaberry was to have three mini prisons. I have a concern that that is being postponed until a new capital build. That is why I have made the point that, if the number one governor in Maghaberry can find the means to bring about three mini-prisons, it should not be contingent on a capital build. Will the Minister agree with that approach?

Mr Ford: We cannot do all that we would wish to do around the concept of three mini prisons without a fairly significant capital investment. For example, different arrangements for visitors cannot be accommodated in the concept of three mini prisons within the current capital configuration. However, Mr McCartney highlights a reasonable point about how we actually manage the arrangements for prisoners in the two separated houses, the other category A prisoners, and the great run of the prison population — the 90%-plus — who are not in those circumstances. It is about seeking to manage staffing as best as possible to ensure that the staffing pressures that exist in Roe and Bush do not impact on staffing elsewhere. That is why, for example, the reduction in the numbers on sick leave on a daily basis has been so important in ensuring that we can make those changes happen and disrupt the regime for that 90% as little as possible.

As for the other issues, as I say, I do not think that it will be possible to do all that we hope to do without a significant injection of capital funding. This is one of those points on which, if the Finance Minister were in the House, I would remind him that there is sometimes more capital funding available than resource funding, and that capital investment in our prisons could significantly save on ongoing resource expenditure. So, if anybody here would like to report that to the Finance Minister, I would be very grateful.

Justice: Budget Position

T3. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Justice for an update on his Department's budgetary position. (AQT 3143/11-16)

Mr Ford: That is certainly not as easy as the Access NI question.

Just before I came into the Chamber, I saw a paper, which will deal with an exceptional November monitoring round and is due to go to the Executive later this afternoon. On the basis that it is for the Executive, in confidence, I cannot give Members as full an update as I would wish. However, I can say that it is clear that there are very significant ongoing pressures in the Department of Justice. There has been some slight benefit this year, because police overtime has been slightly less than might have been the case in other circumstances — a further benefit of a relatively peaceful summer, which we should all be grateful for on more than just financial grounds. As Members will be aware, there are still very significant ongoing pressures around legal aid. We will see exactly how that resolves itself, particularly in the context of the current withdrawal from work by some solicitors and barristers and the potential for further pressures there if, following the judicial review, they are back to work. If that has given a flavour, without giving away Executive secrets, I hope it has been helpful.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for giving me some flavour of the current budgetary position. An awful lot of concern was expressed last year about the £14 million underspend by the PSNI. Can he provide the House with any assurances that such money will not be returned again this year?

Mr Ford: I can certainly give the House the assurance that I will do my best to see that any money not required by any part of the justice system is recycled to other parts of the justice system that are under pressure, whether for legal aid, prisons or courts, all of which have pressures at present.

In many cases, when funding is allocated mid-year, it is very difficult for spending areas to make full use of it if they are expecting a cut the following year. Unfortunately, that is what happened to the funding allocated in-year to the police last year. If they had certainty of funding for a four- or five-year period, they would be recruiting more officers than they are currently able to recruit. Police numbers stand below the recommendation in the review carried out two years ago. So, there are clearly areas where the police, if they had certainty of funding, would be in a better position to spend their funding for a period of years than they are when given small sums in-year. The challenge facing the Executive, as a whole, is to get a coherent budgeting pattern through the next CSR period so that agencies know where they are.

I suspect that the Police Service is not the only service that is in a very similar position. It does not have the capacity to suddenly squirrel away money into one or two short-term things at the end of the financial year, because so much of its budget is tied up with staffing matters. That is a challenge that we now face to try to get matters resolved, which, I trust, we will be in a position to do after the Chancellor's autumn statement.

Muslim Community: Support

T4. Ms Ruane asked the Minister of Justice to join her in condemning the racist attack on members of the Muslim community in Ballymena and to update the House on the measures that are in place to support our Muslim community. (AQT 3144/11-16)

Mr Ford: Like, I suspect, all Members of the House, I immediately join Ms Ruane in condemnation of the attack in Ballykeel last night and, indeed, a number of other attacks that have happened in recent weeks, mostly in Belfast. Whatever the crude motivation may be, there can be no excuse for what went on last night. We need to not intrude on operational issues for the Chief Constable or the Director of Public Prosecutions. We have the ability for enhanced sentences relating to hate crime. There is a lot of work being done around the role of hate crime advocates. The hate incidents practical action scheme deals with providing protective benefits. The community safety strategy has elements about reducing the harm from hate crime, whether it be racial, religious or whatever. There are a number of streams of work being carried through, but it is clearly an issue where, most of all, we need a united community response against such crimes.

Ms Ruane: Tá mé buíoch as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for that answer. I absolutely agree with him on the operational independence. It is something that we will raise at the Policing Board. In relation to the last comment that you made about a united front, it is important that all Departments work together. Will the Minister confirm that he is willing to work with all the Departments to make sure that people from different countries who have travelled here and live here and families who have lived here for 20 years and still have a petrol bomb come through their house do not feel afraid?

Mr Ford: This is one of those occasions when you would just like to say yes, but I should go a little further. We have both the issue, as was highlighted, of those who have been here for a number of years but are still subjected to a variety of hate crimes and the issue of the Syrian refugees whom we expect to be in Northern Ireland before Christmas. I have no doubt that there is a relatively limited role for my Department, but, where there is a role for the justice agencies, they will play their part.

Refugees: Welcome and Support

T5. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister of Justice to join the House in condemning the petrol bomb attack on the Ibrahim family home in Ballymena, the concerning social media posts that have appeared today, allegedly from the UPRG, that threaten the Housing Executive in its allocation of housing to refugees and the assaults that have taken place in East Belfast; and to send the clear message that Northern Ireland citizens of black and minority ethnic background and refugees who come to these shores will be warmly welcomed and receive the statutory support to which they are entitled. (AQT 3145/11-16)

Mr Ford: Anything that the Department of Justice can do, as I have just said to Ms Ruane, it will do to play its part in dealing with hate crime, ensuring that we provide support services for those who will come shortly as refugees and ensuring that we play our part in helping create a mood within the public that recognises the position of those who have been citizens here for many years, whatever their skin colour or religious belief may be.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his response. Does he agree that anyone threatening people from a black and minority ethnic background is merely playing into the hands of the terrorists who seek to divide our community and threaten our freedoms? Does he agree that there is now a long-overdue need for OFMDFM to bring forward the racial equality strategy and the refugee integration strategy? Will he work at the Executive table to ensure that they are delivered?

Mr Ford: Just as I had to be slightly cautious talking about healthcare in prisons and speaking for the Minister of Health, I am not sure that the First Minister or deputy First Minister will appreciate me speaking for them, but the DOJ will play its part in the development of any of those strategies, which are a responsibility across the Executive, even if they are led by another Department. It is absolutely vital that we show a united voice and stand up against those thugs and terrorists, whatever their claimed motivation, who threaten people in this society, wherever they come from and whatever their background. Only with a united view from the Chamber, backed up by a united view at the Executive and strategies in place that ensure that all the relevant agencies work together, will we actually succeed in dealing with those problems.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the period for topical questions to the Minister of Justice.

2.45 pm

Regional Development

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: This is, I think, the Minister's first Question Time, so we welcome her to that. I inform the House that questions 1 and 12 have been withdrawn.

Belfast Rapid Transit System

2. Mr Douglas asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the Belfast rapid transit system. (AQO 9115/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen (The Minister for Regional Development): I am fully committed to the delivery of Belfast rapid transit, including not only the current phase, which connects east Belfast, west Belfast and Titanic Quarter via the city centre, but future extensions to the north and south of the city. I regard Belfast rapid transit as a transformational public transport project for the city. It represents a great opportunity for Belfast going forward and is a major decision for my Department in relation to the commitment of funding in support of an Executive priority.

I have a keen personal interest in Belfast rapid transit and recently visited some of the infrastructure that my Department is developing for the system, including the new 520-space park-and-ride facility at Dundonald and the ongoing works on the routes. The works have been well publicised, and details of the impacts on local traffic are available on my Department's Trafficwatch Northern Ireland website. The changes that the works will introduce and the changes that have already been introduced on completed sections of the routes will provide benefits for existing public transport in advance of Belfast rapid transit becoming operational. The procurement of the rapid transit vehicles is progressing well, and I hope to make a major announcement on that in the next few weeks. Phase 1 of the Belfast rapid transit system is scheduled to become operational in September 2018.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for her answer, and I wish her all the best with the rest of her questions today. Does she agree with me that, in east Belfast, we should encourage commuters to use the Comber greenway as an additional route to the rapid transport scheme? Could the Minister outline any plans that she has to improve and enhance the Comber greenway?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his best wishes for today and for his question. I agree with him on the Comber greenway. Some may say that I am slightly biased given that it links our constituencies, but I believe that it is one of the best examples of greenway infrastructure in Northern Ireland. I am keen to explore how it can be improved to encourage greater use for commuting and, indeed, for wider reasons, including health and well-being. My Department is working on a scheme to improve the linkages to Belfast city centre, but I also want to see better access to the greenway provided at the Comber end, particularly linking into Comber town and eventually into Newtownards. That would allow for greater numbers of people to enjoy a safe cycling and walking route. That would be for commuters and leisure users. If Departments and councils work together, we have an opportunity to develop Comber greenway into a world-class facility.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. You mentioned that there had been progress on procurement, but are you confident that the revised deadline of 2017 will be met for the vehicles to arrive fully assembled? Is there potential for that new deadline to slip?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. I understand that that is no longer an issue and that they should be in place. The procurement process commenced in September 2014, and tenders were returned on 1 May this year. Those have been assessed, and, as I said, there will be an announcement in the next few weeks. That was part of the project assessment review, and we are confident that it is on track to be delivered on time.

Cullybackey Park-and-ride Facility

3. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on an extension to the Cullybackey Park-and-ride facility. (AQO 9116/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The Member will be pleased to know that Translink has commenced work towards the construction of a park-and-ride facility at Cullybackey railway station. A detailed design review and risk assessment, including a CCTV survey of the interaction of vehicles and pedestrians at the existing crossing, has raised concern that additional traffic introduced by the park-and-ride facility could potentially cause blocking over the automatic crossing.

That assessment, combined with increased crossing incidents, has led Translink to conclude that the level crossing at Cullybackey station should be upgraded before the park-and-ride project is commissioned. The crossing upgrade involves significant railway signalling alteration works. Timescales for the work depend on the certainty of capital funding and availability of signalling expertise currently engaged on a number of significant railway projects, most notably phase 2 of the Coleraine to Londonderry track re-lay project.

Translink has committed to aim for completion of the level crossing upgrade and the park-and-ride facility in 2018-19. It is anticipated that the land purchase will be completed in the current financial year, 2015-16, once site surveys conclude.

Mr D McIlveen: I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box today and thank her for her answers so far. The Minister, I am sure, will be aware, having spoken to some local representatives, that we have an issue whereby the park-and-ride facility at Ballymena has been put under immense pressure because there is little alternative for people, given the situation with Cullybackey.

Now that we finally have a Minister for Regional Development who knows where North Antrim is, I wonder whether I can encourage her to visit the constituency in the near future so that she can see for herself the pressing urgency of the project.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his comments. I am happy to visit the constituency yet again. Undoubtedly, the proposed park-and-ride facility at Cullybackey would relieve the pressure on the Ballymena park-and-ride facility, certainly in the short to medium term and particularly for commuters from north of Ballymena.

Ballymena park-and-ride has 294 spaces. It is consistently at full capacity and, on occasion, accommodates vehicles well in excess of the designated number of bays. I am aware of traffic problems, as is Translink, as a result of commuters parking for long periods outside local residences. Hopefully, not in the not-so-near future but certainly within the next couple of years, that situation should be relieved.

Mr Allister: I express my dismay at the Minister's answer. It is two years since this was announced, with headlines in the local paper about a park-and-ride facility at Cullybackey. In March of this year, the Department announced that it was going to provide 110 spaces. The Minister now comes to the House and tells us that Translink has not even completed the land purchase and that it must revisit the level crossing and that it is going to be another three years before we have that basic provision.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his question.

Mr Allister: Why is Cullybackey forgotten —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member must come to his question.

Mr Allister: — and why has its bypass also been forgotten, if we now have a Minister who knows where North Antrim is?

Miss M McIlveen: I am not sure whether I should thank the Member for that question, but he certainly has an opinion. He will understand that I am recently in post, a post that was held by another Member — indeed, another party. The matter has been drawn to my attention. I asked for an update and am asking for the matter to be progressed. We are working through the processes.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister and welcome her to her first Question Time. In a similar vein, can she give an update on the development of the park-and-share or park-and-ride sites at Dungiven and Claudy?

Miss M McIlveen: The Department has invested in the provision of a number of park-and-ride and park-and-share sites in the north-western key transport corridor, including at Drumahoe, Castledawson, Craigadick, Toome, Dunsilly and Ballymartin, which amount to up to 1,400 spaces. In addition, as part of the A6 Dungiven bypass scheme, a park-and-ride facility is proposed to provide 60 spaces. I hope that that answers the Member's question. If I have missed something specific, I will certainly come back to her.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that this question is specific to the constituency and, in particular, to in and around Cullybackey.

Mr Dallat: I will do my best not to meander beyond Cullybackey. I thank the Minister for her continued interest in the Belfast to Derry railway and I congratulate her on taking that epic journey from Belfast to Bellarena recently to see the new passing loop. That was brilliant.

The Cullybackey park-and-ride facility is essential, but will the Minister assure me that no discussions are taking place about the future of the Knockmore line, which is mothballed. I heard a rather nasty rumour at the weekend that they are considering making it into yet another greenway. Can the Minister dispel that rumour?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before the Minister responds, I remind the Member that this is a question specific to the Cullybackey park-and-ride facility.

Mr Dallat: It is just up our road. [Laughter.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Minister may answer.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I had a very enjoyable journey to Bellarena to see the site there, and I am very encouraged by the works that are progressing. That will have a significant impact for commuters making the journey from Londonderry into Belfast and further. I am not aware of the detail of Knockmore. As the Member said, it is a rumour that he heard over the weekend. I am happy to look into that and come back to him.

Bicycle Strategy: EuroVelo

4. Mr McKay asked the Minister for Regional Development whether she has any plans to use the EuroVelo to promote her Department's bicycle strategy. (AQO 9117/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: 'Northern Ireland Changing Gear: A Bicycle Strategy for Northern Ireland' is based around a three-pillar approach. Those are building a comprehensive network for the bicycle; supporting people who choose to travel by bicycle; and promoting the bicycle as a mode of transport for everyday journeys. That balanced approach underlines the importance of high-quality bicycle infrastructure, good support measures for those who want to use a bicycle and effective programmes for behavioural change. I am particularly keen to explore opportunities to expand the cycling infrastructure, in building better infrastructure for the bicycle so that people can have the freedom and confidence to travel by bicycle for everyday journeys. Current work has focused on the urban bicycle infrastructure and the potential to develop greenways. Both are key elements of the bicycle strategy and fit in with the main purpose of the EuroVelo, which is to provide routes that people can use for daily journeys and for recreation. My Department has had discussions with Sustrans about the route for EuroVelo 1 in Northern Ireland. Those discussions included consideration of how the EuroVelo might form part of the comprehensive network referred to in the bicycle strategy.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I congratulate the Minister on her appointment. What plans does she have to develop the EuroVelo to include the north coast, perhaps linking to two potential greenways: from Ballymena to Cushendall and the Armoyn greenway from Ballymoney to Ballycastle?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. This is ongoing and is part of a route that is being developed, as is the funding associated with it. Funding is critical to such projects, as is land acquisition. I am not clear at this stage whether anything further would be required in those areas, but I am happy for officials to look at it as we move forward through the project. This is an exciting option, and it will certainly develop cycling in Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyons: This is also my first Regional Development Question Time. I welcome the Minister and wish her well in her post.

I am sure that many Members will welcome the new Queen's Belfast Bikes station. Will the Minister give us a general assessment of the scheme to date, tell us whether other stations will be opened and whether the scheme can be extended to other towns in Northern Ireland?

3.00 pm

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Belfast Bikes has probably been one of the most successful bike share schemes introduced in the United Kingdom. The number of hires, since its launch in April this year, is now well above 100,000. It is a Belfast City Council scheme, although my Department provided capital funding of over £1 million for implementation through the active travel demonstration projects competition. Last week, the council announced an expansion of the scheme, with two new docking stations at Queen's University, and I know that the council is giving consideration to additional sites.

Obviously, the rationale behind the Member's question was whether the scheme could be extended to his constituency. If other councils wish to consider operating a bike share scheme, I suggest that they develop a business case, as Belfast City Council did. Hopefully, we will see the scheme being launched in various towns and cities throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the Minister to her post and commend her Department for the support it has given to the Sustrans report, 'Belfast Bike Life 2015', which found nearly £12 million in health benefits to Belfast and 67p per mile savings to citizens of Belfast through cycling. The report also says that 78% of people in Belfast want more investment in cycling. Does the Minister intend to increase the budget for cycling to deliver the improved bicycling infrastructure that we need and deserve?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. The Member was present when I launched the first 'Belfast Bike Life' report on 21 October. This report was compiled by Sustrans and is based on Copenhagen's 'Bicycle Account' series. It is the first ever bicycle report for Belfast and provides information on cycling conditions in the city and the views of residents on various aspects of cycling. As the Member said, the report indicates the number of journeys — 19,000 — made by bicycle every day in Belfast, and this information is critical in informing decision-making in my Department and for policy development. Certainly, the investment in cycling has increased over recent years. The Member, and everyone in the Chamber, will be aware of the challenges with our financial situation, but, where there are opportunities, as I indicated in my response to Mr McKay on EuroVelo and the development of greenways, we will take them into consideration.

A8: Completion Date

5. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the upgrade of the A8, including the expected contract completion date. (AQO 9118/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The A8 scheme represents a £133 million investment by the Executive. It forms part of the eastern seaboard key transport corridor, which is an important link between Northern Ireland, the Irish Republic and Scotland, via the port of Larne. I am pleased to advise that the new A8 dual carriageway opened to traffic, as programmed, on 29 May 2015. However, since then, as the Member will be aware, localised traffic management along the scheme has been required to facilitate ancillary works on side roads, utility works and the completion of the landscaping works during the planting season. Construction of this 8.7-mile-long dual carriageway scheme commenced in August 2012 and is on target for contract completion at the end of December 2015. Throughout the construction works, Transport NI and the contractor have ensured that any inconvenience to the public has been minimised.

This is an excellent scheme that will improve journey times for this stretch of the A8 by removing the issues associated with the queuing of traffic, thus reducing driver frustration and improving the safety performance of the route for all road users. In doing so, this much-needed upgrade will grow the local economy, contribute to wider economic development across Northern Ireland and help with the development of the port of Larne.

Mr Beggs: Over the past couple of months, the road has regularly been coned off for re-planing and resurfacing to meet Roads Service standards. When will that come to an end, and when will the maintenance of the road, the lights and, indeed, winter gritting be added to the burden already resting on her Department?

Is she satisfied that her Department has an adequate budget to look after the repair of street lighting, maintenance of the road —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member come to his question?

Mr Beggs: — and winter gritting services?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his numerous questions, a number of which will be covered in detail as we move through Question Time. As he will be aware, a normal winter gritting service will be in place and that that road, given its nature, will be included if it has not already been. We hope that everything will be completed by the end of December. Issues were identified during the construction process about the use of unsuitable material. That has been rectified.

The Member also asked about grass cutting in the area. That commenced yesterday along the central section of the A8 central reservation. Lane closures associated with that will be required so that the remaining outer strips of the central reservation can be cut. That is programmed to be completed by November 2015.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. The infrastructure in East Antrim, including the A8, is a great example of how devolution can work. Will the Minister indicate the economic benefits to the area, including journey times?

Miss M McIlveen: The traffic model suggests that, on average, journey times along the section of the A8 between Coleman's Corner roundabout and Ballyrickard Road will reduce by approximately 25% as a result of the scheme. That equates to a journey time saving of between two minutes 24 seconds and four minutes 56 seconds, which seems terribly precise, depending on the direction of travel and the time of journey.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister to her first Question Time.

There are many in my constituency who have a green-eyed envy of the A8. Can the Minister give us the final costings for its upgrade and tell us whether it is above or below budget?

Miss M McIlveen: At this stage, the approved scheme estimate for the works was approximately £133 million. As the contract for the work is ongoing, the out-turn cost has not yet been finalised, so I am not in a position to give the Member the figure at this stage.

Mr Ramsey: I congratulate the Minister and wish her well in her new appointment. You referred in an earlier answer to inferior materials being used on the road: can you assure the House that that was resolved at no additional cost to the public purse?

Miss M McIlveen: Yes, I can. Immediate action was taken in conjunction with the contractor to address that. The contractor replaced the affected surfacing to ensure that it met the standards that my Department requires. There was no additional cost.

Winter Services 2015-16

6. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the provision of winter services in 2015-16. (AQO 9119/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The Member will, of course, know that the winter service programme is provided to mitigate the effects of adverse winter weather; it does not eliminate them. My Department will provide a normal winter service with over 300 staff and a fleet of 130 gritters available every day to salt the main road network. Salt barns have been filled to a maximum capacity of over 70,000 tons, with reserve stocks of around 20,000 tons in place. Salt bins and grit piles will be provided at strategic locations for self-help purposes. To further improve resilience, I have approved the purchase of four more snowblowers to supplement the Department's fleet of eight. Snow clearance contracts are in place to enable contractors and farmers to be mobilised to clear roads during prolonged periods of snow. In addition to the preparations for adverse road conditions, Northern Ireland Water maintains a major incident plan to provide a fully planned reactive response to any major weather-induced incidents. Translink also has severe weather management plans in place to cope with the effect of severe winter weather on public transport services.

I fully recognise the importance of winter service to the people and the economy of Northern Ireland. I recently visited winter service depots at Ballykeel in Ballymena and Airport Road in Belfast to meet staff and see at first hand the vital work that they do. I realise just how passionate they are in caring for all of us at a time of severe weather. They take on a responsibility, and we should be mindful of the fact that they actually go out when it is frosty. The roads that they are on are ungritted, and we should give them a lot of praise for the work that they do.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Minister for her answer. I also take the opportunity to wish her well in her new role. Can she confirm that she has the financial resources to properly and fully fund winter services?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank Mr Kennedy for his good wishes as I move forward in the role; I appreciate that. Yes, I can confirm that there is adequate funding to maintain a normal winter service.

Mr Clarke: I, like others, welcome the Minister to her first Question Time. Following on from the initial question, what preparation plans does the Minister have to prevent an incident like the freeze/thaw event in 2011 happening again?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. In relation to that, it is particularly around Northern Ireland Water. I remember that particularly well: at that stage I was Deputy Chair of the Regional Development Committee. One of the key recommendations coming out of the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation report on the freeze/thaw of that year was that Northern Ireland Water undertake a major public awareness campaign in an effort to reduce the extent of water wastage on the customer side. Northern Ireland Water is currently embarking on the fifth year of its winter advertising campaign, which will include television, radio, press, outdoor and online advertising. The theme of the campaign will retain the well-established "Beat the freeze" message. In fact, a number of Members in the Chamber, including members of the Committee, took the opportunity to get involved in some photographs in preparation for the campaign last week.

Northern Ireland Water intends to use media interviews to advise customers on the prevention of frozen pipes and wastage caused by burst pipes, including a video on precautionary measures. Northern Ireland Water also maintains a major incident plan to provide a fully planned reactive response to any incidents that may impact on customers, the environment or business. The plan has been regularly tested during the year and has been exercised in response to real-life emergency situations, including the multi-agency response to industrial action events of December and January 2015. I hope that answers the Member's questions. It is about raising awareness and making sure that everyone realises that they have a responsibility to look after their own property.

Mrs McKevitt: I wish the Minister every success in her new role. Given that RPA has happened and we have new councils, is the Minister confident that they have signed up to playing their part in clearing up any snow or ice? I would like her to include in her answer the clearing of footpaths in our towns and cities to keep our businesses open.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. My Department has obviously prioritised its resources. Our key priority is to salt main traffic routes just to keep traffic moving freely. At the end of the 2014-15 winter season, Transport NI had arrangements with 25 of the 26 councils to provide salt to allow councils, where their resources permitted, to salt busy town centre footways in a time of prolonged ice and snow to keep the local economy moving. At this stage, Transport NI is in discussions to roll those arrangements over with the new councils. It is not anticipated that there will be any issues with that. I hope that that answers the Member's question.

3.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the period for listed questions. We now move to topical questions.

Castlerock Road, Coleraine

Ms Sugden: I congratulate the Minister on her new role and pay due regard to Mr Kennedy.

T1. Ms Sugden asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on a solution to the significant and dangerous traffic problem at Castlerock Road in Coleraine on which she worked with the Minister's predecessor. (AQT 3151/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. I am aware of the issue at Castlerock Road and the nature of that in relation to school traffic and the movements in and around that area. I understand that various measures have been put in place to try to reduce risk there. A microprocessor optimised vehicle actuation system was introduced in May 2013; a puffin controlled pedestrian crossing was installed; and we have looked to improve cycling and pedestrian facilities along the Castlerock Road. There are competing demands in that area, and it has obviously become an issue. We are monitoring how those measures progress as a solution.

Ms Sugden: I thank the Minister for her response. Further to the measures that she outlined, I feel that the problem is significant enough to warrant more measures in that area. Will the Minister commit to working with the Minister of Education to find a way of providing a solution to the problem?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her supplementary question. I am happy to do that. I am also happy to discuss it further with the Member and, if it helps, to visit the site to see what the issues are and help to bring it to a resolution.

Newry Rail Station

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Ceist a dó. Question 2, please.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: It is a topical question, Mr Bradley.

Mr D Bradley: Tá brón orm faoi sin. Excuse me. Sorry.

T2. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister for Regional Development whether she is satisfied that the £14 million that was invested in the new railway station in Newry is being exploited fully by the rail company. (AQT 3152/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. It might be useful if he gave me some more information about where he feels there may be failings and about his perspective from the constituency. Would he like to enlighten me?

Mr D Bradley: I certainly will enlighten the Minister. After the recent review of services, there are only 12 trains leaving Newry for Belfast each day, compared with 46 from Portadown to Belfast and 38 from Lurgan to Belfast. There is a 30-minute service from Portadown to Belfast, yet the Newry service has intervals of up to one and half hours. I hope that the Minister sees that there is an imbalance there. Will she review that situation with a view to increasing services from Newry to Belfast?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for that additional information. My understanding is that the numbers using trains from Newry, Poyntzpass and Scarva probably do not justify additional services, particularly early morning services. I will ask officials to look again at the timetabling in Newry to see whether there is a possibility of maximising further usage out of the station. You will understand that the revised timetables came about as a result of a reduction in budget to the Department and, therefore, to Translink. It is all part of a review that has been carried out. I am happy to take it back and look at it again.

Road Safety: Fermanagh

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I must say that it is good to see the Minister here and not in the castle. I am sure that she enjoys our company more than that of her Executive colleagues.

T3. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister for Regional Development whether she accepts the need for enhanced road safety measures in Fermanagh and to state what her Department intends to do to make roads safer in Fermanagh, given that 16 people have lost their life on Fermanagh's roads in the last two years, making it the policing area with the highest death toll from collisions, and there were six fatalities on the A4 from Enniskillen to Fivemiletown and three on the A47 between Kesh and Belleek. (AQT 3153/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. How could I resist coming to the Assembly for my first Question Time? It was the really the only thing that I wanted to do today.

Obviously, a death on the roads in Fermanagh or, indeed, on any road in Northern Ireland, is a tragedy. My Department works closely with the PSNI and other agencies to assess any safety measures that are required on specific roads. It also takes account of all the recommendations made by police and takes action where necessary. Again, as I have made clear to other Members, if there are roads with particular issues that you believe require specific attention, I am happy to meet the Member to discuss those.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for her answer and her open-mindedness on this issue. On a more general point, does the Minister accept the key role that catseyes play on our roads to show motorists where the road is going and where there are dangerous corners, particularly in the dark at times of heavy rain? If you travel around the South of Ireland, the catseyes are much brighter and I think that they are of a higher standard. I think that they are much harder to see in the North. Does the Minister accept that, and will she commit to prioritise funding for catseyes in future budgets?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. Catseyes are recognised as a safety device used in road marking. As the Member highlighted, they are particularly effective in wet weather and in fog, when the effectiveness of road markings themselves are particularly reduced. Obviously, the requirement for catseyes to be installed in a road will be assessed by the local section office. However, as I have said, road safety is a priority and anything that will mitigate loss of life should be included and seen as a priority in my budget.

Car Parking: Residents' Parking Schemes

T4. Mr McGimpsey asked the Minister for Regional Development, in view of the fact that, in built-up areas, planning permission no longer carries with it parking requirements, whether she agrees that residents' parking schemes are the best way to protect local communities in areas such as South Belfast that are polluted by on-street car parking. (AQT 3154/11-16)

Mr McGimpsey: I too welcome the Minister to her first Question Time.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Certainly, regardless of whether it is in Belfast city centre or even some market towns around the Province, parking can prove to be a problem, particularly in residents' areas. I am aware that my officials have been involved in advertising and in the consultation process for a parking scheme in south Belfast. I understand that there were a number of objections, which are being worked through.

Mr McGimpsey: I thank the Minister for her answer. Can she assure me that, in respect of the various proposals for residents' parking schemes, she will effectively keep the pressure on her Department to get to a resolution and give these communities much-needed breathing space?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I understand that he recently had a meeting with my predecessor about this in the Donegall Pass area. I am happy to pursue this and to seek a resolution on the issues that have been highlighted.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Raymond McCartney is not in his place. I call Mr Gordon Dunne.

Traffic Congestion: North Down Commuters

T6. Mr Dunne asked the Minister for Regional Development, after assuring her that his question is not about bikes, whether she recognises the need for Transport NI to do something to reduce the daily traffic congestion faced by commuters from north Down who travel from Holywood along the Sydenham bypass — approximately 40,000 vehicles per day. (AQT 3156/11-16)

Mr Dunne: I too welcome the Minister.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Perhaps those who cycle to work might suggest doing that as an alternative. Transport NI is aware of traffic congestion experienced by commuters along the A2 between Holywood and the Dee Street junction in Belfast. The A2 Sydenham bypass scheme proposal for the route is to widen the existing two-lane dual carriageway to a dual three-lane carriageway.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for her answer. Can she give us some indication of when the project to widen the Sydenham bypass will get under way, which will deal with the problem at the entrance to Belfast City Airport as well?

Miss M McIlveen: I am conscious of the bottleneck in the area. The scheme proposal is now at the third stage of a three-stage development process. Stage 1 concluded in May 2008 with the selection of the proposed corridor; stage 2 concluded in February 2010 with the selection of the preferred option for the scheme; while stage 3 involves detailed assessment of the preferred option and ongoing consultation with key stakeholders. That will result in the publication of the statutory orders: the draft direction order, the environmental statement and the notice of intention to make a vesting order. The current budget allows that development work to continue. However, progression of the scheme to publication of the statutory orders will be subject to future years' funding.

Narrow Water Bridge: Update

T7. Ms Ruane asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the Narrow Water Bridge, given that she will be aware that it is a very important project, with the people of Louth and Down very interested in seeing it built. (AQT 3157/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. I am aware of the Narrow Water Bridge project, which was proposed and sponsored primarily as a tourism project under INTERREG IV. My Department has, and has had, very limited interaction with the original project, other than on those matters relating to bridge orders and licensing. I am unaware of any specific intentions in bringing the project back to life, although I have heard speculation in news reports. As yet, I have not had any firm update.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Minister for her answer. I am aware of the bridge order, North and South, and the planning. In the light of the fact that it is such an important project — it is a tourism project but also an economic one — will she do everything that she can, including meeting the Taoiseach where appropriate, for the project?

Miss M McIlveen: I am happy to look at it as a project. However, I emphasise again that it is a tourism-led project as opposed to something of strategic importance for my Department. Nevertheless, I am happy to look at it.

Footpaths: Lowered Kerbs

T8. Mr Allen asked the Minister for Regional Development whether her Department holds any information on the number of footpaths in Northern Ireland that, at their beginning and end, do not have lowered kerbs. (AQT 3158/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I do not have that information at hand, but I am happy to give it to the Member by way of a written answer.

Mr Allen: Is the information readily available? If it is not, can research be carried out? As I am sure she understands, I have a major problem, and a number of constituents have approached me about the major difficulties that they have when trying to mount and dismount footpaths to get to another footpath.

Miss M McIlveen: I am happy to get that information. I will ask officials to forward it to you, if it is in a format that is easy to forward.

As a constituency MLA, as we all are, I am aware of the difficulties for people with a disability, as well as mothers with prams and so on in being able to use footpaths. Through my office — I am sure that others have the same experience — I have lobbied Transport NI, or Roads Service as it was, to make provision where necessary.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for topical questions to the Minister. I ask Members to take their ease while we change the top Table.

3.30 pm

Ministerial Statement

GCSE Grading

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom fógra a dhéanamh faoin ghrádú do TGM a bhronntar i dTuaisceart na hÉireann. I wish to make an announcement on the grading of GCSEs awarded in the North of Ireland.

Throughout my time as Minister of Education, I have sought to make decisions in the best interests of our children and young people. As a result of changes to examinations and qualifications policy in England over the last three or four years, I have been presented with a range of significant issues to be addressed as they affect here. My response has been to seek professional advice and discuss the issues with the education sector and the wide range of stakeholders who have an interest in education. I have taken my time, because policy development should be given careful consideration.

I have taken decisions that reflect the strategic priorities here rather than those of any other jurisdiction. In particular, I have sought to take decisions that support the shared vision we have for the future of our economy and society and reflect our collective desire to improve educational outcomes and tackle underachievement. I have considered the consequences, the evidence and our educational objectives.

Most recently, I consulted on the grading of GCSEs and whether grades should be awarded alphabetically from A* to G, as they are at present, or numerically from 9 to 1, as is happening in England. The question arises because of changes that have been made in England. Those changes are the responsibility of Ministers in England, and I understand that they must take the decisions that they believe are right for England. However, I need to respond to the impact of their decisions locally in a way that serves the interests of the young people in our jurisdiction.

From that consultation, I came away with two very clear messages. First, there are no educational arguments for changing the grading to a numerical system. Whether the award is in letters or numbers does not help to improve outcomes or address underachievement. This is not, therefore, an issue of outcomes. Secondly, there is general interest about whether it will be possible to compare one set of grades with another. At a purely practical level, English awarding organisations will, for a while, be making their awards using letters as well as numbers as their reformed GCSEs are introduced in tranches. The Welsh have decided to retain the alphabetical grading system.

There will have to be a comparative scale. All awarding organisations, including the CCEA, will be responsible for making sure that parents, schools, employers and others know how the two scales compare. We know, for instance, that grade 4 will be anchored to grade C, and grade 7 will be anchored to grade A. I especially recognise the concern that has been expressed to me that it will be unnecessarily confusing for everyone to maintain a mixture of letters and numbers for GCSEs. An exam certificate should be an immediately recognisable record of a young person's achievement, not an alphanumerical challenge to a reader.

After consideration of the options available to me, I have reached the decision that grading of all GCSEs here will continue under the present alphabetical system. That will mean that, from summer 2017, GCSEs here, regardless of the awarding organisation, will continue to be awarded using the A* to G grades. I have instructed CCEA to continue its revision of GCSE specifications to reflect that.

I make it clear that my decision in no way affects the operation of the open market we have for GCSEs. Awarding organisations other than CCEA play a valuable role in our education system. I am not asking them to change from the alphabetical grading that they currently use, and I am very happy for them to continue to operate here and to offer services to our schools, provided they can meet our needs.

However, I appreciate that the different decisions reached here, in Cardiff and in London will inevitably present some challenges for other awarding organisations. I have, therefore, asked officials in DE and the CCEA regulator to work with the awarding organisations based in England to explore how we might support them and vice versa to make the necessary arrangements. WJEC in Wales will, of course, already be awarding using letters rather than numbers.

I have heard no compelling arguments for change, and I have heard strong arguments for consistency. I believe that it will be in the best interests of learners here to continue with the established practice of awarding using letters, and we must avoid unnecessary complexity as far as possible. I appreciate that there is anxiety around the perceived risk to our young people going out into the world with a GCSE certificate that is anything other than a string of numbers like their English counterparts have. However, I hear of no anxiety in Scotland about their young people not having the same GCSE grades as in England, and nor do I hear it in the South of Ireland, Canada, Poland, Germany or any other jurisdiction; rather, I see that they have confidence in their education system. I have confidence in our education system and in the hard work and attainment of our young people. I want that attainment to be rewarded and recognised across these islands and beyond.

Mr Weir (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): I thank the Minister for his statement to the House this afternoon and for the opportunity for the Deputy Chair and me to receive a briefing from the Department beforehand. Members of the Committee feel that, where there is reform and revision of our examination system, it should focus on ensuring measurable benefit for young people in Northern Ireland by providing high-quality portable qualifications that are easily understood, compared and appreciated by students, employers and further and higher education providers in all jurisdictions.

I welcome the Minister's remarks. It is the right decision to retain the alphabetical grading for Northern Ireland. I also welcome the fact that he is striving to avoid any level of confusion by ensuring that letters are simply retained rather than there being a mixture of letters and numbers. However, I still have concerns about comparability and portability. Will the Minister advise how he intends to take forward the issue that has been raised of a GCSE C here being considered as a 4 in England when employers in England may be seeking a 5 or above? Similarly, the A* here may well be regarded as being the equivalent of an 8 in England, thus potentially denying students in Northern Ireland the equivalent of the highest possible grade in England — grade 9 — which, again, may act to their detriment. How does he intend to cope with those issues of comparability, and how does he intend to keep the system under review so that, if problems arise, changes can be made?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his questions. I apologise to him for not being able to brief him personally. I am sure that he understands, given the day that is in it.

I welcome the Member's comments around the decision that I have made. His comments around how we measure our qualifications against those in England are perfectly valid. They will be measured as we have measured other qualifications coming into our jurisdiction or as the English awarding bodies have to measure other qualifications coming into their jurisdiction. It will be done through discussions between CCEA and Ofqual. I am confident that the universities here and in Britain will be able to measure our qualifications against English-graded GCSEs, Welsh-graded GCSEs, the Scottish model or the model in the South. Even in these groups of islands, a very complex group of qualifications is emerging in the different jurisdictions as a result of decisions that Administrations are perfectly entitled to take. I am confident that we will continue to work together through Ofqual and CCEA and that we will be able to manage the process. I believe that the current grade C will be the equivalent of a grade 4, as the Member has said. There may be discussions around that.

It is also worth noting that the system in England is evolving. It has been brought in in tranches. It will take time to settle and evolve. We will work with our counterparts in England to ensure that not only are our qualifications understood in England but qualifications coming in from England to here are understood by employing authorities, educational authorities and universities.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note that he has said that there is a strong argument for consistency on this issue. Has there been any evidence at all that the changes in England will lead to increased educational attainment or better educational outcomes for our young people?

Mr O'Dowd: No, there is no evidence to support that. In fairness to those who sponsored the changes in England, they were quite clear from the outset that introducing the new marking system in England was not about increasing outcomes. I do not want to get into a discussion of why changes were made in England; as I have said repeatedly in the House and other places, they are perfectly entitled to introduce those changes. When they introduce changes such as that, it presents challenges for me as Education Minister. As I said in my statement, I have measured this debate. I have taken my time on these decisions and have consulted all interested parties. We ran a 12-week consultation on the matter. It has to be said that strong views were expressed on either side of the argument, but nowhere in the debate was there a strong educational argument that changing your awards from A* to G to 9 to 1 would improve educational outcomes. Our target and objective in this society has to be to improve educational outcomes for our young people.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a chuid freagraí. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I have been around long enough to remember when O levels were graded from 1 to 9. We then changed to A to G at GCSE, and now the English are changing back, not from 1 to 9 but from 9 to 1. When I was there, the older cynics in the education system believed that one should not rush into any change because you usually ended up back where you started. I do not know whether the Minister agrees with that analysis. Does the Minister have the power to compel external awarding bodies to report in letters in Northern Ireland?

Mr O'Dowd: I am shocked that you have met old cynics in education; I do not know where they are. Yes, I have the power to ask what are known as the English awarding bodies to award their exams in connection with our curriculum and policies here. I have tasked CCEA to engage with those bodies and to establish how they assist us and how we assist them in moving the process forward. I have the power to do so.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. I share the concerns of the Committee Chair about the portability and comparability of the GCSE grades. Furthermore, I note that the Minister said that he values the roles of bodies other than CCEA in the provision of grades. If the English boards refuse to retain the alphabetical system, which they might, given the inconvenience and the small market for GCSEs in Northern Ireland, does the Minister plan to go as far as using his powers not to approve their qualifications, which could close the market for GCSEs in Northern Ireland and effectively create a monopoly for CCEA in the provision of GCSEs here?

Mr O'Dowd: First, on comparability — Mr Bradley also touched on the point — there are many people in the Chamber who have O-level certificates, and if they were to seek employment now they would use those O-level certificates, which employers and higher and further education bodies can compare with current qualifications. There are qualifications in the market other than GCSEs, and employers or higher education institutions can compare those as well. The comparability issue is not a new thing. It is new to the GCSE market because of changes that were introduced elsewhere, but employers, educators and others have had to deal with the matter since the beginning of time in the comparison of examinations. I am confident and they have expressed confidence to me that they will be able to cope with these matters.

I am not seeking to close down the market. I am seeking to work with what are known as the English providers on exams. I have tasked CCEA with going to speak to them to find out, as I have said, how we can assist them and they can assist us. If we work together, we will be able to assist each other in that regard. I certainly do not want commercial considerations to dictate how we set our education policy in this jurisdiction; that would be a huge mistake. I have no doubt that some bodies will have commercial considerations, but I cannot allow them to set our education policy.

3.45 pm

Mr Lunn: I enjoyed Mr Bradley's history lesson. I can add slightly to it, because I hold two certificates from a year that I am not going to mention: one for GCE and one for O level, both awarded in the same year. That was before the "S" came in and probably before the changes that Dominic mentioned. Does this mean that we will have five different systems across these islands, as we are prone to say, including the Republic of Ireland? Is the Welsh model the same as ours? I am not too familiar with the Scottish model. This is total confusion for portability and comparability purposes and for the universities that will be trying to weed out what the qualifications mean.

Mr O'Dowd: We and the Welsh have stayed with grades A* to G, so we are the same. England has gone down the figures route, 9 to 1. The Southern market has the junior cert and the awards and scoring within it. For as long as I can remember — others in the House may have the exact date — the Scottish have had their own very respected examination system in place. When you look at the obvious geographical closeness of Scotland to England and Wales to England, you will see that they have managed to cope with all those things. They manage to cope. Of course, students travel from here to England, whether for work, higher education, university or whatever it may be. I am confident, from the commentary in the consultation, discussions with experts in the field and the experience of universities that have to deal with qualifications from around the globe and around Europe, that the matter will be easily resolved by our university colleagues as well.

Mr Craig: Given the point raised by the Chair of the Education Committee, is the Minister inclined to introduce what would be the equivalent of grade 9 — an A**? I think of the poor parents who will have to struggle with the complexity of the numbers, letters and all the rest of it, so has any thought been given to what would almost be a dummy's guide to it, Minister? Not all children here go on to university in the Province; in fact, a lot of them go on to apprenticeships and equivalent jobs across the United Kingdom. It is important that there is an understanding of that.

Mr O'Dowd: I have no plan to introduce an A**. Our highest-performing pupils are awarded an A*, and they can stand confidently with that certificate in any jurisdiction and be confident that they are high-performing pupils, with the recognition that they deserve for the work and commitment that they have put into their exams and course work over that period. I have no plans to do that.

You mentioned parents and parental understanding of this. I am more than happy to send out as much information as possible or as required to whichever section of society requires it to familiarise them with the process moving forward. However, it is worth noting that, particularly in universities, it is only in a very limited number of courses that a university will go down as far as GCSE grades, and those are the highest-demand subjects in a variety of universities. I suspect that there is a long way to go before a university will go to GCSEs, because, for a number of those higher-demand courses, you have entry examinations into the university, your A levels, obviously, and interviews etc. As I said to other Members, the universities will be more than able to understand this.

The local colleges tell me that they will be able to deal with our grades being A* to G and England's being 9 to 1. The reason why I went and instructed CCEA to go to what are known as the English awarding bodies and tell them that any GCSEs being awarded here will be scored alphabetically was to ensure that, when parents are looking at the GCSE results that are coming from the local school, they will all be marked the same way. There will be no A**, 9 or whatever it may be; they will all be marked the same way. The information that parents have in front of them about their children's examination scores will all be the same in this jurisdiction.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. What assurance can the Minister give, particularly with regard to the continuing existence of barriers to cross-border mobility at undergraduate level, that this system will indeed be portable, compatible and recognisable in the rest of Ireland for people who want to go to university where stipulations are in place that they need a certain standard of GCSE English or maths?

Mr O'Dowd: The same rule applies perhaps, as I said to Mr Craig, in relation to universities in the South of Ireland: they will only be going down as far as GCSEs for the very-high-demand topics. Universities will be able to read this across, as has been the case before. We are not making any changes to our scores in that sense, so universities in the South will understand our GCSE scores, and they will be comparable to whatever other measures they have in place for entry to their courses.

As the Member will be aware, discussions will continue with university organisations in the South to ensure that our qualifications are given the due credit that they deserve. Significant progress has been made over the last number of years. Indeed, Mr Farry has been involved in those discussions as well. I am aware that discussions are continuing with the Irish Universities Association and within it about how to continue to improve the recognition of our qualifications here to ensure that young people have the ability to travel to either part of the island to continue their education.

Mr Hazzard: I welcome the Minister's statement. I think that it is a confident decision by the local education system to go this route. Will this decision have an impact on those subject areas here that maybe do not attract as many entrants as others? Will this decision perhaps have an impact on that, and what can we do to ensure that those subjects are still available going forward? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr O'Dowd: Clearly, with such a wide-ranging curriculum, a wide range of subjects can fall under GCSEs. There may be a number of GCSEs that have very low entry numbers, which, for commercial or other reasons, the English awarding bodies may not wish to award any further here. We will work with those bodies around that. We will see whether CCEA can develop examinations around that. There is also the option to buy the stipulations around those exams from another awarding body so that we can use them. There are a number of avenues that we can explore to ensure that we still have as wide a range of GCSEs available to our young people as was the case before.

Mr Allister: On a day when the Minister and his party roll over and ask Westminster to legislate on welfare reform, is this not an irrational and political decision to bolster the Minister's anti-England credentials, wreaking havoc with the portability of qualifications and creating a conundrum for students, parents, employers and universities? Indeed, it is a conundrum that might well fit a transfer test question: if John gets a B in Belfast, what would it be in Bristol?

Mr O'Dowd: There are too many conspiracy theories going on in the Member's head to be healthy, I have to say. If he takes nothing else on from me, perhaps he will take on that piece of advice. The Member is a barrister and therefore I would hope that, in his deliberations, he deals with evidence. If he cares to look at the consultation responses that have come back on this matter, he will see that there is very strong evidence for the decision that I have taken today. The strongest evidence that I have related myself to is that our objective — or any decision that you make in education — has to be about improving outcomes for young people. Changing how you score exams does not improve outcomes for young people. There is no evidence to support that theory. You do not change or improve your education system from the top down. I am very confident that universities in England, which deal with students from throughout the world, will be very able to cope with students travelling from here with GCSEs when the main determiner for entry into universities is A-level results. Even in England, there is not a whimper about changing how A levels are scored. They may make a decision in future, and they have a perfect right to do that. We will consult and gather evidence, and I hope that whoever is Minister at the time will sit down and talk to the experts in the field and make a decision. There is no conspiracy theory here; all my deliberations and decision-making are backed up with firm evidence.

Ms Sugden: I thank the Minister for his statement. How will GCSE-equivalent courses in FE colleges be affected by this?

Mr O'Dowd: Again, there are no changes. Our further education colleges will be able to read qualifications across quite easily. We have students coming here from England, and it will be the reverse of what colleges and universities in England have to do. They will compare those results across. Again, Ofqual and CCEA will engage with each other; we know that the 4 is set to a C grade. That information will be extrapolated across to our colleges. The colleges inform me that they will be more than capable of taking on board all that information and transferring it into how they deal with students entering their courses.

Local Government (Numbers and Addresses of Buildings in Townlands) Bill: Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Local Government (Numbers and Addresses of Buildings in Townlands) Bill [NIA 63/11-16] be agreed. — [Mr Flanagan.]

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I want to start by thanking Members for their contributions to the debate earlier. Some of those contributions were insightful, some were helpful and some were completely off the wall, they were that detached from reality. The Minister of the Environment has informed me that, unfortunately, he cannot be here to respond to the debate. He is down in the castle or the house doing something. I am not quite sure what he is doing. Maybe there will be an announcement at some stage and we will be informed, but I accept that the Minister is unable to be here and I will not hold it against him.

I will turn to some of the comments that were made by Members. Anna Lo, speaking on behalf of the Environment Committee, wondered aloud why this policy change could not be done on a voluntary basis and said that, during the Committee hearing, some members had suggested that any councils that wanted to could merely introduce this change themselves. However, in Fermanagh, that was done not so much voluntarily but in an unauthorised fashion for 40 years. In recent years, that caused significant problems for citizens in their engagements with credit-referencing agencies. It is for that reason that the council moved away from the unauthorised or what some have called the voluntary system.

There was also significant potential that someone would take a legal case against Fermanagh District Council as a result of its failure to enact the legislation governing the issuing of property numbers along a roads-based system. As a result, the majority of councillors accepted the need to enact a legislated-for system. The council also sought this specific legislative change to be made to allow it to continue to use the townland-based system but in such a way that would allow citizens to avail themselves of credit, to get home deliveries and to use GPS systems effectively.

Anna Lo also reminded the House that her party had previously tabled two motions in the Assembly calling for greater support for townlands and she indicated that her party remained broadly supportive of the protection of townlands for heritage purposes. Ms Lo also indicated that she felt that changing the system appeared complicated. Hopefully, the Bill will pass Second Stage and be referred to her Committee where those complexities can be addressed appropriately, under her stewardship.

Anna also told the story of a young friend of hers from Fermanagh — it was not 'Anna from Fermanagh'; that is a story by a famous Fermanagh man — who bought a house in south Belfast and had problems proving that her old address existed using the townland-based system. That is exactly the type of problem that people in Fermanagh faced for years, where the unauthorised system was being used without legislation. That meant that people did not have a unique property reference number, which made it difficult for them to pass credit checks, get products delivered or use GPS, satnavs and things of that nature.

That is why the voluntary approach that some Members are proposing will not work. If we move to a system where a council introduces a townland-based system without it being set out in statute, we will throw up all the problems that were there in the past. The only solution to that is for this legislative change to be made to allow councils to number properties based on a townland system within legislation, and not stepping outside it. I am amazed to hear some Members, who will tell you that they are members of a law and order party and want the law adhered to, openly calling for councils to break the law. There is a very strange anomaly here. We have Members who call for people to support the law yet, on this occasion, are calling for councils to break the law and step outside the rules that currently govern how councils can legally administer property numbers. I was a bit alarmed to hear that. Hopefully, it was a misunderstanding, and they are not actually calling for people to break the law.

4.00 pm

Anna Lo concluded by saying that her party was content to support the Bill and to scrutinise it during Committee Stage. That is a pragmatic view, as not everybody is in favour of the specific proposal before the House today. I accept that, but I think that the best way in which to deal with any concerns that exist or any confusion that individual Members may have is to allow the Bill to progress to Committee Stage, where the 11 members of the Committee can engage in a proper public consultation, see what issues there are and see how those can be resolved.

Pam Cameron fails to understand why the issue needs rooted in legislation and wondered why we need legislation for something that there is no need to do. I contend that there certainly is a need and a demand for this among many rural dwellers, and not only those in Fermanagh. Some people think that it is only an issue there. It is not just an issue for Fermanagh. I had responses from every constituency in the North. People in rural communities, and, indeed, in many urban communities, are lamenting the fact that the townland-based system is being eroded, and it is being eroded because of the changes that took place in 1972 to amend the legislation to introduce road names. In the debate that took place in 2001 — 14 years ago — it was all well and good for Members to get up and blame Royal Mail. Everything was Royal Mail's fault or the Post Office's fault. It was not Royal Mail's fault at all. It was merely adhering to the legislation that was introduced. It was a legislative problem that a previous raft of reform of local government enacted. We now have a situation in which a legislative change can protect and promote townlands, and Members appear not to want to support that change, which I find a bit strange.

If the Bill moves to Committee Stage, hopefully the fuller public consultation that the Environment Committee will engage in will demonstrate that there is a level of public support for greater promotion and protection of townlands. I am confident that those who will engage in such a consultation will quickly see that there is a demand for this legislative change. Who knows? There may be issues raised out there about how we can better promote and protect townlands. Members opposite want to see a voluntary scheme, but they do not want to see any kind of a scheme set in statute. This would be a voluntary scheme even though it would be set in statute. We are not forcing anybody to do anything. Members opposite use phrases about why we cannot do this on a voluntary basis, but it would be done on a voluntary basis. We are opening up a mechanism to allow local councils to do this voluntarily if they so want. I have stated before that I am not forcing Belfast City Council or any other council to do something that it does not want to do. That would be wrong on an issue pertaining to the protection of culture and heritage. It would be done on a voluntary basis, but the councils need the legal protection to do it, and they need to be able to do it under a mechanism whereby citizens are not being disadvantaged by the change.

Pam also wanted to know what consultation took place with the emergency services and listed a pile of other organisations that she wanted to see consulted, including the Police Service, the Ambulance Service and the Fire Service. I want to put it on record that those organisations were all consulted. Their views were sought on the proposed legislative change. It may be the case that such organisations will be interested in participating in a more extensive consultation at Committee Stage, and that will be the best place for the Member to find out the views of the emergency services, instead of her standing up here speculating that those organisations will be opposed to such a change.

There is an element of doubt creeping in here around the suggestion that, if we use a roads-based system for allocating property numbers, there will never be a problem finding properties. In 2001, Eddie McGrady highlighted a case in which an ambulance driver stopped him in distress at not being able to find a property on a 10-mile stretch of road. That is the case across the North, where there are very lengthy pieces of road on which, unless you have local knowledge of where a house number specifically is or of where an individual lives, you will have problems using the roads-name-based system to find an address.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for giving way. That is a point that I wanted to raise with Mrs Cameron earlier in the debate, and I certainly contest that this is an issue only for Fermanagh. In my constituency of South Down, just outside Hilltown and Mayobridge, we have the townland of Leode — Leode Road — and the residents in that area refer to it all the time. They have trouble all the time with emergency services, which, for some reason when they look at Google Maps and satnav, see Cross Road.

Not one local resident refers to it as Cross Road, and that causes considerable problems. Emergency services have ended up in Crossmaglen, which is maybe 30 minutes away from the actual place. I put it on the record that this is not just a problem for Fermanagh but a problem right across the board. It is not the case that it will cause confusion; rather, in a lot of circumstances, it will go a long way towards helping to address confusion.

Mr Flanagan: That certainly highlights one of the challenges that we face across the North with addressing. It is clear that the people best placed to deal with addressing are the officials in LPS and the experts in building control in councils. I am not putting in any parameters for how issue property numbers or name roads. A sensible proposition coming out of the Chamber today is that councils are given the power not only to number properties, as they can do at the minute, along a road, a street, a cul-de-sac, a boulevard and all those other fancy types of street that have emerged in recent years but to go back to the historical system of townland names that was always used on this island.

I return to the emergency services issue. Whether a council uses a roads- or townlands-based system, the challenge will remain the same when trying to find a property in an emergency. That will not change. If you do not know where to find an individual property number along a 10-mile road, the best way to do that is to have an accurate GPS system that will bring you to it. Most emergency services and most people engaged in the delivery of services to houses now use GPS or some form of satnav to bring them there. As the Member for South Down indicated, that is not always 100% accurate, but it would be no less accurate in a townlands-based system than it would be in a roads-based system. If you do not have local knowledge, the only solution is to use GPS to find these places, unless you are willing to stop and ask for directions, which, unfortunately, we see emergency services having to do, even in areas where roads are used as a characteristic for finding properties.

We cannot expect everybody to know where every house in the countryside is, no matter what you do for a living. I suppose that there was a time when the parish priest knew where every house in the countryside was, and the postman might have a fair idea. However, as Mrs Overend indicated, even the police do not know where houses are. All those jobs are not now based in one area for a lifetime; you see people being rotated round various areas, whether they are clergymen or clergywomen, postmen, police officers or other emergency services personnel. The case that people do not know where every house is exists at the minute under the roads-based system. Introducing a townlands-based system would not make it any less efficient, and that problem, unfortunately, would remain under the current proposal. However, I will tell you what it would do: if an ambulance driver stopped and asked me where house number 297 was on a 13-mile road, for example, I would not have a clue, but, if you gave me an indication of the name of the townland, I could certainly tell you where the house was on that 13-mile stretch of road. That is how this change would have a positive benefit. All those issues are anecdotal and would need to be drawn out further at Committee Stage, if we want to find out how bad the problem is in the areas where a roads-based system has been adopted and whether moving to an optional townlands-based system would make it any worse.

Cathal Boylan said that he was proud to come from the townland of Caramoyle. He highlighted the fact that, when you look at headstones around graveyards, you can see the common usage of townland names by previous generations. If I had a time machine, it might be interesting to travel forward 50 years and look at people's headstones, because when I look at —

Mr Weir: Still no united Ireland.

Mr Flanagan: Sorry, does the Member want to make an intervention? No? I thank the Member for his contribution; I wish him well.

If we were to travel forward 50 years in a time machine, Peter Weir would probably still be over there as the Whip of the DUP.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Yes.

Mr Weir: I am glad that, even in his speech, the Member is willing to acknowledge that, 50 years from now, we will still be in an Assembly in, obviously, a partitionist state. Clearly, even within 50 years, there will not be a united Ireland.

Mr Flanagan: I will return to the debate before Mr Beggs gets out of the Chair and gets too excited. Who knows what this lovely room will be used for in 50 years' time? I doubt that it will be used as a regional Parliament in the north of Ireland, anyway.

I return to the issue of townlands. If we were to travel forward 50 years in time and go round graveyards, would the headstones of people buried now read, "This is such-and-such from such-and-such a townland", or would they read, "This is such-and-such from number 155 on some random road"? Those are the anomalies that have resulted in recent years from the change. Will we stand idly by and allow this reduction in our culture and heritage to happen? Townlands are a part of us all. They are where we come from and where we take our sense of identity. I do not take my sense of identity from the name of a road, but I take it from a townland. I am conscious that many people in our society do likewise.

Cathal also highlighted the fact that he was concerned that the younger generation in particular had little or no understanding of the townlands in which they live. That is the rationale behind the proposed legislative change: it would cement the use of townlands in council areas that decided to implement it. In my view, there is no better way to increase awareness of townlands than to have them as the principal part of the addressing system. As I said at the start, not all councils will implement and adopt the change, so something else needs to happen in those other areas. However, the mechanism of allowing councils to number properties in a townland, returning townlands to the heart of the address, would go a long way to restoring townlands in many areas.

Cathal made a useful contribution when he welcomed the efforts of many local and central government agencies to increase their use of townlands but said that he believed that, without legislation, the usage of townlands was inconsistent. He said that he supported the Bill as it would help to ensure that future generations would be able to use and understand their townlands.

We had situations here in the past where MLAs told us that our townland was on our driving licence, but it is not on everybody's driving licence. If there is room for it or if the DVLA or the DOE can be bothered putting it on, it will put it on, but it is not a hard and fast rule.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Member for giving way. On his comments about inconsistency, surely, if the legislation were passed and councils had the choice of whether to implement it or not, you would still have inconsistency.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for her intervention. I do not necessarily get the point that she makes; maybe she is making the point that, if some council areas adopt it and others do not, there will not be a uniform system across the North. Is that the point that you are making?

Mrs Cameron: Yes.

Mr Flanagan: OK. I appreciate that. Maybe it is an argument, but why do we need a uniform system in every district council area? Why can we not allow councils to decide how best to issue property numbers? Surely, they know what their people want better than anybody else. If I were to tell a Member of the House that they did not represent their constituents and that somebody else should make those decisions, that is effectively the same as telling councillors and local government officers that they are not best placed to make the decisions, even though it is they who have the statutory responsibility for issuing property numbers.

Mrs Overend: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: In one second, Sandra. All we are doing is — Jesus, there's the heavy hitters now — enhancing the ability of councillors and councils to offer property numbers in a townlands-based system. I do not think that there is any problem there with having one system in one area and a different system in another area.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Member for giving way. On that issue, I foresee a problem. For instance, my postal address is Portglenone, which is a County Antrim address. It is part of the mid and east Antrim area; yet, I actually live in County Londonderry. So there is a conflict there. I foresee that sort of problem.

Mr Flanagan: I suppose the problem there is that the Member's postal town is not actually a town in her council area. That will not be addressed by this issue, but it is an anomaly that happens right across the board. I used to work in Newry, and I used to see people from Crossmaglen coming in, and their address was Crossmaglen, Newry, County Down. People in Crossmaglen, I would imagine, do not like being told that they live in County Down, but that is what Royal Mail tells them.

Mr McCarthy: What is wrong with County Down?

Mr Flanagan: There is plenty wrong with it, Kieran. Pete McGrath is a top man, though.

The problem there is not with this system. Mrs Overend highlights a problem that exists already. This legislation would not make that any worse. It might not make it any better, but it does not change it. The problem that you highlight already exists, and the proposed change would not be the cause of that problem. I contend that your postal town should be your postal town, not one in a different county. That is a serious problem, but it is not something that this legislation is looking at.

Dominic Bradley, in his contribution, highlighted some of his favourite townlands in his area and said that locked within our townland names is a wealth of history. He highlighted that reading some of the excellent publications of the Place-Name Project unearthed our rich history. There then ensued a dispute between two Members from Newry and Armagh about the etymology of the townland of Caramoyle, and I am certainly not going to get involved in that dispute.

4.15 pm

Dominic lamented the fact that a previous Finance Minister, who he says knew the price of everything and the value of nothing, could not find the match funding to sustain the Place-Names Project. I certainly agree with that. I remember having correspondence with and meeting those behind the Place-Names Project at the time and getting some understanding of the benefit of that project in increasing the awareness and understanding of townlands across the North, particularly in areas where they had been allowed to fall into disuse. It was not so much in places like Fermanagh, Armagh or Tyrone but in other rural areas where townlands really were not on the agenda as such. They carried out an extensive project on getting the actual meaning of townland names and letting people in those townlands understand the origins of the word. We should consider looking at the Place-Names Project again. Dominic highlighted that townlands tell us not only about the topography of an area but about the people who once dwelt in it. You have townland names that are derived from the geographic nature of an area but also townlands that get their name from the people who resided in it at one stage.

Dominic highlighted something that I forgot to mention during my earlier contribution: the importance of townlands to lodges of the Orange Order. He said that the Orange Order is doing its bit to support townlands. I raised that issue during my contribution at the Environment Committee. I certainly agree with him, and if the Orange Order is doing its bit for townlands, I certainly think that we, as a legislative Assembly, should be doing our bit as well.

Dominic referenced the work carried out in many areas across the North to highlight townlands using attractive stones and markers. That approach was never needed in Fermanagh because of the central point of townlands on one's address; we did not need stones to mark it out. It is worth exploring that in areas where townlands are not well understood and where people do not know what townland they live in. Despite what Members say, I know an awful lot of people outside Fermanagh who do not know what a townland is or what townland they live in. So, anybody who tells me that there is no need for this legislative change and that we do not need greater protection for townlands is, frankly, arguing from a point of ignorance. Dominic also said that, in some areas, townland names are not as prominent as they could be. In my opinion, the Bill would put them back into pole position in the areas that adopt this change.

Dominic concluded by asking what account had been taken of the Good Friday Agreement and the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages. I will be honest: it was not to the fore of my mind when developing the legislation, and I specifically left out any reference to language at all because I knew that that would be the issue that some Members would run with. This is purely about the culture and heritage of townlands; it has absolutely nothing to do with the Irish language or with any other language. So, I remind any Member across the way who wants to throw that up as an issue that I deliberately left out any reference to the Irish language in the Bill in order to try to get cross-party support on what is a non-contentious issue.

I will turn to Sandra Overend's contribution. Sandra alleged that she has experienced no problem in getting her townland onto official addresses. Well, she must be the only one. I would be interested to see her bank statements, her driving licence, her mobile phone bill, her BT bill and other such correspondence because, frankly, I do not believe her. There are so many people trying to get their townlands onto such correspondence but who cannot do it, and it does not wash for one Member to say, "Well, I have no problem doing it and I do not see the problem here". Maybe Sandra will produce those for me at a later stage.

Sandra also said that she does not see why anyone would abandon the current situation. I say to the Member that the current process of numbering properties along a road name may be effective and efficient, but it has led to the decline of townlands. It has been highlighted in several debates in the Chamber, and outside it, how the numbering of properties along road names and abolishing the system of numbering them in a townland has had a direct impact on the preservation of townland names. This legislative change would, hopefully, reverse that in some areas.

Sandra then raised some practical matters not contained in the Bill, such as where we would start with the numbering in a townland. Once again, I deliberately left that out because I wanted the Bill to be as simple and straightforward as it could be; and the guidance and advice that came, particularly from DOE officials and officials in the Bill Office, was that the best course of action was to place a duty on DFP to issue guidance to councils on how to carry out the process of numbering properties. I say to the Member that where we start in a townland and whether you go clockwise, counterclockwise or up and down a road is purely a matter for the councils, taking into consideration the advice of DFP and the expert knowledge that each council has through its building control officers, because they are the people who know best how to decide on those matters. They are the experts in issuing numbers to houses and other properties. That is where we should leave the power. We should not be stipulating in the Bill how councils number properties. There is no stipulation in the Bill that odd numbers have to be on one side of the road and even numbers on the other. There is no stipulation that you have to start with the lowest numbers on the side of the road closest to your local post office or town hall or east or west. That is not stipulated in the Bill at the minute. The proposal I am bringing forward does not seek to amend or enhance that in any way. What it does do is call for the Department of Finance and Personnel to introduce guidance so that officers, when making those decisions, and councillors, when deciding on them, will do so with the best expert knowledge.

Sandra again raised the issue of the emergency services. I am amazed if Sandra is really that naive to think that there are no problems using the current roads-based system on roads that are 10 or 13 miles long. She also raised the issue of additional cost. There is going to be no additional cost to the Executive from this legislative change. The only additional cost is going to be for LPS, which will have to draft guidance for councils. It is not that cumbersome a process.

Mrs Overend stated that she does not want to give the townland primacy, which is an approach that I am reluctant to hear but it really sets the rest of her comments in context. She falsely claimed that I want to go back to the previous unauthorised situation. She must not have been listening to my contribution today or when I appeared before the Environment Committee. I have clearly outlined that I do not want an unregulated system. I want councils to be able to adopt an authorised system where townlands can officially be the primary part of an address-based system. Mrs Overend simply says she does not support that, and that is fine. Her opposition is clear and she should not introduce irrelevant issues into this debate to justify her stance.

Turning to the points of Mr Girvan; Paul rightly said that the current postcode system works well. I do not disagree with him. I do not propose to change that. Mr Girvan seems to use a satnav a lot, therefore finding properties would not be problem for him regardless of whether we used a road- or townlands-based system as he and others, like me, who use GPS technology would be directed straight to the property in question.

Mr Girvan referenced property numbers at the bottom of lanes. Maybe he is not aware that it is an offence not to display one's number at the end of one's lane. One is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 2 on the standard scale. Maybe he is already compliant with the law, maybe not. Either way, I have no intention of changing that.

Mr Girvan talked frequently about the Seven Mile road. I would be interested to know whether it is seven miles long or is it like most other roads that have no relation to the local community. I would hazard a guess that it is not seven miles long and takes its name like other roads where they just pick a random thing off the top of their heads and call the road that.

Mr Girvan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Very quickly, Paul, aye.

Mr Girvan: It is actually called the Seven Mile Straight but it is longer than seven miles. There is a seven-mile straight part of that road and that is why it is called the Seven Mile Straight but the road is longer than seven miles. [Laughter.]

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for that contribution. I am sure he drives with manners on it.

I was amazed at the tone adopted by some Members. I genuinely cannot understand Mr Girvan claiming that some people are engaged in a cultural war here. People like Jim Shannon called for the greater promotion of townlands. Is Mr Girvan alleging that Jim Shannon is engaged in a cultural war? I do not think that Jim would be that happy about that. [Laughter.]

Mr Girvan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: No, I won't, Paul.

Mr Girvan uses language like cultural war when we are talking about something that is shared between all of us. It is something that is shared between all the communities on this island, including the Orange Order. He does himself no favours when he uses rhetoric like that. It has absolutely no foundation in reality.

Mr Girvan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Very quickly, Paul.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Member for giving way. I used the term because a number of the townlands have been anglicized. Unfortunately, we know the way that has ended up, with street names being turned into Irish all over the place. You see street names that have Irish names on them, and Mr Bradley said that he would be keen for Irish names to be used as opposed to the anglicized names.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his contribution. I agree with Mr Bradley: I would love to see the reintroduction of Irish as our native language but if the Member reads the Bill, that is not what we are debating. We are debating the reintroduction of townlands. The use of the Irish language is not contained in the Bill. I deliberately left it out, hoping that nobody would go on a random tangent as the Member did. Unfortunately, it is hard to hold people back.

One of Mr Girvan's final comments was that GPS systems do not recognise townlands. He is wrong, but if he were right, surely that demonstrates the need for this change to be made.

I think that we have perhaps debated this issue long enough for today. I hope that this is not the final debate on the matter. Each of us knows where the other stands on the issue, and we can now put it to a vote. I hope that Members will support the Bill and allow it to progress to Committee Stage. I thank Members for their contributions to the debate, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Ministerial Statement

November Monitoring Round: 2015-16

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

Thank you for the opportunity, Mr Speaker, to update the Assembly on the outcome of the November monitoring round. As Members will be aware, this is the first full Executive public expenditure monitoring round this year, with the planned June and October rounds not having taken place owing to the failure to implement the Stormont House Agreement and deal with welfare reform.

Following yesterday's agreement, 'A Fresh Start: The Stormont Agreement and Implementation Plan', I am now in a position to deliver a 2015-16 in-year monitoring round on the basis that the Stormont House Agreement will be implemented in full and welfare reform introduced in a manner that is tailored to meet the specific needs of the people of Northern Ireland.

Agreement to the budgetary flexibilities negotiated in the Stormont House Agreement has provided the certainty needed for the Executive to agree an in-year monitoring position aimed at addressing the outstanding issues facing departmental budgets in this year. I always said that failing to deal with welfare reform was having a devastating impact on this year's Budget. I had to write to Executive colleagues requesting that no further expenditure be made on discretionary programmes. All Departments have had to make difficult decisions, and we have seen the impact that that has had on the services that they deliver, whether in our schools, health systems or our ability to cut the grass at the sides of the roads. I am pleased to say that, as a result of yesterday's agreement, we are able to prioritise spending for our health system, the roads and the education system.

Before I go into the detail of the monitoring round, it is worth pointing out that the focus continues to be on non-ring-fenced resource items, which I will hereafter simply refer to as resource expenditure or resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL). The Executive still monitor the ring-fenced resource and administration expenditure positions, and those are included in the tables attached to the statement.

The key issue for the Executive in strategic financial management in this financial year will be managing the overall position to allow the Executive to live within Her Majesty's Treasury's control totals for the 2015-16 year, whilst ensuring that any underspend falls within Budget exchange limits of 0.6% of resource DEL and 1.5% of capital DEL.

As Members will be aware, the Budget for 2015-16 was predicated on the financial package that was negotiated under the Stormont House Agreement. Had the Stormont House Agreement fallen, the Executive would have lost the flexibility to repay the £114 million cost of not implementing welfare reform and the £100 million reserve claim in 2014-15 from asset sales and capital budgets, which would have created a significant resource DEL pressure. I am pleased that, as a result of the recent intensive political discussions, the budgetary flexibilities that were agreed last year at Stormont House will stand.

The starting point for this monitoring round is the June monitoring technical exercise, which was previously agreed by the Executive and notified to the Assembly, and which concluded with an overcommitment on resource DEL of £1.7 million, with £10.3 million of capital DEL unallocated. Following the June monitoring technical exercise, the First Minister and deputy First Minister agreed in September to an allocation of £13.3 million in capital DEL to DCAL through the urgent procedure mechanism to facilitate the progression of the regional stadiums programme. That resulted in a small overcommitment of £3 million in respect of capital DEL.

Before detailing a number of adjustments to centrally held items, I would like to update members on the public sector transformation fund. Members will recall that, as part of the Stormont House Agreement, the Executive agreed a comprehensive programme of public sector restructuring and reform. One of the specific measures included the flexibility to use up to £700 million of borrowing under the reinvestment and reform initiative to fund voluntary exit schemes across the public sector. The public sector transformation fund is to be available over four years, with £200 million in 2015-16, £200 million in 2016-17, £200 million in 2017-18 and £100 million in 2018-19. Those annual limits are firmly set by Her Majesty's Treasury with no across-year flexibility. Not all of the fund may be required, as drawdown may be dependent upon demand by public-sector organisations. The public sector restructuring steering group, which is chaired by the head of the Civil Service, was created by the Executive to oversee the process for allocating funding.

In recognition of the significant savings arising from the voluntary exit scheme, the Secretary of State agreed in September that the Executive could access that funding for 2015-16. The various schemes have been proceeding on that basis. However, the November monitoring round provides the first opportunity to provide details of allocations in individual schemes. Full details are set out in the tables that accompany the statement.

Returning to the issue of the resources available to the Executive in the November monitoring round, a number of adjustments were made to centrally held items, which impacted on the overall financial position in this monitoring round. I would like to highlight these items next.

The Budget exchange scheme allows the Executive to carry forward and draw down end-of-year underspends up to a limit that is agreed with Her Majesty's Treasury. The 2014-15 provisional out-turn position indicated that we would draw down £47.9 million of resource DEL and £10.7 million of capital DEL in this financial year under the Budget exchange scheme. That assumption was factored into the June monitoring technical exercise. However, the Budget exchange scheme requires the devolved Administrations to adjust drawdown to the final out-turn position, which is known only once departmental accounts have been finalised. Due to the timing of this monitoring round, the final out-turn position has yet to be confirmed with Her Majesty's Treasury. However, the latest position indicates that there was an additional resource DEL underspend in 2014-15 at block level of £0.4 million, whilst, on capital DEL, the underspend was £2.4 million less than was declared at the provisional out-turn. The additional resource DEL will now be available in this monitoring round, whilst the reduction in the capital DEL underspend will create a pressure to be addressed in this round. Crucially, the level of underspend that is anticipated remains within the overall Budget exchange scheme limits and the position remains that no resources have been lost to Northern Ireland.

A reduction in the level of EU match funding that is required by Departments for EU Peace and INTERREG programmes has resulted in £8 million of resource DEL and £1.1 million of capital DEL being surrendered from the centrally held budget. This funding becomes available for allocation in this round.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's summer Budget resulted in Barnett consequentials totalling £2.6 million resource DEL and £0.1 million capital DEL. Whilst the amount has yet to be confirmed by HM Treasury, the council tax freeze has resulted in a Barnett consequential that is expected to be in the region of £5.5 million, which can also be taken into account in this round.

Colleagues will recall that the Executive set a capital receipts target of £50 million this year. The June monitoring technical exercise included adjustments totalling £21.8 million to departmental budgets, leaving a target of £28.2 million to be realised over the remainder of this year. The latest update from the asset management unit indicates that a further £3.3 million relating to the sale of various surplus assets can now be factored into the DRD budget in this monitoring round. This, combined with a £0.8 million adjustment to the amount allocated to DFP in the June monitoring technical exercise, means that there remains £25.7 million of the £50 million target unrealised. Whilst the asset management unit has identified a number of other opportunities to generate additional capital income, there is significant risk attached to their delivery in the current financial year. The Executive have therefore agreed that the £25.7 million should be taken into account as a capital DEL pressure in this monitoring round.

Members will recall that the Executive agreed to set aside £26.9 million resource DEL in 2015-16 for measures to alleviate the worst impacts of welfare reform. Delay in implementing welfare reform means that this funding is no longer required for the purpose intended in 2015-16 and is now available for reallocation in this monitoring round.

Members will recall from the 2013-14 January monitoring round that, as part of an agreement to provide £35 million of ring-fenced financial transactions capital funding to the Ulster University for its greater Belfast development, the university agreed to return £7 million to the Executive from its accumulated reserves, with £3.5 million to be returned in this year and a further £3.5 million in 2016-17. The Executive have now received the £3.5 million relating to this year, and that can be made available for reallocation in this round.

There was also a small pressure of £0.6 million resource DEL relating to the salaries of individuals working in statutory bodies that must be taken into account now, whilst OFMDFM has advised that £7.2 million of capital DEL relating to the social investment fund will not be required in this year and therefore becomes available for reallocation by the Executive.

As a result of these changes, we start the monitoring round with £44.6 million of resource DEL available and an overcommitment of £22.7 million on capital DEL. That is before the departmental reduced requirements, reclassifications and internal reallocations are taken into account.

Departments declared reduced requirements in this monitoring round of £33 million in resource expenditure and £20.4 million in capital investment. Full details are included in the tables provided. Members will note that the reduced requirements declared by the Department for Employment and Learning include £4.5 million relating to the FE college end-year flexibility (EYF) scheme. This will be added to the 2015-16 opening stock of £14.3 million, meaning a stock of £18.8 million is carried forward into 2016-17.

Under the terms of the economic pact, the UK Government agreed that the Executive could access an additional £100 million of reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing, spread over three years, for shared education and housing schemes. Allocations in this year totalled £26.8 million, comprising £11.8 million to DE, £5 million to DEL and £10 million to DSD. Departments have declared reduced requirements relating to schemes funded through this initiative totalling £15.7 million in this monitoring round. Full details of these reduced requirements are in the accompanying tables. As this funding is ring-fenced for specific shared education and housing schemes, it cannot be reallocated by the Executive in 2015-16.

It is good practice that Departments seek to manage any emerging pressures internally before bringing forward bids for additional allocations. Whilst the public expenditure control framework allows Departments scope to undertake many such movements on a unilateral basis, movements across spending areas in excess of the de minimis threshold are subject to Executive approval.

In some instances, Departments have also sought permission to move allocations across spending areas to facilitate the transfer of responsibility for a particular function from one business area to another. The internal reallocations agreed by the Executive in this monitoring round are included in the tables for information.

10.45 am

The Executive also agreed a number of reclassifications between the resource and capital categories in this round. There were also reclassifications between the ring-fenced and non-ring-fenced resource DEL categories. Again, those reclassifications are shown in the tables.

All the issues that I have outlined impacted on the amount of resource available to the Executive in this monitoring round. Taking into account the starting position, the reduced requirements and reclassifications resulted in £77.4 million on resource DEL being available to the Executive and an overcommitment of £2.1 million on capital DEL. Before turning to the bids submitted by Departments in the monitoring round, I will update Members on ring-fenced financial transactions capital (FTC) and the Executive's central funds.

The Executive's Budget for 2015-16 included ring-fenced financial transactions capital allocations of £129 million this year, including £40.9 million set aside for the Northern Ireland investment fund. Following a number of further allocations to Departments in the June monitoring technical exercise from funding held for the Northern Ireland investment fund, we enter the November monitoring round with £11.7 million set aside for that purpose. Departments have declared a number of reduced requirements on ring-fenced financial transactions capital, totalling £61.7 million. Details are provided in the tables.

My officials continue to work towards establishing a Northern Ireland investment fund. Progress to date includes the conclusion of the Deloitte feasibility study and further market testing to determine the potential structure and scope of the fund. However, a significant amount of technically complex work remains to be done before the fund can become operational, and DFP officials continue to engage with the European Investment Bank on those work streams. The outstanding work includes, among other things, development of an investment strategy for the fund; determination of the appropriate governance structure; development of the fund manager procurement strategy; and the fund manager procurement process. The latest discussions with the European Investment Bank suggest that that outstanding work is expected to take at least nine to 12 months to complete. Therefore, the proposed fund will not be able to avail itself of financial transactions capital until the next financial year. As a consequence, the £11.7 million held for that purpose is now available for reallocation.

As a result, the reduced requirements declared in this round, combined with funding held for the Northern Ireland investment fund not being required, mean that the Executive now have £73.4 million of ring-fenced financial transactions capital available for reallocation in this round. Departments have submitted bids in this monitoring round for ring-fenced financial transactions capital of £85 million, including £75 million from DSD for co-ownership housing and £10 million from DEL for the Queen's University school of law and integrated student hub. Details are provided in the tables.

The Executive have agreed allocations of ring-fenced financial transactions capital in this round totalling £73.4 million, including £63.4 million to DSD for co-ownership housing and £10 million to OFMDFM for the Queen's University school of law and integrated student hub.

Colleagues will recall from previous monitoring rounds that DEL does not have the legislative authority to issue loans to private-sector entities. The Executive have agreed that, consistent with previous FTC allocations to DEL, the allocation to Queen's University in this monitoring round should be processed by the Strategic Investment Board (SIB). Therefore, the allocation is made to OFMDFM. Taking account of that allocation, the Executive exit the November monitoring round with no ring-fenced financial transactions capital unallocated.

Members will recall that, in Budget 2015-16, the Executive set aside £11 million resource DEL and £15 million capital DEL for the social investment fund in this financial year. In addition, the Executive set aside £3 million resource DEL for this year to fund childcare strategy initiatives. A number of allocations were agreed in the June monitoring technical exercise, which concluded with £1 million resource DEL and £7.5 million capital DEL on the social investment fund, and £1.6 million resource DEL relating to the childcare strategy remaining unallocated.

While no funding was specifically set aside for the Delivering Social Change programme or the Atlantic Philanthropies programme in the Budget 2015-16, the Executive, at the request of OFMDFM, have agreed to flexibility in this monitoring round to fund them from money set aside for the social investment fund and the childcare strategy.

OFMDFM has confirmed allocations to Departments in this monitoring round totalling £2.6 million of resource DEL. That includes £1 million to the Department of Health, £1 million to DE and £0.6 million to OFMDFM, with £0.3 million capital DEL also being transferred to OFMDFM. Those allocations will fund a combination of Delivering Social Change, the social investment fund and Atlantic Philanthropies programmes. Those transfers mean that there is no resource DEL and £7.2 million of capital DEL remaining in the social investment fund for 2015-16. That has been returned to the Executive for reallocation in this round. No resource DEL funding is available under the childcare fund following this monitoring round.

Budget 2015-16 set aside £10 million of resource DEL for the Together: Building a United Community programme. Following a number of allocations agreed in the June monitoring technical exercise, the November monitoring round commences with £1.9 million of resource DEL unallocated from the Together: Building a United Community fund. That has been supplemented by funding returned from a number of programmes totalling £0.2 million, making £2.1 million available for allocation in this round. OFMDFM has confirmed allocations totalling £2.1 million under the Together: Building a United Community programme to be processed in this round, including £1.8 million to OFMDFM and £0.3 million to DCAL. Those transfers mean that there is no resource DEL remaining in that fund.

Against the available resources, Departments submitted bids amounting to £91.4 million in respect of resource DEL and £59.9 million in respect of capital DEL. Those bids are detailed in the tables.

Members will be aware that I have warned about the significant financial pressures facing the Executive's Budget this year. In view of that, I wrote to Executive colleagues early in this financial year, advising them to halt expenditure on discretionary programmes. That action taken by Ministers to contain spend in the year, combined with access to the budgetary flexibilities detailed in the Stormont House Agreement and the UK Government's agreement to access the funding necessary to progress the public-sector voluntary exit scheme, has meant the pressures facing the Executive's Budget this year have been contained. That has been reflected in the level of resources available for allocation in this monitoring round and the level of bids submitted by Departments. I am pleased that Ministers have taken action to contain spend on lower priority programmes as that now provides the Executive with an opportunity to make a number of allocations in line with their priorities.

The Executive have agreed allocations in this monitoring round totalling £87.4 million of resource DEL and £13.7 million of capital DEL. Full details of the allocations are contained in the tables, so I will only highlight some of the main ones. There is a £47.6 million allocation of resource DEL to the Department of Health to address a number of the significant pressures facing the health service relating to elective care and diagnostics, psychological therapies and unscheduled care and other services. There is a £19.1 million allocation of resource DEL to DRD for roads maintenance, concessionary fares and community transport plus £5 million of capital DEL for structural maintenance of roads. There is an allocation of £15 million of resource DEL to the Department of Education for drawdown of school surpluses, estate management and special educational needs. There is also an allocation of £3.9 million of resource DEL allocated to DARD for TB compensation costs.

I would also like to update Members on the schools end-year flexibility scheme, which allows schools to either draw down or increase their reserves. The stock of school reserves carried forward from 2014-15 amounted to £41.7 million. The Department of Education has been allocated the £5 million requested in this monitoring round from that stock. As a consequence, the schools' EYF stock carried into 2016-17 is £36.7 million.

Following the allocations detailed, the Executive exited this monitoring round with a £10 million overcommitment in respect of resource DEL and £15.8 million on capital DEL. In addition, £24.4 million of resource DEL ring-fenced for depreciation and impairments remains unallocated. However, due to the ring-fenced nature of that fund, it is not available for reallocation by the Executive.

The uncertainties relating to the Executive's budgetary position in 2015-16 have been clarified through the talks process, and Ministers have taken action to contain expenditure in this year. As a consequence, the Executive have, through this monitoring round, been able to address some high-priority departmental pressures, not least in the health service and ensuring that our roads network remains fit for purpose. I believe that the Executive are now on course to live within their 2015-16 spending controls. However, I will continue to closely monitor the position through the remainder of this year.

The Executive have agreed that, unless circumstances merit a further monitoring round, this will be the final Executive monitoring round in 2015-16. However, it has been agreed that a technical monitoring round should take place in early January without recourse to the Executive. That will provide Departments with an opportunity to adjust their budgets within Executive agreed allocations ahead of the spring Supplementary Estimates process. That exercise, as a one-off, will provide Departments, subject to DFP approval, with flexibility to process proactive reductions and internal reallocations without recourse to the Executive, providing greater flexibility to manage emerging pressures over the course of this year.

It is now critical that the Executive turn their attention to agreeing a Budget for 2016-17. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will announce the outcome of the UK Government's spending review on 25 November. That will detail the Executive's settlement for the coming years. Following that, I will bring a paper to the Executive on the Budget before Christmas. The Executive have previously agreed that the Budget should be developed based on the planned new nine-Department structure. It is also my preference that we agree a one-year Budget, thus providing the new incoming Executive, following next year's Assembly elections, with an opportunity to develop a longer-term Budget, in line with their Programme for Government. However, I recognise that, in relation to a number of large capital infrastructure projects, it may be necessary to provide some certainty on longer-term Budget allocations through the upcoming Budget process.

With that, I commend the statement to the Assembly.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I start by congratulating the Minister and all those involved in reaching the agreement, particularly for securing protections for welfare claimants and also help for families on tax credits. That is something that many other jurisdictions do not have. I am sure that many families in a similar situation in places like England would greatly appreciate a similar support mechanism being put in place.

The Minister made reference to longer-term Budgets, and we need to start to look towards 2016-2021. Does the Minister agree that we need to ensure that we get corporation tax right? In the event of a corporation tax reduction, as outlined in the agreement, what efforts will the Minister undertake to ensure that VAT and other revenues generated by a corporation tax reduction, which will go to London, will come back to the Executive, where they rightly belong?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his comments and, indeed, his warm welcome for the agreement that was reached yesterday. He is, of course, right to point out that we will have a very generous welfare scheme here within the United Kingdom and that we will support hard-working families who have been targeted in relation to tax-credit cuts. That was something that we felt very strongly about on this side of the House, as he knows.

In relation to corporation tax, I am of course only too delighted that we have been able to set the date and the rate for April 2018 at 12.5%. That will allow Invest Northern Ireland and, indeed, Ministers to now go out across the globe and sell Northern Ireland as a good place to do business, as it always has been, but it now opens more doors to the companies that, heretofore, have not been open to us. So, this gives us a tremendous tool to go out and look for more foreign direct investment.

11.00 am

As he will know, because the main rate of corporation tax in the United Kingdom has fallen, the cost of corporation tax being cut here in Northern Ireland will also have fallen, and therefore the cost to the block grant will not be as large as it was when the main rate was higher. We are continuing to speak with Treasury about the cost of corporation tax. The full cost, of course, does not come out until year 3. Until then, it is a graduated cut to our block grant. The Office for Budget Responsibility (OBR) has indicated that the resource DEL will start to grow again by year 3, 2020-21. That is the year in which our resource budget will start to grow again, so that is to be welcomed.

Secondary benefits is an issue that we continue to talk to Treasury about. He is right to say that, if we are growing the economy here in Northern Ireland, we should take some benefit from that in the receipts that come. That is something that we will continue to talk to Treasury about.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for the many welcome announcements in her statement. We are all aware of the pressures that have faced the health sector over the last number of months. The announcement that it is to receive an additional £47 million is really good news. Can the Minister outline what impact this will have on the health service?

Mrs Foster: I must say that all my colleagues across the parties acknowledged that there was a need to deal with the pressures in the Health Department. It was at the top of our priorities when we went to look at the allocations. So, £40 million of the allocation will go to elective care and diagnostics, £1.6 million will go to psychological therapies and £6 million will go to unscheduled care and other services. I know that my colleague the Minister of Health has been working very hard to make sure that the money that has been allocated to the Department of Health will make a real impact on the lives of real people. That is something that the House should very much welcome.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement. I, too, welcome the £47.6 million for the health service. The Minister mentioned £6 million to be invested in unscheduled care and other services. I would like to ask the Minister this: will this investment ensure that hospital emergency departments, like the emergency department in Daisy Hill hospital in Newry, have the staff to operate on a 24-hour basis and free from the threat of closure or partial closure? That is a way in which that investment would, as the Minister said, affect the lives of real people.

Mrs Foster: I welcome his congratulations on the amount of money that is going to the Department of Health. Some £4 million of the £6 million for unscheduled care and other services will be going to deal with winter pressures, which we know occur every year and, therefore, need to plan for. In all, the money that has been allocated to the Department of Health will mean that we will be able to put in place 40,000 assessments and around 15,000 operations and procedures. That is a tremendously good news story for people right across Northern Ireland. Regardless of where you live or access your hospital care, we are now going to be able to make those available to people. If the Member has very specific issues about hospitals in his constituency, I suggest that he raises those with the Minister of Health.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for her statement. She must be pleased, as I am, that it is not as bad as was anticipated. There are two points, Minister. The first is on the November monitoring outcome. You referred to £24.4 million of resource DEL not being capable of being reallocated. Does that mean that it will have to be returned? Is she aware that DCAL had an under-commitment of some £600,000 for depreciation for the last year brought forward? Maybe she will say a few words about where the financial transactions capital is sitting at the moment.

Mrs Foster: I will take the last point first. As I indicated, all the financial transactions capital has been allocated. The larger amount of it has been allocated to the Department for Social Development for co-ownership housing, although it could have taken even more — £10 million more, I think — if I had had the money available to me in the financial transactions capital. Ten million pounds goes to Queen's University for a new school of law and an integrated student hub. So, absolutely no money from the financial transactions capital is unallocated. I am pleased about that, given that quite a bit of financial transactions capital had come back from Departments into the centre.

In terms of the money that cannot be reallocated, that is money that is ring-fenced to deal with non-cash pressures relating to depreciation and impairments. It is very strictly monitored by Her Majesty's Treasury. There are no unmet ring-fenced pressures, and the unallocated £24.4 million cannot be used or reallocated to the Executive to meet pressures outside the ring fence. That much is very clear.

I am sure that the Ulster Unionist Party will want to join me in congratulating the First Minister and the deputy First Minister on the financial package that they achieved under the Stormont Agreement, because, of course, there is absolutely no new borrowing in that package. It is all real money. Therefore I know that the Ulster Unionist Party will welcome that, given that it had indicated that there was going to be £0.5 billion of borrowing. Of course, that is not the case. It is a good day, because we can move ahead with real money in the package that was announced yesterday.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for her statement. In previous years, moneys have traditionally bridged financial gaps in health funding. We welcome the addition of the money announced today to Health. Has the Minister any concerns about trusts' capacity to spend that money this late in the financial year, as, obviously, we want all of it to be used to make a real difference to patients?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for her question. Indeed, the Health Minister, along with me and others, has been working on a plan to deal with waiting lists for some months, despite what others may have been saying. We have been planning and preparing in the hope of achieving what we have achieved today — the allocation of £47 million to the Department of Health. We will work to ensure that as many people as possible have access to operations and procedures, but we will have to work within the capacity that we have. We will use everything that we can to make sure that we allow as many people as possible to be dealt with in the coming weeks and months, because we realise — it would be wrong of us not to acknowledge — that there have been tremendous pressures on people's lives. People have been told that they will have to wait a very long time for operations and assessment; therefore, we need to be able to deal with those people as quickly as possible. So, yes, we have been working on a plan. The Minister of Health, along with his officials, has been preparing for this day, and I know that he is very happy that this day has come.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister for her comprehensive statement. She said that there would be additional funding and money for the Roads Service. How will that assist in the fixing and mending of our roads, not least in Fermanagh and South Tyrone?

Mrs Foster: May I join the Member in urging the Minister for Regional Development to make sure that she has due regard to the very important constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone when she comes to deal with her budget? Unfortunately, the capital DEL position remains constrained. Members will see that from the figures that I outlined today.

It has limited the capacity for the Executive to make significant allocations in relation to that area. However, we have agreed allocations of £5 million in capital DEL. We hope that that will be helpful not only to road users and those of us who travel long distances every day but to the construction industry. That industry has had huge pressure on it over the past couple of years. We hope that that money will give some help to them. We have also been able to allocate £16.5 million, a not insubstantial amount of money, for roads maintenance. I am sure that the Department will be happy to receive that; I know that the Minister certainly is. Again, that will hopefully provide a small boost. We realise that it is a small boost, but hopefully it is an indication of things to come.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom comhghairdeas a dhéanamh leis an Aire agus leis na páirtithe uile ar éirigh leo teacht ar an chomhréiteach seo. I want to add my congratulations to those parties and my colleagues who put together this good deal. I hope that it is — I am confident that it will be — a fresh start.

The Minister mentioned the Chancellor's next move on 25 November. I have no doubt that he is still wedded to his austerity ideology, but I think that we have made a great job of trying to force back that assault, especially on the less well off.

I want to ask about the very good news for Queen's University. I was to meet the vice chancellor at 3.00 pm but had to cancel. He is pleased that he is getting a £10 million cheque. It will do something to get him over the disappointment of missing the meeting. That is good news.

I want to ask a broader question about investment and investor sentiment because last week I met Dan Sten Olsson, the chief executive officer of Stena Line, which will bring two new ferries into Belfast in 2018-19. The big message from him, Minister, was to build confidence, create stability and show that you are united around creating jobs for the future and a better society for all. Does the Minister believe that today's statement and last night's agreement will build the type of confidence that we need in this region and society?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his commentary and, indeed, his question on these issues. I have listened very carefully to some of the naysayers on the agreement. They cannot take away from the fact that there is no doubt that the agreement that was reached yesterday provides us with financial stability and a fresh start.

He is right to say that we have moved to support not only welfare recipients but hard-working families who otherwise would have been hit by the reduction in tax credits. Whilst the Chancellor may have been pushed back somewhat by the noble lords in the House of Lords, I would say that he will continue to look for that large amount of money — £4.4 billion. Whilst, when he comes to make his comprehensive spending review statement on 25 November, it may not be as hard and fast on tax credits, there will be other consequences in relation to the issue.

We were right to support working families. Likewise, we are right to give hope for the economy here in Northern Ireland. I very strongly believe that the reduction in corporation tax gives hope for businesses here and will allow them to expand and grow in a way that they would not have been able to otherwise and will attract foreign direct investment to Northern Ireland. There is support for working families, hope for the economy and, of course, stability, which we all know will bring further investment in Northern Ireland.

Mr Weir: I will try to keep my question a bit shorter than the previous one. I thank the Minister for her statement. It is notable that those who, not that long ago, were deriding this budgetary process as a "fantasy Budget" are, today, faced with the realities of additional resources for health, education and DRD. Specifically on the issue of education, can the Minister outline how the additional funding for education will maintain and improve schools, and not just in the constituency of North Down?

Mrs Foster: Well done for getting North Down mentioned. As I have indicated, of the £15 million for the Department of Education, £5 million will relate to the drawdown of school surpluses; £5 million to the education and schools estate management; and £5 million to special educational needs. I am sure that everyone in the House will welcome that extra money for special educational needs. I know that, at a constituency level, there have been growing pressures in relation to accessing help for young people who need it in schools. Therefore, I warmly welcome — I am sure the House will warmly welcome — the £5 million for special educational needs, and I hope that it will make a real difference to our young people who, currently, are struggling without that extra help that they would otherwise have.

11.15 am

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next contributor, I have a very long list of Members who wish to speak. The questions are reasonably short but the commentaries are unreasonably long. I just want to draw that to Members' attention.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. I will not mention South Down in my question, although I hope that it gets some resources. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I welcome the statement, which is very important, and I welcome the end-year flexibility for schools. I am sure that the improvements to the schools estate, as was mentioned, will help our construction industry.

The Minister mentioned children with special educational needs, and I share her concern about that. Will she outline what difference the additional resources will make to our special educational needs children?

Mrs Foster: As I just mentioned — I am sure that I am not alone in this — recently a number of parents have been very upset about the fact that they have not been able to access assistance for their young people. They have had the assessment carried out and they know that there is a need to provide assistance, but they have not been able to provide that because the money has not been available. I really hope that this extra £5 million will make a difference to those individuals. It will allow the children to learn in a supported way. It is an issue that many of us across the House have been lobbied on, and I am delighted that we have been able to help today.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I thank the Minister for her statement. Specifically about allocations of funding to job creation and support for it, it has been proven, through facts provided to the Enterprise Committee, that investment in collaborative projects through InterTradelreland and with its support has helped in the drawdown of EU funding for those projects more successfully than would normally be the case. Unfortunately, it appears that InterTradelreland has been targeted for further budget cuts. Does the Minister accept that investment in such projects is of greater benefit in the long term than a simple cut now?

Mrs Foster: I do not have the details of the cut to InterTradelreland that he mentions. He is right that when we work in collaboration we are able to draw down more money. That has been shown by a number of case studies in which InterTradelreland has been involved. As he knows, in-year, people have plans for the year ahead and sometimes things come into those plans that mean that they cannot fulfil them in the financial year. It does not mean that the plans are not going to be fulfilled later on. Resources have been surrendered from the centrally held EU budget; that was in cases where plans had been made but, unfortunately, have not been able to be completed in this year. It does not mean that, in the next year, they will not be completed. That money has been surrendered, and it allows us to reallocate, which is absolutely the right thing to do.

Mrs Dobson: I am sure that many of the 373,000 local people on the waiting lists will join me in welcoming these much-needed additional funds for our health service. Will these additional funds enable the pressures that many domiciliary care providers find themselves under to be lifted? Trusts have often been far too quick to see this area as a soft target for cuts.

Mrs Foster: Of course, each trust has to decide where it believes funding is best directed to. I share her concern about care packages, but if we are going to release beds in hospitals, people need to be able to access care packages to allow them to leave hospitals. Often, as is the case in the south-west in any event, I have found that there are not the staff and the care packages available to allow people to come out of hospital.

I am sure that the Health Minister will agree with me when I say that I hope that there is more proactive management of that system in the coming years, because there is no point in having more money available to allow people to have operations and procedures carried out if they then cannot come out of hospital after those procedures have taken place. Obviously, it is about dealing with the whole spectrum of care not just in hospital but outside hospital.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for her statement, particularly in relation to the additional financial transactions capital. Can the Minister outline to the House how this will allow housing associations to build much-needed affordable homes across Northern Ireland?

Mrs Foster: I am delighted that the Co-ownership Housing Association came forward, through the Department for Social Development, with such a substantial bid for financial transactions capital. I think that it will make a large difference to the housing situation across Northern Ireland, and it takes a huge pressure off me, frankly, in relation to the use of financial transactions capital. As we have said, £10 million is going to Queen's, but the rest of that money will go to the Northern Ireland Co-ownership Housing Association, and it has proven to be a very good catalyst for dealing with the lack of social housing. I hope that that continues to be the case.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for her statement, and I very much welcome the additional investment into the Department of Health, particularly the £40 million for elective care. Specifically in relation to the crisis in our waiting times, what is the Minister's assessment of what that money can do and how much of a shortfall might be left? Also, in going forward, on the protection of the Health budget, coupled with the reform agenda, does the Minister envisage that that protection of Health will be maintained, or is it likely to change?

Mrs Foster: On that last issue, I hope that the Executive have shown that we consider Health to be very much a priority Department in the Executive and for Northern Ireland. We have seen, when Health is under pressure, the impact that that has right across the community in Northern Ireland. Ultimately, of course, it will be a matter for the Executive, after discussion, whether Health remains protected, but I am sure — at least, I hope — that the Minister agrees with me that there is scope for reform in the Department of Health and that we will want to see that reform continuing to take place.

As I have indicated, up to 40,000 people will be able to have assessments using the money that has been allocated today, and up to 15,000 operations and procedures will take place. I think that those are large numbers of operations and assessments in addition to what is already being put through the system at present. Under anyone's money, those are large numbers, and I am pleased that the Executive have decided, again, to prioritise the Health Department.

Mr Dunne: I, too, thank the Minister for the positive news here today. Does the Minister see real benefits for the construction sector flowing from what we have heard today? It is a sector that has suffered so much in the recent downturn in the economy.

Mrs Foster: I do see benefits for the construction industry. Of course, it is not as large as any of us would like. We would like more capital money available to us to be able to give more opportunity to the construction sector, but we have overcommitted with the capital DEL. We do that, and I do not think that that is a significant risk. I think that we will be able to manage that and that it was absolutely right to allocate £5 million capital DEL to DRD. I hope that that will make a difference, and £4 million capital DEL has been allocated to Invest Northern Ireland. Again, we hope that that will make a difference as well. For the forensic lab and prison estates, £2.7 million capital DEL is allocated.

In my Department, I will continue to work with the construction sector to make sure that we can make procurement of government contracts as easily understood and as accessible as we can. I think that we have made progress on that matter, particularly with the new procurement contract regulations, and we will continue to push ahead with that.

Mr McCarthy: Like others, I commend the Minister for her statement this morning. I very much welcome the extra £47.6 million for the health service. However, the Minister may be aware of the request for £98 million in this year's June monitoring round, so that leaves a balance of £51 million. I am disappointed because there is nothing for mental health, learning disabilities or Transforming Your Care, for instance. Can the Minister assure or give some consolation to parents of children with learning disabilities, autism etc that those services will not continue to be the Cinderella of the health service? Simple as that.

Mrs Foster: Well, as simple as that is, I can allocate only the money that I have. First, I wish that I had that sort of money. Secondly, we have to be realistic — this relates to Mrs Cochrane's question — about what can be spent between now and the end of the financial year. I am confident that we have allocated an amount that can be spent. I am not sure that, even if I had been allocated £100 million, it could have been spent.

In response to Mr McCarthy's question about special educational needs and those with learning disabilities, I hope that he welcomes the fact that we have been able to allocate £5 million to schools to help the sort of children whom he refers to. He should recall that it is not just the Department of Health that deals with those children and young people. We should all be concerned about it, and that is why, for me, the Department of Education's allocation is an important one.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Minister for her statement today. Instead of Mike Nesbitt apologising for the singing of our national anthem, maybe he will apologise for getting his financial predictions wrong for this Budget.

Will the Minister outline why she has cancelled January monitoring? Will that mean no further allocations in this financial year?

Mrs Foster: As I said, we are now in a very tight situation because of the turnaround for next year's Budget. We have the comprehensive spending review next week, on 25 November. We then have a very short time to set the Budget for 2016-17. I believe that we have addressed the highest priority pressures in this monitoring round. I do not currently envisage a huge amount of money becoming available to warrant another full monitoring round in this year. However, if money becomes available, I will keep that position under review. We have agreed that there will be a technical monitoring round in January, so, if any issue arises in the interim, we will be able to deal with that there.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I, too, welcome the statement that the Minister has brought to the House today. Looking ahead at the wider strategic and economic issues, I welcome the proposal in 'A Fresh Start' for an independent fiscal council, which appears to pick up on a Finance and Personnel Committee recommendation. In addition to the role outlined in the document at section D, paragraph 4.1, what potential is there for an independent council also to make recommendations on revenues and savings to inform future in-year monitoring decisions?

Mrs Foster: I, too, welcome the proposal for an independent fiscal council. I think that it will give us a fresh and new look at how we approach financial settlements here. Of course, we have already asked the OECD to report on what is happening here, and I hope to have that report towards the end of this month or at the beginning of next month. That will give us a starting point for our financial processes, so I welcome it. If we recognise that we do not have a monopoly on the wisdom in how we deal with things, we should not be afraid to listen to outside, independent views on how we do things.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her exhaustive, perhaps even exhausting statement, this morning. In relation to the allocation of £63.4 million to DSD for the Co-ownership Housing Association, is she convinced that there is the capacity to dispose of that funding in co-ownership housing, given that we have only four months, effectively, until the end of the financial year?

In a sense, it does not really help the construction industry because it is for the purchase and recycling of homes presently built, rather than new builds.

11.30 am

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. If I am not exhausted by now after the talks process, I will never be exhausted. Financial transactions capital is different from other capital funding, in so far as it only has to be allocated in this financial year; it does not have to be spent in this financial year. Therefore, I am confident that it will be dealt with. It takes it off the balance sheet, and that is why it is a very useful way of dealing with the issue. So, they had asked for in and around £10 million more, but that was all that we had to allocate. So, we have allocated it now, and, therefore, it is gone. It is off the sheet, and it does not have to be spent by the end of this year.

Mrs Overend: I welcome the opportunity to ask a question on this issue. I welcome the additional departmental expenditure limit funding that has been allocated to the Department of Education. It is very much needed, especially the money that is going to special educational needs, because it is an issue that has been raised at constituency level time and again. Will the Minister clarify whether the £500 million that the Treasury committed in the Stormont House Agreement to fund shared and integrated projects still stands? I understand that the Executive had the flexibility to spend this money on things that are not necessarily educational but are relevant to a shared future. Will the Minister clarify that issue?

Mrs Foster: Yes, the £500 million that was negotiated last year is still there, as are all the flexibilities and money allocated from last December. What we have been able to achieve in the current negotiations is more flexibility in relation to that money, but, principally, the subject matter is still shared education and other ways of moving Northern Ireland forward in a shared and integrated way. So, I hope that the party that she represents will welcome that; and it will allow us to move money around for a better future for everyone.

Mr Lyons: I also thank the Minister for her statement and welcome the extra money that will be made available for health, roads and education. It is very clear that this monitoring round and the priorities in it reflect the priorities of our constituents, and that is to be welcomed. Can the Minister give us some more detail on why the pressures facing the Executive's Budget are now less than what the Minister indicated earlier this year?

Mrs Foster: We all remember back to June of this year, when a number of Members took great delight in telling me that I was setting a "fantasy Budget". It was not a phrase that I was particularly fond of, I have to say, and I hope that those who doubted the good efforts of us all will now reflect on what they had to say. Back then, we had the pressures of not having access to the voluntary exit scheme money, and, as well as not having access to that money, we could not benefit from the in-year savings that we have now been able to achieve. We had the £114 million of welfare fines and all the consequences relating to that, and, because of the Stormont House Agreement, we now have all the flexibilities that the Budget was predicated on, and more, because, as you know, Mr Speaker, we have been able to achieve more money for the Executive through the Stormont House Agreement and Implementation Plan. So, that is good news for Northern Ireland, and it just shows what hard work, determination and taking responsibility can do.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement to the House this morning and, especially, for the measures in the agreement that will help those most in need in society. Sammy Douglas touched on part of the statement, and there was a debate last week around the November monitoring round. There were some concerns, and one was about the £1.5 million reduction in the social fund, especially in the month of Christmas, when there is usually a run of people seeking crisis loans, but also the allocation to co-ownership. There is a waiting list of 600 for co-ownership, but, for social housing, there is a waiting list of 40,000, with 20,000 people in housing stress. If the Minister for Social Development brought a similar proposal to increase funding for the building of social housing, would the Finance Minister agree to it? If there is a run at Christmas, would more money be made available for those who need crisis loans to help them over Christmas?

Mrs Foster: As I indicated, I can allocate only the money that I have. Indeed, I have overcommitted in resource DEL and capital DEL. However, we have been able to deal with quite a number of bids, as the Member could see from those that were made. I did not receive a bid from DSD in relation to the matters that he raised, and I cannot allocate unless I have a bid. However, as I indicated, if bids come forward and we have money available in January, we will certainly look at those bids.

Mr Ross: Table B of the annex to the statement indicates that the PSNI has returned close to £20 million. We know that, thankfully, the PSNI had to police a quieter summer this year than last. However, is there any other reason why the PSNI return is quite so large, and can DFP offer the police any assistance to help them to manage fluctuations in their budget? Are there any additional resources to help to meet the ongoing legal aid pressures?

Mrs Foster: Indeed, the police returned nearly £20 million during this exercise. However, in the Department of Justice, as I am sure the Member is aware, there is quite a large hole because of legal aid pressures. It was felt, therefore, that that money should be used to deal with those pressures. With budget management, I am sure that he will know that one of the benefits of a quiet summer is that we have money available from the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Frankly, I would rather that we had a quiet summer and money to reallocate in October monitoring than the alternative. Whilst DFP stands ready to assist Departments or arm's-length bodies in any way, I am sure that the police would say exactly the same about the situation.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. First, I welcome the increase for DCAL. As for agriculture, I welcome the TB compensation allocation that has been made to DARD, but does the Minister agree that, in the context of the ongoing work of the TB strategic partnership group on the wildlife issue, the Executive should now review the effectiveness of the compensation scheme that is in place to tackle TB?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member. The issues that he raised about the TB strategic partnership group are not matters for me but for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. I am sure that, if the Minister wants to bring an issue to the Executive, it will be considered by all her colleagues. It is good to be able to allocate £3.9 million to DARD for the TB compensation scheme and £1.1 million to DCAL for its health and safety obligations. That is the budget line under which those have been allocated.

Mrs McKevitt: I thank the Minister for her statement. What funding has been set aside for an effective childcare strategy to support working families?

Mrs Foster: As the Member is aware, there is a consultation, which I think is still ongoing, on childcare, and it is hoped that, once the consultation is finished, we will be able to chart the way forward for childcare. Childcare is one of those issues that, frankly, no Department wanted to take ownership of. OFMDFM had to step in and take ownership of the strategy and is now moving forward to make sure that it will be well resourced and well dealt with in the future. I agree with the Member that an effective childcare strategy unlocks a lot of issues, not least the economic potential of those people who would otherwise have had to stay at home and been unable to access the world of work. In the future, we will be sympathetic to any money being sought for a childcare strategy.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Minister for her statement. I welcome the allocations to Regional Development, including for essential structural maintenance, concessionary fares and community transport. The allocations completely justify the concerns that I raised consistently as Regional Development Minister. I hope that those allocations will be enough, and also, in time, assist a great many local firms that have been struggling for far too long.

The Minister indicated that this is the final monitoring round in this financial year. Can she address my concern, which will undoubtedly be shared by the construction industry, about how the Executive will address the overall shortfall of funding of the capital maintenance, given that approximately £130 million a year is required to maintain our road network?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his welcome in relation to the allocation to DRD. As I said, and he is fully aware of this having been the Minister for Regional Development, we have an incredible pressure in relation to capital funding. That is why I am glad that we have at least been able to allocate £5 million in capital funding, and £11.5 million for essential roads maintenance.

Whilst we would all wish it was more, and would hope to have access to more money for the construction industry, this will be welcomed. I only wish that we had more money to give to the Department. However, I know that the Minister for Regional Development is very content that we have been able to plug at least some of the gap in her budget.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome, Minister, that you made a reference to longer-term budgets and the importance of certainty for large-scale capital projects. I also welcome the fact that the A5 dual carriageway is referenced in the 'Fresh Start' document. Will the Minister now be prepared to work with her colleague the Regional Development Minister to ensure that the draft order is signed off to enable that project to progress to the next stage?

Mrs Foster: The draft order process is entirely a matter for the Regional Development Minister. I am sure that she will have heard what the Member had to say. The reason I mentioned the large-scale projects in the new budgetary process is that if we set a one-year Budget, often that will not allow us to plan ahead. When we are thinking about that Budget and planning ahead, we should, at least, identify a number of large-scale projects that we will be able to roll forward into the next Programme for Government. Otherwise, we would be wasting a year's planning. That is the sort of thinking that we have at this time, but of course that will be a matter for discussion with Executive colleagues.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for her statement. Minister, previously you advised Departments to cease discretionary spending. No doubt, that contributed to the Budget allocations that you have been able to make today. Does that advice to Departments still stand?

Mrs Foster: He is right that that helped us to have money to allocate. I commend colleagues for abiding by that direction. This is an issue that his ministerial colleague raised with me. Now that we have made allocations, the key point is that people live within their controlled total. That is a matter for each Minister. The ministerial letter from me is probably out of date because I have made the allocations. Therefore, it is a matter for each Minister to live within them, and I encourage them to do so.

Mr Allister: Whatever the merits or demerits of this monitoring statement, is it not the truth that in order to make it and the agreement of which it is part, the Minister and her colleagues had to pay the shameful price of sweeping murder under the carpet?

Mrs Foster: Oh, is that the question? Sorry. I wish that people would read the 'Fresh Start' document. I wish that people would see that not only have we principles in respect of paramilitarism and criminality but that we have a plan to deal with it through the strategy; that we are taking action through the joint task force; that we have been allocated £160 million for the Police Service of Northern Ireland; and that we have allocated £25 million in respect of setting up a body to deal with paramilitary activity. So, while he might want to talk about paramilitary activity, some of us are taking action in relation to paramilitary activity, and he can sit back in luxury and do nothing as usual.

11.45 am

Mr McKinney: Does the Minister agree that, whilst the £40 million for elective care is welcome, it is over-welcome, given the Executive's failure to meet over many months? This money will only narrowly go to alleviating the extensive pressures within the health system, and those pressures are down to a failure to properly finance, married to systemic failure.

Mrs Foster: And his failure to agree with welfare reform, which we are about to debate, which would squander millions upon millions of pounds, £114 million this year and £196 million next year. We look forward to his contribution to the debate on welfare reform, which is to come now.

Mr B McCrea: The Minister has mentioned, a number of times, the technical monitoring round that may come up in January 2016. For those of us who follow these issues, it is quite a strange departure that such revaluations, if you like, are not brought back to the Executive. I just wonder why such a dramatic initiative is required because, certainly, there will be members of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee who are worried about internal reallocations going to places that were not thought of at the start of the year.

Mrs Foster: Well, I would hardly call it dramatic in relation to not having a monitoring round in January, given that we will be setting the Budget for next year and that I have said that, if anything comes forward, we will deal with the issue. I am not being prescriptive in relation to the January monitoring round. If there is a need for a January monitoring round, we will deal with it. I say to the Member, if he has concerns in relation to the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, it is a matter for the Committee. The Committee needs to take action in relation to that, not me.

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions on the statement, and I congratulate the Minister in taking so many questions. It may, indeed, be a record.

Standing Order 42A: Suspension

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That Standing Order 42A be suspended in respect of the proposed introduction at Westminster of the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill.

Mr Speaker: As with similar motions, this will be treated as a business motion. There will be no debate. Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Order 42A be suspended in respect of the proposed introduction at Westminster of the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill.

Mr Speaker: I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated and that the motion is agreed.

Welfare Reform: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr Speaker: Before we commence the debate, I encourage Members and the Minister to be mindful of the wording of the motion and confine their comments accordingly. Also, I know that this is a significant item of business, taken after a long period of discussion, but Members should be aware that, if their conduct becomes disorderly, they may not be called to speak.

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That this Assembly consents to the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015 being taken forward by the Westminster Parliament; approves the welfare clauses of the Welfare Reform and Work Bill as initially introduced at Westminster; the draft Welfare Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 2015; and the Executive's proposals to enhance payments flowing from the agreement announced on 17 November 2015.

I am grateful for the opportunity, at long last, to bring this legislative consent motion to the Assembly. I have spent many hours in the Chamber —

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Pursuant to Standing Order 16, I wish to have the opportunity to move that the debate be adjourned to 24 November, next Tuesday and, given the opportunity, I will expound the reasons why.

Mr Speaker: I am content that the motion is in order, and I will allow 30 minutes for debate. Members will have a maximum of three minutes in which to make their comments and they should indicate their desire to speak by informing the Table. The mover of the motion will have three minutes to propose and three to make a winding-up speech. I will not permit interventions during the debate and, if necessary and the House divides, the vote will be by simple majority.

I therefore propose now to suspend the sitting for 10 minutes, to allow Members and parties to make arrangements in relation to speaking in the debate. The Assembly is, by leave, suspended for 10 minutes.

The sitting was suspended at 11.50 am and resumed at 12.02 pm.

Standing Order 16: Delaying Motion

Mr Allister: I beg to move

That this Assembly, in accordance with Standing Order 16, adjourns the debate on the welfare reform legislative consent motion until 24 November 2015.

We are to be asked today, according to the agenda, to approve a legislative consent motion. I suppose that the clue should be in the title — legislative consent. The motion states “That this Assembly”, which is all of us:

“consents to the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015”.

The rather elementary problem is that there is not, as published, a Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015. No one has seen it. Therefore, we are being asked to consent, blind, to a Bill that we have not seen. That begs the question of how far the House is prepared to bend the rules to accommodate such a preposterous proposal.

The motion goes on to state that the Assembly:

“approves the welfare clauses of the Welfare Reform and Work Bill”.

Yes, we can read those. I have read them and understand them, I think. It then states that the Assembly approves:

“the draft Welfare Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 2015”.

Where is it? No one has seen it. It does not exist as far as the House is concerned. The motion goes on to state that the Assembly approves:

“the Executive’s proposals to enhance payments flowing from the agreement announced on 17 November”.

Where are the Executive’s proposals? They have not been published. Nobody has seen them. Therefore, the House is being asked today, with undue haste, to consent to and approve that which it has not seen and cannot see. That seems to me to be absurd. That seems to me to reach new depths of what can only be described as a surreal situation. We are going to approve something, but we have not seen it and cannot read it. It is just not there.

Therefore, I suggest that, since those things are bound to be produced shortly, we adjourn the debate until next Tuesday. In making that proposal, I call in the aid of a paragraph of the agreement. Paragraph 2.2 on page 22 states:

“The Welfare Bill will be debated and approved by the Assembly by way of a Legislative Consent motion no later than the week commencing 23 November”.

Even the agreement anticipates running it to next week. So what is the rush? Why are we foolishly putting ourselves in a position of ridicule by approving something that we have not seen?

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): For accuracy for the Member, the Bill has been published. I have a copy of it here.

The reasons for the utilisation of the Order rather than an Act of the Assembly are set out in the memorandum of understanding that has been tabled today. For the Member’s information, I will read that to him. It states:

“Welfare Reform has already been gradually introduced in [Great Britain] since 2012. The impasse on the implementation of Welfare Reform in Northern Ireland has been a significant ... the [Northern Ireland] Executive in reaching an agreed budget settlement and has attracted financial penalties from [Her Majesty’s Treasury]. Given the financial pressures this has created, it is imperative that reforms are introduced in Northern Ireland as soon as possible.

Given that it would be extremely difficult for the Assembly to legislate on welfare before the end of the current mandate it is essential to allow Westminster to legislate to make the necessary changes.”

To comply with the Westminster timetable, it is necessary to suspend Standing Order 42(a) to enable the legislation to be passed. If the Standing Order were not suspended, it would introduce a delay of a minimum of four weeks, which would jeopardise the passage of the Welfare Bill at Westminster. Those are the reasons why I have decided to move to suspend the Standing Order and proceed with the Bill as set out.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. We welcome the ruling that the motion is in order.

This is a historic agreement. It has been reached across a range of issues after weeks of debate and negotiations. It is about the future of our society. It is about protecting our most vulnerable: our people who are on benefits and who are suffering. It is about defending our public services. It is a very serious debate.

We should get on with the debate. That is where we need to make the points and where all of us, together, need to ensure that we protect our most vulnerable and defend our public services. To be honest, I think that Mr Allister would be better placed doing that than the gimmick that we have seen today.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support Mr Allister’s proposal.

Mr Givan: What a coalition.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Durkan: A proposal was made at yesterday’s Executive meeting and supported by the SDLP to defer any decision on the deal until next week. Evidently, there is great haste to get the deal across the line. Anyone would think that there must be something happening at the weekend. [Laughter.] Mr Allister cited the date that is given in the document and said that agreement must be reached by a date not later than the week commencing 23 November, which is next week.

Also in the document is a throwback to the Stormont House Agreement, institutional reform and how we improve the way that we do business around here. Paragraph 62 on page 36 states:

“Agenda circulated one day in advance of an Executive meeting”.

Before yesterday’s Executive meeting, an agenda and papers were circulated to us half an hour in advance.

This is not the way to do business. We should not be asked to vote on something blind, whether in favour of it or against it. I certainly support calls for a deferral of such a decision.

Mr Nesbitt: I also support the proposal to delay the debate until Tuesday.

It is, after all, less than 24 hours since the DUP and Sinn Féin published this document. I note that this version states that it is from the Northern Ireland Executive rather than the two main parties of the Executive, but we shall see. We shall see which Executive parties end up supporting it. Certainly, the initial version that I was given has no mention of the Executive on its cover.

Anyway, the document gives rise to the Minister's desire to propose a legislative consent motion on welfare reform. That is a very big move, and it is a big document. In briefing the Ulster Unionist Party, the First Minister and deputy First Minister seemed to take a degree of pride in the fact that it is a lengthy and detailed document, unlike the previous Stormont House document of 23 December last. So, there is a lot to study, is there not, as well as the 2015 Order?

Let me just put on record that, during the long talks, we in the Ulster Unionist Party were never in favour of handing welfare power back to Westminster. The reason for that is simple. The clue is in this title: we are Members of a legislative Assembly. We are supposed to be legislators. Is the height of our ambition to legislate to hand over the power to legislate to others because we want Westminster to pick up on welfare reform; we want a panel on paramilitaries; we want a panel deciding who the vulnerable are? It seems that the only thing that we want to legislate on is to give power away. Is that the height of our ambitions?

So, if this document really is a fresh start and is going to deliver —

Mr Speaker: May I just remind you that we are discussing a motion to postpone the discussion that you are having until next week. So, I think that you should address the motion that we are presently addressing, not the one that is to come.

Mr Nesbitt: OK, Mr Speaker. I will stand by that. I will conclude by saying that this is, according to the document:

"An agreement to consolidate the peace, secure stability, enable progress and offer hope".

If it is that important, surely allowing a few extra days for those of us who have had the document and the proposals for less than 24 hours makes utter, logical sense.

Dr Farry: Mr Speaker, mindful of your ruling, I will keep my remarks, and my colleagues will keep theirs, on the substance of the LCM until later in the debate. However, just to put it in context, we are speaking today as a party that is minded to vote in favour of the LCM, notwithstanding that we have expressed scepticism around the deal, particularly the rush and the degree of transparency. That said, in our wider intentions, we believe that nothing would be lost by the Assembly having a week to consider the wider documentation around this. Many of those documents are already in the public domain. However, all of this is happening within a very rushed timescale.

In that context, Mr Durkan referred to the proposal that David Ford made at the Executive yesterday that consideration of the agreement be delayed until next week. The agreement itself refers to the week of 23 November being the decision-making week. In that respect, we believe that delaying a decision in the Assembly is consistent with the agreement, even though we have not yet, at this stage, endorsed that agreement.

A delay would allow Assembly Members to avoid the sense that they are being bounced or pressurised into making a very big decision over a very short time, less than 24 hours after the information, request or notice of an LCM came into the public domain. We think that that is the only fair way that the Assembly can have an open, fair and transparent debate, where no one can have any complaints, irrespective of parties' ultimate decisions on individual aspects of the deal, such as the LCM itself.

Mr B McCrea: I think that Mr Allister was quite prescient in bringing this to our attention. In his response, the Minister made a good argument for why Standing Order 42A needed to be suspended. I take on board that there would otherwise be a four-week delay that may cause some problems in the legislative programme at Westminster. However, I am not sure that he addressed why we should not wait until next Tuesday.

There is some talk that this appears to be a deal between the DUP and Sinn Féin. I am sure that they do not want it to be that and that they would like it to be more inclusive and to bring more people into the debate. Therefore, there is an argument for delaying it for a week to give people a chance to study it and come forward with proposals. Like Mr Farry, I will, in all probability, support the LCM, but I think that we should not rush into it. As a matter of principle, when you are asked to consent to something but you do not know what it is, and, as far as I am aware, it has not been laid, that seems to be a very dangerous precedent to set. If you are going to agree to something on a legislative basis, it ought to be in front of you so that you can see what you are agreeing to. On that basis, I will be supporting Mr Allister's motion.

12.15 pm

Mr Allister: I reiterate this: this is on the very simple but elementary premise that you should not consent to something that you cannot see and that you have not got.

Mr P Robinson: It is here. Open your eyes, then. Read it.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Allister: The Minister claimed that the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015 is published.

Mr P Robinson: It is.

Mr Allister: Well, it is not in the Bill Office, so it is not available to a Member of the House. How are we to consent to something that is not available?

Mr P Robinson: It is available.

Mr Allister: It may be available to some clique —

Mr P Robinson: It is available to the public.

Mr Allister: — but it is not available to Members of the House — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has three minutes to conclude.

Mr Allister: — nor is the Welfare Reform (Northern Ireland) Order, nor the proposals. We are asked to approve four things in the motion, and three of them are unavailable —

Mr P Robinson: Wrong. Wrong.

Mr Allister: — to Members of the House.

Why the rush, in breach of the very timeline in the agreement itself? Why the rush? Is Mr Durkan right? Is that the reason for the rush? Really, the House does itself no favours for its standing if it simply nods through something that it has not even seen. As others said, there is nothing to be lost and much to be gained by taking the six days to allow the Bill to be put into the hands of everyone and published, and to allow the Order to be published so that the House properly, by due process, can consent in an informed way to what it is being asked to consent to.

Anyone who is wondering about the degree to which we are departing from the norms should read Standing Order 42A, which we have agreed to set aside. We have set aside huge hurdles, and, having agreed to do that, the least that we can do is now consent to delay the debate until the documents that we are being asked to agree are in our hands, because today they are not. That is unconscionable and wrong, and I very much regret the fact that the clique that dominates the House is nonetheless going to force through the House a suggestion that we pass that which we have not seen and cannot see.

Welfare Reform: Legislative Consent Motion

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly consents to the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015 being taken forward by the Westminster Parliament; approves the welfare clauses of the Welfare Reform and Work Bill as initially introduced at Westminster; the draft Welfare Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 2015; and the Executive's proposals to enhance payments flowing from the agreement announced on 17 November 2015. — [Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development).]

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development):

I am glad that that suspension was not as long as the previous one and that we are now able to proceed. As I was stating at the commencement, I, like many Members, have spent many hours in the Chamber over the past 12 months dealing with the issue of welfare reform. We can all remember the marathon sessions when we discussed the Welfare Reform Bill at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage and how, ultimately, the Bill fell at its Final Stage.

We all recognise and understand the political and ethical challenges that the Welfare Reform Bill presents for all the parties in the Assembly. It has been clear for many months that getting the Welfare Reform Bill through the Assembly would be difficult and was not going to happen in the short term. In order to make progress, it was essential that we were creative and innovative in finding a way to move forward whilst recognising and addressing the genuine concerns that many in the Chamber hold about the proposed changes to the welfare system. Indeed, many of those concerns are held by many of our constituents across Northern Ireland. This has been a difficult balance to achieve, but I believe that the proposals before the Assembly today represent the most practical way of achieving it. I am, therefore, asking the Assembly to pass this legislative consent motion, which will enable us to reform the welfare system whilst helping the most vulnerable and those hard-working families who would lose their tax credits under the plans announced by the Chancellor.

This motion seeks agreement, in principle, from the Assembly for the Government to introduce the changes to the welfare system in Northern Ireland at Westminster through the Northern Ireland (Welfare Reform) Bill 2015. For those Members who claim that they have not seen it and wish to have sight of it, that information is available on the Northern Ireland Office website.

This motion also provides for the introduction of both the Welfare Reform Order 2015 and the welfare clauses of the Welfare Reform and Work Bill, which was introduced in Westminster earlier this year.

The legislative consent motion will also ensure that the Executive will have the necessary powers to put the top-ups in place that follow from the agreement that was announced yesterday. Let me assure Members that the Welfare Reform Order 2015 will reflect the amendments and provisions that were agreed by the Assembly at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill.

At the heart of the Fresh Start Agreement is, I believe, a recognition of the harsh fiscal realities that we, as an Executive, face, as well as a will to tackle the difficult issue of welfare and the protection of our most vulnerable citizens as we move forward. The Executive are committed to legislating for the implementation of a range of mitigation measures to offset the more adverse impacts of the Government's reform proposals. It builds on the work that was taken forward in the Stormont Castle agreement but also provides £240 million for families impacted by tax credits. No one should underestimate the difficulties and challenges that would have been created for families had we not made such an agreement.

This fresh start to how we deal with welfare reform will help ensure that Northern Ireland has a welfare system that meets the needs of its people and that is fair, affordable and deliverable. There are Members who, maybe, need that to be repeated: we want to ensure, for our people in Northern Ireland, a welfare system that meets their needs and that is fair, affordable and deliverable.

Our critics have continually complained about the failure to reach agreement on welfare and about how that has led to public services in Northern Ireland being damaged because of the fines being imposed by Treasury. If the Assembly passes this legislative consent motion, it will bring the regime of financial penalties to an end, and, indeed, the Executive will be able to reclaim some of the penalties that the Treasury has already taken from the block grant. The Westminster Bill will include a sunset clause that will ensure that these arrangements will apply only until the end of next year.

Members, let me assure you that I recognise that this is a difficult issue for many in the Chamber, but I believe that passing this motion represents the best way forward.

I conclude, Mr Speaker, with the comments I made when I first came to the House as Minister to introduce the process of welfare. Let us not forget that we are dealing with people's lives. We are dealing with real people; we are dealing with people across our country who have real challenges and issues. I believe that it is incumbent upon us to do everything that we can. Yes, there are challenges, and, yes, it has been difficult, but we have stayed at this in a way which, I believe, has brought us to the place where we can have a fresh start on welfare. I commend the motion to the House.

Ms P Bradley: Thank you, Mr Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on the legislative consent motion. It is not my intention to repeat the many arguments for and against the impact of welfare reform. Indeed, this piece of legislation has been scrutinised and debated to the nth degree not only in the Committee for Social Development but in the Chamber. It has also been scrutinised in the many churches, community groups and civic buildings up and down the country. I cannot say that I look back with the fondest of memories to some of the many evenings spent in venues across Northern Ireland, listening to the concerns of individuals, the voluntary and community sector and, most importantly for me, the women's lobby. Thankfully, those voices were instrumental in shaping the Welfare Reform Bill that is tailored to Northern Ireland.

In preparation for the debate, I looked back at the contributions from all parties in the Assembly. No party in the Chamber has the monopoly on representing the vulnerable, and there is no party that does not agree with the general principles of the Bill, yet it has proven to be one of the most contentious pieces of legislation that the Assembly has had to deal with. Possibly, some in the Chamber today will make jibes in an attempt to politically grandstand and electioneer on the decision to allow Westminster to legislate. I ask them to remember that the legislation deals with a high number of our constituents whom we have vowed to represent and who, for some time, have been living with the unknown as to how their future will be affected.

I find it quite strange today to be speaking about welfare reform but not seeing Mr Mickey Brady's face across the Chamber. Mr Brady, when debating welfare reform — he talked quite a bit about the subject — never mentioned the word "benefits". I totally agree with his not mentioning it, because, when we think of benefits, we conjure up an image of advantage, a better life and something that makes life more comfortable. That is not what the benefits system is about, and it certainly does not do that.

I want to digress ever so slightly, if you will give me your permission, Mr Speaker, because I want to bring into the debate the issue of tax credits. Perhaps, you will allow me to explain why. Of course, I will respect your judgement should you ask me to go off the subject. As many Members will know, I was a single parent very soon after having my children. I was also a working mother, and I worked extremely hard to pay a mortgage and keep a roof over our heads. I remember working with many people who, like me, were in receipt of child benefit. I used to envy those who told me that they put away their child benefit to pay for a holiday or spending money, for their children going to university or to buy them their first car. I could not wait to get my child benefit every month just to put money in the electric meter. That is what so many people on welfare benefits face every day.

In another vein, I am old enough to have been a parent when family credit came in. What a difference that made to my life. What a difference it made to my children's lives. The difference in their birthdays, Christmases and any holidays that we had was because I was a working mother getting assistance through working tax credits. I want to commend not only my party but other parties in the Chamber that, at Westminster and in the House of Lords, voted against the Conservative cuts to tax credits. I, as a working mother, like many other working mothers and fathers out there, know just how much they benefit us and how much that benefits the economy. I welcome that and say well done to them.

I want to comment on the agreement reached on the £240 million for working tax credits. I know, as we all know here, that this will affect our nurses, our healthcare assistants and the people who work in our hairdressers, dentists and butchers. All along all our streets in Northern Ireland, they are the people who will benefit from this. It is vital that I put that in.

In finishing, I ask that all parties around the Chamber put aside their differences and what has happened during the talks over recent weeks. Instead, consider the impact on those in the welfare system and on our constituents who have felt the effects of nothing being done, and consider how that has manifested itself across all Departments. I support the legislative consent motion.

Mr Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I would also like to offer my support to the legislative consent motion. The Minister, when he was summing up, correctly referred to the fact that this is about families and people. It is about the impact that unjust and unfair changes to welfare and, now, proposed changes to family tax credit assistance by the Westminster Government will have on the real lives of ordinary people right across society here.

12.45 pm

Our responsibility as elected representatives is to do something about that. That is what brought us to the point, this time last year, in the Stormont House discussions as to how we would collectively create some type of mitigation system that would recognise the unfairness of the British Government's — at that stage, the coalition Government — decision to target those most vulnerable and most in need as a means to reduce the deficit when other means were very clearly available to them.

We had a very lengthy, detailed and often fractious discussion in Stormont House this time last year in the build-up to the Stormont House Agreement in December. At one stage, we had a four-party agreement on how this should be tackled, when the, then, other four parties in the Executive settled for an approach to resolve these issues. Sinn Féin was not satisfied with that, and we held out until such times as we secured a five-party agreement, when all the Executive parties agreed the approach that would be taken on welfare reform legislation and the establishment of a bespoke mitigation system to deal with those who were most affected and most vulnerable.

That Welfare Reform Bill went through after various debates and amendments having been made to it, but it fell at the last hurdle, after a very lengthy progress through this institution, because we were not satisfied, and we had some disagreements with the Minister for Social Development about the roll-out and design of some of the schemes that were to give effect to the agreement that we had. That is where the issue stopped.
